The Debates of the Senate

OFFICIAL REPORT

THE SENATE.

Thursday, January 18, 1917.

The Senate met at 2.30 o'clock p.m.

APPOINTMENT OF SPEAKER.

A communication under the Great Seal was read announcing that Hon. Joseph Bolduc had been appointed Speaker of the Senate.

The Honourable the Speaker was then conducted to his seat by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Mr. La Rivière.

Prayers.

OPENING OF THE SESSION.

The Honourable the SPEAKER informed the Senate that he had received a communication from the Governor General's Secretary informing him that His Excellency the Governor General would proceed to the Senate Chamber to open formally the Session of the Dominion Parliament on Friday, the 19th instant, at three o'clock; also, a further communication from the Governor General's Secretary informing him that the Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, would proceed to the Senate Chamber to open the session of the Dominion Parliament on Thursday, the 18th of January, at three o'clock, p.m.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

After some time the sitting was resumed.

The Right Honourable Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, G.C.M.G., Chief Justice of Canada, having come and being seated,

The Honourable the SPEAKER commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that: "It is the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General's desire that they attend him immediately in the Senate."

Who being come,

The Honourable the SPEAKER said:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have it in command from the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present Parliament until a Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law; but to-morrow, at the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon, His Excellency will declare the causes of his calling this Parliament.

The Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

After some time the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

On the motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed that the House do now adjourn:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If it is in order to do so, I wish to express my surprise that one day of the time of Parliament has not been saved by the House of Commons electing its Speaker to-day and being called into this Chamber an hour later for the opening of the session. It seems to me that it is hardly right that a loss of twenty-four hours should be caused by a function which occupies only about half an hour of the time of the other House.

AUTHORITY OF THE DEPUTY GOVERNOR GENERAL.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I wish to ask if the Deputy Governor General has a special commission to open this Session of Parliament, or does he act ex officio as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am informed that the Supreme Court Act provides that the Chief Justice of Canada shall act as Deputy Governor General, in which capacity he comes to Parliamen to perform the functions of that office; so that a commission is entirely unnecessary.

Hon. Mr. POWER: My impression is that Chief Justice Fitzpatrick holds a special commission which was presented to the Clerk of this House some two or three years ago.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I presume that was a special commission for the special purpose of opening Parliament at that time.

Hon. Mr. POWER: No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I know that last year another commission was issued. However, I suppose the question may be postponed to be looked into.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My impression is that the commission to the Deputy Governor General was issued by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, and that it has lapsed with the expiration of His Royal Highness's term as Governor General.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned until 2.30 o'clock p.m. tomorrow.

THE SENATE.

Friday, January 19, 1917.

The Senate met at 2.30 o'clock p.m., the Speaker in the Chair, and immediately thereafter adjourned during pleasure.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

At three o'clock His Excellency the Governor General proceeded in state to the Senate Chamber and took his seat upon the Throne. The members of the Senate being assembled, His Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the House of Commons, and that House being come, His Excellency was pleased to open the Seventh Session of the Twelfth Parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following Speech:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I desire on this occasion to express my respectful appreciation of the honour conferred on me by the King in appointing me to the distinguished office of Governor General.

I esteem it a high privilege to become closely identified with Canada at the time when she is taking so splendid a part in the world-wide struggle, and I look forward to her ability and capacity to exercise an ever-increasing influence in bringing the war to a victorious conclusion.

When peace is again happily restored I am confident that the vast resources of the Dominion will continue to be developed for the lasting benefit of the Empire and in the best interests of liberty and humanity.

Although nearly two and a half years have elapsed since the outbreak of war yet that period has not been more than sufficient for the enormous preparation necessary to enable our Empire to throw its full strength into the struggle.

The events that have transpired since prorogation give convincing testimony of the efficiency of the measures thus taken and bear splendid tribute to the valour and heroism of His Majesty's forces in every theatre of war.

With preparation already so ample and still increasing we may confidently anticipate that the not distant future will bring such success to the allied arms as will assure the full maintenance of the purposes and ideals for which we have engaged in this war.

The Canadian forces dispatched overseas during 1916 numbered more than 165,000 and the aggregate of enlistments in Canada since the outbreak of war is nearly 400,000. In attack as well as in defence the valour, endurance and resourcefulness of the Canadian troops have been conspicuous on every occasion when they have met the enemy, and they have splendidly upheld the highest traditions of their country.

Equally notable and impressive has been the fine spirit of loyalty displayed by the people of this Dominion who have freely dedicated their energies and their material resources to the common defence of our Empire.

Steps have been taken by my advisers for better organization of National Service, and attention has been given to the more thorough utilization of our natural resources. Measures have also been taken in co-operation with the Government of the United Kingdom to facilitate the increased production of munitions in Canada.

The Government of the United Kingdom have invited the First Ministers of the Dominions to attend a series of special and continuous meetings of the War Cabinet (of which for this purpose they will be members) to consider urgent questions affecting the prosecution of the war, the possible conditions on which the Allied Nations could assent to its termination, and the problems which would then immediately arise. This invitation has been accepted on behalf of Canada.

The Fiftieth Anniversary of the foundation of this Dominion draws near and brings with it the inspiring memory of all that has been accomplished during the half century in the upbuilding of a united and powerful nation. My advisers believe that, notwithstanding the continuance of the war, there should be an appropriate commemoration of an event so notable in the history of Canada.

The life of the present Parliament will expire in October next, and under existing legislation a dissolution and election would be necessary in the early future. My advisers, however, are of opinion that the wishes of the Canadian people and the urgent requirements of the war would be best met by avoiding the distraction and confusion consequent upon a general election at so critical a time.

That purpose can only be effected through the medium of legislation by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. A resolution authorizing and requesting the enactment of such legislation as will further extend the life of this Parliament will be presented to you.

Although in some parts of the Dominion weather conditions affected adversely the excellent prospects of an unusually large harvest, yet taking the country as a whole, the labours of our husbandmen have been abundantly rewarded.

The commercial, industrial and financial stability of the country has been well maintained during the past year. There is every reason to believe that the Dominion will be in a position to meet satisfactorily the readjustment of conditions which must ensue upon the termination of the war.

Important measures designed to aid in meeting these new conditions have been in preparation and some of them will be submitted for your consideration.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts for the last, and the estimates for the next fiscal year will be submitted to you without delay, and you will be asked to make the necessary financial provision for the effective conduct of the war.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The lofty patriotism, the fine courage, and the inflexible purpose which have animated all His Majesty's Dominions in upholding our great cause are in nowise abated. In common with the rest of the Empire the people of this Dominion are firmly resolved that in this war, which has entailed so much sacrifice and which we have undertaken for the highest ideals of humanity and civilization, our efforts shall be continued and strengthened until they are crowned with an abiding peace.

I commend to your attentive consideration all measures submitted to you for that great purpose, and I pray that the Divine blessing may attend your deliberations.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Prayers.

BILL PRO FORMA.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED presented a Bill intituled, An Act relating to Railways.

The Bill was read the first time.

CONSIDERATION OF HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, it was ordered that the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General be taken into consideration on Tuesday next.

COMMITTEE ON ORDERS AND PRIVILEGES.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That all the Senators present during this Session be appointed a Committee to consider the Orders and Customs of the Senate and privileges of Parliament, and that the said Committee have leave to meet in the Senate Chamber when and as often as they please.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE OF SELECTION.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the following Senators were appointed a Committee of Selection to nominate Senators to serve on the several Standing Committees during the present Session. Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Hon. Messrs. Béique, Casgrain, Daniel, Power, Ross (Moosejaw), Taylor, Watson, and the mover.

IMPERIAL WAR CONFERENCE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED laid on the Table certain papers relating to the Imperial War Conference of 1917.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, the 23rd instant, at 3 o'clock p.m.

THE SENATE.

Tuesday, January 23, 1917.

The Senate met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED.

The following newly-appointed senators were severally introduced and took their seats:

Hon. W. H. Richardson, of Kingston, Ontario, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

Hon. Gideon D. Robertson, of Welland, Ontario, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

Hon. George Lynch-Staunton, of Hamilton, Ontario, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Mr. Milne.

Hon. Adam B. Crosby, of Halifax, Nova Scotia, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Mr. Dennis.

Hon. Charles E. Tanner, of Pictou, Nova Scotia, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Mr. McLennan.

EXTENSION OF PARLIAMENTARY TERM.

MOTION.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN rose to move:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a copy of the correspondence, which has passed, between the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Sir Robert L. Borden, and the leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition of Canada, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, regarding the war extension of time of the life of the present Parliament, be brought down and laid on the Table of the Senate for the information and consideration of the honourable members of this House.

He said: The object I had in view in giving notice of this matter on the opening day of the session and bringing it before the House, has been attained, not in full measure, but in very fair measure, of which you have the proof in the introduction of five new senators, with two more to come. My object was to call public attention without delay to the abnormal condition of things that existed regarding the representation in this honourable House. To attain that object, I had to ask for the production of the official correspondence between the Prime Minister of Canada and the leader of His Majesty's loyal Opposition in the House of Commons which dealt exclusively with this question of representation.

In my opinion the Prime Minister acted wisely in consulting the leader of the Opposition in regard to the parliamentary representation during war time. The Prime Minister requested that all vacancies occurring in the House of Commons during war time should be filled by representatives of the same political faith as that of those who had resigned or died during the existing term of Parliament. That was a fair proposition. The proposition was entertained by the leader of the Opposition; but it went only half way. He was prepared to allow any vacancy caused by death to be refilled by a Conservative or a Liberal, according to the political faith of his predecessor. I may say that neither the Prime Minister nor the leader of the Opposition made any provision for the death or the resignation of Nationalists. They were left on one side. That is a very strange thing; and I simply call the attention of this honourable House to the fact.

Pourparlers went on, as demonstrated in the correspondence, between the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition, with this result, that the latter was prepared to stand by an agreement whereby vacancies caused by death should be refilled by representatives of the same political faith as those who had previously occupied the seats. He would not consent to have members elected to vacancies caused by resignations. That was a most fair proposition. Vacancies caused by resignations are not in the same class as those caused by death. Vacancies may be caused by resignations for political purposes, and the leader of the Opposition was perfectly justified in resisting the demand of the Prime Minister that such vacancies should be filled by Conservatives.

Now, what has happened since then? The membership of this honourable House has been depleted very largely during the period of this war. Even to-day one of our trustiest and best workers has gone to his heavenly reward, the honourable senator from Prince Albert, Tom Davis. So we go, and so we come. It is hard to get here, but ah, it is so easy to go. What provision has either the leader of the Government or the leader of the Opposition in the Lower House made—and I blame them not—regarding representation in this honourable House? They have made absolutely none; and to-day seats in this honourable House that were held by Conservatives are refilled by Conservatives and seats that were held by Liberals are refilled by Conservatives. Is that a fair attitude for the Government to assume in this time of war? Why protect a representative in the House of Commons and refuse similar protection in the Upper House, called the Senate of Canada? Is it fair or just? I appeal to my honourable friends on the other side: is it fair under the circumstances and during a time like this, that the same rule should not apply to representatives in the Upper House as is applied by joint consent in the Lower House? There is the position involved in the correspondence for which I am asking, between the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition.

Now, hon. gentlemen, until I called attention to the matter last Thursday, the opening day of Parliament, no steps had been taken to fill the vacancies in this honourable House. Seats are unoccupied not only on account of death, but many owing to other reasons, such as sickness, absenteeism, and, I must add, to a very small degree owing to resignations. But, to the credit of the Senate, to the credit of its stability, very few resignations are handed in. During the fourteen years that I have been here I can recall only three senators who resigned their seats in this honourable House. There was one from the province of Quebec, but he did not retire into oblivion; he resigned to take a judgeship. Another retired to take the Lieutenant Governorship of his native province of Nova Scotia. The third was from New Brunswick, and he resigned, not to retire from public life, but to occupy the high and honourable position of Lieutenant Governor of his province. These are the only three.

Strange to say, but it must go on record, that in all the population of Canada since Confederation there has been found only one man who declined—refused, indeed—to take a seat in this House, although duly appointed by Order in Council, duly signed by the Governor General, who, I think, was Lord Minto.

Vacancies have been caused by death, by illness and by absenteeism, so this is a question that should appeal to the members of this honourable House. We should see that our rights are protected as well as those of the House of Commons. The people of the country will look for fair representation not only in the House of Commons but also in this House. If things go on as they are going, if the war lasts much longer, there will be only a corporal's guard left on this side of the House. It is an ill wind that does not blow some one good, and the Conservative Government is very fortunate owing to the war; the membership of this House is being depleted, and will continue to be depleted to the detriment of the Liberal sentiment and the people of this country. Is that a fair situation in face of the extensions of time that have been granted? If so, then I say, no more extensions, we do not want to be obliterated. If the Government are counting on the duration of the war to wipe out the Liberal party, it is the duty of the Liberal party to deny any further extensions. That is the stand I take, and that is the stand the country will justify. I hope that the production of this correspondence will lead to a discussion of this situation, which I say is not fair, is not just, is not in accordance with the demands and requests of the Prime Minister in the Lower House.

The motion was agreed to.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Hon. JOHN S. McLENNAN rose to move that an Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to offer the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious Speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament. He said:

Honourable gentlemen, it is usual at a time like the present, when there has been a change of the head of the State, to make some reference to that change in speaking to the resolution which I have the honour to lay before you. The thought naturally arises in one's mind, "Le roi est mort, vive le roi"; but, though kings may die, viceroys do not die. Many of Canada's viceroys have passed on to situations of the greatest importance, and have done work for the Empire elsewhere which has added new laurels to those which they had gained in Canada.

The predecessor of the present Governor General, the Duke of Connaught, has gone back to the Old Country to continue there that active interest in all things Canadian, that kindly care for Canadians in England and in the field of battle which endeared him to the people of Canada while he was here and made his tenure of that high office one of the most successful since Confederation.

The present Governor General gives us full cause for the expectation that he will adequately fill the high office to which he has been called. He comes of a very noble house, a house of great achievements. Going back no further than our own time, his grandfather united the rarest qualities. He had an academic career in which he won the highest honours at that university which I am bound to consider in the very forefront of institutions of learning. He endowed that university with equipment for research which made it possible for Cambridge to enlarge the boundaries of scientific knowledge; and for many years he ruled over its affairs as Chancellor. Turning his attention to affairs, he became what is now called a captain of industry, but, unlike many captains of industry, he risked his own money. When he turned his attention to Barrow on the northwest coast of England it was only a fishing hamlet. In its development he risked his own money. It is now a shipbuilding place and a seat of metal working only less important than the great centres of the Clyde and the rivers of the East Coast. His successor was a statesman who thrice might have been the Prime Minister of Great Britain, had he so willed, one whom his political opponents, as well as his political allies regarded as a man of unswerving loyalty to his convictions, of integrity and of unselfishness. With such a history and such forebears His Excellency comes to begin his tenure of office with us. He brings with him Her Excellency to renew the memories of her childhood in Canada. Like himself, she comes from a house famous for its high ideals, its statesmanship, and its scholarly attainments. Canada welcomes them; her people wish them health and prosperity, and that they may so discharge the duties of their high office that they shall hand on to their descendants the achievement of well-done public service more splendid than the memories which they themselves have inherited.

His Excellency comes to us at a happy time. When one looks at the war map on which has been traced a line of battle, there are but few changes in that long front; but there is a different spirit abroad in the air. If we turn to the actual conditions with regard to munitions, with regard to the spirit of our troops, with regard to foreign nations, with regard to our military plans, both those of Great Britain and those of her Allies, there is everything to make us feel confident that we have now turned into "the straight," and that no matter how far off the goal may be, it is only necessary that we go on as we have begun, developing our resources to the utmost and using them with the highest efficiency and skill, to reach the goal with all that means to us, to the Allies, and to civilization.

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: With regard to what Canada has been doing in the year that has passed, our troops have well sustained the reputation made by them in the first years of this war; but to their valour I shall only pay a tribute of proud and grateful silence. At home the products of our fields, our forests, our fisheries and factories, have been useful not only to our own troops and to those of Great Britain, but have also provided materials and supplies for our Allies. Time was, and not so long ago, when the art of making munitions was supposed to be one of the most difficult of all manufacturing arts. The composition of the materials which went into them, the delicacy and accuracy which were required in the adjustment of the parts when they were made, were supposed to be within the power of only very few. But Canadian metallurgists have been able to compound materials which have stood the most exhausting tests. Canadian manufacturers have been able to work to that high degree of precision which is required, and to-day there are between four and five hundred establishments in Canada turning out munitions of war which are not only being used on the western battle front, but are also, after that long journey across Canada, across the Pacific, and across Siberia, helping to supply the Russian troops who are gallantly facing the Germans on the shores of the Black sea.

On the financial and economic side, much has been done. Within the past year a domestic loan was offered in Canada; its amount was $100,000,000. Thirty-five thousand subscriptions were received; their aggregate was $200,000,000. In addition to that our financial resources have been such that over $150,000,000 of Canadian money has gone to support the purchases in Canada of the Imperial Munitions Board.

Our Red Cross societies and similar philanthropic institutions have supplied handsomely the wants of our soldiers at the front. They have aided not only our own soldiers, but also those of our Allies.

The Patriotic Fund, which supplements the liberal pay and separation allowances to soldiers with dependents, began its career in supplying these wants by calling on the people of Canada. The first call was made shortly after the war broke out, and $6,000,000 was raised. A second call was made last year; then $10,000,000 was raised. The campaign for the third contribution has just begun, and the Fund expects $12,000,000. It needs that amount, for the Patriotic Fund disburses among 65,000 people close on a million each month. The campaign has been completed in only one place—the city of Hamilton, in Ontario. The managers of the Patriotic Fund expected that that city would do as well as it did last year, namely, contribute $500,000. The result of the campaign which has just finished has been that Hamilton has contributed $650,000. If that goes on, the $12,000,000 which the Patriotic Fund confidently expects will stretch out to 15 or 16 million dollars.

But charities like these, which begin well at home, it has always been found, spread far afield. The Red Cross Society has aided the Red Cross societies of Great Britain, France, Italy, Russia and Montenegro.

Special funds also have been started in Canada and have been carried to a successful conclusion. The claims of Belgium, the first of all the claims, appealed very strongly to the imagination and the sympathies of the Canadian people. Serbia also has been assisted. The fund to relieve Eastern Jews has been handsomely assisted. Within the last few months a fund for the widows and orphans, dependents of British seamen, has met with the handsomest response. I understand that $50,000,000 has been contributed by the people of Canada to these various philanthropic and beneficent purposes within these last years.

But these contributions and the loans which have been made to help the fighting forces have been made posible only by the saving of the Canadian people. Although we are in the race, we do not know how long it will be before the winning post is reached; but to continue in the race means thrift, more thrift, and always thrift. The figures with which I have been dealing have been large: $100,000,000 to the loan, $150,000,000 in aid of the Imperial purchases in this country, and forty or fifty millions of philanthropic money, mean a good deal. While they undoubtedly mean a heavy burden upon us and upon future generations, a burden which we are bound to meet and bound to pay, for the sake of what the result will mean to us, it is not a matter for discouragement. Those who have actual money in their safes are the keenest critics of the resources of the people who come to them with promises to pay in future. Wall street and the United States are in a better position than any other people to know what are the resources of Canada and what are the probabilities that Canada will meet any obligations that she may undertake. They know the situation, for they have examined it. It is a proud thing for Canada to be able to say that, notwithstanding these large burdens, her obligation in the exchanges of the United States sell on as favourable terms as the loans of France, the loans of Great Britain, and that loan which is backed not only by the great resources of Great Britain, but as well by the thrift and the specie of France.

In carrying on this war the aim of our military organization has been two-fold: first to turn citizens into soldiers, and get them to the front; secondly to take those soldiers, their service done, and turn them back into citizens, bettered, as far as may be, from their experiences at the front. The Militia Department has equipped and put under arms 380,000 men. In the second case it is with the disabled and the invalided we have to deal. The Military Hospitals Commission of which Sir James Lougheed is chairman, and of which I have the honour to be a member, has passed through its institutions some 9,000 invalided. We are now extending our work as the calls on us increase, and within a week or two we shall have no less than 64 institutions, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, fully equipped for the care of between eight and nine thousand invalids at one time. Our problem is to do the best we can for the invalided soldier. That consists in his restoration, as far as it is possible for medical skill to restore him, to the complete use of his functions—and medical skill has made enormous advances within the last few years. The skill of Canadian medical men has been freely placed at our disposal. Then, that man has to be re-educated, improved, during his stay in our convalescent homes, or, it may be, trained to take a new employment; and then employment has to be found for him. The latter work is being carried on by our allies, the Provincial Soldiers' Aid Commissions. In every province of this Dominion there is an organization to take care of the man when the Hospitals Commission has done its best for him. Then, in an other allied work, there has to be a repayment, as far as repayment is possible, of the obligations the country owes to the man who has been permanently injured in his country's service. That is taken up by a Pensions Board which has made a very careful study of what has been done in all countries; and that Board is promptly and effectively dealing with one of the most delicate and intricate problems that can arise out of the war.

There is but one other point of the Speech from the Throne to which I shall direct your attention. It is that which speaks of the fifty years which have passed since the scattered provinces in this part of the British Empire were brought together in Confederation. The older of us are apt to forget, the younger people never knew, how difficult, how dangerous, and how uncertain was the trend of events during, say, thirty years of that period. In the first Parliament, which sat after Confederation, Sir John Macdonald, the leader of the Government, had occasion to use these words:

> I hope to live to see the day, and, if I do not, that my son may be spared to see Canada the right arm of England, to see Canada a powerful auxiliary to the Empire, not as now a cause of anxiety and a source of danger.

The dawn of the day for which Sir John Macdonald longed, broke last year on the battlefields of France and Flanders, when Canada proved herself the right arm of the Empire. During those thirty years people in Canada, of all parties, felt that its economic and industrial development was largely dependent on our relations with the United States. Every ministry which held office in those thirty years tried, and tried with every power which they possessed, to improve those trade relations. Not one of those efforts was successful. Canada never in those thirty years ceased to regard her great neighbour as a Hercules, but it was only toward the end of the period that she found herself an Antæus gaining the strength of self-reliance from every downfall. Many things contributed to the result which was finally reached when Canada found herself and felt that she was no longer dependent. None of the causes was more potent in securing this result than the fact that the leaders of both parties of both races were in harmony about the one essential element in our national development. Howe, no less than Tupper, Geo. Brown and Sir John Macdonald, Dorion equally with Cartier, believed with absolute conviction in British connection and British traditions. I think all will unite in feeling that this half century which has passed should be marked in some appropriate way. In the circumstances through which we are at present passing, ceremonial or celebration, save of the soberest kind, would not be fitting. I would venture to suggest that nothing could be more fitting as a memorial which would be permanent and appropriate than that the new Parliament House, which, like our national life, is a new building on old foundations, should be dedicated to our splendid past, which has made possible a still more splendid future.

Hon. W. H. SHARPE: In rising to second the Address to His Excellency the Governor General, I desire to express my thanks for the honour conferred upon me. I wish also to join with all that has been said in regard to the departure of our former Governor General, and in extending a welcome to our new Governor General of Canada.

We have entered upon the third year of this great war. Canada, in my opinion, has done nobly. We have enlisted almost 400,000 men; we have sent overseas almost 300,000 men; we are keeping four divisions on the front line facing the Germans, and we are keeping these men properly equipped and properly recruited. These four divisions are holding eleven miles of the front line. I visited these four divisions last fall, and I want to tell you to-day, honourable gentlemen, that a better and finer class of men never took up arms in the history of the world—

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: —and the feeling, the morale, the manhood, of these Canadians in France cannot be beaten any where. I had the honour also of visiting a large number of our wounded in the hospitals. Here I found the very best of feeling, and the only ambition those poor boys had was that they might soon get better and go and have another crack at the Germans. The Canadians in France have played an effective and glorious part in this great war: they have met and have defeated the Prussian Guards that the Germans are so proud of. Many of our boys have fallen in this conflict, and many of them will fall before it comes to a conclusion.

There is work for us all to do in this country at the present time. Britain is calling for more products of the land, and she needs more munitions of war. We need more men to fill up the vacancies that occur from time to time in our front ranks in France. We must provide the money for all this. This is work that every one in Canada can help in. We must have men to reinforce our boys at the front; in fact, in my opinion, every man in Canada should be a volunteer to go and work where he can do the most good.

In 1914, if any person had told us that Canada would have done as well as she has, we would not have believed it. Besides enlisting almost 400,000 men and equipping them, we have manufactured a billion dollars worth of munitions of war, and I am informed that more orders are coming to us, to the extent of almost five hundred millions of dollars. Truly, Canada has done wonderfully well.

But what would happen to us, what would our position be, if Germany and her allies should win this war? We have not won this war, and it is a long way from being finished. What would happen if Germany were victorious in this war? We would no longer govern ourselves in Canada. We would pay tribute to Germany and pay heavily for many, many years. There would be no more free speech in this country.

Some people in Canada have refused to do their duty in this hour of the Empire's need. I believe that all agitators against National Service, who are going from one end of Canada to the other, where ever they may be found, should be locked up.

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: The man who is not prepared to serve his country at the present time should have no place in the affairs of Canada.

I fully believe that we are going to win this war, but the end is not in sight. Look for a few moments at the conditions in Europe. We were driven out of the Dardanelles; Montenegro and Serbia were overrun; Belgium has been crushed to the dust and her men have been taken away in cattle cars to Germany and forced to serve as slaves. The papers last fall gave us to understand that Germany was on the run, and just at that time Roumania threw in her lot with the Allies, and what happened? Germany held every front she had and went through Roumania without any difficulty at all.

Now, honourable gentlemen, if we are to win this war every man in Canada must do his duty and do it now. We must double our efforts in every direction; we must conserve everything that is possible for us to conserve. I think the Government would be well advised if they would stop granting homesteads during the continuance of this war, because, honourable gentlemen, in my opinion, the only men who are getting the good land in Canada to-day are slackers and foreigners, and I think we should hold this land for our own men, because they are away fighting to save Canada, and they should have the first choice.

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Another thing that I wish to speak of is the system of sending our troops to England. We have been raising battalions in Canada and sending them to England. I think that this at the present time is the wrong policy. I do not think it will serve any good purpose to send any more senior officers to England. I am speaking feelingly on this matter because I have had some experience: I raised a good battalion and took it to England, and it was there broken up and sent as drafts to France. I was willing to serve but there was then nothing for me or for my senior officers to do. The authorities there told me that the best thing for me to do was to go home, which I did, as soon as I got my affairs in connection with my battalion straightened out. While I was in England, I looked into this question very fully, and I believe that the Government would be well advised not to send any more battalions or drafts to England. I think it would be better to train them here in Canada, to complete units, and then send them directly to France. For a long time we have been told that we cannot complete their training in Canada; but honourable gentlemen, I want to tell you that my battalion received no training whatever in England, and they are practically all in the firing line to-day. I claim that we can train our men in Canada as well as they can do it any where, and I think that we can do it cheaper

There has been considerable talk in the papers about the shortage of food in England. There are a large number of Canadian women and children in England, and if there is any danger over a shortage of food I think that these women and children, who are not employed at some useful work there, should be returned to Canada.

Everything in connection with the army should be standardized. We should not have one standard in Canada and another in England or France.

The right honourable the leader of the Government has been invited to attend an Imperial war conference in the old country. This marks another milestone in the growth of Canada towards nationhood. We in Canada and throughout the British Empire are fighting for a just cause; we are fighting for an abiding and lasting peace. We want peace, but we only want peace with honour, and the peace that will protect all small nations in the future.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I wish to congratulate both the mover and the seconder of this Address upon the excellent speeches which they have given us this afternoon. The statement which the honourable gentleman from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan) presented to us as to the financial assistance which Canada has been able to give to the Empire in this time of stress is an extremely satisfactory one for the people of Canada to consider.

The honourable member from Manitou (Hon. Mr. Sharpe) has to some extent dealt with the question of our military organization. I quite agree with him in regard to sending battalions from this country to England. I think that the Government would have been better advised at the beginning, if, instead of raising the large number of battalions that were raised, they had formed battalions in certain districts, and, after sending the first battalions overseas, they had sent over the rest of the men in the form of drafts to fill up the vacancies in those battalions. There would then have been a closer connection between the men from different parts of this country and those at the front. There would have been developed an esprit de corps which would have had a beneficial effect on both the men themselves and the people in the different districts from which the battalions went forward.

With regard to the officers in England at the present time who now find themselves without any position, I had hoped that a large number of them would have seen their way either to accept a reduction in rank and go to the front or else come back here to help in the work of the war.

Reference has been made to the departure of His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught. I wish to join with the mover and seconder of the Address in expressing the regret of the people of Canada that the term of service of His Royal Highness in this country has come to an end. We had thought that it was the intention that His Royal Highness should remain in Canada until the end of the war. When he first came out here it was understood that it was at great inconvenience to himself, and that he desired that his term of office should extend only for a couple of years. But when the war started he consented to remain on, and I am sure that everybody throughout the length and breadth of this land appreciated his devotion to duty and his desire to render all the service he could to Canada and the Empire in the position which he so nobly filled. We all join in regretting that he should have left us, and we realize that in the future he will do all that he can for Canada and for Canadians who are in Great Britain.

In welcoming to this country His Excellency the Duke of Devonshire we are welcoming a man who has had considerable experience in public life, and whose training has been largely in the public affairs of his country. His experience will be of great benefit to Canada in the problems arising out of this war—problems referred to by the hon. gentleman from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan) in regard to the return of the soldiers and in dealing with those who have so nobly served their country, and who, in doing so have received wounds which will make it necessary to take care of them and provide for them during the rest of their lives. There is also the problem of absorbing into civil life men who have returned and who are no longer fit for duty. It is a very difficult question, and one to which I know the right honourable the leader of the Government is giving great attention. In this connection we realize that the experience of His Excellency the Governor General should be of very great value to this country. We welcome also Her Excellency the Duchess of Devonshire and her family, and hope to see them interested in the affairs of this country.

On behalf of the members of the Senate, I have the pleasure of congratulating my honourable friend the leader of the Government on the honour which, since we last met, he has received at the hands of His Majesty—the honour of knighthood. We appreciate any distinction that comes to my honourable friend in this manner as we in this Chamber appreciate his good qualities. We would have been pleased, however, had some further distinction come to him in the way of his receiving an to him in the way of an appointment to a portfolio in the Government. This Parliament has now met for the seventh session. In the ordinary course, the Parliament would not be in existence now; but owing to the conditions arising out of the war we meet again for another session. During the recess an opportunity occurred for the Government, had they so desired, to place my honourable friend in the position of controlling a portfolio. We know that to-day his services are very fully occupied by the chairmanship of the Military Hospitals Commission and the Economic Commission, but at the same time we think that it would have been only due to the dignity of the Senate that his claims to a portfolio should have received the consideration which they so strongly merit.

We had hoped before we separated at the end of last session that possibly the condition of things throughout the world, in connection with this war, would have been further advanced than they are to-day. There were at that time men who thought there was a possibility of our arriving at a state which would mean the termination of the war before we met again in this House; but, although the progress made in the war has not been as great as we hoped for at that time, still the progress that has been made on the western front, as well as on the east by the Russians, and even at Salonica, has been of a nature that does not give cause at this time for any feelings of anxiety. The splendid work done on the western front by the French, in the fight at Verdun, which was so admirably carried through in the latter months of last year, and the work done on the Somme by the British troops, including all the troops from the different Dominions, have been, I think, a revelation to the Germans, inasmuch as, from all accounts that we receive, they had made preparations and had intrenched themselves as if they had thought that they could not be turned out. But all their ideas and calculations have been upset by the valour and the determination of men of all parts of the Empire and by our Allies the French. Moreover, the co-ordination between the different branches of the service—the artillery, the infantry and the aviation corps—has been a revelation to everybody who has seen the work that has been going on. The way in which the different services have been able to co-ordinate their work and to co-operate in carrying it out has revolutionized the system of warfare from what it was at the beginning of the war. We appreciate the good work that has been done by the Canadian soldiers along with the other troops of the Empire, and desire that everything possible shall be done by the people of this country to support them and let them realize that they have the whole force of the country behind them.

In talking of the war we must not forget that, as far as Canada is concerned, we really owe our position and our freedom from actual contact with this struggle to the admirable work that has been done by the British Navy. The British Navy has had a most difficult part to play, a part that has not appealed to the ideas of the people in the same way as the part that the army has to play. It is very seldom that we are able to read of any work that has been done by the navy, and we are apt to think, when we read, as we have lately done, of a German raider having escaped into the south Atlantic, that the navy has not been able to do all that it should do. It is only natural that sometimes the Germans, with all their tricks and arts of disguise, should be able to rig out a ship that would escape the notice of the watchdogs of the British navy, slip past them, and do a considerable amount of damage before being caught. The reports that we now receive seem to indicate that already this particular raider has been brought to time.

We are threatened at the present time with a further attack by the submarines, possibly on this side of the Atlantic, but I think that we all feel that, even should those submarines be able to do a certain amount of damage at the start, the British navy will eventually prove itself entirely competent to deal with them and bring them to time and that eventually the submarine will prove as great a failure as the zeppelins have proved to be in the raids which they have from time to time made on England. We realize that those attacks, made at different times on undefended parts of the country, have had no military effect whatever.

The Speech from the Throne deals with certain questions with which the Senate has not very much to do. I do not propose, for instance, to discuss the question of the extension of the term of Parliament, as that is a matter which pertains more to the work of the other House, and will, I presume, be discussed when the resolution is brought down. If it comes to us we shall then have an opportunity of dealing with the matter.

The question of National Service, to which my hon. friend from Manitou (Hon. Mr. Sharpe) referred, is one that we are all ready to consider and to deal with at the proper time. I agree with him that the country must rise to a realization of the situation in which it is placed to-day, and that every one, from one end of Canada to the other, in duty to the country and to himself, should put forward every effort to help in the prosecution of this war .

With regard to the question of the Imperial Conference, we have heard from the Premier of England that he is desirous of consulting the Premiers of the Dominions on questions concerning the further prosecution of the war, and those questions which will arise after the termination of the war. The idea is, to some extent, a new one. It is a further step in bringing together the different parts of the British Empire for the purpose of co-ordinating a policy that will affect the interests of the whole Empire. So far as the different parts of the Empire outside of Europe are concerned, there is no doubt that the Premiers of the Dominions can give very valuable advice and assist in many ways in settling questions that will arise; but I do not suppose for one instant that representatives of any of the Dominions would think of offering any advice on questions arising out of such a complicated situation as that which exists in the Balkans at the present time. These are questions which, to my mind, are entirely outside the scope of the Dominions and will probably, in the good judgment of our representatives, be left to be dealt with by those who have made a much closer study of them for many years.

In conclusion, may I say that we shall, as hitherto, endeavour to meet all questions that may arise with regard to the war in a fair and straightforward manner, and to give such criticism to all measures that the Government may propose as will help, and not hinder, in improving the work that the Government has to do, and in such a way as to show the country that in the prosecution of this war we present a united front and are only anxious to do all that we can to bring it to a successful termination.

Hon. Sir James LOUGHEED: Hon. gentlemen, I beg to join with my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition in extending congratulations to the hon. gentlemen who have moved and seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is a time-honoured custom in speaking on the Address to extend the congratulations of the Chamber to those hon. gentlemen. On this particular occasion, entirely irrespective of custom, we can extend our congratulations with every feeling of sincerity and felicity, purely on the ground that the mover and seconder have performed in a most able way the task that was allotted to them. Both speeches have been interesting, instructive and able, and augur well for the thought and ability which those hon. gentlemen will bring to bear on the deliberations of this body.

It may not be out of place to make reference to the first clause of the Speech from the Throne, namely, that which refers to the appointment of His Excellency the Governor General to the high office which he has recently been called upon to fill, and which we know, from the valuable public services which he has already rendered to the state, he will fill with acceptability to the people of Canada and with due regard to the high and important duties associated with the office of Governor General of Canada. While it was with the deepest regret that Canada extended its farewell to his immediate predecessor, His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, than whom no previous Governor General gave more anxious thought and time to the performance of the high duties of his office, we are conscious that in the person of His Excellency the present Governor General we have a very fitting successor to represent the Crown in Canada.

This is the fourth session that has been called since the declaration of war. All these sessions may be said peculiarly to have been war sessions in the sense that all other public considerations have been subordinated to the all-absorbing responsibility that has been thrown upon Canada in taking its part in the unprecedented struggle that is now being waged between the Allies and our enemy. In August, 1914, when the declaration of war was made, we could scarcely have anticipated the magnitude which the struggle has assumed and the unlooked-for responsibilities which Canada has been called upon, and that gladly, to assume. If in August, 1914, it had been predicted that we would have furnished more than the first contingent, it would have been received with doubt in many places. If it had been predicted that the first contingent would have been increased to the number of men already recruited, namely, approximately four hundred thousand, it would have been looked upon as visionary and as something outside the pale of possibility. But during the progress of the war the patriotism of Canada in its adhesion to and love for the Empire has so increased and risen as to bring within the bounds of the practicable that which in 1914 seemed to be the impossible.

Not only has Canada enlisted 400,000 men, but the financial burdens which she has assumed in addition to the response to patriotic benevolence which has exhibited itself throughout every part of the Dominion, has given her a prominent place amongst the Allies in the war, and has increased the pride of every loyal Canadian in the great imperial role which it has been our privilege to play. This is the first time in the history of Canada we have raised our public loans in the shape of war loans within our own boundaries, and that to the unprecedented extent of two hundred millions of dollars. We have been in addition thereto of valuable assistance in financing large amounts within our own boundaries for the accommodation and convenience of the Imperial authorities. In the men we have enlisted and forwarded to the seat of war and in the enormous sums we have raised within our own money markets, Canada has far transcended the ability and resourcefulness which she thought she possessed. We have thus revealed to ourselves and to the world at large the unbounded possibilities which we possess, possibilities abounding in all the national resources of men and treasure, and ability to furnish every element which goes to make a great nation. Wherever Canadians have fought in the titanic struggle which is now being waged in Europe, the name of Canada has loomed large and important. Our troops have fought with a courage and gallantry and resourcefulness second to none of the finest troops in Europe. We have exhibited to the Empire a spirit of patriotism of which we are proud and which we feel assured will have marked results in the conduct of the war and an important bearing hereafter in the important part which Canada must play in the Empire.

It is difficult to predict how long the war will last, how great the demands yet to be made upon the resources of Canada both in men and in treasure, and the strain to which Canada will be subjected in playing its part to the end in the conduct of this great struggle. However, we in Canada are as fully determined as the Allies in doing our utmost until the war is brought to a successful conclusion. The fate of Canada is as much, if not more, involved in the result of this war than the fate of any of the Allies. Occupying as we do the northern half of this great continent, settled sparsely as it is, and with its development only superficially touched, the triumph of Germany would mean the occupation by the Teutonic powers where the Anglo-Saxon has laid broad and deep the foundations of his civilization. While certain indications point to the probable termination of the war at no distant date, yet we cannot afford to deceive ourselves that the utmost preparation must not be made to continue the struggle until a peace is concluded that will absolutely assure the world for generations to come of a continued peace from German menace. For over a generation not only Europe but the whole of civilization has been menaced by the peril of Prussian militarism. The continuous building up by the Teutonic powers for the last forty years of an unparalleled war machine consisting of armaments and munitions of all kinds, threw upon every country in Europe the necessity of expending fabulous sums in making preparation to meet this impending peril. So great had the strain become upon the different nations in Europe, the result of which we in Canada also felt, that it was almost with a sense of relief that the Allies entered upon the struggle for the purpose of crushing the most dangerous menace that of late years civilization has faced. The war programme of Germany was obviously to smash France and Russia and then concentrate its attention upon Great Britain. Having been engaged in preparing this programme for some forty years and concentrating all the national energies of the Germanic people toward this end, it is not surprising that during the first year of the war Germany found itself in possession of large territorial areas in France, Belgium, Russia, and the Balkans. It was a peculiarly studied plan on the part of the Teutonic peoples that, having accomplished this achievement in the war and realizing that their resources were being rapidly expended, they should announce to the world that while in possession of this territory they were prepared to dictate terms of peace to the Allies. They now realize only too well that in the inverse ratio to the expenditure of their national resources the Allies are increasing their military resources to an extent almost beyond conception Thus we have the situation to-day of Germany having reached a point where its resources are being exhausted while those of the Allies are being increased many fold. It would, therefore, under these circumstances be a world-wide crime to permit of Germany directing a peace which should be accepted by the Allies. Germany, having assumed the responsibility through its inordinate ambition and the vanity of its rulers to make war on Europe and become the masters of our civilization, finding itself facing defeat, disaster, revolution and disememberment, like the brutal bully of which it has played the part throughout the whole of the war, would naturally seek to maintain its national entity if nothing more, and thus escape the dire punishment which outraged justice as represented by the Allies should administer.

Peace at such a time and on such terms as those indicated by Germany would render futile the enormous and inconceivable sacrifices made in men and treasure by the Allies. Entirely apart from the terms which should enter into such a peace, the most basic and dominating principle, which must overshadow every other provision, is that Germany should be so driven in this war as to be forced to give assurance to civilization that the military power and brutality of German militarism will in future be unknown in the fabric of our civilization. This has been the overwhelming cause and factor and force underlying this gigantic struggle; and until this cause is eradicated humanity will have no assurance against a return at any time of this the most brutal and destructive demon that has ever been let loose upon the free peoples of Europe.

It is a matter of gratification that the Government of the United Kingdom, as indicated in the Speech from the Throne, have invited the first ministers of the Dominions to participate in the deliberations of the War Cabinet. While this may in a sense be regarded as a concession to the Overseas Dominions owing to the policy which has hitherto been pursued by the Government of the United Kingdom, yet it is not more than the recognition, both contitutional and moral, that should be accorded to the self-governing Dominions of the Empire. It is a matter for comment that notwithstanding the important part played by the Overseas Dominions in the destinies of the Empire, greater advantage has not been taken by the Government of the United Kingdom in seeking the assistance of the different parts of the Empire in dealing with Imperial questions. The war has particularly accentuated the change which must come in this direction. Canada, Australia, South Africa, New Zealand and the other Overseas Dominions are as much interested in the destiny of the Empire, and have proportionately suffered as much, as the United Kingdom, and hereafter their interests in the Empire must be consulted by the Government of the United Kingdom concerning affairs of the Empire. Out of the war must be built up an Imperial edifice including the self-governing parts of the Empire that will stand forth as an evidence to the world of the unity and consolidation of a people, united in one constitutional whole for all the beneficent services that can be rendered to humanity.

Probably the greatest problem that Canada will have to consider after the war will be the demobilization of our Canadian forces, their return to Canada and their absorption into the civilian life of the country. Large and important questions must necessarily grow out of this subject. This will not only involve absorbing into civilian channels those who have so gallantly defended their country during the war, but must also involve questions dealing with the diversion of labour from the channel in which it has been engaged, such as munitions, etc., within the boundaries of Canada. Labour problems of the most difficult character will have to be worked out by the Government. These questions will particularly concern the finding of employment for the many thousands of men who will find themselves unemployed through the extraordinary conditions which will have occurred, and the duty will also fall, not only upon this Government, but upon the provinces of Canada, to deal with the large questions which we shall have to settle on the cessation of the war. New channels of industry will have to be opened up, problems of a Federal or provincial nature touching the development of Canada will have to be grappled with. The establishment of new industries, and those on a large scale, can alone satisfy the employment requirements with which we shall be confronted. It is difficult, if not impossible, at the moment, to outline how these questions can best be solved. Suffice it to say that the national enterprize and patriotism of the people of Canada should be sufficient to deal with them. The settlement of our lands and the development of our natural resources will necessarily demand special attention when this period arrives. Already the Government has given consideration to these problems. Entirely apart from settling returned soldiers upon our lands and adopting such steps as the Government may take for their employment, the development of our resources, including the settlement of our lands, is probably the most important question with which Canada has to deal.

The Address very fittingly refers to the proposed celebration of the 50th anniversary of the foundation of our Dominion. For half a century Canada has been laying wide and deep the foundations of its national edifice to establish on the northern half of the American continent a people with all the virility, energy and enterprise of the races from which they have sprung. Notwithstanding the magnificent heritage which we possess, a heritage equal in all its possibilities to that of the great republic to the south of us, we must confess disappointment at the growth which has taken place during the half century which has passed since Canada laid the foundation of its union of provinces. It is scarcely overstating the facts when we say that our lands, our forests, our fisheries, our water stretches, our mineral resources of gold, of silver, of iron and of coal, are not inferior to those fo the United States, yet, for reasons difficult to explain, we find them very largely undeveloped and not contributing to that degree of wealth and prosperity and population which we have the right to expect. We have built up magnificent systems of transportation not excelled in any part of the world. We have assumed great financial obligations for the carrying out of those enterprises, and yet in growth and population and in the settlement of our lands and the development of our minerals we are lamentably lacking. These are problems with which we shall have to grapple with all the earnestness and ability which have marked our people in the strides of progress made in other directions. A country like Canada, with less than eight millions of people, which has been able to surpass all expectations in enlisting 400,000 men, in floating enormous loans within our own boundaries, in assisting the Empire in the titanic struggle which is now going on, by fully realizing the necessity of concentrating its attention upon the problems of the development of Canada and the growth of its population, should be equal to adopting such a policy as to ensure the growth of this country by leaps and bounds. No progress will be made in this direction until Canada breaks away from the narrow channels in which she has been moving in dealing with great national questions, and adopts a large and comprehensive national policy looking to an increase of all its spheres of development, resourcefulness and energy which she has shown during the present war .

Reference is made in the speech from the Throne to the intention of the Government to ask Parliament for an extension of the term of Parliament which will expire in the month of October next. This is a matter upon which I need not enlarge. Its importance and significance will present themselves to the minds of honourable gentlemen with quite as much force and lucidity as I could present them to the House. The Government is not seeking as a suppliant to have the term of its office extended, but recognizes that with the important and tragic questions with which it has to deal, growing out of the war, the time would be singularly inopportune to plunge the people of Canada into all the excitement and rivalry and intense heat and jealousy of an election contest. At a time when hundreds of thousands of Canadians are fighting in the trenches in France and Belgium for the defence of the Empire, at a time when they are giving their life-blood, at a time when they are leaving desolate, parents, wives and children of the families to which they belonged, no more unfitting time could be conceived for precipitating the people of Canada into all the undue excitement and unfriendly aggravations of an election contest. At the last session of Parliament a Bill was unanimously adopted extending the life of Parliament for one year. The conditions which then obtained and which appealed to Parliament as warranting this action, not only exist to-day, but are intensified in the many tragic features which I have pointed out of the losses which Canada has sustained in the great struggle in which she is now engaged.

Measures which will be brought before the Chamber at the present Session will be largely measures growing out of the war, and I have no doubt they will receive the same support and sympathic consideration that have been given to the different war measures presented by the Government since August, 1914.

I trust that Parliament may not be unduly prolonged in the transaction of its business, and that the same patriotic and valued consideration will be given to all measures introduced by the Government which we have the right to expect at the hands of the Senate of Canada.

Before sitting down, may I be permitted to refer to the very flattering remarks which my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has made with regard to myself. I am always overcome when I attempt to reply to the very kind sentiments which are so frequently expressed by my honourable friends opposite, in whom I find that I have the hearing ear and the understanding mind, and sometimes the helping hand, just as much as I find them on this side of the House; and I can assure the honourable gentlemen that I appreciate the very gracious remarks which have been made by my honourable friend the leader of the Opposition. I hope that as long as I am discharging my duties upon this side of the House I may have the confidence of my friends opposite, to the extent, at least, to which they have shown it in the past.

Hon. L. G. POWER: Honourable gentlemen, I cordially endorse the sentiments expressed by the honourable the leader of the Opposition with respect to the leader of the Government. If we have got along in this House in a harmonious and satisfactory way for some years, I think it is due largely to the good feeling and tact that the honourable gentleman has shown in his important position.

With respect to the honourable gentlemen who moved and seconded the Address to His Excellency, I endorse what has been said by the speakers who have preceded me. The honourable gentleman from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan) talked good sense in graceful English; and the honourable gentleman from Manitou (Hon. Mr. Sharpe) told us in a very distinct and impressive manner things which he had seen for himself, and therefore he knew what he was talking about. I think that these two honourable gentlemen are to be complimented because their remarks were so much to the purpose.

With respect to the Speech of His Excellency, there are just one or two points that I should like to make, apart from those which have been made by honourable gentlemen who have preceded me. The Governor General says:

> I desire on this occasion to express my respectful appreciation of the honour conferred on me by the King in appointing me to the distinguished office of Governor General.

Now, I think that the fact that the Duke of Devonshire succeeds His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught makes his appointment a really more important, more desirable, and more honourable one than it would otherwise have been.

With respect to the Duke of Connaught, I quite endorse all the good things that have been said by the honourable the leader of the Opposition and by other honourable gentlemen. I think that some stress might be laid upon the fact that the Duke of Connaught, being here at a critical time, being an experienced soldier and in every way an able man, exercised an influence on the conduct of the war which had a very beneficial effect indeed. These things were not published, but there is no doubt about them.

If we had been asked to select a man to follow the Duke of Connaught, there is, I suppose, hardly a nobleman in England whom we should have chosen in preference to the Duke of Devonshire. The Duke belongs, as has been pointed out already, to a line of very distinguished men—men distinguished for ability and high character; and characteristics of the whole line have been strong common sense, business capacity, and, perhaps above all, independence of feeling. A Cavendish was the private secretary of Cardinal Wolsey, and although, at least towards the end, Cavendish did not share the religious belief of the Cardinal, yet after the Cardinal had fallen and was out of the favour of Henry VIII, when it was a risky thing to say anything in favour of the Cardinal, Cavendish was independent enough and true enough to his old master to write a life of the Cardinal which was particularly friendly; and that sort of independent character has clung to the line ever since: they have always shown themselves constant and trustworthy.

It had occurred to me to say something about the Canadian forces overseas, but the honourable the leader of the Government has anticipated what had so often struck me. If anyone had told us in 1914 that by this time Canada would have sent 300,000 men across the ocean, he would have been looked upon as more or less lacking in intellect. I think it a perfectly wonderful thing.

The next subject that I wish to speak of is one that I do not feel altogether clear about. We are unanimous about nearly everything to-day; we are not in a critical mood; but I must confess that I do not clearly understand what is meant by the organization of National Service, my ideas on that question are hazy. There are a great many people who think that National Service is a preliminary to conscription, I do not think it is; I do not think the case is so urgent as to need a resort to conscription. Then we have the assurance of the right honourable leader of the Government that National Service is not intended as a preliminary to conscription; but unfortunately there are many people throughout the country who are not sufficiently informed on the subject, and who are of the opinion that it really is preliminary to conscription.

It was rather saddening to me to be informed only yesterday that during the past month some 30,000 people had migrated from Canada to the United States, largely due to the dread of conscription. They are very foolish, I think; but I think it only right to call attention to that statement, and I think that every reasonable step should be taken to remove the impression which has undoubtedly been made upon the minds of a good many people.

There is one point which has not been referred to but which I think really does deserve to be considered by the Government as well as by the members of the two Houses. Honourable gentlemen have of course read that recruiting in the Dominion has fallen off. I think at the present time it is proceeding pretty well; but there was a falling-off for some time, and the question was what this falling-off in recruiting was due to. Now, honourable gentlemen, I do not think it was due to any shirking, as a rule, or to any lack of loyalty or of readiness on the part of the people to bear their share of the risk and burdens of the war. I think it can be put down to other causes. First, there is the exhaustion of the sources of supply; the number of young men to be drawn from has been very considerably diminished. When you take 400,000 men out of a population of 8,000,000 people, the supply of young men is very appreciably diminished. Another point is that some of these men cannot be spared in the places where they are working, for, in making munitions or in farming, they may be really doing as much to bring the war to a successful end as if they had donned khaki uniforms. Then, too, there is the character of the reports that come to us from the scene of action. The Canadian troops have distinguished themselves on a great many occasions, but how much do we know about it? Perhaps months after a fight has taken place we find that at Courcelette or at Givenchy or at some other place the Canadians have distinguished themselves greatly; but has any honourable gentleman seen any interesting and instructive account of any of these fights within a reasonable time after the fight has taken place? I can understand that it is right and proper that anything which might convey useful information to the enemy should not be made public; but, after the fight is over, why should not our people be allowed to know what their brothers and sons have been doing? There is no doubt that love of glory and fame is a very strong motive with the average man. These young men who risk their lives feel, and have a perfect right to feel, that if they distinguish themselves their friends at home should be informed of it. I think that stupidity on the part of the censors is responsible to a very great extent for the lessening of the tide of recruiting. It seems to me that things have been done with very little regard for the natural feelings of the men. This has been referred to by one honourable gentleman already.

Organizations have been broken up. For instance, we had in Nova Scotia what was called a Highland brigade. This brigade consisted of either four or five battalions, I have forgotten which. At any rate, if there were only four in the first brigade, there was a fifth battalion which was intended to make up the losses from death and wounds. These men were recruited in Nova Scotia by officers who were supposed to be speaking with authority, and who went around amongst our people and said: "This is to be a Nova Scotian Highland brigade; they are to go into action together; they are to fight together and live together." That had a great deal to do with the triumphant success of the recruiting of that brigade. The late Governor General reviewed them in September at Aldershot, and he said that they were the finest body of men that he had reviewed. These men went over to the old country, and they had hardly got there when they were broken up; the 85th, the backbone of the brigade, was sent on ahead, and the others have gone no one knows where. You can understand the disappointment amongst both the men themselves and their friends in the province. It would be difficult to go into Pictou, or Antigonish, or any other county and recruit owing to the disappointment of the people.

What I think really the most effective cause of the slackness in recruiting is the delay which has taken place in getting men to the front. I just mention this 85th battalion as an illustration. They began to organize in August, 1915. In October, 1915, the battalion was practically completed and the men were ready to go almost any time after October. When it came to March the men were all keen to go, and disliked very much being kept back. That battalion did not leave Nova Scotia until October, 1916. They might have been eight months at the front before they were sent. The young men who enlist for the war do not enlist for the purpose of spending month after month drilling in Canada. They want to get to the front and do something, and the misfortune has been that they have not had the chance. I think if the honourable the leader of the Government will speed up his colleagues in sending the men across he will probably promote the cause of recruiting and render National Service quite unnecessary.

There is just one more matter which does not impress me very favourably, and that is the proposal to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the Dominion. It seems to me, honourable gentlemen, that a time like this, when the country is engaged in what one might call a life-and-death struggle, when our young men are being killed or wounded or made prisoners on the other side of the Atlantic, is a singularly inappropriate time to undertake a national celebration. I think it is exceedingly inappropriate. I think that the right time for a celebration is after the war is over. When the war has been brought, with our help, to a triumphant conclusion, then we can celebrate the victory and celebrate the jubilee of the country at the same time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. David, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Wednesday, January 24, 1917.

The Senate met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATOR INTRODUCED.

Hon. Frederic Nicholls, of Toronto, was introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and took his seat.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech at the opening of the session.

Hon. L. O. DAVID: Honourable gentlemen, as you all know, I concur in practically everything that has been so well said by the honourable gentlemen who spoke yesterday. There are a few points, however, to which I take exception. I share their views absolutely in regard to Canada's obligations in the great struggle which is going on for the triumph of true civilization and liberty against the most formidable military power that has ever existed. However, honourable gentlemen, I do not feel well enough to make any extended remarks to-day, and I would beg to be allowed to postpone my address to some later time.

Hon. A. BOYER: Honourable gentlemen, before the motion is carried, may I add my quota to the compliments paid to the mover and seconder of the Address? They have accomplished their task as only senators, and experienced ones at that, can do. All young members realize what a task it is to speak for the first time before the Senate. I must say for my honourable friend from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan) that he spoke like an old parliamentarian, and said things which cannot be forgotten.

I concur in the regret expressed throughout the Dominion of Canada at the departure of His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, the Duchess, and the Princess Patricia. The Duke himself was an old friend of ours. I can well remember, as a boy, seeing him stationed in Montreal with the old Rifle Brigade. It was one of the pleasures of our school days to go and gaze at the son of Queen Victoria commanding a company of the Royal Victoria Rifles on the Champ de Mars. The royal family has always taken a very keen interest in the Dominion of Canada.

Canada has reason to compliment itself upon the Governors who have been sent out to us. In the present Governor we have a man whose ancestors have shed a bright lustre upon their time. It was my good fortune to be in England when the Marquess of Hartington was the right-hand man of the late Hon. Mr. Gladstone. We followed his policy the world over, and when the unfortunate crisis occurred in which the Marquess of Hartington severed his connection with Mr. Gladstone because they had failed to agree on the question of Home Rule for Ireland, we young men, growing up in the old Liberal school, and having for our ideal the Gladstonian policy, regretted to see the separation. We tender the hand of fellowship to the new Governor, and I trust that Their Excellencies will not regard the cold winter as a criterion of the welcome which we extend to them.

There are only two points in the Speech from the Throne upon which I will say a few words. The first is National Service. Like a good many others I received through the post office on the 22nd of December, if I remember correctly, a card asking for certain information. This card I filled in and mailed on the same day. The question has been asked: how are those in charge of the National Service to ascertain who have signed and who have not signed the National Service cards. The idea of distributing those cards through the country post offices was a very good one, but it had one weakness. The postmasters were not instructed to keep a register of those to whom the cards were delivered. I know a half-a-dozen municipalities in the immediate vicinity of Montreal in which the postmasters delivered the cards. I know of one family in which there were a father and three boys. The father, who generally called for the mail on his way home from work at six o'clock, was given only one card. What about the boys?—there were none for them. In a dozen municipalities where I have asked: "Have you received your National Service card?" I have received the reply: "No, I do not know what it is." It seems to me that, as we wanted a thorough inventory of the resources of the man power of Canada, there should have been some other way of delivering these cards. There are voters' lists; why should not they have been used and a card addressed to every man on the lists? We could then have exercised a check on those who received the cards. But when it comes to inquiring from different men throughout the Dominion, "Have you not received your card? Why have you not sent back your card?" the answer will invariably be, "I never received one;" and if you persist and say, "Yes, you did," the answer will be, "Prove it;" and how can you prove it when the postmasters have kept no registers? I specially inquired at the post office in Montreal if they had any envelopes, or if they had the necessary papers, and the answer was, "We have not received them yet." We in Quebec are ready and anxious to do our duty to the utmost, but we want the means of doing it. Do not allow the only chance we have of making effective our resources throughout the Dominion to slip by through a lack of organization.

The Speech from the Throne refers to the coming year as the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the Dominion of Canade. I quite concur in the sentiments expressed with regard to having a national celebration of this event, but I quite agree with my hon. friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) that there should be no celebration until victory in the war has been achieved. I should like to see our boys brought back victorious from the old country to join in the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the creation of the Dominion of Canada. They have done wonders for us; they have made illustrious the name of the Dominion throughout the world; and they should not be left out of the celebration. If we are sure that the war will be over by the date set for the national celebration, well and good; but, if not, I would humbly beg the Government to postpone the celebration until all the Canadians abroad are brought back to join in it; and then with a mighty shout we may say to the world, "See what a young nation, only fifty years of age, has done."

I have a very good piece of news to impart to this honourable House with reference to the celebration. We all regretted the burning of our House of Parliament in the unfortunate fire which took place on the 3rd of February last. I particularly regretted the destruction of that huge canvas, the work of Mr. Harris, which hung in the Railway Committee room. It was what one might call a national manuscript; it contained a true portrait of each and every one of the men who were sent by the different provinces to set their seal on the creation of the Dominion of Canada. Sir Robert Borden, on the recommendation of Sir Joseph Pope, wrote to the Advisory Art Council asking if it would be possible to secure from the artist the original drawings of the picture, and I may tell the House that the Advisory Art Council has been successful in securing from Mr. Harris those original drawings. Unfortunately Mr. Harris is too advanced in years to remake the picture; but we must rest satisfied in possessing once more the portraits of those men who laid the foundations of the Dominion of Canada, whose fiftieth anniversary we are preparing to celebrate.

The Address was adopted.

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED SENATORS.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, almost each session of Parliament brings with it the melancholy fact of vacancies in our ranks made by the grim hand of death. Since we last met death has been busy amongst us. The grim reaper has garnered more than his usual harvest. No less than seven of our members have reached the bourne from which no traveller returns.

With the exception of one they were with us during the last session of Parliament, interested with their colleagues in the proceedings of this Chamber, and thus practically active in their duties until the last call sounded. As long as I have been in this Senate I have no recollection of so numerous a group during the recess having to answer to the last call. They were all men who for years had been active in the public life of Canada. With the exception of two, all have been prominent in political life, had enjoyed the confidence of their electors and had sat for years in the House of Commons, afterwards coming into this Senate and bringing with them the activity of the lower Chamber.

Senator Derbyshire was the first to precede his fellows. He was in continuous attendance with us until the end of the last session. Then came Senator Frost, who with his friendly greeting had almost regularly filled his seat from day to day. Then was gathered in Senator Costigan, who for over fifty years had been one of the most active figures in the public life of Canada. For a year or more Senator Kerr, urbane, energetic and emphatic, had been prostrated by a painful illness which finally brought the strong man low. Then came Senator Mackay of Montreal, who for years had gone in and out amongst us in his quiet, unostentatious way, finally to leave vacant the chair which he had occupied for some fifteen years. Then came the news of Senator Fiset's death, a man always eager and intense, and who seemed to give promise of many years of life. And yesterday over the wire came the news of the death of Senator Davis, one of the most active men in our membership, and one who had looked forward to many years of public activity. To-day the flag flies on these buildings at half mast as his death signal.

But death laughs at our promises and expectations and gathers in its victims when least we expect it. We visualize all those our fellow members as we last saw them and as with one exception they filled last session the seats they had occupied so long. Invariably at such a time we ask ourselves the question, what chair will next be vacated? To-day we call up friendly memories of all of our late colleagues. The touch of the vanished hand of each is easily recalled by us. In view of the uncertainty of life and the certainty of death we are more impressed than ever with the futility of our rivalries, with the vanity of the shadows we are pursuing, and with the value of cultivating toward our fellowmen those kindly thoughts that never die. We thus place on record the deep regret of our Chamber at the vacant chairs that have thus been left, and would convey to the families of our departed colleagues our deepest sympathy in the loss and bereavement which they have suffered.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: It is difficult to add very much to what has been so admirably said by the leader of the Government with regard to the departure of our friends since we last met together in this Chamber. They were known to all the members of this Chamber for their long service to their country in many ways in public life. Some of them came to this country in the first instance from the old land and spent their lives, as in the case of Senator Mackay, in developing and building up the industries of Canada. Senator Davis was born of Irish parents in the province of Quebec, but had spent most of his life in the development of the western country, and had been a very energetic and capable representative of that part of Canada. Senator Frost was descended from a family from the United States, but had spent most of his life in Canada and had been instrumental in the building up of a large industry in the province from which he came. He was dearly beloved by those who knew him and by all the employees who were associated with him in his work. Senator Derbyshire was a representative man in his part of the country, as a farmer and dairyman interested in the agricultural pursuits of Canada, and also as a worthy and capable public man doing his duty to the country. Senator Kerr was for some years Speaker of the Senate, and we can to-day see the effects of his handling of the affairs of the Senate when he was in that position. He was also a very prominent Mason, and in his professional career he had been associated with the leading members of the Ontario Bar.

Senator Costigan had spent possibly more time in public life than any of the other men to whom I have referred. He was in the Government of Sir John Macdonald; afterwards in the Government of Sir John Thompson, he was a minister with my honourable friend opposite, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and later was a minister under Sir Charles Tupper. He had, I might say, the almost unique record of never having been defeated in an election from the time he commenced to take a position in the public life of this country. Subsequently he was appointed to the Senate, and on the occasion of his seventieth birthday he was presented by the Liberal members and senators with a token of respect by the hands of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the leader of the Liberal party.

Senator Fiset was a prominent man. Not only had he taken a great interest in the affairs of the district which he represented, but he was also very prominent in matters connected with the militia, from which he retired with the rank of lieutenant colonel. He has left behind him sons who have taken an active part in the present war. His eldest son, at present Deputy Minister of Militia, was distinguished for his services in the South African war. Another of his sons,

I regret to say, has been returned to Canada badly wounded.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Dying.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: My honourable friend here informs me that he is dying from the wounds that he received at the front, while doing his duty to his country. The other members of the family are also engaged in doing their share, both in France and in this country, in the terrible struggle which we are now carrying on.

I join with my honourable friend in expressing our regret at the loss of so many of our friends from the Senate, and our condolence with their families and friends.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, when I look at the names of our departed colleagues, I am struck with the fact that they constitute a group which is typical of this chamber as a whole. They are from all parts of Canada, west, east and centre; all the races of our population and the various activities of the men who make up the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada. It is often stated in the press that the Senate is not a very active body and seems to be composed of men who have reached the age when they take life easily. Yet when I look at this list of men I find that up to their last days they had been active in the various walks of life, and had only become inactive when sickness prevented them from crossing the threshold of this Chamber. They have all been men of prominence in their respective localities. Five of them received the endorsement of their people as worthy to represent them in the House of Commons, and from there they came direct to this Chamber.

I can but second the remarks of the two leaders in this House; but I would like to add a word about one of those seven members, one with whom I have been closely associated, the late Senator Mackay; and what I shall say of him I am quite sure I could say equally of the other six of our colleagues who have passed away. I have known Senator Mackay in Montreal for forty years, and have been able to estimate him in his private as well as his public life. He was a public-spirited man, wise in council, and most generous to all charitable institutions and not only those which knocked at his door, but many others; and his name in most cases did not appear to tell the public what he was doing. I have sat with him on some boards, and have always felt that his advice was precious, and I have heard encomiums on all sides as to his life, both private and public. I join in expressing sincere sympathy with the families of our late colleagues.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER (translation): Honourable gentlemen, as one of the old members of this honourable Chamber, I may be permitted to add a word to the eulogies which have been expressed towards those of our colleagues who, during the past year, have passed away. I of course concur in what has been said by the honourable gentlemen who have preceded me. In rising to follow them I do so to speak more particularly of my friend the Hon. John Costigan. The honourable leader of the Opposition has told us that for fifty years he had without interruption represented the same constituency. This, honourable gentlemen, is a record. One does not represent the same constituency for fifty years without possessing great and solid qualities both as a public man and as a private citizen, especially, I may say, when the nationality of the member is different from that of the electors. The Hon. Mr. Costigan was an Irishman; those who elected him were Acadians, compatriots of myself. I consider the facts stated to be a compliment both to the elected and the electors. The fidelity which united them to each other was not broken by the change of political allegiance on the part of Mr. Costigan. Mr. Costigan was essentially an honest man. This only can explain the fidelity of his electors and their unalterable confidence in him.

But there was another thing. Mr. Costigan, while the intrepid chief of the Irishmen of the Dominion, was just to other nationalities. He had within him an innate sense of justice. He exemplified the real qualities of a leader of a national party in the Dominion, vindicating the cause of those whom he specially represented, while at the same time conceding generously the rights of others. It is to Sir John Macdonald, of regretted memory, and the Hon. John Costigan, whose loss we mourn to-day, that the Acadian minority owes the honour of having a representative in this Chamber, however small his claims and personal qualifications for that position may be. The affectionate tribute which I render to his memory is an act of gratitude both for my compatriots and for myself. Let us hope that Canada will produce other national party leaders with views as large, as philanthropic and as liberal as those which have characterized my deceased and much regretted friend.

Hon. N. A. BELCOURT: May I be permitted to join the hon. leader of the Government and the hon. leader of the Opposition, as well as the hon. colleagues who have preceded me, in the eloquent and feeling tributes that have been paid to the memory of our colleagues who during the recess have gone to their eternal reward. It is said that it is a salutary practice to think of the day when we individually must go from this earth to take the long passage to the Great Unknown. The celebrated order of Trappist monks practise that idea daily, and constantly, when they meet one another in their monasteries, they exchange the austere salutation, "Brother, remember we must die." Although in this Senate we do not exchange the salutation, death so frequently gathers members from the Senate—and at no time has it done so in such large numbers as during the last recess—that in this House we are constantly reminded of death, and the thought manifests itself in many ways unconsciously to ourselves in our remarks to one another. Certain it is that a great deal of the animosity, one might say acrimony, which exists in other places, is not manifest in this House.

I heartily and thoroughly agree with what has been said much more eloquently than I could say it with reference to the seven colleagues who are no longer among us. I should like, however, to be allowed to say just one word with reference to one of them, because he belonged to the province which is both my native and my adopted province. He belonged to the Bar of the province of Ontario, and I can remember being engaged with him and against him over thirty years ago before the courts of this province. I refer to the late Hon. Mr. Kerr, who practised at the Bar of Ontario for nearly half a century. He always displayed the strictest professional ethics and a fine dignity in his professional relations. He had a large practice, and during his whole career he afforded an example to the members of the Bar in the province of Ontario which I am sure will be long remembered. In the years during which he occupied the position of Speaker of the Senate, we can all remember the dignified, courteous, affable and able way in which he performed the duties of that high office. To-day, when he has gone to his reward, I think it is due to his memory that these matters be specially recalled.

I cordially join in offering our sympathies to the families of the gentlemen who have left us. To the widow of the late Mr. Kerr I think probably every heart in the Senate will beat a little more strongly in sympathy, because no wife of any of our Speakers had by her constant charm of manner so thoroughly won the hearts of the senators and all those who in the social functions were called to meet her. The members of Mr. Kerr's family also have given an example of duty to country and Empire which should be remembered on this occasion. I think that not less than three or four of them are to-day or have been in active service in the war.

I join cordially in all that has been said, and hope that the families of our deceased colleagues will be inspired by God with courage and resignation under their sad bereavement.

Hon. LOUIS LAVERGNE: I agree with what has been said by other hon. gentlemen in regard to the loss of our late colleagues in the Senate, with all of whom I was very friendly. Amongst those seven senators there was one from the province of Quebec, Senator Fiset, who rendered eminent services as a doctor in the district of Rimouski, and also valuable military service as a member of the militia in Quebec, in which he was a lieutenant colonel. His sons have also been engaged in military affairs. Surgeon-General Fiset, who is now the Deputy Minister of Militia, was in active service in South Africa. I concur very heartily in all that has been said of our deceased friends, especially of Dr. Fiset, who was one of the greatest surgeons we had in Quebec, and was always very kind to any of his colleagues who were ill or who asked for his advice.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN: Before the last flowers are placed on the graves of our lamented colleagues, allow me to cast a few handfuls of sand upon at least two of those graves. One is the grave of the late Hon. John Costigan, popularly known some thirty-five years ago as "Honest John Costigan"—and no man in this honourable House remembers him better than our venerable colleague, a model for all Canadianhood in this great Dominion, Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who will remember the Hon. John Costigan as one of his trusty, loyal, faithful colleagues. Can I pay him a higher compliment in the face of posterity than to have as a living witness of his value as an honest statesman, a true friend, a representive of the people, the right hon. gentleman himself, Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell? What higher tribute can be paid to any man in his grave than the respect and esteem, the love and devotion, of the men whom he has left behind? What the Hon. John Costigan did for the Conservative Government for many years, from 1882 to 1896, he did not for Canada alone, but the same "Honest John Costigan" worked for imperial interests thirty-five years ahead of his time. The Imperial Council called at present by the British Government, to be composed of Prime Ministers from all the Dominions over the seas, was first thought of and first inaugurated by the Hon. John Costigan, aided by my right hon. friend, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who was then Minister of Customs in Sir John Macdonald's Government. How was it that Hon. John Costigan became an imperial factor thirty-five years ahead of his time? Because he sought then for Ireland what all the world is seeking to-day for poor Belgium. He then was the first to rise on the floor of the House of Commons and ask and pray the British Government and the British Parliament to grant to Ireland that measure of Home Rule for which to-day, on behalf of Belgium, England is bleeding to death and spending her treasure without limit, as well as Canada and the other overseas dominions. But, oh, how the ears of England were closed and her eyes were dimmed at that time! They would not think of poor little Ireland; it was a crime then. I remember, when I was a young man, coming out of the University 35 years ago, that it was a crime to be called a Home Ruler. To-day the noblest medal that an Englishman can put on his breast is to state to the world, "I am fighting—not for England, but for Belgium, for Serbia, for Montenegro, for all the small nations of the earth." Thirty-five years ago Honourable John Costigan was officially and publicly alone, in fighting for the same principles, the same rights, that are to-day involved in the struggle of Great Britain on behalf of those outlying nations, whilst at her doors was a nation which for over 700 years had been on her knees asking for self-government. To-day, thanks to the Honourable John Costigan for having initiated the movement which has now reached a glorious climax, not only Ireland, which has suffered long and severely, but also the other poor nations which I have mentioned, are to be emancipated. This honourable House can not do itself more honour than to cast a last glance on that grave from which springs a light which is now illuminating the world —the light of Home Rule for small nations and small peoples. Such was the work accomplished by "honest John Costigan," a colleague of our right honourable nonagenarian representative on the floor of this House some 35 years ago.

At the end of 30 years the spirit of the nation rose again, because one of the famous Irish patriots said, "The spirit of a nation can never die," and I believe the poet who wrote those sublime words was an uncle of the senator whose seat, now vacant, is adorned with flowers—Davis, the Irish national poet; Davis of the Gavin Duffys and the O'Connells and the D'Arcy McGees in the time when I was a boy, in the time of my honourable colleague here, whom I respect and admire as the foremost type of Canadian manhood in this Dominion, Sir Mackenzie Bowell. Fair—may I say it?—in spite of his official position as the president of organizations which we then considered, and which many of us, though not myself, still consider to be enemies of certain faiths, certain classes of religion. Never has his allegiance to those societies broken his allegiance to his adopted country, Canada. He has always been a champion of the minority as well as a friend of the majority. I bow before him; I take my lessons in public life from his conduct; I take him as my model. I devote my interest and my time, but not all my time and all my interest, to those special societies as against the interest and the devotion that I owe to our common country, Canada. There is my model. We have to regret one who disappeared only yesterday morning, in the person of Tom Davis, a nephew of the Irish national poet. Let our sympathy go out to him, and I say to him, now in his grave, "Tom, your name shall remain, with that of your uncle, deeply impressed in the hearts of the people of Canada. You were a trusted friend of the people, especially of the people of this country, as your famous uncle was a champion of Irish rights sixty years ago when Gavin Duffy and D'Arcy McGee and other patriots were exiled to the overseas Dominions, then colonies." When Gavin Duffy reached the shores of Australia he was asked, "Well, Gavin, how does poor old Ireland stand?" And he replied, "Ask me not; I have left her corpse on the dissecting table." That same Gavin Duffy was afterwards for years Prime Minister and Governor of Australia, showing that the heart of the Irish is true all the time when it rocks and beats against justice and truth; but the heart of the Irish is in open rebellion or concealed rebellion when it confronts injustice, when it confronts what is not right and not in accordance with the laws of humanity and civilization. Honourable Tom Davis was a descendent of those men, and, in conjunction with the name of the Honourable John Costigan—" Honest John "—I say to Tom: " My friend, you have done well by your native land, Canada; you have fostered a name which shines gloriously in the pages of your ancestors. I say farewell to you both."

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, January 25, 1917.

The Senate met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATOR INTRODUCED.

Hon. Thomas J. Bourque, of Richibucto, N.B., was introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Mr. Poirier, and took his seat.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY (translation): Honourable gentlemen, may I be permitted to express my regret that the commission of the new senator who has been sworn in has not been sent to him in French. It seems to me that in this country, where the two languages are placed upon an equality, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery should be aware of this requirement and comply with the spirit of the law. If he was not obliged to write the commission in French, he should, recognizing the circumstances of person, time and place, understand as a man of intelligence that when he sends a commission to a French member, that commission should at least be drafted in French. My own commission was issued in French. Law and courtesy go hand in hand in such cases.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER introduced Bill (A), An Act to amend the Companies Act, which was read the first time.

THE NEGOTIATIONS FOR PEACE.

MOTION.

Hon. RUFUS H. POPE moved:

That in the opinion of the Senate only the representatives of the Nations who have taken part or have been engaged in the war, should participate in the negotiations for peace.

He said: Honourable gentlemen of the Senate, I appreciate as much as any honourable member of this House can appreciate that the question which I have placed on the Order Paper may have a very important bearing upon grave issues which must be settled sooner or later; and possibly this question could have been dealt with better by some of the senior members of this honourable House than by myself. Therefore I shall no doubt, in the inperfection of my remarks, leave an opportunity for any or all of the honourable gentlemen present to take part in this discussion, that we may arrive at a conclusion that will be worthy of the dignity of this honourable House and will convey to the world some expression of the opinion of this portion of the Empire, as it is represented by the Senate of Canada.

The horizon of the future of Canada is, in this day in which I am speaking, much broader than ever before. While we have in the past had sympathy with many world-wide catastrophies, and while we have offered words of sympathy and shown our generosity by way of gifts to people in different corners of the earth who have suffered from calamity, never before have we taken part as we are taking part to-day in such a serious conflict as is going on in the centre of Europe. Never before have we offered such a sacrifice for liberty, for the permanency of the small nations of the world, in order that they might enjoy those special favours of birth and inheritance that are so dear to them. Never before has any colony of Great Britain offered the tremendous sacrifices of men and money that Canada is to-day offering on the fields of Flanders.

Believing that our vision is broadening, and observing that all kinds of legislators and legislatures and senates and powers are taking upon themselves the privilege of expressing their views with regard to this war, whether they happen to be neutral or otherwise, I have thought that possibly it would not be out of place—that it would not be an interference with the policy of Canada, nor with the plans of the governments in whose hands the conduct of this war is placed—for this honourable House to take into consideration the very vital question embodied in this motion. I believe that it is within the constitutional rights and prerogatives of this honourable Assembly to express our opinion upon this question.

There was another motive, a purely selfish one, I admit, that prompted me to move this resolution—that it would give me the great pleasure of expressing my views upon this subject in a public assembly of which I happen to be a member.

Honourable gentlemen, why do we fight? First, permit me to say that we are not "too proud to fight" in this great world struggle. Secondly, our intense love and devotion for peace and all that goes with peace prompt us to fight. Thirdly, it is our conviction that England had a just cause when she went forth to battle in this great war, and we as Canadians have the courage of our convictions. Under those circumstances we find ourselves called upon to make the sacrifices that we are now making, not alone for the independence of Canada or of the Empire to which we belong, not alone for the defence of those liberties that we possess, but, I firmly believe, as I am sure the honourable gentlemen of this House believe, for the liberty of the world—of the smaller as well as the larger nations, of the land and of the sea—for liberty in its purest and best sense. That is why we have pledged our faith, our money and our lives, and have gone forth with the battalions of all the Allies and with those of the diverse parts of this magnificent Empire to which we belong.

The President of the United States has said that we should have peace without victory. Honourable gentlemen of the Senate, the President of the United States, Mr. Wilson, has the privilege of entertaining any set of opinions he sees fit. It was his privilege to be the head of a great college and an instructor of boys growing to manhood; but, upon my sacred honour, when I read the last two or three messages that he sent to the Senate of the United States, and that have been published throughout the wide world, I thought that possibly he had made a mistake when he ceased to instruct the youth and undertook to educate full-grown men and the full-fledged nations of the world.

Peace without victory! In the first place, we are great lovers of peace. It is our inclination to have peace at the earliest possible moment, and I am sure that every honourable gentleman and every citizen of Canada would read gladly and attentively any message appearing in the papers or elsewhere headed by the word "Peace.' But we have a right to consider from whence such a message comes and whether Mr. Wilson is an authority upon peace. In the first place, his ideas as to the methods for establishing peace—adopted by himself, not by his predecessors—can be found in his dealings with Mexico; and, if he cannot direct us, who are at war for a righteous cause, with a more certain and absolute knowledge of the arts of making peace than he has shown in the case of Mexico, we had better look in some other direction to find the method of a doctor who would administer the medicine of peace.

President Wilson speaks of protecting small nations, and says that there should be no trafficking in nations—that their ideas and ideals are as important to them as are those of the greater nations. I agree with him that there should be no trafficking in nations. I have only to direct the attention of this honourable body to the Philippines, and point out that he presides over a nation that has trafficked in small nations, but nations which have not enduring peace even to this time.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: And only a few days ago he completed the barter and purchase of the Danish West India Islands, and paid for them in so much cold cash.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Yes, they trafficked in them, quite contrary to the splendid phraseology that was used in his message:

> No peace can last, or ought to last, which does not recognize and accept the principle that governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that no right anywhere exists to hand peoples about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were property.

The hon. gentleman presides over a nation which believes in acquiring what will profit. The nation of which he is the presiding officer participated in a treaty in which were laid down the principle of the protection of the smaller nations, and more particularly the methods of international warfare that would be tolerated by civilized powers. As first magistrate of that great republic, President Wilson knows that it is his bounden duty to read and digest all matters appertaining to public affairs of this kind. He knows that there is not a single article in that code of international law which has not been violated a hundred times by Germany in this conflict. And still he says that these principles shall be the guiding star. No man knows better than the President of the United States that Germany marched upon Belgium before war was declared. Nobody knows better than he that for forty-eight hours Belgium was looking across to see if the relieving arm of old England was coming to the rescue, and that at the end of eight and forty hours it did come, but a handful of veterans who did valiant service after their arrival in France. Nobody knows better than the President of the United States that the womanhood of Belgium and of parts of France has been violated, and that things have taken place beyond mention in this honourable House. Nobody knows better than President Wilson that many small children have been put to death, and many others maimed for life. He knows, too, of the murder of Nurse Cavell. He reads, and he must remember these things. Nobody knows better than he of the violations of all the laws of civilized nations, at sea as well as by land, because some of his own fellow-citizens have suffered and gone down to their death. It is not for me to say what action the President of the United States should take with regard to the loss of the Lusitania and other losses of American citizens. He can write notes or he can remain silent. I am no citizen of the United States; I am a British subject and a Canadian; I have no criticism to offer. The President of the United States knows of what I have spoken, and much more; and in his first message for peace to the world he has the audacity, if that word is strong enough, to say in his public message that the objects of the Central powers of Europe and the objects of the allied forces of the British Empire, France and Russia, in entering the war were the same. He invites us to sit down with these murderers and violators of women on an equal footing in a council of peace. I enter my most solemn protest against that, and, I trust that this honourable body will take this opportunity of entering its protest.

There are so many matters connected with this subject that if one were to deal with them all, it would take an inordinate time. I think one of the greatest courtesies that we as members can pay to this honourable body is to deliver what we have to deliver in the fewest possible words; so I will just mention one other matter, which I think the President of the United States may possibly be looking forward to as of more importance than the traditional history to which he pointed in his academic message to the United States Senate.

Honourable gentlemen of the Senate, one of the results of this war will be to give Canada a better place among the nations of the world. We belong to this great continent of America and we are, as we may say, an independent colony under the British flag, and not obliged to participate in the wars of Europe. But what did we do? We selected from among the youth and manhood of the best blood of Canada, a half million of our best young men and sent them over to fight with the Mother Country and her Allies the battles of civilization. We have won a place in the hearts of the allies that no other nation has ever had. We have attracted the attention of the world. This will have the effect of opening to the eyes of the world a marvel of natural resources of which under ordinary circumstances they could have formed no idea. This will draw commerce, finance, and immigration to Canada.

The United States of America know full well that after this war is over, if two boxes of goods, one marked, "Canada" and the other "United States," are shipped to any of the nations along with whom we have fought and died, the goods marked "Canada" will sell first and all the time. She knows that a broad opportunity has been afforded to us and that the connections and associations which we have formed will make us a preferred competitor against the United States in the markets of the world. I do not say that this will be a result of tariff arrangements; I do not know what those tariff arrangements may be; but I say that, as a reasonable body of men, whether we have been free traders or protectionists in the past, we do know that the tremendous expenditures of all these nations will necessitate large revenues. I believe that the basis of taxation in so far as Europe is concerned, will be broadened as a result of this war; but whether it is or not we have a broadened sympathy which will give to us a renewed—aye, a new position, in the markets of the people of the Allied Nations.

Now, nobody knows this better than the people of the United States. Consider our position as it will be after the war. A man wanting to do an export business from America will be able to do it on a much better basis from Canada than he can from the United States. When the delegation from Belgium came to see the President of the United States, and gave absolute proof of the outrages committed in Belgium, he received them in that placid way of his and said, "We will attend to that after the war." Now, after the war, these trade arrangements of which I am speaking are going to be attended to, and a nation which has become as sordid as the United States apparently has, which has enjoyed an accumulation of wealth to the extent which they have in the last two years and a half, will be considering in what manner they can interfere in order that their future may be as bright as their present. Knowing the devastation that has taken place in Europe and the tremendous demand that must arise for products from the outside world, it is only natural that they should be interested in this question. I have no objection to fair competition in trade; I am not here to discuss what the United States can get; but I am here to stand by my words when I say that the boys in the trenches who are giving us a place on the map of the world will have something to say about the peace terms. We should take good care that we participate in every advantage that belongs to us, or we shall have been untrue to those hundreds of thousands of men who have made the supreme sacrifice in the name of liberty on the battlefields of France.

There is just one more matter that I think should be placed on Hansard. It shows how the world's history repeats itself from time to time, that this great war is centred precisely where other wars have centred; and that the same conditions are about to arise that arose when England and France were negotiating as to peace one hundred and sixteen years ago, when Pitt, the Prime Minister of England, in answer to those who urged peace at any price, said:

> I see no possibility at this moment of concluding such a peace as would justify that liberal intercourse which is the essence of real amity; no chance of terminating the expense or the anxieties of war or of restoring to us any of the advantages of established tranquillity. . . . . As a lover of peace, I will not sacrifice it by grasping at the shadow, when the reality is not substantially within my reach. Why, then, do I refuse peace? Because it is deceptive, because it is perilous, because it cannot exist.

The motion was put and declared agreed to.

After some time:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I may be belated—in fact, I am belated—but I had intended to ask my honourable friend the member from Compton (Hon. Mr. Pope) not to press for a pronouncement by the Senate on the motion which he has made. It seems to me that it would be inadvisable for the Senate to urge its opinion not only on the Imperial Parliament but upon the Allied Nations as to the course they should pursue in negotiations for peace.

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I thought the discussion would continue for some little time, and that I should have an opportunity of discussing the matter with my honourable friend; but it terminated so quickly as not to leave me that opportunity. I think the House will agree with me that, while it may be quite proper to discuss the course that should be pursued in regard to negotiations that may take place looking to the establishment of peace, it would be undesirable and unbecoming of the dignity of this Senate, that we should arbitrarily express our opinion as to what should be done by the Allied Nations. With the leave of the House, I would therefore move that the motion which has been passed be rescinded, and if my hon. friend desires to bring it up again I shall be very glad to facilitate his doing so.

Hon. Mr. POWER: We have a rule of the House which prescribes the method in which a resolution of the House may be rescinded, and the honourable leader of the Government is not pursuing the course laid down.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have assumed that it was by leave of the House.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I notice that the honourable gentleman from Compton (Hon. Mr. Pope) is not here. If there is no difference of opinion and the unanimous consent of the Senate can be procured, I for one will not object.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: While there is much to be said in favour of the position taken with so much eloquence by the hon. member for Compton, I think it would be undesirable for the Senate to pass such a resolution.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Does the rescinding of the motion expunge the speech from Hansard?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. POPE: As I was called out of the Senate, I would like to ask the leader of the House what is desired.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would suggest to my honourable friend that we rescind the motion that has been passed, and that my honourable friend allow it to stand on the motion paper for further discussion.

Hon. Mr. POWER: You cannot do that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is nothing to prevent it.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I understand that the honourable leader of the House has asked for unanimous consent to rescind the resolution. We had better accept that, and if the honourable member from Compton wishes to bring the matter up on some other day, he can do so.

The motion to rescind was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Now that this motion to rescind has been carried, I suggest to the leader of the Government that, as this resolution was apparently adopted without due consideration, it should not appear in our Minutes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, I think it is desirable that the motion should not be in the Minutes.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Friday, January 26, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

IMMIGRANTS IN THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY inquired of the Government the number of immigrants that landed in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island in the years 1915 and 1916.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The number of immigrants who settled in the Maritime Provinces—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island—during the fiscal year 1914-15, was 11,104, and during the fiscal year 1915-1916, was 5,981.

GOVERNMENT COMMISSIONS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a statement showing the date and object of all commissions instituted by the Government of the day, since its accession to power in 1911, up to the present date; the number of days during which each of these commissions sat, and what was the cost of each to the country.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I would suggest that the motion be amended to include the names of the personnel of the various commissions.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Hon. Mr. LEGRIS: I have no objection.

The motion, amended as sugggested, was agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

PROPOSED APPOINTMENTS.

Hon. the SPEAKER: I have the honour to lay before the Senate the following communications:

The Senate, Clerk's Office,
Ottawa, 18th January, 1917.

Sir,—Adverting to the Order of the Senate of the 17th of May last, that shorthand writers be secured to report the debates of the Senate, I have the honour to report that Mr. Albert Horton, chief of that branch of the staff, who was authorized to organize the same, has submitted the names of Messrs. D. J. Halpin and H. H. Emerson, as the best men he could find to assist him in his work, and these two men are now awaiting being appointed to assume the discharge of their duties.

As the skill requisite to perform this work is somewhat peculiar, if not technical, these appointments could be made under Section 21 of the Civil Service Act, 1908, subject, however, to the provisions of Section 19 of the said Act.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,
(Sgd) Sam'l E. St. O. Chapleau.

Hon. Joseph Bolduc,
Speaker of the Senate,
Ottawa.

The Senate,
Speaker's Office,
Ottawa, January 26, 1917.

Referring to the letter of Clerk of the Senate of the 18th instant, relative to the proposed appointment of shorthand writers to report the debates of the Senate, I recommend the appointment of Messrs. D. J. Halpin and H. H. Emerson, as suggested by the Chief of that branch of the Staff, at the minimum salary of Subdivision B of the First Division, subject, however, to the provisions of Section 19 of the Civil Service Act, 1908.

(Sgd) Joseph Bolduc, Speaker.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think these communications should be referred to the Standing Committee on Debates and Reporting, and I move accordingly.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is usual at this period of the Session to have a short adjournment while awaiting the arrival of business from the Commons, and I purpose moving that when the House adjourns to-day it shall stand adjourned until a week from Monday at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I would suggest that the hour of meeting should be eight o'clock instead of three o'clock.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I consent to that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is there any reason why the adjournment should not be until Tuesday?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I took the matter up with the Prime Minister, and it is expected that the Commons will adjourn for a considerable period during the same week. I therefore think it desirable that we should be here on Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, February 5, at eight o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Monday, February 5, 1917.

The Senate met at Eight o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATOR INTRODUCED.

Hon. Henry W. Laird, of Regina, Saskatchewan, was introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Mr. Sharpe, and took his seat.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF ELEVATORS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. POPE:

Is it the intention of the Government to take over at an early date all the terminal elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur, either by purchase or lease? If not, why not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is not the present intention of the Government to take over the terminal elevators at Fort William and Port Arthur by purchase or lease. The Government as a matter of policy determined to construct certain terminal and internal storage elevators. This has been carried out as far as considered advisable at present, and no further extension will be made unless further consideration and an easier financial situation render it desirable and feasible.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN:

1. What is the total amount expended as on the first day of December, 1916, on the Hudson Bay Railway enterprise? (a) How much on the railway itself? (b) How much on the terminals? (c) How much on the port, wharves and the excavation of the channel to deep water?
2. What will be the length of the excavation to deep water?
3. What will be the depth of the water at low tide in the excavated channel?
4. What will be the width of this artifical channel?
5. What is the estimated cost of all the excavation in the port and channel when completed?
6. How many miles of the railway have been graded from Le Pas?
7. How many miles remain to be graded?
8. What is the distance to-day from Le Pas to the end of steel?
9. What is the estimated cost of the said railway when completed?
10. What is the estimated cost of the terminals when completed?
11. What is the estimated cost of the grain elevators, if any, to be built at the terminals?
12. What is the price of coal to-day at Port Nelson?
13. How many men have been employed in the Government works at Port Nelson last summer?
14. How many are there now in the pay of the Government at Port Nelson?
15. How many steamers have been chartered or otherwise employed by the Government to transport men, materials and supplies to Port Nelson?
16. What are the names of these steamers?
17. What has the Government paid for that service?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Total amount expended to December 1, 1916, $17,557,100.42—(a) expended on the railway, $12,103,603.43; (b) expended on Port Nelson terminals, $5,453,496.99 (includes ports, wharves, excavation of channel.
2. The channel from turning basin at docks to deep water of natural channel will be about three-fourths of a mile in length, beyond which some improvements will be made at isolated points in the natural channel for a further distance of one and a quarter miles.
3. 20 feet.
4. 500 feet.
5. No separate estimate of cost of dredging has been made.
6. About 413 miles ready for track.
7. 11 miles.
8. 332 miles.
9. $16,000,000.
10. $10,000,000.
11. $1,000,000.

12. No coal on sale at Port Nelson. Cost of each cargo varies with the class of vessel used to transport it.

13. The number of men employed varies from week to week. The maximum number on any monthly pay-roll was 578.

14. 90 men on December pay-roll.

15. Two steamships were employed during the season of 1916.

16. Durley Chine and Sheba.

17. Both vessels owned by the Government. Cost of operation on the Hudson Bay route during 1916 was $31,355.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (A), an Act to amend the Companies Act.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I have taken charge of this Bill at the request of the honourable gentleman from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville), who is not able to be present.

The reason for the introduction of the Bill is, briefly, this. At the present time it is practically impossible for any person interested in a company incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act to get information as to the financial condition, the officers, or the internal affairs of the company. Under the existing law there is a procedure by which, in certain cases, an application may be made to a judge, and an order made, to allow a person interested to inspect the documents of the company; but that is not workable. The object of this Bill is to enable such persons to get reasonable information of what the company is doing. There are in the Bill provisions with respect to the inspection of companies, under which, instead of persons interested having to apply to a judge for an order, the Secretary of State may appoint one or more competent inspectors to investigate the affairs of any company, and to report thereon in such manner as the Secretary of State may direct. Then, as at the present time there is practically no provision for annual returns from these companies, the eleventh clause makes provision for such annual returns.

While this Bill is by no means complete or perfect, it is a step in the right direction, and I know that certain officers of the Government have been giving a good deal of attention to this question. What I purpose doing—and I trust that the honourable the leader of the Government will have no objection—is to have the Bill read a second time, and then referred to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, who will hear the officials to whom I have referred; and in that way I hope there will be produced a respectable and complete measure.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I must confess that I have not had an opportunity of examining the Bill closely; but, without committing myself to its principle, I cannot see any serious objection to referring it to the Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill read the second time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Power, the Bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

THE PARLIAMENTARY ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have been asked by several honourable gentlemen whether any arrangements had been arrived at concerning the parliamentary adjournment which is expected shortly to take place. I am informed that the House of Commons will in all probability adjourn on Wednesday of this week until the 19th of April. I would suggest that when this House adjourns it might safely adjourn to the 23rd or 24th of April. The 19th of April will be a Thursday and the 24th the Tuesday following.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: My honourable friend has not told us what legislation we may expect.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not anticipate any legislation other than war financial measures and a proportion of the estimates sufficient to carry us over the adjournment.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Would that necessitate sitting at night?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That will depend on what legislation may come down to-morrow.

MILITARY HOSPITALS COMMISSION EXHIBIT.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: On behalf of the Military Hospitals Commission, I desire to invite honourable gentlemen to view some exhibits made by the convalescent soldiers, which will be found in the lobby of the House of Commons. This exhibit shows the different kinds of work done under the vocational branch of that institution.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Tuesday, February 6, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

1. When did the Royal Commission on Indian Affairs complete its work?

2. Has the final report been made to the Dominion Government?

3. If so, has this report been submitted to the Provincial Government of British Columbia?

4. Has the Dominion Government considered making any alteration in the policy previously announced, of settling the question of the adoption of the report by the governments before hearing any representations that the Indian tribes interested may wish to make in their own behalf.

5. At what date did the members of the Royal Commission and the Secretary, cease to draw their remuneration?

6. What has been the cost of the Royal Commission to date?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. On 30th June, 1916.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.
4. No.
5. The commissioners ceased to draw salaries on the 30th June, 1916; the secretary on the 30th October, 1916.
6. The total cost to date, $315,604.36, of which half is borne by the province.

APPOINTMENTS TO THE SENATE.

INQUIRY AND DISCUSSION.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN inquired of the Government:

1. Is it the intention or the policy of the Government during the war extension of time, unanimously and gratuitously, granted to it by Parliament, to continue to fill all Liberal vacancies in the membership of the Senate of Canada with supporters of the Conservative party, irrespective of the rights, interests and claims of His Majesty's Loyal Liberal Opposition in the Upper House of Parliament, and of the rights, interests and claims of His Majesty's Loyal Liberal subjects throughout the Dominion of Canada, and particularly of those Liberals who are overseas fighting for and defending the common cause of the Allies?

2. If such be the intention and the policy of the Government does it, or can it, expect the undivided support of Parliament and the people of Canada in regard to its party or political ends, over administrative measures?

3. Is the Government prepared, in contradistinction and in contravention of the agreement which obtains in the House of Commons regarding representation in that House to set aside similar conditions regarding the representation in the Upper House of Parliament?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As this is purely a matter of policy, the Government does not feel called upon to answer this question.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I know that there can be no debate on a question put and an answer given; but, as there is nothing else on the Order Paper for to-day, I would ask the leave of the Senate to say a few words on this question. If the House is unanimous in granting permission I will say a few words now.

Some hon. SENATORS: Go on.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Senate of Canada is in a constant state of evolution. As senators we are immortals, because our number remains the same; but our names change. I rise to speak more particularly for the information of those members who are not absolutely au fait of what has taken place in this Chamber during the last fifteen years. Since I entered this Chamber in 1898, we have had quite a number of debates—academic debates, if you will—on the constitution of the Senate and on various suggestions of reforms to make it more democratic or representative, and more useful as one of the chambers of Parliament.

The question which the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) put on the Order Paper some days ago recalled to my mind some suggestions which I made to the Senate about ten years ago, during a debate in which members on both sides of the House expressed their views as to the proper constitution of the Senate. I recognized then that the Fathers of Confederation had had in view the constitution of a second Chamber which would act as a moderator on hasty legislation, a body which would be in general sympathy with the administration of the day, but would be composed of independent men who would exercise their own judgment in passing upon the public acts which come before them. It was recognized, apparently, in most of the debates on the subject which took place in this House, that senators were all party men—that, whatever the mode of their appointment was, they would meet in the second chamber as men affiliated with one of the two parties in Canada. It also seemed to be generally desired by those who took part in those debates that some mode of appointment should be devised under which it would not be possible for a Government perpetuating itself in power to wipe out all opposition, by preventing the appointment of representatives holding views somewhat different from those of the Ministerial party. The problem was to devise a mode of appointment which would provide a more even balance between the two parties in this Chamber, in order to enable the more independent minds, or those less subservient to party feeling, to have full play in the decisions of this body.

In the debates of 1906-7 or 1907-8, I suggested that perhaps the following modification in the appointment of senators could be adopted with advantage to this Chamber. My suggestion was that senators should be appointed, not by the Cabinet, but by the House of Commons, which would naturally give a preponderating influence to the Cabinet, since it would enjoy the confidence of a majority of the House of Commons. When a party on coming into power, found itself with a minority in this Chamber, it could, through its majority in the House of Commons appoint senators to vacancies as they occur—until it had attained a certain given majority, say five or ten. When that majority was reached, the appointments should be made alternately, one by the majority of the House of Commons, and one by the leader of the Opposition, whose candidate would be the one obtaining the greatest number of votes from the members of the Opposition. I thought that this would perhaps give the Senate a greater influence with the public at large, inasmuch as it would put the two parties in this Chamber somewhat on a parity, the Ministerial party always having a slight majority for the reasons that I have given. Of course, many and diverse opinions were expressed by the various members of this Chamber; but I thought that, until the people of Canada should decide on some form of direct election of senators, that mode of appointment would result in maintaining a fairly equal division between the two parties, and in giving to the more independent members a larger influence in the decision of the important questions that come before us.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

I recall this expression of opinion of ten years ago because at the present moment the two parties have almost reached that ideal condition which I have mentioned, in which the party in power has a small majority in this Chamber; and for the better administration of the affairs of Parliament it should be satisfied with a small margin, rather than an overwhelming majority. I recall it also because we are in a transitory stage—the Parliament elected in 1911 having practically expired last autumn, and because the two parties to-day are continuing, of their own volition, to perpetuate themselves in Parliament without going back to the electors for a new mandate. I mention it because it seems to me appropriate at this particular time. If the leaders of the two parties feel that there is a public advantage in maintaining a certain equilibrium in this Chamber, now is the time, before an election, in the peculiar conditions which exist, to decide upon a new policy. To my mind this is one of those exceptional occasions when the two parties, in face of a dissolution of the House of Commons, standing practically on an equal footing, can decide upon a new policy. I mention it now because I feel that at such a time the two parties are entitled to claim an even division of public opinion in this country. Of course, only an election will tell, but, for that reason, I thought it proper that I should recall the remarks that I formerly made. We had those debates in this Chamber without consideration of party advantage. We were discussing in absolute sincerity what would be the best solution for the criticism that we sometimes hear in the country as to the mode of appointment to this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Would not those members appointed by the House of Commons be themselves members of the House of Commons, or would they be taken from outside?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I do not remember touching upon that point, but I should take it for granted that the Government of the day, or the leader of the Opposition, might make the selection and nomination of a senator even from among their colleagues. I admit that there are arguments pro and con, and I have not applied my mind to the solution of that question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Will the hon. senator who has just taken his seat allow me to put to him a question in regard to his remarks as the the majority in the Senate? What difference does it make—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Before the hon. gentleman proceeds, I wish to ask the Speaker whether we are to understand that this is a general discussion upon the whole principle of the constitution of the Senate, or whether consent is given by the Senate to hear my honourable friend make a speech. If we are to have a general discussion, it may lead to further discussion. My own impression is that we ought not to depart from the principle of parliamentary practice laid down, that there should be no discussion unless the order of business provides for it. If we are going to have a general discussion, I may have a little to say in reply to my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I fail to see that the honourable senator has a right to interrupt me. I am simply asking a question. I am not continuing the discussion, and I think my right hon. friend should have waited until I put my question. I am asking the senator who has been informing the House on the question of majorities, in this House or elsewhere, what is the difference between a majority of one and a majority of 25 or 100? So long as you carry a majority, what is the difference?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The difference is this, that a very small majority, in a body constituted as is the Senate, is likely to give a greater influence to those members of the Senate who have been less active partisans in their lifetime than perhaps the majority of us, and who could perhaps bring a greater independence of mind to their actions in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There is not a member of this House who has not been an active partisan, and that is the reason why we are here.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The point raised by the Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell is, I think, well taken. The hon. member for De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) was allowed to speak by the unanimous consent of this House; but, as soon as a member objects to any other remarks being made, I think further discussion is out of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have not finished my inquiry yet. The second inquiry is:

If such be the intention and the policy of the Government does it, or can it, expect the undivided support of Parliament and the people of Canada in regard to its party or political ends, over administrative measures?

Now, I want an answer from the Government. The first question has been answered: the Government has no policy in regard to the first question. Now I want to know what the answer of the Government is to the second. Will the Government say yes or no?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The second question is answered by my answer to the first.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Very wise government! Now, the third question is this:

Is the Government prepared, in contradistinction and in contravention of the agreement which obtains in the House of Commons regarding representation in that House to set aside similar conditions regarding the representation in the Upper House of Parliament?

What is the policy on that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The third question is answered by my answer to the first and second questions.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Oh, the country will judge your answers, I tell you.

AGRICULTURAL, INDUSTRIAL AND TRADE INTERESTS OF CANADA.

MOTION FOR A COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved:

That a committee composed of nine members of this House be appointed to further inquire into what is being done and what could be done to best promote the agricultural, industrial and trade interests of this country both during and after the war, such committee to be composed of the following members: The Honourable Messieurs Bolduc, Lougheed, Sir James, K.C.M.G., Dandurand, Edwards, Bostock, Ross (Moosejaw), Taylor, Ross (Middleton), and the mover, and to report from time to time to this House.

He said: Honourable gentlemen will remember that at the last session a committee was appointed, with instructions to inquire into what was being done and what could be done to best promote the agricultural, industrial and trade relations of this country, both during and after the war. The committee caused to be issued throughout the country some 20,000 letters inviting all incorporated bodies to make their own suggestions. A large number of answers were received. Many of them were limited to local interests, which can hardly be taken into consideration; but a great many made valuable suggestions, which are being tabulated by the clerks of the committee in a statement giving the names of the parties or of the body making the suggestion, and giving an abstract of the suggestion when it is of general interest. If the committee is re-appointed, the work could be completed by the month of April, when this House sits again after the adjournment, and when the committee can again take up the question of the inquiry and dispose of it finally.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC LOAN BILL—$100,000,000.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 19, An Act to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the Public Service.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, in view of the possibility of Parliament adjourning to-morrow, I would ask, with the leave of the House, that this Bill be given a second reading to-day. It is a Bill that has for its object the borrowing of $100,000,000 in the event of the Government finding it necessary to exercise its borrowing powers to that extent. This is not a war measure; it is a borrowing Bill for civil purposes; such as we almost invariably pass each session. My recollection is that last session we passed a somewhat similar Bill, or at least a Bill involving the same principle of borrowing, for $75,000,000. There are certain payments falling due during the ensuing recess—some $75,000,000, I believe; there are three loans to be repaid, two aggregating $50,000,000, and one approximately $25,000,000. That, of course, will leave a margin of borrowing power which may be exercised by the Government in the event of our necessities requiring it. I would therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Landry, and with the consent of the House, the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I do not propose to make any lengthy remarks on this matter, but I would like to ask my hon. friend if he can give us some explanation as to the amount of financing that the Government has been doing for the benefit of the Imperial Government. If my hon. friend has the figures there, and can give us the information, I think it would be very interesting to know just to what extent the Government has been able to assist the British Government in financing and in dealing with the question of munitions. I think the country is reasonably proud that Canada has been able to provide certain financial arrangements which have very greatly assisted the Mother Country in connection with the manufacture and supply of munitions of war.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would prefer that my honourable friend would wait until the War Measures Bill comes before this House. That question will be involved to some extent in any discussion that may arise upon that measure. In the meantime I shall acquaint myself more exactly than I can speak to-day regarding the amount of advances which we have made on behalf of the Imperial Government.

Hon. Mr. POWER: As a matter of procedure, I submit that the better plan would be for the honourable leader to move the suspension of the rule which forbids two stages of a Bill being taken at the same sitting, and then we shall be at liberty to discuss the merits of the Bill on the second reading. There is no objection at all, I fancy, to suspending the rule.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Acting upon the suggestion of my hon. friend from Halifax, I would move the suspension of rules 23f, 24a, and 63, with a view to permitting the Bill to be read a second time this afternoon.

The motion for the suspension of the said rules was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Would the hon. leader give us any information with regard to what unused borrowing powers the Government have, in addition to this Bill? They have still borrowing powers which are not used up.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand that the margin of borrowing powers which we now have will be exhausted by the end of the fiscal year.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my hon. friend tell us what loans are maturing this year, the dates at which they were contracted, and the amounts?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot give you that with exactitude. All I can say is that in the discussion that took place in the Commons upon that question the Minister of Finance said that there are two short-date loans, aggregating $50,000,000, due in April and May; and he also stated that a $25,000,000 loan will mature in New York on August 1st. Then we shall be clear, I think, until past the end of the year.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is all the information?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the statement made by the Finance Minister. Of course, my hon. friend is aware, as I have already said, that this is not a war loan; it has nothing to do with the various war measures which we have passed from time to time; it is purely for civil government purposes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That might depend on the date of the loan, and that is why I asked the question.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, one is distinct from the other.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Perhaps my hon. friend will have that information for us by the time the Bill is reached again.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The Government has given the country an explanation for the demand for a $100,000,000 loan to pay off two loans. It has given an explanation in regard to $75,000,000 of the amount at present demanded—$50,000,000 to pay off a loan that is coming due in April, and $25,000,000 to meet a loan falling due in August. Has the Government yet told the country, or the Senate, or Parliament, what it is going to do with the balance of the $100,000,000—the $25,000,000? The Government has not stated anything about that. The country is waiting for its answer and its explanation. It has no explanation and no answer—a dumb Government!

Hon. Mr. POWER: Is the hon. leader of the Government in a position to inform the House what rate of interest the Government expects to pay upon these loans?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You will not answer that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That will depend on the market at the time the loan is negotiated.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Suppose the loans were made to-morrow?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They would probably cost from 5 to 5½ per cent.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: "You pays your money and you takes your choice."

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am not proposing to oppose or unduly delay the passing of this important measure, but I wish to express my regret that the Government have not paid any attention to the efforts that have been made on two or three occasions in this House to secure something more like fair play in the rate of interest allowed by the Government to different lenders. I understand that to-day no money is being borrowed at a lower rate than 5 per cent, while at the same time the depositors in the Government savings banks and in the Postal savings banks, who are as a rule our own citizens, and generally people who are striving to save a little out of their comparatively limited means, are getting only 3 per cent. I think that on the face of it that is a most unjust and indefensible distinction. Some years ago, when the rate of interest paid on loans from outside was 3½ or 4 per cent the Government of that day paid to the depositors in the Government savings banks the same rate that they paid to lenders outside. They paid at one time 4 and at another time 3½ per cent. Under the late Administration the Minister of Finance reduced the rate to 3 per cent, on the ground that the Government were paying only 3 per cent to outside lenders, and he did not think it was a businesslike thing for the Government to pay more to the depositors in the savings banks than the rate at which they could get the money from other lenders. Now, as they say, the boot is on the other foot, the depositors in the savings banks, who, as I say, are our own citizens and as a rule people not overburdened with wealth, are getting only 3 per cent, while the lenders, the capitalists, whether they are American, English, or Canadian, are getting 5 per cent. I contend, hon. gentlemen, that that is a most unjust and indefensible position, and I feel that it is my duty, while this measure is going through, to call attention to the unfairness of the manner in which the Government deals with these depositors.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I recall full well the statements made by the honourable gentleman on several occasions in the House in regard to this matter; but I am afraid that if he inquired into the situation he would find that the very condition to which he referred has existed for some time back. The fact is that for some time Canada has not been receiving loans from Great Britain, as she formerly did, but has been aiding Great Britain, as has already been mentioned. But that is not all. The position to-day is that the very parties to whom the honourable gentleman refers have had the opportunity for some months back, and have the opportunity now, to withdraw their money from the savings banks and invest it in the loans which are offered by the Government.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It is not probable that the average poor person—widow or child—would know enough to invest in the bonds.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Well, it would be absolutely impossible to be the guardian of every individual in the country.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, but they are the majority.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Under a new order which has been issued by the Finance Minister, persons who are depositors in the savings banks to-day can withdraw as low a sum as $25 and invest it in Government debentures, and draw upon that sum at the end of three years a sum equal to interest at 5 per cent per annum.

Hon. Mr. POWER: May I be pardoned for saying another word? I felt there was a good deal of force in the view taken by the honourable gentlemen who have just spoken; but I was rather surprised, on looking at the Canada Gazette, to find that the amount deposited to-day in the savings departments of the various banks in this country is much larger than what was deposited there a year ago.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: That is absolutely true. We have a phenomenal condition, a condition unprecedented in Canada, because of the great stimulus which has resulted from the activity in manufacturing and the high prices that are obtained for agricultural products and everything else that we have to export. There is no doubt that the banks are to-day overburdened with deposits, and it is because of this plethora of deposits that the banks have been able to come to the aid of the British Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may inform my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) that there are to-day banks which refuse to pay 3 per cent on large deposits unless they be time deposits. A plethora of money in the banks is not necessarily an indication of a healthy condition in the country.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I have no doubt that the remarks of the honourable senator from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) are entirely correct. I remember reading within the last few weeks the statements of two of our banks, according to which the deposits in those two banks—deposits bearing interest and deposits bearing no interest—amounted to nearly $500,000,000. The amount of deposits in those two banks, bearing interest at the same rate as is paid by the Government savings banks, amounted to millions—I have forgotten the exact figure. Apparently there is any amount of money in Canada to-day. I think the statement of the honourable senator from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) in regard to savings bank interest is entirely answered by that. To the honourable gentleman from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) I might say that the Treasury certificates now available for small investors, bearing 5 per cent interest, and which are negotiable, offer a very good reply, and show how the small investor can get from the Government of the country 5 per cent for his money, which is the same rate they are paying on larger investments.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable senator from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) says that some of the banks refused large sums at 2½ per cent. That is strange. If the conversion is so easy, you would think that those banks, in justice to their shareholders, would get the money at 2½ or 3 per cent, make the conversion, and get 5 per cent, and I am surprised that his own bank does not do so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Government is issuing war certificates in denominations as low as $25, and any person purchasing these can realize a little over 5 per cent. All they have to do in order to realize 5 per cent is transfer their account from the post office savings bank.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The people will gradually catch on to that.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

STAFF OF THE SENATE.

STATUTORY INCREASES.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand that His Honour the Speaker has submitted to the House the recommendation of the Clerk of the Senate with reference to the provisions contained in section 3, chapter 15, of the statutes of 1908, that the Senate should allow the members of its staff to enjoy the benefit of the provisions of the said Act—that is, the section covering the statutory increases to which the officers and servants of the Senate would be entitled, with the consent of the Senate. With the leave of the House, I move seconded by Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell, the adoption of this recommendation.

Hon. Mr. POWER: In the ordinary course of events, I think this recommendation should go to the Committee on Internal Economy, but, inasmuch as the House is likely to adjourn to-morrow until the latter end of April, and if we did not adopt this recommendation now the gentlemen referred to in the report might possibly lose some of the advance to which they are entitled, I trust that there will be no objection to adopting the motion of the honourable the leader of the Government.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SHORTAGE OF COAL.

Hon. H. W. RICHARDSON: With the leave of the Senate, before we adjourn, I wish to say that this country is in a very difficult position with regard to transportation and the coal supply. I have lately been associated with coal men of the United States and transportation men of this country, and I commence to realize the gravity of the situation. Never before in the history of this country has anything like the present condition existed. To-day we are facing a coal famine, which would mean almost the complete stoppage of transportation; we are struggling to move our supplies; we are weeks behind with our shipments; we have had to cancel a certain number of our passenger trains, at which the public did not demur, realizing the gravity of the situation. Ontario, unfortunately, has to depend on the United States for its coal supply. At the present time the mines in the United States are working to the limit. In the past the mines were able to supply the demands of the trade. The demands, however, have increased wonderfully. Factories that were working eight hours a day are now working twenty-four hours a day, and new factories have been established. Railroads that were able to operate and to transport the products of those factories are not able to transport three times that production, as we have it to-day. You can see how this has exhausted the coal supply of the country. Then, too, the wages of the operators on the railroads, the cost of steel, the cost of ties, the cost of spikes, and so on, have increased so enormously that the railroads have not been able to keep up their equipment.

In our country we have three or four lines of railway. We all know how they are prospering. There is not an hon. gentleman here who has not a full knowledge of the prosperity of our railroads. Take the Grand Trunk Railway; the English capitalists have never received one cent for their money. Take our own Intercolonial Railway: year after year it has shown a deficit. And last year we had the Canadian Northern Railway coming before us asking for help to tide them over. There must be a cause for all this, and the cause is largely that the railroads are not receiving sufficient from the people for the freight they are carrying. If we do nothing but stand still here and watch these railroads with their extra cost of maintenance and with the same old rates, we shall soon see them in bankruptcy; there is nothing else for it. Not one of us who goes into a store to-day demurs at paying the shopkeeper twenty-five to fifty per cent more for goods, because we know they are costing more; but we do not extend the same treatment to the railway companies.

It is useless for me to speak to you, honourable gentlemen, unless I have some solution to offer. The railways in the West have experienced unusually severe weather, and the cost of operating has increased at least 40 per cent. They have to move their coal supply, and that necessitates unshipping goods that need to be moved. Grain has to remain until they are able to ship it. The cost of coal is enormous. Only last week one railroad out of Toronto paid $8.50 a ton for five cars of coal. A shipment of coal crossed to Cobourg the other day and the railroads gobbled it all up. One railroad in our country has contracted with the mines in Pennsylvania for two hundred tons of coal at $4.16 at the mines; adding $1.25 for freight to Suspension Bridge brings this coal to $5.41, and further freight charges of $2 or $2.50 have to be paid before this coal can be used by that railroad. The Canadian Northern is bringing coal from Fort William to Montreal, and our Government railroad is doing practically the same thing. The coal at Lethbridge is coming east to Winnipeg. I think the situation is serious enough for our intervention—if we can intervene—and the only means that I see of getting over this stoppage of transportation is to order the railroads to purchase sufficient coal, irrespective of cost, to operate their roads. At the same time we can assist them by allowing an increase of 7½ per cent on the present freight rates to compensate them for the loss sustained, owing to the unusual condition of affairs caused by the war. This increase of rates would only last until normal conditions are resumed.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I think the honourable gentleman has put the situation very well; but at the beginning he said that the railroads were doing more business than ever before—in fact, that they had more than they could handle. Therefore they should be making more money, notwithstanding the great cost of everything. Would he explain why they need assistance when they are doing more business than they can take care of?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: They are doing more business, but the cost of doing that business has increased very considerably; in other words, they are not doing business at a profit, as they have been for years.

In the past the coal supply in Ontario has been taken care of largely by means of water transportation. During the summer months freight by water is very much cheaper than by rail. Fort William receives its coal from lake Erie at the very low rate of 30 cents a ton, and, strange to say, although every other rate went up last year, this old rate of 30 cents a ton was maintained almost until the end of the season; while tonnage from ports on lake Superior to lake Erie ports was $1 a ton for ore, and 4½ to 5 cents a bushel for grain. Owing to the shortage of cars in the United States and to the great demand for coal, the coal supply at the Lake Erie shipboard was not as good as usual. Steamers had to delay two or three days, waiting for a cargo; therefore they would go up light and sacrifice the cargo of coal; consequently the coal supply was lessened. Coming to Eastern Ontario was a class of ship that we call full-sized canal boats; they carry somewhere about 2,700 or 3,000 tons, and owing to the very high freight rate on the Atlantic ocean, any of these boats that were fit for sea service went into the ocean trade. Transportation through the Welland canal to Ontario and Montreal was greatly reduced; there was no tonnage to carry it, although rates went up from $1 a ton to Montreal to as high as $2.50. Taking it altogether, the situation is a result of the war, the wonderful demand, and the increased production of the factories, which are operating twenty-four hours a day, instead of eight. The only solution I see is for the Railway Board to order the railroads to buy coal, and give them a sufficient advance in rates to compensate them for the increased cost.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Evidently the honourable gentleman is an expert in the railway business. Before he takes his seat, will he please state to the House and to the country what amount of dividends and bonuses were paid by the various railroad systems in Canada during the past year? That would be of more consequence to the people and to the Senate than any statements about coal shortage. I would like him, if he is able to do so, to tell us the amount of dividends paid by the various railroad companies.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: No answer.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No answer. That means there has been too much paid.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I think there is a good deal in the statement of one honourable senator, who said that the railways appeared to be working overtime this last year and that their earning powers were very much increased. I know, after looking over the statement of the earnings of the Canadian Northern Railway, that there is a great improvement on last year; evidently they have done much better, and I presume that a like condition will be found in the finances of the Canadian Pacific railroad and other railroads. But, notwithstanding that, it may be, as the hon. senator (Hon. Mr. Richardson) has said, that their freight rate is still too low to pay. However, the suggestion of the hon. senator that they be authorized to go on and contract to carry at a rate that will pay I do not understand. Of course, this House has no authority to do that. I merely wish to refer to the fact that we have a Railway Commission whose special duty it is to look into freight rates, upon the complaint that they are either too high or too low, and I would suggest that it would be the part of wisdom, if anything is done, that it be done through that Commission. The Railway Commission can have but one object: that is, to do whatever is fair, and, if it is clearly established to their satisfaction that the rate is too low, and they so represent to the Government and to the country, I am quite sure it would then be an easy matter to give the railway companies the power to impose a higher rate. But until that is done I think we should be acting rather prematurely, or in the dark, if we were to make any special deliverance here with reference to what the railway companies should do.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I know that the Railway Commission has the power to increase the rate if it is satisfied that the existing rate is too low. Therefore I think that whatever is done ought to be done through the Commission.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: I may inform the honourable gentleman that the General Manager of the Intercolonial railway states that it will have a surplus of $2,000,000 for the fiscal year ending the 31st of March. The net earnings have never before been as large as they are now. The Canadian Northern had a deficit of only $245,000, according to its last report. It has done very well. But if there is any difficulty the Railway Commission can remedy it. Of course, they have no jurisdiction over the Intercolonial.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Wednesday, February 7, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

APPOINTMENT OF REPORTERS.

Hon. E. M. FARRFLL presented the second report of the Standing Committee on Debates and Reporting.

The Report was read, as follows:

Your Committee have, in obedience to the order of reference of the 26th January, 1917, considered the report of the Clerk of the Senate, dated 8th January, 1917, and the recommendation of His Honour the Speaker of the appointment of Messrs. D. J. Halpin and H. H. Emerson as Official Reporters of the Senate, and now beg to recommend to the Senate the adoption thereof, with the addition that, on the recommendation of the Chief of the Reporting Branch, Mr. Thomas Bengough, who has been in the service of the Senate for nine sessions, be employed as a reserve sessional reporter at $1,500 per session.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

(Signed) E. M. Farrell,
Chairman.

Certain rules having been suspended:

Hon. Mr. FARRELL moved that the report be now concurred in.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: If I heard correctly the reading of that report, it proposes to attach another employee to the Senate who will be permanently under salary. I do not know whether or not that proposal has been submitted to the consideration of the Committee on Internal Economy, but it seems to me that it ought to be. The other recommendation, I understand, was submitted and approved of. As the Committee on Internal Economy is charged with looking after the expenditure of this House, it would seem to me to be appropriate that they should exercise their judgment on the proposal referred to before it should be reported to the Senate.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: These matters are generally dealt with exclusively by the Debates Committee. It was that committee which last year examined the situation and recommended the appointment of Mr. Horton as Editor of the Debates, with the responsibility of organizing the staff. He has organized the staff, and it is upon his report that we are now acting.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: But I understand that the proposal referred to is an addition to that report. The original report recommended that two new stenographers be employed, and they are, according to the recommendation of the committee, to be employed; but the last recommendation, which is tacked on, is that a former reporter of the Senate, who is now practically out of business, be continued at a salary of $1,500 per session as an extra.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That matter was being studied by the editor at the same time, but the understanding with the party concerned had not reached such a point as to enable Mr. Horton to make his recommendation last week. He did so this morning before the committee, and we took for granted that His Honour the Speaker, who was present with us for a time, would accept our report and not raise any objection to the procedure in connection with it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: As his predecessor used to do.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: I am sorry I was not able to be present to-day at the meeting of the committee, of which I am a member, but I would like to ask the chairman if this is the unanimous report of the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It is.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: And, further, was the salary of $1,500 for this auxiliary reporter recommended by Mr. Horton?

Hon. Mr. FARRELL: He was present at the meeting.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Did he recommend that the salary be $1,500?

Hon. Mr. FARRELL: No.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: That was fixed by the committee. What is the salary to be paid to the other reporters?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: $2,100.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: While Mr. Bengough is undoubtedly a first-class reporter and entitled to the consideration of the committee, he is very fully and amply paid at $1,500 a session, which, as we all know, may last only a few weeks.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, but we have to take sessions as they come; they may be short or they may be long.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: In addition to that, we are paying Mr. Holland a pension of $1,000 a year.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But, taking all these figures into consideration, the sum total does not exceed the amount this branch cost previously.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, may I say a word in connection with this matter? I am not a member of the Debates Committee, but I took some interest last session in endeavouring to arrange a readjustment of our reportorial staff, owing to the dissatisfaction which had for some time prevailed. We were fortunate enough to secure the services of Mr. Horton as Chief of the Reporting Branch. It was understood at the different conferences which we had that we should endeavour to make provision for the officers who had been for a considerable time connected with that branch. Mr. Bengough had been, as the report of the committee states, connected with the reporting of the Senate for some nine sessions. I think he had some anticipation that he would be charged with the carrying on of the work of his predecessor, Mr. Holland. However, we viewed the matter differently and appointed Mr. Horton to that important position. I have looked into the saving which the change will effect. The reporting will not cost the Senate as much as it has previously cost, and we shall have a very much more efficient reportorial staff. I cannot say anything as to the formalities of the matter, which apparently were discussed at the committee meeting this morning. The only thing I can say, on the merits of the question, is that every consideration should be given to the claims of Mr. Bengough.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. FARRELL.

PRIVATE BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill B, an Act respecting the Essex Terminal Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Taylor.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL.

FIRST, SECOND, AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 20, An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial years ending respectively the 31st March, 1917, and the 31st March, 1918.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Honourable gentlemen, I wish merely to make an observation with regard to Bills of this class. When money Bills or resolutions are introduced into the House of Commons, they must of course first have been recommended by the Crown, and that information is given to the House by the minister who introduces them; but since I have come to this House it has seemed to me that it would be an improvement in our practice to follow the practice which obtains in the Imperial Parliament, of having such Bills marked as having received the recommendation of the Crown. As it is, in the event of the representative of the Crown in this House accidentally overlooking or neglecting to state the fact, we do not know whether the recommendation of the Crown has been received or not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say to my honourable friend that it would be rather a reflection—would it not—upon the House of Commons to suggest that so important a preliminary was omitted by that House before sending a Money Bill to us? At any rate, I think we can safely take it for granted that Bills of this kind do not escape the keen scrutiny of His Majesty's opposition in the House of Commons. However, the suggestion is worthy of consideration, and I am not at all opposing it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: The practice in the past has been for the minister of the Crown in charge of a money Bill to state to the House that the approval of the Governor General has been obtained; and that practice applies to this House as well as to the House of Commons. In England, in the House of Lords, a written statement is read to the effect that the appropriations asked for have received the approval of the Crown. I do not see why we should not follow that practice here.

Certain rules having been suspended:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of the Bill. He said:

The object of this Bill is to vote supplies to the amount of $32,195,441.17, being 25 per cent of the main Estimates passed by the House of Commons during the present session for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1918. It will therefore be apparent to honourable gentlemen that the total Estimates for the year amount to $128,781,764.70. Of this amount $107,668,214.70 is chargeable to Consolidated Fund, while the balance, $21,113,550, is chargeable to Capital Account.

I may say that the total estimated expenditure for the year 1917-18, as shown in the main Estimates, amounts to $203,472,765.94. Of this amount $182,359,215.94 is chargeable to Consolidated Fund and $21,113,550 to Capital Account.

The estimated expenditure on account of Consolidated Fund, of which $74,691,001.24 is statutory, has been greatly increased in consequence of the heavy charge for interest on Public Debt and Pensions; but for other services the Estimates now presented will be found to be materially reduced from those of the previous year. The reduction will represent no less a sum than $67,542,779.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What departments do these cover principally?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot give that information to my honourable friend with any exactitude. Practically all public works have been cut off, as well as absolutely unnecessary expenditure.

Schedule B of this Bill is composed of the Supplementary Estimates for the fiscal year ending the 31st of March, 1917, amounting to $9,127,777.42. Of this amount $8,378,697.43 is chargeable to Consolidated Fund, $680,220 is chargeable to Capital, and $68,859.99 consists of unprovided items for 1915-16. Of this estimated expenditure $6,375,000 is a further amount required for the working expenses of Government railways, and $1,200,000 is a further sum required for the purchase of seed grain under Governor General's warrants.

In further answer to my honourable friend from Ottawa I may say that the Estimates for 1918 would give him the information which he seeks; but to analyse those closely would occupy too much time at present. The main reduction has been in public works.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The difficulty is that we do not know which of these Estimates have been voted by Parliament.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Parliament has voted 25 per cent of the main Estimates, entirely irrespective of the uncontrollable expenditure, payable by statute, which, as I have said, represents no less a sum than $74,691,000.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This has nothing to do with war expenditure?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. I shall be prepared to explain that later.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I suppose the motion which we have adopted, suspending the rules of the House, gives me the opportunity of making a few remarks on this money Bill. The Senate has no power to make any change in this Bill; we must accept it or reject it as a whole; but I think it my duty to call the attention of the House to a certain item which I have noticed. Last year the Senate did not choose to vote the salary of a certain officer in the Library. In the dying hours of the session I called the attention of the honourable leader of the Opposition to the matter, but nothing was done. Let me recall the facts. A few days before Parliament met last year, an Order in Council was passed appointing a man of the name of Aubry as curator of the Library. This man had passed the legal age for appointment; but he was nominated, and a recommendation was placed in my hands, which I refused to sign, because he was over age and because he was not recommended by the two Librarians. In such cases there should be a joint report of the Librarians, and upon that the Speakers of the two Houses make their recommendations. All this was done with the exception that the recommendations were missing. The Order in Council was passed a few days before the Session began, and the law provides that it must afterwards be approved by both Houses. The recommendation was brought here, and the Order in Council was laid upon the table. That Order in Council was approved of by this House, but without the recommendation of the Speaker. The Auditor General refused to pay this man because he was not recommended according to the law, and because he was beyond the age limit. He was nominated against both the letter and the spirit of the Civil Service Act. I find in the Bill before us the following item:

Library of Parliament.

To provide for the salary of Napoleon Aubry, housekeeper, from January 12, 1916, to March 31, 1917, at $900 per annum—$1,100.

Allowance to housekeeper in lieu of quarters, from January 12, 1916, to March 31, 1917, at $300 per annum—$366.67.

We will not amend that; we have no right to amend it. Far larger interests than this have imposed upon us the duty of accepting the Estimates as given; but, though I accept them, I think it my duty to protest against this way of solving a difficulty. I should have thought that, if I was in the way at that time, my removal from office, which was voluntary on my part, would have placed the Government in a position to obtain the recommendation from my successor. He might not take the same view of the law that I took. Under the circumstances I think that an effort should have been made to get the signature of the new President of this Chamber. I do not think the Senate should accept things in this way.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Does the honourable gentleman contend that the vote of the House of Commons and the vote of the Senate do not cover the illegality?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The Parliament is supreme. All we can do is to protest. The majority rules, and in this case the majority in the House of Commons, and I suppose in this House as well, will rule that this salary must be paid.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: As I understand the Civil Service Act, it contains provision for making an appointment during the time that Parliament is not in session; that is, it can be done by Order in Council. It may be that it requires the consent of the Speakers of the two Houses to make appointments to the Library, antecedent to the passing of the Order in Council; but there might be a time when there would not be two Speakers in existence and when the necessity for an appointment might arise. Therefore I should think that when an Order in Council was passed making such an appointment, and an item put in the Estimates to cover that appointment and voted by Parliament, it would be absolutely legal. I think there is no question whatever about that. There may have been an irregularity in the first instance; but I think that, after the Order in Council was laid upon the Table here and was endorsed by the House, it was too late to raise the question as to what antecedent requirements were neglected before the Order in Council was passed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think that the remarks made by my hon. friend, who has been Speaker of the House of Commons, are not in accordance with the law. The law says that during the recess an appointment may be made by Order in Council, but that Order in Council must be submitted to the House in the first days of the ensuing Session and must be approved by the House. As a matter of law, that Order in Council cannot be passed without the joint recommendation of the Speaker of the Commons and the Speaker of this House.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I understand that the Order in Council was passed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I say that the Order in Council cannot, as a matter of law, be passed without the recommendation of both Speakers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: He is right.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: And it is because the proceeding was irregular and illegal that we have to-day that item in the Estimates. I will not object to the payment; I do not care about that at all; it is a petty sum; but I want to state my position and to explain why in that instance I was backed up by the Auditor General, who refused to pay, and by the officials of the Library, who refused to accept that man. The man is, as I have told you, over age. What is the use of having a law?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I can only say that I must have misunderstood the honourable senator in his first explanation, because I understood him to say that the Order in Council was passed and was submitted to this House, and it was upon the strength of that understanding that I made the observation I did.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: As I have informed this House, the Order in Council was passed. It was submitted to this House and was approved by this House; but it lacked the signature of the Speaker of this House in both cases—when it was passed by the Council and when it was passed by this House; and it is for that reason that the Auditor General refused to pay the man. The position we are facing to-day is that, not having complied with the law, the Government has put that item of salary in the Estimates as a special vote. By doing so it is evading the law.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

QUEBEC HARBOUR BILL.

FIRST, SECOND, AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill (23), An Act to provide for further advances to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.

The Bill was read the first time.

Certain rules having been suspended:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of the Bill. He said:

This Bill proposes to advance by way of loan to the Quebec Harbour Commission $1,500,000. Under the legislation of 1913 we made provision for advances to that Commission to the extent of five and one-half millions of dollars.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That is all we have advanced so far?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is all we have advanced up to the present time. Previous to that date there had been made certain advances, which have been duly protected, not only by legislation, but also in the payment of interest and in different other obligations.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: What is the rate of interest?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: These debentures, I understand, bear interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. At the time the agreement was entered into between the Federal Government and the Quebec Harbour Commissioners it was arranged that this rate of interest should be charged. Of course, the Government cannot at the present time negotiate loans upon that basis. But, notwithstanding the extra rate of interest which we shall have to pay, we must regard it as assistance that may be legitimately given to a national undertaking. Since the reconstruction of the Harbour Commission its affairs have been conducted in a most satisfactory way. Its revenue has increased very substantially. For instance, since the year 1913, when the revenue was $126,000, it has increased to $288,000, an increase of $162,000. At the end of last year there was a substantial surplus, after paying interest and expenses of all kinds, aggregating, I believe, about $30,000. We therefore regard the loan as one that can be made with the greatest possible safety; provision will doubtless be made to meet the maturing interest as it may fall due from time to time. It is proposed that the advances provided for in the Bill shall be distributed over about two years. I think provision has already been made for the expenditure of about one-half the amount, or at any rate it is anticipated that within two years it will be absorbed in the carrying on to completion of the undertaking as at present designed.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is this amount for the extension of works or the completion of works?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The completion, as designed between the Harbour Commission and the Government.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I understand that the Commission have paid the interest?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, there has been no trouble whatever with that.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL—$500,000,000.

FIRST, SECOND, AND THIRD READINGS.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 24, An Act for granting to His Majesty aid for Military and Naval Defence.

The Bill was read the first time.

Certain rules having been suspended:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Before the Bill is read a second time I want to call the attention of my hon. friend, the late Speaker of the House of Commons, to a rule of this House, which he did not quote a while ago, but of which I am sure he knows. It is this:

The Senate will not proceed upon a Bill appropriating public money, that shall not, within the knowledge of the Senate, have been recommended by the King's representative.

I suppose we all have this knowledge now and can proceed?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I was only endeavouring to inform the House that this recommendation had been made.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: That is the way I took it.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I spoke from a knowledge of what has frequently occurred in the Commons. Owing to the evidence not being available at the proper time, a Bill has sometimes been passed through several stages without it and afterwards the omission has had to be supplied.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, hon. gentlemen, I have great pleasure in informing the Senate, with respect to this Bill, and also the previous money Bills with which we have dealt, that they have been recommended by the King's representative. May I now be permitted to say that this Bill proposes voting so large an amount as scarcely to admit of anything being said about it. If it were for a smaller amount we should most exhaustively discuss it.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Then, I suppose, you would say it was such a little one?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say that the anticipated expenditure for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1918, will amount to $433,274,000. The details of that may be set out in this way: for Militia and Defence there will be required $196,171,000; for the Ministry of Overseas Military Forces, $219,000,000; for Naval Service, $17,500,000; for the Department of the Interior, $75,000; for Railways and Canals, $300,000; for Finance, $60,000; for Public Works, $133,000; for Labour, $15,000; and for Agriculture, $20,000; making in all $433,274,000. As hon. gentlemen can very well appreciate, the ascending ratio in which war expenditure increases is something that almost transcends human imagination.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Goes up like an aeroplane.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It may be interesting to hon. gentlemen to know that in 1914-15 our war expenditure amounted to $60,750,476; in 1915-16 it amounted to $166,197,755; in the present fiscal year, up to January 20, 1917, we expended $216,901,822.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: This $500,000,000 makes it nearly a billion, does it not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It may. It is estimated that our net national debt at the present time is, in round figures, $750,000,000. One cannot say what it will be by the time this expenditure is made. My honourable friend the leader of the Opposition asked me yesterday if I would inform the House as to the financial relations between the Government of Canada and the Imperial Government with reference to the amounts which we have advanced from time to time in assisting the Imperial Government in the payment for munitions which have been made in Canada or in the United States. The state of that account is as follows. Up to the present time we have made advances to the Imperial Munitions Board to the extent of $116,000,000, and we have agreed to advance them a further sum of $34,000,000, making a total of $150,000,000 that the Government of Canada has advanced to the Imperial Government for the purpose of buying munitions and supplies in Canada. On the other hand, we owe the Imperial Government about $97,000,000; so there is at present a balance due us by the Imperial Government of about $18,000,000. Honourable gentlemen are probably aware of the fact that our war account in England is at present being carried by the Imperial Government; that is to say, they make payment to the Canadian forces and we in turn liquidate those payments periodically. But the account with the Imperial Munitions Board, as I have mentioned, shows a balance in our favour at the present time of about $18,000,000.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That has nothing to do with the credit supplied by the banks? That is a separate matter altogether?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That, I understand, is entirely separate from this. I understand that the chartered banks of Canada have made advances approximating about $100,000,000 to the Imperial Government. It is scarcely necessary to point out that our ability to have successfully carried out these financial transactions is a great tribute to the resourcefulness of the Canadian people. There was a time when we considered it absolutely necessary to negotiate even the smallest public loan in Great Britain. After the declaration of war we found the money market of England closed to our requirements; we then had occasion to resort to other channels for the purpose of negotiating our loans. It seemed to us at that time absolutely necessary to go to a foreign country; hence we floated our first loan in the United States. Then we awakened to our national ability and resourcefulness, and suddenly discovered that we could float our loans more advantageously within our own boundaries; and this we have been successful in doing. We have not only succeeded in raising the money from our own people, but we have been of substantial assistance to the Imperial Government in facilitating its meeting of its obligations on this side of the Atlantic.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I do not desire to criticise the actions of the Finance Minister in connection with the matter just discussed by the leader of the Government, but I am one of those who have dreaded very seriously the beginning of the flotation of our own loans in Canada. Even with our present plethora of money, looking to the future, I have thought that it was an undesirable practice. However, I do not wish to criticise, because I think the Finance Minister has done admirably during this period; but it would be an unhappy condition of affairs if Canadians should come to think that the present condition could continue, because a period is coming when we certainly shall not be able to float our own loans in Canada.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: In my opinion the Finance Minister has acted admirably and with very good judgment, and I think the results will be good. This is because of the method he has adopted, of selling our bonds at home and putting their denominations low enough to enable the common people of the country who desire to make investments to do so safely. He has provided that they may buy the securities of their own country and receive a higher rate of interest than the banks and other financial institutions will pay. Many years ago I spoke of this question in the House of Commons—not merely once, but on different occasions—and I heard the same arguments advanced that the honourable senator who has just taken his seat has advanced to-day: that it was a mistake to raise money at home, but rather that we should borrow abroad and spend at home, and that we were not enriching the country when we borrowed from our own people. I disagree with that conclusion. I think the best principle is to give the money earners at home an opportunity to invest their money at a reasonable rate of interest, and I do not know where they can get as good security. If the rate of interest is fixed as it has been in this case, I do not think it will do the country any harm. I hope we shall continue to make these loans at home, thus giving the people an opportunity to make such investments, and enabling them to get some reasonable return of interest, which heretofore they have not been able to get from the Post Office savings banks, the Government savings banks, the chartered banks, or the loaning corporations of the country.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: There is no one in Canada who has a greater respect and admiration for the Finance Minister than I have, but he will be the last person to subscribe to the statements of the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: We have heard from the honourable the leader of the Government as to the enormous amount of money that we are being called upon to provide at the present time. We all realize the enormous responsibility resting upon the Government in dealing with these matters; but, as one honourable gentleman has said, the figure in this case is so enormous that we can hardly realize what it means to pass a vote of this kind.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House in discussing this question, but I would have liked to have had some particulars about the new appointment of a minister in England to handle the affairs of Canada there. According to the statement of the Government, he is probably dealing with the greater part of the enormous sum that we are asked to vote to-day. I presume that in connection with his work he has a very large organization, and of course very heavy responsibilities rest upon his shoulders. So far as I know, no real explanation of this matter has been given to the country. I think it would be of great interest to the country to have such an explanation. It is a new departure for us to be carrying on business in this way, and I imagine that it entails new methods of doing business.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under the War Measures Act it was considered to be in the interest of Canada and in the interest of Imperial defence that we should exercise the powers which were vested in us by that Act, and practically duplicate in England the machinery that we have on this side of the Atlantic. It is not difficult for honourable gentlemen to appreciate the fact that, in dealing with the several hundred thousand men who have been sent from Canada to Great Britain to take their part in the defence of the Empire, in France, or in whatever part of Europe they may be, the financial and departmental administration of that business could not be successfully carried on in Canada. Consequently it was desirable to establish administrative machinery in Great Britain, so that we could be in touch with the various questions arising from day to day, just as though we were administering similar business on this side of the Atlantic. I do not think that one need appeal to the imagination or the reason of any person in order that he may appreciate the good judgment shown in pursuing this course. Of course, in a time of war like the present, machinery, so to speak, develops itself from conditions which arise from day to day; and those conditions have so developed as not only to warrant but to demand that the Government of Canada should consult an overseas Minister of Militia who would administer the affairs of Canada in England in relation to our participation in the defence of the Empire in the same way as if he were in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I should like in a very few words to express my cordial support of this measure.

Five hundred millions of dollars is indeed a very large sum of money, probably more than we can mentally visualize, though we are getting our minds daily accustomed to think in huge figures. For my part I am quite prepared, as I have said on many other occasions here and elsewhere, to have Canada contribute to the war as much as she possibly can, consistently with the interests and requirements of the case. I have put no limit whatever upon the contributions of Canada in this war except that which would be prohibed by Canada's own interest and capacity. It must be a matter of pride to all Canadians that Canada is able to raise $500,000,000, besides the large expenditure which she has already provided for; it must be a matter of additional pride that she can raise these moneys among her own people. Nothing could show more clearly the increasing importance and financial strength of Canada than what has been done by her since the war began. These are tremendous sums, but the issues involved in this great struggle far transcend money considerations; indeed, the issues transcend Canada, transcend Great Britain, transcend the British Empire; they interest the whole world, they involve the fate of world democracy. They are the interests upon which civilized humanity absolutely depends for the future, unless the clock is to be put back for centuries and the world shall content itself with the ethics and customs of savagery. If we had to contribute twice or three times the amount of this loan in order to accomplish the victory which democracy and civilization are bound to achieve in this war, we should not hesitate to do so.

I desire to call the attention of my honourable friend to one section of the Bill which I do not understand, and which, it seems to me, will require some change. I refer to section 5:

> When securities issued under this Act have been pledged as security for a loan, and the loan has been paid off and the pledge redeemed, the securities shall not be deemed to have been extinguished, but shall be deemed to be still alive, and may be re-issued and sold or pledged as if the former pledging had not taken place.

If that were carried to its logical conclusion, pledges might be issued for the whole amount of the loan, and then be re-issued for another $500,000,000. This contemplates the buying in of some securities, forming part of the $500,000,000; but, if you have redeemed $490,000,000 of these securities, can you go on and re-issue the whole of them again?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Certainly. We have inserted the same clause in many private Bills.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That does not make it any clearer to me. I hope my honourable friend understands my meaning.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I see my honourable friend's point; but it may be necessary to exercise power of that kind; that is to say, where the securities may be temporarily pledged.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not dispute that, but it should be provided that that shall not be done beyond the amount of $500,000,000.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We cannot go beyond that amount, because the securities cannot exceed the amount of the borrowing power of the Bill. We might exercise the borrowing power to the limit temporarily; we might have an opportunity of securing a temporary loan for that amount. If we retired that loan—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The difficulty is not that you would exceed your powers of borrowing, but that you would have issued certain securities in exercising that power which you could still re-issue.

Hon. WILLIAM B. ROSS: If you made a loan of $100,000,000 at 70 cents on the dollar, and then you took up that temporary loan, as the law stands those securities would be dead; but this Act provides that you could re-issue them. You have $500,000,000 of securities, and you can call them in or put them out, but you do not make the amount any more.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is not the difficulty. If you issue the whole $500,000,000, and then redeem them, you can go on and pledge them over again and borrow another $500,000,000; but if you issue only $490,000,000, and pledge them, you can go on and re-issue them.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not if you have issued them.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not purpose entering into the general question of this Bill, because I agree substantially with the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt). As he put it, I do not feel that this is a war between England and Germany, or between the Entente Allies and the Central Powers; but I do feel that it is a war between freedom and civilization on one side and tyranny and barbarism on the other. In a case of that kind, one cannot halt between two opinions: he must cordially support the right side.

I just wish to call attention to the advice which the Minister of Finance, a very capable and admirable officer, has been giving to the people of this country for some considerable time. The advice is that the people of this country should be very economical and should scrutinize every dollar before undertaking to invest it and should be satisfied that the investment of that dollar, in no matter what, is necessary. It seems to me that in this particular respect the Minister of Finance is somewhat like the person of whom Shakespeare speaks in Hamlet: he treads "the primrose path" of extravagance and "recks not his own rede." I just wish to call attention to one point which has been discussed in another place, but which it will do no harm to say a few words about here, to show that the Minister does not reck his own rede. I propose to say a few words in order to illustrate my meaning by referring to the Government's dealings with the question of the rifle with which the Canadian troops are armed.

I do not propose to take any part in the controversy as to the relative merits of the Lee-Enfield and Ross rifles. I know that there are very marked differences of opinion, both among the men who have used the two weapons in the field and among the higher authorities who may be supposed to know something about them. I am not qualified to judge, and I do not propose to say anything about that question; it is not essential to the point I wish to make. Neither do I propose to deal with the correspondence and discussions which took place before the Canadian Government abandoned the Ross rifle as a weapon for use in active service. I simply wish to call attention briefly to certain things that have happened in the later stages of this controversy. On June 5, 1916, Sir George Perley—I am not quite sure whether he was Sir George then or not—cabled to the First Minister to the effect that the Army Council in England had decided that no more Ross rifles were to be sent to England; and about that same time on June 11, I think, within a few days after this cable, the British military authorities decided that they would be prepared to supply all the Canadian troops who went overseas with the Lee-Enfield rifle; and it was stated on June 8 by the English authorities that the Lee-Enfield as manufactured in the United States would be a satisfactory weapon. The military authorities in England then decided that they did not wish any more Ross rifles sent to England, and they did not wish any more Canadian troops to come over armed with that rifle. That being the case, what would the average man do? Here we have a contract with the Ross Rifle Company providing for the furnishing of about 100,000 rifles at a price of $25 each, that is, $2,500,000, and we have the British military authorities declaring that these rifles shall not be used. They do not wish the Canadian troops to use them; and we have the Canadian Government concurring in that view and deciding that they will not arm any more of their men with the Ross rifle, and will not ship any more to the other side. As I say, what would any ordinary business man do in these conditions? The natural thing, I should say, would be for the Government to go to the company with whom they had the contract for the manufacture of the 100,000 rifles, explain the position to the company, and intimate to the company that the Government under the circumstances would not be prepared to incur any further expenditure in connection with that contract. What is the use? What are we to get for the $2,500,000? A rifle which we cannot use and which the British military authorities will not use? Practically that $2,500,000 is thrown away. That is where I find that the professions and advice of the Minister of Finance do not harmonize with the actions of his colleagues which he stands by and apparently approves of.

Then, there was another thing. When matters had got to this point, it seems to me that, in addition to causing a stoppage of the manufacture of Ross rifles, it was the duty of the Canadian Government to make provision for the manufacture of the rifle which the British Government approved of. This correspondence, which took place in the beginning of June of last year, has had practically no sequel, as far as one can make out; nothing has ever been done by the Government to secure the early manufacture of the Lee-Enfield, and the manufacture of the unnecessary Ross rifle is going on continuously.

It may be said—and I know the ground is taken in another place by the First Minister—that the Government were bound by the contract. In ordinary times the Government might have felt bound by the contract, but I think that under the War Measures Act they would not be bound. I see further that the head of the Ross Company has stated in the public press that he would not insist on holding the Government to their bargain with respect to the Ross rifle. So it seems to me that anything more unbusinesslike and, to my humble mind, more stupid than the conduct of the Government in connection with the manufacture of these Ross rifles can hardly be imagined.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT COMMISSIONS, 1896-1911.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SMITH moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a statement showing the date, the object and the personnel of all commissions instituted by the late Government from its accession to power in 1896 up to the accession to power of the present Government in 1911, the number of days during which each of these commissions sat, and what was the cost of each to the country.

The motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENTS TO THE SENATE.

A notice of motion of the Hon. Mr. Cloran having been called:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yesterday at the sitting of the House the honourable member from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) dealt with the subject-matter of this motion as it stands in my name. He went into the matter fully and I think forcibly and with a spirit of fairness. I had not anticipated that he would make a speech on this matter. It has practically taken the wind out of my sails. What I had to say he has said, so I do not see that there is any necessity of pressing the matter and I will let it drop.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Hoping that the Government will take note.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will not overlook that.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That the following members of the Senate be appointed a committee to consider and report upon the arrangements which should be made for the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of this Dominion, namely, His Honour the Speaker, and Hon. Messieurs Bowell (Sir Mackenzie, K.C.M.G.), Dandurand, Edwards, Sharpe, McLennan, and Watson.

He said: I may say I have discussed this matter with my honourable friend opposite.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not rise to offer any objection to the personnel of the committee proposed by the hon. leader of the House, but I wish to repeat what I ventured to say in the debate on the Address in reply to His Excellency's Speech. I think that the present time is singularly inappropriate for what must be regarded as a sort of festive undertaking. If this celebration is to be imposing and effective it must be concurred in cordially by all the people. Do hon. gentlemen suppose that the parents whose sons are at the front, some fighting, others wounded, or the parents of those who have died, are in a mood to rejoice over the fact that fifty years ago this union was consummated? It does seem to me like blending a wedding with a funeral. I think that decidedly the better plan would be to wait until the war is over, and then we can have a great big celebration in which the whole country can join.

Hon. Mr. POPE: The committee is created for a purpose, and it will be for the committee, I presume, to decide upon the time and the manner of celebration.

Hon. Mr. POWER: No; because when you appoint a committee to do a thing they have no choice as to whether it shall be done or not.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Will they not have an opportunity of considering and reporting? The only thing that I rise to say is this: if we are going to have this celebration there is only one place to hold it in—the province of Quebec, even if you only go to Hull. There is no place where you can have a celebration of the fiftieth anniversary that will be worthy of the fathers of Confederation except the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I did not gather from the remarks of my hon. friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) whether or not it is the intention that this committee shall sit during the parliamentary recess.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I really cannot say to my hon. friend whether the Government is absolutely committed to having a celebration or not. It was intimated in His Excellency's Speech, and it is a matter, it seems to me, for the consideration not only of the Government but also of the committees of both Houses which have been or will be selected for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I think the suggestion made by the hon. Senator from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) is one that ought to receive consideration at the hands of the committee. Celebrations of great national events have been postponed on many occasions. The Chicago exposition was postponed for one or two years. This war cannot last for ever; it must come to an end this year or next year. When the war is over and peace is proclaimed to the world, the celebration of the birth of Canada fifty years ago and the celebration of peace and victory can be combined. Of course, I am in favour of celebrating the anniversary, but it is a question of the proper time. Why not postpone the celebration until peace is obtained and victory assured? I quite agree with my hon. friend from Compton (Hon. Mr. Pope) that the province of Quebec is the proper place in which to have the celebration of this anniversary. It is practically the centre of this Confederation.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: It seems to me that if we have a celebration at all it ought to be at the capital of the country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I think that is the only appropriate place where it could be held. The honourable senator who has just taken his seat has suggested that we postpone it till some time in the future, when some anticipated event may have been realized, and when we could combine the two celebrations. That savours a good deal of the suggestion made to the boy to postpone the celebration of his birthday until next year. The anniversary comes at a given time, and if the celebration is postponed it is not the celebration of the fiftieth year after Confederation was consummated. With reference to the opinion that we should have no celebration at all, it does not seem to me that there is anything inappropriate in having a reasonable celebration. It can without any doubt be of such a nature that it is not bubbling over with exuberance, or anything unseemly, or anything unkind towards other countries. It can be kept in consonance with the conditions of our country and the conditions of the world; it need do no injustice to any; and yet it can be made a fair representation of our feeling for a great event in our own country's history. It does not seem to me at all inappropriate that we should have such a celebration at the present time.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I have no objection to acting on the committee, but I must say that I am entirely in sympathy with the views expressed by the honourable member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power). I think our business at the present time is to prosecute this war, and I do not think that we can very well have a celebration such as we should have in commemoration of the birth of Canada in the present state of feeling in this country.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It would cost too much money.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: It is not the money part of it I am considering. We can raise the money; but I think that a celebration of this kind should be held when the people are in good spirits. So far as I am personally concerned, I will, as a member of that committee, advise against the holding of any celebration at the present time. I notice that it was suggested in the Speech from the Throne that there should be a celebration this year. Evidently the Government came to that conclusion; but I suppose that when a committee is appointed it is to have a free hand in determining whether it should recommend a celebration or not. As I say, I feel personally that we should have no celebration at the present time, but that it should be deferred until the war is ended and victory is proclaimed. We may be able to have a celebration of the opening of our new Parliament Buildings at the same time. Regarding the question whether the celebration should be held in Ottawa or in Hull, I do not know whether my honourable friend would prefer to go to Hull or to stay in Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is the reason I did not want Ottawa selected: it is too near to Hull.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: The difficulty could be overcome if we look on the event as a commemoration rather than a celebration—if the fifty years of Confederation could be marked soberly and quietly at the time they are fulfilled—the 1st of July, I think, is the official date—without any of the merry-making and extravagant money-spending phases which all of us are inclined to associate with celebrations.

The motion was agreed to.

CARE OF RETURNED SOLDIERS.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That the following members of the Senate, namely, the Honourable Messieurs Beaubien, Belcourt, Daniel, Mason, Ross (Moosejaw), Thompson, and the mover, be appointed a committee for the purpose of considering, inquiring into, and reporting upon

(a) The reception, treatment, care, training, and re-education of the wounded, disabled, and convalescent who have served in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces.

(b) The provision of employment for those who have been honourably discharged from the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, and the training and re-education of those so discharged who are unable to engage in their former occupations.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

EXHIBIT OF WAR RELICS.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Before the Orders of the Day are called, may I be allowed to ask my colleagues of the Senate to go to the Archives building and view the magnificent collection of war relics made during last summer by the curator, Dr. Doughty. I spent an hour there this morning, and found it most instructive and exceedingly interesting, and I am sure that every member of the House will be fully repaid for his trouble in going to see the wonderful things brought back from the field of battle.

PUBLIC LOAN BILL.—$100,000,000.

THIRD READING.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, Bill 19, An Act to authorize the raising by way of loan of certain sums of money for the Public Service, was read the third time and passed.

THE PARLIAMENTARY ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That when the House adjourns to-day it shall stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 24th day of April next, at the hour of eight o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

THE ROYAL ASSENT.

The Right Honourable Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, G.C.M.G., Chief Justice of Canada, Deputy Governor General, having come, and being seated on the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal assent to the following Bills:

An Act to authorize the raising by way of loan of certain sums of money for the Public Service.

An Act to provide for further advances to the Quebec Harbour Commissioners.

An Act for granting to His Majesty Aid for Mi itary and Naval Defence.

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service for the financial years ending respectively the 31st March, 1917, and the 31st March, 1918.

The sitting having been resumed:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the adjournment of the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Before this motion is carried I should like to know if His Honour the Deputy Governor came here in virtue of a commission or in virtue of the law.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say to my hon. friend that a commission has been specially issued within the last few days.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: When did we have the commission?

Some hon. SENATORS: Take it for granted.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: We will take the word of the leader of the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think that commission should be laid on the Table and it should be inserted in our minutes.

The commission was then read by the Clerk.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I suppose this is the vindication of the point I raised the other day. I am going now to raise another one. The commission reads: "Given under my hand and seal at Ottawa this eleventh day of November, nineteen hundred and sixteen." The honourable leader of the House stated a few moments ago that that commission was made only within the last few days. There is something wrong.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is nothing wrong about that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: On the contrary. Words are put in the mouth of His Excellency which are untrue. On the 11th November last His Excellency the Governor General never signed the document given to us to-day, for the simple reason that His Grace the Duke of Devonshire had not then arrived at Ottawa. Moreover, we have just been told by the leader of this House that this Commission has been specially issued within the last few days. Evidently there is something wrong.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It is a good thing to have that Commission on record in our minutes.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 24, at eight o'clock p.m.

THE SENATE.

Tuesday, April 24, 1917.

The Senate met at eight o'clock p. m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

APPOINTMENT OF CLERK OF THE SENATE.

The Hon. the SPEAKER informed the Senate that a Commission under the Great Seal had been granted to Austin Ernest Blount, appointing him the Clerk of the Senate.

The Commission was read, and His Honour the Speaker administered the Oath of Office to the Clerk.

The Hon. the SPEAKER informed the Senate that a Commission under the Great Seal had been issued, appointing Austin Ernest Blount Master in Chancery.

The said Commission was read.

The Hon. the SPEAKER informed the Senate that Austin Ernest Blount had been appointed Commissioner under the Great Seal, to administer Oaths to Members of the Senate of Canada.

The Commission making this appointment was read.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: It is ordered that these Commissions be placed on the Journals of the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Ordered by whom, Mr. Speaker?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I gave the order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I did not know if I heard correctly. In my time if I had given an order of that kind I would have been called to account immediately. What authority have you, Mr. Speaker, to govern this House? I think the Senate should order these things, through the channel of the Speaker. I did not know that the Speaker had any authority to say, "I order that to be put on the Journals."

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I thought that myself.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: As it was a formal matter, I thought it was not necessary to ask the permission of the House. To please my honourable friend I ask the permission of the House, and if the House is against that—

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: It is just for that reason that I raised the point of order. I want to say a few words on this matter, but there is nothing before the Chair. If a motion were made we would have a chance to say a word.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think these proeedings go on the Journals of the House as a matter of course, and a motion to that effect is not necessary.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Any proceeding of this House should be entered in the Journals. There are certain entries made upon a motion, and certain proceedings of a formal character such as commissions issued by the Crown, are entered as a matter of course without a motion. For example, when a senator is called to the Senate and sworn in at the Table, and his commission is duly read, it appears in the Journals. No one thinks of moving a motion. I think the Speaker is perfectly right in regarding this as a pro forma proceeding which would be recorded without any motion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I quite agree that it should go in the Journals, but I object to the order. If we may distinguish between two motions, we might distinguish between two procedures. As a matter of fact, what takes place in this House goes in the Journals, but who gives the order? Is there an order to be given? If it goes by custom, it goes by custom; if it is by order, who gives the order? I never had such authority when I was Speaker of this House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You were not persona grata.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I suppose I may be allowed to say a few words on this question with the permission of the House. What I say is in no way personal to the new Clerk of the House. He is a gentleman, I know him by reputation, and I have not a word to say against him; but if I had been Speaker and if the Government had said to me, "We are going to impose on you a new deputy minister"—because the Clerk of the House is the Deputy Minister of the Speaker, who is a minister, as the law says—I would have said, "Well, perhaps I may object or perhaps I will not object," but I would have felt it very annoying if I had not been consulted on the subject. The House through its Speaker may be ignored altogether.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Has been.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: It is a nomination of the Crown, and yet I would have felt hurt if the Government had not consulted me on the subject. I might have had a candidate of my own, and I would have had to pass him by. They might have said, "That is not your business; we propose this man and you must take him." That is what has been done in the present instance, I think. I am speaking in vindication of the right of each individual here—not the right of nomination, but the right to be properly treated. I should like the Speaker to be treated as I would like to be treated myself if I were in his place. That is the golden rule, and I would like to see it applied to every one. We have a tradition in this House that has been disregarded. Not as a right, but as an act of courtesy, we have always had a French-speaking Clerk in this House. This tradition is not being observed. I repeat that I have nothing to say against the gentleman himself; I am very glad of his appointment and congratulate him upon it, and I think we shall have a very splendid officer in him. The tradition has been to have an English Clerk in the House of Commons, while since Confederation we have had a French Clerk in this House.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: How about Bourinot, who was Clerk of the House of Commons? I understood my hon. friend to say that the House of Commons always had an English-speaking Clerk, but I was under the impression that Mr. Bourinot was French.

An hon. SENATOR: He was from Cape Breton.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Bourinot was not a Frenchman. As I was saying, this tradition is no more. We are living in very difficult times for our language. I shall not make any allusion to what goes on in other legislatures. In Ottawa we cannot sing our national hymn these days because the music of it is French. I am very sorry that some belonging to the Irish nationality have voted against it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Who are they?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Why name people?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Because there are none to name.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think Fitzpatrick is an Irish name.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, that is a go-between.

Some hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I do not wish to go further, but I think it is my duty to protest against the way in which the Clerk of this House has been nominated, and against the fact that the traditions of the past are being thrust aside altogether.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I rise on behalf of the late Clerk, who has departed not from life but from the Senate. The day after the newspapers announced his dismissal I happened to meet him on Sparks Street, near the post office. I had learned of his dismissal, or rather his replacement, and I said to him, "My dear Chapleau, I thought I was coming up to your funeral, and here you are still alive. I saw yesterday in the Montreal papers that you had been replaced." He said, "I saw that myself, and it is the first intimation I have had of my being kicked out"—I will use his own words —"of being kicked out of my office like a dirty dog. After spending 46 years of my life in the service of Canada I am put out of my office without even being consulted or notified, or asked if I wanted to go. If they had asked me, after 46 years of service, if I would retire, I would have said, 'Certainly.' But to find in the newspaper press that I have been dismissed without notice, without consultation, without my consent, I consider that a disgrace and an insult to my name and the name of my family; and my family has served the State from the Prime Minister down to the Government, or from the Government to the Prime Minister." These were the sentiments expressed by Mr. Chapleau, the late Clerk of the Senate, the day after it was announced in the press that he was no longer Clerk of the Senate. Now, honourable gentlemen, this honourable House owes something to the reputation of the Clerk, and should not let him disappear from public and official life under a cloud. It is a wonder that the Government of the day, or the minister who is responsible for this action, did not have common sense enough to realize these things —to respect the reputation of that man, as the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) has just said, to respect our rights and our powers as represented by the Speaker. I do not blame the whole Government; probably only one out of the whole Cabinet knew anything about it; but the minister who is responsible ought to be called to time.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I rise to a point of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There is no point of order until I am through.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Nothing but disorder. I want to know what we are discussing. Surely the honourable gentleman is not the Speaker and the whole House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have the floor, and I do not want to be interrupted.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I want to know what we are discussing and whether these gentlemen are in order.

The Honourable the SPEAKER: There is nothing before the Senate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yes, there is; Senator Landry's remarks are before the House.

The Honourable the SPEAKER: The whole discussion has been out of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Why did you not rule it out of order? I am going to appeal to this House against your decision.

Some Hon. SENATORS. Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is not a fair way of conducting a discussion. Anyhow, I say the Senate owes it to Mr. Chapleau to protect his reputation in regard to his dismissal.

THE GAULT DIVORCE PETITIONS.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I have been requested by the Hon. Mr. Edwards, who is unavoidably absent, to move the following motion, with the leave of the Senate:

That the record of the proceedings before the Committee on Divorce on the petition of Andrew Hamilton Gault, of Montreal, Quebec, for a Bill of Divorce from Marguerite Claire Gault, presented to the Senate during the last session of Parliament, be referred to the Committee on Divorce for its consideration on the hearing of the petition of Marguerite Claire Gault for a Bill of Divorce presented to the Senate during the present session.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: May I ask if it is the petitioner or Mr. Gault who is asking for this through Mr. Edwards?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I understand that it was for Mrs. Gault that this request was put forward. As the Committee is to meet to-morrow morning, they were anxious to have the matter arranged so that they could go on with the case.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. RATZ moved, with the leave of the Senate:

That the record of the proceedings before the Committee on Divorce on the petition of Andrew Hamilton Gault, of Montreal, Quebec, for a Bill of Divorce from Marguerite Claire Gault presented to the Senate during the last session of Parliament, be referred to the Committee on Divorce for its consideration on the hearing of the petition of Andrew Hamilton Gault for a Bill of Divorce presented to the Senate during the present session.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is the same motion as the one just passed, and I submit you cannot have the same motion twice.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may explain to my honourable friend that there are two cases. One motion applies to one case and the other motion to the other case. The two cases are being prepared separately, and these motions are for the purpose of allowing this evidence to be used in each case.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: That union of both parties is against the spirit of divorce. I think the objection of my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) is quite well taken. I do not see why we should act twice in the same matter. In addition, I would suggest that motions of this kind should come from the Chairman of the Committee.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The second motion is absolutely useless, because if a divorce is granted in the one case, the same parties being concerned, it cannot be granted the second time. There cannot be two cases for one divorce.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: It seems to me this matter is one very easy to understand. There is the evidence and two cases; and in each case it is desired that the evidence be made a fact of the record.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The motions are for the purpose of giving the committee permission to consider in both cases the evidence given last session, and are therefore quite in order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Honourable gentlemen forget the facts in regard to this celebrated case. We are asked now to send back the evidence. Honourable gentlemen will remember that when that case was submitted by the Divorce Committee last session, I asked that the evidence be laid before the House, and the House was informed that there was no evidence to produce. If there was then no evidence to produce and lay before the House, how can the House take action with regard to a thing which does not exist? Is the House aware of these facts? Now the House is asked to deal with this evidence. What evidence? When the committee reported last session that there was no evidence to produce, the matter went by the board.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The honourable gentleman is in error. The committee last year reported to this House all the proceedings, including the evidence. The honourable gentleman asked that this evidence should be printed. This House refused to print it, but you will find in the records of the House the statement that the evidence came before the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Exactly.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Then, why state that the House was informed there was no evidence, when the evidence was placed on the Table of the House and is referred to in the Minutes? What this House did was to refuse to publish the evidence—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Exactly.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: —to let it out. I do not think any one outside of this House has ever seen it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I withdraw the objection I made, because I find the two motions are different. One is "for its consideration on the hearing of the petition of Andrew Hamilton Gault," and the other is "on the hearing of the petition of Marguerite Claire Gault"—two different parties.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: The worst feature I see in the case is that both parties are asking for a divorce. I am afraid there is collusion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You would not think so if you were attending the hearings.

The motion was agreed to.

THE ADDRESS TO THE GOVERNOR GENERAL.

HIS EXCELLENCY'S REPLY.

The Hon. the Speaker presented a message from His Excellency the Governor General thanking the Senate for the Address which it had voted to His Excellency in reply to His Excellency's Speech at the opening of Parliament.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION.

The Hon. the SPEAKER presented a message from the House of Commons, which was read as follows:

That a message be sent to inform Their Honours that this House has amended its resolution of Wednesday, the 7th day of February last, appointing the committee to consider and report on the matter of celebrating the Fiftieth Anniversary of Confederation, by adding thereto the following words:

"And that the committee is hereby empowered to meet in joint sittings with the like committee of the Senate"; and request Their Honours to similarly amend their resolution, passed the same day, in connection with the same subject.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As honourable gentlemen will observe, the Commons have amended their motion so as to permit of joint sittings of the two committees. It is obvious that as between the two Houses this is the only way to determine on the character of the proposed celebration. Assuming that honourable gentlemen are in accord with this move:

That a message be sent to the House of Commons informing that body that to the resolution adopted by the Senate on Wednesday, the seventh day of February, appointing a committee to consider and report upon the Fiftieth Anniversary of Confederation, the following words be added:

"And that the committee is hereby empowered to meet in joint sittings with the like committee of the House of Commons."

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I have not the slightest objection to this motion, but recently I had occasion to form a decided opinion against joint committees of the two Houses.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Though they sit at the same time, they are not a joint committee.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is a joint committee in that sense, just as was the committee to which I am going to refer. During our last sitting my honourable friend moved to have a committee appointed to deal with the question of returned soldiers. I was a member of that committee. I was advised by one of the clerks of the House of Commons, and I imagine that other members of the committee received a similar notice, that the committee of the House of Commons would sit on a certain day, and that if the members of this House were so disposed they might come and sit there also. I think that was about the meaning of it. I have not got the notice with me. I am not quite sure whether any other member of this House attended on that day; I think I was alone. Possibly my honourable friend from Moosejaw (Hon. J. H. Ross) was present.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The honourable senator from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) was there.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think I was the only member of the committee present when the meeting began. When I got there I found that the committee of the House of Commons had already met, chosen its chairman and appointed its clerk; these gentlemen took possession of the chairs, and told us that we might sit anywhere we chose and could listen, and perhaps put a few questions. I did not like the proceedings very much, but as I was there I thought I should sit it out. We were simply considered at the utmost as an adjunct to that committee.

An hon. SENATOR: On sufferance.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: On sufferance. The next day the chairman called me to order because I was asking questions that he thought I should not ask, and I was asked in more or less polite language to desist. We were told, "If you fellows only shut up we will do some business." that was the effect of it. I made up my mind that I would not sit any longer on a committee of that kind. The committee afterwards sat in Montreal two days and in Toronto one day, and I have just received notice that it is going to sit to-morrow at half past two.

I have not formed a very favourable opinion of joint committees of the two Houses, and take this opportunity of drawing attention to the manner in which these joint committees work. I have no confidence in committees of that sort bringing forth anything very useful and think I owe it to the Senate to call its attention to the way members of this House have been treated. I do not know how my honourable friend from Moosejaw feels about it, but I think if he or any other member of the House had been present, they would share my views.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think there is a misapprehension in regard to the matter to which my honourable friend quite properly directs the attention of the House, although in one way my honourable friend is quite right. The Senate committee was never organized; the Commons committee was organized and sat simply as a Commons committee, appointed its chairman and secretaries and whatever officers are necessary to perform the duties of the committee. Possibly to some extent the fault is my own; but the explanation is that on the last day of the session, ten minutes before we adjourned for the members to go to their homes, I was notified on behalf of the Commons that a motion had been moved in the Commons appointing such a committee, and it was suggested that we should appoint a similar committee—not that it should be a joint committee. It was a matter for our own discretion to appoint that committee, and we should have organized; but it was too late to do so, as the Senate adjourned within ten minutes after I received the notice. The consequence is that the Senate committee has not yet been organized. I took the opportunity of communicating with various members of the committee, suggesting that they might do one of two things: either organize and sit separately, and travel over the same ground practically as the Commons had done or take up a new field of inquiry; or that they might attend the Commons committee meetings. I felt sure that the committee would extend the courtesy to members of this House of allowing them to examine witnesses and take the same part that members of their committee did. Immediately upon our meeting to-day I took steps to have a notice sent to the members of the committee notifying them that we would meet for the purpose of organization to-morrow.

In this case the situation is somewhat different. My honourable friend will realize that it would be folly for two committees of Parliament to sit and discuss separately the character of the celebration that will take place. There can be only one celebration, and it must be the outcome of agreement between the two Chambers; hence the necessity of the committees sitting together.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I quite agree with my hon. friend that it is not practical to have two committees to sit on this subject. I wished to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the two committees were appointed on the same day, and that the House of Commons committee, knowing that a committee of this House had been appointed, chose to meet and elect its president and officers without considering in any way the honourable gentlemen of this House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: You should have organized separately.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Not at all. We were called there to meet, and I think the courteous thing would have been for that committee to have waited until we were there. I quite agree that it is absurd to traverse the whole of the evidence; I think the committee has heard twenty-five or thirty witnesses, and the evidence consists of seven or eight hundred pages. I do not blame my honourable friend for suggesting that the committee should meet together; it would save time and expense; but what I object to is the discourtesy with which this House was treated, and for that reason I think we ought to take precautions in order that members of this House who are on committees shall be treated in a different way in future.

The motion was agreed to.

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED SENATORS.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is my melancholy duty to make mention to the Senate of the death since we last met of three of our most influential members. I refer, first, to our departed colleague Sir Lyman Melvin Jones. Although our late colleague was one of the leading captains of industry in the Dominion and represented directly larger commercial interests than probably any other member in this Chamber, he at the same time, for the last thirty years, had been prominent in the public life of the Dominion. Although of late years he resided in the city of Toronto, yet in his earlier days he was closely identified with the development of the West, and particularly of the province of Manitoba. He was at one time mayor of Winnipeg. For some years he was Treasurer in the Provincial Government, and that province enjoyed the benefit of his foresight and executive ability.

His many interests, not only throughout Canada, but also in the United States, prevented him to some extent from identifying himself as closely with the business of this Chamber as he otherwise would have done, but during his attendance we always had the advantage of his very great experience and knowledge. His views on all public matters were listened to with great attention and with the deepest interest. To those who knew him best he was a man most genial and companionable and was held in the highest esteem by his fellowmen. He was in every sense a public man of the most representative type and was a valuable member of this Chamber.

I learned yesterday of the death of our colleague Senator Baird, of New Brunswick. After a somewhat protracted illness he passed away last Saturday. He was one of the older members of this House, having been appointed some twenty-two years ago, and until recent years was almost continuously in attendance at our sessions. Like many other members of this chamber, he distinguished himself in the provincial field before coming into the wider field of Dominion politics. The late Senator Baird for a number of years was a member of the Legislative Assembly of New Brunswick and also a Legislative Councillor of that province until the abolition of its second chamber. He was for many years, during the greater part of his life, I think, associated with the public life of that province and with the development of its commercial interests. It was with very great sorrow and regret that during the last couple of years we observed his failure in health, and to-day we are called upon to mourn his departure.

It was with most sorrowful surprise that I learned of the death in Honolulu of our colleague Senator Corby. His death has come as a surprise to all of us. Few men in the Canadian Parliament had the good fortune to be possessed of the charm and the popularity of our late colleague. Wherever he went he seemed to radiate that social pleasure and good feeling which ever characterized his communication with his fellow men. His hand, his heart and his purse were always open in response to whatever appeal was made to him. His public benefactions were numerous and his friends were legion. Of the many men we know, probably it would be difficult to select any one with the geniality and the charm of manner of the late Senator Corby. For a number of years he had been associated with the public life of the Dominion, and also with its commercial interests. He served his constituents in the House of Commons for many years, and his presence in this House was always a pleasure to his fellow members. His public spirit, his enterprise and his social qualities will be deeply missed by his fellow-members in this Chamber. We cannot adequately express our profound sorrow at his loss, and the sympathy which we feel for his widow and daughters at the loss of one to whom, not only they, but all those who knew him, were most deeply attached.

It is with deep feeling of melancholy we note from session to session the passing away of those so closely associated with us, and day by day it is more deeply borne in upon us that all flesh is grass, that the place that knows us to-day may know us no more forever. We deeply regret and mourn their departure from amongst us, and would express to their families our deepest sense of the great loss which they and this Chamber and Canada have sustained in the death of our late colleagues, Senators Melvin Jones, Baird and Corby.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I desire to join with my honourable friend the leader of the Government in expressing our deep regret at the loss of the three honourable gentlemen, members of this House, to whom he has referred. Sir Melvin Jones was well known in the West, where he took such a prominent part in the public life of the country. At the same time he was recognized throughout the Dominion as an authority in the business with which he had been associated from his youth. He was responsible for developing the concern with which he was connected, making it a great institution in Canada, and afterwards extending it to the United States. Senator Melvin Jones was a man who was respected by all who came in contact with him, and was appreciated for his business capacity and his faith in the possibility of Canada's future. This House and the country generally can ill spare a man who had taken such a prominent part in the life of the country as our late colleague.

Senator Baird has been known to all the members of this House for many years, and it was with great regret that we learned of his illness and his inability to take part last session in the work of this House. He had been before the public for many years, and had acquainted himself with the interests of this country from one end to the other. Even in the province of British Columbia he was known as a man who took a lively interest in the development and business of the country. All those who knew him had a friendly and kindly feeling for him, and recognized in him a man who was doing his best to advance the interests of his country.

In the late Senator Corby we recognized a most lovable character, a man who, as my hon. friend has said, was peculiarly appreciated in every circle in which he moved. He had the happy charm of making friends wherever he went. He always maintained his opinions in such a way as to make one feel that they were genuine, and that he was anxious to do his very best in the interest of his country, and would fight for what he thought was right. He took a very prominent part in the public life of the province of Ontario and of the Dominion.

I join with my honourable friend in expressing the regret of this Chamber, and in tendering our sympathy to the families and relatives of our three departed colleagues in the loss that we and they have sustained.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Honourable gentlemen, I do not suppose that there is another gentleman in the Chamber who has had the long and intimate acquaintance with our late colleague Senator Corby that I have had. I have known him from childhood, and have watched his career for many years, as a young man in business, in social and public life, and I can say with safety—

THE LATE CLERK OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Before the Orders of the Day are called, with the permission of the House I wish to make a few remarks on the retirement of our late Clerk.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would the honourable gentleman let that matter stand until to-morrow?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Certainly.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Wednesday, April 25, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE GAULT DIVORCE PETITIONS.

WITHDRAWN.

Hon. W. B. ROSS presented the fifth report of the Committee on Divorce, which recommended:

In the matter of the petition of Marguerite Claire Gault, of the city of Montreal, Quebec, praying for a Bill of Divorce from Andrew Hamilton Gault of the said city.

Counsel for the petitioner having made application to the Committee for leave to withdraw her Petition, the Committee recommend that leave be granted accordingly.

Hon. W. B. ROSS presented the sixth report of the Committee on Divorce, which recommended:

In the matter of the Petition of Andrew Hamilton Gault, of the city of Montreal, Quebec, for a Bill of Divorce from Marguerite Claire Gault of the said city.

Counsel for the Petitioner having made application to the Committee for leave to withdraw his Petition, the Committee recommend that leave be granted accordingly.

Hon. W. B. ROSS, with the consent of the House, moved the adoption of the said reports.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA JURISDICTION BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN introduced Bill C, An Act to limit the appelate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Bill was read the first time.

ACCUSATION AGAINST MRS. BURLINGTON-HAM.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MONTPLAISIR:

1. Is the hon. Minister of the Interior aware that a certain Mrs. Hélène Burlington-Ham, secretary for ocean ports of the "Young Women's Christian Association," spends the summer navigation season in the city of Quebec?
2. Does the minister know whether any complaints have been made against this lady?
3. Has the minister read a marked number of the Franc-Parleur, a newspaper published in Quebec, dated 30th September last, and in which this paper made certain accusations against this lady?
4. Is the minister aware that this lady, following the publication of this article, instituted civil proceedings, in the course of which she admitted a portion of the accusations made against her by the correspondent in the "Franc-Parleur"?
5. Does the minister intend to take any action in the matter, and what action?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Yes.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.
4. The minister is aware that when civil proceedings were instituted the Franc-Parleur published a retraction of its accusation against Mrs. Burlington-Ham. The minister has no knowledge of Mrs. Burlington-Ham having at any time admitted the truth of any portion of the accusations made by the Franc-Parleur.
5. No.

APPOINTMENT OF MRS. BURLINGTON-HAM.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MONTPLAISIR:

1. Has Mrs. Burlington-Ham been appointed a special member of the Dominion Secret Police?
2. If so, by whom and on whose recommendation was she appointed?
3. Has she, in such a capacity, any special mission in connection with the Immigration Office at Quebec?
4. Does that title give her authority and precedence over the Agent and the Officers of the said Immigration Office?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Yes.
2. Commissioner of Dominion Police.

3. Yes.
4. No.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Owing to the number of inquiries that have been made as to whether or not there is sufficient business before us to warrant our continuous sittings for some time to come, I would say, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, that I regret there is not a sufficient amount of business to keep us engaged. I therefore give notice for to-morrow that I will move:

That when the Senate adjourns on Thursday, April 26, it do stand adjourned till Tuesday, the 15th of May next at eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Notice for to-morrow? Well, then, my Home Rule motion is belated again. I am not going to stand for that. We want the opinion of the Senate of Canada to be given to Mr. Lloyd George, as well as the opinion of the Australian Senate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Possibly—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If you want to cut out Irish liberty on behalf of Germans, then let us know.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: It is only a notice of motion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yes, a notice of motion which will take effect. I hope the Government is not doing this to cut off the adoption of the resolution.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say to my hon. friend that we would not under any consideration injure Ireland, and, if my hon. friend will wait, we may possibly have Home Rule before that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Thank God if you do. I am afraid not.

THE LATE DUCHESS OF CONNAUGHT.

EXPRESSIONS OF REGRET AND SYMPATHY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: On Thursday last reference was made in the House of Commons to the death of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Connaught, which took place during the adjournment of the House in the present session of Parliament. It is most fitting that this chamber should give expression to its sympathy with the Duke of Connaught and family in the great loss which they have sustained through the death of Her Royal Highness.

During the five years that she presided over the vice-regal residence in Ottawa as the wife of the Governor General of Canada she impressed herself deeply upon the people of this Dominion as being pre-eminently fitted to occupy the high position she so gracefully filled. No one appreciated more deeply the possibilities and requirements of the people of Canada. Possessed of great powers of observation, of ripe experience and mature judgment, and sympathetic with the great national questions with which this country was called upon to deal during her presence amongst us, she exhibited an interest and judgment that commanded the admiration of all. Interested as she was in the public affairs of Canada, she nevertheless possessed all the womanly qualities of heart and mind which gave her a deep-seated place in the affections of our people.

The members of this chamber can readily recall the occasion when both Houses of Parliament in the Senate Chamber presented a farewell address to Their Royal Highnesses previous to their departure from Canada. We recall how deeply touched Her Royal Highness was with the expressions of regret to which this Parliament gave utterance upon the severance of the official relations between Canada and themselves.

Owing to the tragic occurrences of the present war, which are unparalleled in history, and for which the native country of her late Royal Highness was primarily and altogether responsible, yet, knowing her deep feelings of sympathy and loyalty to the British Empire, the country of her adoption, our sympathy and admiration were more acutely quickened for the splendid part that she played in what is probably the most realistic drama of the ages. I feel assured that I am expressing the sentiments of the members of this chamber when I say that we are deeply anxious to assure His Royal Highness and family of our deepest sympathy in the great loss which they have sustained, and that we but repeat the sentiments which we on former occasions expressed as to the place which she held in the affections of the people of Canada. I would therefore ask that this Chamber join with the House of Commons in conveying to His Royal Highness and his family our profound sympathy and condolence in their great bereavement.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It is eminently fitting on this occasion that we should join with the House of Commons in expressing deep regret at the loss of Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Connaught. I concur in everything which my hon. friend has so admirably said. Owing to the ill-health which unfortunately Her Royal Highness suffered during her sojourn in this country, she was not in a condition to take as wide and as active an interest in the affairs and duties of the position which she held as I am sure she would have wished to do. We all realize the terrible strain under which Her Royal Highness must have suffered during the last years of her residence here on account of the conditions due to the war; but by any action during the whole period of her life Her Royal Highness gave no sign of anything but absolute devotion to the country of her adoption, and her desire to do everything possible for its benefit and advancement.

I join with my honourable friend in assuring His Royal Highness on behalf of the members on this side of the House, that her memory will be ever green in the minds of the people of Canada, and we trust that this expression of sympathy may be of some consolation to His Royal Highness and the members of his family at the present time.

THE LATE CLERK OF THE SENATE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I desire to draw my honourable friend's attention to clause 52 of the Civil Service Act, which reads as follows:

> The deputy heads of departments shall be appointed by the Governor in Council, and shall hold office during pleasure. Whenever such pleasure is exercised in the direction of removing a deputy head from his office, a statement of the reasons for so doing shall be laid on the table of both Houses of Parliament within the first fifteen days of the next following session.

I presume that my honourable friend is aware that the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1908 placed the Clerk of the Senate in the same position as the deputy head of a department, and I ask my hon. friend whether under that clause he considers that he should make a statement to the House at the present time. While the clause says, "within the first fifteen days of the next following session," I thought, the House being in session at the present time, that my hon. friend might have something to say.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Do I understand that my honourable friend is moving for any papers in the matter?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I was asking the question first.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I shall take cognizance of the question of my hon. friend and shall furnish this information at an early date.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The 15th of May or to-morrow?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: May I be permitted at this time to express the regret of honourable members on this side of the House for the loss which we have sustained, and their appreciation of the services rendered to the Senate by the late Clerk. He held a position in the public service for over forty years, I believe, and I think it is only right that we should express our appreciation of the services rendered by him to this House, and to the country.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I suppose that, when the matter comes up again, that will be the proper time to make some reference to the late Clerk.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Possibly.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I have known the late Clerk for fifty years, and have always regarded him as a most efficient officer. He had been in the public service for over forty years, and I was very much surprised to notice in the press that he had unfortunately met with his death, and that his successor had been appointed. I am glad to know that he is still well and fairly active, and I hope he will be for a long time to come. As one member of this House, I desire to express my great regard for him as a public official, and in doing so I am sure that I voice the sentiment of all the members of this Chamber. The position he occupied was a most invidious one, as we all know, and I think we all agree that on every occasion he conducted himself in an efficient and fitting manner.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I was going to give notice that to-morrow I would ask for some papers with regard to the late Clerk of the House, but, perhaps, if we are going to adjourn to-morrow, with the leave of the House I might make my remarks now. It is because I have had occasion to meet the Clerk of the House lately, and was informed that he was not notified, but that this event had happened without any knowledge of his, that I think it is only fair to him that we should say that there was no fault to find in his work, and that he does not leave this Senate under a cloud. He was an efficient officer; he was well informed on the rules of procedure, but the fact that he has been drummed out with more or less politeness might give the idea to the public that his conduct in the Senate had not always been exemplary, or that, with age coming on, he was not as efficient as he had been, whereas in reality nothing of the kind is the fact, and I think he would have been able to fulfil the duties of his position for some years to come. I saw him only a few minutes ago and he looked as well as any one of us, and I could not help telling him that he looked fit and in very good health.

I do not want to say much as to his successor; God forbid that I should say one uncharitable word against him; I had never seen him before I saw him in this chair. I have no doubt that he must be a very able man. He enjoyed the confidence of the leader of the present Government when he was in opposition, and later on was private secretary to the Prime Minister, and no doubt a man who has occupied such positions should have a great deal of ability. I venture to say, however, that it will be some time before he is more efficient than our late Clerk was; it will be some time before he will know the rules better, because, during the last eighteen sessions, nearly every time we applied to the Clerk for advice it was correctly given.

This is supposed to be a time of retrenchment, a time to save money. The Acting Prime Minister, in Toronto the other day, said to the people that they must save, they must retrench. We have appointed a new Clerk, and have raised the cost of the clerkship 70 per cent. We know that the Clerk gets a salary of $5,000 a year, and the late Clerk, who has been 46 years in the service, is entitled to retire on 70 per cent of that, $3,500. Therefore the clerkship will now cost $8,500 as long as Mr. Chapleau may live.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: May he live long.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: This at a time of retrenchment. I do not think it is in keeping with the teaching of economy. I cannot explain this change except by the fact that coming events cast their shadows before them. We all know that when ministers, especially prime ministers, are about to take their departure, they like to find a nice soft nest for their private secretaries and confidential officers. If that is the case in this instance, the change is explained. It is an easy way to pay a debt of gratitude with other people's money. I do not see any reason why this change was made at the present time, when we are talking of economy and retrenchment, and I am sure that from Halifax to Vancouver the people will resent putting two men in to do one man's work even more than the millions which are being sunk in the mud at Port Nelson, Hudson bay.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Did the honourable leader of the Government, in reply to the honourable leader of the Opposition, state that he would bring down all the correspondence relating to this dismissal?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have no opportunity now, but I will move to have that brought down, and I give notice that I will move, by way of a vote of thanks, that this honourable Senate owes a debt of gratitude to the late Clerk for his services here.

THE UNITED STATES IN THE WAR.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Is it the intention of the honourable leader of the Government in this House to extend a welcome to the United States upon the occasion of their entry into the present war? This has been done in other places, and I think the example ought to be followed in the Senate. It is a very important matter, and I think the least the Government can do is through its representative here to ask for an expression of opinion in regard to the entry of the United States into the present world conflict, to uphold the rights of Great Britain, Ireland, and the allied nations.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I shall at once take the matter into consideration and bring it up at a subsequent date. I shall be very pleased to discuss with my honourable friend the character of the reference which is to be made.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES WAGES BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON introduced Bill D, An Act concerning the payment of the salaries or wages of employees of railway companies.

The Bill was read the first time.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That when the House adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the fifteenth day of May next, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: A number of the members have to leave their homes on Sunday morning in order to be here on Tuesday. Would it be as well to adjourn until Wednesday, then they would not have to leave home until Monday morning?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am quite willing, if that is the wish of the House; but I thought that we had agreed upon Tuesday as the proper day for meeting after long adjournments. If I had suggested Wednesday, some serious obstacle might have prevented some honourable gentlemen getting here then. However, I do not want hon. gentlemen to be inconvenienced, and will change the day to Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact that Thursday, the 17th of May, is Ascension Day; so that if we meet on Wednesday night, we shall have what might be called an off-day, as we have to go to church on Thursday.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does my hon. friend suggest Thursday?

Hon. Mr. BOYER: I think the motion should remain as it is for Tuesday.

The motion, amended as suggested, was agreed to.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue:

For a copy of all proceedings in the Exchequer Court of Canada, and judgment of Mr. Justice Cassels concerning the reference of the Quebec and Saguenay Railway, the Quebec and Montmorency Railway and the Lotbinière and Megantic Railway.

The motion was agreed to.

LOYALTY OF GOVERNMENT RAILWAY EMPLOYEES.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. GIDEON ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to a question of privilege. I should like to make a statement with reference to a comment reflecting upon the loyalty of the employees of the Canadian government railways which appeared in this morning's press. Being a stranger to most of you, it is fitting for me to state that I have been directly connected with railway work for many years and have the knowledge born of experience of a good many railway problems.

It is casting a reflection upon the integrity of the employees of the Canadian government railways to say that they are disloyal to the management or the country which they serve, and I feel it my duty to rise and make this statement in their behalf. During the past year and a half or two years, no single-track railroad in Canada has handled so large a volume of traffic as the Intercolonial railway. A very large proportion of that traffic has been passenger traffic, requiring the closest attention to duty, which has been given, and some seven million passengers and fourteen thousand trains have been handled without the loss of a life. This, I submit, indicates that the employees of the Canadian government railways have not been dilatory or remiss in their duty, or disloyal to their trust. This question sometimes arises, not from any desire to reflect upon the men; but in the minds of the public of this country it is a reflection upon those employees.

I would point out to the House that since the war broke out the railway labour organizations of Canada have strenuously and successfully avoided the promotion of any industrial dispute in this country. Not one railway strike has been precipitated by any of these organizations. They have co-operated harmoniously with the managements of the railroads in handling a largely increased traffic, in some instances with a reduced staff, and in many instances with many new men; and in spite of that the transportation problem has been handled, I think, quite efficiently.

I have had personal and business relations with the management of the Canadian government railways for a number of years, and I know that the relations existing between them and the particular class of employees which I have the honour to represent, have been most cordial, and that there is no cause whatever for any person to state that there is anything but absolute harmony and loyalty existing.

I do not desire to go into details, but I should like to point out one feature. I am absolutely sure that the change in policy and the improvements in the methods of operation which have been adopted have greatly facilitated the handling of the traffic on this road during recent years when it has been so heavy. A number of the great railroads in the United States were the pioneers in adopting up-to-date methods of operation. Some of our railroads in Canada ten years ago adopted what is known as the standard code of operating rules; but not until early in 1914 was that code adopted on the Intercolonial system. Knowing the methods of handling trains under the present rules, and those which have been in effect for some years past, I feel safe in saying that the adoption of this code—it was a drastic change and was looked upon by the employees at that time as being not altogether desirable—has done a great deal towards enabling the heavy traffic to be handled as readily as it has been during the last eighteen months.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Who said that the employees were disloyal?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: It was stated in the press this morning that statements to that effect had been made. In the interest of the railway men in general, and the Intercolonial employees in particular, I feel that I should call attention to the fact that there is no foundation for such an assertion. I am sure that the employees of the Intercolonial railway would feel badly at any such imputation and resent it.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: I heard the debate in the House yesterday, and I heard no one refer to the loyalty or disloyalty of any one employed on the Intercolonial.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I made no mention of the House.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: I was there and heard the debate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Before the honourable senator (Hon. Mr. Robertson) takes his seat I would like to ask a question on behalf of the very men for whom he has made such an excellent and eloquent plea and defence. I would like to ask him, for he represents labour unions, and especially the interests of railway employees, if he is satisfied with the administration of the Intercolonial railway in regard to the promotion of men from the lower to the higher ranks. That is more important to the men than anything else the honourable gentleman could advocate on the floor of this House, and I would like to have his views on that point.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In reply to the honourable gentleman, I would state that during recent years the custom has prevailed on railroads of making contracts as between the employes and the management. That system has been followed on the Intercolonial railway, and at the present time there are articles of agreement covering the rules governing the promotion of employees in the various ranks of the service. Those agreements are being strictly adhered to by both the management and the employees, and the men have no complaint whatever to make in that connection.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is strange, very strange.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I may add, in order that it may be realized that I speak with knowledge of these matters, that I happen to be vice-president of one of the organizations dealing with the management of that railway and have made wage agreements with the present management.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell the House that men going into the employ of the Intercolonial railway sign a contract whereby they can get promotion? Is that what he means? That is an important point.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I mean to say that when a man enters the employ of the Intercolonial railway he is immediately placed upon what is known as the seniority list, or roster, and he is promoted according to his seniority in the service, merit and ability being sufficient. Seniority is recognized and included in all our contracts with all the railroads in Canada.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: I think you will find that does not affect the higher employees; it refers only to members of the labour organizations of which you speak—conductors, drivers and trainmen generally.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Those are the men who reach the very highest positions on all railroads.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Sometimes.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: I think it was stated last night that within a few months there were 21 men from outside roads who took their places.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: They cannot all be general managers.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: But there are other offices beside that of general manager.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has in mind, I think, the practices which prevailed on the Intercolonial railway prior to 1911.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Past ills will not cure present errors.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I rise to a point of order. I am sorry that this matter has not been brought before the House in proper form. Every honourable gentleman who introduces a question has the responsibility of order upon him, and I am sorry my honourable friend did not bring up this matter with a motion, so that we could discuss it. The whole thing is out of order. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we must be careful to have matters come before the House in the proper way. I would like to discuss this question, but I cannot, because I know it is out of order, I think this discussion has gone far enough.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I must point out to my honourable friend that the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Robertson) who first spoke on the question began by asking the permission of the House, which was given.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: He spoke with the unanimous consent of the House.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I must dissent from that. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Robertson) who addressed the House asked for—

Some hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable gentleman cannot dissent from the decision of the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I am not dissenting from the decision of the Speaker, but I want to make my point of order good if I can. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Robertson) asked permission to make a statement as a matter of privilege, as a personal matter. The honourable gentleman has a perfect right to discuss a personal matter, but not to discuss general railway questions. That is the point I want to make. I would be very glad to discuss this matter, but I cannot discuss it; no honourable gentleman wants to discuss a matter which he knows is not in order. I think we should be careful to bring matters before the House in proper form. I bow to the decision of the honourable the Speaker, and I quite understand that, if I were to rise to speak on a matter of privilege, he would think I was going to speak on a personal matter appearing in a newspaper, or in some other way brought before the public and which I thought as a public man required personal explanation in order to set the matter right so far as the public were concerned.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable gentleman is not justified in saying that it was made only a personal matter. It was made a public matter.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY IN DORCHESTER.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired of the Government:

1. What are the names of the parishes, in the county of Dorchester, through which the National Transcontinental runs.
2. Are there to-day, any cases unsettled for land taken for the said Railway in any of these parishes? If so, how many, giving the names of the owners?
3. Were any cases settled during the last Federal Election in Dorchester?
4. If so, in what Parish, and what was the total amount paid during the three weeks preceding the election or voting day?
5. What were the names of the parties receiving the money?
6. What were the names of the agent arranging for the payments?
7. What were the names of the agents handing the cheques to the owners of the land taken?

8. Were all the amounts paid by cheque or in cash?

9. What were the dates, the amounts, and the names to whom these cheques, if any, were made payable to?

10. Were there any other claims, besides for land taken, paid in connection with the National Transcontinental Railway during this last election?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. St. Isidore, St. Anselme, St. Clair, St. Malachie.

2. No.

3. Yes.

4. St. Malachie and St. Clair, $1,425 for land taken.

5. Philemon Fleury, Amedee Landry, Adolphe Couture, Octave Picard.

6. George H. Pharand.

7. George H. Pharand and Roy and Baillargeon, notaries, before whom the deeds were passed.

8. By cheque.

9. Philemon Fleury and George H. Pharand $100, January 22, 1917. Amedee Landry and George H. Pharand $100, January 23, 1917; Adolphe Couture and George H. Pharand $1,100, January 26, 1917; Octave Picard and George H. Pharand $125, January 22, 1917.

10. Yes.

DOMINION LANDS SUITABLE FOR AGRICULTURE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

1. How many acres of land capable of immediate cultivation does the Government own in each of the Provinces: (a) within ten miles of a railway now in operation? (b) within ten miles of a railway under construction?

2. How many acres of land that can be made ready for cultivation by an expenditure of not more than $60 per acre does the Government own in each of the provinces: (a) within ten miles of a railway now in operation? (b) within ten miles of a railway under construction?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Approximate areas of undisposed of available Dominion lands suitable for agricultural purposes within ten miles from railway lines, in Manitoba, 1,529,376 acres, Saskatchewan 1,003,200 acres, Alberta, 4,467,876 acres.

2. It is not possible to furnish this information from the available records.

THE LATE CLERK OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That Major Samuel E. St. O. Chapleau, ex-Clerk of the Senate, be paid out of the Contingencies of the Senate, a sum equal to the difference between the salary he received when in office and the Superannuation allowance he now receives, for a period of six months.

He said: I may say that there is a precedent for this in the case of Mr. Lemoine: when he was superannuated, or when his successor was appointed, he was given six months' leave of absence. I think that, in consideration of the services rendered by the late Clerk, the Senate can very well exercise its discretion and authorize that he be paid out of our miscellaneous vote the sum mentioned, namely, the difference between the salary he received when in office and the superannuation allowance, which would be approximately $1,000.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That in view of the long and faithful services of Major Samuel E. St. O. Chapleau, the late clerk of the Senate, he be continued an honorary officer of this House and allowed the entrée of the Senate and a seat at the Table on occasions of Ceremony.

He said: There is a precedent also for this. In the case of the late Mr. Langevin, who was Clerk of the Senate, the Hon. Mr. Mills moved, in 1900, I think, a resolution to grant to Mr. Langevin the same privilege as that which is embodied in this motion.

The motion was agreed to.

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

On the notice of motion being called:

By the Hon. Mr. CLORAN:

That in compliance with the demands and objects of the Entente Powers prosecuting the present war to secure the overthrow of autocratic rule and the establishment of democratic government throughout the world, based on and guided by the principle of the right of all nations, great and small, to self-government through the means of free Parliaments representative of all the people, and of governments responsible both to Parliament and to the people, it is the imperious duty of the British Government and Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland to concede without further delay to the Irish people the rights and powers of self-government.

That in so doing the British Government will not only serve the policy of the Allied Nations but will contribute to the solidarity of the British Empire itself.

That a further denial of the right of self-government to the people of Ireland will tend to obscure and weaken the cause of liberty for which the war is prosecuted.

That a refusal to grant to Ireland, irrespective of class or religious denomination, a free Parliament, representative of the whole people, will constitute a disturbing factor in the consolidation and management of the British Empire

That the Speaker of the Senate be directed to forward this Resolution to His Majesty King George V, to the Rt. Hon. Lloyd George, Prime Minister of England, and to John Redmond, leader of the Irish people.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have given notice of an amendment to this resolution. The notice of the resolution has already had a beneficial effect. I understand from a declaration of the leader of the House of Commons in England, Mr. Bonar Law, that the Prime Minister is to introduce a Home Rule Bill next Monday. I hope, therefore, that this resolution, instead of being a prayer for clemency and mercy, will be transformed into a hymn of thanksgiving, a Te Deum, throughout Canada.

The motion was allowed to stand.

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate: Copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Government or its ministers, the Department of Militia, the Militia Council, Major-General F. L. Lessard, C.B., Inspector General, or any other person, and Lieut.-Colonel Armand Lavergne, O.C., the 61st Regiment, or any other person, on the subject of the territorial defence of the Province of Quebec, as well as copy of all Orders in Council or documents relating to this subject.

HOME RULE FOR IRELAND.

PROPOSED RESOLUTION WITHDRAWN.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Hon. gentlemen, I hold in my hand the cabled report of the speech of the Right Hon. Lloyd George delivered yesterday in the British House of Commons regarding the settlement of the Irish question and the granting of self-government to a united Ireland. To all intents and purposes the speech of the Prime Minister is really a political manifesto to both Houses of the British Parliament, to the overseas dominions, and to the nations of the world, fighting under the flag of allied democracy; while at the same time Lloyd George's proposal goes to the whole Irish people in the form of a referendum.

Four weeks ago I cabled the British Prime Minister that, in conjunction with other parliaments and legislatures and with the members of the United States Congress, the Senate of Canada had before it for consideration the present resolution, urging the British Government and Parliament to concede, without further delay, the rights and powers of self-government to the Irish nation; and that this resolution would undoubtedly receive as the sanction of this honourable House, as well as the endorsation of Canada, less a small faction.

It is very pleasing indeed to find that the speech and proposal of the Prime Minister regarding the settlement of the Irish question practically cover the grounds outlined in this resolution, which reads as follows:

That, in compliance with the demands and objects of the Entente Powers prosecuting the present war to secure the overthrow of autocratic rule and the establishment of democratic government throughout the world, based on and guided by the principle of the right of all nations, great and small, to self-government through the means of free parliaments representative of all the people, and of governments responsible both to Parliament and to the people, it follows as a matter of course that the British Government and Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland concede without further delay to the Irish people the rights and powers of self-government.

That in so doing the British Government will not only serve the policy of the Allied Nations but will contribute to the solidarity of the British Empire itself.

That a further denial of the right of self-government to the people of Ireland will tend to obscure and weaken the cause of liberty for which the war is prosecuted.

That a refusal to grant to Ireland, irrespective of class or religious denomination, a free Parliament, representative of the whole people, will constitute a disturbing factor in the consolidation and management of the British Empire.

That the Speaker of the Senate be directed to forward this resolution to His Majesty King George V, to the Rt. Hon. Lloyd George, Prime Minister of England, and to John Redmond, leader of the Irish people.

I shall quote a few extracts from the speech of Mr. Lloyd George to demonstrate that the action I proposed to be taken by this Senate was fully and cordially in line with the Imperial policy, as announced by him and already acclaimed throughout the Empire and by the Allied nations. The only ones that will take exception to the Prime Minister's Irish proposal or regard it with disfavour are Germany and a small body of ultra loyal subjects scattered over the British Isles and our own Dominion.

Lloyd George's appeal for union, supported in the House of Lords by Lord Curzon and Lord Lansdowne, is mainly directed to this so far irreconcilable element in Irish politics and national affairs. The following extracts from the speeches of these English statesmen will abundantly show this to be the case:

Mr. Lloyd George especially emphasized the necessity of the convention being thoroughly representative. He said:

"We must not have a convention merely of political parties, though they must all be represented—the followers of Mr. Redmond and Mr. O'Brien, the Ulster Unionists and the Southern Unionists, and I hope of the Sinn Feiners also. But in the main the Government's view is that the convention ought to consist of representatives of local governing bodies, of the churches, trades' unions and commercial interests—in fact, a real representation of the Irish life, thought and activity in all their leading aspects.

"As far as possible we shall invite delegates to be chosen by the bodies whom they represent. Where this is impossible—and I quite understand where it may be desirable to have Irish interests represented which may not have been chosen by any of the categories to which I have referred—other means must be taken to secure that every element of Irish opinion is present."

Continuing, the Premier asked would it be too much to hope that Irishmen of all creeds and parties might meet together in convention for the purpose of drawing up a constitution for their country which should secure a just balance of all opposing interests, and finally compose the unhappy discords which have so long distracted Ireland and impeded its harmonious development, that now were a source of weakness to the people of these islands during one of the greatest trials through which they had passed.

After pledging the Government to give legislative effect to any substantial agreement, Mr. Lloyd George added:

"Perhaps we ought to safeguard the treasury, because Irishmen might become unanimous upon the question of making a demand on the Imperial exchequer." He was unable, he said, to imagine Great Britain acting in a niggardly manner, but the treasury must have a word to say. He could only promise on behalf of the Government that should the convention happily come to an agreement they would not forget that restitution and reparation should begin at home.

The Premier entreated the House to believe that nothing but pressing war considerations would have induced the Government to take up the settlement of so thorny a problem in the middle of the prosecution of this great war; but when they were engaged in a life and death struggle they did not want a rankling and festering quarrel on their hands that irritated, distracted and weakened the nation. From a war point of view it was important to get the controversy settled in order to win the good will and co-operation of the Irish race throughout the world. He concluded by saying that the entire strength of Great Britain and the whole-hearted support of Ireland as well was essential to victory. Therefore he appealed to Irishmen of all faiths and political opinions and especially to the patriotic spirit of Ulster.

Will the patriotic spirit of Ulster answer the demand of the Prime Minister? The patriotic spirit of Ireland will answer, and has given its answer; but will the spirit of Ulster answer the demand for the safekeeping and the safeguarding of the British Empire? I do not believe it will. I believe that Carson, the rebel, will still lead the Ulsterites in rebellion against the King, the Crown, and the flag, as he did three years ago. Carson and his Ulsterites, they should not be called "Ulsterites;" they should be called ulcers on the body politic of Ireland.

Lord Curson, who has been an opponent of Irish liberty up to the present, made this statement.

He said it would be a national misfortune if any one of the Irish parties—

I suppose he meant the ultra loyalists.

—remained aloof from the proposed convention.

He added that a grave responsibility would rest upon the leaders who were elected should they abstain from attending.

Then, we have a last word from one of our ex-Governors, Lord Lansdowne, who never had a healthy reputation with the Irish people, one of the worst grinders of the human race that ever existed in Ireland. I remember thirty years ago when William O'Brien came here to denounce his conduct towards the Irish peasants of his estates in Ireland. Lord Lansdowne was never a friend of Irish freedom and justice; he was a friend of Irish landlordism, who sucked the blood of the nation to squander his wealth elsewhere—anywhere except in the country. Lord Lansdowne, before he dies, confesses his guilt before Almighty God, and this is what he says:

Lord Lansdowne accepted the proposed convention. He said that one fact which seemed to dominate the situation was that we had travelled so far—

He did not say he had travelled.

—along the road to Home Rule that it was now felt impossible to turn abruptly backwards.

He would do it if he could, but he cannot now.

The convention might do immense good and he could not see what harm it could do.

Now, hon. gentlemen, these are the words of Lloyd George, a friend of the cause, of Lord Curzon, an enemy of the cause, of Lord Lansdowne, enemy—oh, enemy is too small a word—the worst opponent in Ireland or in Great Britain of the cause of the Irish people. There you have the two expressions of opinion given in the House of Lords no later than yesterday afternoon. The war has brought curses on men, but the war has brought also blessings, and thank God for the war.

It is well that these declarations of enlightened statesmanship should go on the official records of this honourable House, they seem to be such a true echo of Viviani's historical speech delivered before the two Houses of the Canadian Parliament on the 12th of May instant, and in which, as the authorized representative of France, he made such a soul-stirring appeal for the triumph of the cause of the Allies, and for the establishment of liberty, fraternity, and equality among men of all races, of all creeds, and of all nations.

As the prayer of the resolution has been acceded to by the Government and the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, it becomes unnecessary for me to proceed with its further consideration, and I therefore beg, with the permission of this hon. House, to have it withdrawn.

Before concluding, honourable gentlemen, I wish to pay a tribute to the political foresight and statesmanlike sagacity of the honourable leader of this House. When I placed this resolution on the Order Paper four weeks ago, the honourable leader of the Government, Sir James Lougheed, intimated to me that it might not be necessary to proceed with its discussion, as Prime Minister Lloyd George would find means to unite all conflicting interests and give to the Irish people the self-government for which they have so long struggled and which is now on the eve of being pressed to a successful conclusion, not only in the interests of Ireland, but in those of the British Empire itself.

And it thus cometh to pass that the last prayer and plea, from the Canadian Senate and the Canadian people, for liberty, right, and justice to Erin and her sons, is to be transformed into a hymn of praise, of thanksgiving, and of hope that the old green isle will resume her place among the nations, as the emerald gem of the sea, and the home of a free, happy, and united people, blessed by the Great Ruler of all democracies, harkening to the divine slogan of the angels: "Peace on earth to all men of good will."

The motion was withdrawn.

OFFICIAL REPORTING OF THE SENATE.

PAY OF AMANUENSES.

The Hon. the SPEAKER laid on the table of the House a letter from the Clerk of the Senate, accompanied by a report of the Editor of Debates and Chief of Reporting Branch, with respect to the pay to be allowed to the amanuenses employed on his staff.

On motion of the Hon. Mr. Power, the papers were referred to the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

PROPOSED APPOINTMENT.

The Hon. the SPEAKER laid on the table of the House a letter from the Joint Librarians of the Civil Service Commission-certificate of the Civil Service Commissioners, respecting the proposed appointment of Mr. Herbert D. Troop as a clerk in subdivision B of the Third Division, at an initial salary of $700 per annum.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that these papers be referred to the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I understand this is a recommendation from the Librarians. I do not know whether there is a recommendation also from the Speaker of the Senate.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: No.

AN OFFENSIVE CIRCULAR.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I wish to call the attention of the Government to the following letter, or circular, which I received yesterday; and I am told that many of my colleagues have received similar circulars. It is as follows:

> War Cry! No priest of the Church of Rome shall levy any tax, tythe or toll in any of His Britannic Majesty's dominions.

I bring this to the attention of the Government in the hope that they will forbid the use of the mails for carrying such stupid and infamous matter. What is the use of it? Taxes and tolls are levied on the Catholics of this Dominion, and they are willing to pay them; they do it very willingly. What is the use, then, in these difficult times, of sending circulars like this to arouse racial or religious prejudices? I hope that the Postmaster General will see that such nonsense is not sent abroad. I have received many stupid and ridiculous circulars of various kinds, but when the mails are used for carrying such a stupid thing as this, it is time to call the attention of the Government to the fact, in order that the mails may not be used for such a purpose.

Bill 9, an Act respecting The Lachine, Jacques Cartier and Maisonneuve Railway Company.—Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: If it is understood that by accepting the second reading of this Bill we are not accepting the principle of the Bill, I would not object; but it is essentially a provincial Bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I may say that I do not know anything about the Bill; but the hon. gentleman's point can be considered by the committee.

Bill 35, an Act respecting The Kaslo and Slocan Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Gordon.

Bill 37, an Act respecting The Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal Company, Limited.—Hon. Mr. Casgrain.

Hon Mr. POWER: It is to be regretted that the hon. gentleman in charge of this Bill is not here to explain it. Its subject-matter has been discussed at some length in the press and in Parliament, and I think we ought to know just what is desired.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The Bill simply calls for an extension of time for the completion of the work. I do not know anything further about it. In the absence of my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) I made the motion in order to expedite the Bill. If my hon. friend has any objection—

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am not opposing it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It can be explained in the committee.

ADJOURNMENT.

SPECIAL JOINT SITTING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To-morrow being a statutory holiday, I propose that when this House adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until Monday afternoon, as the Right Hon. Mr. Balfour is to address the Houses of Parliament in joint session in the Commons Chamber on that afternoon. I am unable to state definitely the hour at which Mr. Balfour will address the Houses; it is probable that it will be three o'clock; and it is desirable that we should assemble a little earlier on that occasion than usual. I therefore move that when the House adjourns to-day it stand adjourned until Monday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: Will members of the Senate be admitted to the House of Commons?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes; seats will be reserved for members of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: I ask this question because there does not seem to be any gallery in the House of Commons for members of this House. The last time I went into the House of Commons a messenger showed me orders from the honourable the Speaker of the Commons that no strangers were to be admitted to the floor of the House. As there is no gallery reserved for us, I think it would be well for the honourable the Speaker of the Senate to take steps to have some accommodation provided. My neighbour (Hon. Mr. McSweeney) was nearly ejected.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: My hon. friend was ejected; I did not get that far.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: For many years we have enjoyed the privilege of having a gallery reserved for us. I do not know whether the new Speaker of the Commons has a great respect for the Senate; but some day he may want to join us. I think that the honourable the Speaker of this House should see that senators receive proper treatment in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Yesterday I went to the nearest entrance to the House of Commons—I had been there several times, sitting down—and I was stopped by the doorkeeper.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: Did he arrest you?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: He did not get that far; I did not give him a chance. He showed me a circular signed by the honourable the Speaker of the House which said that only distinguished strangers were allowed to sit on either side of the Speaker. I gave him my card, and told him to take it to the Speaker and ask him if I would be allowed to go inside. He went in with the card himself, or sent in a page; I waited for some time, and, receiving no answer, finally retired. I went to the other entrance and was shown the same circular signed by the Speaker; so I quietly retired and went upstairs. On that occasion I was not very particular about gaining entrance; but when there is a crowd one is rather hustled and bustled about, and the ushers upstairs are very officious.

My honourable friend Mr. Bostock had an experience in the Commons the others day, so had I. There was a stranger sitting in the front row of the Speaker's gallery, and not another soul but myself. I said to the usher, "Why is he sitting there, he is not a member of the Cabinet or of the House of Commons?" He said, "He is a friend of the Speaker."

I think it is time that the members of the Senate stood upon their rights.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have listened with much interest to the thrilling experiences of my honourable friend from Moncton (Hon. Mr. McSweeney). I hope that the other members of the Senate will not be subjected to treatment of that kind hereafter. I think it would be sufficient for His Honour the Speaker to take this matter up with the honourable the Speaker of the Commons, in order to secure for us the same privileges that we enjoyed in the old building. I am satisfied that it is an oversight, and that the Commons would be glad to extend the same courtesies to members of the Senate that always have been extended.

With regard to the provision to be made on Monday next, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Commons has already taken the subject up with me, and has assured me that every provision will be made for the accommodation of senators.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understand that the senators will have seats on the floor of the House?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I will try to see the honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons, with the view of making some arrangement whereby the senators shall have a proper place on the floor of the House of Commons on all occasions.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Monday at half-past two o'clock.

PAYMENT TO STANFIELDS, LIMITED.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY inquired of the Government:

1. What was the amount paid the Stanfields Limited for goods damaged in transit in accident in December last on Northern Division Intercolonial Railway; also, date of accident?
2. What was done with the goods so damaged?
3. Were they sold by public tender, and, if so, the names of parties tendering, the amount of each tender, and the name or names of the successful bidder?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. $6,917.32; date of accident, November 7.

2. Such portion as was not totally destroyed was disposed of to A. M. King and Son, of Annapolis, N.S.

3. Sold by public tender and the following tenders were received: W. Stetson & H. H. Rogers, Halifax, $2,400; Mosher, Jacobson & Valeskey, Halifax, $2,503.05; E. David & Sons, Bridgewater, $2,000; F. W. S. Colpitts & Son, Moncton, $2,450; Peter McSweeney Co., Moncton, $2,050; A. D. Farrah & Co., Newcastle, $2,000; A. M. King & Son, Annapolis, $4,000; A. M. King & Son were the successful bidders.

EXEMPTIONS FROM CONSCRIPTION.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Hon. gentlemen, with your permission I shall begin by reading the resolution of which I gave notice:

Resolved, that, in any measure intended to introduce conscription into Canada, provision should be made that no man, whose father, brother, or son has gone to the seat of war as a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, or is being trained in England preparatory to going to the front, shall be selected for compulsory service.

I have trespassed on your time to read this notice because I find that some honourable members of this House labour under a misapprehension as to the object and meaning of the motion. My position is this, honourable gentlemen. I do not undertake to pronounce an opinion as to the merits of conscription. Conscription may be wise or it may be unwise. If I were called upon now, without any further consideration, to vote on the matter, I do not feel quite clear as to which way I should vote. There are a great many considerations to be weighed and thought over, operating on both sides of the question; and, as I have not given the matter the serious consideration which I think every member should give to an important question, I do not feel prepared to express any opinion on the subject. By and by, when one has had time to weigh the arguments pro and con, he may be in a better position to form an opinion. I may say that any discussion of the merits of conscription in connection with this resolution would be out of order; that is not the subject of discussion. That question can be more properly discussed on a motion of which notice has been given by one of my honourable friends.

Then, honourable gentlemen may say, and I have been asked, why move this resolution? Why not wait until the Government measure has been brought down? I think I can give an answer to that question or that suggestion, which ought to meet the views of any reasonable gentleman. A Government measure providing for conscription has been promised. I assume—I do not know, but I assume—that that measure, if not in actual course of preparation, is now being considered; and the proposition embodied in the resolution to which I am speaking is one that, if the Government thought well of it, might very well be embodied, either wholly or partially, in the Bill providing for conscription. It is just one of those considerations that in the hurry of parliamentary work might perhaps be overlooked, and if one waited until the Bill had been introduced by the Government and had come to this House in the regularly parliamentary course, it would be very difficult to secure either favourable consideration or support for an amendment coming from the Opposition.

Now, honourable gentlemen, the position is this: over 400,000 men have enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Force of their own choice and free will. That was, I think, by way of implementing a promise made by the Prime Minister of Canada about a year and a half ago to the effect that Canada would raise half a million men. As to the propriety or wisdom of that promise on the part of the leader of the Government, I have nothing to say—not just now. Over 400,000 men have been raised; it is deemed necessary to raise something less than 100,000 more. The conclusion has been arrived at by those who are responsible for conducting the business of the country that that number of men, I think 80,000, cannot be raised by voluntary enlistment and consequently compulsion in some form must be resorted to, and conscription is being resorted to—or will be. Now, honourable gentlemen, I think it must strike every member of the House that where, say, one or two sons in a family have of their own free will joined the Expeditionary Force and gone to the front, and in some cases have lost their lives, or in other cases have been seriously wounded, it seems unfair that the remaining sons of the family should be taken under any conscription law. If a father and a mother have given one son, or two sons, and perhaps have a third son at home, it does seem an unreasonable thing that they should be exposed to the risk of having that remaining son, who is possibly the only person to whom the parents in their declining years can look for support, taken under a Conscription Act, while there are thousands of men living in the same neighbourhood who have perhaps a half dozen sons in the family and have not given one to the public service. I think that is a consideration the fairness of which will strike every honourable gentleman.

Honourable gentlemen may say, "Well, that would not happen; the brother of a young man who has sacrificed himself for the country would not be taken by conscription." But, honourable gentlemen, whatever preliminaries may be arranged for conscription, in the end, as I understand, the question of the man to be taken is settled by lot, but the lot is just as likely to fall on the son of the father and mother who have lost one or two sons already as it is on the son of the father and mother who have not sent any son to the war. I think that that is a condition of things we should try to avoid.

I know that some little objection has been taken to the wideness of the resolution; but there are cases where the father of a son over 20 years of age has himself gone to the front as a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force; and it does seem to me that if the head of a family has gone to the front it is not altogether unreasonable that the son should be allowed to remain at home. However, the resolution, although it covers the case of the father, is really intended to deal with the case of the brother. Substantially it provides that, where one son of a family has already enlisted and been sent to the front, no other son of the same family shall be compelled to join the Canadian Expeditionary Force. This of course would not interfere with voluntary enlistment. This resolution, if embodied in the Bill, would have the effect —and I think it is deserving of some attention—of increasing the number of those who might have enlisted and did not and who would now be compelled to take their places in the Canadian Expeditionary Force. Cases have come to the attention of every honourable gentleman similar to one which has been brought immediately to my attention. There is a man in Halifax who is not a farmer, and not a maker of munitions; neither were his sons. As far as I know he has three sons. Two of them went to the front; one was killed and the other was very seriously wounded, and, as I understand, is now on his way home probably crippled for life. I think it would be a most inhuman thing for any conscription law to take that sole remaining son away from his parents. I saw an item in an Ottawa paper the other day with reference to the case of a widow, which was almost similar to that of the man of whom I have spoken. Two sons went to the front. One was killed, the other was seriously wounded. The third son wished to enlist but he was not physically fit, and was rejected. I feel that the Government should have, and I trust that they will have, some regard for human sentiment, and that with respect to conscription they will not imitate the ruthless Prussian method of dealing with our citizens.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Honourable gentlemen, I think the honourable member from Halifax wants to bind us in advance to the principle of conscription. His motion is nothing less than an amendment to something which is to come before us. I think it is entirely out of order. What are we asked to do? We are asked to amend in advance the Conscription Bill. If this motion is adopted, we shall be accepting the principle of the Bill and at the same time proposing an amendment in that regard; and now is not the time to commit ourselves. Let the Government come out with flying colours, and we shall know what to do with the Bill. I do not think the honourable member for Halifax has a right to ask us, in advance, to accept his amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is my honourable friend going to press this motion?

Hon. Mr. POWER: I should like to hear it discussed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend is going to press the motion, I intend saying something on the question raised by my honourable friend who has just taken his seat.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Has the honourable gentleman raised a point of order?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Chair.

Hon. Mr. POWER: On the point of order: honourable gentlemen, I am not easily surprised, but I am a little surprised at the raising of this point of order. There is no Bill before the House; there is no motion to amend a Bill before the House. It is the every-day practice in the English Parliament, and in almost every other parliament, to express an opinion as to certain legislation which they might think desirable I have not said a word as to the merits of the Bill which the Government intends to introduce, so what I propose cannot be regarded as an amendment, and an attempt to shut out the resolution would be such an interference with the rights of the members of this House that it should not be tolerated.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend takes that ground and insists that his motion is in order, and indicates that he intends to press it, I must join with my honourable friend to my left (Hon. Mr. Landry) on the point of order which he has raised. I would cite to His Honour the Speaker, Bourinot, page 301, in which it is very clearly laid down:

> A motion must not anticipate a matter already appointed for consideration by the House.

My honourable friend knows that the Prime Minister has intimated to Parliament that a Bill is to be brought down dealing with the subject of conscription. I would refer also to May, page 279, where the question of order is very clearly dealt with. The reason is very simple, and is that any member or group of members could anticipate the introduction into this House of a Bill to which the Government or a member may be committed, and by a resolution or a series of resolutions, moved in advance, might so commit the House on the matter that it could not be considered properly. My honourable friend proposes to introduce into the Conscription Bill a very important principle, anticipating what may or may not be contained in the Bill. It seems to me that his motion does violence to one's idea of the proper consideration which should be given to a Bill by proposing in anticipation the defeat of a principle which may be embodied in it.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Honourable gentlemen, I have just a word to say in regard to this matter. I am not prepared to admit that the point of order is well taken, because, generally speaking, any member of this House may move a resolution. We always anticipate that something may be done when we move a motion. In this case we are just taking the ground that if a Bill is proposed we ought to do something. While not admitting the principle laid down by the honourable the leader of the Government, I am prepared to ask my honourable friend to consent to the postponement of his motion, as I intend asking to have mine postponed, until the Bill is before the House. I think that a member of the House has the right to move a motion on a public subject, even if there is no question of a Bill being proposed.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: If this matter can be dealt with in connection with the Bill the same thing should be done in connection with all Bills coming before the House.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Question.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Honourable gentlemen, the question which has been raised is one of great importance, and, in order to give it the attention which it merits, I would ask to be allowed to reserve my decision until to-morrow.

The motion was allowed to stand.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY GUARANTEE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate copies of all Orders in Council passed in conformity with the provisions of 4-5 George V, Chapter 20, Section 15, Subsection 5.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Will the hon. gentleman please explain the provisions of 4-5 George V, chapter 20, section 15, subsection 5?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The clause referred to is in the Act which granted a guarantee of $45,000,000 in 1914 to the Canadian Northern railway. Under that clause certain Orders in Council had to be passed with reference to portions of the railroad in British Columbia. It is with the object of having those Orders in Council laid on the table of the Senate that I have made this motion.

The motion was agreed to.

THE SPEAKER OF THE SENATE.

ADDRESS TO RIGHT HON. A. J. BALFOUR.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Honourable gentlemen, I should like to know under what authority or in virtue of what decision or resolution of the Senate the address read yesterday in the House of Commons by the Speaker of the Senate was dealt with. Is there any decision of the Senate empowering the Speaker to leave the Chair, go to the other House, and deliver a speech in the name of the Senate?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: War time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I did not think that I had missed any of the meetings of this honourable body; but I have been unable to find any such motion, and my attention was never called to its adoption. I have no objection to the speech; it was a good speech.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It was also in French.

The Hon. the SPEAKER.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: That did not make it worse. I am not complaining of the speech at all, nor of the way in which it was delivered. It is the principle that I am objecting to. If the honourable the Speaker has the right to make such a good speech, he might have the right to make one which would not be so good in our opinion; he might express an opinion which we would not care to endorse. I would not want it to appear in the future that a precedent had been established. I want to guard against any expression of opinion which would not be the opinion of the majority of this honourable body.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Carried.

Hon. M. LANDRY: No, it is not carried. I want to know by what authority it was done.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: If it is carried, it will be a vote of censure on the honourable the Speaker.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I do not see that there is any motion before the House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The honourable the Speaker has only one pair of glasses; he might put on two.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Does the honourable gentleman wish to make a motion?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: No, I want an explanation, such as we have the right to ask for every time the Orders of the Day are called. This is the first time I have heard it said on such occasions that there was nothing before the Chair for the mere desire to evade giving an answer.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I did not say a word against the remarks of the honourable gentleman. I simply said that there was no motion before the House. I repeat that I had no orders from the House to express the views which I expressed. If it had been a formal address, I would not have acted as I did. I was informed by the Speaker of the House of Commons that the Senate was invited to attend the sitting yesterday, and I conveyed that message to the Senate. The Speaker of the House of Commons told me that he was going to address Mr. Balfour, it being war time, and at once I prepared the few remarks which I read yesterday, and which my hon. friend admits were not to be taken advantage of against me. I understand that if it had been a formal address, I would have been compelled to present my views to this House, but, as I only made a few remarks as Speaker of the Senate, I did not believe it was necessary to ask the permission of the House.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: If any honourable gentleman objects to what I have done, he is at perfect liberty to make a motion of censure against me, and I will abide by the judgment of the House.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

EXEMPTIONS FROM CONSCRIPTION.

MOTION.

On the Order:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Power:

Resolved,—That, in any measure intended to introduce conscription into Canada, provision should be made that no man whose father, brother or son has gone to the seat of war as a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force or is being trained in England preparatory to going to the front, shall be selected for compulsory service; and the point of order raised by the Hon. Mr. Landry, etc.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Honourable gentlemen, I regret to say that I have had so much to do since the adjournment of the House yesterday that I have had very little time for the study of the important question raised by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry). Therefore I pray to be excused to-day. I shall study the question seriously, and shall give my decision on Tuesday.

The motion was allowed to stand.

CLAIMS OF BRITISH COLUMBIA SEALERS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK rose to call the attention of the Government to a return made to an Order of the House of Commons of the 7th February, 1916, for a copy of all correspondence and reports on the claims of sealers of British Columbia under the last treaty with the American Republic; and to inquire what amount of money has been paid to the Government under the terms of the treaty.

He said: I desire to make a few remarks in regard to this inquiry which stands in my name, and I hope that I shall not be too long in dealing with the matter; but it is a matter that requires some explanation, and there is some history attached to it which I think will be necessary to lay before honourable gentlemen in order that they may understand the situation.

As honourable gentlemen know, the Alaskan territory was bought by the United States in the year 1867 from the Russian Government, and the Pribyloff islands were a part of that territory. After the United States Government had taken over these islands they made an arrangement with a company to take over the killing of the seals on the islands. At that time the sealskins were possibly not as valuable as they are at the present day; but some years later men in British Columbia, in Victoria especially, started to hunt for seals in Behring sea. They were what were known as pelagic sealers. I think they started about the year 1873, but it was not until the year 1886 that their method of hunting had become rather a nuisance, I presume, to the men who owned the islands. United States revenue cutters then started to examine ships, and in the year 1886 they made some seizures. The United States revenue cutter Corwin seized in Behring sea the British sailing schooners Carolina, Thornton, and Onward, and warned out of that sea the British schooner Favourite. The vessels that were seized were not trespassing inside of the three-mile limit of the Pribyloff islands; they were seized in the open sea.

This condition of things continued during the years from 1886 or 1887 up to 1890, and then an arrangement was reached whereby a modus vivendi was to be in force until the British Government and the United States Government could come to some understanding as to the claims set up by the United States Government in Behring sea. The modus vivendi remained in force until the year 1893, when what is known as the Paris award, covering regulations dealing with this question, was arrived at. When the representatives of the various governments met in Paris, the contention of the United States Government that Behring sea was a closed sea was disallowed, and the contention of the British Government that all the nations of the world practically had the right to go and fish for seals in Behring sea was maintained. Then the question of the seizure of British sealing vessels in previous years came up, and the United States Government agreed to indemnify the men who had suffered on account of those seizures. At the time the award was made, I think I am right in stating, Sir John Thompson, who represented the Canadian Government, refused to sign the award, because other sealers—not the men who had been injured on account of their vessels having been seized, but other men in British Columbia who carried on sealing in Behring sea—were not compensated for the loss to their business which would result from the regulations that had been agreed to between the British Government and the United States Government. The award made in Paris, which set out these regulations, provided that pelagic sealers should not be allowed to hunt for seals in a zone of 60 miles around the Pribyloff islands, and that they should not be allowed to hunt for seals between the 1st of May and the 31st of July. Now, those three months were the best months of the year for sealing in those waters. The habit of the seal is in the fall of the year, in November or thereabouts, to go south, to stay in the southern waters until the beginning of the following year, and then to go north again. About the 1st of May, or a little earlier, the seals begin to arrive on the Pribyloff islands, and they continue to come there until the middle or end of July. So that the best time for men who were hunting seals in Behring sea to carry on their work was during those three months during which under the regulations agreed to by the two governments they were prohibited from hunting. Therefore their business was very seriously interfered with.

In the year 1897 a commission was appointed by the Canadian Government and went to Washington, and the question of compensation to the Canadian sealers was one of the questions brought up as between the two governments on that occasion. Sir Louis Davies, at that time Minister of Marine and Fisheries, tried to have the question arranged. With that object in view, he instructed the sealers to have their vessels, their nets and every other instrument for catching seals, properly valued; and a man was sent from Nova Scotia to British Columbia for the purpose of placing a value on their whole outfit. The value that this man placed on the vessels was $553,129. This was reported to Sir Louis Davies, and he, as representing the Canadian Government, asked the sealers whether they would compromise by agreeing to take the sum of $450,000 in settlement of their claims for compensation. This I understand they agreed to do, but, owing to other matters which the two governments were at that time trying to arrange, this question was left open, no definite arrangement being arrived at. It has stood in that position ever since.

The men who were engaged in this sealing industry in the year 1900 came to the conclusion that the best thing that they could do was to organize all their interests and form themselves into a company, called the Victoria Sealing Company. They represented at that time 43 vessels, out of a total number of 46 which made Victoria or Esquimalt their headquarters and were sailing out of Victoria to the sealing grounds. They were of course fishing under great disadvantages, being placed in the difficult position of not being able to hunt for seals at the best time of the year. In consequence of these disadvantages under which they were placed by the regulations, although they really controlled 43 vessels during the season of 1901, only 24 put to sea. In 1902 28 vessels put to sea, in 1903 20; in 1904 19, and so on down to 1909, when only one put to sea. In the years 1910 and 1911 no vessels belonging to this particular sealing company attempted to go to Behring sea for the purpose of catching seals. However, in the year 1903 one vessel not owned by the Victoria Sealing Company started hunting for seals in Behring sea; and this went on until in 1907 there were five independent vessels engaged in the business. Some of these vessels went on hunting until the year 1911.

Now, there is a difference of position between the vessels owned by the Victoria Sealing Company and those independent sealers, who went into the business in 1903. The men interested in the Victoria Sealing Company had gone into the sealing business before the regulations were made, and before there was any stipulation that they had to follow those regulations which were a detriment to them. The other men, who went into the business in 1903, of course started sealing in the face of the regulations and knew the difficulties they would encounter. The sealers represented by the Victoria Sealing Company, inasmuch as the regulations had interfered very much with their fishing in Behring sea in the year 1894, went across to the Japanese side, where they found many seals, and got a large number of skins. This fact was brought to the knowledge of the Japanese Government, and the Japanese people, later on, finding that money was to be made out of hunting for seals, went into the business and in 1902 started hunting for seals in Behring sea. Up to that time the only persons who had been hunting seals, and to that extent had been sustaining the rights of Canada to hunt in those waters, were those men practically represented by the Victoria Sealing Company. They were bound by the regulations made between the Government of Great Britain and the Government of the United States, and they had to obey those regulations. The Japanese sealers, however, were not a party to those regulations. They came over into Behring sea, and were able to hunt anywhere outside of the three-mile limit around the Pribyloff islands, and they could hunt at any time during the year, and could use any method which they chose to kill seals; they were not restricted in any way. The United States Government therefore tried to bring about an arrangement whereby the Japanese Government would be made a party to an understanding in order that the seals might be protected. This led to a treaty made in 1911 between the United States Government and the British Government. on the condition that the Russian Government and the Japanese Government, who were interested in these matters, should become parties to it. The position was this: the United States Government owning the Pribyloff Island, the Japanese Government owning the Robben reef, and the Russian Government owning the Commander island, were all owners of islands to which seals resorted; but the British Government and the Canadian Government, not being the owners of any such island, were cut out of the sealing under this treaty. An arrangement was therefore made that the British Government should receive an amount representing 15 per cent of the value of the catch of seals on the Pribyloff islands, 15 per cent of the value of the catch of seals on the Russian islands, and 10 per cent of the value of the catch of seals on the Japanese islands, in any year.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Why was that paid to the Government?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: In consideration of joining in this treaty and resigning their right to hunt for seals in Behring sea. It was also arranged under this treaty that no seals should be killed by the company to whom the United States Government had leased their islands for five years from the date of this arrangement; and the United States Government agreed to pay to the British Government the sum of $200,000 as a first payment, out of the moneys that would become due to them under this arrangement. They were to pay a similar sum to the Japanese Government.

After this arrangement was come to between the two governments, the Government of Canada appointed a Commissioner to inquire into the claims of the sealers who were now prohibited from hunting in Behring sea. As a result of that inquiry a report was brought down to the House of Commons on the 7th of February, 1916. The Commissioner was appointed under an Order in Council. I do not think it necessary to read the whole of it, but I should like to read the part which I think bears on this question:

That by the Paris Award Regulations of 1893, which were made effective by Imperial and United States legislation in 1894, serious restrictions were imposed upon the operations of British and United States pelagic sealers, which restrictions, it is represented, made the business so unprofitable that several Canadian pelagic sealers and sealing vessels were forced to abandon the industry;

That certain Canadian citizens claim to have been damnified by the above-mentioned treaty and regulations, and to be entitled to compensation;

That it is desirable that a thorough investigation of all claims flowing from or arising out of the Pelagic Sealing Treaty and the Paris Award Regulations aforementioned should be made;

The minister therefore recommends that Hon. Louis Arthur Audette, Assistant Judge of the Exchequer Court, be appointed a commissioner under chapter 104 of the Revised Statutes of Canada for the purpose of investigating all such claims; that for said purpose he be authorized to receive claims, to take evidence in regard thereto, to hear counsel on behalf of the claimants, if such claimants so desire, as well as on behalf of the Crown, if it be decided that the Crown should be represented by counsel; that the said commissioner be authorized to visit British Columbia and such other places as he may deem necessary for the purpose hereof, and that as soon as possible thereafter the said commissioner report to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries his proceedings under said commission, together with the evidence and his opinion, having regard to the said treaty and regulations, and the evidence of each case as to what person or persons, if any, is or are entitled to be paid compensation by the Crown for damage resulting from such treaty or regulations, and what amount each of such persons is entitled to be so paid.

The minister further recommends that the Minute of Council of the 10th May, 1913—P.C. 1054—be rescinded, and that this minute be substituted therefor.

The committee concur in the foregoing and submit the same for approval.

Honourable gentlemen will notice that the Commissioner was to inquire into the claims which came both under the treaty and under the regulations; and the report which was brought down will show, I think if honourable gentlemen have taken the time to read it, that the Commissioner took a decidedly peculiar view of the situation in dealing with the matter. He has divided the claims into four different classes. He rules out of court the three first classes. The claims of the Victoria Sealing Company came under class C—and to me it appears that the Commissioner has taken a very peculiar view of the situation in dealing with these claims. He has only allowed consideration to those men who were fishing in the years 1910 and 1911. He appears to have ruled other claims out of court altogether for various reasons, but, as far as one can learn from the report, principally because the men were not fishing during those two years.

I have tried to show to the House that the men who were fishing in the years from 1886 onward are the men who established the right of Canadians and British subjects to fish in those waters, and that, if it had not been for their enterprise, energy, and courage, Canada practically would not have established the right to hunt for seals in Behring sea, and if they had not established any right, they would not have had any claim to consideration when this treaty was made in 1911. I have shown also that at one time, at any rate, the United States Government was prepared to compensate these men for the loss of their business and the difficulties under which they were carrying it on, owing to the regulations made in 1893; and I think that honourable gentlemen, in considering this matter, will see that these men have not been fairly dealt with when their claims were turned down simply because they were not fishing in the years 1910 and 1911. They continued fishing as long as it was possible for them to do so. They had not the Bank of England at their back; they had not unlimited money to enable them to stand being overhauled by the United States revenue cutters, and also the British cutters—because the British ships were bound to see that the regulations were properly carried out. This was the cause of a great deal of expense, a great deal of trouble, and a great deal of annoyance. In the year 1908, one of their vessels called the Carlotta Cox was seized, and the owners were fined $6,000 and put to other expenses. In that year there were only 10 vessels really trying to hunt seals, and when this seizure was made the company did the best they could to call the other vessels in, because they did not want to have any more seizures, and did not want to have to pay large sums of money for what was claimed to be an infringement of the regulations.

Contrast the treatment which the Canadian Government has meted out to these men with that meted out by the Japanese Government. When they saw what was to be made out of pelagic sealing, the Japanese Government not only encouraged their men to hunt seals, but, between the years 1902 and 1911, bonused them to encourage them to follow up the sealing industry. When the arrangement was made between Japan and the United States, the Japanese Government compensated their sealers to the extent of $600,000, although I do not think there is any instance of their boats having been seized and their owners fined, as was the case with the sealers from British Columbia. Honourable gentlemen will see that the Japanese Government was very much more considerate and generous towards its people than the Canadian Government has been to its people up to the present time.

This return was brought down to the House in February, 1916. Later on the sealers, through their counsel, wrote to the Department of Marine and Fisheries asking for a re-hearing of the case, and forwarded a petition to the same effect, because they felt that they had not been fairly dealt with in the matter. On the 22nd of November, 1916, they wrote a letter to the department, drawing attention to their action of the 26th of April, 1916, and asking the Government to consider the matter further. The letter was as follows :

Victoria, B.C.,
November 22nd, 1916.

To the Hon. J. D. Hazen, Minister of Marine and Fisheries,
Ottawa.

Sir:

On the 26th of April last the Victoria Sealing Company, Ltd., sent you a protest against the findings of Mr. Justice Audette regarding the Sealing Commission, for which he was appointed commissioner.

A reply to the petition that a re-hearing of the matter be given has never been received by this company, although the shareholders have been anxiously looking for it all this time.

Would you kindly let us know whether the petition for a re-hearing is to be granted, or whether it is refused.

We have the honour to be, Sir,
Your most obedient servants,
The Victoria Sealing Company, Ltd.,
per F. W. Adams,
Secretary-Treasurer.

On the 29th of November they received this letter from the Deputy Minister of Naval Service:

Sir:

I beg to acknowledge your letter of the 22nd ultimo, calling attention to the protest of the Victoria Sealing Company, Limited, against the findings of Mr. Justice Audette in connection with the Pelagic sealing claims, and the request for a hearing in the way of appeal before the Governor in Council or otherwise.

In reply, I am directed to state that as the claimants were given full opportunity to substantiate their claims before the commissioner, and the award was made in the light of the evidence submitted, it has been decided after careful consideration of the matter, to accept the award of Mr. Justice Audette as a final closing of the case. I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,
(Signed) G. J. Desbarats,
Deputy Minister of the Naval Service.

Dear Sir:
F. W. Adams, Esq.,
Secretary-Treasurer,
Victoria Sealing Company,
Victoria, B.C.

Not satisfied with that, the Victoria Sealing Company wrote to the Premier, and on the 6th of January they received a reply from the Premier, which reads:

Prime Minister's Office, Canada.
Ottawa, Ont.,
January 6th, 1917.

Dear Sir:—

In reply to your letter of the 22nd November last, I beg to say that the report of Mr. Justice Audette and the petition for re-hearing had been referred to the Hon. Arthur Meighen, Solicitor General, for report.

Yours faithfully,
(Signed) R. L. Borden.

F. W. Adams, Esq.,
Secretary-Treasurer,
Victoria Sealing Company,
Victoria, B.C.

But nothing further has come of this matter. This question having been carried on for so many years, a number of the men who were originally interested have been placed in position where they are almost without support of any kind. They feel that they are entitled to some compensation for the money that they have lost and the business that they have lost over this matter, and they think that the Government should take the matter up and deal with it as promptly as possible. I think that honourable gentlemen will see that there is a great deal to be said for these men, and that they have a claim against the Government. Although it may not be absolutely a legal claim, I think that in equity their case should certainly be considered. I have therefore brought this matter to the attention of the Government and would ask their careful consideration of the same.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I notice that my honourable friend has placed an inquiry upon the Order Paper in connection with the subject to which he has so interestingly directed our attention. I have an answer to that, but, inasmuch as my honourable friend has asked for copies of all correspondence and reports on the claims in question, possibly the matter had better be allowed to stand in its entirety until those papers are brought down. It is to be presumed that they will disclose the reasons why the award of Mr. Justice Audette should be carried out and why no increased allowance should be made. I shall see to it that those papers are laid upon the Table, and then, in the light of the information contained in them, honourable gentlemen on both sides of the House will have an opportunity of further discussing the subject.

The inquiry was allowed to stand.

WHOLE WHEAT BREAD.

MOTION.

Hon. J. P. B. CASGRAIN moved:

That in the opinion of the Senate, during the war, whole wheat bread should be made as soon as possible in Canada.

He said: The subject of this motion is a live question and has been a live question for many years. I want to say at once that it is certainly the most important matter that I have ever brought to the attention of this honourable House in the seventeen years during which I have had the honour of a seat in it. This is a question of great moment, particularly at the present time during the war. I crave your indulgence, honourable gentlemen, if in my remarks you do not find the co-ordination that there should be. If any injustice is done, it is an injustice to myself on account of my brief preparation.

I claim that this matter is of such urgency that not one moment should be lost in bringing it to the attention of the Government of the country. Those who will be good enough to hear me will, I hope, be convinced that 85 men can be fed with whole wheat bread, from the same quantity of wheat as would, if made into ordinary white bread, feed only 62. If this is not worthy of consideration by this honourable House, I do not know of any question that is.

How did I come to be apprised of the fact which I have just mentioned? It was due to La Presse, of Montreal, which has by far the largest circulation of any newspaper in this country. I think La Presse beats any other paper by about 40,000. Its circulation is about 140,000; I looked at the figures only five minutes ago. The next biggest paper, the Montreal Star, though it has not published its circulation lately, so far as I can see, claims 100,000. Consequently La Presse has 40,000 more circulation than any other paper. It is edited by perhaps the oldest journalist in the province of Quebec, if not in Canada, Mr. C. A. Dansereau, a man who, as the honourable member for Belleville (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) is well aware, has occupied a very prominent position in the party now in power, and a man upon whom Providence has bestowed the faculty of acquiring universal information. Owing to his immense fund of information he is able to keep the readers of that paper informed upon all the scientific discoveries that tend to make the world better. He is also able to keep them in line with the new discoveries tending to the advancement of agriculture by the aid of chemistry. It was a campaign conducted by his paper last winter that apprised me of the fact which I have mentioned, and which I was astounded to learn. The campaign was begun after the publication of a book by Dr. Aurèle Nadeau, of Beauce county, in the province of Quebec. The preface of this book is written by Dr. Arthur Rousseau, a very prominent physician of the city of Quebec, and the book has been published under the auspices of the Quebec Government entitled, "The Great Fallacy of White Bread."

Now, the question is, have we, during this war, the right to sacrifice about one-third of a crop for the sole purpose of producing spotlessly white flour, deprived, as it is, of all the ingredients that are absolutely necessary for the well-being of man, when we know that not only our Allies, but even our own mother country, England, has now adopted whole wheat bread, and that the King, on his own table, has had nothing but whole wheat bread for the past two years? Why should we lose any of the wheat when we realize that with the same quantity we can feed four men by the use of the whole wheat, whereas with the commercial bread as now used we can feed only three?

I do not blame this Government or any other Government. It is not the first time I have spoken in the Senate on the subject of bread. The Government regulates all food matters. There is a department to which is assigned that special task, that is, the Department of Inland Revenue, which has officers who inquire whether jam or preserves are made with saccharine, or sugar, or glucose, or whether figs and turnips mixed together are sold as substitutes for strawberries, and so on. The Government officers are all at work on these questions; but bread, the staple of life, the Government seems to have neglected absolutely—and in saying Government I mean all the Governments in this country, not particularly the Government of the Dominion. All Governments seem to have neglected this great question of bread, which constitutes half the food of the masses of the people.

The Government is now urging increased production. I agree entirely with the Government. We cannot increase production too much. But here is an increase already found in the yield of wheat. If the Government will only put a small measure on the statute book, we can get 25 per cent more nutriment out of the wheat than we are getting to-day.

My honourable friend from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) tells me that 80 per cent is the maximum of nutriment to be got out of wheat. Well, it is not more than 85 per cent. There is not much difference between that and the figure mentioned by my honourable friend, who is an expert in the milling business, I understand.

Great Britain has adopted the use of whole wheat bread for some time past. France has also adopted the use of whole wheat bread. In France it is called ration bread for the army and "le pain du paysan" for the peasants. The saving to France annually by the use of this bread amounts to the hugh sum of $58,000,000—simply by changing from one system of grinding to another. With the permission of the House I will explain both systems in a few moments. I received a letter only yesterday from one of our late colleagues, now resident in Paris. He tells me that the people there are even going beyond the use of ordinary whole wheat bread, natural bread, and that henceforth they will have black bread; and they say they will cheerfully stand for that provided they are able to push the Germans out of France.

I believe that federal legislation is absolutely needed in order to prevent this tremendous waste. One pound of natural bread contains more mineral salt, more iron, more lime, more potash, than one pound of meat; but white bread contains hardly any of these things, because they are nearly all extracted; all of them that are found in the bread now in use are equivalent to only one-third of a pound of meat, or one-third of the food value that there should be. One pound of whole wheat bread contains 85 grams of gluten, which, as you know, is the vital part of the wheat. Gluten is the part that is of value; the rest is nothing but starch. One pound of whole wheat bread contains, as I say, 85 grams of gluten. One pound of white bread as we have it to-day contains only 40 grams, less than half, and the other ingredients in proportion, or some of them in lesser proportion.

The great advantage of the Hungarian milling—of the separation of all that is alive in wheat from all that is dead—is that white flour keeps well because it is dead, because there are no more ferments in it—nothing to cause fermentation, for you cannot have fermentation without ferments; they are carefully taken out. Then speculation comes in, and speculation is really the curse of the whole business. People can buy this dead flour, hoard it up in stores or in warehouses, keep it there for months, nay, years, if they like—until they get a better price. They know it cannot deteriorate; it is dead; it was dead before it was put there. Everything alive in it, everything that was good in it, has been taken out. Gluten, for instance, and fatty substances are likely to make the flour turn sour. It is only the starch that we get out of the wheat at present. But you can get starch out of potatoes, out of corn, out of rice, out of almost any vegetable. If it is only starch that is wanted, why use wheat, that admirable kernel which has been provided by the Creator with every ingredient necessary for the nourishment of our bodies? These ingredients have been stolen before the wheat reaches us, and all that remains is a mass of starch in one's stomach, with none of the ferments to make it easily digestible and none of the nutritive mineral salts to sustain life. All that the starch contains—I want to give it credit for what it does contain—is what are called calories; that is to say, the starch gives a certain amount of heat—a great deal of heat, if you like. Under the German kultur, that is how prisoners are fed in Germany: it is claimed that if they have so many calories they have enough to sustain life. Starch simply acts as coal does in a locomotive: it keeps the boiler hot; it keeps the locomotive going. But there is nothing in it for repairs; there is no oil there for the machinery. A locomotive would not run very long if coal alone were fed to it and both the oil and the necessary daily repairs were omitted altogether.

Wheat, as I said before, is one of the most admirable gifts of the Creator. Thousands of years before Christ wheat was in use. It has been found in the hands of mummies buried in Egypt thousands of years before the Christian era. As showing the vitality of the germ, that wheat has been planted and has grown, with practically no difference from the wheat now grown in Egypt. There has been no change in 4,000 years. According to the Bible Abraham said, "Take three measures of meal, put them in the cinders; build the fire over it." What is it that the surveyors in the woods eat but bread made under the camp fire? In 4,000 years no change has come; only in the old days they had much better wheat, because it had not been robbed of its ferments; but now we have only this dephosphated flour which contains very little nutriment.

So the use of wheat is not new. Even Aristotle preached against the use of white bread, saying that it was impossible to have good bread without a certain admixture of bran. All the countries of the world use bread of some kind. In Lapland, for instance, they take the second bark of the pine tree, grind it up and make a sort of bread which is necessary to accompany the oily fish and the oils that they consume. In Siberia—I am speaking of northern Siberia, because, as we all know, in southern Siberia there is good wheat, splendid wheat, very much like that of our own Northwest; but in northern Siberia the small twigs of pine trees are ground to a flour and made into bread. Its nutritive value cannot be great, but still it is necessary to be used with the meat that is eaten by those people. In Iceland, where there is hardly any vegetation except moss, moss is turned into flour, from which bread is made. Spain and Italy make excellent bread and cakes out of chestnuts. Chestnut flour is much used and a very good flour it is. In India, Arabia, Egypt, Asia Minor, bread is made out of sargho and durian. The product makes a delicious bread which is used by the caravans crossing the desert and is enjoyed immensely. In the sterile parts of Russia, China, and the Orient, buckwheat and rye are used for bread. In the Indian archipelago the leaves of sago are used. Even in darkest Africa Stanley found that the negroes had a sort of bread made from the root of manioc, out of which root we obtain the familiar tapioca; the poison was extracted from this root and it was then ground up. We all know that in the Tropics the well-known banana is used by millions of people; it is their bread. In the South Seas the core of the bread-tree produces a beautiful white paste, which when heated is equal to the finest fresh hot bread that you can eat. So, you see, the use of bread has been universal from the beginning of the world.

The bakers are sinners in a certain respect, because when asked for whole wheat bread they do not want to give it. In the first place, it would be very difficult for them to procure it. They possess only white flour, which has been impoverished of all the valuable ingredients of wheat; so they buy a little bran, mix it with the flour, not putting in the other things—the fats, oils, salts, minerals, cellulose, or even the germ of the wheat, which is only one and one-half per cent, and thus make a combination. They do this because there is not as much money in the making of bread with whole wheat flour.

All the academies of medicine the world over hold that the decadence of civilized races is due to the use of white bread, because it is deprived of all the valuable ingredients of the wheat. This is not simply a statement of my own; you will find it made repeatedly ever since Hungarian milling came into use, and, as pointing directly to it, the decadence of the civilized races synchronizes exactly with the appearance of white bread. We all know that the decadence of the people in England when this war started was so great that the military regulations had to be changed more than once in order that many men might be admitted into the ranks of the army.

The nature of the flour depends upon the mode of grinding; it is very simple, and it would not take the Government more than five minutes to make a law to correct this if they wanted to do it. I know they are full of good intentions, and I hope they will take up this matter.

The large mills of this country all produce what is called Hungarian flour; that is, by roller milling. This simply means that the wheat is put between rollers and crushed; that it is again put between rollers and crushed, and crushed again, until all the good of the wheat, including the bran and the germ, is taken out. What is left, a dead powder containing only 62 per cent of the wheat, is sold to the public, and our bread is made out of this. All the other elements of the wheat are not lost, far from it; they are used for many purposes. By the old-fashioned process of milling between millstones—and there are now steel grinders which are made to imitate the stones very well—the whole of the wheat was ground up, the starch being mixed with the other substances in the kernels, which Providence put there because they were necessary, and which should have been left there until the wheat was eaten. Wheat is unrivalled as a complete food; the substances in it cannot be found elsewhere. Why do the breeders of fine cattle always insist upon having the refuse of the mill which uses rollers, even if they have to pay a double price for it, while they pay only a half price for the refuse from the mill where the wheat is ground by millstones? The reason is that the millstone mills produce good flour but very poor bran, and the human being gets what is good, whereas in the roller mills the human being gets the poorest part of the wheat and the hogs get the best of it.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: The rollers do not separate it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If the honourable gentleman would like to make a speech afterwards, he may.

This reform has been advocated for the last fifty years, and with considerable success in some countries; but it must be remembered that when large interests are at stake it is very difficult to bring about a change. There is too much money now invested in the milling business to make a change easy; but under the existing circumstances due to the war I suppose the Government will not hesitate to do what is in the public interest. In the milling of wheat during the last fifty years everything has been sacrificed to the whiteness of the flour; the nutritiveness has been taken out of it; but, now that our national resources are menaced, every Canadian home should be supplied with good whole wheat bread. Fifty years ago Liebig, who was a very great man and knew food values, said that if white bread was tolerated as a basis of food, we would have a neuropathic and alcoholic people;—and if there are any temperance gentlemen in this House, I repeat this to them.

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Because, a person's stomach being perfectly satisfied with whole wheat bread with everything that our Maker put into it to make it a satisfying food, there is no craving for murderous stimulants. I appeal to those who take a friendly glass now and then. When do you take your cocktail—before or after your meal? It is when one's stomach is out of order, when one feels out of sorts, that he thinks a little brandy or Scotch whisky might do him some good. But when one has taken wholesome food he does not need a murderous stimulant.

Time forbids that I should dilate upon this subject. I could make a long speech upon it. The poorness of bread causes the abuse of meat, and also the abuse of alcohol. I happen to be a stockholder in a large milling company, and I know that in proposing this resolution I am not making myself popular with the stockholders, the directors, or the managers of that company. But we are not here to look after our interests; we are here for the purpose of saying what is good for the country; here we stand on a pedestal of independence, we have no electors who have mills, and we can say what we believe to be right.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Why did you not speak before?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I spoke as soon as I knew the facts of the case. The advocates of the millers say, "What does it matter if the hogs get the best of the wheat? Don't you eat the hogs anyway? You get it all back." That is a roundabout way of getting it back. I think that the poor man should get bread made of the whole wheat.

Dephosphated flour has lowered the average term of life in America to thirty-nine years—and I defy any one to contradict that statement; and the waste after forty years of age, owing to the use of white bread, has been enormous. One who preaches a new doctrine is treated as a visionary, but these figures are borne out by statistics. Diseases of all kinds have been caused by the demineralization of the wheat, the taking out of the mineral salts. Tuberculosis and other diseases have increased in spite of the progress of hygiene. If I had time to read this book—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, do not do that.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If you look at a kernel of wheat with a microscope, what do you find? You find a thick fibrous outer envelope which constitutes fifteen per cent of the whole wheat; that is bran. Inside of that, looking carefully, what do you see? You see three inner membranes. One is called the episperm, which contains fats, oils, minerals, and ferments. These are called the vital layers of the wheat, the very best part of it. Then, there is the endosperm, which contains 80 per cent of the starch and gluten. In white bread the gluten is carefully left out, because it is yellow and would impair the whiteness of the flour. Then, there is the germ, which is only one and a half per cent of the kernel. That is the richest part, but that also is taken out, by one turn of the roller.

Now, as to the chemical composition. Wheat is composed, first of all, of starch, which constitutes 60 per cent of it; albuminoids, 16 per cent; fat, 2 per cent; mineral matters, 2 per cent; cellulose, 2 per cent; and water, 18 per cent; making a total of 100 per cent. Starch generates heat, just like coal in a locomotive. The albuminoids are valuable, like the casein in milk, white of egg, or cheese, the fibrin in meat, and so on. These are called the living vegetable flesh of the wheat, a very small proportion of which is left in bread to-day. The starch in the kernel of wheat produces more heat than the starch of the very best meat. White flour is devoid of phosphates, which children need for the building up of a large, strong skeleton, and they cannot get it in white bread. Therefore, if the Government made the change proposed, they would be helping not only the men of the country but the children as well. Then, there are the soluble ferments, which help digestion, and change the starchy material first into glucose and then into dextrine. Lastly, comes the cellulose, which really means the bran, as I have stated. It has no nutritive value, but it has great alimentary value, because it mechanically separates all the starchy matter. Small particles of the starch are distributed throughout the mass, which, if it were not for the cellulose, would be just like putty. The Creator has put this cellulose into the wheat so that the juices can penetrate the starchy mass and assist in digesting it. Cellulose acts just like a policeman on the street of a large city: it activates the circulation; if there are any groups standing around the corners of the human body, the cellulose drives them out. I need not tell you that not a particle of cellulose is left in the flour that we use to-day. It comes with the inner envelope and those three fatty and meaty layers. There is also a part of the tegument, or rather tegmen—a part of the outside—which is useful and is conducive to health.

There are two varieties of bread: bread made with millstones, and bread made with rollers. When a farmer brings two bushels of wheat to be milled by the millstone process, he goes back with 100 pounds of flour. How many pounds does he take back when it is milled by the roller process? The farmer comes with one bushel of wheat, 60 pounds, to the mill. Does he go back with 60 pounds of flour? No. Does he go back with 45 pounds of flour? No. Does he go back with 40 pounds of flour? No; he goes back with 37½ pounds. Where has the 22½ pounds gone to? The miller keeps that, and that is the most valuable part of the wheat.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: May I ask the honourable gentleman if the mills that he is interested in only get 37½ pounds of flour to the bushel?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Perhaps my honourable friend from Portage la Prairie will tell us how many pounds he gave during his experience?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Forty-three pounds.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Out of 60?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: He kept 17 pounds for himself.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I gave 43 pounds of flour; bran and shorts are different.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They are the best part of it. Well, we will compromise and call it 40 pounds. I said 37½ pounds and my honourable friend said 43.

White flour contains, first, starch, which is absolutely dead; that is, after it has left the mill of my honourable friend from Portage la Prairie. Second, it contains only half the gluten; third, almost no mineral salts; fourth, still less fat; fifth, no ferment; sixth, no cellulose. Who has all these? The millers have, and they are the very best part of the wheat. Here is an example: Some 25 years ago a celebrated scientist in France, Magendie, made a test of the merits of whole wheat bread and bread as we have it to-day. He tried it on dogs. He took all the dogs from the same pack. The dogs were fed on bread and water, and those which were fed on the bread made as it is to-day lived only from 40 to 50 days, while the other dogs, eating whole wheat bread, continued to live, and at the end of the test were perfectly well and healthy animals. Dr. Maistrion made a similar test on a human being and found that 58 per cent of the bread made as we have it to-day was left undigested in a man's stomach, while the whole wheat bread only left 5 per cent undigested. Those admirable proportions in the kernel of the wheat are all destroyed by roller milling. All that the Government would have to do to correct this would be to prohibit the use of rollers and reinstate the millstone, or at least not allow so much rolling, because it is the constant bolting that gives the fineness to the flour, resulting in the production of a useless starchy powder.

I know that the Government would have trouble in carrying out this proposal, because when error is backed by strong financial interests its initial velocity increases in geometrical proportion. The millers have found it easy to keep this flour because there is no danger of its getting spoiled; the speculator also finds it a good thing to handle, because there is no danger of fermentation, the ferments having been taken out of it. The gluten, which is a highly perishable nutriment, is out also. Fats easily become rancid, and therefore the millers want to take them out. But the dead flour keeps well, especially under the conditions that I have mentioned; and I would like to call the attention of the House to the ingredients that are added in order to kill any perishable substances, which means living substances, that perchance have escaped the murderous rollers. For instance, they put in alum, talcum, boric acid, salicylic acid, gypsum, and other ingredients to kill anything that may be alive in the flour.

Gluten is of course the most valuable ingredient of the wheat. I have said it does not go into the flour, but it goes to make macaroni. Compare the small quantity of macaroni that will provide a satisfying meal with the huge piece of bread that would give you the same nutriment. In the macaroni the gluten which has been taken from the wheat brings the miller a good price, macaroni being much dearer than bread.

Then, look at all the catchy advertisements in the papers. Those advertisements are perfectly true. Grape-nuts, for instance, you see advertised everywhere. That is an excellent food, containing the very best of the wheat. There is where the miller makes his money. The farmer does not get the shorts and the other valuable elements of the wheat; the miller gets them and sells them to his other customers. Force is another good food. Then there is wheat flakes; there is Renaux flour, very much used in France; there is Graham flour; Bledine; Jacquemaire; and Nestle's Food. Nothing is better than Nestle's Food, but it costs from 30 to 40 cents a pound in ordinary times. Then there is Mellin's Food. Where do you find all these good foods? You find them on the shelves in the grocery stores; you do not find them in the cart of the baker. He goes his rounds with that stuff which is fit for neither man nor beast.

The roller millers have many sources of revenue, as I have shown you; but the millstone has only two: good flour and poor bran.

The decrease in height of people in England is due to white bread and synchronizes with its appearance.

While I am talking about bakers I may just as well give them away entirely. They have another trick. The dough, all saturated with water, is put into the oven. This is altogether too hot, and immediately a beautiful golden crust forms around the lump of dough and you would think from its appearance you had a lovely loaf of bread. But what have you? That crust having been put on too quickly, the dough has not had time to dry, and you have 40 per cent of water when you should have only 22 per cent, which you would have had if the bread had been properly baked. There is 18 per cent clear profit for the baker.

There is another point. When the flour is so poor in gluten that they cannot possibly use it, the bakers say, "We must alter that." So they add bean flour to the wheat flour, because bean flour contains a good proportion of gluten, but the colour is gone. Resort is therefore had to the use of gypsum, which is nothing but ground stone. This is put in and it makes the flour white and heavy; so it is profitable in both respects.

As I said before, the Hungarian milling is good for the fattening of hogs; the hogs get the best, to the detriment of human beings. This Hungarian method of milling is justified in Hungary, because Hungarian wheat is richer in gluten than the wheat of any other country. The proportion of gluten in Hungarian wheat is sometimes as high as 22 per cent. The most that our wheat ever has had is 16 per cent. Therefore the Hungarians could afford to extract some of the gluten and would still have enough left to make their bread wholesome.

The price of peace is the loaf of bread. Bread is the price of internal peace in Europe, and the size of the loaf will now depend absolutely on what can be done from the North American continent. The Allies, in order to provide the minimum bread ration, will require more than 500,000,000 bushels of wheat at the next harvest. With the lower classes bread is the fetish food, and without the loaf—even assuming that you give them a dietetic sufficiency of something else—you could not preserve public tranquility. Bread is the price of peace.

May I make a slight digression? I would refer you to what took place in Petrograd a few weeks ago, when the people were crying for bread. I have lately met a friend who went to Russia to deliver forty locomotives made in Kingston, Ontario. They were landed at Vladivostok but at that point the railroad, the bridges, etc., were not strong enough to carry heavy locomotives, and they had to be taken to another place, to Harbin, where the three countries, Korea, China, and Russia, meet. He spent six months there putting up these locomotives, and from there he went on to Petrograd. It took him eight days to go that distance. At every station along the way peasants came to offer food of every kind, but when he got to Petrograd there was little food to be had at any price, because all the railways of Russia were busy hauling men and munitions. An improvident Government had forgotten the first essential, bread. If there had been bread, Czar Nicholas would probably be on his throne to-day. That was the mistake he made—not to have provided bread for the people. This is similar to the case of the French queen, Marie Antoinette. When the French revolution began she asked, "What is the matter? What are the people crying for?" "Your majesty, they want bread." "Give them some," she said. "We have none," was the answer. "Then give them cake," she said.

Bread is the natural necessity for the peace of the country. In addition to the 500,000,000 bushels of wheat needed, the Allies will require from 250,000,000 to 350,000,000 bushels of other cereals. Therefore we have the problem of furnishing from 800,000,000 to 1,000,000,000 bushels of grain. In France alone the wheat crop is down to 55 per cent, creating a deficiency of 150,000,000 bushels. All the supplies of Russia, Bulgaria and Rumania are absolutely cut off. Those of Australia and India are also in effect cut off, because the carriage is three times the distance across the Atlantic; the tonnage required is trebled and the danger just about doubled. The result is that the Allies in Europe have been unable during the last three months to get any consequential amount of grain from those directions. Whether that lane will be re-opened is a matter of some doubt. Some measures are being taken to re-open it, and it may be hoped that during the next year some food supplies may be obtained from Australia and India by the use of sailing ships and by transhipping at some point like Buenos Aires or Panama.

In supplying the great vacuum of food across the water, public tranquility in this country must not be disturbed. Therefore, honourable gentlemen, in conclusion, I say that the State should not permit the handling of wheat, in this time of war, to be a business in the hands of schemers. The State should punish all those who lay an unholy and sacrilegious hand on the staff of life. If the wheel of hygienic progress cannot turn without crushing some one, let the speculator perish, but may the great mass of the people be saved!

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I desired a moment ago to ask a question, but my honourable friend did not give me the opportunity. The speech to which we have just listened is certainly a most interesting one and illustrates the variety of subjects which are dealt with in this House. I am willing to accept the statements which have been made, but many of them are so startling that I shall be almost afraid to eat a piece of ordinary bread. The question I desire to ask is this: where are the authorities, the books, in which we can verify the statements which the honourable gentleman has made regarding bread? If those statements go out to the public and cannot be controverted, there may be a general desire to enter the milling industry, and that would be unfortunate, because, according to the statements of my honourable friend, the millers are stealing the best part of the wheat. I wish to congratulate the honourable gentleman on the speech which he has taken in collecting the information, and I would ask him who are the authorities to whom we can refer to ascertain if all his startling statements are correct?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) permit me to ask another question?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I shall be glad to answer the questions, one at a time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would my honourable friend object to saying how long he has been using this whole wheat bread himself?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I will answer one question at a time. As to the authority, I have no less authority than the book published by direction of the Hon. Joseph Ed. Caron, Minister of Agriculture of the province of Quebec. Bulletin No. 24 is entitled, "The Great Fallacy of White Bread," by Aurele Nadeau. If the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Choquette) would take the necessary time, as I have done, he would see on the very first page of the book quotations from Professor Arm. Gautier, in "L'Alimentation;" Professor Maurice Letulle, in the preface of "Pain Naturel;" Professor Tarnier, in "Le Pain;" and Dr. Monteuuis, in "Pain Naturel." I am very glad that my honourable friend has given me the opportunity of saying something more on the subject. In the book is a model equipment of flat grinding mill-bakeries. Eleven hundred pounds of this kind of bread can be made every day, and for the production of that quantity it would only be necessary to have a five horse-power gasolene motor. I would recommend that the members of this House read this book, prepared under Government authority, and giving the results of various tests that have been made. I may say I have taken several hours to study this question, and I have tried to give you the benefit of it all in forty minutes; but if you desired it I could continue and give you further information.

In answer to the question by the honourable leader of the Government, I may say that I never could get any satisfaction out of white bread; I never liked it—I suppose because it is not good. I did not know that before, but my stomach must have been wiser than my judgment.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am personally acquainted with Dr. Nadeau, who wrote the book in question; also with Dr. Rousseau. They are two gentlemen of very high reputation. I do not think, however, that the book is authority for all the statements which have been made by the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: There is nothing more urgently needed to-day than thrift, and everything possible should be done to increase production. As far as wheat is concerned, we cannot increase our resources, because the crop is now planted, and we must make the most of the yield. Whether I agree entirely with the statements made by my honourable friend or not I am not disposed to say at the present time. I would like to move the adjournment of this debate, because there is in his speech much food for serious thought, and we may later on be forced to adopt some such measure as the honourable gentleman has proposed to-day. There are many points to be considered in connection with this question. Some have been brought out in the course of the discussion, but there may be others that can be brought out only by careful study and in the light of further information. I would therefore move the adjournment of the debate until Thursday next.

The debate was adjourned.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

STAFF OF THE SENATE.

PROPOSED PROMOTION AND APPOINTMENT.

The Hon. the SPEAKER laid on the Table a communication from the Clerk of the Senate reporting a vacancy on the staff of the Senate in subdivision B of the First Division, occasioned by the death of Mr. Byron R. Nicholson, Clerk of English Journals, and recommending that the duties of Clerk of English Journals be assigned to Mr. C. H. Jones in addition to his duties as Clerk of Minutes, and that he be promoted from subdivision A of the Second Division to subdivision B of the First Division, such promotion to take effect from the first day of June next.

The Hon. the SPEAKER laid on the Table a communication from the Clerk of the Senate reporting a vacancy on the staff of the Senate in consequence of the death of Mr. William Chapman, Translator of Debates, and recommended that Mr. Jules Fournier be appointed French Translator in the Senate.

THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

PROPOSED APPOINTMENT.

The Hon. the SPEAKER laid on the Table a communication from the Joint Librarians forwarding a certificate from the Civil Service Commissioners in favour of Herbert Charles Stock, authorizing his appointment as a messenger at an initial salary of $800 per annum.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Power, the above communications were referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

CLAIMS OF BRITISH COLUMBIAN SEALERS.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

On the inquiry:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK:

That he will call the attention of the Government to a return made to an Order of the House of Commons of the 7th February, 1916, for a copy of all correspondence and reports on the claims of sealers of British Columbia under the last treaty with the American Republic.

And will inquire what amount of money has been paid to the Government under the terms of the treaty?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understood my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) to suggest that this should be made a motion for papers. Would it not be well to put it in that form and place it among the Orders of the Day as an adjourned debate?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The papers would be placed on the Table of the Commons. Does my honourable friend wish to make it a motion for papers?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Yes, and placed among the Orders of the Day for a debate at a later date, say Tuesday next. With the Commons. Does my honourable friend wish to make it a motion for papers?

The motion was agreed to as a motion for papers.

TERRITORIAL DEFENCE OF QUEBEC.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would ask the honourable leader of the Government if he will be kind enough to inquire what has become of an Address that was agreed to on May 22 for a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Government or its ministers and Major-General F. L. Lessard. The document is a very short one. I suppose it may be expected at the next sitting of the House. I should be glad to have it before the prorogation of Parliament.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill X, an Act respecting a certain patent of The Sharp Rotary Ash Receiver Company, Incorporated.—Hon Mr. McHugh.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Explain the Bill.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: The explanation of the Bill is given in the Bill itself. It is an application to this House for the passing of an Act giving the Commissioner of Patents power to revive the patent. This is the only way in which, under the Canadian law, any person who has lost his right to a patent can come into possession of it again.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Why?

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: There is a default in the payment of the fee. It was paid in the first place for a period of six years. In Canada the patent is generally paid for in three instalments; the fee for a patent for 18 years is $60—$20 for the first six years, $20 for the next six, and so on. When the patent was taken out the fee was paid for the first six years, but at the end of that time it was allowed to lapse, the second payment was not made in time and consequently the patent expired. In England such a thing would not happen. A fine would be imposed by the Commissioner of Patents upon the holder of the patent and he could revive it.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Does the honourable gentleman know why the second payment was not made in time?

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: I think honourable gentlemen are familiar with the procedure which has been followed for some years past. Bills of this kind have been sent to a committee, and evidence has been furnished to the committee by the applicant showing the reasons why the patent was allowed to lapse. If the reasons have not been satisfactory the committee has reported against the Bill; if they have been satisfactory, the report has been in favour of having the patent revived. If this Bill goes to the committee, the solicitor who will appear for the applicant will no doubt be in a much better position than I am to explain why the payment of the fee was not made in time. Sometimes it is because of an oversight, sometimes it is through the fault of an agent or a clerk. I see that this patent was held by a person in the state of New York. The laws of the United States are very different from those of Canada, and the patentee might not know that he was losing his rights in Canada. In the United States all patents are granted for the full term of 17 years and the fee is paid at once. This patent being held by an American, he may not have been familiar with the Canadian law, and may have overlooked the fact that he had to attend to the payment of the fee. However, that will be a matter for the committee to deal with. All the necessary explanations have to be given there, very often under oath, and the solicitor for the petitioner will appear before the committee.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Can the honourable gentleman tell us the date when the second payment became due?

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: The Bill tells that; it became due on March 15, 1916, and the application for the Bill was made on February 17, 1917; so it was lapsed about eleven months. But remember that in these Bills there is always a saving clause to protect any person who has in the meantime commenced the manufacture of the article covered by the patent, and the original patentee gets no rights against him when the patent is revived.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Before the honourable gentleman takes his seat, I would like to ask him if any advantage was taken of the patent during the first six years.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: I cannot tell that; but it must have been used, because, under the Canadian law, it would have lapsed at the end of two years if the manufacture had not been begun, and I see that this patent was in effect for six years.

Bill A 2, an Act respecting the Empire Life Insurance Company of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Nicholls.

Bill B 2, an Act respecting a patent of James B. King and others.—Hon. Mr. Nicholls.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: I would like to hear an explanation of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: In moving the second reading of this Bill I was acting for the Hon. Mr. Nicholls, who is not able to be here. He did not inform me of the nature of the Bill, but I understand it is the same as the other one.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: It will go before the committee and we shall have an explanation there.

CONSERVATION OF CANADIAN TRADE.

MOTION FOR A COMMITTEE.

Hon. FREDERIC NICHOLLS rose to move the following resolution:

Considering that after the war trade and commerce will be for a time disorganized and that new conditions will have to be met, and considering that, in addition to conserving our present trade in natural and manufactured products, efforts must be made to increase Canadian trade in foreign markets, having particular reference to the markets of those countries with which we are at present allied;

Be it resolved:

That, in the opinion of this honourable House, it is expedient to appoint a Committee to inquire into and report upon the best method or methods of conserving and increasing our domestic and overseas trade, to the end that our present prosperity may not unduly suffer when the stimulus resulting from orders for munitions and other war supplies is removed.

Hon Mr. POWER: I rise to a question of order. We have a rule which forbids the moving of any motion which is prefaced by a preamble. This resolution is prefaced by a preamble and is consequently out of order.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: If the honourable gentleman who has just spoken had given me the opportunity, I was going to say that owing to my inexperience in this House I had inadvertently introduced what may be classified as a preamble, and I desire to ask the kind permission of this honourable House to withdraw that part of my resolution.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Certainly; that is perfectly correct.

The preamble to the resolution having been, by leave, withdrawn,

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS moved:

That, in the opinion of this honourable House, it is expedient to appoint a Committee to inquire into and report upon the best method or methods of conserving and increasing our domestic and overseas trade, to the end that our present prosperity may not unduly suffer when the stimulus resulting from orders for munitions and other war supplies is removed; and that Committee consist of Hon. Messrs. Beaubien, Edwards, McLennan, Dandurand, Gillmor, and the mover.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, on rising to address this House for the first time I bespeak your indulgence. The subject of the resolution is of the utmost importance, and I approach it with diffidence; but my endeavour will be to place before you such facts as I hope may impress you with the advisability of the appointment of a committee as suggested by the resolution. The subject is also one which could be dealt with at great length, and many arguments could be cited in favour of the plan suggested, but if I err it shall be on the side of brevity.

Presently this country is, notwithstanding the war, but rather as a result of the war, experiencing a period of great prosperity. Prior to the commencement of the war Canada borrowed about three hundred million dollars each year from Great Britain, partly to pay interest on debts already contracted, and partly to develop our resources and for industrial investments. When the tocsin of war first sounded this source of supply was shut off immediately. For a short period trade and finance were severely disorganized, but the recovery was not long delayed, and our recent trade returns—and figures in the final analysis are what count—almost surpass belief. Quoting from the recent Budget speech of the honourable the Minister of Finance, I may point out that during the first year of the war the revenue from all sources was about $130,000,000; it rose during the second year to $170,000,000; but for the year ended the 31st March last the revenue increased to $232,000,000. Our total war outlay since the beginning of hostilities is over $600,000,000, and is constantly increasing, and this expenditure has been met partly from revenue and partly from the proceeds of domestic loans, which have aggregated $350,000,000; and in addition our chartered banks have loaned to the Imperial Treasury over $150,000,000 to meet its commitments for munitions and supplies purchased in Canada.

It should, however, be remembered that a very large proportion of our prosperity is the result of extraordinary orders for war materials and supplies, amounting to vast sums, some estimate of which may be realized when I cite the fact that orders received by the Imperial Munitions Board alone amount at this time, in round figures, to about one billion dollars, and that of this sum about six hundred million dollars has already been disbursed to manufacturers in payment for munitions, and that engaged in this manufacture, directly and indirectly, there are over 250,000 workers. Further vast sums have also been paid out in the purchase of grain and other farm products, machinery, clothing, woollens, and an infinite variety of Canadian natural and manufactured products. It is because of this that my resolution draws attention to the absolute necessity of some action being taken to minimize, if at all possible, the sad check this country will receive when this source of income fails us.

After the war ceases there will certainly be a period of disorganization, when the balance of trade, which for some time past has flowed steadily in our favour, will commence to recede. The countries now at war, however, particularly those that have been devastated in Europe, will require to expend immense sums in reconstruction, and will become customers of those countries which are most ready to supply the requirements promptly and at a reasonable price. In this country we have had little experience in either looking for or catering to an export trade, and if we desire to share in the volume of business that will be offering overseas we can make our preparations none too soon.

When in Edinburgh during his recent visit to Great Britian, Sir Robert Borden stated that:

There was reason to believe Germany had before the war more thorough knowledge of the resources and development of the Dominion than could be found in the United Kingdom.

And again at Manchester Sir Robert Borden said:

It is believed that the industries of Germany will be supported and developed in future by a more thorough and powerful State organization than ever known.

Admitting that Germany in the past has built up her vast foreign trade largely through the help of the State, and admitting, as intimated by Sir Robert Borden, that state aid will be extended at even greater lengths after the conclusion of the war, it behooves us to consider whether we in Canada will leave to the individual the development of the foreign trade that might naturally accrue to Canada, or whether the Government of this country will, in some form, undertake to assist in the development.

Alexander Behr, vice-president of the Russian Chamber of Commerce, Moscow, in an article in the Journal of the Russian-American Chamber of Commerce, makes the claim that:

Germany's great increase in foreign trade up to the time of the war was due, more than to any other factor, to; first, the co-operation between her business men and her Government; and, second, the foresight and liberal methods of her bankers. Her banking facilities were shaped to suit conditions abroad, and her bankers came into direct and close contact with the people whose trade was sought. Credit conditions were studied at close quarters, and business was done through the banks.

Next to intelligent assistance from the state, it is obvious that in foreign trade the question of credit is the most important item, and in Canada our banking system does not tend to encourage the granting of credit for foreign exports other than on bills of exchange drawn against actual shipments, or commodities in elevators or warehouses. It is no criticism of the banks to draw attention to the fact that provision has not been made for a specific department for granting credits against exports of manufactured goods, for until now the necessity has not been urgent, and our manufactures had not prior to the war developed to the extent that they were in a position to cater to the world's markets.

Since the war, as I have pointed out, we have manufactured and shipped upwards of six hundred million dollars' worth of munitions alone, and I speak with knowledge when I say that the production of munitions is the most intricate, the most delicate, and the most precise class of manufacture that could be undertaken. It was an entirely new industry to Canada, and it is a credit to Canadian industry that in such a short time so many existing factories were reorganized and so many new ones established that have turned out such an immense quantity of munitions, and thereby brought to Canada so large a sum as six hundred million dollars for munitions alone. If the manufacturers, when the need arose, were able to accomplish such results, I take it that they would be equally resourceful in manufacturing many other lines of goods for export that will be required by the European countries, we hope at no late date; but in order to bring this about some systematic method of state aid will have to be adopted.

That assistance in some form is necessary is not to be wondered at when we consider that even in Great Britain they have felt the necessity of grappling with the same problem. It has been admitted that the German national system of manufacturing for export, and the system of banking facilities for export trade, were far in advance of those which obtained in Great Britain, and having these facts in view the British Government appointed a committee known as "The Committee on the Financial Facilities for Trade." A perusal of their report to the British Board of Trade is most illuminating. It is too voluminous to quote in extenso, but I bespeak your indulgence in quoting one or two of the salient clauses, one of which says:

We recognize that the British manufacturers may be frequently in want of finance of a kind which a British joint stock bank with liabilities could not prudently provide, whereas the German banks in particular seem to be able to afford special assistance at the inception of undertakings of the most varied description, and to have laid themselves out for stimulating and promoting and for carrying them through to completion. We conclude therefore that there is ample room for an institution which, while not interfering unduly with the ordinary business done by British joint-stock banks, by colonial banks, and by British foreign banks and banking houses, shall be able to assist British interests in a manner that is not possible under existing conditions.

The report further recommended that the main features of the Trade Bank should be as follows:

It should not accept deposits at call or at notice.

It should open only current accounts for parties who propose to make use of the overseas facilities which it would afford.

It should have a foreign exchange department where special facilities might be afforded for dealing in bills in foreign currency.

It should open a credit department for issuing of credits to parties at home and abroad.

It should inaugurate an information bureau.

Where desirable it should co-operate with the merchant or manufacturer, and possibly accept risks upon joint account.

It should become a centre for syndicate operations, availing itself of the special knowledge which it will possess through its information bureau.

It should receive Government assistance.

This report was not only seriously, but most favourably received by the Government, and, really at their suggestion, a British Export Bank, to be known as the British Trade Corporation, was promoted, and I have just received from Sir Albert Stanley, of the British Board of Trade, which is a department of the Government, a copy of the petition of the promoters, the deed of settlement, and the royal charter of incorporation. The petition of the incorporators, all men of the very highest standing in Great Britain, so fully sets forth the objects to be obtained that I make no apology for drawing it to the attention of this honourable House:

The humble petition of the Right Hon. Alexander Baron Faringdon, the Right Hon. Frederick Huth Jackson, Arthur Balfour, Frank Dudley Docker, C.B., William Henry Neville Goschen, John Henry Brunel Noble, and Sir James Hope Simpson, sheweth as follows:

Whereas a committee was appointed at the instance of Your Majesty's Board of Trade to consider the best means of meeting the needs of British firms after the war as regards financial facilities for trade and more particularly with reference to the financing of large overseas contracts;

And whereas the said committee issued a report whereby they recommended the establishment of an institution with the following primary objects:

(a) To afford advice and financial assistance to British commercial and industrial undertakings from their inception and generally to further the development of British trade, industry and commerce.

(b) To make advances for the enlargement of works and the extension of plant and for the amalgamation and co-ordination of works and businesses with a view to effecting economies in the cost of production.

(c) To render financial assistance in connection with transactions involving long periods of credit.

(d) To assist in obtaining orders from abroad for British manufacturers and traders, and to grant financial facilities for the execution of such orders, especially when such orders are intended to be executed in the United Kingdom.

(e) To undertake credit operations and to draw and accept bills.

(f) To acquaint themselves with the conditions of trade and with the business requirements of all countries of the world, and to enter into banking agency arrangements in such countries with colonial or British foreign banks, or where necessary to open up branches and agencies in such countries.

(g) To establish, equip and maintain information bureaus in close touch with the Department of Commercial Intelligence of the Board of Trade for furnishing British merchants or manufacturers and the business community generally with reliable data and information upon openings for trade, new contracts, state and other loan and issue proposals, and generally upon all matters relating to foreign trade and business, and to undertake the examination of industrial projects.

(h) To act as an agent for carrying through overseas commercial and financial transactions in which Your Majesty's Government may be interested and to receive official recognition and assistance.

(j) To undertake trading operations and business on their own account or jointly with others either through the medium of syndicates or otherwise.

This petition was duly acted upon, and a royal charter granted, and I quote from the royal charter that portion of it which sets forth the powers granted under the act of incorporation:

(a) To act as agents for any Governments or authorities, or for any bankers, manufacturers, shippers and others, and to carry on agency business of any description, including the power to act as attorneys and to give discharges and receipts.

(b) To carry on business as contractors, merchants or traders on their own account.

(c) To promote or finance or to assist in the promotion or financing of businesses and undertakings of any description, and to develop and prove the same, either through the instrumentality of syndicates or otherwise, and to act as an issuing house.

(d) To enter into any partnership or other arrangements for sharing profits or on joint account.

(e) To acquire and hold or dispose of any shares, stock, bonds, obligations, debentures, debenture stock, scrip or other securities or interest of any companies, trusts, or corporations, or of any governments, states, provinces, municipalities or other authorities.

(f) To acquire and hold or dispose of any interest in any railways, tramways, ships, canals, docks, harbours, armament works, shipbuilding establishments, irrigation works, electrical works, gas works, water works, and in addition any carrying, transporting, trading, industrial, agricultural, financial, or manufacturing works, concerns, or business of any description, and to carry on the same.

(g) To acquire and hold any interest in and to develop the resources of, and turn to account, deal with, pledge, and dispose of any territories, forests, mineral fields or other lands, possessions, buildings or property, real or personal, immovable or movable, in any part of the world, including lands, buildings, and other hereditaments in the British Isles, notwithstanding the provisions of any statutes of mortmain or any other statutes or laws to the contrary.

(h) To undertake and execute any trusts, and to act as executors, administrators, receivers and treasurers, and to give any guarantees.

(j) To obtain, work or dispose of any concessions, charters, acts of parliament, or other legislative rights, monopolies, licenses, patents, copyrights, or other privileges or advantages.

(k) To establish and maintain information and investigation bureaux, and to collect statistics, returns, particulars and information likely to prove useful for the consideration of business and financial propositions, and to undertake experimental and research work.

(l) On behalf of any governments, authorities or corporations, to keep any registers relating to any stocks, shares, debentures, debenture stock, or securities, and to undertake any duties in relation to the registration of transfers, issuing of certificates, or otherwise.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I think I have shown you that the great development of German trade abroad was brought about in a comparatively short time by an intelligent system of state aid, and by a system of banking specially developed for the promotion and extension of foreign trade. I have also shown that some of the keenest business men in England, members of a committee appointed by the British Government, have arrived at the conclusion that the only way for the British manufacturer to successfully compete after the war in foreign markets is to adopt a system somewhat similar to the German system, and that their recommendations have been approved by the Government, and a royal charter has been granted to a British trade corporation sympathetically in alliance with the Government and with an initial capital of ten million pounds sterling, the English joint stock banks evidencing their approval by generous subscriptions to the capital stock.

It is not my purpose to urge any definite line of policy, but I do urge that a committee of this House be appointed so that this important matter may be given serious consideration, with the hope that after the evidence of those in this country best qualified to advise in this matter has been heard it may be possible to formulate some plan that may measurably attain a result so greatly to be desired.

It is a question whether it would be, or would not be, too radical a proposition for the Government to consider establishing a trade bureau, or a department, which would actually sell Canadian products in foreign markets and distribute the orders received amongst Canadian producers of natural and manufactured goods. Such a plan to my mind has much to recommend it. A Government department as sales agent would carry more weight than an individual or corporate body could. It would also be able to finance trade credits on a much lower basis of interest, and thereby create a trade that it would be impossible for the individual to develop. The proof that such a plan is feasible is at hand. The Imperial Munitions Board is a department of the British Government and has practically sold to that Government hundreds of millions of dollars worth of munitions in bulk, and has distributed this vast volume of trade amongst hundreds of Canadian firms, thereby saving the country from a period of depression when normal trade was dormant, affording profitable employment to thousands of both men and women who otherwise might have been a charge on the community. For further proof the War Purchasing Commission, a department of the British Government, may be cited, where we have millions of dollars worth of Canadian products sold to Allied nations, and the orders distributed broadcast to people who of their own initiative would never have sold in a foreign market.

When the war ends we run great danger of a panic through disorganized trade conditions, unless the Government lends a helping hand. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been granted to railways for the development of the country, hundreds of millions have been spent in the construction of canals and the development of our waterways, and we are to be called upon to advance millions for the construction of good roads; but of what advantage are these public works unless an expanding trade calls for their utilization? A few millions to risk in the development of trade is not too much to expect from a Government that has always stood for constructive statesmanship.

Honourable gentlemen, we in this country of ours have weighty problems to grapple with, and should we not meet them at least half way? There is work aplenty for every public spirited citizen, and should not this honourable body, composed of men of experience and ability, blaze a trail through a wilderness of conjecture as to what may happen after the war?

As you all know, this country has challenged the admiration of the world through her whole-hearted efforts to play a man's part in the brotherhood of nations, and I think I may safely make the statement that friends and enemies alike have been astounded at what our small population of virile and sturdy northerners have accomplished. We have raised and equipped an army of over 400,000 fighting men, and outside of Great Britain's present effort I doubt if ever before in any country has so large a proportion of the male population of military age, without compulsion and of their own free will, offered to risk their lives in defence, not primarily of their own country, which has not been directly menaced, but in defence of liberty and humanity under the Imperial flag. We have also mobilized our resources, financial, industrial, and commercial, until prosperity at present reigns, and this motion is made with the object that our prosperity may continue.

Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, ex-President of the United States, in an article entitled "The Lessons Canada Teaches Us," refers to Canada's efforts in the following eulogistic terms:

> The flag that commands the respect of other nations and inspires amongst its own followers the high passion of loyalty must float over a land where there is well-distributed material well-being, but what is even more important where there have also been developed the stern and lofty virtues of resolute and adventurous valour, of trained prowess, of readiness for self-sacrifice, of power to render service, and of determined and unshakeable patriotism. These are the virtues which during the past two and a half years Canada has preeminently shown. She has passed through one of those times which try men's souls and which sift out the strong and the worthy from the weak and the unworthy. She has stood the test. She has proved her possession of those qualities that mark the people of masterful ability, able to shape their own destinies and to hold their own in the rough world of actual life.

Honourable gentlemen, is Colonel Roosevelt's complimentary reference to this country true, or is it untrue? Are we able to shape our own destinies and to hold our own in the rough world of actual life, or are we not? The war itself has been a lesson in unpreparedness, and let us take heed therefrom. I therefore venture to hope that this House will adopt the resolution for the appointment of a special committee, which resolution I have the honour of moving.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Beaubien, the debate was adjourned till Thursday next.

THE LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT.

PROPOSED APPOINTMENT.

The Hon. the SPEAKER laid on the Table a communication from the Joint Librarians forwarding a certificate from the Civil Service Commissioners in favour of Joseph Ludger Parr, authorizing his appointment as a clerk of Subdivision B of the Second Division, in the Library of Parliament.

TRANSLATION BRANCH OF THE SENATE.

PROPOSED REORGANIZATION.

The Hon. the SPEAKER laid upon the Table a report from the late Clerk of the Senate recommending the organization of the French translators of the Senate into one branch, and recommending that Mr. L. de Montigny be appointed Chief of the French Translation Branch and French Secretary of Committees, and be paid the salary attached to the Subdivision to which his promotion assigns him.

The Hon. the SPEAKER submitted his concurrence in the said report and his recommendation of its adoption by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the documents submitted by His Honour the Speaker be referred to the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does my hon. friend include in that motion the report dealing with the appointment to the library?

Hon. Mr. POWER: Yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I fail to understand how the Internal Economy Committee can deal with an appointment to the Library, which must necessarily be the appointment of either the Joint Librarians or the Joint Committee representing both Houses. Let me assume for the moment that we disapprove of the appointment which has been made by the Librarians and that the Commons should not agree with the Senate, what would our position be? This can only be properly dealt with, it seems to me, by the Joint Committee on the Library. It cannot be dealt with by the Internal Economy Committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am not very anxious that that certificate should go to the Committee on Internal Economy, but I think that if you look at the Civil Service Amendment Act of 1908 you will find that appointments to the Parliamentary Library have to be approved by both Houses, and it is with the object of having this approval from the Senate that I move to have this recommendation referred to the committee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not, of course, wish to restrict the duties of the committee, but it would be unwise for us to arrogate to ourselves the right to deal with subjects that would not come within the authority of the committee, and I certainly cannot conceive, under the circumstances, in what way this committee has authority to deal with a report such as we have before us. It suggests to one's mind to ask what is the Committee on the Library for? That is a joint committee of both Houses, and it is surely within the authority of that committee to approve or disapprove of the appointment of clerks by the Speakers of both Houses. It is only out of regard for the proper procedure that I make the suggestion.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: The matter has not been dealt with by the Joint Committee of the two Houses?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: What action does this House propose to take?—refer the report to the Joint Committee, or is it all through when it is laid on the Table of the House?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me we have to assume that the Librarians, having made a certain appointment, would not have made it without the authority of the Joint Committee on the Library. If the Joint Committee on the Library does not act in reference to such a subject, what is that committee for?

Hon. Mr. POWER: The Committee on the Library, as I understand, has not met at all this session; consequently the recommendation does not come from them; but if the House thinks it more appropriate that this particular recommendation should go to the Joint Committee on the Library, I for one am perfectly willing.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let it stand, and let us find what is the proper procedure.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think honourable gentlemen will find that my motion was not irregular. However, I am willing to confine it to the report on the French translators.

The motion, referring the report on the French translators, was agreed to.

EXEMPTIONS FROM CONSCRIPTION.

HON. MR. POWER'S MOTION RULED OUT OF ORDER.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Before we go to the Orders of the Day, I rise on what is practically a question of privilege. It will be remembered that the other day I said a few words in regard to the proposed conscription measure; at least, my remarks touched on that a little; and the honourable member from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry), endorsed I think by the honourable leader of the Government, raised a question of order. They took the ground that my motion was out of order. The Speaker did not rule on the matter at once, and informed the House that he would give his ruling the next day. The question was a very simple one, and I was rather surprised the next day to find that His Honour the Speaker postponed his decision until to-day. I certainly thought that before we went into the Orders of the Day His Honour would have given us his ruling. As I say, the question is a very simple one, and His Honour has had a good deal of leisure, I think, during the last few days, and I may express my regret that the decision has not come forward.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I am very sorry if the honourable gentleman was so anxious to have my decision, but I am prepared to give it now.

Honourable gentlemen, I have the honour to submit to this honourable House my decision on the point of order raised by the honourable member for Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) on the motion of the honourable senior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power):

> That, in any measure intended to introduce conscription into Canada, provision should be made that no man whose father, brother or son has gone to the seat of war as a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, or is being trained in England preparatory to going to the front, shall be selected for compulsory service.

The point of order raised is:

> That, as the proposed motion is an anticipated amendment to a Bill, of which notice has been given, the same is out of order.

I have gone very carefully into the matter, but I cannot find any specific rule of the Senate which would indicate to me what my ruling should be. By Rule 1 of the Senate it is stated that, in cases not provided for in our rules, the standing orders, rules and usages of the Imperial Parliament shall apply. I have therefore searched the authorities on the subject, and I beg to quote the following in support of my ruling:

In the English House of Commons Standing Order 10a is as follows:

> In determining whether a discussion is out of order on the ground of anticipation, regard shall be had by Mr. Speaker to the probability of the matter anticipated being brought before the House within a reasonable time.

I also find in May, 12th edition, pages 248-249, the following:

A motion must not anticipate a matter already appointed for consideration by the House. A motion is equally out of order if it anticipates a notice of motion for leave to bring in a Bill that includes the subject proposed to be dealt with by the motion.

Blackmore's Speaker's Decisions, at page 120, says:

It is contrary to the practice of the House to consider any resolution bearing upon a Bill before the other House.

Mr. Speaker Brand gave the following ruling:

It is contrary to the practice of this House to consider any resolution bearing upon a Bill before the other House of Parliament until that Bill has been read in the other House a third time.

May, 11th edition, page 279, says:

A motion is also equally out of order which anticipates a motion for leave to bring in a Bill that includes the subject proposed to be dealt with by the motion, or a Bill appointed for consideration, though the Bill may not have been printed.

Blackmore, 2nd edition, page 114, says:

Mr. Speaker will not allow questions to be put on the paper which refer to the details of a coming Bill.

For the above reasons I declare the point of order to be well taken.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES WAGES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON moved the second reading of Bill D, an Act concerning the payment of salaries or wages of employees of railway companies.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Explain.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, the serious and favourable consideration of this House is asked by the large army of railway employees in this country for the proposed measure, on the ground that it is sound in principle; that the present practice of payment of wages to railway employees is not satisfactory; that this Bill, if adopted, would bring about the desired remedy; and that there is ample precedent to show that it is wise legislation. I do not desire to take up much of the time of the House to-night, and, being a junior member, I do not know whether at this time I should enter fully into the reasons in support of the request connected with this measure.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Now is the time.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: If this be the proper time, I would crave your indulgence for a few minutes in order that I may, if possible, make clear to you why the railway employees of the Dominion of Canada seek this relief. I think it is well known, probably to every honourable gentleman in this House, that the general custom followed in the payment of wages to workmen throughout Canada is to pay weekly, semi-monthly, or possibly, in the case of men employed in clerical capacities, once a month, on the last day of the month. Were that in effect for railway men they would be satisfied; but the present practice is that they must wait until the end of the month, when their time is returned, and then some three weeks longer in order that the accounting departments of the railways may do their work. Wages earned on the first day of June, for example, are paid anywhere from the 15th to the 25th of July, six or seven weeks after the money is earned. The railway men feel that this is not a fair condition so far as they are concerned, and that they should not be, because of the peculiarity of their employment, discriminated against in this regard but that they ought to be paid at least twice a month. The adoption of the Bill proposed would mean that the wages earned, say, between the 1st and the 15th of any month would be paid about the end of the month, and the wages earned during the latter half of the month would be paid about the 15th of the following month; because we must recognize, and do recognize, that a certain length of time for preparing pay-rolls, issuing the cheques, and so on, is absolutely necessary; but we do claim that the present practice of keeping the men out of their wages for a term of from six to seven weeks is not fair to them.

I would point out to you briefly some of the reasons why they ask this relief. Doubtless all will readily realize that men who are waiting for their monthly pay until nearly the end of the month after it is earned must necessarily seek credit in the purchases that they make, and the custom in all towns throughout the country where our railway men are largely located is to trade on a credit basis at a few general stores, and at the end of each month, or when they receive their pay, to go to the store and meet their liabilities, which in many cases consume almost their entire earnings. The result is that the railway employee seldom has anything left, or at best sees very little left, of his monthly wages. We submit, honourable gentlemen, on behalf of the employees, that were they paid twice a month they would be in possession of money, which would enable them to go into the cheapest markets and buy for cash the things that they require to maintain themselves and their families, and that by doing so they would be able to make more purchases for the same money than they can under the present system.

I speak with some personal knowledge of this matter, because I personally handled the pay-roll for several hundred men on one of our large railways for over eight years, and I know that it was their practice to meet their liabilities by turning their cheques over to the grocery stores, etc., in the manner which I have indicated. I am convinced, honourable gentlemen, after careful investigation and observation of the situation for years, that if this measure were enacted the railway employees of Canada would be able to effect a very considerable saving—that they would be able to make their meagre earnings go much further in the purchasing of the supplies necessary to maintain themselves at this time.

There never was a period since this legislation has been sought—and it has been sought by the railway employees since 1908—there never has been a period during that time when the need of it was so great as at the present moment. Perhaps I can demonstrate that to you clearly by making this statement: When the war broke out, in 1914, it cost $1.37 to purchase what could be bought for $1 in 1900. That represented the increase in the cost of living in 14 years. Two months ago it took $2.20 to purchase what $1.37 would buy in June, 1914, three years ago. The wages of the railway employees in Canada have increased in some cases to a limited extent, but nowhere to an extent even approaching the amount that would offset the increase in the cost of their living. So I say to you that the purchasing power of the earnings of railway men has so steadily decreased during the last three years that this relief is more sorely needed now than at any previous time since it was first sought in 1908.

The only objection that the railway companies have raised, so far as I know—I do not hold any brief for them, but I desire to do them justice, as I believe many of the managers will concede, from my relations with them in years past—the only objection I know of that they have raised to this is that it would entail some increase in the expense of accounting. Now, honourable gentlemen, I would like to point out to you, in connection with that, just one fact. The general manager of one of the large railways, in speaking at a banquet a few months ago, stated that there were 175,000 railway employees in Canada, which I think is approximately correct. It is a conservative statement to say that the average monthly earnings of Canadian railway employees is $70. which means that the monthly pay-roll would amount to $12,225,000. Let me point out that the railway employees earn $12,000,000 in one month; that they do not receive that money until nearly the end of the following month; that when they do receive it they do not receive cash, but a cheque asking somebody else to pay to them a certain amount; so that it is approximately two months from the time the service is rendered until the cheque comes back and is a charge against the railway company. There is approximately in the hands of the Canadian railways all the time $25,000,000 which represents wages earned and unpaid; and the interest on that amount of money at five per cent is a million and a quarter dollars a year. Cannot the railway companies well afford to grant to their employees this reasonable relief which they seek, and pay for it out of the interest on the employees' money in their hands—earned and unpaid?

I feel, hon. gentlemen, that this measure would have been passed years ago by this honourable House had it properly and thoroughly understood the situation at the time the Bill was first presented. My information is that it was passed by the House of Commons some three or four years ago, but that for some reason this honourable House did not see fit to approve of it. I feel sure that the House of Commons will endorse its former action if you signify your approval of granting this great relief to the 175,000 men and the several hundred thousand women and children dependent upon them, who would thus be able to make their small earnings go further in procuring the necessaries of life than they can under the present system. I earnestly hope that this honourable House will view with approval and adopt this Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Before the honourable the Speaker puts the motion I would like to tell my honourable friend that when this Bill came before the Railway Committee of the Senate some seven or eight years ago—

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Less than that; three or four years.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am told, three or four years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: It is more than that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Six or seven years.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am quite sure that my memory does not fail me as to the fact that a number of representatives of railway employees appeared before the committee and declared themselves satisfied with the conditions as existing then. I do not remember how the Senate divided, but I do remember that it became quite an involved question what benefit would accrue to the employees. I hope that if this Bill goes before the committee we shall be able to pass judgment on a better record than was then laid before us.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In reply to the honourable gentleman, I may say that when the Bill was submitted to this House it was with the unanimous approval and at the unanimous request of the properly-constituted and duly-authorized legislative representatives of all the railway organizations, including the organization whose representative opposed the passing of the Bill some four years ago; that since that time the organization which that particular gentleman represented, in convention assembled, passed a resolution instructing its representative at Ottawa to urge the passage of this Bill. I would be glad, honourable gentlemen, and if in order I would move, to have this Bill referred to the Railway Committee, and I shall be pleased to arrange for the legislative representatives who are duly elected by those 175,000 men to appear before that committee on any date that may be set and to state at first hand the desires of the men they represent.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: It will have to go before the committee anyway.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I ask my honourable friend if he is aware whether or not representations have been made to the committee now engaged upon the consolidation of the Railway Act in the House of Commons? It seems to me this would be an opportune time to have the proposal embodied in that measure, if there is a disposition on the part of the House of Commons to do so.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In reply to the honourable the leader of the House I may say that, according to my information, that matter has been dealt with by that special committee, who have endorsed it, and are recommending to the Commons its inclusion in the consolidation of the Railway Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am very glad to hear that the joint committee have agreed to endorse the principle of this Bill, because it seems to me that, under the ruling which was given by the honourable the Speaker a little while ago, this Bill is out of order. In the case of my motion, which was declared out of order, there was no Bill before this House, there was no Bill before the House of Commons, and His Honour ruled it out of order because possibly some member of the Government had intimated his intention of dealing with this subject and it might be brought into Parliament this session. And now we have a measure introduced by the Government and containing a provision with respect to the payment of railway employees; yet, strange to say, no one appears to think that a motion to read a Bill of this kind is out of order. If my motion is out of order, this one is very much more out of order

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Are you raising a point of order?

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not wish His Honour the Speaker to expose himself to the danger of being considered inconsistent. He ruled my little motion out of order, and he is prepared to allow a big one to come on. I am not objecting to the Bill. I am glad that the Commons, or the Joint Committee, are dealing with this matter, but I make the point of order and I anticipate what His Honour's ruling will be.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Honourable gentlemen, while not expressing myself in favour of the principle involved in this Bill, I have no objection to offer at the present time, if it is distinctly understood that we do not affirm the principle of the Bill by allowing it a second reading. We know that the principle of a Bill is generally affirmed or rejected upon its second reading, particularly in the House of Commons. I remember an occasion when Sir John Macdonald took exception to a proposition somewhat similar to this. Where there may be a difference of opinion it is distinctly understood, in allowing a Bill involving a particular principle to be read a second time, that each individual should not be held to an affirmation of the principle of the Bill. Apart from that, it does not seem to me that this Bill is in a totally different position from the motion of my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power). There is no suggestion of amending a Bill which is before the House of Commons. The reference made by my honourable friend to what the Railway Committee may do is another matter altogether. This is a distinct proposition, affirming the principle that railway employees should be paid once a fortnight instead of once a month, and I do not see any similarity at all between it and that to which the honourable gentleman refers.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Apparently I have not been able to follow the deductions of the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Robertson). If I followed him, his deductions are wrong.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: For the information of the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), I may say that this Bill was introduced into this House and had its first reading prior to the time the railway brotherhood representatives proposed it to the special committee of the House of Commons which is now dealing with the consolidation of the Railway Act.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Honourable gentlemen, I understand that a similar Bill was turned down a few years ago because some of the railroad employees appeared before the committee and said that they preferred to have things remain as they were. That is practically what my honourable friend has said. If that is the only objection to the Bill, he may rest easy, because the railroad employees from one end of the country to the other are practically united in demanding that they be paid twice a month. I come in contact with a great many railway men, and I find that this is the case; and why should it not be the case? Every little corporation in Canada is paying its employees at least twice every month, and many of these corporations—perhaps most of them—have to borrow the money in order to do it, whereas everything which the railway companies have to sell is sold for cash; they are paid cash for passenger transportation and for the transportation of freight. These are the only commodities which they have for sale, and they are paid cash the day the goods are delivered. For the life of me I cannot see why they should not be willing to pay their men twice a month instead of once a month. As I understood it, the objection that the railway companies had to paying the men twice a month was owing to the accounting feature. They said that paying the men twice a month would entail a hardship upon them. I admit that to pay twice a month instead of once a month will entail some additional expense, but I do not think that it is going to entail any extraordinary expense unless they are going to insist, as I understand they do now, that all their pay-sheets should every month pass through one central office. I may be wrong, but I imagine that that is something which they have always insisted upon. My own opinion is that this Bill is in the interest of the men, and I for one shall be very pleased to see such a provision in the consolidation of the Railway Act which is now being put through, or to have this go through as a separate Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the honourable gentleman who has introduced this Bill. I understood him to say, in answer to the leader of the Government, that this matter had been brought up before the Committee of the House of Commons which is now dealing with the revision of the Railway Act. If that is the case, and if they have considered this question, probably favourably, I cannot quite see the object of our going on with this Bill at the present time. It seems to me that we shall have to consider this question when the Railway Act comes up, and if the substance of this Bill is included in the present Railway Act as amended, we shall have to do the work over again. I think the honourable gentleman might let the Bill stand until later on.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: It seems to me that the objection taken by the honourable leader of the Opposition is not altogether a good one. We do not know at what time the Government Railway Consolidation Act will come before this House. It may come at such a period of the session that there will be no time to deal with it, and it may not contain the proposal which we have heard to-night. If that is the case, there might not be time left for the introduction and passage of such a Bill as we have before us. I would like to ask the honourable gentleman who has introduced the Bill if the men at the present time do not really get paid every month. I understand that they get paid once a month, although that payment may be seven weeks in arrears.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. McHUGH: When a similar Bill was before the Senate some years ago, I think the principal reason why it did not become law was that the managers of the great railways opposed it on the ground that it was going to work a hardship upon them. At that time the railways paid their employees by sending a car out, and they thought that it would be a hardship to be compelled to send that pay-car all over Canada twice a month, and that the benefits derived would not compensate for that hardship. I have heard that the railway companies and their employees are very much in accord now as to payment twice a month, and, as the employees are now paid by cheque, that requirement is not such a hardship on the railways as it would have been at the time the Bill was up for consideration before. As the honourable gentleman who has introduced this Bill has said, it was introduced before the committee of the House of Commons was appointed. I think it would be well for us to go on with the Bill that we have now before us, and if a similar clause is put into the other Bill it is not going to do any harm.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE EXPENSES OF PARLIAMENT.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE.

The Hon. the SPEAKER laid on the Table a message from the House of Commons asking the Senate to appoint a committee to consider and report upon the total cost of each session of Parliament, and the best way, if any, of reducing the same.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, it was ordered that this message be taken into consideration to-morrow.

FIGHTING BATTALIONS.

INQUIRY.

Brigadier-General Hon. Mr. MASON inquired:

Is the Government contemplating any action whereby the splendid work and glorious deeds of the fighting battalions will be preserved and kept conspicuously on record?

Is the Government of the opinion that this can be most effectually accomplished by allotting in some equitable manner the fighting battalions among the militia regiments now in existence, and by following the system in operation in the Imperial army?

Can drafts to keep these battalions up to the necessary strength be then obtained with less difficulty and expense?

Have these battalions no root as it were, and that when mustered out their individuality will disappear?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. Brigadier-General Cruikshank has been detailed on duty to deal with this matter, the work to be performed in conjunction with Major Doughty, Dominion Archivist.

ENLISTMENT OF CANADIANS IN THE UNITED STATES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

If any arrangement has been made with the United States Government or any department thereof which will allow Canadians of military age residing in the United States to enlist there for the purpose of joining the Canadian Expeditionary Force?

Has any estimate been formed as to the possible number of recruits that may be obtained if an understanding is come to?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This matter is under consideration. Nothing conclusive has been done yet.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: No action has been taken?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: There has been considerable interest taken in this question on the Pacific coast. The idea is that something might be done through certain Scotch societies. There are regiments there which would like to have these men join.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Government appreciates the importance of this question, but it involves negotiations with the American Government.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: According to the Fredericton papers, Colonel Guthrie has returned from Boston bringing back with him twenty volunteers for the Kilties; so I presume there must be some arrangement with the United States authorities whereby they consent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Probably they are making no resistance.

Bill C 2, an Act to incorporate The Imperial Order Daughters of the Empire and The Children of the Empire (Junior Branch).—Brigadier-General Hon. Mr. Mason.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Will the honourable gentleman kindly explain the objects of this Bill?

Brigadier-General Hon. Mr. MASON: Honourable gentlemen, the Daughters of the Empire is an organization which is pretty well known, and its usefulness is generally acknowledged. Its objects are charitable, patriotic, and loyal, and are achieved by the services of ladies who give a great deal of their time and in other ways make many sacrifices for the benefit of the order and the objects for which it was established. Since the beginning of the war this organization has raised two and a half million dollars, all of which has gone for patriotic purposes. In the city of Toronto alone they have made ten thousand official visits to the dependents of soldiers. The desire of those responsible for the Bill is to have the order incorporated, with the powers and objects set forth in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: Is it to incorporate the Children of the Empire? It seems to me to be rather curious legislation.

The Bill was read the second time.

Bill T, an Act to authorize the issue of a patent to James Wallace Tygard.—Hon. Mr. McCall.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman from Simcoe (Hon. Mr. McCall), has asked me in his absence to make an explanation as to why this application is made for the issue of a patent to James Wallace Tygard. It seems that Mr. Tygard, the promoter of the Bill, secured a patent in the United States concerning useful improvements in internal combustion engines. This was secured on the 29th of December, 1914. Although the promoter of the Bill is a resident of the city of Toronto, he, apparently unaware that he would have to make an application to the Patent Office in Canada for a Canadian patent within twelve months, let the time go by until March of the present year, when he made this application. Up to the present time, a patent has not issued in Canada for this invention.

The Bill was read the second time.

REGULATION OF WAR CHARITIES.

On the Order:

Second reading Bill P, an Act to incorporate The Army and Navy Veterans in Canada.—Hon. Mr. Sharpe.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say to my honourable friend who has charge of this Bill, and also to my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Dennis), who has charge of the Bill U, an Act to incorporate the Great War Veterans Association of Canada, which is of a similar character, that it is the intention of the Government to bring down general legislation controlling and regulating all war charities, and I would suggest to these honourable gentlemen that these Bills should stand until say this day week, and in the meantime the general Bill may be brought down. I understand that this Bill has been introduced into the House of Commons. These organizations may be doing very good work on behalf of the returned soldiers, but they are becoming so numerous that it is desirable, if not necessary, that they should come under Government regulation.

The said orders were allowed to stand.

WHOLE WHEAT BREAD.

MOTION.

The Senate resumed from May 31 consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Casgrain:

That, in the opinion of the Senate, during the war, whole wheat bread should be made as soon as possible in Canada.

Hon. W. H. RICHARDSON: Honourable gentlemen, as I said last week, I think the question under consideration furnishes much food for serious thought in this House and throughout the whole country. The honourable gentleman who moved the motion (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) told us very clearly some of the advantages to be derived from the use of whole wheat bread. He did not show us clearly, however, the great necessity for it. I propose to-day to consider the question whether there is really a necessity for it at the present moment or not. As this matter is one closely connected with my business, I have probably given it far more thought and attention than any other honourable gentleman here; it has been necessary for me to do so. I will give a résumé of the conditions surrounding the wheat trade of this country since the inauguration of the war, in August, 1914.

At that time, honourable gentlemen, conditions were normal. There were no high prices and there was no talk of the increased cost of living. The supply of wheat was quite sufficient for the demand, and it was rarely that the price of wheat exceeded $1 a bushel, which is considered a normal price. Nor did prices advance at once. It was thought by the public at large that this war would be of short duration, that it would last perhaps a few months, and that conditions would then again become normal. Although at the inauguration of the war prices did advance about 25 per cent, the supply coming forward was so great that the advanced prices receded almost to the former price of $1 per bushel. Later on, as the war progressed, it was seen that it was going to be of long duration, and prices gradually creeped up.

Coming to 1915, we find that America had the greatest crop of wheat in its history. The climatic conditions were wonderfully favourable. It seemed at one time as if the United States would have 900,000,000 bushels of wheat and perhaps more. It is impossible, however, to forecast what a crop will be; we do not know until it is harvested. Just as the harvesting commenced, torrential rains came in Oklahoma and throughout the other southern parts of the United States, and the wheat in sheaf was greatly damaged, and some of it entirely lost. These rains, strange to say, followed the harvesting into Kansas, into Illinois, and into the province of Ontario. It is true that we harvested a very large crop of winter wheat, but that crop was damaged to a large extent; what the exact loss was no one can say. A certain portion of the crop was used for feed, but a large proportion was never used at all; it was shelled out in the field. However, we had in the northwest—in Dakota, Minnesota, and our own northwestern provinces—a wonderful crop of spring wheat, a crop amounting to almost 700 million bushels, and in many places the quality was of the very best. So that loss of winter wheat in the southwestern states was not felt, because of the great abundance in the north. Therefore prices in 1915 did not unduly advance, for there was a supply sufficient to meet the demand.

Coming now to 1916, the crop in the southwestern states, which is the main source of United States wheat, was not a failure, but it was a much smaller crop than the preceding one and was rather below the average. The Dakotas and Minnesota had what may be called a real failure; their wheat was in small quantities and the quality was remarkably poor, some of it weighing only 35 pounds per bushel. In our own Northwest there had been a fair promise, but it was subject to rust in the province of Manitoba, and to frost in many other places, and was much decreased. The only part of our Northwest which yielded a first-class crop was southern Alberta.

So we come to the present year, with stocks very greatly depleted, because the Argentine Republic, which is a very large producer of wheat, had last year a complete failure; so much so that all exportation from that country was forbidden. In the preceding year also it had a very small crop and exported only small quantities compared with what it used to export.

Let us come now to 1917. At the present time the world is looking for a large crop of wheat. The question is, will the world realize that large crop? It is reported that in the southern and southwestern states 12,000,000 acres of land have been ploughed up because the crop of winter wheat was killed in that country to that extent. Since then conditions have rather improved, but in any case the winter wheat crop of the United States will be an unusually small one. The Dakotas and Minnesota have the promise of a fair crop of spring wheat. Their harvest last fall was earlier than ours, their ground was better prepared, and the consequence is that they got on the soil earlier—and because they are south of us their climate also, of course, enabled them to do so. As to ourselves, we did little or no summer-fallowing last year, for various reasons—labour being scarce, the grain crop coming on late, and our harvest coming very late, almost on the verge of winter, with little or no fall ploughing done. Therefore this spring conditions for early sowing were not as good as usual. You all know what kind of weather we have had for the last month, and instead of summer weather we still have a very backward spring. The wheat crop in our Northwest will be somewhat light, the acreage being less than usual—five or possibly ten per cent less. It had all been sown two weeks ago, but owing to dry weather and frost it has not been doing well.

Now, we are dependent upon this year's crop of wheat to feed ourselves and to feed Europe, and anything that we can do to save we are bound in my opinion to do. The motion of the honourable senator (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) with reference to the making of whole wheat bread I agree with to a certain extent; but I question if this country at the present moment realizes seriously enough the conditions to induce Parliament to adopt it. But there is a substitute for whole wheat flour in what we call war flour—76 per cent flour. This is a flour that is manufactured not entirely from No. 1, No. 2, or No. 3 wheat, but from mixed varieties, principally of low-grade wheats. It has more gluten and more phosphates in it than the ordinary flour we now get from our mills; it has a better flavour; and its only defect is that it is of a slightly darker colour. There is no reason that I can see why this flour should not be manufactured, when every bushel of wheat gives six pounds more of this flour than of the other. Figure out what that means, and you will be astonished at the great increase its use would mean in the production of flour in this country and in Europe.

There is another great point in its favour, and that is that in milling this 76 per cent flour you are able to use low-grade wheat. We know that in the past Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta have always produced a considerable percentage of low-grade wheat. I think the only year in which there was a negligible quantity of the lower grades was 1915; in that year we had a wonderful crop. But low-grade wheats have always been penalized; there is no market at home for them, and they have had to be exported to Europe, and often to be sold on sample; so that we never get for them what they are worth. I claim that these low-grade wheats contain far more gluten, pound for pound, than the higher grades. I think this has been fairly demonstrated. I have a letter from one of my best customers who has been grinding this 76 per cent flour. He states that a barrel of this flour, 196 pounds, will make 280 pounds of bread, which is supposed to be the product of a barrel of strong baker's flour. I repeat that it has more gluten, more phosphates and more fat in it than any other, and, besides having more nutritiveness, it is more palatable and more wholesome. If there were no necessity to conserve our wheat, these reasons alone would be sufficient for this country to adopt the milling of 76 per cent flour.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is the only defect that of colour?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: The only defect is the colour. Any honourable gentleman can find out for himself in the course of two or three days the quality of the bread. He can go to the baker and get the bread, and he can prove it to his own satisfaction. I am not talking of something I have not proved. I have tested it out, and I know what I have said about the quality of the bread made from 76 per cent flour to be correct.

I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House longer on this matter. I think I have set before you that we have a shortage of wheat; that at the very best we are not going to meet that shortage; that some substitute will have to be found to take the place of wheat. Europe will require from us, or should get from us, a billion bushels of wheat. She may not need it, because Europe is finding ways and means of making flour go further than usual. Again, England is trying to increase her production of wheat. She has ploughed up acres of land that have been in lawns for years, and has sown wheat and other crops on them. But the soil must be properly prepared a year in advance, for a satisfactory yield of wheat cannot be expected from a single spring ploughing; it is utterly impossible.

Again, if we adopt the use of this low-grade wheat and this 76 per cent flour, we shall secure to our men in the Northwest, when they have a crop that is off-grade, a far better price than they have received in the past. I have found that any legislation that is beneficial to our farmers is what our Government desires to enact. I have been surprised to find that in every move made by the Government the effect upon the producer is considered.

I think I have given you, honourable gentlemen, sufficient reasons why we should have 76 per cent flour, yielding six more pounds of flour to the bushel of wheat and giving a more nutritious and more wholesome bread than the ordinary white flour of the mills.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: What about the offal?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: The offal is used, of course, only for cattle. The winter wheat land in the south that has been ploughed up, about 12 million acres, has been sown to corn and oats. Every available acre in Ontario that we could plough this year has been sown to oats and barley, and the land in the Northwest that has not been sown to wheat, because the season was so late, has been sown to oats and barley. We had last year a most prolific hay crop, from which thousands of tons of hay still remain, and there is every promise that there will be another abundant hay crop this year. So it seems to me that there is no necessity to protect the cattle, because they will have an ample quantity of fodder.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: May I ask the honourable senator from Kingston if the production of this flour will require any change in milling?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: The production of this flour simply means coarser bolting cloth—the sieves a little coarser.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: It can be used immediately?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It simply requires that the cylinders be not placed so close together.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the honourable gentleman whether that flour will keep well or not?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: That flour, I think, will keep as well as the white flour; I question if it would sour. It has been tested and has been found to contain 11·85 per cent of moisture. That is below the average. The reason for this is that low-grade wheat, wheat that has been shrunken, contains less starchy matter, but the other nutrients are in it. The shrunken wheat has been tested and found to contain less moisture than the large, plump, 60 pound wheat. Therefore this flour will keep as well as any other.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is it as suitable for export purposes?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes. We are exporting it now for the War Office, and it must undergo a moisture test. That is how I know that it has tested 11·85.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will the honourable gentleman allow me a question? He does not feel absolutely in accord with the motion as put by the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain). Would he not be disposed to draw a conclusion from his remarks, and suggest an amendment to that motion?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: I would like to offer an amendment in favour of the use of this 76 per cent flour, because I feel that it will meet with the approval of the people. Its value can be demonstrated in one week. I have in my pocket a proof of this, which I did not think it worth while to give to you before. Here is a letter from a baker who has used this flour and has been selling it:

Re the war flour. For the benefit of any bakers that you get interested in the flour. I made a five-hour dough, using Fleischman's yeast. Temperature of dough, 76. Heat of oven, 340 degrees Fahrenheit. Baked 35 minutes. Result, 160 pounds of flour yields 153 loaves of 24 ounces each.

That is a wonderful yield, and no trouble —everything easy to do.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: I would like to ask the honourable gentleman if he thinks that last year there was sufficient low-grade wheat to manufacture enough flour for the consumption of Canada.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: If the honourable gentleman will examine the figures of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, he will ascertain. It was because the country elevator man sold his country's stock in May wheat, composed of No. 1, No. 2, or No. 3 Northern, which he had to deliver on his contracts, and the buyer refused to take the lower grades at any price, demanding that he should deliver the No. 1, No. 2, or No. 3 Northern. The country was full of low-grade wheat and short of high-grade, and the only way these contracts were settled was by the council of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange appointing a committee to decide the difference in value between the high-grades and Nos. 4, 5 and 6 Northern, the committee allowing a deduction of 20 cents per bushel on No. 4, 40 cents on No. 5, and 70 cents on No. 6. In that way they cancelled the contracts and the wheat came down to normal.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: May I ask whether this wheat is for sale, and if the flour made from it is cheaper than the product of the high-grade wheat?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes, it is cheaper and it is for sale, and there are mills manufacturing it, but only a few; the Empire Flour Mills manufacture it. It is getting to be universal. As to it being cheaper, I cannot tell you mill secrets, for it would not be fair to my customers to do so, but I can tell you this, that four-fifths of the wheat used in that flour was below No. 3 Northern.

Hon. ROBERT WATSON: I am certainly interested in this very interesting discussion. I take exception to some things which the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Richardson) has said in regard to the manufacture of this flour for export. You might get a larger percentage, not of flour, but a larger percentage of bran and shorts put into the flour, if that is what you mean, by increasing the number of pounds you are going to utilize out of a hundred pounds of wheat for baking purposes; but, while you could manufacture it and use it for domestic purposes, without any length of time in storage, I question very much whether you could manufacture it for export, because it would not keep.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: How long would it keep?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I do not think you could ship it for export at all. Some members of this House will remember—I know the right honourable gentleman from Belleville (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) will remember—the time when the Government discussed the question of the export of flour to Jamaica; and Adam Brown of Hamilton was appointed by the Government a commissioner to an exhibition there; and he had some trouble in demonstrating to the people of Jamaica that they could use our Canadian hard-wheat flour, and that it would keep in that hot climate. The only flour that did keep on that occasion was that which was manufactured by what was then called the new process, the roller process flour, the Hungarian flour; the old millstone flour would not keep in Jamaica. Only flour manufactured with rollers that extracted the germ and such other elements as made the flour ferment would keep in Jamaica. Adam Brown demonstrated that they could buy our hard-wheat flour with safety and keep it, but not when ground by the old stone process. I mention that to show that while we might eat this flour at home, we could not possibly manufacture it for export.

I can quite endorse what has been said by the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Richardson), who is a practical man, as to the value of our low-grade wheats for milling purposes. I have had practical experience in the milling business, and in the West I have very often found that between No. 3 or No. 4 Northern wheat and No. 1 Northern there would not be over two cents of a spread, for the simple reason that in some seasons the quantity of strength you want in the wheat is found in the lower grades which the Eastern miller requires to mix with soft wheat to make the flour up to strength. In other words, there is more strength per pound in a bushel of No. 4 Northern wheat of a low grade than you would get in high-grade wheat; there is more starch in it, and therefore the miller who wants starch and strength in wheat, will pay more for the low-grade wheat that he wants for milling purposes than he would otherwise.

I would suggest to the Government that a commission should be appointed to investigate the whole situation. I am satisfied that in years gone by the Northwestern farmers have lost tens of millions of dollars on low-grade wheat simply because there was no market for it. There was a duty of ten cents a bushel against it going into the United States; and, as there are only about four milling companies in Canada, they have a monopoly of the business here. The result was that the millers in Canada bought that wheat at their own price, and they made more profit, I venture to say, out of the low-grade wheat than out of the high-grade wheat. We were in hopes we would have a market for low-grade wheat in the United States when the Government took off the duty of ten cents a bushel, which excluded our wheat from the United States market. However, we are deprived of that, as arrangements are not yet worked out for opening that market; though I understand that some arrangement is being made whereby our wheat will go into the United States duty free. In Minneapolis there is a milling capacity of 200,000,000 bushels a year, and this off-grade wheat, which works tough and will not store, will make just as good flour as No. 1 hard Northern wheat, but not quite so much to the bushel, because it is not possible to clean the bran quite as well, though the bran is as good as that from the high-grade wheat. The farmer has been getting more for his bran, consequently he does not lose anything, because he keeps the bran, which is richer and better for his cows. Where you get that wheat off season and store it for months it will mill better; and, with the Minneapolis milling capacity of 200 million bushels seldom running over half its capacity, if the American millers come into our market and buy that wheat on a sample market for milling purposes, the farmer in the West will get a square deal and will get from 15 to 20 cents a bushel more than he would get from local buyers.

I trust that something good will come out of this discussion. I agree with the speakers who have said that the people would be healthier if they ate brown bread rather than white. My honourable friend who made the motion now under discussion the other day recommended the whole wheat for human food. He must not forget that we have to have dairies; we have to have beef; we have to have stock feed; and if the wheat does not all go into a loaf of bread it is not wasted; it goes into some other process whereby we get food. There is no doubt in my mind that if people were better educated on the quality of flour, they would use a great deal more brown bread than is used in Canada to-day.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Is there any objection from a miller's point of view to manufacturing flour from low-grade wheat? Will it require alterations and changes in their machinery which would be expensive?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Oh, no. No change in machinery, and no additional expense. If you make a low-grade flour out of any kind of wheat, you simply extend and take more out of your bolting; you bolt less out of the starchy material.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Is the only reason for its use that people like to have white bread rather than dark bread.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: That is it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Watson), with many others, seems to think that cattle would not get along if they did not get the best part of the wheat. Now, when was Hungarian roller milling first started in this country? Does the honourable gentleman remember that in 1876, at the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, Canada made the very best showing in cattle it had ever made before or has made since? Yet I do not think Hungarian milling was in use in 1876.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I think Hungarian flour was first manufactured in Canada in 1874, in the county of Waterloo, Ontario, at a place called Conestoga. It was manufactured by the roller process, with an iron roller which was brought from Hungary. It was for that reason called Hungarian flour.

Hon. GEORGE GORDON: In view of the very high cost of living at the present time, this is one of the most interesting subjects that have been before this House this year. So far as I know, nothing has yet been done in any quarter to reduce the high cost of living; and if the statement made by my honourable friend from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Richardson) is correct, what a simple process it would be to have a law enacted to have only such flour as he describes used in Canada during the duration of the war. He claims that each bushel of wheat will produce six pounds more of such flour than of white flour; that the flour is, if anything, more nutritious and better in every respect for the consumer—that the colour amounts to nothing. I know as well as he does, and bakers tell us right along, that the demand from the public is always for a white loaf; but if the other kind is better, the fact of our having to put up with that kind of a loaf is going to do us good rather than harm. Therefore I say that this question should be brought to the immediate attention of the Government, and I think we should insist very strongly from our House on having this thing done.

We are suffering to-day from high prices on the principal things that we eat. If maximum prices were fixed on wheat, on flour, and perhaps on one single vegetable. we would be much better off. It is to-day almost impossible for a man with a moderate salary to buy butter to put on his bread. That commodity is very high, not only in Canada but in the neighbouring republic. Over there they have substitutes for butter in oleomargarine and butterine, which are much better than a great deal of the butter which we buy in Canada at a high price. Some people say, "When you touch butter, you are touching the farmer; you are touching the farmer's wife;" but in my opinion there should be a limit, no matter whom it is touching; and I claim that, no matter what quantity of substitute is made in Canada, the farmers will still get a very high price for their butter. Even if we did not consume a pound of butter in Canada to-day, the price they would get for what is exported would be very great. We appear to be waiting for a food controller to do some of these things. My candid, honest opinion is that a food controller should not be waited for to fix a price upon these necessities; I maintain that a price can be fixed which would be satisfactory to the farmer, and would be a good, fat price. Unless something of this nature is done, and done in the near future, the prices of these necessities are going to advance to such an extent that many of the industries in this country will suffer by reason of the fact that the employers will not be able to pay enough for their labour to allow the employees to live as they should.

I have mentioned only one or two articles which I think should be dealt with promptly by the Government, but let me make one more suggestion which I think would help the situation considerably. I would suggest the prohibition of the manufacture of ice cream, in order that the cream might be used in making butter and cheese.

Hon. Mr. GORDON.

Another suggestion I have to make which may be considered by some of my protectionist friends to be somewhat radical; but when we are engaged in a war such as this great war, anything which we can do to help to win that war should be done. One of the vital principal things for winning the war is to encourage our people at home to be happy and contented, and to live within their means. One other thing I think ought to be done, and done promptly, and I make the suggestion to the Government: that is, the duties should be removed from meats and lard. I suggest this particularly for the reason, in addition to the others which I have already given, that for some time the railroads have not been able to give a proper service to the country. This is not entirely the fault of the railroads, but is caused by the lack of transportation by boats at the terminals. Therefore they would not suffer from a little lack of transportation in some respects. I believe that if the duties were taken off meats, and we could import them freely into Canada at points all along the line, thereby helping out transportation and letting the articles go by the shortest routes, it would help not only the railroads but tend to content the people and to quicken enlistment.

Hon. GEORGE LYNCH-STAUNTON: Hon. gentlemen, I would like to add a few words to what has already been said upon this interesting and important question. It is admitted on all sides that the use of low-grade wheat will increase the price to the farmer, a consummation greatly to be desired. It is further admitted that more bread can be obtained from a given quantity of such wheat; it is further admitted that the wheat crop is short; it is further admitted that the kind of bread advocated is more wholesome than white bread, and it is also admitted that its use will not embarrass the miller. Now, if the use of this bread will increase the price to the farmer, will not embarrass the miller, will increase the amount of food in this country, and will better the food from a health point of view, then why in the name of fortune are the people not compelled to use it in time of high cost of living? I can see no reason why a commission should be appointed to inquire into this question when the millers, the grain growers, the producers, the people who know, say that these statements are true. What can a commission ascertain more than we know now — that it will be better for the farmer and the miller, more wholesome for the consumer, and will increase the amount of food in the country?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It will also cheapen the food for the consumer.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It will also reduce the price to the consumer. If a man stood on the market square offering to sell anything and make such statements about it, the people would perhaps think that he was trying to sell them something which required commendation; but here we have all the people who know declaring the statements to be facts.

I have grave doubts whether we can decrease the cost of living merely by regulations; but we certainly can decrease the cost of living by increasing the quantity of food in the country. If the Senate does nothing more during this session than to impress this point upon the Government and the people of Canada it seems to me that they will have done far more for the country than any regulation of prices can do.

Hon. JAMES M. DOUGLAS: Honourable gentlemen, I do not feel that I can criticise what has been said; but I am amazed at the speeches which have just been thrust upon our hearing. It is quite evident that the honourable gentlemen who have spoken on the subject have not a full knowledge of what has been done by the Government of this country. Apparently they have not taken into consideration the varied means that governments of the past in various countries have taken to test the qualities of grain and to prove chemically and otherwise the benefits to be derived from them. I venture to say that if these speeches were made in the presence of wholesale grain growers and gentlemen who are engaged in the milling business, honourable gentlemen would be perfectly amazed at the way in which their arguments would be turned upside down and outside in. I know that some people like brown bread, and some like white bread; but when you want to sell grain, do not take grain that will sour in twenty-four hours before it is manufactured, when it should produce the quality and quantity of flour which it is expected to produce. Will any honourable gentleman in this House venture to say that any grain, any wheat, or any bread, that has been produced is equal to what we are now putting upon the market, if Canada is to retain her place in the wide world as being a great grain-producing country, and to sustain her reputation of producing the best bread that can be eaten on the face of the earth?

It is well enough for men engaged in trade, and law, and all sorts of things, to come here and teach us a lot about farming. There are plenty of men farming who have got brains, and who know what is in flour, and just exactly how much bread can be made from so much grain. You cannot teach these men, because they already know; they know from a chemical standpoint; they know the business root and branch. You could not do anything with such arguments before an agricultural audience. These arguments may do in certain parts of Canada, but they will not do in the Northwest. Sometimes when there is a crop failure it is due to the climatic conditions. I have had some experience in this country of grain-growing and the stock business, during the last forty years, and I have never thought it necessary to make such changes as have been advocated here.

Yesterday or the day before we heard a speech showing that the great producing business of this country, the one that was going to make the country wealthy, was to help to slay our enemies. We were told how we should destroy our sons and daughters, who have been reared with great care and given the best of education. Are we to feed our enemies and give them the best of the grain that we grow, the best of the cattle that we raise, the best food that Canada can produce? What country on earth can do better? Honourable gentlemen, I simply ask you to look into the records of our own country along agricultural lines, and in two or three months you will have changed your opinion on this question. If people want to live on chaff, let them do so; but why should we be asked to feed the people beyond the seas and to destroy our own home food and our home production? How are we going to support our position in the markets of the world, if these arguments are acted upon, and we are going to be regulated? Try the process if you like, and you will find it one of the most difficult things that you could undertake to convince a man that any grain has been grown, or will be grown, that will surpass the White Fife and the Red Fife—and the Marshall, for example, is almost their equal in value in the production of bread or a marketing flour. No special emergency as to food exists in this country. We do not need to run here and there and propound theories about this and that. We have already gone through the process. We have sent out commissions and skilled men who understand this question from a chemical viewpoint, and who know the best processes that can be employed. I think we are wasting time. All that I can conclude from the arguments presented is that some honourable gentlemen seem to need education. They are behind the times. Some of them have been in our midst only a few weeks, and they are not posted as to the growing of grain, or as to what is best to do on the farm. They tell us to go and do this, that, and the other thing. We can only laugh in our sleeves; we are making money even with the grain which we have and the stock which we have, and we do not need to fear anybody. We can hold our own and fight our own battles along these lines, and if people will not educate their children along agricultural lines, but let them grow up in ignorance, in schools or otherwise, they must bear the consequences. I appeal to you, and refer you to what has been done in the past. I do not like the idea of paying $40 a ton for bran. I could use a lot of bran in feeding. Some people talk about feeding cows with wheat. Well, he is not a wise man who makes use of good wheat to feed cattle nor yet to fatten hogs. He will not produce as good a quality of hams, for example. The wheat will be dry and hard, lacking the oily substances necessary to produce the kind of ham that the appetite of the Canadian people demands. We need no commission to inquire into this question. I appeal to you again to give us some new ideas, because the ideas which we have heard expressed here are not new ideas. They are old, exploded ideas. You will find all the information you desire in the records now in the possession of the Government of Canada. I sincerely hope that you will not waste time by appointing commissions and sending them, as has been done in the past, to England, and Scotland and other countries. If they want good grain, they must pay for good grain. The farmers must live—

Hon. Mr. POPE: You are right.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS: And they are not making much profit out of wheat. I have a fairly large acreage under wheat, and this year we are using more power and are breaking up new fields, in order to meet the deficiency, if there should prove to be a deficiency. What I desire is that we may utilize the knowledge that we have already obtained—that it may be used by our legislators, both here and in the other House. We should know what we are talking about, and any quantity of literature on this subject is available. However, I am not afraid of a famine.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Will the honourable gentleman tell us why, in his opinion, off-coloured flour is inferior to white?

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS: It is not inferior; the off-coloured is simply a lower grade of wheat.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS: Oh, yes. Do not tell us it is not, because we are satisfied on that point. There is no other grain today in the hands of the farmers, and acceptable to our millers, in Montreal or anywhere else, that can produce as much bread out of a given quantity of grain as White Fife or Red Fife, as flinty hard as you please. That is what is wanted, and in order to keep our place in the market we must comply with the wishes of our millers and the requirements of the markets abroad. We must do it along the lines I have indicated, and nothing to warrant a change has yet been discovered in the cultivation, the germination, or the cross-breeding of wheat. Can any of these gentlemen tell us how cross-breeding is done in order to produce new varieties of wheat? That is going on at the Experimental Farm in this very city, and you can see it at the proper season. There is nothing in Canada yet known to the scientists that can surpass Red Fife, or White Fife, or Marshall. I leave you to follow up the inquiry on that point, and you will find that I am right.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Did not the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Douglas), who is a scientific man, tell us just now that in twenty-four hours whole wheat flour would turn sour? I understood the honourable gentleman to say that.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Or in forty-eight hours?

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS: I do not remember saying that.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman does not remember, but I remember full well. He said that in twenty-four hours it would turn sour. I ask him what kind of bread he has eaten all his life. Is it not the bread made from white flour by the Hungarian process?

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS: We are content to eat it until the end, because we want no better, and would not exchange it for anything the honourable gentleman has offered.

notwithstanding any of the arguments he has presented on the floor of this House. I am sure they would not be accepted by any scientist, or anyone who knows anything about the processes of chemistry in connection with wheat germination and wheat growth and the production of flour, or about the interest of the farmer. I should modify that reference to the interest of the farmer. Farmers could grow other grain, grain that would be more profitable to them than what they are now growing, but our manufacturers persist in requiring a kind of wheat that will enable them to produce a certain quality of flour, so that when it goes to Europe or anywhere else in the world's markets it may take first place; and you cannot change that by anything that has been suggested here to-day. I am amazed that honourable gentleman should not know all that and a great deal more, because the information is at hand.

We have heard speeches in this House year after year, we have had scientific investigations, and we have gone to the expense of sending commissions all the way to Britain and elsewhere. Even the United States cannot compete with us. And where is the country on the face of God's earth that can produce anything better than what we have? We are not so poor that we cannot afford to follow up what we have done in the past, or at least hold our own, and provide good, solid, wholesome food. Why should we go back? Why should $40 a ton be paid for bran? We do not want that cattle feed. It is good for putting a fine, glossy coat on calves, or for finishing off the feeding of your best stock, but that is about all. We can afford better than that, though sometimes we think we must try it, on account of the exactions of our millers, who study their business in the light of its results in the money market. Flour may be high in price; it is high in price, more than it is worth really; but on whom does the pressure come? Who is suffering by this pressure? The farmer is not making money out of the high prices. The farmer got high prices last fall, and he is getting high prices to-day, but they do not benefit him much in the long run—do not improve his business or increase his resources. It is the manufacturers who get the advantage; they are the men who are making the money. I came to the conclusion that I could not afford to raise wheat very much longer, for the simple reason that I could not make it pay, even with the use of machinery and of artificial power in producing it; but just now we are turning over the soil, and we shall increase our acreage very largely, because there is the possibility of a scarcity. But who is causing the scarcity? If we can get our men, who are willing to sacrifice their own sons, to do anything and everything possible to bring this war to a successful conclusion, we need not bother about the kind of bread that is eaten by the German. He can if he chooses eat black bread, such as is described in the bulletin, but we are not yet obliged to do that and we do not intend to do it. We will send out our boys with well-fed muscles. We will send them out with a deep feeling of pride that Canada is our permanent home, and woe be to any man who will interfere with their rights, their civil or political rights, and the truth that is to make us a free and honourable people. That is what we want.

I should not have taken so much time as I have done. I speak somewhat freely because some years ago I had the honour of being chairman of the Committee on Agriculture for this Dominion, and I think that our experience gives us the privilege of a little latitude. What I desire to say is this: We have made agriculture a success. We do not mean to say that we have not made it a paying business; but we do mean to say that we are not in any secondary position so far as agriculture is concerned. If we utilize what has been done by the late Government and what is being done by the present Government, we shall overcome any difficulties that may loom up in the distance

Hon. FREDERIC NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, the longer I have listened to this discussion the less I seem to know about it. When it started I thought the purpose was to suggest that we could economize in the production of our foodstuffs by using whole-wheat bread, because, primarily, it was more wholesome, and, secondly, it was less costly.

Hon. Mr. DOUGLAS: But we do not all believe that. That is the difficulty in this discussion; we do not believe what has been said.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: If the honourable gentleman is quite through, I will, with your permission, resume my remarks. I would like to ask this simple question. I am not a farmer; I do not know anything about the chemical composition of wheat, but I have been told and have read, and had it impressed upon me, that whole-wheat bread is much more wholesome than the white bread of commerce, from which all the germ of the wheat and all the really wholesome properties have been extracted by rolling. If that is so, and if whole-wheat bread can be substituted at a lower price, and if it contains a very much larger percentage of nutriment, I for one cannot see why the time of this House should be taken up with such a diatribe about chemical composition as that to which we have listened. In the interests of this country we are expected to economize during the war, and the appointment of a food commissioner is urged. The simple question involved in the proposed resolution is whether whole wheat bread is as wholesome as, or more wholesome than, ordinary bread, and whether it is as cheap, or cheaper. If it is both more wholesome and cheaper, I hold that it is a good thing for this country favourably to consider using it.

Hon. JOHN W. DANIEL: I do not wish to take up the time of this honourable House, and I do not propose to do so, but it would appear from the speeches of one honourable gentleman here and another there that this is a very simple question. There must be reasons for the great perfection to which the milling of white flour has been brought in Canada. It appears to me that our present kind of fine flour is made for one or two reasons. While we have heard many remarks about the wholesomeness and the greater cheapness of utilizing a larger part of the berry, that is, of having something nearer a whole wheat flour, we have also heard it stated that one reason why that process is not used to the same extent now as it was formerly, is because that kind of flour will not keep. If that is a fact—and I believe it to be a fact—that is one reason why we have so much white flour in preference to the brown flour, and, of course, it is a very important reason, too. In order to give you an idea of what occurred during the South African war with regard to the flour that was sent out to our soldiers in South Africa, I will read a statement which I find in the tenth volume of the Encyclopædia Britannica on this subject. It says:

The tendency of flours containing germ to become rancid is well marked. During the South African war of 1899-1902 the British army supply department had a practical proof of the diastasic action of branny particles in flour. Soldiers' bread is not usually of white colour, and the military authorities not unnaturally believed that comparatively low-grade flour, if sound, was eminently suitable for use in the field bakeries. But in the climate of South Africa flour of this description soon developed considerable acidity.

In other words, it turned sour.

Ultimately the supply department gave up buying any but the driest patent flours, and it is understood that the most suitable flour proved to be certain patents milled in Minneapolis, U.S.A., from hard spring wheat.

That is one of the reasons, I take it, that has caused the general use of this white flour.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Speculation also.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Well, it is not the only reason. I congratulate the hon. gentleman (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) on the very learned way in which he introduced this subject into the House. I think he is deserving of a great deal of congratulation in that respect. I would scarcely like to follow him and echo as perfectly accurate all the statements that he made in that speech. I think he rather overdrew the picture. He spoke of the decadence of civilization and civilized people. Is it because we have had so much white flour in Canada that we now hear complaints against conscription? Is that one of the reasons? Is the absence of virility to be put down to the use of white flour? If so, I would certainly support the motion of the honourable gentleman and be satisfied with any law that would result in the use of whole wheat flour. That would be a consummation most devoutly to be wished. But the consensus of opinion, as far as I can ascertain, is that flour—I will not say whole wheat flour, but flour containing a larger percentage of the wheat than we get in our present flour, would be advisable; it would be more wholesome, containing more nutriment than the present flour.

The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) stated, I think, that our present flour is absolutely devoid of gluten. I could not go with him that far. I think he is incorrect in that. I do not think it would be possible to bake a flour that had no gluten in it. It would contain nothing but starch, and you cannot make bread out of starch; you must have something else. As a matter of fact, there is gluten in it when it is properly made, though not so much as is found in the ordinary grain of wheat. Gluten is what the bakers want. They like what is called a strong flour. Well, what is a strong flour in the baker's sense? It is a flour with a good deal of gluten in it. By the use of this kind of flour you get better rising properties, and, of course, gluten being one of the principal alimentary ingredients of flour, you get more nourishment too.

The resolution before the House might, I think, be modified to advantage; but the idea is, in my opinion, a correct one, although in the remarks that have been made I have heard nothing to convince me that whole wheat flour is going to be any cheaper than white flour. Nobody, so far as I know, has referred to that. Everybody appears to have taken for granted that it would be cheaper. With reference to the manufacture of flour, we must remember this also, that besides the use of flour for bread this country requires a great deal of milk and cream and cheese, and the people who raise dairy and other cattle cannot do so to advantage unless they have some of the by-products of flour in order to feed the cattle. While in producing the ordinary white flour the ingredients of the whole berry are not all used, some of them are utilized to our advantage in other ways.

I think the matter is one that comes within the cognizance of this House, and one that we might fairly bring to the consideration of the Government, or those departments of the Government that may be interested in this particular question, in order that it might be so considered that the people of this country would receive the best advantage from the debate that has taken place in this House this afternoon and previously.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Casgrain (for Hon. Mr. Beique), the debate was adjourned till Tuesday next.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY inquired of the Government:

What were the gross earnings and working expenses of the National Transcontinental Railway from Moncton to Winnipeg for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1917?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Gross earnings, $5,916,550.99; working expenses, $7,806,922.20.

ST. JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY inquired of the Government:

What were the gross earnings and working expenses of the St. John and Quebec Railway for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1917?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Gross earnings, $81,325.63; working expenses, $98,-300.42.

THE 78TH HIGHLANDERS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. TANNER moved for:

An order of the Senate for a return showing:

1. The name and rank of each person who at the outbreak of the war in August, 1914, was an officer, commissioned or provisional, of the 78th Regiment (Highlanders), of Pictou County, Nova Scotia.

2. The length of time each of such persons was attached to said regiment.

3. (a) The name of each of said officers who joined the Canadian Overseas Forces.
(b) The unit to which he was attached.
(c) The rank with which he was attached.
(d) The date at which he was attached.

4. The name of each person who since the outbreak of war became attached as provisional officers to said 78th Regiment and the date at which each such person became attached and his rank.

5. (a) The name of each of the officers referred to in paragraph 4 who joined the Canadian overseas forces.
(b) The unit to which he was attached.
(c) The rank with which he was attached.
(d) The date at which he was attached.

6. The name of each of the officers referred to in each of the foregoing paragraphs who were in active service at the fighting front, the units with which they served, and the length of time they served.

7. Particulars as to each of the said officers showing where each one was on May 1, 1917, to what unit he was attached, and what his rank was at that time.

8. If any of these officers have gone to the fighting front since May 1, state name, unit, rank and date.

The motion was agreed to.

EXHIBITION TRAIN IN FRANCE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN moved for:

An order of the Senate for copies of all correspondence, memoranda or other documents received by or sent by the Right Hon. the Prime Minister and the Hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning a project to advertise Canadian products by the organization of an exhibition train of sample goods in France.

The motion was agreed to.

THE EXPENSES OF PARLIAMENT.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate have appointed the Hon. Messrs. Power, Bowell (Sir Mackenzie, K.C.M.G.), Dandurand, Thompson, Bostock, Taylor, Gordon, and Daniel a committee to act with that already chosen by the House of Commons, to consider and during the present session to report the total cost, including incidental expenses, of each session of Parliament, and the best way, if any, of reducing the same.

He said: This is in answer to a message that was brought down from the House of Commons to this House yesterday:

Hon. Mr. POWER: I regret that I overlooked that message. Would it not be better to allow it to stand, say, until Tuesday? The honourable the leader of the Opposition would, I think, like to speak on the subject, and I myself have some doubt as to the wisdom of our dealing with the matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I agree to let it stand until to-morrow.

The motion was allowed to stand.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

On the motion for the adjournment of the House:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: May I ask my honourable friend when we may expect the papers for which I moved on the 26th of April last, with regard to the proceedings in the Exchequer Court in the case of the Quebec and Saguenay Railway.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All the papers have apparently been brought down with the exception of a letter which was sent to the Prime Minister by the Solicitor General, and I am endeavouring to ascertain whether that communication can be laid on the Table or not.

Hon. Mr. TANNER.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I did not know that the papers had been brought down to the Senate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think they are here. However, I will make further inquiries. In any case, all the papers from which information is obtainable are already down.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I beg to inquire of the honourable the leader of the Government if the papers regarding the request of the British Government for rails for the Allies have been brought down in the House of Commons, and, if so, if copies of those papers could not be laid on the table of the Senate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am unaware whether that correspondence has been brought down or not. If it has been laid on the table of the House of Commons, it certainly should be laid on the table of the Senate. I will see that that is done.

The Senate adjourned until Friday at three o'clock p.m.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

On the Order:

Consideration of the report of the special committee appointed upon the arrangements which should be made for the celebration of the 50th anniversary of the foundation of this Dominion.—Hon. Mr. McLennan.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: I move the adoption of the report, with the change of the phrase, "that appropriate memorial services be held at London and Paris," to, "that arrangements be made with the authorities in England and France to hold appropriate services on July 1st or July 2nd."

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would call my hon. friend's attention to the words in the first paragraph, "that a topical pamphlet comparing and contrasting Canada of 1867." The word "topical" seems to me to be rather peculiar. Would it not be better to use the word "descriptive?"

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: I could defend the word "topical," but I think perhaps "descriptive" would be a little clearer.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I may say that the Parliament Building Committee consider that some changes should be made in the inscription to be placed on the pillar in the new Parliament Buildings. Therefore, if it is agreeable, I think it would be well to adjourn the consideration of this matter to a future day, so that the two committees may get together in the meanwhile.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: The only difficulty, I understand, is that the architect would require almost immediately to get ready the inscription and make the column.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I think it was, suggested that the matter be referred to Mr. Campbell, of the Archives, who might be able to design something more appropriate. I think the Building Committee meets next Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: I am perfectly willing that the report should stand until next Wednesday.

The motion was withdrawn.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMITTEE.

REPORTS.

On the Order:

Consideration of the second report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.—Hon. Mr. Power.

Hon. Mr. POWER: With the permission of the House, I prefer that some other honourable gentleman should move the adoption of this report, as I do not concur in the report, for the reason that it says:

Your committee are of opinion that these appointments are matters coming more properly within the sphere of the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament.

That is not my opinion. The Joint Committee on the Library is very likely not to meet at all this session, and consequently this matter is liable to be indefinitely postponed. Neither the law nor the rules of the House require that a recommendation of this kind should be referred to any committee; it is left to the discretion of the Senate to refer it, or concur in it, or throw it out at once. There is no question, I fancy, as to the propriety of the recommendations made by the Joint Librarians and concurred in by His Honour the Speaker; but, instead of sending it to the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament, I think the better course would be to have the House adopt the recommendation of His Honour the Speaker, and when some honourable gentleman moves the adoption of the report, I propose to move that as an amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In answer to what my honourable friend has said, and with a view to establishing some regularity in our practice, I suggest that the motion should be to lay upon the Table the report of the Internal Economy Committee upon this particular subject. That being done, a motion would be in order for concurrence in the report of the Joint Librarians. The Joint Librarians of Parliament are in a position analogous to that of a deputy minister, and the joint Houses of Parliament are in a position analogous to that of a minister; consequently, when the Joint Librarians submit an appointment, it is confirmed by the Joint Houses practically acting in the same capacity as a minister. Therefore I move that the report of the Internal Economy Committee be laid on the Table.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: As a member of the committee, I may say that when the matter came before them for consideration, it was felt that the Senate could only have knowledge of the facts through a committee of the Senate. All we had to act upon was the report of the Librarians; we did not know whether or not the joint committee had dealt with the question; and it seemed to us that we ought to have been advised from that source. I think it is rather extraordinary that the chairman, acting for the committee, hesitates to move the adoption of the report of the committee. He wants somebody else to do that. I understand that the chairman ought to act in accordance with the wishes of the committee over which he presides.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There would have been no irregularity if the Senate had asked the Committee on Internal Economy to make inquiries as to the facts leading up to the appointment and to report those facts to this House; but unfortunately the Committee on Internal Economy has made a report, thus arrogating to itself the right to report on the matter, and the report is that these appointments are matters coming more properly within the sphere of the Joint Committee of the Library of Parliament. That is inaccurate. While I must admit that I myself suggested the other day that probably that committee would have authority to deal with the subject, it is only the joint Houses of Parliament who would have authority to confirm the action of the Joint Librarians, and this Chamber, in concurring in the report of the Joint Librarians, would of course be acting as one of the Houses of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: We have no report from the Joint Committee on the Library that they have taken any action in the matter. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Power) says the Joint Committee will not meet this session. They have not met, and this matter comes before us for approval without a recommendation from that committee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I could very well understand our committee advising this House that there was no objection to the appointment, but our committee cannot properly report that it comes within the sphere of the Joint Committee. It is simply a matter of straightening out the practice.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: When the matter came before the Internal Economy Committee, they arrived at the conclusion that it had been sent to the wrong committee, and should have been sent to the Joint Committee on the Library. I am inclined to think that that committee should report before an appointment is made on the recommendation of the Librarians.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: In the other House these same appointments have to be approved of. We read in the Official Report of the Debates of the House of Commons of the 6th June:

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON.

Sir Robert Borden moved:

That the recommendation of His Honour the Speaker, laid on the table of the House on the 14th instant, respecting the appointment of Mr. Herbert Charles Stock to the position of messenger in the Library of Parliament, be concurred in.

Of course, the Speaker received the report from the Joint Librarians. That is the way the thing is done in the House of Commons, and it appears to me it might just as well be done in that same way here.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: The Speaker of the House of Commons makes that recommendation as chairman of the Internal Economy Committee.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say that we have not apparently before us any recommendation from the Speaker. The only thing that we have before us, according to the report of the Internal Economy Committee, is a communication from the Joint Librarians of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: That is all.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Perhaps the House will allow me to make a short answer to what was said by my honourable friend from Fredericton (Hon. Mr. Thompson) with respect to the irregularity of my conduct. My duty is to present the report of the committee. I presented the report at the earliest practicable date, and it was put down for consideration to-day. But surely I am not compelled to endorse a report which I do not conscientiously believe in, especially when there are numbers of gentlemen, like my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Thompson), prepared to endorse the report and to move its adoption.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The report of the Internal Economy Committee is already on the Table of the House, and I believe it would be just as well to postpone consideration of the matter till a fixed date, when we may be ready to make an amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think there is any disposition to interfere with the report. It is on the Table, and we can leave it there. Then I would move concurrence in the communication of the Joint Librarians of Parliament, laid on the Table by His Honour the Speaker.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Power, the third report of the committee was concurred in.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved concurrence in the fourth report of the committee. He said: Two of our messengers have enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and no special provision was made for their payment. The Accountant came to me and asked what he was to do about these men. They were being paid, I think, at the rate of three dollars a day as messengers, and the question was whether they should continue to receive that amount, or be paid some lower amount, or be allowed nothing in addition to their military pay. The Accountant told me that in the Commons the messengers who had joined the Expeditionary Force were allowed $50 a month each. I thought we should be safe in making the same arrangement as to our two messengers, but, of course, it was desirable to have the authority of the Senate for doing that, and for that reason this report is presented.

The report was concurred in.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved concurrence in the fifth report of the committee. He said: This report simply recommends that Mr. Bérubé, who has had charge of the reading room for some years and who is a most energetic and efficient officer, be appointed to the position of curator. There is no difference of opinion on the subject.

The report was concurred in.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved concurrence in the sixth report of the committee. He said: This report recommends that the amanuenses employed in the Debates Office of the Senate be paid at the rate of five dollars per day as sessional employees, but with half pay only for such period of any adjournment as exceeds seven days. These employees are very efficient. As honourable gentlemen have noticed, our reports this session have been very much better than the reports in the past. There is no question that five dollars a day is only a moderate and reasonable allowance.

The report was concurred in.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Before we pass from the subject, I would like to ask the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee, or the chairman of whatever committee has charge of the matter, what is going to be done about supplying senators with additional stenographers and typewriters. The stenographers available to members on this side of the House are not at all competent and are utterly unable to overtake the work that at present offers, and unless the appointment of additional stenographers is authorized, conditions will before long be still worse.

Hon. Mr. POWER: That is a matter which should perhaps have come up at the last meeting of the Internal Economy Committee; but there were a great many items before the committee. The honourable the leader of the House was unavoidably absent, and, as there were some items which might be looked upon as contentious they were left over. But the intention is to try to have a meeting next week and dispose of the matter referred to with the others.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: How many stenographers have we now?

Hon. Mr. POWER: Four. I have a report from the Clerk of the Senate, who has had a great deal of experience with stenographers and typewriters, and he certifies that one of the four is extremely competent and capable, while the others are somewhat deficient. We thought, and I believe the honourable the leader of the Government agrees with me, that before appointing additional stenographers we should consider the matter in the committee.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I do not think we should consider the matter so long that the session will end before it is remedied. There is no question that the stenographers, at least those that we use, are altogether inefficient. There is only one of the staff that is at all efficient; she might be termed super-efficient, and she has in consequence to do all the work.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I would like to say, in reply to the honourable gentleman, that I made inquiries of members on this side of the House, and Hon. Mr. Taylor inquired of members on the other side, and members have reported that the stenographers are giving good satisfaction, so far as the two for this side are concerned.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is for your side of the House. But we do not have their services at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say that complaints have been made to myself with regard to the inefficiency of certain stenographers. I do not know them personally. I took the liberty of suggesting to my honourable friend the senior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), the Chairman of the Committee, that some form of examination should be set before the appointments are made.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And I think I submitted to him a method whereby one of the officers of the House could readily determine the efficiency of candidates for appointment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is the proper way. Why not at once authorize some official of the House to take charge of that examination and dispose of the matter?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I suggested that the Clerk of the House, who is himself most competent in stenography, should determine the matter. I think the House could safely leave the matter in his hands.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Why not sanction it now?

Hon. Mr. TANNER: I understand that this matter is now in the hands of the Committee on Internal Economy. That committee will not meet until some time next week; then the report will come in and lie on the Table for a day or two, and another week will elapse before anything will be done. In the meantime, on this side of the House we have one competent stenographer to do the work of twelve or fifteen senators. It is physically impossible for any stenographer, however competent she may be, to do that work.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: For nearly forty senators.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: For my part, I find I have to wait the greater part of a day before getting a chance to dictate a letter. Surely, when there is one stenographer for every three members of the House of Commons, honourable gentlemen at this end of the building should have at least equal accommodation. I hope that there is some way of disposing of a trifling matter like this immediately, so that we may have our business transacted. I do not like to be obliged to spend the day watching in the corridor to see if I can catch a stenographer. I would like to get my work done.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: I presume that the stenographers who have been mentioned as competent or incompetent are the English stenographers. There is one French stenographer for the whole Senate, a very competent one, I believe, and very obliging, but she is much crowded with work. To overcome the difficulty, I have been obliged for the last two weeks to get my correspondence written outside of the Senate.

I think the whole question might be considered and that we who have French correspondence should not be altogether disregarded and neglected.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I can corroborate the statement of the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Poirier) that the stenographer to whom he refers is very competent, not only in French, but equally in English.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: I know half her time is taken up by my English colleagues.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I beg leave to move that the matter of the efficiency of the stenographers and the number required be left altogether in the hands of the Clerk.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: And that he act immediately.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: That would be the best way, I think.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: It was arranged agreeably to both parties in this House, that honourable Mr. Taylor and I should make the selection—that he should select two stenographers for one side of the House and I should select two for the other. I was careful to select only stenographers who were recommended to me as competent by persons who knew their qualifications. During the early part of the session there was some complaint from the French members regarding French stenographers, but within a week the complaints had disappeared. I went to see those honourable gentlemen, and they said the stenographers were doing first-class work. So far as this side of the House is concerned, I have had no complaints about the two stenographers selected by me. The honourable gentleman from Leeds (Hon. Mr. Taylor) will be able to judge of the efficiency of the stenographers he has selected. I do not think, however, the matter is one calling for action by the House or the Clerk.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I would like to say, as to the stenographers, that I have given them up. I have tried to get some work done. I tried hard last year. This year I have not made any effort at all, I was so utterly disgusted with the work done by the stenographers last year. I asked for a fountain pen this year and said I would do the work myself. That is what I am doing now. The present staff of stenographers, with one or two exceptions, is a farce.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: I agree with my colleague (Hon. Mr. Watson) in reference to the manner in which we selected the stenographers. He selected two for the members of the Opposition and I selected two for the Conservative members. Honourable gentlemen must understand that it is very difficult to secure a good stenographer to-day.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: They are engaged either in the departments or in the Commons, and I do not know where you can get a competent stenographer in the city. I selected one who, I believe, is one of the best in the city. But a great many of the members have individually enough work for one stenographer. I did make application early in the session to have the staff enlarged. We should have for each side of the House two more stenographers; then one or two members would not monopolize the best one all the time, as is done at present.

The matter is to be dealt with by the committee on Tuesday or Wednesday of next week. We shall have a report from the Clerk of the House as to the efficiency of these four stenographers. I understand that the Clerk has held a test, and no doubt application will be made to him, or he will be given authority to select a couple more if necessary, as two are certainly not enough to do the work of honourable gentlemen on either side of the House.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: In making a selection of stenographers why should the honourable gentleman confine himself to Ottawa? There are many cities other than Ottawa where there are plenty of capable stenographers; the woods are full of them.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: We had only two to select from.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Honourable gentlemen appear to be labouring under a misapprehension in regard to this matter. The honourable leader of the Government made the suggestion, which I thought a very proper one, and upon which I acted almost immediately, that I should consult one of our officers, who is a skilful shorthand writer and typist, and ask him to examine these four young ladies. I spoke to the Clerk, and he has held an examination, and has made a report to me which will be submitted to the Committee on Internal Economy next week. Some honourable gentlemen seem to think that every senator should have a stenographer for his own use.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Those who have work.

Hon. Mr. POWER: That would be a rather large order. It is not very long since no senator had a stenographer.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I would like to second the motion of the honourable gentleman from Tignish (Hon. Mr. Murphy). I have been obliged to give up entirely the use of the stenographers. I do not know who chose the French stenographer, but I know that she does work for members on both sides of the House, not only in French, but in English as well. I have dictated a few letters, but owing to the delay in getting them I have since given up the idea and have been writing my letters by hand. This is not practical. In my opinion, the country ought to pay for what each of us gets in his own office—the clerical assistance required. If the matter were left in the hands of the Clerk of the Senate, he could engage assistance and could dismiss any employee who would be unable to do the work.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Why not engage returned soldiers who are typists and stenographers? Here is an opening for capable men.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: In my humble opinion, if the senators fully understood the inconvenience to which the commercial community is subjected through lack of stenographers, they would be perfectly satisfied with any stenographer they could get.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: There is no difficulty in getting stenographers if you are willing to pay for them. I understand that the maximum paid here is $75 a month. Who expects to employ a competent stenographer for $75 a month? The woods may be full of them, but they are worth more than that in business and professional life. We should pay a fair wage to the stenographers, and let the Clerk be the judge of their efficiency and the salary that they should receive. They should be paid on their merits. Stenographers are like every one else: some are worth a good deal of money to you, and you cannot get them without paying for them. One honourable gentleman has said that we have stenographers here who are efficient in both English and French; then they should receive more considération than those who are not. Of course, the Committee on Internal Economy should have some control over the expenditure of this House; but, as suggested by one honourable gentleman, I think it would be well for the Clerk to be authorized to hire these people and pay them what he considers they are worth, running say from $75 to $150 a month. Then we would have the kind of stenographers we want, and would not be compelled to take as much time in reading over and correcting letters as it takes to dictate them.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I hope the Senate will not deal with this matter along these lines. Two years ago the Government was good enough to give the members of this House some clerical assistance. Up to that time we provided our own assistance. Through the honourable the leader of this House it was intimated that four stenographers, two for either side of the House, might be selected to assist the members in doing their work. The correspondence of the members of this House must of necessity be more or less political in character. Therefore the honourable gentleman from Leeds (Hon. Mr. Taylor) on one side and I on the other side were authorized each to select two stenographers. We did so. I made inquiries, and was furnished with stenographers of the right political stripe; and, so far as this side of the House is concerned, I am glad to say that there is little or no complaint about the stenographers. All that the honourable gentleman from Leeds had to do was to satisfy the members on his side of the House, and I would object to any such arrangement as having the right of selection relegated to the Clerk of the House or any one else. If you wish to do away with the present system, all right; but I do not think that this House ought to take action along those lines.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is quite apparent that the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) has taken advantage of the Conservative members of the House, and has selected the better stenographers for the other side of the House. If the honourable gentlemen who have moved and seconded this motion will leave the matter with me, and the House is agreeable, I will see that an arrangement is made with the Clerk.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: In the House of Commons they have one stenographer to every three members.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: They are busy there.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Supplementing what my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) has said about stenographers being able to take dictation in two languages, I may say that this is the case with the special stenographer given to us. She takes dictation in both French and English; therefore we have no occasion to interfere with the privileges of our honourable colleagues who speak a different language.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: If it could be arranged to employ our stenographers in some of the departments during the recess we would have no difficulty in getting a better class of assistants; but our difficulty is that they are employed only for the session, because any good stenographer can get a permanent position and will take it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: For thirty or forty years members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons did their own work.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: This is war time, and we do not want to open any new avenues of expenditure.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: My suggestion is that this matter should be taken into consideration by the joint committee to ascertain if it is not possible to reduce the expenditure of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: In my opinion there should be no such thing as Liberal stenographers and Conservative stenographers. If, in the judgment and experience of the members on this side of the House, that method of selecting stenographers has broken down, some other method should be adopted; and, with the permission of the House and of my seconder, I beg leave to withdraw my motion in favour of the suggestion made by the honourable the leader of the Government.

The motion was withdrawn.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That the report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament as to the appointment of J. Ludger Parr as a clerk in the Library of Parliament, in Subdivision B of the Second Division, accompanied by the certificate of the Civil Service Commissioners, laid on the Table of the Senate on the 5th of June, instant, be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

THE EXPENSES OF PARLIAMENT.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House that the Senate have appointed the Hon. Messrs. Power, Bowell (Sir Mackenzie, K.C.M.G.), Dandurand, Thompson, Bostock, Taylor, Gordon, and Daniel a committee to act with that already chosen by the House of Commons, to consider and during the present session to report the total cost, including incidental expenses, of each session of Parliament, and the best way, if any, of reducing the same.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, it is almost unnecessary for me to enlarge upon this motion. It is proposed that joint action be taken by both Houses of Parliament to consider the subjects set out in the message.

I need scarcely say, in the first place, that on the ground of courtesy we should accept the message of the House of Commons; in the second place, I think it is possessed of every merit. I think such a joint committee of both Houses could sit with great advantage, and endeavour to improve the methods relating to the expenditures of Parliament. Under our system of parliamentary government accretions unquestionably gather upon the hull of the ship of state—

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Barnacles.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: —resulting in a state of inefficiency because of these matters being nobody's business. It is not necessary for me to say that no honourable gentleman would tolerate for a moment in his own business the methods by which the transaction of the business of the public is shackled and manacled. We are assembled in Parliament for the purpose of transacting the public business with the same caution, the same prudence, and the same economical management as we transact our own. It seems to me that if we fail in doing that we are false to the public duties which devolve upon us.

I recall that a few sessions ago a committee was appointed by this House to inquire into some of the expenditures of the Senate, and even by the very casual investigation which we made at that time we were able to save to the country a very substantial amount per annum. We reorganized to some extent the staff of the Senate. I am satisfied that we improved it, and at the same time we carried out certain substantial economies.

The present is a peculiarly fitting time for the adoption of economies in public expenditure. I cannot say that I am aware of the character of the proposed investigation, but allow me to illustrate what I mean in saying that economies may be effected. In both Houses of Parliament, for instance, we have distinct translation branches, in which work is duplicated and overlapped. There is no reason why there should not be a single translation branch to do the work for both Houses of Parliament. We have a branch in each House engaged in translating our statutes, yet there is only one issue of the statutes. The same observations apply to Hansard. I have always been in favour of the official reporting of both Houses being done by one branch. I do not know whether that is feasible or not, but there is no reason why it should not be considered. There is another consideration: is the country deriving any advantage from the enormous expenditures that both Houses of Parliament are making year after year in the publication of Hansard? Is there any good reason why the proceedings of committees, particularly those of the House of Commons, where the greater portion of the work is done in committee, should be published in Hansard? The Hansard of this country, comprising sometimes four or five enormous volumes, which are never referred to, never looked at, costs the country, I suppose, hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Some members of the House will be getting after you.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: These are some of the items that might be considered. I am not so dogmatic as to say that practical effect can be given to these suggestions, but there is no reason why an extended inquiry should not be carried on by a joint committee of both Houses of Parliament to ascertain what unnecessary expenditures we are making and what efficiency we might introduce into the transaction of the public business. I am satisfied that it would inure not only to the satisfaction of Parliament, but also to the advantage of the public.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I am sure that we on this side of the House shall be only too anxious to help my honourable friend and the members of the House of Commons in carrying out the desire expressed for economizing and retrenching in the expenditure of the country. At the present time the need for economy is a pressing question before the country. Perhaps some of the suggestions of my honourable friend can be carried out, and I hope that the members of the Senate on the proposed committee may be able to impress their ideas on the members of the House of Commons.

I might point out to my honourable friend that there has heretofore been a little friction on joint committees of the two Houses. Some members of this House have felt that they have not received quite as much consideration as they ought to receive. I do not know how the House of Commons committee is constituted, but I hope that when the joint committee meets proper consideration will be given to members of the Senate, and that on this occasion there will be nothing similar to what has occurred previously.

Another point that one might suggest to the Government is that in the work of the departments there is, as far as can be learned, a great deal of overlapping, and I hope that this action by Parliament may have a beneficial effect on the Government in suggesting how certain services of the departments might be brought together and retrenchments effected in that way as well. I think that in certain directions there is a great opportunity for that to be done.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I would like to see the name of the mover added to that committee. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) has always practised economy, as far as I know, in this House.

The motion, amended as suggested, was agreed to.

WHOLE WHEAT BREAD.

MOTION.

The Senate resumed from June 6 consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Casgrain:

That, in the opinion of the Senate, during the war, whole wheat bread should be made as soon as possible in Canada.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I have no intention of detaining this honourable House on this question. I was not present during the debate, but I have read the important speeches which were delivered on the question, and in my opinion it deserves our very serious attention. I have procured the data which were referred to by the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), and I have found in them authority for some of his statements, but I fail to find more than a prima facie case. It would, it seems to me, be premature on the part of this honourable House to pass an opinion on the resolution proposed by the honourable gentleman. I am satisfied that there is a good deal of ground for improvement in the use of wheat and the making of bread; but from the information at my disposal I have not been able to ascertain what should be done in the matter. If the honourable gentleman is willing to accept a suggestion, I would suggest that the question be referred to the Health Committee, which is composed of members who have given a great deal of attention to questions affecting public health submitted to it from session to session. The chairman of that committee is a medical man. I am satisfied that would be the best way to deal with the question. The committee would procure the best information available and then make a report, which would have the proper weight not only with this House but also with the House of Commons and the country at large. Therefore, without detaining this honourable House any longer, if the honourable member will accept my suggestion, I will move that the motion be referred to the Committee on Public Health and Inspection of Foods.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I would like to have it clearly understood, and would ask this honourable House to see to it, that the committee does not give this proposal a first-cass funeral, and that it comes back to this House with some recommendation, whether negative or affirmative. Many things have been referred to committees and have never come back. If this matter can be considered by the Committee on Public Health within a reasonable time, I have certainly no objection to referring it to that committee. I suppose the committee will have the usual power to send for persons, papers and records.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

REPORTED RESIGNATION FROM THE CABINET.

INQUIRY.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would like to ask my honourable friend the leader of the Government if he has any statement to make in reference to the reported resignation of a member of the Cabinet, and whether any papers in connection with the matter will be laid on the table of the Senate?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have no statement to make at present. The time may come when such a statement may be desirable. When it does come I shall be very glad to make it.

REGULATION OF WAR CHARITIES.

On the Order:

Second reading Bill P, an Act to incorporate the Army and Navy Veterans in Canada.—Hon. Mr. Sharpe.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have to ask that Bill P and Bill U should remain on the Order Paper for a short time, pending general legislation by the Government. As I intimated a few days ago, it is the intention of the Government to bring down general legislation for the purpose of regulating war charities.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Will that include the Patriotic Fund?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will not include the Patriotic Fund. The legislation which the Government has in view will permit of the organization of these societies, and will permit them to have a corporate entity, so that they will be capable of doing the business they have in view; but it is desirable that there should be some uniformity in regard to them and some system of regulation by the Government.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: The Army and Navy Veterans have been incorporated under the laws of Manitoba since 1886. Their work has extended beyond the limits of the province of Manitoba, and all that they ask in this Bill, as I understand it, is that they may carry on that work in other parts of Western Canada. If they were under a Dominion charter they could carry on their work throughout the Dominion. I think it hardly fair to refuse them a Dominion charter.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is there anything that you are asking to do in the Bill that you could not do under letters patent?

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: We have a provincial charter at the present time. The work of the association has extended into the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The question is whether you could not do the same work under letters patent which would cover the whole of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: If this Bill were allowed to go to the committee, anything objectionable found in it could be cut out.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I direct the attention of my honourable friend to clause 2 of the Bill. He will see that its provisions are of the most sweeping character, and would permit of all kinds of charitable work being entered into by the organization, with the collection of subscriptions from the public. The object of the Government is to regulate these matters.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The honourable leader of the Government has taken a stand which holds up this measure until some Government legislation is completed. In Manitoba there is a conflict between the Veterans' Association and the returned soldiers' organization. The Veterans' Association has been incorporated for a number of years, and it has been in reality a social club. That is all right; it is for a good purpose. The returned soldiers' organization is of a more recent date, and I think it is the most active organization in Manitoba to-day. I think it well that the Government should undertake the control and regulation of all such societies, which collect money from the people, who are absolutely innocent as to what becomes of it.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Is that association of soldiers organized to prevent the expression of opinion at public meetings?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I am not criticising them in regard to that. If I were there I think I would join the veterans.

The order was allowed to stand, also the order for the second reading of Bill U, an Act to incorporate The Great War Veterans Association of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Dennis.

CONSERVATION OF CANADIAN TRADE.

MOTION FOR A COMMITTEE.

The Senate resumed from June 5 consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Nicholls:

That, in the opinion of this honourable House, it is expedient to appoint a committee to inquire into and report upon the best method or methods of conserving and increasing our domestic and overseas trade, to the end that our present prosperity may not unduly suffer when the stimulus resulting from orders for munitions and other war supplies is removed, and that the said committee be composed of the Hon. Messieurs Beaubien, Edwards, McLennan, Dandurand, Gillmor, and the mover.

Hon. C. P. BEAUBIEN: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to add a few suggestions to the able address made by the honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon.

Mr. Nicholls) a few days ago. He has laid before the House a proposition which I consider timely and patriotic, and he has done so in a short, crisp, convincing speech, which to my mind showed clearly the sterling qualities of the business man. I have absolutely no ambition to exhibit to you similar business qualities. A professional man generally has the weakness of the profession which he follows, which unfortunately deprives him of that precision which is so essential to the business man. With your indulgence, however, I will attempt to do my best.

The trade of Canada, it seems to me, has up to the present time developed somewhat as water flows in a stream: it has gone from Canada by gravitation, and little has been done to help it along. I will for a few moments try to illustrate that idea with reference to certain of the resources of our country. Under the pre-war conditions we were living on the marvellous resources of this land and, so to speak, borrowing from the future. But after the war, to my mind, conditions will be changed. Then the nations will be hungry, lean, and intent upon securing the absolute necessities of life. Then, in my opinion, we shall see a war of trade as we now see actual warfare on the battlefields of France. We shall see a war of trade organized, directed, and subsidized by state governments. If that is the case, honourable gentlemen, what shall we do?

There is no land in the world that can compare with Canada in the growing of wheat. I had occasion last year to visit France, and to my great surprise I found that our Canadian wheat had penetrated very little, indeed, into the French market. A few figures will establish this clearly.

In 1913 we exported to France 222,000 bushels of wheat. In the year 1916 we exported to the same country 3,842,362 bushels. France imports a large quantity of wheat. She imports yearly 731,000,000 francs worth of cereals. Let me illustrate in a striking way, as I have seen it, the importance of wheat importation to France. I was informed that a large firm importing wheat into France had for the purchase of wheat in foreign lands the following representatives: in North Russia, 50 buyers; in South Russia, 64 buyers; in Argentina, 34 buyers; in Roumania, 28 buyers; in India, 18 buyers; in Australia, 4 buyers; and in Canada, one buyer, who occasionally comes over from the United States.

Canada now ranks fifth among the nations of the world in the production of wheat. Very soon, I believe, we shall rank third. Is there not something to be done along the lines traced by this resolution to increase our foreign trade in wheat and I may add also in oats? I will refrain from speaking of oats, as my argument for wheat applies equally well to this commodity. Is there not something to be done to secure in this respect a better share of the French market?

I always remember a thing which, though simple in itself, impressed me deeply. I once came to a swiftly-running stream that divided two friendly communities. The people at first did not know how to get across. What did they do? They stretched a steel cable across the stream, and, by turning their boat one way or the other, used the adverse current which had divided them as a means of bringing them together. Is it not possible to take from the adverse conditions created by the war a force which we can usefully employ to develop our foreign and home trade? Owing to the war we have exported to France a great quantity of wheat, and what has been the result? An admirable advertisement of our products all over France. There is not a miller in France who will not acknowledge that Canadian wheat will make more bread and better bread than any other wheat in the world. Is the present not an opportune time for us to use the adverse conditions of the war which are costing us so much in money and blood, to introduce permanently into France the wheat of our beautiful fields of Canada? How could that be done? By a campaign in which we would ask the French millers to specialize in Canadian wheat. With the feeling of sympathy for Canada now running so high in France, that undertaking, you may rest assured, would not be difficult.

What can we do to increase our home trade in wheat? The discussion that took place in this House a few days ago has shown conclusively the importance of this question; and, by the way, the Gazette of yesterday states that whole wheat bread is now being used in England with very good results. May I quote from its special London cable service:

> Bread rations are three pounds per week. The bread made by Government recipes is a great improvement on the former bread, and saves white flour, whole wheat being utilized.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Let us disregard the exclusive use of whole wheat flour in Canada as being perhaps a difficult proposition for us to cope with at present, and take the recommendation of the honourable member for Kingston (Hon. Mr. Richardson) to use 76 per cent flour. I speak subject to correction, but I understood him to say that by using 76 per cent flour we could save six pounds of flour in every bushel of wheat. I also take it from him that 196 pounds of flour will make 280 pounds of bread. Roughly speaking, that means that six pounds of flour will yield about nine pounds of bread. Then every one of the 80,000,000 bushels of wheat that we consume yearly could afford us a saving of nine pounds of bread. This means the stupendous saving of 730,000,000 pounds of bread, if my information is exact. It is admitted, I understand, that 300 pounds of bread per capita is used each year. Let the estimate be as liberal as possible; say one pound per capita per day. What does that mean? It means that our population, now estimated to be 7,000,000, uses 210,000,000 pounds of bread a month; and if it be true that we can save 730,000,000 pounds of bread in a year, the bread thus saved would feed the whole nation for 104 days. It is, I think, admitted, in the first place, that the producer would get more money, because he could to better advantage sell his low-grade wheat; secondly, that the miller would lose no money; and, thirdly, that the consumer would get better bread, more bread, and cheaper bread.

Allow me to touch upon another subject, which I believe is also of great interest to the country, namely, the lumber industry. France imports 220,000,000 francs worth of ordinary lumber a year. Last year, while in France, I inquired whether that country imported any of our lumber, and to my utter amazement I learned that Canadian lumber was absolutely unknown in France. Lately an effort has been made by the British Columbia Government to advertise British Columbia fir in France. We export about $40,000,000 worth of lumber a year. Could we not, there again, make use of the adverse conditions of the war? At the end of this war no less than 3,500 municipalities in France will have been completely destroyed. That is more than exist in the whole of Canada. In the province of Quebec there are only 1,242 municipalities, counting not only the cities and villages, but also the little out-of-the-way places at the cross roads, which have post offices. Those destroyed towns and villages in France have to be rebuilt, and if after the war, when our mills are stopped and our workmen are thrown out of employment, we could face this task of building anew, equipping, and furnishing that once beautiful but now desolate country, would not that be a marvellous opportunity to help to sustain and stimulate our lumber trade and industries? I do not by any means assert that we can secure all that lumber trade of France, but we ought to obtain our fair share of it. The French people are desirous of giving us that fair share, and why should we not make preparations now to secure it?

Honourable gentlemen, that is what I respectfully suggest could be done outside of Canada for our lumber trade. What could be done at home? An immense quantity of lumber is, of necessity, I believe, lost in the carrying on of lumbering operations; but I am told by very good authority that by means of simple legislation a large portion of the wood now lost could be utilized for the manufacture of ethyl alcohol, which would enable us to manufacture many chemicals and pharmaceutical products, especially chloroform, which Germany, I understand, controlled prior to the war. Why should we not do that, again using the adverse conditions in which the war places us, to prevent this waste and turn it into profit?

With reference to our fisheries, I have read, to my great astonishment, a debate in the House of Commons, in which members of Parliament who must be admirably versed in this subject stated that for twenty years our fishing industry had been practically at a standstill. Although the products of our fisheries to-day are valued at $35,000,000, as compared with $20,000,000 twenty years ago, the increase is in price rather than in production, the actual increase in production being only eight per cent. In a country that boasts of possessing the finest, the richest fisheries in the world, is that a satisfactory result? The price of meat has greatly increased, and war conditions will probably continue to enhance these prices from day to day, or from month to month. Can we not there again use the adverse conditions of the war? We should endeavour to increase the output of our sea food not only for the home market but for many foreign markets as well. It seems that this can be accomplished by two methods: firstly, by cheaper production, and, secondly, by cheaper and better distribution.

Another great asset of this country is our water-powers. I have been told and have often read that Canada and Norway possess the finest and cheapest water-powers in the world. In Canada there are many water-powers that can be developed at a capital cost of from $50 to $60 per horse-power. Can we not use these water-powers to establish new and profitable industries? We are now making our powder with nitric acid from saltpetre or nitrate of soda, every pound of which is imported from Chili. This saltpetre costs us $80 a ton. With water-powers capable of development on the basis of $65 per horse-power, I have it upon very reliable authority that we could manufacture nitrate of soda at $45 a ton, which would mean a saving of $35 a ton on the several thousands of tons which we are importing into this country every month. I am not at liberty to say exactly how many tons are so imported; but it is sufficient to know that several ships of several thousand tons' capacity are continually used for the transportation of that commodity. By so using our water-powers we could economize to the extent of several hundreds of thousands of dollars a month. By that economy we can operate and maintain in this country a new industry—an industry that will render us absolutely independent of Chili so far as saltpetre is concerned; and any one can conceive how necessary this might be when he remembers that German submarines can now cross the ocean and menace New York. Why should they not also cross the Pacific? What could prevent them establishing a base somewhere on the coast of South America, and torpedoing every boat carrying a cargo of nitrate of soda to Canada? If that were done, not a pound of powder could be manufactured in Canada. Apart from the necessities of war, present and future, nitric acid could provide nitrates which, used as fertilizers, would produce the same results here as they have the world over in increasing the productivity of the land.

Honourable gentlemen, there are also by-products of the iron industry which could be used to better advantage than they are now. Some are used in the manufacture of explosives. They could be employed to much greater advantage in the production of powder, and especially in the making of a stabilizer now altogether purchased at substantial cost from foreign markets. We could use these products also in the manufacture of aniline dyes. What happened in France? The modern process for the manufacture of dyes was first invented by a scientist of Lyons and developed there, but soon afterwards purchased by the Germans and made into one of the greatest world-wide monopolies. When the war broke out practically no dyes could be obtained. As a consequence what was done in France? The Government there spent one hundred million francs to create this industry anew, and I am informed that similar steps are being taken in England, where an enormous company called the British Dyes has been created and subsidized by the British Government.

In the House of Commons yesterday the Minister of Trade and Commerce, after announcing the appointment of Mr. McGrath as controller of fuel, read the Order in Council making this appointment, in which it is said:

> At the present moment the outlook for the coming season gives cause for grave anxiety and calls for prompt and efficient action if subsequent shortage and its consequent privations are to be avoided. The Quebec district, which formerly drew for its needs for railways and factories some 2,000,000 tons of bituminous coal from Nova Scotia mines, cannot estimate on more than 200,000 tons from that source. Nearly all the prospective output of these mines will be required for local needs, bunkering purposes, and the use of the Intercolonial Railway. This transfers the supply of this deficiency to the United States mines, whilst in middle Canada the demands have to be met, if at all, by drawing upon United States sources.

This looks very ominous, and in the face of this condition of affairs it would be well for honourable gentlemen to read the book prepared by Dr. Haanel, Director of Mines, on the development of peat bogs for the production of fuel. I glanced at it the other day and found it very interesting. In this country there are 12,000 square miles of peat bog capable of producing 9,300,000,000 tons of peat fuel, which are equivalent to 5,400,000,000 tons of anthracite coal, and sufficient to provide fuel for 5,300,000 families for one hundred years. That sounds a little like a fable, but in reality what has happened? The Government built a model plant at Alfred to manufacture peat fuel on a small scale, and it succeeded so well that a private corporation has been formed and has bought the peat bogs there. According to Dr. Haanel, an experiment has been made in producing power from that fuel for manufacturing purposes. The Government established in Ontario a peat producer gas power plant, which furnished evidence that one horse-power produced by peat fuel would cost yearly $11.25.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Half the price of coal.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: And what would one horse-power cost with bituminous coal, not at the prices of to-day, but at $4 a ton? It would cost $18.

This peat question in itself seems to me well worth an investigation. We live in a beautiful country with unlimited possibilities; but we cannot get away from the fact that it is a very large country for seven million people to develop.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: What will be the result if you still take away 100,000 of the young men of this country to be slaughtered on the battlefield? How can you produce more wheat and more lumber and develop more water-powers?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I do not know whether my honourable friend thinks that this is a proper occasion to anticipate the speech which he has reserved for the question of conscription.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: No, no. It is a proper question.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I think I can answer the question, and when the honourable gentleman makes his speech, if he is patient, I will endeavour to answer him.

It will be extremely difficult to maintain this country in a state of prosperity after the war. Transportation will be very expensive, with our 7,000,000 people scattered broadcast over a country 3,000 miles in extent; its administration generally must be very costly for that and other reasons. In other words, we have a large, beautiful ship, but we have few hands to man her. There is but one way to accomplish our end, and that is by developing the magnificent resources of our country and by throwing back of that development the best brain power that can be got. If we do not, we shall find ourselves lagging behind other countries. We must prepare now; later it will be too late.

Too many committees, in my opinion, have given poor results; and, unless the present one be a working committee, meeting from time to time and having at its service the best possible help, specialists and scientists when required, it had much better not be entertained at all.

Whilst the members of the Lower House are absorbed by the difficult political questions of the hour, I submit that the members of this honourable House, happily free from such concerns, should turn to the grave economical problems that face the country and grapple with them with determination and perseverance.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I hope the honourable member who has just spoken, being a member of the proposed committee, will induce it to report before the end of the session, in order that the Government may act in accordance with the views expressed by that committee.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: This whole question seems to revolve around the future, with the necessity of increased production at home, more work for our people, and a broad territory to cover. These things cannot be done in a moment. The large areas of uncultivated prairie in the Northwest cannot be cultivated at a moment's notice. The land cannot be utilized without the sod being broken a year in advance. If we are going to increase our production in the West, help must be given; new methods must be adopted, the steam plough must be used, new territory must be broken. If we delay this will not be done. The farmers will do the best they can with the help that they have, but they cannot do this alone. It seems to me that we have come to the point where the Government of this country has to step in and assist in every direction in order to increase the production and also the savings of the country. As has already been said, we have unlimited water powers, but up to the present only a few of them have been harnessed. We have peat bogs that are to-day of great value. In the past, with cheap coal, it was a question whether peat could be utilized in such a way as to compete with coal; but to-day coal is worth $6.50 at the mine in Pittsburg, and one is fortunate to get it at that price. In the past I have sold coal to the Grand Trunk Railway at 83½ cents a ton on the cars at the mine. Think what this means. We cannot get individuals or private corporations to take hold of these problems, and I think it is time for the Government of the country to gather the very best information available, employ the scientific men of the country and pay them well, build laboratories, and so on, and see if we cannot take care of our by-products and our waste, because it is just as important to live without importing goods as it is to export goods to other countries. If possible, it is well to utilize what we have at home, no matter if it does cost almost as much as the imported product, because it assists the people and keeps the money in the country.

There is much in the speech of the hon. gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) to make us thoughtful, because no one can tell what the conditions will be after the war. We know that the munition factories that are in operation to-day will not be running. We are sure that many other industries now in progress will cease. We know also that our soldiers, those of them who are left, will return home, and employment must be found for them. Employment must be provided also for those who are to-day manufacturing war supplies. No one can foretell the duration of the war; but it will not last forever, and I think it is now time to get ready for the conditions that are bound to exist when this war is over.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches that have been made with reference to this proposed committee. I appreciate the object which the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) has in view in moving for this committee; but I desire to draw the attention of the Senate, and the honourable gentleman himself, to the fact that a committee was appointed in the session of 1916 for a similar purpose. Its object, in the words of the motion for it, was:

> To inquire, alone or jointly with a like committee of the House of Commons, into what is being done and what could be done to best promote the agricultural, industrial, and trade interests of this country both during and after the war.

The House of Commons did not answer the message from the Senate, but the Senate Committee proceeded with the inquiry during the session of 1916. It did not complete its work, however, and, as honourable gentlemen will remember, this same committee was re-appointed this session for the purpose of completing its work. The committee is presided over by the hon. Senator Béique, and I understand that a considerable amount of information has been obtained. Questions were sent out to different organized bodies throughout Canada for the purpose of obtaining expressions of view and ideas or suggestions that might be of interest and value in dealing with this question. The views advanced by these different correspondents have been collated, and some of them have, I understand, been submitted to certain gentlemen for an opinion as to whether they are feasible and can be utilized. If I may be permitted, I would suggest to the honourable gentleman who has moved for another committee, either that it should be joined with the former committee or that the two committees should in some way collaborate, so that both will not cover the same ground. I do not think work of this kind should be duplicated, and I am sure that the two committees could co-operate and accomplish something that would be of much value to the country.

Then, my honourable friend the leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) was appointed chairman of a commission for the purpose of dealing with much the same question. Inquiries have been made at different times as to the result of the work of that commission, but, so far as I know, it has made no report to the public, although it has doubtless done very valuable work, and possibly the Government has benefited greatly by what it has accomplished. I think, therefore, that with these two committees and the commission we ought to be able to give the Government some very valuable advice, and I hope that good results will accrue.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, with your permission I would like to say to the honourable gentleman who has just spoken that my object in moving for the appointment of this committee is to try to have some action taken. I realize that after the war we shall be confronted with an entirely new set of conditions. I realize also, being more or less actively connected with business enterprises, that the present time is none too soon to take active steps to provide some means which will help to minimize the adverse situation in which we shall surely be placed. Until this morning I was not aware that this honourable House had already appointed a similar committee. I have since looked at the composition of that committee and its duties. On perusing the resolution appointing it you will see that it covers a great variety of important questions, such as the whole field of agriculture, colonization, immigration, labour, employment for returned soldiers at the end of the war, improvement of highways, branch railway development, the attraction of capital to this country, and the extension of trade relations. The committee for which I have had the honour to move will have much more modest objects than these: we propose to take up one or two salient questions and try to push them to some conclusion, so that at the proper time we may be able to achieve some result.

Let me give you an illustration. There was a great deal of criticism some years ago when the Government of the day decided to bonus the iron and steel industry. The idea prevailing at that time was that if this country was to develop the iron and steel industry it could not do so without rendering it aid in its earliest stage. What is the result? As I pointed out on Tuesday last, we have received in this country orders for $1,000,000,000 worth of munitions. Now, iron and steel are the basis of munitions manufacture. We threw our bread upon the waters—we invested a few millions in bounties—and it has brought forth fruit after many days: we have hundreds of millions of dollars worth of work which this country could not possibly have undertaken if it had not been for this wise provision of the Government of that day in bonusing, to a certain moderate extent, the iron and steel industry, so that it might be properly established.

Now, honourable gentlemen, all that I desire is to see the appointment of this modest committee. The committee would be only too glad to co-operate with any committee appointed previously, or with any commission that has been appointed by the Government. But I consider it only a waste of time for a committee of this House to attempt to take up the wide range of questions I have mentioned. They should be divided among many committees, because each one of those questions is in itself of great importance. I do not know whether the committee for which I have had the honour to move will be effective or not. Personally I believe it will be; but I leave the decision to this honourable House.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Edwards, the debate was adjourned till Wednesday next.

PRIVATE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Bill K2, an Act to incorporate Canadian Ukrainian Institute Prosvita.—Hon. Mr. La Rivière.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Explain.

Hon. Mr. LA RIVIERE: This is a society that is now in existence in Winnipeg, but it has no legal status and it desires to be incorporated so that it may proceed with its work. The objects of the society are philanthropic; there is nothing political about it; there is nothing even national about it, from the outside standpoint. The only national features are that it aims to teach its members the laws of the country and to make good Canadians of them. These people have taken the oath of allegiance. They are good citizens, and will become better. The objects of the Bill are stated in full in the preamble. The Ukrainian population is scattered all over Canada; there are people of that origin in every province, and they want a charter to cover the whole Dominion.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Are they Galicians?

Hon. Mr. LA RIVIERE: They speak the Ukrainian language. They come chiefly from Galicia. Many of them have settled in Manitoba, others in the eastern provinces. In the West they are becoming very good farmers.

The Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday at 3 o'clock p.m.

EMIGRATION AND IMMIGRATION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DAVID inquired of the Government:

1. How many Canadians left, monthly, this country since the 1st of January, 1916, to reside in the United States?
2. In what province were they residing when they left?
3. Has any correspondence taken place between the Canadian Government and the United States in connection with that emigration?
4. How many persons came from the British Isles to Canada during the same period?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1 and 2. The Dominion Government does not collect data regarding persons leaving Canada.

3. The United States Immigration Department keep records of Canadians entering the United States, the Canadian Immigration Branch keep records of persons from the United States entering Canada, and these statistics are exchanged by correspondence between the two services.

4. Immigration from British Isles to Canada.—1916: January 216, February 224, March 320, April 743, May 858, June 1,134, July 1,021, August, 910, September 1,065, October 879, November 872, December 354; 1917: January 218, February 138, March 90, April 129, May 127.

THE LATE HON. SENATOR OWENS.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is my melancholy duty to make some reference to the death of one of our colleagues within the last few days: I refer to the late Senator Owens. On Friday last he passed away. He was one of the older members of the Senate, having for over twenty years occupied a seat in this Chamber and identified himself very closely with our business. He was acute and keen in all the business interests of life, and brought the same intensity and earnestness to the transaction of public business. He had exceeded the allotted span of life by seven years; yet he carried his years well, and gave promise of many more years of usefulness. It was with the greatest surprise that his colleagues in this Chamber learned of his very sudden death. The messenger of death sometimes conveys his message speedily and sometimes slowly. In the case of the late Senator Owens the tidings of death were conveyed more hastily than happens to most mortals. A few days previous to his death he was with us in this Chamber. It seemed to us that one day we saw him and the next he started on that long journey from which no traveller returns. The late senator occupied no unimportant position in the province in which he lived and which he so well represented in this Chamber. His seat is vacant, honourable gentlemen, and we shall see him no more; but I feel sure that I speak the sentiment of every member of this Chamber when I say that we deeply regret his loss and desire to convey to his sorrowing family our sympathy in the bereavement which they have suffered.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I desire to associate myself with the honourable leader of the Government in his expression of the regret and sorrow we all feel at the loss of the late Hon. Mr. Owens. All who knew him recognized in his genial and kindly behaviour a man who was always popular and with whom they were glad to associate. He took an active part in the work of our committees and in the proceedings of this Chamber. The time he spent in this Chamber since his appointment in 1896 was a time of real service to the country. Hon. Mr. Owens was a member of the Legislature of the province of Quebec from 1881 to 1891. He was recognized as a progressive and feeding agriculturist, and he did a great deal for the advancement of agriculture and the improvement of live stock in that province. I am sure that we on this side of the House all join most sincerely in the expression of our deep sympathy with his family in the loss they have sustained.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: As one who sat in the Legislature of Quebec with the late Senator Owens, may I add my quota of praise for an old companion? We sat together in the Quebec House from 1884 to 1891, when he left. I remember William Owens coming to me one day and saying, "Boyer, are you going home to-morrow?" I said, "Yes." "Let us pair," he said; and for the last fifteen years we have been paired both at Quebec and at Ottawa. I always found in William Owens a true friend. We differed on political issues, but, as far as friendship and the general interests of the country were concerned, William Owens and your humble servant were as one. I made it my duty to attend his funeral and to offer to Mrs. Owens the deep sympathy of all the members of this honourable House, telling her what a loss the death of her husband would be to all of us.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Senator Owens was a friend of mine. Senator Owens was a friend of the province of Quebec, with which he was so long identified. I have known him for the past thirty-five years. As a member of the Legislature of the province of Quebec he was an all-round man, fair, open-minded, one of those men whom you can trust to promote harmony instead of racial prejudice and disunion. Senator Owens has been a man of mark in the province of Quebec. He was a distinguished member of the Quebec Legislature four decades ago, and then he became a distinguished member of this House. He was a conscientious worker on behalf of the people of Canada, and everything that has been so well said by the honourable leader of the Opposition over his tomb is well merited. Senator Owens has disappeared from our midst. I hope he will be succeeded by a man of the same stamp.

EXTENSION OF THE TERM OF PARLIAMENT.

INQUIRY.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I desire to ask for information which is very much desired by a large section of the people of this country, who were apprised four months ago in the Speech from the Throne that the Government intended to introduce a most vital Bill, concerning the extension of the term of the present Parliament. On their behalf I rise to ask the honourable leader of the Government what the intention of the Government is? When do they propose to introduce that Bill? I fully understand that at the present moment the honourable leader of this House, who is a member of the Cabinet, may not be in a position to give me an answer to that question. But if he is not in a position to give me an answer, and give the country an answer, as to when we may expect the introduction of that Bill, I shall put on the Order Paper an official and formal notice of inquiry. If he gives me an answer now, that will not be necessary. If his answer is incomplete and does not satisfy the situation, then I shall put this notice on the Order Paper.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All I can say to my honourable friend is that I am unaware of the Government having in any way receded from the intimation which was given in the Speech from the Throne. Of course, events march very quickly nowadays, and what may be determined one day may possibly not be adhered to the following day. All I can say to my honourable friend is that I know of no change of position in respect to that particular Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: In view of the incomplete answer from the honourable leader of the Government, I beg to give notice of the following inquiry for Wednesday next:

When will the Government introduce, as announced in the Speech from the Throne, its Bill for further extension of time to permit the present ministry (depleted) and the present House of Commons (very much depleted) to continue in existence without a mandate from the electorate of the Dominion of Canada?

BRITISH GOVERNMENT AND CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 47, an Act to facilitate certain financial arrangements between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and for other purposes.

He said: This is a measure growing out of the existing war. It is needless for me to explain to honourable gentlemen, for they must be familiar with, the difficulties which have arisen in the matter of arranging exchange between the United States and Great Britain. As we are all aware, most of the supplies and munitions during the earlier period of the war were obtained by the Allies from the United States. The transmission of gold to the United States became a matter of very great jeopardy and difficulty, amounting to almost an impossibility. It therefore became necessary to devise some method of establishing a credit on behalf of the United Kingdom in the United States, to meet the payments which had to be made from time to time for munitions and supplies. Under the provisions of the Defence of the Realm Act of 1914, and the amendments thereto, the Government of the United Kingdom took power for the purchase, compulsory or otherwise, from persons ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, of certain securities, not only of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but also of other financial organizations..

Hon. Mr. POWER: Not the Canadian Northern.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, I am not prepared to say that the Canadian Northern would not have presented a very attractive feature to the investing public in Great Britain. However, in this particular case attention was directed to the acquiring by compulsory purchase of securities of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the greater part or a very large proportion of which were held in the United Kingdom. At the instance of the Imperial Government the Railway Company has been asked to issue collateral trust bonds of the company to such an aggregate amount as might from time to time be determined by the directors, for the purpose of taking over or acquiring such consolidated debenture stock or bonds of the company as were purchased by the Imperial Government. This is being done. These collateral trust bonds of the company will in all probability be made payable in the United States in currency, in exchange for the consolidated debenture stock or the bonds of the company, which are payable in the United Kingdom in sterling. This will of course permit of the transmission of the original securities to the United States. and their supercession by the new securities.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Would the honourable leader of the Government kindly explain what he means by collateral trust bonds?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are securities that will be issued by the railway company, payable in currency instead of in sterling, and payable probably in the United States instead of in Europe. When the Imperial Government wish to transmit the original securities to the United States for the purpose of establishing a credit or for realizing thereupon, either by sale or otherwise, the new securities will practically take their place, and will be realizable in the United States, whereas the original securities are realizable in Great Britain. This may seem a little complicated, but I hope that I have made myself clear. This issue of securities will be applied entirely in respect of the original securities which I have mentioned. It is not proposed that they shall be applied to any other purpose.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: There is no increased liability?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. They take the place of the others. The object is to enable the Imperial Government to establish a credit in the United States for the purpose of meeting liabilities that have been occasioned by the purchase of munitions and supplies in that country.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: What is the rate of interest?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They will represent an equivalent of the other.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: In other words, the trust bonds will be given in place of the original securities?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: And the original security disappears altogether; it is handed over for these new bonds?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That can be done, or a financial institution in the United States may say, "We will take the sterling bonds and hold them, provided that you give us collateral security payable in the United States." In whatever way you look at it, the one will be collateral to the other.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Then the two will be in existence?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They might be existent, or the original securities might become wiped out. For instance, if the Imperial Government should transmit the original securities to the United States, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company might come into the financial market of the United States with the collateral trust bonds and purchase the original securities, thus extinguishing them.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Then they would be collateral no longer.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This does not in any way affect the stock of the company?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I thought that under the British Defence of the Realm Act, quoted by my honourable friend, the actual stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was handed to the British Government by investors, to be used as security. Has my honourable friend any information on that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I cannot say that I have.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Though my honourable friend is taking charge of this Bill, I understand that it is really a Bill of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I notice that the interest paid on these collateral securities is to be 5 per cent per annum. I think the interest on the debenture stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is only 4 per cent, so that any one buying these collateral bonds would get a higher rate of interest.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It depends on what they are taken at; they may not be taken at par.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I just wish an explanation on one point. It may come more properly in the committee stage, but I think the honourable the leader of the Government will not raise that objection. On the second page, line 13, I read this:

> Upon the redemption or payment of such Collateral Trust Bonds, such Collateral Securities shall be deemed not to have been paid off or to have become extinguished, but to be still alive, and the same may be disposed of or reissued by the company, and in that event the holders thereof shall have the same rights and priorities as if such collateral securities had not theretofore been issued.

As I understand that, there are certain mortgages of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company which are replaced by these collateral securities. These collateral securities are paid off, but the original securities remain due and unpaid. That seems to me a rather remarkable way of doing things. I am not objecting; I only wish to understand the matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The explanation is that the Company has certain borrowing powers. They have exercised those powers to the extent of the issue of the consolidated debenture stock or the bonds which are dealt with in this Bill. The scheme which is now being put into operation permits of the issue of collateral trust bonds for the purpose of transmitting, so to speak, the original securities to this side of the Atlantic; but the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is not to be called upon to retire those securities, and, even though they should purchase the original securities or retire the collateral trust bonds, their borrowing powers must not be diminished accordingly. That is to say, they have the right to exercise the borrowing powers originally given to them; they are not enlarged, nor restricted, nor diminished.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It seems to me that they are doubled. There are the original securities, and the Company is allowed to duplicate those.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. POWER: That is what it comes to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, because the collateral trust bonds are issued to deal exclusively in the original securities. They could not sell the collateral trust bonds and still leave the consolidated debenture stock or bonds outstanding. One has relation to the other exclusively, and is not outside of the limits of the transaction involved.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: There is a rumour to the effect that the United States having entered the war and loaned money to the British Government, this legislation is not to be given effect to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Notwithstanding that, the Imperial Government has asked the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to put the matter in this shape. I suppose they regard it as expedient in the event of it being necessary to raise that amount of money. At the present time there is no necessity for it.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Is it not merely a matter between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Imperial authorities?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

PENNY BANK ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 55, an Act to amend the Penny Bank Act.

He said: The penny banks have been established by the Government of Canada with a view to promoting thrift and saving on the part of the school children. The deposits made by any individual in these banks are limited to $300, and are placed in the Post Office Savings Bank, where they bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent. It is now proposed that authority be given to invest the funds of these Penny Savings Banks in Dominion of Canada securities, subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance. If there is any profit in excess of the 4 per cent interest which is paid on the deposits it inures to the credit of the depositors.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: How much is now in the Penny Banks?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot tell my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable the leader of the Government says that the rate of interest to be allowed on these deposits is 4 per cent. I was under the impression that the present rate was 3 per cent.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Not for the Penny Banks.

Hon. Mr. POWER: If the rate is 4 per cent for the Penny Banks, it adds force to the contention raised in this House that in the Government Savings Banks and the Post Office Savings Banks the rate of interest should be 4 per cent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is for the encouragement of the children.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 57, an Act to amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916. He said: The principal feature of this Bill is the increase of taxation upon net profits earned by business institutions throughout Canada. Under the original Act net profits over 7 per cent were taxed 25 per cent. It is now proposed to increase that tax so that net profits in excess of 15 per cent and up to 20 per cent shall pay a tax of 50 per cent, and net profits exceeding 20 per cent shall pay a tax of 75 per cent. There are some other features of the Bill which are not material, and which simply deal with the machinery for more successfully carrying out the Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I noticed the other day that a representative of the Manufacturers Association in Winnipeg said that the manufacturers were being pretty heavily taxed. I think he used these words:

> Last year the Federal Government saw fit to provide itself with emergency revenue by levying a tax on business profits, and, although the amount secured largely exceeded their expectations, they have recently said that tax is now to be very substantially increased.

I take it from that statement that the gentleman considers that the taxation has come rather heavily on the manufacturers of the country; and it occurred to me that it would be interesting if this House could get some idea of what this taxation amounts to. My honourable friend said that, by the taxation now proposed, one-half of the profits in excess of 15 per cent on capital stock would be paid to the Government. First of all, one-quarter of the profits in excess of 7 per cent, as provided in the original Act, will be taken by the Government.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Up to 15 per cent.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Then, one-half of the excess profits between 15 per cent and 20 per cent will be taken.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And beyond that 75 per cent.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: A company with a capital of $75,000, if they made a profit of 7 per cent on that amount of capital, would get a return of $5,250. They would pay no tax on that amount. If they made 15 per cent, they would get a return of $11,250, and they would pay 25 per cent of $6,000, or $1,500, to the Government. It does not seem to be as heavy a tax as I thought it was when reading the statement of the gentleman at Winnipeg. If the profits were 20 per cent, the actual amount they would pay to the Government as the tax for the year would be somewhere about $2,875.

Then, the gentleman said that the amount secured by the Government had largely exceeded their expectations. I have never seen any statement as to what the Government expected to get out of their excess profits tax. When we go into committee my honourable friend can probably give us a statement of what the Government expected and what they have actually received from this tax. I have heard it said that a great deal of this money has not been collected, and it would be interesting if my honourable friend could furnish that information for the benefit of the House.

A gentleman with whom I was discussing this matter one day raised this further point. When the tax is to be paid on profits made say in the year 1915, and the balance sheet of the company is made up to December 31, 1915, and shows a profit of, say, twelve per cent, the tax on the excess over 7 per cent would naturally have to be paid in the year 1916. Is the amount that is actually paid over to the Government charged up in the accounts of 1916, so that the profits of 1916 are reduced by the amount of the tax that is paid for 1915? The tax is paid in 1916.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That pays for the 1915 period.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It is entirely a matter of book-keeping, but it is conceivable that it might be done in that way, so that the tax of 1915 would really not be paid at all. I would like my honourable friend to look into that point. Perhaps we can discuss it further when we are in committee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not see that there is any difficulty about that. If a certain well-defined profit is made in the year ending December 31, 1915, of course the tax has to be paid in 1916; but that has nothing to do with the profits of 1916.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They have not the money; they have paid it out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But the money will come in 1916, or may have been collected in 1915.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It is a matter of book-keeping. If they are allowed to charge that up—

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: They might juggle their accounts.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend (Sir James Lougheed) allow me to ask him this question: whether the Government, in considering the imposition of this tax, of which I quite approve, has at the same time considered the possibility of discriminating between different kinds of companies doing business? Has the Government considered the advisability of imposing a higher taxation on the companies engaged in making munitions, for instance, than on companies doing ordinary mercantile business or engaged in ordinary manufacture? There are, I understand, a number of people of the opinion that munition manufacturers ought to contribute a larger proportion of their profits to this tax than men who are engaged in manufacturing say boots and shoes.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Why?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not desire to discuss the reasons, because that would take too long. I just want to ask my honourable friend if that has been considered, and if he can give us any information on that point.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say that that matter was considered, but it was found impracticable to enforce any such discrimination; it was also considered inequitable. For instance, companies that are not munition concerns may profit through the war as largely as munition makers. There are many industries and many financial or commercial organizations which are profiting more than munition works. In the earlier period of munitions manufacture the undertaking was largely experimental. Then, there is the further consideration, that upon the cessation of the manufacture of munitions, those companies must naturally suffer a very substantial loss. But let us examine the situation in general. As my honourable friend will admit, all companies who are doing business must necessarily profit from the manufacture of munitions; if they do not profit from it directly, they are profiting indirectly through the war. Hence it seemed to the Government that the only fair course was to impose a tax, on the basis provided for in the Bill and in the Act which it amends, upon all companies that were making profits exceeding the amounts that are mentioned; and I think honourable gentlemen will agree that the percentage which we have exempted is a very reasonable return upon the capital invested, no matter what the company may be engaged in.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I presume the greatest difficulty was in making the discrimination—in drawing the line.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, and it would exempt many other prosperous companies—some companies that are more prosperous than munition concerns.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If that explanation were given to the public—if it were known by the public that the Government had considered the matter and found itself confronted by these difficulties to which my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed has alluded, that would perhaps reconcile a great many people to this tax.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I hope my honourable friend will make the explanation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The explanation ought to be made by the Government. Mine would carry no authority.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: This Bill strikes me as one that will create alarm in the country. It has, in fact, already done so. This Bill, sanctioned by the Finance Minister, tells the people of Canada that a certain class of persons called manufacturers are making anywhere from seven to one hundred per cent profit. If that does not alarm the working classes, I would like to know what would. And the Government allows companies or individuals to make profits of from seven to one hundred per cent and more. Is that not alarming? Is that not a cause for the people to cry out for the conscription of wealth as well as the conscription of blood? Has the Government taken that into consideration? Is the fact that profits are made of from seven to one hundred per cent and over not a cause of the high cost of living? The honourable the leader of the Government has said that the high profits are not made by munition manufacturers alone, but also by others—by boot and shoe manufacturers, by beef trusts, by cold-storage concerns; and is the Government going to allow this to continue? I contend, with the vast majority of the people of this country, that during this war-time any profit over seven per cent should go into the public treasury, to put down the high cost of living and give the Government a chance to pay the interest on the national debt, which is increasing by millions and billions. Has the Government taken that into consideration? No. I understand that the present Finance Minister, a friend of the trusts and of the manufacturers, does not want conscription of wealth; and so far as the public knows he as a member of the Cabinet is opposed to any such scheme and prepared to resign if such a scheme is carried through. Honourable gentlemen, we have it from the lips of the Government itself that a small class of people are taking from the pockets of the masses 100 per cent profit. Is that not an outrage upon the economy which is urged upon the people? Instead of imposing a tax on profits over 10 per cent here, 15 per cent there, and 20 per cent there, I say that no profit should be allowed over 7 per cent, which is twice as much as the Government gives to the poor man who deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks his hard-earned money. Those profiteers, be they munition makers, be they pork dealers or beef dealers, or cold storage men, or grain handlers, or millers, the Government should be courageous enough, as has been done in France, as is being done now in Russia, as Lloyd-George is doing in England, to prevent from making these excess profits; or, if they make these profits, the Government should have them turned into the national treasury. The proper thing to do would be for the Government, if it had the courage, to prevent these people from making such profits and making the poor man pay 14 cents for a pound-and-a-half loaf of bread, for which he should pay only six or seven cents. That should be the action of the Government; but up to the present time, during the past three years of war, the Government has done nothing but allow the country, not through its action, but by the voluntary system, to drain itself of its life-blood. The Government has not taken one step to prevent the monopolistic classes, or the manufacturing classes, from bleeding the rest of the people. What is the Government for but to guard the welfare of the people? The Government is promoting the interests and wealth of the companies and individuals who are bleeding the masses in this country and sucking their life-blood. How can the Government go before the people and say: "We want your confidence; we have conscripted your manhood; 430,000 men have left the shores of this country for the battlefields of Europe; now we want more of your blood." And the people will say to them: "Yes, we are ready to shed our blood on the battlefields of Europe, but the dependents, the mothers, the children, the cripples, the sick, and the old, are left behind to be bled, not on the battlefields of Europe, but in their own homes by your protégés"—the protégés of Sir Robert Borden and his Government—"by your protégés, the manufacturers, the munition-makers, and others." What answer can Sir Robert Borden expect but that? This Bill reveals to the country that manufacturers, companies and individuals, are making excess profits. The word "excess" is so easy to say. The word should be "outrageous." I repeat that any profit over seven per cent made by any company, at least during this war-time, should go into the national treasury; it should be the duty of the Government to prevent any profits in excess of that rate from being retained. This Bill does not provide for that, and the Government will have to suffer the consequences.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 66, an Act to amend the Judges Act. He said:

There are three features in this Bill. One makes provision for the salary of an additional judge in the province of Saskatchewan. By reason of certain legislation passed by the Government of that province, it becomes necessary to make this provision. Another section of the Bill provides for an increase in the number of judges in the province of Ontario. It is proposed to appoint a county court judge for the district of Timiskaming. Under section 3 of the Bill, provision is made for restricting the travelling expenses of a judge to those incurred in the district in which he exercises his jurisdiction. This is necessitated by certain legislation passed by some of the provinces changing the residence of the judges and thus permitting them to draw allowances in excess of travelling expenses incurred in the judicial district in which they perform their duties.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understood my honourable friend to say that this Bill had some application to Ontario; but, looking at it, I do not see that it has any relation to Ontario at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Section 2 of the Bill increases the number of judges in Ontario from 73 to 74.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Some time ago a deputation came from the West, and, I think, other parts of Canada, to see the Minister of Justice with regard to the question of salaries of county court judges throughout the Dominion. I understand that the Minister of Justice told the deputation that he would give the matter serious consideration and hoped to be able to do something in the interest of the county court judges, but as yet no announcement, so far as I know, has been made. Can the honourable the leader of the Government tell us whether anything of that kind has been considered, or if any action is likely to be taken in the matter?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No action, to my knowledge, is about to be taken in that matter. It is almost needless to say that when a vacancy occurs it is not an extremely difficult matter to secure an incumbent, and I fancy that as long as that condition prevails the increase of salaries will not be a matter of overwhelming anxiety to the Government.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The qualifications should be raised.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think the provision contained in clause 3 of the Bill is a very good one. The truth is that, while judges administer the law as applied to persons who come before them in generally a very satisfactory and accurate way, they do not always carry out the law with respect to themselves as well as they might; and I am glad to see that this practice of permitting a judge exercising his jurisdiction in one district to live in another district and draw travelling expenses between his place of residence and the place where he holds his court, is to be prevented. I think that is a step in the right direction. While the Government were considering this question of the liberties which judges have taken in the past, there is another subject that they might have considered, and that is, the fact that a law which was passed, I think, in 1903, forbidding judges to act as trustees, or in any capacity other than that of judge, has not been enforced, and throughout the country there are judges acting as trustees, not only for estates which come to them as executors, but also in trust companies and in commercial companies of various kinds. I think that is a practice which deserves reprobation. It is not necessary to alter the law; if the Minister of Justice will see that the law is enforced, that will be sufficient; and I hope that the honourable the leader of the Government in this House will urge the Minister of Justice to carry out that law. Of course, in the case of the present Minister of Justice there would be a certain amount of self-denial in enforcing a law of that kind.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I agree with my honourable friend that the section reads well, but I am afraid that in practice it might not work out quite so well. The difficulty exists by reason of the last provision:

> Unless his residence at that place be authorized or approved by the Governor in Council.

In practice it looks well because permission is generally given to a judge to reside at some place other than in the judicial district over which he has jurisdiction—just what the section intends that he should not do.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

OCEAN TELEGRAPH ACT REPEAL BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 69, an Act to repeal The Ocean Telegraph Act. He said: In 1913 Parliament passed the Ocean Telegraph Act, confirming an agreement entered into between the Government and the Universal Radio Syndicate, Limited. This syndicate was to establish a wireless service between Canada and the United Kingdom, and in pursuance of the agreement entered into between the Government and the syndicate at that time, a deposit of £10,000 was made with the Government of Canada. £5,000 of that was to be returned to the syndicate upon the completion of a certain section of the work, which was accordingly done, and the money was repaid. When the war began the financial situation was such as to result in serious embarrassment to the company, and a loan of $15,000 out of the remaining £5,000 was made by the Government to the company. This loan, however, did not save the company, and it went into liquidation. Since that time the Marconi Company has entered into an arrangement by which this service will be practically completed between Canada and the United Kingdom; and, in pursuance of subsequent arrangements which have been made, it is proposed that the Government of Canada shall repay to the company, or those who represent it, the $10,000 which is still in hand. This does not mean that the Government is paying anything out of its exchequer. The money was deposited simply as an evidence of good faith, and Canada is now securing, through the new arrangement entered into, and by a very much more responsible company, a wireless service between the United Kingdom and Canada which will be a very great improvement.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I notice that my honourable friend, in moving the second reading of this Bill, did not tell us very clearly as to how much work had been done by this company. I think the company was started in 1913 to push forward in Canada what is known as the Poulsen system of radio-telegraph. Previous to that time I think the Marconi system had been established in this country, with the support, to a certain extent, of the Canadian Government; therefore the result of the action of the Government in 1913 was to create a rival company to the one already in existence. I presume that when the Government adopted the policy of incorporating this company and giving it certain monetary assistance, it was considered that the Poulsen system was better than the Marconi system; but, from what my honourable friend has said, it would appear that the Marconi system is the better one, and that the Government is now falling back upon the Marconi Company.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is stronger financially; I do not know whether the system is better.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I have never heard of anybody sending messages by the Poulsen system, but I have heard of messages being sent by the Marconi system. I think the policy of the former Government in adopting the Marconi system has been justified by the results; apparently it is further developed and more useful than the Poulsen system. As I understand it, when the subject of wireless telegraphy was first under consideration, the idea was that the wireless telegraph might compete with the cable system. There has been a great deal of discussion on this question from time to time, and I think it is generally admitted that the cable companies have a very strong monopoly. It was thought that the wireless telegraph might possibly be a means of supplying the people with a much cheaper means of communication between this country and Europe; but, so far as I know at the present time, it has not benefitted the public to any great extent. I understand that the Dominions Royal Commission, of which I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce was a member, has reported in favour of some action being taken, not only by this Government, but by the British Government, to break the monopoly created by the cable companies and to provide better and cheaper cable service generally. I understand that they have reported very favourably upon the part taken by this Government years ago in building the Pacific cable connecting Canada with Australia and New Zealand, and I think I am right in saying that the Pacific Cable Company is now a commercial success, and that it has been a great benefit to the Dominions of the British Empire as a whole. I hope it will not be long before the Government will take some further action with a view to reducing the tariff on the cable service between this country and Great Britain. At the present time the public generally is much more interested in the question of cables than it used to be, and I think the Government would be well advised to go carefully into the question to see if something cannot be done along this line.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

PRIVATE BILLS.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill 48, an Act respecting the British Columbia and White River Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

Bill M 2, an Act to incorporate the Manitoba and Ontario Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Smith.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Although this is a private Bill, I think it is desirable, before it is read the second time, that some substantial reason should be given why the Bill is proposed. Clause 7 says:

> The company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of the gauge of 4 feet 8½ inches from a point at or near Brereton Station on the main line of the National Transcontinental Railway in the province of Manitoba, to a point on the English river in the province of Ontario between the easterly boundary of Manitoba and the 94th meridian of longitude; thence northerly to a point on the Hudson Bay between the mouths of the Albany and Nelson rivers.

In the first place, this line, if constructed, would to a certain extent compete with the Government road which runs to Hudson Bay a little north of the proposed terminus of this road, and I think it should be shown that there is some commercial demand for this road. When I look at the list of incorporators I do not find the names of any gentlemen who are capitalists or who would be likely to take a substantial interest in the construction of the road. It looks to me very much like a case of charter-mongering.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: This road is to run through the territory of the English river, which is said to be a very good district. It is a well-timbered country, and is likely to furnish a large amount of local traffic. As to this road competing with the Government railroad, the only sense in which that can be said is that both roads will touch Hudson bay. I hope that in the future Canada will have more than one railroad touching Hudson bay. This railroad touches it fully two hundred miles from where the Government railroad does. I can easily conceive that in the future there will be a large amount of traffic from Hudson bay. The fishing industry will no doubt be a large one, and there is no question that minerals will be found there. This Bill has a two-fold purpose: firstly, to connect Hudson bay with the Transcontinental railroad by the shortest possible route; and, secondly, to open a new and excellent territory. I do not know any of the incorporators personally, with the exception of Mr. Kerry, who is a well-to-do man, and one of the most prominent civil engineers in Ontario. I do not think that he would lend his name to a company that was not bona fide and in the general interests of Canada.

The Bill was read the second time.

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN HOUSE OF COMMONS.

On the motion to adjourn:

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Before the adjournment of the House I beg to be allowed to raise a question which concerns and interests the members of this House. There was a time when the members of this House were able to go into the House of Commons to listen to the discussions which took place there, but to-day that seems impossible. When we go to the entrance to the gallery, we find three or four hundred women there, so that it is practically impossible to get in. If we do succeed in entering the Chamber we find the gallery which is supposed to be reserved for members of this House, filled with people. Is there no way of protecting the rights of the members of this House? I think that the Speaker and the leader of the Government in this House should find a means of protecting the privileges of members of this assembly, either by obtaining permission for them to enter the House of Commons before the prayers are said—there would be no harm in our listening to the prayers in the House of Commons—or perhaps it would be possible to have a policeman to make a passage for us through the crowd so that we could go in.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I do not think the trouble lies with the Speaker of this House nor with the leader of the Government; I think it lies largely with ourselves. There are members of this House who seem to have no hesitation about taking in two or three of their friends and putting them in the seats that should be occupied by the honourable gentleman who has just spoken and other members of this House. Under the old conditions, it was laid down very distinctly that a member of this House had no right to take anybody into the House of Commons on an occasion of importance except his wife or daughter; but from what happened the other day it is evident that this rule was not observed, or that it was honoured in the breach rather than in the observance.

Hon. the SPEAKER: As requested, I conferred with the Speaker of the House of Commons and the Serjeant-at-Arms, after the several complaints which were made to me in regard to the gallery which is reserved for the Senate being filled with outsiders. I proposed that a messenger of the Senate should be placed there to see that only senators should be admitted to the Senate gallery, but that was strongly opposed by the Serjeant-at-Arms. At the same time, he told me that he would see that none but senators should be admitted there. I might go again to see the Serjeant-at-Arms or the Speaker of the Commons and deliver the request that we be given proper accommodation.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable the Speaker should not be put to that trouble.

He has done his duty, and I think that the Speaker of this House is far above the Serjeant-at-Arms of the House of Commons. The arrangement in the old Parliament Buildings was that the Speaker had a messenger appointed who stood at the door of the Senate gallery and admitted only senators, their wives and daughters, except when there were but few persons in the gallery. All that is necessary for the Speaker of this House, without consulting the Serjeant-at-Arms or anybody else, is to appoint a messenger to take his place there when the House of Commons opens—that is the right and the power of the Speaker of this House—and tell him to allow nobody in but senators, their wives and daughters.

Hon. the SPEAKER: But it is the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We admit that the House of Commons belongs to them, but the Senate gallery comes under the control of the Speaker of this House, and it is his duty to see that the rights and privileges of the members of this House are respected. There are two ex-Speakers of this House present here to-day, and I appeal to them if that has not been the custom hitherto.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I am inclined to think that if an arrangement were made whereby a railing could be placed at the rear of our division of the gallery of the Commons, with a gate at the end, and a messenger from the Senate were placed in charge, we would have no trouble at all. The messenger of the Commons does not know the members of the Senate, and there is no reason why he should know them. Before the Parliament Buildings were burned we had the privilege of sending a messenger to take charge of our particular portion of the gallery. I fully agree with what has been said by the honourable gentleman from Tignish (Hon. Mr. Murphy), that some of our senators are themselves a good deal to blame for the inconvenience of other members of the Senate. I noticed, as he did, the other day that some senators took in three or four persons who occupied seats that had been reserved for senators. We ought to recognize the fact that a senator has no right to ask any person into that gallery except his wife or daughter. In the old House of Commons we used to have messengers who adhered strictly to that rule. They got their instructions and carried them out. I am sure that if we got a good messenger and instructed him that nobody but senators, their wives and daughters should be admitted to that gallery, there would be no difficulty.

The Senate adjourned until Friday at three o'clock p.m.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY inquired of the Government:

What were the gross earnings and working expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for the year ending March 31, 1917?

What was expended on Capital Account for the same period on the Intercolonial Railway?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Gross earnings, $16,805,723.64; working expenses, $15,731,389; expenditure on capital account, $4,490,497.56.

RETURNED SOLDIERS.

SCHEME OF SETTLEMENT.

On a notice of motion by the Hon. Mr. Domville with reference to a scheme for the settlement of returned soldiers in the Northwest of Canada:

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Stand.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Dropped.

Hon. the SPEAKER: Honourable gentlemen, I do not think it right that this long motion should be reprinted from day to day. If the honourable gentleman who placed it on the Order Paper wishes to make a speech on it, he may renew the motion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I do not think it is within the powers of the Speaker to dictate to the House as to whether the motion stands or not. I do not think it is within the powers of the Speaker to make the observations which he has made.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think it is the duty of the Speaker to call attention to anything which he thinks is being done in contravention of the rules and practice of the House. Some honourable gentlemen have, I suppose, made rather extensive researches into the doings and rules of procedure of parliamentary bodies elsewhere; but I think that one can search in vain the world over for a precedent for setting out this document on our minutes. In reality it is not a notice of motion. It would appear that the honourable gentleman from Rothesay (Lt.-Col. the Hon. Mr. Domville) had a scheme which he thought might be a valuable one. Instead of setting out his views in a speech to the House and having his remarks reported in Hansard, he has put them in the shape of a notice of motion on the minutes, where they are continued day after day, and in that way he has brought them to the notice of the public more forcibly than if he had made a speech. There is another point to be considered. Every page of printing adds considerably to the expense of carrying on the Senate. We now have a joint committee to endeavour to reduce expenses. I am satisfied that the honourable gentleman from Rothesay would be perfectly willing that the notice should be dropped, because he has gone away and left it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I have no observation to make except that the day before yesterday the honourable gentleman from Rothesay asked me to request that this order should stand when it was called.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The honourable gentleman came in immediately after it was allowed to stand the last time.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Dropped.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: A former senator from British Columbia, the late Senator Macdonald, put motions on the Order Paper which remained there for almost whole sessions, and no objection was taken under the Speakership of the ex-Speaker (Hon. Mr. Power). That happened dozens of times. The honourable senator from Rothesay has asked another senator to request that this order stand for to-day; he asks no more. The ex-Speaker says that it is going to be an expense. Such a picayune economy does not appeal to me when we are willing to vote millions for purposes that are not to the advantage of the country. This way of dealing with the expenditure of a dollar or two dollars for a typewriter and such petty matters is, as I say, picayune—I have no Irish word to express it.

The notice of motion was dropped.

CLAIMS OF BRITISH COLUMBIAN SEALERS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a return made to an Order of the House of Commons of the 7th February, 1916, for a copy of all correspondence and reports on the claims of sealers of British Columbia under the last treaty with the American Republic and all papers connected therewith.

The motion was agreed to.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION.

JUBILEE PAMPHLET.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: May I ask the leader of the Government if the pamphlet called "The Jubilee of Confederation," which is published in English, is to be published also in French and distributed to the senators, as the English edition has been?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I know nothing about the pamphlet to which my honourable friend refers.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I may say that the pamphlet referred to was issued by the joint committee appointed for the purpose of arranging a fitting celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation. The pamphlet is printed for distribution in Canada, and contains a few head-notes on subjects which might well be discussed by school teachers and others. I am not aware whether or not it is to be published in French.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: I suppose the Government will order it to be printed in French?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Apparently it has been issued by the committee, and I have no doubt that if my honourable friend asks them to have it published in French they will be very glad to do so.

Hon. Mr. POWER: There should be a French version.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Doubtless it will be printed in French.

RUMORED RESIGNATION OF CABINET MINISTERS.

INQUIRY.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would draw the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to a notice that appeared in the Ottawa Journal of Friday last, as follows:

One of the first resignations from the Cabinet which will pave the way to contemplated reorganization will be that of the Hon. T. W. Crothers, Minister of Labour, if rumours which seem to emanate from usually reliable sources have foundation in fact. It is said to be Mr. Crothers' personal wish to facilitate in every way the strong government reorganization planned by the Prime Minister. Five other ministers are also expected to relinquish office about the same time.

Has my honourable friend the leader of the Government any announcement to make in regard to this matter?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. What my hon. friend is reading is manifestly prophetic.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It is a Government paper.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to be a prophecy as to what will happen. It is also qualified by the statement that it is but a rumour that is in circulation; so until it assumes some more concrete form I cannot answer my honourable friend.

BRITISH GOVERNMENT AND CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 47, an Act to facilitate certain financial arrangements between the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and for other purposes, Hon. Mr. Landry in the Chair.

On section 1—Company empowered to acquire consolidated or debenture stock or bonds issued by company and to issue collateral trust bonds therefor:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think I have fully explained this Bill upon its second reading. There is nothing new that can be said about it.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Notwithstanding the lucid explanation made by the honourable leader of the Government, I am not quite clear as to the latter part of the clause—authorizing the company to issue collateral trust bonds to the amount of all the existing encumbrances on the property of the company.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, no.

Hon. Mr. POWER: That is what I understand:

> The stocks and bonds and other securities of the company or of such other company so acquired by the company, shall in such case be held by the company as still subsisting and continuing.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will look at lines 28, 29, and 30 he will notice the limitation:

> May issue collateral trust bonds of the company to such aggregate amount as may from time to time be determined by the directors for the purpose of taking over or acquiring such consolidated debenture stock or bonds of the company.

That is to say, the collateral trust bonds will be issued for the purpose of taking over or acquiring the consolidated debenture stocks or bonds.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: On the last occasion the honourable leader of the Government gave us a very lucid explanation of this Bill; but not only myself but some other senators with whom I was talking afterwards did not clearly understand the position of these securities. It seems to me that, if the honourable leader of the Government has no objection, this Bill, which is not a Government Bill, might be allowed to go to the Railway Committee, and the solicitor of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, who is now in Ottawa, might explain this matter to the satisfaction of the Committee. I may say I have been asked to make that request by some others. It is a delicate matter to touch bonds. I have had something to do with railways that have had such bonds. It may be very simple, but I do not entirely understand the matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), very properly, has great confidence in the explanation that would be made by the solicitor of the company, I may say for the information of the House that I hold in my hand his explanation of the Bill, and, with the consent of the House, I will read it. It may be more illuminating than the explanation which I made upon the second reading. It says:

> The British Government have acquired or will acquire from holders in Great Britain bonds and consolidated debenture stock of this company and bonds and debenture stock of two of the subsidiary companies of the Canadian Pacific. They will deposit these securities with this company or a trustee, and we will issue collateral trust bonds, in dollar form so as to be marketable in New York, which collateral trust bonds will be secured by the securities handed over to us by the Government. When the collateral trust bonds are redeemed or mature, the British Government will put this company in possession of the moneys to redeem or pay them off, and the collateral securities will then be returned to the Government, continuing in the meantime the exact status, so far as the company is concerned, that they have now.

The financing is really that of the British Government; but, for the convenience and in order to facilitate it, the company is lending its credit to the Government temporarily to the extent mentioned. The collateral securities will of course be kept alive, because they must be returned to the original holders thereof, that is, the British Government, upon the payment off of the trust bonds. Then, in order that the points raised by the Hon. Mr. Bostock and the Hon. Mr. Power may be met, the writer says in addition that the deposits of the collateral securities is made on the basis of par for those bearing 5 per cent interest and 80 for those bearing 4 per cent interest. In this way the collateral securities equal in interest charges what will be paid on the trust bonds.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: But it is said in the Bill that this only applies to such securities as belong to the British Government?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. If my honourable friend will look at section 1, he will see that collateral trust bonds will be issued to a sufficient amount for the purpose of taking over or acquiring the consolidated debenture stocks or bonds of the company that may be acquired by the British Government. The one will be practically the equivalent of the other.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I may add that there has been deposited with the Imperial Government about $197,000,000 of those bonds of the Canadian Pacific. This was done a year or two ago for the purpose of enabling the Imperial Government to borrow on those bonds. These bonds were held by people in the United Kingdom. Owing to the high rates of exchange, the Imperial Government cannot advantageously use those bonds in the United States, as they are payable in London.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In sterling.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: In sterling, and they could not be paid in the United States except at a considerable loss. The object of the Bill is merely to enable the company to issue an equal amount of temporary collateral trust bonds, which will be payable in dollars in New York. The purpose is to enable the British Government to effect a loan on these securities, if it should become necessary, in the United States, and the bonds which were deposited with the Imperial Government by the English bondholders will have to be deposited in New York with the trust company for two purposes: for the purpose of guaranteeing the payment of the collateral trust bonds, and for the purpose of guaranteeing the Canadian Pacific Company that these collateral trust bonds will be paid at maturity by the Imperial Government. When they are paid by the Imperial Government, the original bonds will either be returned to original holders or remain the property of the Imperial Government, if the Imperial Government purchases them out and out.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: How did the consolidated bonds come into the possession of the Imperial Government?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Under the Imperial Act which mobilized all the securities in England about two years ago. The holders of all bonds were compelled to deposit them with the Government, the Government having the option either of purchasing them at a stated price or of returning them, and in the meantime paying interest on the bonds. This is a matter entirely between the holders of the original bonds, the Imperial Government, and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and is merely to enable the Imperial Government to effect a loan in the United States on better terms than they otherwise could.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is not an isolated case. The Imperial Government has mobilized the bonds of some of the provinces—for instance, Manitoba. Manitoba was negotiating for an exchange of its issue in the same way. It proposed making a currency issue with which it could take up in New York its bonds in Great Britain. Some of the Canadian municipalities have done the same thing.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am not a financial man, but the company is issuing say a million dollars and encumbering its debenture stock and bonds to that extent. The British Government takes over this consolidated debenture stock for $1,000,000. The company then issues collateral trust bonds, apparently, for any amount up to $1,000,000. It seems to me that you have just doubled the amount of the encumbrance.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. My honourable friend as a lawyer should know that the two securities cannot be disposed of separately. Of course, this issue of collateral trust bonds will show on the face of it that it is issued as collateral to the consolidated debenture stock.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is my honourable friend of the opinion that this transaction could have been accomplished without legislation. I do not know that it could, but I have an idea that it might. This is a domestic arrangement between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Imperial Government.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The bonding power of the company is necessarily limited by the statute, and the company could not issue stock or bonds without authority.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is a case of replacing certain bonds by certain other bonds.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: The collateral security will be given by the same debtor. There is no more guarantee in the one than there is in the other.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The collateral trust bonds will be given to the holders of the consolidated debenture stock.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Who is asking for the Bill?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Imperial Government is asking for it in order to overcome the difficulty of exchange between Great Britain and the United States. As my honourable friend knows, the rate of exchange is so adverse to European financiers that it would be a most destructive transaction to ship gold to the United States to pay for munitions or supplies to the amount represented by these bonds. By the mobilization of these bonds and the issue of currency stock, or dollar stock, they overcome that difficulty.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Then, it is the intention to sell them in New York?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The original bonds will be sent over and the collateral bonds will be sold.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: When those collateral bonds are put out, they are out for good.

PENNY BANK AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 55, an Act to amend the Penny Bank Act, Hon. Mr. Thompson in the Chair.

On section 1—withdrawals for investment in Government securities and application of interest:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This Bill is to permit of the Government investing the funds of the Penny Banks in securities of the Government of Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Can my honourable friend state the amount invested in those banks?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. There are two of those banks. One is in Toronto, and has thirty-four branches. It has on deposit in the Post Office Savings Bank $370,000. The other is the Penny Bank of Chicoutimi, and has on deposit $13,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think the honourable gentleman said that the depositors were allowed 4 per cent interest?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not understand why all the depositors in the Savings Bank should not get the same rate of interest. You give the children 4 per cent; you give the bankers anywhere from 5 to 7 per cent; but you give the average person only 3 per cent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I presume it is an incentive to the children to use the Penny Bank.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: After giving authority, the section says:

—and may apply towards paying the working expenses, or for the purpose of augmenting the guarantee fund of the bank.

How is the augmenting of the guarantee fund done?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Those are 5 per cent securities, and of course that rate would be 1 per cent in excess of the present rate of interest. I assume that the cost of administration will be no greater than it is at the present time, so that the rate of interest on the deposits should be increased pro rata.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The section does not say that. It does not provide that the depositor shall receive anything over 4 per cent, which goes to augmenting the guar- difference between 4 per cent and say 5 per cent which goes to augmenting the guarantee fund of the bank. I confess that I do not know what that means.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: The reserve.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There is no reserve in the Penny Bank.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Why not?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Because it is a Government bank.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The Government could keep the guarantee account.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is not an answer to my question. How does it keep it? Where does it go? This difference apparently is ear-marked for a certain specific purpose: "for the purpose of augmenting the guarantee fund of the bank." But so far as I know it has none.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, it has.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is not a Government bank.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Act says:

"Guarantee fund" means the fund in this Act required to be established and maintained by the bank as security for the purpose in that behalf in this Act set forth.

The procedure apparently is that the Governor in Council may by letters patent grant a charter.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is the explanation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Section 8 of the Act makes further provision. Apparently it is not a Government bank.

The section was agreed to.

On section 4—annual report to minister:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What is the object of striking out "months of June and December?" I understand that it means that they have to report only yearly instead of every half year. Would there not be a better guarantee to the people if the report were made every six months?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Once a year may be regarded as sufficient.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Twice a year would be better.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The present provision is that the bank shall transmit a statement to the Minister of Finance in June and December of each year. It is evidently intended to reduce the returns to once a year, as in the case of other banks.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think it would be better to strike this clause out entirely. It is desirable that the depositors should know where they are twice a year rather than once a year.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There will not be very much apprehension in the minds of the children who have deposits in these banks, particularly when they come under the inspection and regulation of the Government, and more particularly as the funds will be invested almost entirely, I fancy, in Dominion of Canada securities. Furthermore, these banks are not being carried on on a very large scale.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of the Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 57, an Act to amend the Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, Hon. Mr. Daniel in the Chair.

On Section 1—taxes when profits exceed 15 per cent; when they exceed 20 per cent:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Will the honourable leader of the Government tell us what has been collected under this Act of 1916?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am very sorry to say that I cannot inform my honourable friend. Before the third reading is had I will make inquiry of the Department of Finance. Upon the second reading I explained that the object of the Bill is to increase the business profits war tax. On excess profits between 15 and 20 per cent the tax imposed will be 50 per cent; on profits in excess of 20 per cent it will be 75 per cent.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Under the original Act, as I understand it, incorporated companies may retain a profit of 7 per cent on their capital and ordinary business firms 10 per cent. Does the 15 per cent include that 7 and 10 per cent? Or is the 7 per cent for incorporated companies taken before the percentage of profit is considered for the war tax?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under the existing Act the tax imposed is 25 per cent of the excess profits over 7 per cent. The former Act will continue in operation, and 25 per cent will be imposed on profits between 7 per cent and 15 per cent. Then, from 15 per cent up to 20 per cent, 50 per cent of the net profits will be taken.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think that the passing of this measure is a step in the right direction. There is just one point on which I would like the honourable leader of the Government to give us a little explanation. When you impose such very severe penalties on the people who are in business you naturally lead them to try to evade the law. I have not a copy of the original Act by me at the moment; but I should like to know whether it contains provisions to render it impossible, or impracticable at any rate, to violate the law.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Human ingenuity is usually equal to evading almost any statute, but the administration of the Act, so far as the Finance Department is aware, has been very satisfactory.

Hon. Mr. POWER: That is all right enough up to 25 per cent; but when you come to 75 per cent it must make a difference.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There may be efforts to evade the consequences of the law; but the Finance Department, in carrying it out, have endeavoured to secure the very best talent in the way of accountants to examine the books of the different concerns to which the Act applies, and they have expressed satisfaction at not only the machinery which they put into motion but the assistance which has been given them by the various commercial concerns throughout Canada in arriving at the proper determination of what the tax should be.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: You put all establishments on the same plane? You do not differentiate between munitions factories and ordinary establishments, do you?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I notice by section 9 of the original Act that the Governor in Council may appoint a board or boards of referees, a board to consist of not more than three members. Would my honourable friend give the names of the referees who are appointed under that section?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I can not do that at the moment. It is practically a board of appeal. I will have that information for my honourable friend tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I asked my honourable friend the other day how this tax was collected. Has he had time to look into that? As I understand it, the tax is charged on the first accounting period of the year from December 31, 1914, to December 31, 1915?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The tax on the profits earned in the year 1915 would not be paid until 1916, and the question is whether a company paying taxes is allowed to charge that tax up in their ordinary expenses of the year 1916, or how they handle it? Of course, if it is charged up in the ordinary expenses of the year 1916, it reduces their profits for the year 1916 by the amount of the tax.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I asked about that, and I was told that they are not allowed to do that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The parties affected know that provision has to be made for the payment of the tax for the accounting period, and consequently it would not run over into the following period. It has nothing to do with the following period; that is to say, each period must sustain its own burden.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But, unless the officials of the department look carefully into the matter or instruct the company how to deal with it, any company doing business would naturally charge up their taxes as part of the expenses of the year in which they are paid.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not the year in which they are paid, but the year for which they are paid. They are in the same position as a dividend. If a dividend is declared for 1915 it is not chargeable as expenditure for 1916 although it may be paid in 1916.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Is any publicity given to the amount of taxes paid by different firms? Is there any return brought down?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not to my knowledge. There is nothing to prevent a return from being brought down.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: A statement was made in the other House three or four days ago.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I made inquiries at the Finance Department a few months ago. A firm asked me to find out what had been paid by other firms in the same town, and I was told that the information could not be produced.

Hon. Mr. POWER: That is right.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I do not think it is. I think that anyone paying taxes should be able to learn what his neighbours pay.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: A return has been laid on the table of the House of Commons respecting the assessments paid.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is, as to the total amount collected.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: What is the duration of the tax?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Three years, under the first Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Can the honourable leader of the Government tell us whether all the assessments for the first accounting period have been made up to the present time?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot tell my hon. friend with exactitude, because there has been considerable delay in making an examination of certain companies whose head offices are in various countries. There is not an assurance that the tax will be collected from companies of that class, as there is in the case of domestic companies; but, notwithstanding that fact, of course such companies are liable, and the collections are being made.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: I think in the statement that was presented the other day in the House of Commons the Ogilvie Company gave the net profits for the year and the amount paid out for dividends on preferred stock and on common stock, but not the amount of the war tax.

The section was agreed to.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 66, an Act to amend the Judges Act, Hon. Mr. Watson in the Chair.

On section 1—appointment of additional puisne judges:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: On the second reading of the Bill I explained that owing to recent legislation of the province of Saskatchewan providing for the organization of a new court and the reorganization of the existing supreme court, it is necessary to appoint an additional judge; consequently provision is made for the salary of that additional judge in Saskatchewan. Likewise, in the province of Ontario the number of county court judges has been increased by one, with the intention of giving to the district of Timiskaming an additional judge, and provision is accordingly made for the payment of that judge. The other principal feature of the Bill deals with the residences of judges. As honourable gentlemen know, when a judge is appointed his commission indicates where his judicial district is or where his jurisdiction will be exercised. Apparently of recent years some of the provincial legislatures have intervened at the solicitations of a judge who naturally desired to have a more attractive place of residence than that indicated at the time of his appointment; and, with that ingenuity which sometimes characterizes the human mind on the question of mileage, the judge has been charging mileage between his new residence and his judicial field, thus entailing very large expenses upon the Dominion exchequer. It is proposed to stop that by limiting the residence of the judge to the district in which he exercises his jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Does this increase the salaries of the judges?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would like to ask the honourable leader of the Government how the salaries named in this Bill compare with the salaries of the judges say in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The same, I think.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: We used to hear a great deal of the high cost of living out West—that it was so much more expensive to live out West than in the East that every official had to receive a much larger salary than he would receive in the eastern part of the country. So far as I can find out, it does not cost a bit more to live in the West than in the East, and I think the time has now arrived when salaries should be equalized all over the country, and that higher salaries should not be paid in British Columbia and Saskatchewan and other western provinces than are paid in the eastern provinces for the same services.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I can assure my honourable friend that the judges of New Brunswick have not been neglectful of their interests.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I know they are not, but I was speaking of the policy. I take it for granted that the judges of New Brunswick do not receive as high a salary.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Just the same.

The section was agreed to.

On section 3—travelling expenses of judge not residing in his district:

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I would like to inquire what is meant by the last words of that clause: "Governor in Council." Does that mean the Governor in Council of the province?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is only one Governor in Council.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I doubt if the Government has any right to change that provision. We know that a Provincial Government has a right to arrange the judicial districts in the province and to fix the place where the judge shall reside. The Dominion Government has no right to do that, and I think the last words in this section infringe on the rights of the provinces. The Federal Government has the right to appoint the judges, but it has no right to say where they shall reside. That is determined by the statute of the province. I think that if we leave those words in that section, it will be unconstitutional.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Bill does not say that the province shall not designate the residence of the judge. It only states that if the appointment indicates or provides for his place of residence, mileage shall be chargeable only from that particular place. Of course, the province may indicate another residence, but we are not bound to pay the mileage.

Hon. Mr CHOQUETTE: But you say, "unless his residence at that place be authorized or approved by the Governor in Council." This Parliament has no right to do that at all. We might say, "unless the place is changed by the province to which he belongs." That would be quite different.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend misapprehends the clause. It provides that the province may designate the residence, and the Governor in Council may authorize or approve of that residence, and accordingly the mileage will be computed from that residence.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I protest against that. We have no right to fix the place where the judge shall reside. The province has the right to declare the place where the judge shall reside, in his district or in the prvoince, but the Federal Government, by any Order in Council, or even by any Bill, cannot do that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Choquette) misinterprets the section altogether. As I understand it, those words, "unless his residence at that place be authorized or approved by the Governor in Council," simply mean that if the judge chooses to reside at some other place and travels from that place to his judicial district, the Dominion Government will not pay the expenses unless they have approved of that.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: That is not according to law.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is the Dominion Government that has to pay; it is not the province.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: They have refused during the last three or four months to pay. The Minister of Justice has declared that a judge had no right to some of his travelling expenses.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Choquette) is losing sight of the first clause, which says:

> A judge who is appointed or assigned to a district for the exercise of his ordinary jurisdiction therein, and required by law at the time of his appointment to reside within that district, shall not be entitled to travelling allowances incurred or made necessary by reason of his residing at any place outside of the district.

That is, if he resides anywhere outside of the district where he is required, by virtue of the law, to reside. Therefore it respects the provincial law.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think this is a good point at which I should intervene to move an amendment that I wish made to this Judges Act. You will see that this section 3 is really a section to stop peculation by a judge. It is a little painful that legislation of that kind must be passed in this House with regard to the judges. If we are entitled to expect honest dealing from any persons in this country, I should say it would be from the judges of the Superior Courts.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Of any court.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I think that from the great majority of our judges we get that, but here and there are exceptions, and section 3 deals with exceptions of that kind. Now, section 33 of the Act is in these words:

No judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or of the Exchequer Court of Canada or of any superior or county court in Canada, shall, either directly or indirectly, as director or manager of any corporation, company or firm, or in any other manner whatever, for himself or others, engage in any occupation or business other than his judicial duties; but every such judge shall devote himself exclusively to such judicial duties.

You see, the position is stated there positively and negatively; it is impossible that any man with sufficient capacity to occupy the position of a Superior Court or County Court Judge could misunderstand that statute. It is stated in two ways: you shall not engage in any of those things, and you shall give your whole time to your office. Now, there are two cases—I am not going to name them—of Superior Court judges who are not observing the provisions of that section. One of them says it is nonsense, because there is no penalty annexed to it. In my opinion, there is a penalty that could be enforced against him, the penalty of impeachment; and possibly there is another, under a clause in the Summary Convictions Act. A man violating a statute in which there is no penalty provided can be fined $100 and imprisoned for one year. It is all very well to chase a man who has been caught in some peculation in connection with horses or drugs; you expect to find a little of that in this wicked world; but to find judges of the Superior Court openly defying the provisions of that section is, I think, a little surprising. It is regrettable, and I am sorry that the subject has to be brought up in this House; but I think it ought to be brought up in this House and ought to be dealt with.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: You say they can be impeached. Can they?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I think they can. They are violating the provisions of a public statute.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend say in what respect they are violating the law? What is it they are doing?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Well, there is one judge who is drawing a salary of $2,500 a year in connection with a business, besides getting $6,000 as a judge.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is that the case of a director of a company?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: That is not the case of a director.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: In what capacity does he draw the $2,500?

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think it is better not to identify him.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Another judge is drawing pay as a director in two or three companies. Now, I propose this amendment to the section:

Section 33 of the Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"And every such judge shall in the month of December in every year file a statement with the Minister of Justice that he has complied with the terms of this section, or, if not, shall state in what manner he has departed therefrom. No salary shall be paid to any judge failing to file such statement."

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: That is good.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: If the judge files his statement, the Minister of Justice will get what he does not get to-day; he has no check upon the judges in this country. He has to depend on private information, which is to a certain extent unsatisfactory. It is no hardship on a judge at the end of each year to say, "I have devoted my whole time to the duties of my office," or to say, "I have not; I have drawn a salary elsewhere," and what it is. Then the Minister of Justice can say, "Now, you stop that or it will have to go before Parliament," or, "Stop that or I will know what to do."

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: There is no penalty; there is only the requirement to file a statement.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: No, but it brings the whole matter right before the Minister of Justice. The violation of the law is now under cover. There is merely a report.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Assuming that he does not file the declaration, as the law is at the present time, what then?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He does not get his salary.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: "No salary shall be paid to any judge failing to file such statement."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is very effective.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: That is a good penalty, is it not?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend explain further whether he thinks that section will cover the case of a judge sitting as a commissioner—as a member of a commission of inquiry such as is now sitting in Montreal?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I suppose that in the case of the creation of a commission and the appointment of a judge the Minister of Justice or the Government has some way of getting clear of the provisions of the statute. Of course, I am unalterably opposed to the putting of Superior Court judges on these commissions. I think it is a bad practice, and is gradually but surely lowering the character of our bench. But as to the question that my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) asked, I do not know; I do not care very much whether or not this amendment would conflict with the appointment of judges as members of commissions. I should be very glad to find that you could head that off in some way or other.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But as the proposed amendment stands it does not cover the case, does it?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I do not know that it would.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It does not prohibit it, at any rate.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Let the judge who is offered an appointment on a commission find out before he takes it and draws his pay.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I agree with my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Ross) that judges should not be given that kind of job at all, and I think that the judges themselves should refuse to act in that capacity; but if my honourable friend is going to deal with this thing drastically, as he proposes in one respect, I do not see why he leaves that unprovided for. To my mind this practice is open to just as much objection and is just as scandalous as the other; in fact, I think it affects the administration of justice far more than the receiving of a mere salary as a director or administrator of a company.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: But you have the statute. I am dealing with a statute which this Parliament has adopted and which is being defied and violated. That is all I am dealing with. If my learned friend (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) will bring in a Bill to prohibit the appointment of judges of the Superior Court on commissions I will support it.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I cordially endorse the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross). I think there has been a very great abuse of the law. The law at the present time provides that a judge shall not engage in any other business than the discharge of his duties as a judge; but some judges set the very bad example of paying no heed to the law which they are supposed to administer, and I think the honourable gentleman from Middleton is perfectly right and is doing valuable service in introducing this amendment. But I think that there are one or two points about it which perhaps need further consideration; that with respect to the appointment of judges as commissioners, for instance, and there is another point on which I had thought of moving an amendment myself. I would suggest to the honourable leader of the Government that the committee report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I quite concur in that, but would suggest that we let the preamble stand and that we pass down to section 4; then I will move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again. In the meantime, the proposed amendment will be printed, and we shall discuss it at the next sitting of the committee.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I regret that I cannot see eye to eye with my honourable friend (Hon. W. B. Ross). I think we must all acknowledge that, although there may be a few exceptions, we are justly proud of the men who sit on the bench in this country. It seems to me that the first thing to do in order to have good judges is to lead the people to respect them. There is no country in the world where judges are more respected than they are in England and no country in the world where they are better paid. Now, because there are two or three judges in the whole land who do not do their duty—

Hon. Mr. POWER: A great many more than two or three.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: There may be, but I think everybody will admit that they are rare exceptions. Because there are a few exceptions are you going to force the judges to make a return every year in that form to the Government—to come to the Government, as it were, and say, "My hands are clean"? I say that is unfair. I do not think we ought to oblige the judges to do that. May I draw the attention of the House to one thing: section 33 is a very severe one. It prohibits a judge not only from engaging in any business, but also from engaging in any occupation. We are using our judges in Montreal now for occupations, patriotic and others, and we are very glad to have them.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Occupations they are paid for.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Excuse me. Section 33 does not say that. This is what section 33 says:

> No judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or of the Exchequer Court of Canada or of any superior or county court in Canada shall, either directly or indirectly, as director or manager of any corporation, company or firm, or in any other manner whatever, for himself or others, engage in any occupation or business other than his judicial duties.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The Patriotic Fund is not an occupation.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Wait a minute. The word "occupation" is one that can be very easily stretched; it is a very wide word. Why is it not an occupation? A man may have a very steady, daily occupation that is perfectly patriotic and for which he receives no remuneration whatsoever.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Give an instance.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: There are a great many instances. There are judges who are administering our hospitals in Montreal, for instance. That is an occupation, a very heavy one indeed.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: They get no pay for it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: "Engage in any occupation," are the words of the statute.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: The word "occupation" in itself is very wide, and by this amendment you add a very drastic provision that may have a much wider effect than you expect. To my mind the reason against this amendment is this: because there may be a few exceptions we should not ask all the members of our bench throughout the land, men of high standing, men who deserve and have the respect of the public, to say every year that their hands are clean, so to speak, before they can receive their salaries. I repeat, I do not think it is a fair position in which to place a man having the high standing of a judge.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think that, as a general rule, if the judges respect themselves they will have the respect of the public, and the exceptional ones do not deserve to be respected. I think that what the honourable gentleman has just said goes to show the desirability of having the committee report progress. I should suppose that the "occupation" should be a gainful occupation.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I quite agree with the honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien): I think the adoption of the amendment would be a reflection on the whole judiciary. Some means might be taken to make the clause more stringent than it is, but I quite agree with the honourable gentleman that the amendment would go too far. If it were necessary to make a rule affecting all judges in that way, that would imply, I think, that a large number are disregarding the statute, and that this is the only means of reaching them and compelling them to observe the law. I think that the law, instead of affecting, directly or indirectly, all members of the Bench, should be directed only against those who violate the statute. I quite agree with the honourable gentleman also as regards the interpretation of the word "occupation." The question was discussed, I remember, when this law was passed a few years ago. It was contended, and I think that the consensus of opinion was to this effect, that the intention of the statute was to prohibit only such occupations as either entailed a salary or interfered with the discharge of the duties of the judge by preventing him from giving the whole of his time, or a reasonable proportion of his time, to his judicial duties.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The honourable senator who has just sat down must have been in this House when section 33 of the Judges Act was passed. If you can contrive anything more in the nature of a reflection on the judges I would be very much surprised. All that the amendment asks is that the judges shall say once a year that they have complied with the section, or, if they have not, that they shall tell the Minister of Justice in what way they have not. There is no reflection on the judges, and I do not think it is nearly as severe as section 33.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: When the Judges Act was amended, I remember, an increase in salary was given to the judiciary. Judges in the cities received an increase from $5,000 to $7,000 a year, and judges in the country from $4,000 to $5,000 a year. The then Minister of Justice said that the judges up to that time had been allowed to engage in some other occupation, or to occupy positions of trust, even on commercial bodies, and the Minister of Justice tolerated this procedure because he felt that for a number of years the judges had been underpaid. The principal argument against judges sitting on boards was that it might affect their independence inasmuch as it would bind them to some policies adopted by those boards which they would have to review in some parallel cases, and that, coming into contact with those institutions, business and otherwise, would perhaps create some bias in the minds of the judges and bring them down from the high plane on which they must stand. I do not remember if the then Minister of Justice explained the word "occupation;" but I know that in my province, and I am convinced that it is the same in other provinces, judges are members of universities. Some have been professors of law in universities and I have no doubt have received a fee for their services. We perhaps felt that it would be injudicious not to allow them to continue giving the benefit of their experience and knowledge to the young men of the universities. I do not remember whether the Minister of Justice proposed to temper that disposition of the law; I doubt if he could; but I do not see that the judges have altered their ways since that law was passed, and have withdrawn from serving the universities. I confess that I am somewhat reluctant to go with my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross), because the amendment affects all the judges. It seems to me that if he wants to strengthen the hands of the Minister of Justice he can do so by sanctioning the law without forcing all the judges to make a declaration.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Clause 33 has been cited. It says positively that a judge must attend to his business and must do nothing else. If the Minister of Justice learned of a judge doing something else it seems to me that it would be sufficient to write him and call his attention to the statute. I would not be prepared to vote for the amendment proposed by my honourable friend. I think it is somewhat of a reflection on the judges. You are going to ask the judges to give themselves a certificate that they have not sinned. I do not know of any class of men who are asked to do that. I think that the Bill as it stands is sufficient. I have been told that within the last three or four months some judges have been stopped of the practice referred to in a very simple way. I know of two judges who have sent in accounts for sitting in Quebec. They were appointed for outside of Quebec but resided in that city, though by the law they are obliged to reside in their district. This practice has been followed since Confederation, you may say. These judges sent in accounts of their per diem expenses for the time they sat in Quebec. They had no right to do that; according to the law they have no right to their expenses. It would have been sufficient in the past for the Minister of Justice to write and say, "You have no right to this, because you have been sitting outside of your judicial district even though in the district in which you reside." I maintain that a change by the Federal Parliament would be unconstitutional, because the right to charge travelling expenses to the places where they sit is fixed by the local authorities. The Government at Ottawa has only the right to appoint judges for the district. With the exception of the clause providing for the appointment of new judges, I think the Bill is of no value whatever. The Minister of Justice has all the machinery necessary to make the judges obey the law, and he can refuse to pay the expenses to which they are not entitled.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: The honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) has made a very plausible argument on the face of it. He says that section 33, if put into effect by the sanction which we are now giving, would in itself be the instrument making the change. I say not at all. Section 33 restricts the duties of a judge. There are other sections which say that judges shall not take money for judgments which they render. There are a great many sections in our law to guide men through life and to make them honest whether they want to be so or not. What would any honourable gentleman in this House say if at the end of the year he had to write down a negative confession, so to speak?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The honourable gentleman has to do it every session in order to get his indemnity.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I must confess that I did not know it. It makes no difference; it does not change the value of my argument. If the judges have every year to report to the Minister of Justice that they have not violated that clause before they can touch their salaries, why should they not also state that they have not violated other clauses of the law?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The amendment does not say that. It requires the judge to inform the Minister of Justice whether or not he has complied with that section.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: By painting the picture in more vivid colours, so to speak, it will be seen more readily. You force the judge to come down, figuratively speaking, and show a clean record as far as that section is concerned. It is not a fair rule to apply to a judicature which until now has been held up to the respect of everybody.

Progress was reported.

OCEAN TELEGRAPH ACT REPEAL BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 69, an Act to repeal the Ocean Telegraph Act, Hon. Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As I explained the other day, the object of this Bill is to authorize the Government to make a repayment to the Universal Radio Syndicate of the balance of a deposit made by that company as a guarantee of carrying out its contract with the Dominion Government. A wireless telegraph system was to be constructed between Canada and the United Kingdom. $50,000 was deposited with the Government at that time; half of this amount was to be repaid to the company upon the expenditure of $50,000, which was done. Afterwards a loan of $15,000 was made to the company out of the remaining $25,000, and $10,000 is still held on deposit. The Marconi Wireless Company practically propose taking over the contract and carrying it out, and in this way the Government is securing the construction of a line as good as, if not superior, to the original line.

The Bill was reported.

PRIVATE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Bill N2, an Act respecting The Montreal Central Terminal Company.—Hon. Mr. Beaubien.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Explain.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I understand that this Bill is simply for the purpose of extending the period for construction.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Why?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Because the company has found it impossible to proceed with the work during the war.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 42, An Act to amend the Chinese Immigration Act. He said: The main provision of this Bill is to allow Chinese students to visit Canada without being subject to the usual head tax. At the present time the tax is imposed upon them and is refunded on their departure from the country. This is not done in the United States. The other clauses are simply the necessary machinery for the purpose of making more effective the tax on Chinese.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: The imposition of this $500 tax has prevented scores of students from coming here to obtain an education.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I do not quite see why the tax should prevent them coming into the country, because I understand that it is returned.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They have to get the money first.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I thought that in many cases there was a society that put up the money to provide for this tax.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There was one very regrettable case last winter. A Chinaman who came to New Brunswick was put in jail and finally deported, although his father was a naturalized British subject, and he was born in Trinidad. He was coming here to study at one of the colleges. He was sent away like a calf or a horse. There was a great deal of excitement about the case in Trinidad and also among the churches.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Do I understand my honourable friend to say that he could not establish the fact that he was a student?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes, but he had not the $500.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What certificate does the Government exact as to evidence in order that a Chinaman may be allowed in? Is it a simple declaration that he is a student and that he comes in to perfect his education?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I could not tell you at the moment. I think the Act is very explicit on the subject.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think the case mentioned by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) is even worse than he has stated. As I understand it, both the father and the mother of that so-called Chinaman were British subjects living in Trinidad. There was a trace of Chinese blood in either the father or the mother, I do not know which, and on the strength of that this man was held up in St. John and not allowed to land because he had not $500 to pay.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This is rather irregular on the motion for the second reading, but I may be allowed to say that the difficulty is found in the West, where a large number of Chinamen come in. The problem is to know how to distinguish between students and ordinary labourers.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: They are British subjects.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It is quite conceivable that others might come in who are not students and slip through without paying the tax. I presume the Government has some regulations or some methods of finding out whether a man is a student, and following him up to ascertain whether he goes to college, or what he does after he gets into the country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Let us discuss that in committee.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: If my honourable friend has the information, we can probably go into the matter better in committee than now.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My hon. friend has inquired what is the reason that clergymen are included in the class exempted. There are two classes exempt from the tax—clergymen and students.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is, Chinese clergymen.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They are all clergymen.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: A clergyman has been a student. The clergy are a favoured class. It is unreasonable that we should impose a head tax of $500 upon clergymen of a particular sect that we allow to come into Canada.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: This exemption is susceptible of abuse, because clergymen are not ear-marked in any way; anyone from China can be a clergyman for twenty-four hours.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You can easily tell them; they have a peculiar brand usually.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I think the attention of the Government ought to be called to this matter. The clauses are very wide. "Clergymen" is a very general term. Who is going to diagnose the case of a Chinaman when he comes here, to ascertain whether he is a clergyman or not? That term is very broad, and the Government ought to look into it. The second class who are exempt are students who will attend colleges. Well, there are any number of colleges all over the Dominion, from Vancouver to Charlottetown, and you would have five or six or a dozen students going to each college or each university; but how long will they stop there? It is open to them to stay for a whole term of a college, university, or school; but it is open to them also to go abroad promiscuously through the land. I think the Government should consider this matter and make the terms of the exemptions definite. If you are going to tax every Chinaman because he is not a student or a clergyman, you are not giving them a fair deal. Those men will come into the country under the classification of students; but what is a student and how long is he going to be here?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The Act provides that if he ceases to be a student he may be deported.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: How are we going to find out? The Government and all its officers would require to follow them.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Act provides that those certificates shall be endorsed by the British consul or an official representing the Imperial Government, or the accredited representative of His Majesty at the port or place of departure of a student or clergyman, or the individual in question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is one protection, but is it sufficient? I am simply pointing out the danger, that is all.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 68, an Act to amend the Civil Service Act. He said: There are two particular features in this Bill. The first is to be found in section 2, which gives the persons placed in the Third Division by the Act of 1908, who had passed a qualifying examination, the right to avail themselves of the standing which they had at that particular time. Owing to some peculiar phraseology in that Act, they seem to have been deprived of that right, although not intentionally. The other clauses deal chiefly with increasing the minimum salaries in the lower grades of the Inside Service by about $200. I think it will be recognized by honourable gentlemen that that class of public servants, particularly those who have been receiving from $600 to $1,000 a year, are very poorly paid, particularly at this time, when the high cost of living is so emphasized. These are the chief features of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is the meaning of section 2 that a civil servant can be promoted from the Third Division to the Second Division without examination? That is the object of it, is it not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is a pity that another wording could not have been chosen to convey that idea rather than the wording that is here.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: When the Act was passed in 1908 it was the intention that that right should continue to those who desired to exercise it, and who had passed the qualifying examination; but it has been interpreted by the Civil Service Commissioners to be that it only qualifies them for the Third Division, and that they will have to pass another examination for promotion to the Second Division.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not think this is very much of an improvement on the old section.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is very desirable to remove a cloud and make it clear. We can go into that in committee.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It seems to me that adding the words "without examination" would have made it clear.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. The idea is that, they having passed an examination previous to 1908, that examination shall qualify them for the higher classes as well without their having to pass another examination.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I understand the object of it, and I think it would have been made perfectly clear if, after the words, "may be promoted from the Third Division to the Second Division," the words "without examination" had been added. If anybody is so disposed, I think it could still be interpreted in the way it has been interpreted before.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That may be.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned till three o'clock tomorrow.

PRIVATE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill V2, an Act to incorporate the North American Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Nicholls.

FURTHER EXTENSION OF TERM OF PARLIAMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN inquired:

When will the Government introduce, as announced in the Speech from the Throne, its Bill for a further extension of time, to permit the present ministry (depleted) and the prsent House of Commons (very much depleted) to continue in existence without a mandate from the electorate of the Dominion of Canada?

He said: I do not suppose the Government can give me any definite and complete answer to this question, but I am sure the House will be very much interested in any answer that may be made.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot say at what time during the present session the Bill will be introduced.

A VOTE ON CONSCRIPTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE rose to call the attention of the Government to the following extract from an article published in the Montreal Star of the 5th June, instant:

> Too Much Secrecy at Ottawa.
> And by that same token if there is ever to be a vote on our war policy, it should be an open vote. The ballot has its uses in protecting the labouring man from his employer and the poor from the rich, but it should not be prostituted into a shield for cowardice, moral or physical. Any man who goes up to vote either to conscript his fellow citizen or to desert his other fellow citizen already under German fire should do so like a man, under the eyes of the youth he intends to conscript or the father and brother of the other youth he intends to desert.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I may say that there has been a line omitted, by oversight or otherwise, after the citation of the article mentioned. My original notice must have had the words, "and will inquire if the Government intends to do anything in that direction." How this omission occurred I do not know, but I ask permission of the House to go on with the motion. I do not intend to take very much time on this matter, and it is not because I attach very great importance to the article that I bring it up.

I may say that the method of taking the vote does not make a particle of difference in Quebec. We are willing to vote openly or secretly; but I see by the Star, which is supposed to know a great deal about sentiment outside of Quebec, what the sentiment is about conscription. In order that we may know what that sentiment really is I will take the liberty of placing before the House a few quotations from Ontario papers. They are not Liberal papers, not papers which are absolutely opposed to recruiting, and you will see from these quotations that the article to which I refer—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend pardon me? If it is in order for honourable gentlemen to direct the attention of this House to every article which appears in the newspapers of this Dominion it is quite manifest that we would not be able to do the business of the country. There must be some limitation placed upon a discussion of this character. I regret very much to have to raise the point of order; but my honourable friend is entirely out of order, as there is nothing before the House.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: With all due respect to my honourable friend, I do not think the point of order is well taken. Every day we discuss public matters in this House. I am dealing with the question of voting on a public matter. I do not refer to any Bill or anything else to come before the House. This is an article discussing a public matter and asking the Government to change the law with respect to voting. I ask if it is the intention of the Government to do something in the direction of doing away with the secrecy of the vote in this Dominion on this question. I think I am absolutely in order. I will not take much time—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not think the point of order is well taken. The honourable gentleman is not raising a question of privilege; in that case there might be some question as to the propriety of referring to a newspaper. What the honourable gentleman wishes to do is to find out what the policy of the Government is as to the manner in which the vote on the conscription measure is to be taken. There is nothing objectionable about that. The honourable gentleman has a right to ask that question. He need not have referred to the Star at all; he might simply have asked the question. He used the reference for the purpose of making perfectly clear what he intended, and I fail to see that there is anything contrary to order in the inquiry.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The article does not for a moment allege that the Government is going to do anything. The Star as a newspaper is advocating some particular policy. What right has my honourable friend to ask if the Government is going to follow the policy advocated by this newspaper? If my honourable friend is serious about this matter, he knows perfectly well that if his course were carried to its logical conclusion we would not be able to transact any business in this House at all; our time would be taken up in the discussion of newspaper articles, and very much more important articles than this one.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) is not discussing the article in the Star at all. He simply uses that to show the point which he wishes to get at, and he has a perfect right to make the inquiry.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is no inquiry.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The fact that he cites the Star does not count for anything at all.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Question. I ask the Chair to rule.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We are in the dark; we want some light.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I fail to see that there is anything contrary to order at all.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: It seems to me that the honourable gentleman would be correct if the motion contained an inquiry at the end of it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understood that my honourable friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) drew attention to the fact that there was an omission in the notice as printed, and, as I understood, obtained permission to amend it.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: When did he get that permission?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: To-day, while you were not listening.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: What is the inquiry?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I asked the permission of the House, and I thought that there was no objection, to add the words, "and will inquire if the Government intends to do anything in that direction;" then I proceeded. I am willing to postpone the motion until to-morrow so that it may be printed correctly.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Go on.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: Does my honourable friend for a moment think that the Government would be ready to answer such a momentous question just as it is put? Such questions should be put in the regular form, and sufficient time should be given to look them over.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I will give the Government all the time that is required to answer.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They should answer it off the bat.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The honourable the Speaker decided some time ago, in regard to an inquiry by an honourable member of this House, that the inquiry was out of order because it had been announced by the Government of the country that the subject to which it referred would be brought before Parliament. I take the same point of order with regard to this matter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I rise to a point of order. The honourable gentleman cannot raise a second point of order until the first one has been decided.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That makes three points of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The Speaker must decide the first point of order first.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I withdraw my point of order.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I raised the point of order that there was nothing before the House as the motion appeared on the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The House, by unanimous consent, allowed the honourable gentleman to amend his notice.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am entirely unaware of that.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I will postpone it until to-morrow in order that it may be printed correctly.

The notice was allowed to stand.

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA JURISDICTION BILL.

On the order:

Second reading Bill C, an Act to limit the Appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Casgrain.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not intend moving the second reading of this Bill today. I may explain that I have been in communication with some very eminent lawyers and some judges, and, as usual, there is much diversity of opinion between the lawyers and the judges on this question. I am gathering all the information obtainable and hope to be able to present it to this honourable House in moving the second reading of this Bill. I shall try to give good reasons for its adoption. If, however. I am not able to find better reasons than I have been able to collect up to the present time, I shall have to drop the Bill. I would therefore move that this order be discharged and be placed on the Order Paper for July 19.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. GEORGE LYNCH-STAUNTON moved the second reading of Bill L2, an Act to amend the Railway Act.

He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill I wish to make a few remarks as to the reasons why I have introduced it. The Bill, you will notice, provides that hereafter:

4. No person shall be qualified to be nor shall be elected a director of the company—

That is, of any railway company authorized under the Railway Act of Canada—who is not a bona fide resident in Canada, nor shall any person act as a director after he has ceased to be a bona fide resident in Canada.

5. All meetings of directors shall be held within Canada and no action of the board of directors had or taken elsewhere shall be lawful or of any force or effect.

6. The provisions of subsections 4 and 5 of this section shall apply only to elections of directors and meetings and actions of directors had, held or taken after the first day of January, 1918.

The object of this Bill is to compel any railway company receiving aid from Canada or its provinces to have the supervision of its affairs committed to directors who know the conditions which exist in Canada.

It may be said that, railway companies being private corporations, their shareholders should be the sole judges as to the persons to whom they should confide the care of their money. But this is not a sound position, nor a position which has been respected by the legislatures of Canada. Under the general Railway Act every railway company must submit to an order of the Railway Board directing it to allow its private property to be utilized by any other company, and on such terms as the Railway Board may decree. In innumerable ways we interfere with the disposal and the enjoyment of the rights and properties of persons who invest their money in public utilities of this description. Not only are the railway companies to which I refer not exempt on that ground, but they are debtors of Canada, and creditors often undertake to interfere with the management of the business of their debtors. Not only that, but it is in the public interest of Canada that the great railway corporations be well and economically managed and be prosperous. Moreover, a failure of a great railway corporation reflects upon the credit of this country.

These are, I submit, general reasons, no matter how well a railway company is governed, why the legislatures of Canada have the right to interfere with their internal management. If it were only an academic question, if it were only the assertion of a right, perhaps we would never undertake to interfere with them. In my opinion, however, it is not only wise but it is the absolute duty of the Parliament of Canada at this time to interfere with the government of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which is the company I have in mind in introducing and speaking on this Bill.

The Grand Trunk was the first of the great transportation companies authorized to build railways in Canada. They obtained their charter in 1851, and a few years after they commenced the building of their roads they dropped their Canadian directors, electing a board of directors all, I think, or at least a majority, of whom were non-residents of Canada. I do not wish to make any extravagant statements, nor to reflect harshly upon anybody; but I think that it is known to all who know anything of Canada that the Grand Trunk Railway Company has been uniformly unsuccessful throughout its history, from the day that it first commenced operations until the present time. The Hon. Mr. Barker, who was a member of the House of Commons for many years, who was an acute, able financial critic, and who had a great railway experience, was a few years ago commissioned by the Grand Trunk Railway Company's shareholders to investigate the company's affairs, and he made such a report that the shareholders turned out the whole board of directors for inefficiency—for the manner in which they had financed the road, and for the buying of the Michigan and Vermont branches. Mr. Barker told me, in discussing that report upon many occasions, that the fundamental blunder made by the Grand Trunk Railway directors was in the purchase of their feeders. They bought everything that was offered to them, and, so far as I know, they did not buy any feeders which ever benefited the Grand Trunk.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: In what year was that?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The report was made about the year 1900; I cannot tell you the exact date. I tried to ascertain it, but I am not sure. I know personally that they bought lines running from the city of Hamilton to Caledonia and towards the international boundary, and they have so mismanaged them that the Toronto, Hamilton, and Buffalo Company within the last few years have been paid by the town of Dunville a large bonus to run an opposition line to Dunville in order that that part of the country might be served with railway communication. It takes one nearly a day to go by rail from Hamilton to Dunville, and a whole day to go to Cayuga, though you can drive there in three or four hours. The Grand Trunk made no pretense of accommodating the public. Now, if it would pay the Toronto, Hamilton, and Buffalo Railway Company to build a line of railway to share the business of Dunville with the Grand Trunk, surely common sense and decent management would have induced the Grand Trunk to run over the existing lines a direct train to that town.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the population of the town?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Four or five thousand, but it is in an excellent country, where there is much business. At all events, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Toronto, Hamilton, and Buffalo, and the New York Central, which are governed by men who know how to run a railway, thought it was sufficiently important to build a line there to share the business.

Years ago the Grand Trunk Railway Company had a monopoly of the business of the city of Hamilton, and I remember when the city offered to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company $500,000 to build a line into that city. They went on their knees to Mr. Van Horne, they begged and begged him for years, to have the Canadian Pacific railway run into Hamilton. What for? To divide business with the Grand Trunk, who, if they had had the common sense to treat the city of Hamilton with ordinary business prudence, might have continued until this day to have the whole business of that city, which is now the second or third manufacturing city in this Dominion.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: How does the Canadian Pacific railway get into Hamilton from Toronto?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It goes as far as the Desjardins canal, within a mile of Hamilton, over the tracks of the Grand Trunk. It pays the Grand Trunk about $40,000 a year for that privilege. All I wish to impress upon honourable gentlemen by my statements is that not only did the Grand Trunk buy poor properties as feeders, but after obtaining them they have never endeavoured to develop them; they have allowed them just to go along until the population in the district concerned induced opposition railroads to parallel them and take from them the little business they had. It was not the enterprise of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but it was the entreaties of the people served by those railways, which induced it to come in.

We all know that the Grand Trunk Railway Company had an opportunity to obtain the greatest prize that was ever offered to a railway company when Sir John Macdonald conceived the idea of building the Canadian Pacific railway. The Grand Trunk allowed that golden opportunity to pass, and it was seized by a group of Canadian gentlemen who lived in Canada and knew the value of the opportunity. The gentlemen who were governing the Grand Trunk were three thousand miles away, and whenever there was some tin-pot railway that their local manager asked them to buy they purchased it; but when they had an opportunity to build the greatest adjunct to their railway which they possibly could have obtained, they let it go by.

I have already said that on Mr. Barker's report the Grand Trunk shareholders turned out the old Board and put in a new absentee set of masters. And what did they do? I have been reading with interest the report made by the commission appointed to inquire into the railways and transportation of Canada, consisting of three gentlemen—Sir Henry Drayton, Mr. W. M. Acworth, and Mr. A. H. Smith, of the New York Central Railway Company. I assert, honourable gentlemen, that this report publishes the most humiliating, the most abject confession of ignorance and inefficiency on the part of the Board of the Grand Trunk Railway. It reports conduct which at least should not be approved of by the Parliament of Canada. Now, what is said in it? We all know that the Grand Trunk Railway Company applied to the Government of Canada to build the Transcontinental line. Mr. Hays suggested to Sir Rivers-Wilson that it was desirable that the Grand Trunk Railway Company should induce the Government of Canada to build the Transcontinental railway in order that the produce of Canada might be carried to the ocean entirely on British territory; and they laid a scheme of that kind before the Government. Now, mark: the object was to carry the output of the West to the ocean entirely on British territory. They laid this scheme before the Government of the day, and the Government of the day made some important suggestions for the amendment of the proposition, and it eventually came about that the Grand Trunk Railway Company agreed with the Government to build the Grand Trunk Pacific railway from Winnipeg to the Pacific coast, and to rent for fifty years, with the right of renewal, the Transcontinental line from Winnipeg to Moncton, creating another competitor for the old Grand Trunk. The Grand Trunk Railway was given the right to supervise and interfere with the cost of construction of the Eastern section, or what is known as the Transcontinental railway; and, so far as I know—and I know a little about it—they had the absolute control of the construction of the western or Grand Trunk Pacific end of that road. Recently they came to the Government of Canada and asked to be relieved from their obligations and from their contract, and, as the commission puts it, they wished to wash their hands of the whole transaction. Now, what are their obligations?

The Grand Trunk Railway Company has guaranteed to the Government of Canada and to the public a payment by the Grand Trunk Pacific of at least $120,000,000; it has advanced in cash to the Grand Trunk Pacific $25,000,000; it has obligated itself to pay for the present $5,000,000 a year and after next year $7,000,000 a year interest on the construction of that railway. During that time, from 1906 to 1916, the Grand Trunk Railway Company paid out $36,000,000 in dividends; and they deferred—to use a technical word, when I mean to say they did not do their duty—deferred improvements of $6,000,000 which they said were absolutely necessary to the railway. Why did they take this tremendous responsibility? This wrecking of the Grand Trunk railway was undertaken by a board of directors living 3,000 miles away from Canada. I do not know whether any one of those gentlemen is a railway man—whether any member of that board has any railway knowledge or experience; but I trust for their honour that they are tyros and not business men. They have allowed what Mr. Chamberlin has sworn to be an absolutely impossible bargain to be made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company. They have put the seal of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to a liability of $125,000,000—to a contract which Mr. Chamberlin swears never could benefit the Grand Trunk Railway a single dollar. They have taken from the treasury of that railway $25,000,000 when they knew—unless they were, as I say, tyros—unless they were simply a dummy board—that they were putting that amount into the building up of a road which would never be of any use to the Grand Trunk, and which money they now claim should have been expended for the ordinary up-keep of the Grand Trunk railway itself. In this country we would not call them directors; we would call them wreckers. And those men have taken this enormous corporation, this great artery of Canada's trade, and, if their General Manager is to be believed, they have destroyed it beyond redemption. Unless the Government of Canada comes to their aid they must, he says, go into the hands of a receiver. I consider that is a national disaster. I am not lecturing; but I have tried to impress upon you how seriously I think this case is from my point of view as a Canadian. I consider that this railway company should be rescued from these men, who are either betrayers of their trust or ignorant of their duty. I have not in the least overstated the evidence of Mr. Chamberlin. He swears to the statements which I have quoted.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is it true that Mr. Chamberlin has left the Grand Trunk and is no longer connected with that company?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Rumour has it that Mr. Chamberlin is retiring. I know not whether it be true or not; but I understand that the Chairman of the Grand Trunk Railway Company is in Canada, and so far as I know he has never repudiated or answered the charges that have been made by Mr. Chamberlin. Here are the very words Mr. Chamberlin uses:

> We can no more carry out that contract with the Government than anything in the world. How are we going to raise money to build those steamships? How are we going to build steamships? How are we going to carry the burden if we are forced to carry all that stuff all the way down there at Boston and Portland rates?
> Sir Henry Drayton: Your second ground is that of impossibility?
> Mr. Chamberlin: It is an impossibility.
> Sir Henry Drayton: If it is impossible now, it was always impossible?
> Mr. Chamberlin: It was always impossible.

Now, there is the contract that they entered into. If they had taken a gambler's chance at the expense of Canada, as they say some other people did, it would have been different; but to take that great railway enterprise and pledge it for an impossible enterprise certainly shows that the men who did that are not fit to be allowed to govern that company any longer. This Chamber is made up of men who have succeeded in nearly all walks of life, men who know Canada, men who understand great business enterprises; and I ask if there are six honourable gentlemen in this House who, appreciating their duty and endeavouring to perform it, would undertake to be the directors of and govern from Ottawa a railway in South Africa or Australia, or in England, for that matter? Yet these gentlemen jumped jauntily into the directors' chairs, and, although from year to year they saw, if they spent a moment to look at the reports, that the railroad was on the toboggan slide, they continued to draw their directors' fees and allow the railway to take care of itself.

Now, the railway conditions of Canada at the present time are very critical. It is in the air—not only in the air, but it is discussed in practical railway circles—that the steam railway engine will be as rare as a stage coach seen only on a coloured plate. In the United States there are 400 or 500 miles of railway operated by electric power.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: More than that.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Perhaps 1,000 miles; and it is the opinion of engineers for whom I have great respect that the time has now arrived when all the railroads of Ontario and Quebec at least, to be efficient, must be run by electric power, the only possible force by which railways in this northern country can be run economically and successfully. I am not going to enter into the details of that problem; but these questions are up and are being discussed. The railways are short of equipment, inefficient, and, to use the phrase of the board, have fallen down. They must be rebuilt. Is it reasonable or fair to the people of Canada, not to speak of the shareholders of the railway companies themselves, to allow these radical changes to take place under the guidance of a board 3,000 miles away?

I would like to point out what Mr. Smith said in his report regarding the possibilities of this railway under proper control. He is apparently an able and successful railway man; he is president or general manager, I do not know which, of the New York Central Railway. He says this:

> Standing alone, with efficient operating conditions imposed, there is no reason within my knowledge why the Grand Trunk Railway proper should not become a profitable operation. It occupies a good territory, reaching some of the best traffic centres in the United States and Canada, and has American connections that ought to contribute to its welfare. The company needs terminal improvements in cities and modern equipment, especially locomotives. The need for equipment is pressing and should be met.

There is the railway: it has never succeeded; it has been under foreign control, while the Canadian Pacific railway has been under Canadian control. The Canadian Pacific railway is the most successful and perhaps the most efficient railway corporation in the world; Canada is proud of it. The Canadian Pacific railway aids our credit; it is to-day able to help finance the British Empire; while the Grand Trunk is a mendicant at the doors of Parliament. The contrast ought to convince any one that it is the part of wisdom at least to compel the Grand Trunk railway to be governed by Canadians, men who know our environment, men who understand our needs, men who have been brought up in this country and do not have to listen for their guidance to the reports of hirelings—of some person who is simply earning his salary.

I submit, honourable gentlemen, that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company are entitled to gratitude; they are shareholders with the people of Canada; they invested their money in the early days, and they have received very small returns from the investment. They live in a distant country and do not understand the reasons for their non-success. We do. I heard Canada reproached twenty years ago because of losses on the investments which confiding gentlemen in England had made in this railway, and I say that when we gave that charter it was our duty to see that the road was governed by people who understood our conditions; if it was not our duty, it was our interest; and now we should at least step into the breach and endeavour to save the Grand Trunk Railway Company shareholders from themselves.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: I think it is acknowledged that for many years to come this country will not be able to look to England or to any part of Europe for capital for the development of this country, which up to this day has been and for a long while to come will be a new country. I think we shall have to go to the United States to a very large extent for capital for the development of Canada, and our ability to obtain capital from that country will be impaired if its citizens cannot become directors of the companies in which they invest their capital. Therefore I think that this Bill would not be in the general interests of this country.

I quite understand the criticism of the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) as far as the Grand Trunk Railway Company is concerned; I have no doubt that the able speech which he has delivered will be distributed to the shareholders of that corporation and will be a lesson to them; but we must not close our eyes to the facts that it is almost entirely British capital which is invested in the Grand Trunk Railway Company, that it was invested because of faith in a charter which was granted by Parliament, and that under that charter it was open to those gentlemen to have their affairs administered by people chosen by themselves. I think it would be a very serious interference to take that right away by a general Act, and to say that in the future it will not be open to the English shareholders in the Grand Trunk Railway Company to elect any of the members of the Board although they have contributed all the capital. I think honourable gentlemen will agree that this bill goes too far; it shows the danger of dealing with this question by a general Bill. I think the honourable gentleman should wait until the Grand Trunk Railway Company comes to this Parliament asking for help, when means could be devised to prevent all of the directors being appointed outside of Canada, or to curtail the right of appointment to some extent; but I fail to see the advisability of trying to cure the evil by a general law such as has been suggested. For my part I am not disposed to assent to the second reading.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: With reference to the point raised by the honourable gentlemen (Hon. Mr. Béique) I may say that I have a letter from the president of the Toronto, Hamilton, and Buffalo Railway Company, raising the same objection, but I thought that this might be discussed more properly in committee. No doubt there are railway companies in Canada which should not be brought under such a sweeping enactment. The president of the Toronto, Hamilton, and Buffalo Railway says that there are five American directors on their board, but that the majority are Canadians. I quite appreciate that a company which has had no aid from Canada and which has a substantial number of Canadians on its board of directors should not perhaps be treated in the same way as a company which has received a great deal of aid from Canada and has not been built entirely by the capital of foreign shareholders. I did not discuss that point because I thought it might well be considered in committee, and I would ask to have it deferred until then.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: I had intended raising the objection taken by the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) to the principle of this Bill; but, as that objection has been made, I will simply say a few words in justification of the action of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in promoting the extension of their system and the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Grand Trunk Railway Company, the oldest railway company in Canada, having a system covering the whole of Ontario and much of Quebec, and with important connections with the United States and with the Atlantic seaboard, felt that, when it had gathered valuable freight from the cities and towns of the East, and had carried it by a short haul to North Bay, it was not just to itself to have to hand over that freight to a railway which was not part of its system in order to have it carried to the Pacific ocean and the Northwest. Feeling strongly on that point, the then president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, Mr. Hays, an expert railway man and a man of very high standing in the United States and Canada, proposed that the Grand Trunk railway should first be extended from Fort William and Port Arthur throughout the Northwest, connecting their existing system with Fort William and Port Arthur for some time by means of their water transportation. It is true that when they came before Parliament they asked for authority to build from the Pacific ocean to Winnipeg, thence to Fort William, and thence to North Bay; but I had it at the time from officials of the Grand Trunk that their main object for the time being was to develop that western extension by means of their water connection with Fort William. When their petition was presented to Parliament, I was one of those who thought, since the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, or in other words the Grand Trunk Railway Company, intended building from the Pacific ocean to North Bay, that, instead of deflecting their road from the point now called Cochrane, but which was then simply a geographical expression, to North Bay, and thence to Toronto, they could, without covering much more ground, push on by a direct line to the seaboard at Quebec. Many members of both Houses felt the same way and urged that view upon the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I need not detain this House in order to state what followed. The Grand Trunk Railway Company agreed to alter their scheme, undertaking to build the portion of the line from the Pacific to Winnipeg and a branch to Fort William, under the charter of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and leaving to the Government the construction of the line from Winnipeg to the East. The company was to lease the railway and to have the privilege of operating it for seven years after it was built and completed, without paying interest on the capital expended. This scheme was seriously studied at the time by the best railway men that the Grand Trunk Railway Company could command. Although the management felt that the development of the country traversed by the eastern section of the railway would be a somewhat heavy undertaking, yet it was no heavier a load than was assumed by the Canadian Pacific railway in the development of the Northwest when there was hardly a settler beyond Winnipeg. I make this statement in order to justify the action of the board sitting in London in agreeing to this undertaking. They had no mean advisers on this side of the Atlantic to study and report upon the scheme. I may say that in the last conversation I had with Mr. Hays before he started on that fatal trip on the Titanic which ended in his drowning, he expressed a robust conviction that the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company would carry the undertaking through the lean years and make it financially successful. I say this because he felt strongly on the matter and because it is due to the directors of the Grand Trunk in London that I should affirm it. He did not come to this conclusion without serious study. I will not speak of the handicap which the board in London were under in studying conditions at such a distance. As the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) has said, nearly all of the capital invested in the undertaking was that of private individuals, and it was quite natural that they should deem it their privilege to decide where the board should sit and who should be the directors. I know there has been a strong sentiment throughout Canada that the Grand Trunk Railway Company would do better to have their board in Canada. At this stage of the discussion I will not express an opinion upon that, except to say that I felt at the time I refer to that the board in London had taken all the precautions that were possible to them in the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I intend to move the adjournment of this debate, but I do not want to do so before saying that I dissent very strongly from what has been said by the promoter of this Bill. The Bill seems to apply only to the Grand Trunk railway. The promoter has read from the majority report made by Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. Acworth. The report of Mr. Smith does not agree with that. We have still the memory of a famous report made by Messrs. Lynch-Staunton and Gutelius, and there seems to be a little rancour left with regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Grand Trunk Railway Company because the Grand Trunk has allowed the Canadian Pacific to run into the city of Hamilton because Hamilton wanted two railways. Every place wants two railways so that there may be competition.

I do not want to lose my opportunity of speaking later on by saying anything now. Therefore I move the adjournment of the debate; but I desire to say that I do not believe that all the statements made by the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) can be substantiated, and I hope, when this debate is resumed next Thursday, to be able to answer every one of his arguments and to satisfy this honourable House that it is a very partial discourse which we have heard.

The debate was adjourned.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 42, an Act to amend the Chinese Immigration Act, Hon. Mr. Beaubien in the Chair.

On section 1—clergymen and students to be exempt from tax:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I desire to draw the attention of the committee to this clause. It is to amend clause 2 of the Act of 1908, chapter 14. I cannot find, either in that Act or in the original Act, any definition of the term "clergyman" in this connection. I notice in the Act of 1908, in section 2, the words "the wives and minor children of clergymen." In the Bill now before the House it is proposed to provide that clergymen also may be allowed to come into this country without paying the Chinese head tax. If we look at the dictionary we find that the proper definition of the word "clergyman" is "an ordained minister, especially of the established church." I do not think that definition can be made to apply at all to a Chinaman coming into this country, whether he is a priest of the Buddhist church or a priest of the order of Confucius or of any other sect that may exist in China at the present day. I think, therefore, that some definition should be given of that term; otherwise it is left open to all kinds of interpretations—to any interpretation that the official of the department who is dealing with the matter might place upon it. The other subsection reads:

> Students coming to Canada for the purpose of securing a higher education in any Canadian college or university or other educational institution approved by the Minister.

Clause 2 of chapter 14 of the Statutes of 1908 contains the words:

> who shall substantiate their status to the satisfaction of the controller, subject to the approval of the Minister, or who are bearers of certificates of identity.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN.

At the port of entry, I presume, they have to make it very clear to the controller that they are really going to be students. A student can be a student of anything. A Chinaman coming to Canada might claim that he was going to be a student of agriculture simply because he was going to work on the land, or he might claim to be a student of mechanics of some kind simply because he was going to work in a blacksmith shop. I think it is very necessary in this case also that we should very clearly define what is meant by a student; otherwise there may be great laxity in enforcing the Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am at a loss to answer my honourable friend in defining what the word "clergyman" should mean. A clergyman is a clergyman; he is a priest of religion; he is a minister of souls, so to speak. Are you going to use those terms? The word "clergyman" is very well understood in the English language; no term is better understood. If we proceed to define it we shall simply place on it a limitation which may lead to confusion. There can be no question as to what a clergyman is, and the officers of the Government must work out the application of that section; they must satisfy themselves that the man occupies a priestly office in relation to the people to whom he ministers.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would suggest to my honourable friend, if that is his point of view, that it would be very much better to use the word "priest" than "clergyman."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Because the definition of "priest" is "an officiating minister of a non-Christian religion."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I fancy that some of my honourable friends here would take exception to that as a definition of a priest.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I maintain that unless the Government is prepared to give a definition of the term we shall have to fall back on the definition that is found in the dictionary.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: There are also Chinese Christians, in no inconsiderable number—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: A very negligible number.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: —so that the use of the word "priest" might eliminate persons whom it would be desirable under this privilege to permit to come in.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I pointed out last night to the honourable leader of the Government that the word "clergyman" is a very broad one; that it covers every kind —priest, minister, and all. Everybody is a clergyman who wears a robe of any kind, and there are some without a robe. I asked the Government if they could not define the term in some way. We in this country understand what a clergyman is, but there are no clergymen in China. In that country there is a population of four or five hundred million. I suppose everybody there is a "clergyman." How do we know? We know they have no Christian religion? Clergymen, priests, etc., appertain to the Christian religion. Of course there are pagan rites in China. They believe in Confucius and Buddha and in various theories of philosophy and theology. What is a clergyman in China? That is what the Government ought to find out. The leader of the Government states that a clergyman is a clergyman. But what is a clergyman in China?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What would you call him?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, I would call practically every man in China a clergyman.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They must be a very religious people.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They have their Buddhist priests; I suppose they have as many rites in their churches as there are in the Christian church; there must be at least as many sects amongst the millions of Chinamen as there are amongst the seven or eight million people in Canada. If the door is to be left open for any Chinaman to come here who simply says, "I am a clergyman," the Government will need to have a good many officers to watch those who are coming in. I am suggesting that it should be made easy rather than difficult for the Government officials to prevent these men from crossing the border at all points, going before a justice of the peace and saying, "Me clergyman, me clergyman." The same applies to the students. Wherever Chinese students receive an education, whether in a university, a college, or a high school, the authorities of such institutions should be required to report to the minister the departure of these students. The minister would then have a check on them; but, as the Bill is drafted, there is, so far as I can see, very little check upon this kind of immigration. I do not object to the immigration, but I certainly do object to charging one Chinaman, a bona fide workingman, $500 to come into the country, and then giving a fellow Chinaman the chance of coming in without paying a cent. There is that phase of the question to be considered. It seems to me it is the duty of the Government to make this legislation a check on, and not an open door for, this class of immigration.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I hope the honourable leader of the Government will be able to give us some explanation of the meaning of the word "clergyman" as applied to a Chinaman. If he is not able to do so, I would suggest that the committee report progress and consider the Bill later. I think we should know.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is my honourable friend prepared to say how a more intelligible meaning can be placed upon it than by merely using the word? In the first place, a clergyman must necessarily be a teacher or minister of religion. We cannot possibly define in the Act what the religion is. In the Act we are amending it is provided that Chinese immigrants shall bring certificates from the point of embarkation. In fact, the most effective machinery, it seems to me, is provided by the statute, to determine who are students, who are clergymen, etc. Section 2 of chapter 14 of the Statutes of 1908 roads:

> Who shall substantiate their status to the satisfaction of the controller, subject to the approval of the Minister, or who are bearers of certificates of identity, or other similar documents issued by the Government or by a recognized official or representative of the Government whose subjects they are, specifying their occupation and their object in coming into Canada.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Do I understand that this form is to be made up here in Canada?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They must bring certificates.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Countersigned by the British consul?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: From the Government of the state from which they come.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is, from the Chinese officials?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, why not have those countersigned or endorsed by the British consul or some other British official in China? That would be a proper precaution.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will look at the Act, he will see that that is already provided for. This machinery has been in operation for years. The department has been very strict in enforcing the law as against the entry of Chinese; in fact, we are amending the Act now because of the restrictions which have been placed on Chinese immigration having operated as a hardship in some cases. We can only use terms which are well understood in the English language. Any attempt to define a well-known term only leads to further complications. When we speak of a clergyman you know that he is a minister of religion. When we speak of students you refer to the Bill and you find what the word "student" means. Students are those:

coming to Canada for the purpose of securing a higher education in any Canadian college or university or other educational institution approved by the Minister.

Then, they must bring with them from China a certificate as to their status as students or clergymen, as the case may be. They must also satisfy the officials on this side of the water as to their status. Then they are admitted.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: For my part, I should be satisfied if the honourable gentleman were in a position to state that amongst Chinamen there is a class known as clergymen, but until we have an answer to that question, or some assurance on that point, we should delay consideration of the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is for us on this side to determine whether they are clergymen or not, just as we determine whether they are students or not.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But is there such a class amongst Chinamen?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It may not be easy to determine.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The criticism is not an objection to the Bill. All this honourable House wants is to make it as clear and definite as possible. Some of us think that the door is left open to immigration which the country does not want, that is all. If the minister and the department are satisfied that immigration can be restricted under the terms of this proposed law, the House will accept the Bill, subject to any modification that may be necessary in the future. But I am still of the opinion, and I think the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) is correct in stating, that the word "clergyman" is very broad and indefinite.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I know two things: there are religions in China, very many; there are temples in China, very many. The question is, have they any priests or clergymen? I have no doubt from my knowledge of humanity that when there are those two conditions, religions and temples, there are priests, in China as elsewhere. I may say that during the winter of 1915-16 there was a congress of religions held in Shanghai under the auspices of the International Institute, presided over by the Rev. Gilbert Reid. There were in attendance at that congress representatives from all the sects, divisions, and subdivisions, including the Christian sects, who, before the higher intellectual classes of Shanghai, expounded the doctrines of their religions, which were all represented by clergymen of high standing, either by their official status or by their learning. I received the report of that congress, which lasted five or six months. They devoted a couple of days in the week to an exposition of the doctrines held by the various sects represented at the congress.

On section 2—persons ceasing to be in exempt class liable for tax:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: How will the Government keep track of these people? I think it would be rather difficult, once they get into the country, to keep track of them, whether they are exempt or not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In just the same manner as it is done to-day.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But, as I understand, it is not necessary to keep track of them at all to-day. Every Chinaman coming into the country pays the tax of $500. Now it is proposed to allow these men to come in without paying any tax, on the representation that they are students.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: On the certificate issued by their own Government and endorsed by the British consul at the port of embarkation. Furthermore, they have to satisfy the authorities here.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That is when they come into the country.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Then they go to the university or the college where they intend staying, and after they have been there a year they may leave and start in business for themselves in the country, and they are no longer students. What happens then?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If they have been admitted properly into the country, I presume they have a right to stay here. If they have the right, they remain.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: In that case this Bill would be simply a means of avoiding the tax altogether.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No: it simply gives exemption from the tax to certain specified classes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It does seem to me that it is going to throw the door open very wide for Chinamen coming into the country. I think there is great danger.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not more than heretofore. The Bill only means that instead of a refund of the tax there shall be no tax imposed. Students heretofore have been entitled to come in and then have been entitled to a refund of the tax at a particular point. The wives and children of clergymen have been entitled to come in without paying the tax. It simply makes our law practically the same as that of the United States. The United States, which has always had very drastic legislation in regard to Asiatics, to-day permits to come in Chinese students and other classes such as are referred to in this Bill, without imposing a tax upon them.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But the difference between the Canadian law and the United States law, as I understand it, is that in the United States all other classes, outside of those expressly specified, are excluded altogether. In Canada they are allowed to come in, and I understood that one of the troubles was that a large number of Chinese came into Canada, paid the tax, and then crossed the line into the United States. In Canada we allow any to come in who pay the tax, but the United States excludes all Chinamen except those who are specially exempted. I do not think that the legislation of the two countries is on all fours.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of the Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 68, an Act to amend the Civil Service Act, Hon. Mr. Taylor in the Chair.

On section 2—persons placed in third class under 1908 Act who had passed qualifying examinations, etc., eligible for promotion to second class:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Before the passage of the Act of 1908 those who had passed a qualifying examination would have been entitled to promotion to all the higher classes. As I explained yesterday, owing to certain phraseology in the Act, the Civil Service Commissioners have placed a contrary interpretation upon it, and exact from those persons an examination for each class. There are about 400 persons entitled to the advantage of this particular provision, and the object of it is to make clear what was intended in 1908.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understand that those persons had already passed a qualifying examination before the Act of 1908 was put into force?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: And that since that time they have had to pass a further examination to get into the next class?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Some of them have and some of them have not.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Would the honourable gentleman be good enough to state just the change which this amendment makes in the existing law?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Subsection 2 of section 26 of the Act of 1908 reads as follows:

> Any person placed in the third division upon the coming into force of this Act may, by the Governor in Council, upon the recommendation of the head of the department, based on the report in writing of the deputy head, and accompanied by a certificate of qualification by the Commission, to be given with or without examination, as is determined by the regulations of the Commission, be promoted from the third division to the second division without an open competitive examination.

Now, if any honourable gentleman is able to follow that on the wing, so to speak, he will make an excellent wing shot. It is so complicated, so involved, that it is quite manifestly capable of two or three meanings; consequently it is proposed to repeal that section and to make quite clear what is intended, viz., that a person who passed a qualifying examination previous to the passage of the Act of 1908 shall be entitled to be promoted to the other divisions.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Are there not a number of civil servants who did not pass any qualifying examination before 1908?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They cannot avail themselves of this provision. It only extends to those who have passed the qualifying examination.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Those who had not passed it would have to pass an examination now?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, they come under the existing Act; but this Bill applies to what may be termed vested rights, and is only giving recognition to the rights which these persons then had.

The section was agreed to.

On section 3—minimum and maximum salaries:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The only change in the Second Division is that the minimum is increased in Subdivision B from $800 to $1,000; that is to say, in the Second Division the minimum and maximum salaries shall be: in Subdivision A, $1,600 to $2,100, the same as before; but in Subdivision B the minimum has been increased from $800 to $1,000, and the maximum from $1,000 to $1,600.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: They start at the higher salary?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. They started at $800, but now it is proposed that they should start at $1,000.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think these changes are in the right direction at any time; but I dare say honourable gentlemen have seen a great many complaints that the increases were not as great as they should be in order to enable the civil servants to live respectably. I think those objections are made because we are now dealing with what I trust is an abnormal condition. It is to be hoped that before very long, "when this cruel war is over," conditions will revert to something nearer to what they were before the war began. If at the present time we permanently increased the salaries of public servants so as to enable them to be just as comfortable now as they were before the war, we should be placing a considerable burden on the public, which would be unnecessary when the war is over and things return to their normal conditions. As you all know, I am rather in favour of economy as a rule; but the idea has been suggested to me, and I pass it on to the honourable the leader of the Government, that the United States have, if I may be permitted to say so, shown a great deal more business capacity in their measures intended to provide for war conditions than Canada has shown. In the United States, as I understand, in dealing with their Civil Service, instead of increasing salaries 30 per cent, or whatever amount is deemed necessary, they give bonuses to the civil employees in order to meet the exceptional condition of things, though I presume they also somewhat increase the salaries. Those bonuses are recognized as being only temporary, as they will cease when the abnormal cost of living has passed away after the war. No doubt the Government have been impressed by the fact that there are a good many of our civil servants who, even after this beneficent Act has passed, will still find it rather hard to maintain their families, and I suggest that the Government might consider a policy of giving bonuses pro tem in such cases, as is being done in the United States.

The section was agreed to.

On section 4—increase of $100 authorized in certain cases where salary less than $1,000:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This section gives authority to the Governor in Council to enlarge the annual increase from $50 to $100 to that class of civil servant in receipt of less than $1,000 per annum.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I notice that this beneficent clause covers only the case of clerks in the Third Division of the Inside Service.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes; this Bill does not deal with the Outside Service at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER: But, as far as I can judge from what I have seen of them, it costs the members of the Outside Service in cities like Toronto, Montreal, Halifax, and St. John quite as much to live, and they are as a class just as deserving as the members of the Inside Service who live in Ottawa. I understand that when this measure was going through the other House the Minister of Finance made a sort of promise that the cases of the outside servants would be considered later, and I hope that the Government will consider their cases with a strong inclination to the side of mercy.

The section was agreed to.

On section 5—salaries less than new minimum to be increased to such minimum:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is simply giving effect to the former sections.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Do I understand that the increase of $50 per annum given to the third class and $100 to the first and second classes is on account of difference in the cost of living? If that is the case, would it not be equitable to give $100 to a man on a low salary as well as to one who receives a higher salary? It will surely cost $100 more for the man who receives $1,000 to live, and surely it is harder for him to economize on that salary than it would be for a man receiving $1,500 or $1,600.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say that we are dealing with a particular class—those chiefly in the Second and Third Divisions, the lower-paid classes of public servants. But section 4 permits of giving an increase annually of $100 instead of $50. Section 37 is repealed; that section makes provision for an annual increase of only $50, though under exceptional circumstances $100 might be given. But this Bill enlarges the authority of a department to increase the official pay by $100 instead of $50.

A VOTE ON CONSCRIPTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. P. A. CHOQUETTE rose to call the attention of the Government to the following extract from an article published in the Montreal Star of the 5th June, instant:

Too Much Secrecy At Ottawa.

And by that same token if there is ever to be a vote on our war policy, it should be an open vote. The ballot has its uses in protecting the labouring man from his employer and the poor man from the rich, but it should not be prostituted into a shield for cowardice, moral or physical. Any man who goes up to vote either to conscript his fellow citizen or to desert his other fellow citizen already under German fire should do so like a man, under the eyes of the youth he intends to conscript or the father and brother of the other youth he intends to desert.

And to inquire if the Government intends to do anything in that direction.

He said: In the remarks which I made yesterday on this question I stated that the article referred to was not of great importance in the province of Quebec. It will have no effect there. If a vote is to be taken in Quebec we are willing to have it either open or secret. We are not afraid to say openly what we say privately in expressing our views on this important question.

But, honourable gentlemen, the Montreal Star, in which this article appeared, must have been in a position to know that in certain provinces of this Dominion an open vote on conscription would be much better for the measure than a secret vote. Without discussing which method should be adopted, I desire to draw the attention of the Government to some articles published in newspapers in the province of Ontario, to show what are the prevailing sentiments there, and to show especially why the Montreal Star has published this article calling the Government's attention to the mode of taking a vote on this question. It is known that when the national registration cards were sent out thousands of young men, especially in Ontario, took the road to the United States, whereas in the province of Quebec no one left his home and went away, but all remained and did their duty. In confirmation of that fact I will refer you to the following article which appeared in the Star of the 1st of February last:

More Leaving for United States.

Sarnia, Ont., Feb. 1.—The January report from the Port Huron immigration office shows the number of applicants for admission to the United States on the increase. There were 1,231 applicants, and a large number of those seeking admission were Canadians of military age. There were fifty-two rejections. There were 1,300 in transit and 105 admitted on certificates from Canadian ocean ports.

Then there appeared in Jack Canuck of the 10th of February last a despatch from Hamilton, which reads:

Devil Rule—Hamilton Shirkers Hiking to U.S.

Hamilton.—It is openly alleged that Hamiltonians for military service are running away to President Wilson's bailiwick. One day recently no less than four put their military possessions in their pockets and skipped out. A prominent citizen who knew the men informed Lieut.-Col. R. A. Robertson of the fact, and supplied the Chief Recruiting Officer with the names and addresses of the "runners away." Other local military men are unanimous in stating that it is time the Canadian military and immigration authorities took up the matter and stopped this exodus.

The Toronto World about the same time stated that a number of rich young men had escaped from England to the United States with their money and their cowardice. It said:

We must give some credit to the man who stays in his own country and helps it to bear the burden, even if he is too weak and vacillating to enlist.

In Jack Canuck of February 10, this article appeared:

The Slackers' Retreat.

"Regarding the alleged endeavour of military eligibles to cross into the United States to avoid filling in the registration cards," says a Toronto daily, "Lieut.-Col. Brock, local director, states that he lacks the power to prevent men eligible for the army from leaving the country." We like that phrase, "alleged endeavour." Have the Toronto daily newspapers any doubt that thousands and thousands of our young men eligible for military duty are fleeing from the country to escape "doing their bit" along with their fellows? Do they deny the accuracy of the immigration returns from the United States? The fact is that the daily newspapers are reluctant to admit the truth, the deplorable truth. Immigration figures show that for every two men who have enlisted in the Canadian army, one military eligible has vamoosed into the United States, there to remain until all danger of his being packed overseas is past. How long is the Dominion Government going to patronize this sort of thing? The inaction of the Government would give one the impression that they were aiding and abetting the flight of these young slackers from duty. A temporary arrangement should be entered into with the United States at once which would have the effect of prohibiting men of military age leaving Canada without a passport.

The Toronto News, about the 8th of January last, stated that more than 2,000 persons had crossed the frontier in 15 days to go to the United States.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Is that a Tory organ?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am quoting from Tory organs. In the Ottawa Evening Journal we find a letter dated the 1st of May, signed "A Canadian whose three sons have volunteered," and stating:

It is a shame that we should sacrifice our best and bravest and let the unpatriotic slack, shirk and even scoff. The other day I was in Toronto, and walking up Yonge street, near King street, I was behind two extremely dandified, smart-looking young men. One said to the other: "These guys of soldiers seem to be everywhere." "Yes," responded the other, "the boobs are all over."

I am an old man, nearly at the scriptural limit, but you can imagine my feelings. Last night I was at the Regent Theatre, watching pictures that everybody should see and remain neutral if he or she care. Behind me sat half a dozen well-dressed, healthy young men. They not only ignored the direct appeals of the soldiers, but they exulted over escaping the caps that were collecting contributions, and jeered at the "coons," as one of them exclaimed, who were going up in response to the passionate and eloquent appeal of Captain Robins, of the 207th. Do you wonder that I favour conscription?

Another incident. Sitting in a car, also in Toronto, I overheard the conversation of a sergeant in uniform and an elderly man, who were sitting opposite each other. The soldier said: "I am from Ottawa, and it's a disgrace the way the young men of that city are shirking. There are hundreds, yes, thousands and more, in the Government service doing work that girls could do, who should be in uniform." "I don't doubt it," was the reply. It is almost the same here in Ontario. The Government appeals to business houses and banks to let the young men go; why don't they set the example? When the soldiers come back they will have to make room for them, or there will be protests from all parts of the land. Our first and paramount duty is to win the war."

I have read these articles to show that there is some reason for the Montreal Star saying that, in Ontario especially, if there is to be a vote on conscription it should be an open vote. It is time that we knew where courage and cowardice are to be found—whether in Ontario or in Quebec. When the national registration cards were issued, who signed them? Who told the people to sign them? The clergy of Quebec told the people to sign the cards. There was no need of conscription there; nobody left his farm to go to the United States. If conscription is to be put into force we in Quebec are prepared to obey the law. We are not trying to escape to the United States, as men are doing in Toronto and elsewhere, where, according to one of these gentlemen, they are laughing at the soldiers.

There is more than this. In Toronto not only are young men going to the United States, but aliens are being kept in the factories. I read in the Montreal Gazette of the 12th April last, under the heading, "Mayor Church's Reform"—I think he is a good Tory too—the following:

Toronto, April 11.—Mayor Church will present a motion at the next council meeting asking the city to memorialize the Government to disfranchise all aliens in Canada not resident in the country for 25 years. He will also move a resolution to ask the Dominion Government to order munition manufacturers to discharge all alien enemies employed. In some cases aliens are in foremen's positions. In one Toronto munition works 98 per cent are said to be aliens.

So in this loyal city of Toronto not only are the young men going to the United States, but the best places in the factories—foremen, and so on—are given to aliens—and 98 per cent of the employees are aliens. This is what Mayor Church says himself—that not only are the young men going away and shirking their duty, but the people are employing the enemies of this country in munition factories to prepare bullets—

An Hon. SENATOR: Profiteers.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Drive it home.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: It is most extraordinary.

Further, we find in the report of the Auditor General that $26,571 has been spent in advertising for recruits to the end of March. Where has the money been spent? $18,566 has been spent in Ontario and $3,996 in Quebec—over five times as much money spent in Ontario as in Quebec, to call men back from the United States to enlist.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Drive it home.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: In Quebec we do not want any money spent for recruiting; we will go willingly when the time comes. It is a shame that yellow journals should be allowed to slander us in Quebec by accusing us of not answering the call to duty. Well, Sir, there is the fact: not only has this patriotic province of Ontario been shirking its duty, but the Government has been obliged to spend five times as much money there in order to get soldiers as it has spent in Quebec.

Now, it is stated in a report laid before Parliament that only 14,100 French Canadians have enlisted. I deny that absolutely. I say—and my statement is borne out by statistics which have been made privately—that over 25,000 French Canadians have enlisted; and on this question I will make a proposition to the Government, if my honourable friend the leader of the Government will give me his attention for a moment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: He cannot.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I will wait.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: He is turning a deaf ear to the truth.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am going to make a proposition. It has been stated in a report laid before Parliament that only 14,100 French Canadians have enlisted. I make this proposition to the Government: If the Minister of Militia will give us access to the records in his department, I with some friends will undertake to tabulate by nationality the numbers of men who have enlisted; and I will do this without a cent of expense to the Government. Surely the Government is not willing to leave the people of this Dominion under the impression that Quebec has not done its duty. If only 14,100 French Canadians have enlisted I still maintain that we have done our duty; but let us have access to the militia records and if within ten days I do not prove that over 25,000 Canadians have enlisted, I shall be willing to say that I have been entirely mistaken, and to withdraw all that I have said on this subject, and apologize to the Government.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Let the Government take up the challenge.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: There is only one other point to which I wish to refer in regard to the accusation that we French Canadians have not done our duty. I have before me a record of the casualties taken from the Montreal Gazette, which is generally reliable in this respect, because it gets its information from the Government. Let me recite the names of some of those who have been killed or wounded. First of all, I take this morning's Gazette. It says:

333 Canadians in two casualty lists yesterday. Ten Montrealers included, of whom two are killed and one died of wounds.

Take the names. I find six French names: MacKay, Clairmont, Major, Pillage, Emard, Daoust. There are six French Canadians in a list of ten casualties. I go further. In the Montreal Gazette of this date you will find the heading: "Killed Year after first wounding—Private E. Daoust Enlisted in Overseas Units when in Winnipeg on Holiday." So it will be seen that French Canadians are enlisting in every part of the Dominion. Sir, what is the conclusion to be come to? It is either that the French Canadian soldiers are in great numbers or that the Imperial authorities, under the advice of the Ottawa authorities, have put them in the front ranks to protect those behind them. This is the only conclusion that we can come to—either that they are in large numbers or that they have been put in the most dangerous places to protect those who are hiding their skins behind them, as they are doing in Toronto and other places.

Take the Gazette of the 16th of March, in which we find the following:

Cordial Welcome to Wounded Men.—Forty-six Montrealers arrived from Quebec by special C.P.R. train.

Half of them were French Canadians. Out of 46 wounded soldiers there were 23 French Canadians.

Take the Gazette of the 25th of June last, which says:

Nineteen Montrealers were included in three casualty lists.

In these lists there were 9 French Canadians, the names of whom are given, namely: Boisseau, Laviolette, Dufour, O. Desjardins, P. Desjardins, Beauchamp, Leduc, and Duchesne. I may add that there are many names which, though English or Scotch, belong to men who are in fact French Canadians, and very often not able to speak English; for instance, McNicol, Blackburn, Warren, Brown, Burroughs, and Robertson. One man named Brown some time ago in Quebec was refused permission to serve as an English juryman because he could not speak English. Another man named Burroughs, in Montmagny, could not speak English at all. Yet soldiers having such names as these are put down as English. Again I ask, what is the natural conclusion? I leave the question to the public until my challenge to the Government is accepted.

Again, we read in the Gazette of the 16th of May last:

Sixteen Montrealers in 314 casualties issued yesterday.

Among these are sixteen Montrealers. Eight are French names—Pelletier, Normand, Duquette, Lalonde, Chicoine, Casgrain, Desrosiers, Blouin—eight out of sixteen. Does this not prove that the French Canadians are in the great number, or that they are taken and afterwards put in front of the English soldiers and killed in larger proportion?

I wish to make this point as strong as possible. Take the Gazette of the 16th of June, which says:

Seventeen Montrealers in 469 casualties for the week end.

There are eight French Canadians in the list: Latour, Verge, Nadon, Major, Soucy, Sylvestre, Salvail, and Archer.

And that is not all. It is very easy to change a French name to English. I know a man named Colin who becomes Collins. Take the name Clement, which is made Clements on adding an "s." Take Martin —that is a good French-Canadian name—and we find it in every list put in English as Martin. Is this fair? Is it just? Is it doing justice to one of the best, greatest, and most loyal of the provinces of this Dominion, the province of Quebec?

I repeat, let us have a chance to look at the records of the Militia Department, and we will show what the true position is as to the number and nationality of those who have enlisted in Quebec, Ontario, and elsewhere.

I refer again, Sir, to the Gazette of the 18th of June, in which we read:

Cordial Reception to Invalided Men. Twenty Montrealers in party which arrived on Saturday night. Many saw long service.

Nine of these men were French Canadians, and one name in the list is Collins. We all know that that is a French name; so, instead of there being nine French Canadians, there are ten in this list of twenty casualties.

Then I refer to the Star of the 13th of the present month, which contains a picture of a father and five sons. It is called, "A Patriotic French Family," of the name of Cyr, of Thedford Mines. The father and five sons have all gone to the war. Where can you find two or three soldiers from one Ontario family? These men are at the front; they are not slackers. When danger is present you will always find a French Canadian ready to face it. We do not go on the platform, on the hustings, into the churches, to boast of our loyalty; but when duty is put before us, we face it calmly, as every honest man must do.

Now, Sir, I do not wish to impose upon the House, but I was anxious to get these points placed properly before it. I have done so, not to get compliments for my compatriots, but to get justice; and if I have called attention to this article in the Star, it is not because I attach any special importance to that paper. We know what the Star is. Sir Hugh Graham has made a great deal of money with his paper by following every party, every government, performing on every tight rope, and dancing to the music of every violin. We all know that. It seems to me that when he changed his name from Hugh Graham to Lord Athelston it might have been more appropriate to call himself Lord Ragtime.

I shall probably again address this honourable House when the Conscription Bill comes before it; but I have on this occasion placed this matter plainly before you because it is time that this country was made aware of the truth in regard to the enlistment of French Canadians and the slackers of Ontario. I will now await the answer of the Government to my question and my challenge.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say that that is a hypothetical question, and is consequently out of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There may be two or three points of order before we get through. I heartily and completely concur in the remarks made by the honourable Senator from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette).

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Excuse me—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There is no point of order raised, Mr. Speaker, and you have no right to correct me.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: There is a point of order raised.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say that the question has been answered by the representative of the Government in this House, and, having been answered, it cannot be discussed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It is both a motion and an inquiry.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I can keep order just as well as you can.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: It is a pity you did not.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There is a motion before the House.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: There is no motion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: All I have to say is this, that I do not want to implement what my honourable friend has said; but this is an indication of what the Government is prepared to do when it gets an actual majority in this House.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not like to see a bad precedent made. I am sorry the honourable gentleman from Grandville should have spoken perhaps a little more vehemently than was necessary, but I wish to call the attention of the Chair to rule 39:

> No debate is in order on a mere inquiry; but explanatory remarks may be made by the senator making the inquiry, and by the minister or other senator answering the same. Observations upon any such answer are not allowed.

That is perfectly correct.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Now read rule 21 in connection with that.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am speaking to the question of order. If this were a mere question, the point of order taken by the honourable leader of the Government would have been properly taken; but rule 40 says:

> When it is intended to make a statement or raise a discussion on asking a question, the senator having such intention, as part of the notice under Rule 21, gives notice that he will call attention to the matter inquired into.

Now, we have had discussions running over several days on similar notices, and I do not wish to see the practice of the House set aside.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend the senior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) say that, once a representative of the Government has given an answer to a question, that answer can be discussed?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Certainly it could be discussed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have not asked the honourable senator. Will my honourable friend from Halifax say that?

Hon. Mr. POWER: Well,—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes or no.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Something depends on circumstances. There has been no debate. The honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) rose to take part in the discussion, and then the leader of the Government gave his answer.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I answered before.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not think the mere fact that an answer is given in that way prevents a debate.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I asked the honourable leader of the Government if he would answer the inquiry of the honourable member for Grandville, and after the reply is made by the minister I do not believe that a discussion is in order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The Speaker is mistaken; I state so plainly. I rose before the honourable leader of the Government gave his answer.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am in order; people who cry "Order, order'" are out of order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I will respect the Chair, but I will not respect the people opposite me who cry "Order."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is a voice from the tomb; I don't like that.

CUSTOMS CLAIMS ON PROVINCES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a copy of all papers and correspondence between the Minister of Customs and a member of the Executive Council of any province with regard to claims made by the Minister of Customs for the payment of customs duties by the Government of that province.

He said: I would like to get that correspondence before Bill 67 is considered by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should like to give notice of a motion for to-morrow that when the Senate adjourns on that day it do stand adjourned until Monday, July 9, at eight p.m.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Will not the House of Commons be dissolved before then?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, then we will not have to come back, I suppose, until we are summoned again.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I would like to point out that the Senate is a permanent body, and the House of Commons may go up in a volcano of smoke in the next few days: so I do not think it wise for the Government to adjourn a permanent institution of Parliament.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill S, an Act respecting The Canada Preferred Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

Bill J2, an Act respecting The Western Canada Accident and Guarantee Company —Hon. Mr. Laird.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES WAGES BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. WATSON moved the third reading of Bill D, an Act concerning the payment of salaries or wages of employees of railway companies.

Hon. GIDEON D. ROBERTSON: In compliance with the notice given yesterday, I beg leave to move:

That the Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be amended as follows:

Strike out Clause 2 as recommended by the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs, and Harbours, and substitute the following:

"2. This Act shall come into force on October 1, 1917."

The reason for this motion is that I feel that the Bill as it reads is not sufficiently definite to meet all requirements, and that some definite date should be set down upon which the measure would come into effect. Passing a measure of this sort without fixing a definite date on which it will be effective would be something like making a New Year's resolution effective some time in the future. Seriously, honourable gentlemen, the necessity for early action on this Bill will be apparent, I think, when I state that at the present time it takes $2.40 to purchase goods or foods that could be bought for $1.37 when the war broke out. That must be convincing to all of us as a demonstration of the need of the labouring man earning small wages to receive payment of those wages as promptly as possible. There is also on foot in many towns at the present time a movement on the part of merchants to require all purchasers to pay cash instead of giving credit, as they have done heretofore. This makes it doubly necessary that this measure of relief should be granted. We do not desire to ask anything unfair or unreasonable on behalf of these men, nor expect the railway companies to do anything that is not reasonable on their part. I feel that they should have some time to prepare for the change, and I think that the date named gives them ample time for that purpose. I am not particularly anxious that the 1st of October should be the fixed date, but I named it because that was the date unanimously agreed upon by the Special Committee of the House of Commons that was dealing with the revision of the Railway Act. The particular purpose of the motion is that some definite date be named.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: In common, no doubt, with other honourable gentlemen, I received a circular letter from the Brotherhood of Railway Employees asking my support to the principle of this Bill. I was very pleased indeed to tell their representative, the honourable member from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson), that I was entirely in accord with the principle of the Bill, because I think it fair that railway employees should receive their salaries or wages twice a month instead of monthly. After having approved of the principle of the Bill I had also been spoken to by representatives of the railways, who told me that they had decided to approve of the principle of this Bill, but they added that it would work a great hardship to bring the Bill into operation now, or at any time prior to our knowing what the after-war conditions are going to be. They pointed out that their coal bill will be this year some $18,000,000 in excess of that of last year. The country is crying out that the railways have not an adequate equipment; yet they are paying from 50 to 80 per cent more for cars and every other kind of equipment they require than formerly. I think the honourable mover of this amendment will agree with me that nearly every class of railway employee has received a considerable increase of salary since the commencement of the war. On the other hand, the railways, or at least some of them, have come to the Government and stated that unless the Railway Commission will grant an increase in freight rates they will be unable to make both ends meet; that everything they have to purchase has increased enormously in price, while the rates they get for carrying either freight or passengers have remained at what they were before the war. I want to say, not in antagonism to the principle of the Bill, or with any feeling adverse to labour, that fair play is bonnie play, and that there are always two sides to a question. The railway men have for years tried to get the principle of this Bill admitted, and this year it has been admitted by the railway companies and has been concurred in by the Railway Committee of this honourable House. The difference of opinion is as to when it should become operative. I think that in all fairness it should not be allowed to become operative until conditions after the war become known, or until such time as the Railway Commission will concede an increase in freight rates.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Is it not provided in the Railway Bill which has just passed the House of Commons Committee that October shall be the time when the bimonthly pay shall commence? I think so.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I may say that I did not take any part in the debate on the question whether this Bill was in order or not. I understood that a Government Bill containing such a provision was to come before this House. However, this House has approved of this Bill coming before us by itself, and therefore I consider this to be the proper time to debate the question. The principle of the Bill appears to be a fair one; but on the other hand we know that the railways, or some of them, are before the Government for assistance to enable them to keep open, or else they will go into the hands of a receiver.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: No doubt.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: For the reasons I have given, I am of opinion that it is not wise to fix any specific date at this juncture. On the other hand, I understand that the committee have recommended that the change be brought into force by proclamation of the Governor in Council. If the lower House has approved of the principle of the Bill, and has entrusted it to the responsible minister to have it carried through, surely he is sufficiently in sympathy with the Bill which has been brought forward under his own auspices to see that the proclamation is carried into effect at the right time.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN: "It's a long lane that has no turning." Thirty-five years ago, which is probably before many of you were born, I advocated in the editorial columns of a metropolitan daily and weekly this very same measure; and that is why I say, "It's a long lane that has no turning." At the end of thirty-five years I find myself in the Senate of Canada, called upon by, I will not say the same men, but their descendants, to approve of the enactment of this measure of justice and right to the ordinary railroad workers. It is a long time to look back upon. For years and years my pen was at their service. For years and years that pen was spurned by the railroad companies and by those in power —the governments of the day.

Hon. Mr. POWER: They didn't know who was writing.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: But they know to-day who is talking, and the talking comes from the writing. I heartily endorse the motion made by my honourable friend on the other side (Hon. Mr. Robertson), that this measure go into effect as soon as possible. He has set a date, the 1st of October. That gives the companies the half of June, the whole of July, the whole of August, and the whole of September to get ready to pay their men semi-monthly instead of monthly. Now, what more time than three months and a half does a business man or a company want to regulate their affairs so as to change the date of payment of their employees? Do they want 35 years more, when I shall be dead and gone and my son will probably be here advocating the same cause? Oh, honourable gentlemen, life is too short to trifle with the rights demanded by the workingmen of this country. We have trifled with them for the past 50 years in this Canada of ours, and the day has come when the workingman must be listened to, must be heeded, and his demand for right and justice and self-preservation must be respected, in spite of the powers and influences that come into the Senate. That is the stand that I take. I heard an honourable gentleman say yesterday that we were all business men: we had graduated from the work of a coal heaver up to the position of a coal baron; we had graduated from being a counter-hopper up to the position of a merchant of dry goods; we had graduated from a shantyman up to a lumber king; and so on. Oh, gentlemen, I tell you it is unfortunate for the people and for the race that the men who have graduated from the ranks of labour and have attained to the pinnacle of finance, in Canada or elsewhere, forget their obligations to the fellows they have left behind, in the trenches, in the dugouts, in the water, in the fields, in the forests, in the mines, in the cotton factories. It is regrettable that that fact must be admitted. It is a misfortune that the wealthy forget their beginnings, and live only to enjoy the wealth accumulated, instead of spreading it abroad for the benefit of the race. That is the misfortune of men who come into the House. I have known them; they have come and they have gone—men worth millions and millions, who never spent a cent during their life—well, I will admit that they may have spent something, but nothing in comparison with the wealth accumulated. There is the foundation of the cry of the workingmen, that the rich man has accumulated millions and millions, not by the sweat of his own brow—oh, no!—not by the sweat of his own arms—oh, no!—but by the sweat of the brow of the labourer in his factory, in his lumber mill, in his mine. And these millionaires, having accumulated wealth, not by their own effort, but by the effort of slaves, sit in their offices and gloat over their wealth, and by chance very often, too often, are given honours in public office, in this Senate, in the House of Commons, or elsewhere. Honourable gentlemen, the time is coming when the united force of the workingmen will prevail over capitalist wealth, gotten unjustly and against the welfare of the people. No man on earth owning a million dollars or over ever earned that money. I say that deliberately and positively. No man on earth, from his birth to his death, has ever earned, honestly and fairly, without oppression of his workingmen, a million dollars. And how many men there are worth anywhere from a million to ten, fifteen or one hundred millions. I say to this country —not to this Senate, not to deaf ears—I say to the country, and I hold out to the workingmen of this country this pledge, that that state of affairs cannot last forever, any more than could the injunction of the railroad companies of thirty-five years ago against the workingmen that they should be paid only once a month, that it was too much bother, too much expense to the company, to pay them twice a month. The day will come when the railway companies will have to pay their employees once a week, because to-day the grocer, the baker, the milkman, and the other suppliers of food demand the payment of their bills on Saturday—at the end of the week. I do not blame them; they are justified, because the wholesalers demand from the retailers immediate payment for these goods. The railroad companies condescend—no, they do not condescend—they have been forced by public opinion, by the needs of the working classes—not to grant, for we are compelling them, but to accept this demand made on behalf of the working people. Why do the working people ask for bi-monthly payment? You gentlemen who have graduated from the ranks and have become millionaires ought to remember the old days—whether the time elapsed since then is long or short makes no difference—you ought to remember the old days, when the bills came in from the grocer, and the butcher, and the baker—and especially the plumber (did you ever get a plumber's bill?) and the painter, and the others. When the wife sat in a chair crying and the poor man came home from his work, what was the scene? "I cannot pay the bills," she says. "Dear," he says, "no, you cannot pay the bills because I am not paid for my work. I have been working from 6 o'clock in the morning until 7 to-night, and I have not got my pay, and how can you pay the bills if the company doesn't pay me?" That is the story of many and many a household, many and many a poor mother with children at her knee. Is that not a pitiful scene? Does that not appeal to the hard-hearted millionaires throughout the country? How can you resist an appeal of that kind? How can any Government stand behind capitalists who are crushing the workingmen, depriving them of all delight in life, by the force of wealth—by the force of money for election purposes? There is the history, not only of the Conservative party, but even of the Liberal party. All parties are alike in this country. They cater to wealth to secure election. That to my mind is the only reason why sensible men oppose the demands of labour for right and justice. I say to my fellow countrymen, keep your eye and keep your hand on your legislatures. They are few in number; you are the majority; and in all democratic countries the democracy should rule. You labour men outside these walls are the majority in this country. Keep your eye on the legislatures, keep your hand on them, even if they be immortal, like this eternally-composed Senate. Some members go, some come, but the Senate goes on forever.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Some Senators.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You men in the trenches of labour, you men in the firing line of life, have your families and children to maintain. See that legislators, not only in this House, but also in the House of Commons, are not subject or submissive to the influence of capital, which tries to take from you all the blood it can without killing you outright. That is the appeal I make to my fellow men outside the walls of this Senate, and I know it will be heeded. And let the statesmen beware, for the day is coming when the workingman's voice—not the wishes or interests of the millionaire—shall be the law of the land. Now, honourable gentlemen, I have said enough—

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have said too much for the few here, who represent very little; but I have said enough for my fellow countrymen to know that at least they have in H. J. Cloran a friend who stands by them now and forever.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The amendment proposed has been the subject of considerable discussion, and it is a great satisfaction to me to know that the principle of this Bill has been accepted. It may be within the recollection of some members of this honourable House that a few years ago I brought up a similar Bill. At that time it might have passed but for the fact that the session ended sooner than we had expected. However, I am entirely in sympathy with this Bill and hope it will become law. I do not think the proposed measure would be a hardship on the railways at all. I think the railways will realize after a very few months that the wages will go much farther if payment is made twice a month than if made only once. The committee has had the advantage of hearing both sides on this question, and I think that after a committee has reported it has been rather unusual, during all the time I have been a member of this honourable House, to make further amendments without sending the Bill back to the committee, and giving the same parties the opportunity of being heard again. It is contrary to the rules of the House to state what took place in the committee; but I think that a discussion of this kind should take place in committee, where the parties would be represented; and I would suggest to the mover that in the interest of his own Bill it should be referred back to the committee. It is known that the Minister of Railways and the Government wanted the Bill amended in a certain way, and we know that in this country the Minister of Railways and the Government have, for the time being at any rate, the power to have legislation passed. The railway companies have admitted before the committtee that they have no objection to this Bill. There is only the question of having this amendment approved by the committee, and I believe that if the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Robertson) desires as much as I do that this measure shall pass, he will amend his motion to ask simply that the Bill be referred back to the committee. No time will be lost by that, because the date has been fixed for October 1, and the Bill will be presented here a long time before that. The committee can fix a date agreeable to everybody. The railway companies will in all probability accept the date mentioned, or it could be advanced thirty days if that were necessary in the interests of all concerned.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Will the honourable gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I have the floor. I gave the honourable gentleman the floor first, and I will not give him the floor now. I could wax almost as eloquent as some others in telling how important it is for the workingman to get his pay. But I believe that in the interest of the Bill itself it would be well to send it back so that the amendment may be discussed in committee. As far as I am concerned, I will do everything possible to have the proposed amendment take effect provided we can get the consent of the Government, but by flying in the face of the Government we would simply cause the Bill to be sidetracked. There are no more days for private Bills in the other House, and unless the Government is willing the Bill cannot go through.

I believe that the honourable gentleman sincerely wants the Bill to go through. If so, in my opinion, the best way for him to accomplish that is to amend the motion and have the Bill sent back to the committee.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not see what is to be gained by referring this Bill back to the committee. From the point of view of the railroads, there can be no question but that of bookkeeping, and any one who knows what is now going on in this country knows that it is very important to the men to be paid oftener than once a month. I for one would like to see them paid once a week, because I know that workmen in small towns throughout this country cannot get goods out of the stores without paying cash. If they were paid once a week they could buy their week's supplies. I was told by one workman, even before things had become as critical as they are, that it was worth 20 per cent to him to get his wages every Saturday morning, so that his wife, his children, or he himself could go to the stores and buy for cash. To-day increased value of wages is not the only thing to be considered; in many cases the fortnightly payment of wages is going to be important for the men unless you want to drive them into the hands of three-ball men to get credit. The small wage-earner cannot get along under the monthly payment system. I do not see what there is to argue about, and I would like to see a vote taken on this question now.

Hon. Mr. POWER: There is a good deal of force in what was said by the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), and permit me to say that I thought there was a good deal more force in the speech made by the honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls). I cannot at all agree with the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière in thinking that there is any reason whatever for sending this measure back to the committee. This is not the first time this measure has been before the House; it has been here at least once, I think twice.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Three times.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Two or three times at all events. There was a full meeting of the committee, and members who are not on the committee are familiar with this question, and there is nothing to be gained by the measure being sent back to the committee. At first I was rather disposed to think that the recommendation made by the committee with respect to the time when the Bill should go into force was judicious; but, on thinking it over, and after listening to what has been said, I have come to a different conclusion. While the railways are having a pretty serious time just now, still I do not think the directors and managers of the railway companies are suffering as much as the men who are getting their wages only once a month. As pointed out by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross), the fortnightly payment of wages in reality means much to the men; it is equivalent to an addition to the wages which are now paid monthly. While serving on the committee, I was under the impression that the honourable gentleman who represented the employees was quite willing that some date other than the first of October might be fixed for putting this legislation into effect. I gather from what he said a few moments ago that he has no very serious objection to making that date the 1st of January. As the honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) pointed out, I think the railways are suffering a good deal, and perhaps there is much to be said in favour of giving them a slight extension of time before bringing the Act into operation. But the honourable gentleman from Toronto dropped one remark which confirmed my opinion that it would not be safe to leave the matter open. The honourable gentleman spoke as though the Government would probably not think it well to put this Act into operation until after the close of the war. Now, honourable gentlemen, we do not know when the war will end, and we do not know whether this benevolent Government will be in power then or not; therefore the proposal of the honourable gentleman from Toronto, if carried out, might mean an indefinite postponement of what everybody admits is a step in the right direction. I gathered from the professional gentlemen who represented the companies before the committee that they did not seriously object to the system of bi-monthly payment, and if the honourable gentleman from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson) will agree to substitute the "1st of January, 1918," for the "1st of October, 1917," he probably will get an almost unanimous vote of the House.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of my honourable friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls), but I must say that his argument failed to convince me. He told us that the railway men had got an increase in pay. Well, if the companies can afford to give their men an increase under the present critical conditions, what is to prevent them paying them fortnightly? We are told that the railway companies have applied to the Railway Board for authority to increase freight rates. If that increase is granted and the Bill remains in suspense, have we any assurance that the railroads will avail themselves of this expression of opinion and give the men their pay fortnightly? I must confess that I have doubts. Our honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) told us that we were only thirty-five years of age. Well, suppose we are. I remember the days when all the large corporations paid their dividends every six months. What is the modern tendency? It is to pay dividends quarterly. When this change was made there was not a protest against it; on the contrary, a shout of joy went up from all the shareholders. It was a convenience to everybody. When you see such large corporations as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and the United States Steel Corporation, with a capital of $1,800,000,000, paying their dividends every three months, there must be something in it. I remember when in the city of Montreal we paid our gas bills every three months. The Company gradually changed their policy and required the bills to be paid monthly. At first there was a protest; we were accustomed to the old system; but the Company, as the reason for the change, said that the monthly payment of cash was a great convenience to them, helping them to finance, and asked the consumers to conform to it, which they did, and to-day everything works smoothly. Now, what is the position of a man who gets his wages once a month? He has to go to his landlord and say: "I have had sickness in my family, I have the rent to pay, I have the grocer to pay, I have the water bill to pay; will you be kind enough to allow me a little delay?" If the men received their wages once a fortnight, it would help them, and, after all, no one knows what they want better than they do themselves.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Those of us who are not now in a position to vote on this question never will be. In the committee I proposed fixing the 1st of January as the date when the Bill should go into force. This proposal was defeated by only one vote. From a conversation which I had with the promoter of the Bill, I think he would not object to the 1st of January being set as the date for the Bill to go into force. We must fix a day; it is better for all concerned. If my honourable friend will accept the change to the 1st of January, no doubt the Bill will go through.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I rise with some diffidence to speak in this Chamber, but, in view of the importance of the Bill, I could not see a vote taken without first speaking on the question. I am thoroughly in accord with the amendment proposing that the Bill should go into force on the 1st of October. If I had my way it would take effect at once. The honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Boyer) spoke of a large corporation by way of illustration. They did not complain of having to employ additional help in their offices when they changed the time of payment of gas bills from every three months to every month. I am sure that the railway companies and any other corporations in Canada can easily pay the additional help required in order to pay the wages of their employees fortnightly instead of monthly. Why should we delay this matter any longer? I think the 1st of October gives them ample time, and that they should be agreeable to the change after the notice given by the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) who raised this question, I understand, a year ago.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Many years ago.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: And the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) says that he has been at it for thirty-five years. Surely the people, if they can read him as well as they could hear him, ought to be convinced by this time that it is all right. I see no reason why we should hesitate about putting this legislation into effect at once, or at least on the 1st of October. This gives ample time for all corporations —I speak particularly of railways, but I include all corporations which pay their men only once a month—to make the change. I agree with the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) in every particular but one. I do not agree with him when he says that he is the only friend of the workingman in this Chamber.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Of thirty-five years' standing.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I do not know that I can go quite that far myself; but I am here for the purpose of seeing that justice is done to everybody, and I can assure this House that when justice is done to the workingman everyone should be satisfied, and everyone will be satisfied. It appears to me that the only way to do justice in this case is to put this Act into force in accordance with the amendment brought in. I agree that this Bill should not be sent back to the committee. I think that now is the time to act, and, so far as I am concerned, I propose to vote that it shall go into force not later than the 1st of October. I think that would do no injustice to anybody, while injustice would be done to the workingman by putting the matter off.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I do not wish to take up the time of the House unnecessarily, but I wish to say that I appreciate, and I know the railway men of Canada will appreciate deeply, the sympathetic consideration which has been shown in this matter both in the committee and in this House. I find that there is a desire on the part of all concerned, including the railway companies to get together, and, while I still feel that October 1 is not an unreasonable date, if there is no objection I shall be glad to adopt the suggestion of the senior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) and change the date to January 1.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I feel pretty well satisfied that this will be the solution of this difficulty. As chairman of the committee which has reported this Bill, after hearing the expressions of opinion given in the House, I would not like to insist upon a vote being taken. For the information of the House, I may say that the opinion of the committee was very evenly divided, there being only a majority of one in favour of this Bill being put into force by proclamation of the Governor in Council. I think this is the fourth time that a Bill of this nature has been brought up since I have been a member of this House. The last time one of the representatives of the railway men, Mr. Harvey Ball, was opposed to the Bill. He was in favour of the monthly payment of wages. Consequently the members of the House being guided by all the evidence, some of them voted against the Bill. In Canada probably the highest class of mechanic is in the employ of the railways, and I think that class is improving as time goes on. Some kinds of labour will not benefit much by this change; but others, the lower-priced men, will benefit to a great extent. A few years ago the railway companies objected to the adoption of this principle on the ground of expense, because they paid in cash by means of pay cars. I understand that the employees are now paid by cheque; consequently there is no particular reason why payment should not be made twice a month. I may say that in adopting this measure we are incidentally aiding the revenue of the country, because the stamps on the cheques will run into quite a large sum. If it is agreeable to the House, I think I am safe in saying on behalf of the committee that I will accept the amendment proposing the 1st of January. I would not like to see the House divided on this question. I was very pleased to hear the remarks of the mover of this Bill with reference to the heads of departments who appeared before the committee. I think this is the first time that we have found the employers and the employees so agreeable on this question. There is another consideration which should guide us more or less: I understand that the Committee of the House of Commons on the amendment of the general Railway Act has adopted the principle contained in this Bill. Therefore I will agree to accept the amendment.

The amendment, with the date changed to the 1st January, 1918, was agreed to.

The Bill was read the third time and passed.

THIRD READING.

Bill 68, an Act to amend the Civil Service Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of Bill 57, an Act to amend The Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916.

He said: I was asked by my honourable friend the leader of the opposite side of the House for information which I have very great pleasure in giving him.

In the first place, I was asked what amount would be realized under the first year's taxation imposed by this Bill. I understand that it will be approximately between $14,000,000 and $15,000,000. I understand that nearly $13,000,000 has been collected already. It is estimated that the tax on the second year's profits will approximate about $20,000,000. With the amendments which we are now considering, increasing the tax, it is quite possible that the amount realized from it will approximate $40,000,000.

My honourable friend also asked me as to the personnel of the Board of Referees. I am informed by the Department of Finance that it has not been necessary up to the present time to appoint that board; consequently it has not been done.

My honourable friend the other day stated that he understood that the taxes for the accounting period of one year were charged to the expenses of the succeeding year. I controverted that, saying that I did not think it was the case. I find on inquiry that my honourable friend was correct—that, owing to the Act having been made retroactive, the payment of the tax could not be anticipated by the different companies affected; consequently it had to be charged up to the expenses of the following year.

With these explanations I would move the third reading of the Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time, and passed.

DIVORCE BILLS.

SECOND READING.

Bill O2, an Act for the relief of Rozilla Lamb.—Hon. Mr. Robertson.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Friday, June 22, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CONTRACTS FOR COAST STEAMERS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired:

1. Has the Government let a contract or contracts for two steamers to be built either in Victoria or Vancouver, to be used in trade between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts?
2. What class of ship do the tenders call for?
3. What will be the total cost of each ship completed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Yes.
2. Wooden auxiliary sailing ships of about 2,500 tons each.
3. Approximately $230,000 each.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That, when the Senate adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until Monday, the 9th July next, at Eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The honourable the leader of the Government has not given us any information as to the condition of legislation in the other House at the present time. I understand that in another place it is proposed shortly to hold morning and Saturday sittings. Whether that is an indication that the work of the Session is being brought to a close or not I am not in a position to say; probably the leader of the Government can give us some information on that point. I understand that there is some legislation coming down which will require careful consideration and considerable discussion by honourable gentlemen. It would be a great misfortune if this legislation were brought before this Chamber in the dying hours of the session, and we were forced to consider it without having sufficient time to deliberate upon it, as we should do in the interests of the country and with due consideration for the dignity of this Chamber. Unfortunately on other occasions we have had to complain of the manner in which important legislation has been brought to this Chamber in the dying hours of the session, when it was not possible to give it the consideration it deserved and which the country had a right to expect. There is, I think, on the file of Bills in this House at the present time Bill 67, which deals with the Customs Act. It is a Bill which may cause a good deal of discussion. Then, there are one or two committees dealing with questions of interest and importance. I fear that they may not proceed with their work during the adjournment, owing to the desire of certain honourable gentlemen to go away. I draw the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to these matters in the hope that we may have sufficient time to give proper consideration to them when they come up.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend's remarks sound very familiar. When I occupied the position which my honourable friend now occupies I used annually to indulge in similar expressions; indeed, they are a kind of hardy perennial. However, my honourable friend is only doing his duty. He speaks of morning and Saturday sittings being an indication that the end of the Session is approaching; but I would not venture that prediction. They indicate rather that the Government is desirous of giving the Commons more time for the transaction of public business. I have mentioned to the Prime Minister that our Order Paper was practically cleared up, and that the disposition of the Senate was to adjourn for a couple of weeks, and I do not anticipate that any public business will be ready for us before we resume. The Conscription Bill is now under consideration, and by the time it has passed the second reading and the committee and other stages we shall probably have resumed our work in this Chamber. The only other Bill of importance that is before the Commons is the consolidation of the Railway Act. That, I believe, has just left the committee, and will soon be before the House, when the Committee of the Whole will deal with it. Honourable gentlemen can understand that it will take some time to dispose of a Bill of that nature. I know of nothing else of importance that could come before the Senate before the expiration of a fortnight. We have been holding over the Customs Bill pending the bringing down of certain information which my honourable friend from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) has asked for. It is a very brief Bill and should be disposed of in a very short time. It is simply a declaration of what the law has been since Confederation. A judicial interpretation of it may afterwards be necessary. I think therefore the public business will not suffer if we adjourn.

Hon. Mr. POWER: As justification of the proposed long adjournment the leader of the Government tells us that in the past we have had similar adjournments which the Opposition has sometimes opposed. When he was the leader of the Opposition he made it a point to speak, I presume in a more or less perfunctory way, against such adjournments. I think the honourable gentleman will have some difficulty in discovering a precedent for the present action. Of late years we have adopted the practice of having long adjournments in the early part of the session, before important business has come before the Senate, and when business has not been anticipated within a short time; but the circumstances are different in this case. We are, I hope, at any rate within a month of the end of the Session, and the honourable gentleman proposes to devote more than half of that time to an adjournment. I do not think that is a businesslike proposition, or one which should commend itself to the members of this House as business men. I quite concur in what has been said by the honourable the leader of the Opposition; and I say further that we should have some regard for the reputation of this House. There appears to be a feeling prevalent amongst people outside that the Senate just meets and then adjourns, and that what it does is hardly appreciable and of no value. I do not think that we should do anything to encourage that feeling. By adjourning at this time we are doing what is calculated to lower the Senate in the estimation of the public. It seems to me that it will be time enough to adjourn, if prorogation is not close at hand, when the business before the Senate has been completed and there is nothing coming up from the committees. I submit to honourable gentlemen that if, instead of meeting on the 9th of July, we meet on Wednesday, the 4th of July, at, say, three o'clock in the afternoon, we shall have a reasonable amount of rest and shall not be leaving ourselves open to criticism. There is another thing which must also be borne in mind: when we meet on Monday, gentlemen who live at any distance have three alternatives—either to be late, to come here on Saturday, or to travel on Sunday; and the members being, as a rule, religious men, do not wish to travel on Sunday. Consequently I think that when we have a long adjournment Wednesday is the proper day to resume. I speak without any personal feeling in this matter, because I am not proposing to go home.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: A number of honourable gentlemen who left this afternoon asked me to suggest to the honourable leader of this House that in making his motion he should change the date of the meeting to Tuesday. I shall not express my own views in regard to this matter at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In view of the remarks of my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) I do not see how we can extend the time to Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: I think you had better make it the 12th of July. That would suit a good many of us.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, we want to be here for the celebration. You will have two days here to prepare for it.

The motion was agreed to.

IRREGULAR QUESTIONS.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I desire to draw the attention of the House to a lack or lapse in the Orders of the Day. I understand that a senator yesterday gave notice of two questions, very important and very interesting to the general public. On reading over the Orders of the Day, I find that the two questions have been suppressed; there is not one word about them. Where the power of suppression lies is a question that I should like to have answered—that the people of this country would like to have answered. Who has the power to suppress free speech, or to refuse to give to the representatives of the people information respecting questions of administration. Honourable gentlemen, it is stated in the House of Commons, in the press, and throughout the country that we are engaged in the present war in order that democracy may prevail over autocracy and the suppression of human rights; but here in this Senate we find the most outrageous suppression of the right of demanding from the Government information to which the country is entitled. Has the Government undertaken to suppress those questions, or what power in this Senate has suppressed them? Is it the Clerk at the Table?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I do not desire to interfere with the honourable gentleman who is addressing the House, but I would like to ask if he is in order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Do not be so sharp. I am perfectly in order. This is before the Orders of the Day, and I am rising to the highest question of privilege affecting the representatives of the people.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order. I believe that the honourable gentleman ought to confine his remarks to asking an explanation from the proper authorities as to why his inquiries were not printed. Then he may make a motion if he so desires.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, that is what I am endeavouring to do; I am trying to the best of my ability to get an explanation.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: But you have not the right to make a speech.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am not making a speech. I am asking for information. Was it His Honour the Speaker who suppressed these questions? Was it the leader of the Government? Who was it?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: If the honourable gentleman will wait a moment, I will tell him.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is the information I want.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Honourable gentlemen, after the honourable gentleman for Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) gave notice of his inquiries yesterday, and I heard the reading of those inquiries, one of the clerks at the Table called my attention to this fact—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: One of the clerks!

The Hon. the SPEAKER: that an inquiry should not contain any statements of fact. The object of an inquiry should be to ascertain if something can be done, but not to provide the House with facts. I advised the clerk to see the honourable member for Victoria and request him to correct the inquiries. I was later informed that the honourable gentleman had refused to correct them.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is a strange admission, that the highest authority in this House takes his inspiration from a servant of the House—a very strange admission.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: We read in Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure, Fourth Edition, page 313:

The Canadian practice is identical with that of the English Commons... No argumentative matter shall be introduced, and if such matter appears it is always struck out by the clerks at the Table, by the order of the Speaker. It is the duty of the clerk to point out any irregularity to the Speaker, as in the case of notices of motion, and if the latter is of the same opinion he will order the clerk to communicate with the member, so that he may have an opportunity of amending his notice.

That is what has been done. In May's Parliamentary Practice, Twelfth Edition, page 223:

The purpose of a question is to obtain information, and not to supply it to the House. A question may not contain statements of facts, unless they be necessary to make the question intelligible, and can be authenticated; nor should a question contain arguments, expressions of opinion, inferences, or imputations. The expression of an opinion or the solution of an abstract legal case, or of a hypothetical proposition, cannot be sought for by a question.

Denison's and Brand's Decisions, 1857-1884, page 255:

A question relative to matters outside the House, and bearing upon any matter before the House, cannot be put.

Also on page 262:

The Speaker has the power to direct that the language of a question be changed, if it seems to him unbecoming.

I find also in Peel's Decisions, House of Commons, 1884-1895—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I do not dispute any of those authorities.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I have no objection at all to the inquiries appearing on the Order Paper provided they are made in proper form.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If His Honour the Speaker will point it out to me, I will immediately correct any word or phrase or clause in the questions. I have said I do not object to the authorities cited by the honourable the Speaker, for the very good reason that I know and respect the rules. I do not state any facts; I am simply asking for information:

Is the Government aware that its recruiting officers are kidnapping school boys and inducing them to enlist for overseas military service on behalf of the Allies in the present war?

That is simply asking for information.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The second question, paragraph 3, reads:

If so, why not utilize their powers and their services in this secondary capacity?

That is offering advice to the authorities, which the honourable gentleman has not the right to do in an inquiry. In paragraph 2 of the first question the honourable gentleman states:

As an illustration and example, is the Government aware that its recruiting officer, Roy Anderson—and so forth. In that he is stating a fact, which he has not the right to do.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: How can I get an answer to the question as to whether the fact is true or not if I do not state the fact that a certain officer is doing a certain thing?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order. The honourable gentleman has no right to discuss the matter.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am not discussing it; I am going to accept your correction, and I will move that the words "as an illustration and example" be struck out, and that in the second question, "If so, why not utilize their powers and their services in this secondary capacity," be struck out.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I would ask the honourable gentleman to take these inquiries and make the necessary corrections.

REPORTED WRECK OF THE CRUISER RAINBOW.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to call the attention of the honourable the leader of the Government to an item in the Daily Colonist of Victoria, B.C., of 12th June, 1917. It reads as follows:

Local shipping men were much amazed to read the following news item in The Sunday Seattle Times under the heading, "Former Cruiser Strikes on Reef." The steamship Eva Marie referred to is in reality a small wooden freighter owned by Capt. V. Jacobsen, of Victoria. She was at one time called the Rainbow and was recently wrecked. Of course the naval authorities and a few others know where the Canadian cruiser Rainbow is, but they won't tell. The Times says:

"Advices received from British Columbia last night report that the steamship Eva Marie, owned by the Canadian Sulphite Company of Vancouver and formerly well known as the Canadian cruiser Rainbow, ran ashore yesterday on Helmcken Island, thirty miles north of Seymour Narrows. It is feared that she is a total loss, though the engines and boilers may be salved.

"The vessel was bound to Vancouver from a salmon cannery in Northern British Columbia with a full cargo. All hands were saved. According to the details received, the Eva Marie "jumped" a reef, being carried over an outer row of rocks by gigantic sea. No other details were received.

"As the gunboat Rainbow, the vessel figured promptly the first year of the war in operations on the Pacific Ocean. At one time the little vessel's officers believed they had been overhauled by the German cruiser Leipzig, and they cleared their ship for action, intending to fight to the finish against fearful odds. The other vessel, however, turned out to be a merchantman."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say that this is the first intimation I have had of anything of the kind.

CONSERVATION OF CANADIAN TRADE.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE.

The Senate resumed from June 13 consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Nicholls:

That, in the opinion of this Honourable House, it is expedient to appoint a Committee to inquire into and report upon the best method or methods of conserving and increasing our domestic and overseas trade, to the end that our present prosperity may not unduly suffer when the stimulus resulting from orders for munitions and other war supplies is removed; and that the said Committee be composed of the Honourable Messieurs Beaubien, Edwards, McLennan, Dandurand, Gillmor and the Mover.

Hon. W. C. EDWARDS: I rise on this occasion with the greatest possible diffidence to address this honourable House, because, first, I have no pretensions as a public speaker and attempt to speak only when I feel compelled to do so; and, secondly, because I am suffering from a trouble which makes it very desirable that I should avoid exercising myself physically or mentally. But the subject that I am going to endeavour to deal with is, in my opinion, the most important that has ever been before the people of Canada, and I am sorry that it is not to be dealt with by a more capable man than myself.

The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) who introduced the question to the House made it possible to deal with a great variety of subjects affecting Canada; so much so that I have enough material to enable one more capable than myself to lecture upon them for the next year. I want, however, before proceeding further, to congratulate both the mover and the seconder of the resolution, who are new members, on the very favourable way in which they put the question before this honourable House. I am not at all surprised at the mover, one of the largest and most successful manufacturers in Canada, bringing the question before the Senate and the people of the country, because he knows quite well the difficulties which Canada must sustain during the continuance of this war and after it is over.

He referred briefly to one very important question, namely, that of the enormous annual borrowing of money from abroad before the outbreak of the war, the expenditure of which in this country of course stimulated enormously, though to a great extent artificially everything pertaining to Canada. The honourable gentleman knows that such borrowing will be impossible after the war is over; that Canada, at least for several years to come, will have to live on the production of her natural resources. I am therefore not at all surprised that this matter engages his attention, for it is quite possible that, with many others, he believes that after the war is over Canada may develop a large export trade in manufactures, which I do not think is possible for this country. I would be glad to think it were otherwise, but I do not.

The seconder of the resolution referred to a matter which is very vital to Canada and presents one of the greatest difficulties under which this country suffers, namely, the fact of her sparse population scattered over a vast area of territory, making very expensive our transportation and everything dependent upon it. I will elaborate my views upon this point later on, and will proceed for the moment to another subject.

All the countries engaged in this unfortunate war must be exercised, just as Canada is, as to these problems. The great republic to the south of us has been very much concerned. I have read the writings of a number of the prominent men of that country upon the subject. One class or school of thought makes the statement that they should prepare themselves for the immense export trade in manufactured goods which will be possible for them after the war is over. Another school of thought advocates raising their tariff to prevent their being flooded with the cheap products of European countries. But anyone who is at all a student of economics understands quite well that if that country wants to manufacture cheaply for export to foreign countries it must lower its tariff. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) smiles, but when he has studied this subject to the extent that I have he will come to other conclusions than those which he now entertains.

What evidence have we that Canada is very much exercised over this matter? To start with, we have the speeches of our Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George E. Foster) not only in Canada, but in Great Britain and France—and, if I were possessed of the large imagination of that honourable gentleman, and also of his genius for invention, I could thrill Canada from the centre to the outskirts.

We have also a Foreign Trade Commission, which toured Great Britain and Europe a few months ago, no doubt studying the question of trade. I followed those gentlemen somewhat, reading their speeches, and I noticed that the Chairman of that Commission made the statement at Edinburgh that this country, during the present century, would attain a population of 100,000,000 people. He also, I am afraid, is possessed of a very large imagination, for later on I think I shall show the impossibility of Canada ever attaining such a population.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Who made that statement?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Woods, of Toronto.

Then, we have the Economic and Industrial Commission, headed by the esteemed and respected leader of the Government in this House (Hon. Sir James Lougheed). I may say at once that I have great confidence in any business matter in which our honourable friend engages. I do not know how free a hand he has, but, if he is given as free a hand as he should have and is backed by the Government of the day as he ought to be, I would expect very great results from his commission.

Next, we have the committee of this House headed by my honourable friend from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique). This is a committee of rambling scope, covering a great deal of ground, but the result may be beneficial to Canada. It also is concerned with this question of export trade and many other matters. The honourable gentleman is a very able man, and what he undertakes he will certainly carry out if at all possible.

But that is not all. We have the Advisory Council on Industrial Research, headed by a retired professor of Toronto University, a very eminent scientist, who, I suppose, is going to deal with the question scientifically and educate Canada as to what this country may do in the production of articles which require scientific research and application. As to the success of that council I am not prepared to speak. Personally, I would have more faith in the industrial activity of Canada well directed on agricultural and other lines.

In addition to all these, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is making a very searching inquiry into the resources and possibilities of Canada. I would expect that company to go into the matter very seriously, for there is no institution more closely identified with the life and activities of this country. At the head of this inquiry is a gentleman from Boston, Mr. Arthur Little, one of the most capable scientists on the continent of America, so far as industrial research and development are concerned. I have had considerable conversation with one of the gentlemen engaged in that inquiry, and I say frankly that I expect some good results from it.

Finally, we come to the motion of my honourable friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) for a committee of this House to inquire into what may be done, in so far as Canada's export trade is concerned, after the war is over. He is an able business man, one of the foremost of the manufacturing and financial men in Canada; and, while I may point out greater difficulties than occur to him, I want him to understand distinctly that I am not opposing him, and that nothing I shall say will be in opposition to his motion, with which I heartily concur. But I am going to try to deal honestly with Canada, her climatic conditions, her geographical situation, her resources and possibilities; and, while I am sure that what I am about to say will not be popular in this Chamber and will appeal to very few men in Canada at present, there is a time coming, a few years hence, when what I say to-day will be thought of more seriously. In addressing this House as I am now doing, I am taking a great risk, for the reason that I have already given, but I am doing it because I feel that it is incumbent upon me—that it is a duty which I owe to my country.

I want it understood further that there is absolutely nothing political in my speech. I speak for no political party. I am one of those who believe that to-day there should be no division of political parties; that we should have but one aim, and that is to do our part, under the unfortunate conditions which at present exist and the unfortunate conditions which are certain to follow this unhappy war. I may again, in a few days, address this honourable House to say, though I may be wrong, that I do not agree with all that is suggested with reference to the war. I believe that Canada should do what she can—that it is the duty of all Canadians who love their country and who have confidence in it to do their part. Perhaps, after I have done, honourable gentlemen will say that I have no confidence in my country; but that will not be correct. I have confidence in Canada to the extent of her possibilities; but I have carefully studied our conditions, and I think I know our disabilities.

I have said that I am not going to talk politics, but I cannot help discussing certain principles. Without Great Britain this war would have ended long ago—of this there is no question. I claim that Great Britain, though troubled as she must be, can continue this war indefinitely, notwithstanding the enormous amount of money that she is daily spending upon it, and notwithstanding the great aid she is rendering her Allies; and that is possible wholly and solely because of her trade policy. But, not only in Canada but also in the other colonies of the Empire, as well as in Great Britain, there is a school of thought which advocates that after the war is over we should adopt a policy of high tariffs and exclusion of trade with other countries, in this way sowing the seed for another war. I dissent entirely from that view, being opposed to any preferential arrangement being made after the war is over. I think nothing could be more suicidal to Great Britain and her Allies than to enter into any such arrangement. It is the trade policy of Great Britain that has made her great and powerful and able to continue this war. What are the conditions? England is spending over $30,000,000 a day, and yet is as rich to-day as she was when the war began. With the income from her foreign loans, with her shipping and her commerce, which never were greater than to-day, she is earning the cost of the war. That is an astonishing statement, of which I am not the author; it is the statement of a great statistician in England, and is, I believe, a true statement. In making this statement I do not pretend to say that Great Britain will be as rich when the war is ended as she would be had there been no war. She will be poorer than she would have been just to the extent of the cost to her of the war, and the general impoverishment of the world will be extreme. Of that there is no doubt, for, if a large portion of the population of the world is diverted from industrial production and commerce to the destruction of wealth, there can be no other result. In contrast to Great Britain, there are a great many who admire what Germany has accomplished so far as industrial and scientific development is concerned. Germany unquestionably is one of the great countries of the world. What she has performed in recent years is wonderful. But what is the cause of this war? I have read many books as to the cause, but personally I have no doubt as to the cause. Tariffs, protective tariffs, are the cause of this war. Germany had reached a position consequent upon the protection which she had given to her industries which made it necessary to her that she should make the stroke.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Will the honourable gentleman tell us why she attacked free-trade England if tariffs were the cause of the war?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I would ask my honourable friend to study economics, as I know he has never done. Germany did not attack England. She was driven to this war because of her economic condition. She had a war with France about forty years ago. It lasted a comparatively short time, and she got an enormous indemnity from France. Germany thought she would be able to repeat the dose, but in this instance she has failed, because she had not only France to deal with but also Great Britain. No greater crime has ever been inflicted on mankind than protective tariffs. Do away with protective tariffs and remove potentates from their thrones and you will have no more such wars. We may study the prevention of war to the end of time, and yet war will continue just as long as those two evils are inflicted upon mankind.

Now, so far as Canada is concerned, we all certainly desire the development of our country, agriculturally, industrially—in every way possible. We desire to increase our export trade in manufactures if that can be accomplished; but later on I shall show that up to date Canada has been practically unable to export manufactured goods, and Canada cannot increase her export trade in manufactured goods to any appreciable extent so long as it is a protective country. The United States up to ten years ago—and I invite honourable gentlemen to examine the trade returns—paid her foreign indebtedness almost wholly in raw material. Within a few years, after her industries had become too large for her own requirements, she began an effort to export manufactured goods, and she has succeeded to some considerable extent; and as she increases her exportation of manufactured goods she advances towards free trade, and the time is not far distant when that country will be the greatest free-trade country in the world.

Now I am coming to a subject on which I shall not have sympathy in this Chamber and shall have comparatively few supporters in Canada. There are some men in Canada who have thought as much as I have on the climatic conditions of Canada, her geographical construction, and her possibilities. You will be somewhat astonished, honourable gentlemen, at the statement I am about to make. I know of no other public man in Canada who would make such a statement. Not since Confederation has any public man made such a statement, but the reverse. On all our public platforms, in all our legislative halls, the statement has been continually made that Canada is a country abounding in variety of natural resources which are of enormous value and inexhaustible. In my opinion this attitude has been more or less misleading and hurtful to Canada, giving her people an exaggerated idea as to her possibilities. Not only has Canada the disabilities due to her climatic condition and her geographical conformation, but she is not a country possessed of numerous natural resources. I make the statement advisedly, and I think I know what I am talking about, and before many years have passed my statement will be found to be true. One of my friends, in talking to me before I arose to address this honourable House, said, "Edwards, don't be pessimistic." "Well, my friend," I said, "I will not be pessimistic, but I am going to tell the truth." Canada, as I have stated, is not a country of a great variety of natural resources. She has just four, namely: agriculture, lumber, mining, and fishing; and a fifth might be added, namely, our water-powers. Occupying the northern portion of the North American continent we are naturally rich in water-powers.

Taking the first of the resources that I have named, while it is my frank opinion that our possibilities are greatly overestimated, yet it must be admitted that we have a country of very considerable agricultural possibilities. At the same time it is considered to-day by gentlemen much better acquainted with the conditions of our western provinces than I am that no considerable amount of actual wealth has been made in producing wheat—that the cost of raising a bushel of wheat is about sixty cents, and the average price, prior to war conditions, was about the same. If the best possible results are to be attained in Canada in her agricultural industry a change in our tariff conditions is absolutely essential, for I think it must be generally agreed that, after all, agriculture is the mainstay of Canada.

Coming to the next industry which I have named, that of lumber, I think it will be agreed that with this I am somewhat familiar. I do not hesitate to make the statement that every province in the Dominion of Canada far overestimates its resources in this respect. There are many in Canada who even to-day believe that our timber resources are inexhaustible and that it is only a question of time when the United States will be exhausted of lumber and will have to turn to Canada for a supply. This idea, I assure you, is absolutely incorrect. The United States has as great a supply of lumber relatively to her wants as Canada has. The total quantity of standing timber in Canada would not supply the wants of the United States for more than eight years. Canada was once a comparatively rich country in this resource, but bush fires and unwise administration of our timber resources on the part of the various provinces have brought about the unfortunate result I have named.

In pulpwood we are considerably stronger than in timber for lumber manufacturing—of this there is no question; but, if our pulpwood resources are no better administered than our lumber resources have been in former years, they too will become exhausted much more rapidly than is at present anticipated.

I would ask honourable gentlemen who travel through this country from Halifax to Ottawa, or farther west, just to observe as they pass over the various streams the logs that are being sawn to-day; for I assure you, honourable gentlemen, that the logs being sawn to-day in most of the mills in eastern Canada are such as were left in the woods twenty-five years ago, and I do warn the various provinces of this Dominion that, if we do not take care of our resources in this respect, the lumber trade of Canada, except west of the Rockies, will in a comparatively short time be a thing of the past. A stage was reached several years ago in the lumber industry, making it the continuous aim and object of every lumberman to conserve his timber resources; but they have not been supported by the administrators of the various provinces. Considerable portions of country are each year being sold for settlement where the object is not settlement but to obtain cheap lumber, on the part of illicit settlers and a certain class of lumbermen. To give evidence of this I could show to any one who would accompany me, say fifty miles from this city, in one single district from fifty to sixty farms once occupied by pretended settlers, but now, as all the timber is cut off these farms are all abandoned. This condition of affairs, I assure honourable gentlemen, has been most serious in so far as the timber resources of eastern Canada are concerned.

In making the statements I do relative to our timber resources I do not want to pretend that we have not still timber resources of very considerable value, but I do contend that they are not nearly of the value which the average Canadian believes. With regard to the destruction of these resources, I quite admit that the provinces are not all equally guilty. In so far as fire protection is concerned, the provinces of Quebec and British Columbia have made the greatest strides in improvement in recent years.

As to our mines also, I believe that a very great misconception exists. Because we have a very large country and because the greater portion of our northern country is rock it is generally believed that we are enormously rich in minerals. While I admit the possibility that valuable mines may yet be discovered, I contend that so far as our mineral resources are now known the general public of Canada greatly overestimates our wealth in this respect. In asbestos and nickel Canada is comparatively supreme; but, after all, these are not of sufficient importance to warrant us in believing that we are immensely rich in mineral resources. We have more or less gold; but, as is well known, the production of gold is not wealth-producing, for generally it costs about two dollars to produce one dollar's worth of gold. We have some silver mines that are at present very considerable producers, but no one will pretend that so far as is at present known Canada is possessed of inexhaustible deposits of this metal. In copper we are fairly well off. At the same time, while we have some smelters in Canada, we have not yet produced a sufficiency of copper to justify the erection of one refinery. This statement I do not make of my own personal knowledge; but I make it as the result of an inquiry made by a commission of which I am a member at the present time for the Dominion Government. Lead and zinc exist in British Columbia to some extent and can be produced to-day at a profit, because of war conditions, but in normal times cannot be produced profitably.

As is very well known, the greatest mineral wealth-producing resources of any country are coal and iron. Our coal is most unfortunately situated, being at the extreme east and the extreme west of our country; and, while I regret to say it, I say it with an authority which I know cannot be denied, that no iron mine has ever yet been discovered in the Dominion of Canada that is on its own basis a commercial possibility. Even with war prices that at present prevail, there are only two iron mines in Canada operating, namely, the Helen mine and another mine north of Lake Superior. The Helen mine, I understand, is pretty well exhausted; but in any case neither of these mines produces a quality of iron of commercial use without the admixture of iron from abroad.

The fisheries of Canada are of some value, producing in the neighbourhood of thirty million dollars a year. On this resource I have very little to say, as it is the one of our resources on which I have the least information.

Now I come to the last of our natural resources, and it is the resource which, under natural conditions, would, next to agriculture, be the most valuable in Canada, namely, that of our water-powers, mentioned by the honourable member from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) in seconding the resolution to which I am speaking. It is stated that Canada possesses forty per cent of the water-power of the world and that the province of Quebec possesses seventy-five per cent of the forty per cent. But our water-powers are not being utilized to any appreciable extent and will not be utilized so long as existing tariff conditions continue.

Unless Canada is liberated from the unnatural condition which exists, I must frankly say that I do not see much hope for our country; for, while I admit that this is perhaps one of the dearest countries in the world to live in and produce in, yet the vigour and virility of the people of a northern country will overcome very considerable difficulties if only they are given freedom and the enjoyment of the results of their labour.

Now, to illustrate the handicap under which Canada suffers, may I be permitted to give an example? It is that of one of the largest manufacturers in Canada. It would be unfair to mention his name or his product. In a comparatively recent conversation with him I asked him this question: "Should the commodity manufactured by you be manufactured in Canada?" He said: "No, certainly not." I said: "How do you reconcile such a statement with your position at the head of this large enterprise?" He said: "I did not create the business; I found it here; I grew up in it; I am managing it; but the manufacture in which I am engaged should not exist in Canada." I said: "May I ask you to explain?" He said: "It is very simple. To build large factories in Canada such as those which I am administering costs at least forty per cent more than their construction would cost in the United States." He said: "I have to build stronger; I have to build warmer. But that is not all: when I have constructed the plants, I have to heat them with imported coal—on which I pay duty—at greater cost per month and for more months in the year than would be the case in the United States. And there are many other disabilities which I could mention." I then asked him: "With your knowledge of conditions, if you were choosing a location for business, would you come to Canada?" He said: "No, I would go to the United States, where there are far greater possibilities for industrial development than there are in Canada."

I do not like to touch on specific cases, but I am going to speak of one, namely, agricultural implements. They are produced in Canada at very much greater cost than they are produced in the United States. I know this as a matter of fact, for the information is from an absolutely reliable source. Of manufactured articles agricultural implements are among our largest exports to foreign countries. It would be impossible to export them but for the drawback of duty on the raw material which goes into their manufacture. Every article which goes into their construction is imported. And is it any advantage to the farmers of Canada to pay that penalty? I do not like to make the statement, but I make it advisedly, that the manufacturing industries of Canada outside of those in which our natural resources are involved have never produced one dollar of wealth to Canada, but have been a great detriment to our wealth-producing resources. I knew that I would make my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) smile.

Neither do I enjoy making comparisons showing the great advantages of another country over Canada; but it is undeniable that our country—which is, after all, composed of but a narrow fringe of successfully inhabitable country, averaging, I think, not over seventy-five miles in depth from coast to coast, this fact making our transportation problem a most difficult and expensive one—borders on perhaps the richest country in the world in its great variety and wealth of natural resources, its geographical construction, and its variety of climate, giving it enormous advantages over Canada. Without troubling the House to enumerate the very numerous natural resources of the United States, I will just here mention three products of that country of very considerable volume which Canada cannot at all successfully produce. Taking, first, cotton, which Canada cannot grow, the value of the product last year was over a billion dollars—almost as much as the entire agricultural production of Canada. Then, taking corn, which we cannot grow at all successfully except in two counties of Canada, last year's production amounted to $2,295,000,000, almost equal to the entire agricultural and industrial production of Canada in the same year. Another product, namely, the hog; the value of that product in the United States last year was one billion dollars. While we do produce to a limited extent the bacon hog, fed on clover and peas, we cannot produce the hog grown in the United States, because we do not grow the corn necessary for feed, and because our climatic conditions do not make it possible. These are a few of the many articles which we cannot produce in this country and which are successfully produced in the United States. In fact, I personally do not know of one product which Canada can produce as cheaply as the United States except possibly pulp and cement.

I want now to review briefly, if I may, the development of the North American continent from the beginning, but more particularly since say the middle of the last century. Canada and the United States started together. The United States is spoken of as being older than Canada, but it is not one day older than Canada.

That country's development has been enormous. Canada's has not been relative, and there must be a reason for the very great disparity in this respect. Some claim that immigrants went more willingly to the United States because that country was supposedly a freer country than Canada. That may be true, but I do not think it is the case at all. There are others who claim that, prior to the days of railways, the rivers of the United States, rising in the interior of the most valuable portion of that country and running to the south, and being open winter as well as summer, offered greater advantages than existed in Canada, where our rivers are frozen over from five to six months each year. There may be something in this contention, but it is by no means the main reason. The more rapid development of that country is due to climatic and geographical conditions and the natural general advantage which that country has over Canada in the variety and richness of its resources.

Prior to the Reciprocity Treaty, which was in effect for ten years and was abrogated in 1866, Canada had a struggling existence; so much so that many of the young men growing up in Canada emigrated to the United States and helped largely in the development of that country. At the same time there was great unrest in Canada and a very strong feeling in favour of annexation.

With the advent of reciprocity and the consequent improved condition in Canada the annexation feeling disappeared. With the abrogation of that treaty, however, our large borrowing began for the construction of the Intercolonial railway, and soon after it was completed the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway began. This large expenditure of money necessarily created artificial development, and for a period after the completion of that road stagnation again was manifest—so much so that in 1895 the road which my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) lauded to the skies yesterday suffered very serious difficulty, and I think it very doubtful if that road would have a successful existence to-day but for the advent of one man to the administration of the affairs of Canada, namely, the Hon. Clifford Sifton, who certainly was one of the strongest administrators of the Interior Department, if not indeed the very strongest, that Canada has ever had. The enormous development which Canada made from 1896 to 1914 was due, to the largest possible extent, to his very strong and vigorous immigration policy. During that period the influx of settlers to Canada, particularly to the western provinces, was unprecedentedly large—so large as to cause an abnormal development of everything in Canada, industrial and otherwise. But, while that period had its beneficial results, there was also created a condition from which, from my standpoint, Canada suffers very seriously to-day, namely, the demand, and the unceasing demand, for the construction of railways. In fact, I think it may be well said that for a very considerable period of time Canada was drunk with her supposed prosperity. I do not blame the Government of that day or the present Government, specially, for what I consider the overbuilding of railways far beyond the present necessities or the immediate prospective necessities of Canada, because, as I have already said, the people of Canada were drunk with supposed prosperity and did not believe that railways could be built fast enough to keep up with the growing development of the country, and its transportation requirements. To my mind, the response on the part of the Governments of Canada to the demands of the people in this respect is the cause of one of the greatest difficulties which Canada now encounters, and which she will have to contend with in the future. Just think of the effect upon a country with a small population such as Canada had, not exceeding say seven millions, of borrowing for many years at the rate of $300,000,000 a year. Add to this the large amount of money brought in annually by the great influx of population from 1896 to 1914, the expenditure of which in the country caused an enormous amount of artificial development and, under our system of protection, created manufacturing and industrial activity far beyond the requirements of Canada, and which could not and would not have existed but for that unnatural expenditure. It was a period in Canada when an unthinking populace believed that at last Canada had come to her own and that thereafter her development was to be equal to that of the United States.

With the large cessation of railway building in 1913 a period of adjustment became apparent, and in 1914 it grew more manifest, becoming very acute with the declaration of war in August of that year. The general belief was that Canada was in for a period of depression for at least the length of the war and perhaps for a considerable period afterwards. It was not then realized that Canada would have from Great Britain and other countries a great demand for munition requirements and abnormal prices for its agricultural and other products. Under these conditions Canada is enjoying what some people, and a good many people, call prosperity. But from my standpoint it is really the most serious artificial period which Canada has ever experienced. With the stoppage of the abnormal demand when peace is declared, we shall certainly reach a period of serious readjustment, and I am not at all surprised that my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) is greatly interested in what may be done to offset, so far as may be possible, these conditions; hence his proposed resolution. With him I am strongly desirous of doing everything that can be done to that end, but I am, perhaps, not as sanguine as he is as to the good results which may be accomplished. I am sure he agrees with me that with the stoppage of the war there will be an immediate crisis, which will continue for the period of readjustment and until the natural channels of commerce consequent on the return of peace are restored. I am sure that he also agrees with me that no one now living can tell just what the ramifications of trade and commerce will be, or the extent thereof, during the period of restoration. It is very difficult, indeed, to say to-day what demand there will be for Canadian products during that period. If there is a fair demand for what Canada can supply we may enjoy some prosperity; but that sooner or later not only Canada but the whole industrial and commercial world will suffer a long period of depression and distress because of the present terrible war I have no doubt. The difficulties that I apprehend in so far as Canada is concerned are that our farmers, who are our basic wealth producers, will have serious competition from the cheap production in cereals of Russia and other countries, naturally lessening the home demand, and the great difficulty which we shall suffer, for the reasons that I have already given, in so far as the exporting of our manufactured goods is concerned. Our public indebtedness, Dominion, provincial, municipal, and otherwise, for our small population, is very large, our interest liability being to-day in the neighbourhood of $500,000 a day, or say about $180,000,000 a year, which debt and liability will, of course, be enormously increased by the war. And I think that it will be at once conceded on all sides that hereafter for several years it will be impossible for Canada to borrow to any appreciable extent abroad. She will have to exist on the production of her natural resources, and, if she cannot export manufactured goods to any appreciable extent, as I have already stated I believe she cannot, then her manufacturing must be limited to such requirements as the production of her natural resources necessitates. Under these conditions, I am frank to say that I fear the results for many of our industries, which have been built up, as I have already described, under artificial conditions.

I think it will be admitted on all sides that the greatest saving condition would be a considerable and continued influx of desirable immigrants, and there are those who to-day are happy in the belief that such will occur; but I am frank to say that I cannot see how it is possible. It is my opinion that for a term of years the demand for labour of all kinds, in France, Belgium, Serbia, Poland, and the other devastated countries, will be far greater than it possibly can be in Canada. If my premises are correct, how can it be argued otherwise than that Canada has before her as difficult, if not a more difficult, problem to solve than any of the countries engaged in the present war?

Now, honourable gentlemen, if you will carefully observe the figures which I shall give you, I think you will see the great difficulty under which the wealth-producers of Canada have laboured and are labouring at the present time. The total value of our agricultural products in the year 1913 was $808,000,000; in 1914, $889,000,000. In 1915 there was a large increase, owing to enhanced values consequent upon the war, the total value in that year being $1,019,000,000; and in 1916 it was $1,081,000,000. The values of our fisheries during the same years were as follows: in 1913, $33,389,000; in 1914, $33,207,000; in 1915, $31,264,000; in 1916, $35,800,000. The whole mineral production in 1913 was $145,000,000; in 1914, $128,000,000; in 1915, $137,000,000, and in 1916, $177,000,000. This production includes coal, brick, clay, cement—in fact, everything that is taken out of the earth. The great increase in 1916 was of course consequent upon the war. I have not the figures of the total value of our forest production for 1916; but in 1912 it was $121,000,000; in 1913, $111,000,000; in 1914, $106,000,000; and in 1915, $102,000,000. These figures do not include firewood, valued annually at about $50,000,000.

The point which I desire to make is this, that the money value of the products I have named, which are those of our natural resources, is exceeded by that of our manufactured products. I have not the figures of our manufactured products for all the corresponding years; but in 1911 their total value was $1,165,000,000, and in 1915 $1,400,000,000. As I have not the figures of our manufactured goods for 1916, we shall have to take the year 1915 to make the comparison. In that year the value of our agricultural, mining, fishing and lumber products amounted to $1,290,000,000, while that of our manufactured products was $1,400,000,000, or $110,000,000 more than the value of what I claim is the source of Canada's wealth production. Now, honourable gentlemen, to me this is a most extraordinary and terrible condition of things. What does it show? It shows exactly what I have described, namely, that the artificial conditions which existed during that considerable period of borrowing abroad created in Canada a large development of manufacturing and commercial business which cannot exist after the unfortunate war is over.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: May I ask the honourable gentleman if he is aware of the fact that in the United States to-day 70 per cent of the population is urban, and 30 per cent agricultural—in other words, that 30,000,000 people are feeding 70,000,000, and that, if the population goes on increasing at the same rate, in a little more than a decade they will have to come to Canada, with her surplus products, to get food? If we develop our boundless areas at the same rate as we have done in the past—

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: The honourable gentleman is making my argument. In a few moments I will show that the United States is in very much the same position as Canada. The manufacturing development of Canada is far in excess of our requirements, and we cannot export, as I will show later. I ask my honourable friend, what are we going to do with our manufactured products? Who is going to buy them? These artificial conditions have created exactly the situation which my honourable friend has shown, namely, that this country, which is primarily an agricultural country, has severed the people from the land and centralized the population in the large cities—a condition which this country cannot maintain.

The United States is in a better position than Canada with regard to exportation, because they can produce much more cheaply than we can. Canada cannot export manufactured goods to any appreciable extent. This is a very serious question, and I invite honourable gentlemen to study it. I will give you some figures with relation to the exports of Canada which are astounding. In 1912 Canada exported to the value of $290,000,000. Of this amount $264,000,000 consisted of farm products and $25,000,000 of manufactured goods. In 1913 our exports were worth $355,000,000. Of these exports $324,000,000 were the products of the farm, and they include paper and pulp, amounting to five or ten millions a year, while the value of manufactured goods exported was only $30,000,000. In 1914 we exported products worth $431,000,000, $394,000,000 being the products of our natural resources and only $37,000,000 manufactured goods. In 1915 the effect of the munition orders began to appear, and of our exports, valued at $408,000,000, $348,000,000 were the products of the farm and $59,000,000 were manufactured goods, which included a considerable quantity of war munitions. In 1916 we exported $734,000,000 worth of materials, of which $524,000,000 was the products of the farm and $210,000,000 manufactured goods. Every one must agree that that is an unnatural condition, and one which cannot continue.

My purpose is to show, and I think I have shown very clearly, that the industrial system of Canada is thoroughly and completely out of joint, and that the restoration of equilibrium will necessitate a tremendous shake-up in the industrial life of Canada. While I support my honourable friend (Hon Mr. Nicholls) and will do everything I can to help him and his committee, it is candidly my opinion that, with all deference to the committees and commissions which have been appointed, two able and independent commissions should be appointed, namely: one to inquire into and determine how many of the several thousand miles of railway which Canada has built and which Canada does not now require, and, I think, never will require, should be abandoned and consequently cease to be a charge on Canada for maintenance; and the other to examine into the possibilities and cost of production in Canada relative to other countries, the cost of transportation in Canada relative to other countries—in fact, the whole situation in so far as Canada is concerned as a producing and exporting country. If this is done, I think the conclusion which I have announced in this House will be reached, namely, that it is absolutely impossible for Canada to be a protective country and at the same time a country exporting manufactured goods. I think it will be found that, with the exception of the two products which I have named, pulp and cement, there is not a single article which can be produced or manufactured as cheaply in Canada as in the United States. I think it will be found, further, that the best means, in so far as manufacturing is concerned, for making it possible for us in Canada to compete, or nearly compete, is by the development of our water-powers; but, as I have already stated, this enormously valuable asset must rest in abeyance just so long as our tariff conditions are what they are; and in the best interests of Canada everything should be done that can legitimately be done to promote the development and production of our natural resources. It occurs to me that if the same energy were put forth for the improvement of our agricultural conditions, it would be much more profitable than an attempt to develop the production and exportation of manufactured goods under the unfortunate conditions that exist. I think it would be found that under improved conditions the area that we are now cultivating might be made to produce twenty, thirty, even forty per cent more per annum than is now done; and nothing should be permitted to exist in Canada which acts as an embargo, upon the farmer, the lumberman, the miner, and the fisherman.

Honourable gentlemen, I am not going to detain this House much longer. I repeat that a great misconception has existed as to the possibilities of Canada. But there are two incidents which, in my humble opinion, may be the outcome of this unfortunate war, and if they occur they will be highly beneficial, not only to Canada but to the whole world, namely, prohibition and disarmament. I am not speaking of prohibition in any moral sense, but purely from the economic standpoint. If prohibition and disarmament result from this terrible war, it will be, after all, a cheap war for Canada and the world. A great many people who do not study economics believe that the existence of militarism in Europe creates an increased demand for our products. Such is not the case. If the men engaged in armies and armaments were engaged in useful production instead of work for destruction, the purchasing power of the countries involved would be enormously enhanced, and our trade with those countries would be far greater than it is to-day.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS.

Finally, honourable gentlemen, rest assured that it is by no means my desire to belittle Canada. It is the country of my birth, the country in which I have lived, in which all my interests are, the country which above all others I desire to see prosper. My object is not to belittle Canada, but to arouse the people of Canada to a study of the natural conditions of their country—its advantages and possibilities, but also its disabilities. Far too much has been said about our wonderful advantages, without, on the part of those making the statements, any study whatever as to our general conditions. When I make the statement, as I have often done, that Canada is but the Scotland of America, I do not belittle Canada, because if Canada produces the history and the men that Scotland has produced she will prove herself to be, after all, one of the greatest countries in the world, small as she is. But the difference between Scotland and Canada is this: Scotland is not shut off by artificial conditions from the rest of Great Britain, but enjoys free intercourse for all her products, with all the advantages that accrue therefrom, while Canada is shut off from the rest of the North American continent by artificial barriers which are destructive of her very best interests.

I have previously made the statement that prior to the Reciprocity Treaty, which went into force in 1854 and was abrogated in 1866, great unrest prevailed in Canada, and annexation to the United States was strongly advocated. The artificial conditions under which we have lived since that period have, as I have said, caused Canadians to believe that nothing but prosperity is before us. Honourable gentlemen, I ask you to examine the situation, and I ask how, under the conditions in which we must now live for many years to come, dependent upon the production of our natural resources, it will be possible for Canada to prosper without not only reciprocity in natural products but absolutely unrestricted reciprocity between Canada and the United States. If this does not come about, I am much afraid that you will hear again the cry which none of us desire to hear, namely, that of annexation to the United States. While I am a strong believer in reciprocity, I as a Canadian absolutely disbelieve in any such thing as annexation. It is true that from that great country we draw our inspiration in everything but government; but our system of constitutional government is one that all Canadians prize, and that I for one do not want to see ever disappear from Canada. But it is not natural, it never was intended by the Almighty, that this portion of the North American continent should be shut off from that portion of the continent to the south of us; and, so far as our trade is concerned, in my humble opinion nothing but unrestricted reciprocity will save Canada from two things, namely, the destruction of our best interests and the loss of our national independence.

Honourable gentlemen, I have done. I thank you very much for listening to me. I was prepared to say a great deal more, but I will not detain you further at this time.

On motion of Hon. Mr. McCall, the debate was adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS.

THIRD READINGS.

Bill 48, an Act respecting The British Columbia and White River Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

Bill M 2, an Act to incorporate The Manitoba and Ontario Railway Company, the title to be the English Valley and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Smith.

Bill Q, an Act respecting The Vancouver Life Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Bostock.

ALLEGED ENLISTMENT OF MINOR.

INQUIRY.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN inquired:

Has the attention of the military authorities been directed to the alleged action of Recruiting Officer Roy Anderson in recruiting Gordon St. Armand, of 398 Nepean Street, Ottawa, a boy 16 years of age, and if so, will the authorities discharge him and return him to his parents?

He said: I desire to relieve the honourable leader of the Government of the necessity of answering this question. The question has already been answered de facto by the minor, Gordon St. Armand, having been returned to his home. In asking permission to withdraw this question, I may state that the recruiting officer who was supposed to be implicated in what I call the kidnapping of a child and sending him to Petawawa military camp without the knowledge or consent of his parents has disclaimed all responsibility, and has written me an official letter, enclosing a certificate from the boy. He states that all he did in this matter was to fill out the attestation papers when the boy came into the recruiting office, and then to hand them over to the Military Medical Board; that apart from this he had nothing to do with the matter. This puts a new complexion upon the conduct of the recruiting base here in Ottawa, and I think it is only fair to the officer to have his statement put on record. It is a plain and unvarnished statement of facts, and I would ask that it be placed on the records of this House, just as were the accusations made against him three weeks ago, when the matter was first brought up. The statement says—I am not quoting it verbatim, but am speaking from memory—that the boy entered the recruiting office and Sergeant Anderson took his name and his alleged age of 18. Thereupon the sergeant filled out the attestation papers. When that was done he handed the boy over to the Medical Board, who found him fit for overseas service. According to what the officer says, the Medical Board took no steps to ascertain the boy's age, and took no trouble to ascertain that this minor was suffering from nervous and mental shock, which he incurred two years ago in what was almost a fatal automobile accident, an automobile running over him. The Medical Board is therefore responsible for the disappearance of this child for some days without the knowledge or consent of his parents.

My work in this case has been accomplished. This child has been returned to his broken-hearted parents. That was a work of charity, which I have done. I do not know the boy, have never seen him, but I know the parents are glad to have him back. Now, the next point is this, that the Medical Board neither established his age nor investigated his physical or mental condition. I will have no quarrel with that board. I have nothing to do with them. Let the proper authorities look after them.

An act of justice has been done to the family, and I wish now to rectify an act of injustice done to the recruiting officer. The document which I am placing on the record ought to be taken as the word of an honest and faithful soldier of the King. I have nothing to add to it; it explains all the facts. The lesson to be drawn from all this, honourable gentlemen, is that our recruiting officers, and especially our military medical authorities, should be absolutely certain before putting men through as fit to go to the front. They should make no attempt to put into the firing line boys under age, or men who are of age but physically unfit. God knows, the soldiers at the front who are physically fit have enough to do to look after themselves; but in a drive, in a march, or in a trench it takes four of them to carry each man who is physically unfit. There are positions in which men unfit for the firing line can render invaluable service, as I stated in one of my questions, which statement I notice has been omitted. They can render service as orderlies, stretcher-bearers, cooks, kitchen men, and so on, but they ought not to be declared fit for active service on the firing line. The letter from Sergeant Anderson reads as follows:

Petawawa Camp, Ont., July 5, 1917.

From Sergeant Roy Anderson, 72nd (Queen's) Battery, C.F.A., C.E.F.

To Senator Cloran,

House of Commons, Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—In the Senate Chamber, Thursday, June 21st, you gave notice that on Wednesday you would inquire of the Government certain questions regarding the enlistment of Gordon St. Armand in the 72nd (Queen's) Battery, C.F.A., C.E.F. In your notice you stated that Roy Anderson, recruiting for the 72nd (Queen's) Battery, enticed this boy to enlist, and compared the enlisting of this boy with the Cruger girl case in New York.

I am taking the liberty to inform you of the true facts of the case. I think you will find upon investigation that this case has been wrongly stated to you. The writer of this is the person who is accused of enticing this boy into the army, and I would be greatly obliged if you could see your way clear to investigate this matter more fully, and I am quite confident that after considering the evidence at hand you will be convinced that an injustice has been done me. The facts of the case are as follows:

"Gordon St. Armand came into the Base Recruiting Office, where I was recruiting for the 72nd (Queen's) Battery, and expressed a desire to join this unit. I filled out his attestation papers and had him examined by the Medical Board. This Medical Board passed him as physically fit for overseas service. He left the following day for Petawawa to report to the Officer Commanding. He gave his age as 18 years of age, and, as I was not in a position to judge whether he was or not, never having seen the boy before, it was then the place of the Medical Board to discover whether he was of age or not. Previous to the boy coming into the office I had never seen him and had never approached him in any way with regard to enlisting. The father came in a few days later and explained to me that the boy was under age, and, as I was leaving shortly for Petawawa, I asked him to furnish me with a birth certificate to that effect. This he did, and upon arrival at Headquarters here I submitted this certificate to the Officer Commanding thus fulfilling my promise to the boy's father. The matter then, of course, rested with the military authorities."

I am enclosing herewith certificate signed by the boy, in which he bears out my statement.

Trusting that you will have the kindness to look into this matter and satisfy yourself that I did nothing wrong. It is of vital importance to me, as this has gained considerable circulation in Ottawa, which is my home town.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Signed) Roy Anderson, Sergeant,
72nd (Queen's) Battery, C.F.A., C.E.F.

To whom it may concern:

This is to certify that I, Gordon St. Armand, enlisted in the 72nd (Queen's) Battery, C.F.A., C.E.F., of my own free will, and that Sergeant Roy Anderson did not, at any time, entice me to enlist in this unit.

(Signed) Gordon St. Armand.

Petawawa Camp, Ont., June 29, 1917.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The question is dropped.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, the question is answered by the letter.

RECRUITS REJECTED, DISCHARGED, OR DESERTED.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN inquired:

1. How many officers and men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force have been classed as unfit for military service?

2. Have the military authorities given consideration to the possibility of utilizing the services of these men in a secondary capacity?

3. Do those who have been classed as unfit continue to draw military pay?

4. How many have deserted from the various units between 1st October, 1914, and 1st June, 1917?

5. How many have been discharged from the various units since 1st October, 1914?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would ask my honourable friend to change this inquiry into a motion for a return. It will require considerable research, and under the circumstances it will be necessary to put the answers in the form of a return.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have no objection whatever to accepting the suggestion of the leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. POWER: That is a very important question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I know the question is important, and I feel that the honourable leader of the Government is unable to answer immediately; but, if I accept his suggestion and move for an order for these papers, we may get them when the war is over. I desire to have the information before the conscription debate begins in this honourable House, as it is quite essential to that debate. It is not a matter of curiosity or inquisitiveness on my part, but these are questions relating to facts upon which the people of the country are entitled to receive the earliest possible information.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will get it as early as possible.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I mean within two or three days.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, I will not promise that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: For when would you promise it, then?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All I can say to my honourable friend is that I shall ask the Militia Department to prepare this information as quickly as possible. Honourable gentlemen will observe that the inquiry calls for very widespread information and will probably involve the preparation of a voluminous document. It certainly cannot be dealt with by way of a question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: All these facts and figures should be collated in the department now. The department ought to be able to furnish them immediately. How many have deserted? That information is on record in the department, or, if it is not on record in the department, then the department is at fault; and the people want to know if the department is at fault. Then, I ask another question. How many men have volunteered since the beginning of the war and been rejected? These figures are collated and on record. There are 450,000 on the pay-roll of the Militia Department to-day, not counting the officials in the department at Ottawa, or at Montreal, or at other centres. Of that we are absolutely certain; we are paying for them. I am informed also that 125,000 good Canadians volunteered their services to the Empire, but were refused. Why? Because they were physically unfit. The 450,000 and the 125,000 make a total of 575,000. Then, how many Canadian citizens have gone overseas as reservists and have joined the armies of the Allies—Russians, Italians, Poles, Serbians, French and English? These figures must be on file in the department. Why not give the official figures to the country? It would not take two hours to do it. Those are the facts and figures I want. They are on file, or if they are not on file, then the Militia Department is more rotten, more decrepit, and more inefficient than we ever thought—that is all I have to say. I will let the question stand until the Government returns the figures.

The inquiry was allowed to stand.

CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE

ALLEGED DISAPPEARANCE OF MEN.

Hon. L. G. POWER arose to call attention to the mysterious disappearance of more than sixty thousand members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force and to ask the leader of the Government whether or not it is the intention of the Government to cause diligent search to be made for the missing men before putting the proposed Conscription Act into operation.

He said: When I gave notice of this motion I was under the impression that it was thoroughly well founded; but upon further inquiry I find that perhaps to a certain extent I have been under a misapprehension. I did think it would be rather interesting to go into some historical comparisons between this case and some other famous cases; but, inasmuch as the foundation upon which I proposed to erect my structure has been to a very considerable extent undermined, I shall ask the House to allow me to drop this motion. In order that the House may not be in entire ignorance of the reasons for what I have done, I shall read a few lines from a statement made by the Minister of Militia on the 6th of this month, as follows:

A question has been raised by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), and also by other honourable gentlemen, as to the discrepancy between the number of enlistments in Canada and the number of men who have gone overseas and the number of men who are still in Canada. There is a discrepancy. Up to the 31st of May, 1917, 64,552 of these men can be accounted for, which would leave 10,910, with respect to whom an investigation is being made.

I do not propose to quote the rest of the minister's remarks, but shall quote just one short paragraph:

They were discharged for various reasons; some men are not fit to become soldiers owing to mental and other reasons. Up to that date some 33,867 men, after they had enlisted, were found to be medically unfit.

I think that is a matter which calls for attention. The minister then says that there are some 13,000 deserters and some 10,000 odd men who cannot be accounted for. I do not think the discrepancy has been accounted for in the most satisfactory way; but in a sense it has been accounted for; therefore, with the permission of the House, I ask that this motion be dropped.

The motion was dropped.

APPROPRIATION BILL—$40,172,951.33.

FIRST READING.

Bill 108, an Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1918.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

PRIVATE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill 32, an Act to incorporate the Cascade Scenic Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Watson.

PRIVATE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill R2, an Act for the relief of John N. Salter.—Hon. Mr. Pope.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill Q2, an Act to amend the Companies Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

He said: Honourable gentlemen will doubtless recall that during the present session the honourable the senior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) introduced a Bill to amend the Companies Act, which in due course was sent to the Committee on Banking and Commerce. To some extent that Bill was in harmony with the views held by the Under-Secretary of State as to amendments that should be made to the present Act. However, after consideration by the committee, and after hearing the Under-Secretary of State, it was suggested that a Bill that would meet the views of the Government should be brought down and should practically supersede the one introduced by my honourable friend from Halifax. I think this Bill to a very large extent met his views, and consequently it has been prepared at the instance of the Government. It received its first reading before the last adjournment of the Senate, and I am now moving the second reading with a view to having it sent to the Committee on Banking and Commerce for consideration; and, with the two Bills before it, that committee may determine what is most desirable to do with either or both of them. The probability is that the committee will report upon the desirability of the first Bill being withdrawn, and the adoption of the measure which I now hold in my hand. I do not think it is necessary to explain it, as my honourable friend upon the second reading of his Bill explained the main changes which were being made in the Act. I may say, however, that this Bill embodies provision for the incorporation of patriotic societies, and their control and regulation by the Government, so as to dispense with the necessity of such organizations making application to Parliament for special legislation.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The honourable the leader of the Government has not given us any precise reasons for this Bill. I thought that he would probably have explained more fully what the objects of the Bill really are. I have not had very much time to look through this Bill, but apparently a great many clauses are being added to the Companies Act, and a number of questions are being dealt with which will require very careful consideration in committee. As I read the Bill it cuts many clauses out of the present Act and introduces a number which are practically taken from the British Companies Act. I notice a clause adopted from the British Companies Act with regard to prospectuses; but the British Act has a clause dealing with a company which does not issue a prospectus at all. As far as I understand it, there is no provision of that kind in this Bill, and it looks to me as if a company by omitting to issue a prospectus could take itself out of the jurisdiction of this Act. I just mention this point in order to direct the attention of the Committee on Banking and Commerce to it when the Bill comes before them. There are several other matters dealt with in the Bill, but I do not purpose taking up the time of the House now in dealing with them. We shall probably have opportunity to discuss them before the Banking and Commerce Committee.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does the Bill cover substantially the proposed amendments which were distributed to the members of the committee?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER: This Bill is substantially the one which I had the honour of introducing with the amendments and changes before the committee. The truth is that the Bill was not in any sense my own; I introduced it to oblige the honourable gentleman from Rothesay (Hon. Lieut.-Colonel Domville), who was going away. I am very glad to have been the humble instrument in setting at work the machinery which is going to produce a Bill which I think will be particularly useful, and which I think has been needed for very many years.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow.

THE SENATE.

Tuesday, July 10, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

AMES-HOLDEN COMPANY BOOT CONTRACT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. WATSON inquired of the Government:

1. Has any contract been given to the Ames-Holden Company for the supplying of boots to the Government since the first of August, 1914?

2. If so, what are the dates of the contracts and the total amount in each case?

3. How much money has been paid to the Ames-Holden Company?

4. On what dates has it been paid, and how much has been paid on each occasion?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend permit this to be changed to an order for a return instead of an inquiry? The information he asks for is of a rather voluminous character.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: All right.

The inquiry was agreed to as an order for a return.

RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS OF OVERSEAS FORCES.

INQUIRY.

On the notice being called:

By the Honourable Mr. Farrell:

Inquiry of the Government:

1. Has a record been kept of the religious preferences of the men enlisted for overseas service?

2. If such a record has been kept has it been tabulated?

3. And if so, what are the numbers given of each denomination?

4. Have the numbers been published or given to the press or to any person?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In the absence of the honourable gentleman from Liverpool (Hon. Mr. Farrell), I would ask the House to permit the same thing to be done in this case. The information asked for will be better given in the form of a return. If the House consents I will have a return brought down.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I would like to know if this is going to be the permanent policy of the Government, that when a member asks for information he cannot get it without an order for a return. This Parliament has only a few months to live—I hope it will live no longer anyhow—and the Government is now coming down at the tail end of its parliamentary existence with the suggestion that all questions be put in the form of motions for returns. That, I understand, was quite acceptable at the beginning of the Parliament, but it is not now, when the Government is in extremis, when it is dying for want of bread. I do not think it is fair to the country, and I protest against this policy.

Hon. Mr. POWERS: Stand.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The question stands.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say to honourable gentlemen that I do not propose answering this question as an inquiry, and if the honourable gentleman who asks the question is not satisfied to move for a return, the question will not be answered as an inquiry.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: On what grounds?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend has no right to cross-examine me. If an inquiry is made, I will exercise my judgment as to whether it is to be answered or otherwise.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Then we shall know where the Government stands. Kaiserism is coming in.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It may be needed to some extent.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The invasion of the country has commenced.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I suggest to my honourable friend that, as the honourable gentleman who put this motion on the Order Paper is not here, it might be allowed to stand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not object to that, but it seems to me that in his interest the information should be brought down.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Stand.

Hon. Mr. POWER: With the understanding that when the honourable gentleman returns he can change the notice without coming before the House.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Certainly.

The inquiry stands.

RECRUITS REJECTED, DISCHARGED, OR DESERTED.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN inquired of the Government:

1. How many officers and men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force have been classed as unfit for military service?
2. Have the Military Authorities given consideration to the possibility of utilizing the services of these men in a secondary capacity?
3. Do those who have been classed as unfit continue to draw military pay?
4. How many have deserted from the various units between 1st October, 1914, and 1st June, 1917?
5. How many have been discharged from the various units since 1st October, 1914?

He said: I gave the Government two days.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend does not agree to change this to an order for a return, I do not propose to answer the question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Then the question will remain on the Order Paper until Parliament expires.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You will not get the information then.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I will not get it anyway. The question will stand. If the Government is going to take Parliament by the throat, it must suffer the consequences.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There is no disorder in that.

The inquiry stands.

AN EXHIBITION TRAIN IN FRANCE.

MOTION.

Hon. C. P. BEAUBIEN rose to move the following resolution:

That this House urge upon the Government the desirability of forthwith preparing and carrying out at the first propitious moment the project of advertising Canadian products in France by means of an exhibition train of sample goods, for the purpose of obtaining for the producer, the manufacturer, and the wage earner of this country a larger share of the French market, more especially at the cessation of hostilities, when Canadian trade and industry will be in greater need of stimulation and will be more likely to obtain it through the enormous and pressing needs created in France by the war.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, in rising to propose this motion I want to make a very earnest appeal for your patience and forbearance. If I have an excuse for addressing you at any length, it is my deep conviction that the subject which I am bringing to your attention is of the greatest importance to the country at large. In the month of April of last year Sir George Foster announced to the House of Commons his determination of creating a Trade Commission with the object of going to Great Britain, to France, and to Italy to inquire as to the possibility of increasing the trade of Canada with those countries after the war. The minister requested me to accompany the commission to France and I did so. I know that the privilege extended to me on that occasion was due to the fact that I belonged to the Senate of Canada, and I thought that perhaps honourable gentlemen of this House would not find it amiss if I submitted to them the experience which I gathered on the way and the conclusion to which I came.

I would like, honourable gentlemen, briefly to state what kind of a reception was given in France to the representatives of Canada. Although you are all aware that France is par excellence the land of generosity, I know you would have been deeply moved by the warm welcome extended to the Canadian commissioners by the population of France, not only in the large cities, but even in the country and in the little by-passes in the mountains. In the populous centres thousands gathered to greet them. This was not at all due to the personality of the gentlemen who composed the commission, although I can say, not being a member of the commission myself, that they were competent and able business men. No, it was not that; it was the fact that Canada was represented in the persons of these gentlemen.

I well remember one day, Sir, in the Jurah, when climbing the mountains, we arrived at a place where, from a little house—a mere log-house here—an old man —for there are none but old men left back of the trenches in France—came down with two little children and threw flowers at us, shouting: "Vive le Canada!" That very day at a banquet a member of the commission expressed, I think, very nicely and very accurately, the sentiments implied in that heartfelt welcome from the mountain folk. He said: "Gentlemen, we from Canada know perfectly that these flowers were not intended for us, but that the hand which threw them to the representatives of Canada really meant that they should be laid on the tombs of the Canadian soldiers who have given up their lives for the common cause and will forever sleep in the soil of France."

Let me tell you of another incident which indicates still more clearly the profound gratitude that now exists, and will for a very long time live in France for Canada. We were received at Evian les Bains, one of the great thermal stations of France. Mr. Barillot, a very remarkable and delightful Frenchman, who is at the head of this enormous thermal institution, received the Canadians, as they were welcomed everywhere throughout France, in a princely manner. Really the hearts and arms of the French people were wide open to your representatives. A telegram expressing appreciation and gratitude for such kind hospitality was sent to Mr. Barillot; it quoted Bornier's old verse: "that every man of heart has two countries, his own and France." Mr. Barillot flashed back his answer in the following words: "If it is true that every man of heart has two countries, his own and France, henceforth let it be known that every Canadian has two homes, his own and mine." I wondered how far that sentiment, so admirably expressed, would be applied. A few months after my return I met a Canadian who had just arrived from Bordeaux. There he had met a compatriot, Captain Jean Descarries, a physician attached to the Laval Hospital. Captain Descarries and two others were inspecting the different hospitals in France to obtain the best and most modern ideas for the establishment and organization of their own military hospital. Captain Descarries recounted a visit these three officers made to Evian and their experience in Mr. Barillot's magnificent Royal Hotel. They had been in the hotel barely a quarter of an hour when Mr. Barillot called upon them, assured himself that they were from Canada, and immediately caused the best rooms to be placed at their disposal, in this, perhaps the best and most expensive hotel in France. For three days they were treated like right royal princes, and then, growing anxious lest their bills might become longer than their purses, they determined to leave, much to their regret, and asked for their accounts. The answer to their query came from Mr. Barillot; it was: "Every Canadian has two homes, his own and mine."

The Canadian mission were received everywhere in France with a kindness and cordiality beyond all expression. This reception came not only from the President of the republic, the ministers of the French Government, the generals and high officers, the senators and members of Parliament, but also from the numerous cities visited by the commission, the Chambers of Commerce, the important industrial establishments, and the population itself. The commissioners were particularly the guests of the two big railways of France, the Paris-Lyon-Méditerrannée, and the Paris-Orleans, which provided with the greatest solicitude for their transportation and comfort through most of the French territory outside of the war zone and the invaded area. To all these statesmen, cities, and to these corporations, Chambers of Commerce, great companies and their heads and directors, to these eminent men, and, in fact, to the nation of France, the people of Canada should be deeply indebted. Above all, they should be grateful to the ever active, farsighted and patriotic member of the French Parliament, Mr. Maurice D'Amour, who conceived the idea of a Canadian trade mission, who admirably prepared the itinerary of the mission in France, and devoted himself so generously to its success. If there existed a time when better economic relations could be established between Canada and France, that time is the present one. Throughout the journey of the commission through France the tenor of the speeches was the same: "Henceforth," the French people said, "we shall receive no goods either from Germany or Austria; when the war is over and we shall piously remove the bodies of our dead heroes from the battlefields to our little churchyard cemeteries, do you think we shall consent to barter with our barbarian enemies? Never! We shall have nothing in common with them. And you Canadians, who have come forward so generously to our help and have given us soldiers unsurpassed in the world, tell us, will you replace on the empty shelves of our stores the rejected goods of Germany and Austria? Will you, in turn, accept our merchandise in lieu of the enemy's products? Will you do it? Will you shake hands over it?" We said we would, and I came back to Canada with the conviction that words like those on such an occasion meant something: they implied an earnest endeavour to fulfil this patriotic purpose, and since my return from France I have striven and shall continue to strive to bring that result about.

I am aware that the words I have quoted were prompted by a sentiment burning fiercely in the soul of France, but I believe that sentiment will henceforth play a large part in the business of the world as well as in its international relations. After all, is not commerce based on confidence? And can we have confidence in the people whom we have fought since the beginning of the war? Are you willing to make them rich and powerful? That is what trade with them will accomplish. If they become rich and powerful, how are they going to use their power and wealth? If you want to know what the history of the future may be, read the history of the past; it is fresh, and it is written in letters of blood.

So much for the question of sentiment. Now, what is the business aspect? I ask for your indulgence as a layman in matters of business; yet there are some things so apparent that the eyes cannot but see them. France exports manufactured articles not one of which, I think, comes into competition with our own. Canada exports mostly raw products, which, of course, come very little, if at all, into competition with the productions of France. Can we not find means of bartering together? Strange as it may seem, honourable gentlemen, we were prior to the war exporting to France, with her population very little under that of Great Britain, less than two per cent of what we exported to Great Britain. We exported to Great Britain in 1914, in normal times, $211,000,000, and to France barely $3,800,000, though the populations of the two countries are about the same. Why? Why had we not a larger and fairer share of the French market? The reason can be stated in a few words: because our goods are not known in France. Honourable gentlemen, that may seem to you astonishing, but it is absolutely true.

I am glad to say that I received this very morning the report of the Canadian Trade Commission. I did not expect it, but it came in good time to support what I am about to affirm. A few days ago I stated that our wheat and our oats were practically unknown in France, as was also our lumber. No one, it seemed to me, should be unaware that in our beautiful fields we raise the best wheat in the world; but that is the case in France. No one should be unaware that we produce 300,000,000 bushels of oats a year, but that is the case in France. It seemed to me that no man could think of Canada without her beautiful forests, from which we export $40,000,000 worth of lumber a year. It seems passing strange that the people of France should not at any rate know of our beautiful pine of Eastern Canada, or of the British Columbia pine or fir; but they do not. In France I have seen with my own eyes near Bordeaux a sign stating: "We sell North American lumber." North American lumber! And just as the Frenchman who buys a large quantity of wheat will send scores of buyers all over the world, but will only now and then ask his agent in the United States to make an occasional visit to Canada, so the man in France who deals in lumber will never ask for Canadian lumber, but for Scandinavian lumber, or American lumber, etc. The French merchant, prior to the war, hardly knew that we had wheat, or oats, or lumber. If you will bear with me for a few moments I will read from the report of the Canadian Trade Commission in order to sustain my contention in this respect. I am quoting from page 81:

> To-day France is ready and glad to buy wheat from Canada. Unusually large shipments have been made, due principally to the war and to the fact that ocean freight rates from other countries have been increased. These imports have given France an opportunity to see the very fine qualities produced in our country. French purchasers have been satisfied with our wheat, and have come to regard Canadian Government inspection as the best possible guarantee of high grade grain. Dominion inspected wheat has commanded higher prices than that which has been inspected at sea-board. . . .

In all the countries visited the Commission heard warm commendation of Canadian flour. This leads to the conclusion that if French millers could be induced to take advantage of the popularity now secured for our grain, and specialize on Canadian wheat, and advertise the product in a distinctive way, great gain would result.

As to the oats, the report says:

With the exception of oats, France's imports from Canada of other grains than wheat are relatively small. In oats Canada has an opportunity, as the quality of oats received from other countries has not been good. French buyers are ceasing to buy as once many of them did—irrespective of the weight per bushel. Canada's fine qualities of oats should have a good reception, as weight for weight they have greater food value than our oats.

As to timber, I will quote simply one paragraph from the same report:

Our exportation has been carried on almost exclusively through England. On the English market our British Columbia wood is robbed of its national character. It is lost in the midst of the products of other countries and is sent to France under names that in no way indicate its origin. At times even dealers sell it as wood from "the North." Our forest products have an undeniable value, and it is essential that their value be known in France and attributed to Canada, in order that our merchants and the countries at large may reap the benefit.

In order to secure a place in the French market, Canadian producers must first of all make Canadian products known. To attain this end, there is but one practical and efficacious way, namely, to show them to possible purchasers. Printed matter, advertisements and lectures by commercial agents will never convince the French people of the value of our merchandise. They must see it, feel it and be convinced for themselves.

This report goes on to say that very little effort in this respect has been made by Canadian timber merchants in past years, while, on the other hand, German traders and English agents have gone into the market, have measured the wood according to the French metric system, have put in prices in French specie, and have given the weight of lumber exactly as is done in France.

Now, honourable gentlemen, just one word as to the different products which it seems we could sell in large quantities in France.

Our pulpwood is unknown there. When touring through the Isère, at Grenoble, the president of the Chamber of Commerce in his speech said to us: "Gentlemen, do you know, we are manufacturing every year 200,000 tons of paper which prior to the war was entirely made from German or Austrian or Scandinavian pulp? We hear for the first time that you can export pulp to us. Will you send it over to us in large quantities? We will have no more German or Austrian pulp." France imports yearly 512,000 tons of pulp, and until lately we did not export one pound of pulp to France. Can we not use that opportunity? Oh, I know there are difficulties: I know that I shall be told: "There is great difficulty in transportation; mechanical pulp contains a great deal of water, for which freight must be paid: it is hard for us to compete." It is true; I am perfectly willing to admit that; but, tell me, can you extend your trade over the world without an effort? You cannot do it. But this difficulty has been met. In the province of Quebec we have the Chicoutimi Pulp Company, of which Mr. Dubuc is the president and manager. He has had the spirit to cope with and the ability to solve this difficulty, and his company now exports to France annually 40,000 tons, consigned to Mr. Jean Dupuis, proprietor of one of the most important publications in France, Le Petit Parisien, and to Mr. Jean Darblay, one of the largest manufacturers of paper in the world. Apart from that, I understand that 50,000 tons of pulp a year are being exported from Chicoutimi to England. What has been done by Mr. Dubuc can be done by others. Why not?

As to apples, France imports 110,000 barrels a year. Do you think they get any from Canada? Not at all. They get them from Germany, from Austria, from Italy, from Spain, from Belgium. Is there a better apple in the world than the McIntosh Red, or the Fameuse? I do not believe there is; I have not heard of any. There may be other varieties of Canadian apples of equally good quality, but I know of no country in the world that can compete with Canada in apples. You will perhaps tell me that there are difficulties. Yes, there are difficulties, I know; but, mind you, we shall have to face those difficulties, whether we wish to do so or not, when this war is over. We shall have to face competition from other nations, unless we want to be hemmed in within the borders of our own country; and if we have to face those difficulties and solve them, why not set to work now? As for apples, an attempt was made last year—during the war. The province of Quebec exported a certain quantity of apples, McIntosh Red and Fameuse, and sold them on the Parisian market, I understand, with a fair measure of success for a first attempt.

We can develop a large trade in canned meats. In 1913 France imported 42,000 metric quintals of canned meats. A metric quintal is 220 pounds. That is a fairly large amount. From Canada in 1913 not one pound was imported into France. In 1914, $29,000 worth were imported; in 1915, $633,000 worth. Our canned meats have, by force of necessity, been introduced and advertised, and are now being used extensively in France. Why not keep a hold on the advantages that the war has given us in that respect?

Our fish exports have increased largely. Of canned salmon we exported, in 1913, 594,000 pounds; in 1916, 3,905,000 pounds. Our fisheries also are a great source upon which we can draw. Why not make an effort? Let us advertise our goods in France and see that the market which adverse circumstances have opened is kept by us.

There is also in France a large demand for boneless fish, cured fish, and smoked fish —a market of which, I believe, we have not at all availed ourselves of to the present time.

As to minerals, I could not help smiling when I heard that every pound of asbestos imported into France came from Germany. "Why," I said to the French people, "do you know that 85 per cent of the world's total production of asbestos comes from my own province, the province of Quebec? Eighty-five per cent of the total production of the world! And not a pound do you get from us! How is it? And, do you know, we have ascertained that the Germans came here and bought practically all the asbestos that we had for export—corralled, so to speak, the whole amount exported, and then retailed it to France, Italy, and other countries of Europe.

As to nickel, it is the same sad story. It was not known in France, prior to the war, that 85 per cent of the total production of the world came from Canada; and, except what they obtained from their own colonies, the French people imported all their nickel from Germany, who in turn bought it from us.

Of other metals and minerals, we have antimony, magnesium, magnesite, of which we have a very high grade in Canada, and of which France also imports large quantities from Greece, Hungary, and India. We have mica, which we can but do not export. We have tungsten and cobalt, for which there are very large outlets in France.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN.

But, honourable gentlemen, those are the ordinary advantages which the French market offered in times of peace. Are there others? There are opportunities created by the war, and these are great indeed. You are all aware that the Treaty of Frankfort, made as a consequence of the defeat of France in 1870, gave Germany the benefit of the lowest rate of duty on all imports into France. This, coupled with the enormous indemnity France had to pay to Germany, gave Germany a tremendous advantage in the French market, which she has used very largely and very profitably. After the war, this treaty, thank goodness, will be abrogated. After the war, German goods and Austrian goods, and the goods of other enemy countries, will be missing from the shelves of France. Those shelves will be empty and must be refilled. There will be the reconstruction of an enormous area of French territory. As I said to this honourable House a few days ago, at least 3,500 municipalities will have to be completely raised and must be completely rebuilt, equipped, and furnished. There is another opportunity, an immense opportunity, which we shall have: it is the replacement of every pound of rail and of every piece of machinery in France, which is running now, and has been running since the beginning of the war, twenty-four hours in the day. That has all to go to the scrap-heap; nothing of it will be left; and France, with all her territory re-conquered, cannot at the best furnish more than 20 per cent of her new and pressing requirements. Where will she get the rest? I am well aware that we in Canada, with our small population, labour under certain disadvantages — disadvantages which have been laid bare to us with almost cruel frankness by the honourable member from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Edwards). I know that we cannot expect to have the largest share of that market; but it is not necessary that we should. Let us have our fair share of it, and it will keep the wheels of industry going at the very time when it will be most necessary for every man in this country—not only the man with capital invested in large industries or manufactories. That man has my sympathy, but my sympathy goes out particularly to the workingman who has nothing to draw upon, and who will, when the glad bells of peace are ringing, hear the command to drop his tools and walk out. That man must find work, and if we do not find him work that is profitable for the country, we shall have to find work for him just the same. Honourable gentlemen, that man is not going to die of hunger. He will not allow this Government or any other government to permit conditions under which he would die of hunger. We must find work for him, and, if we do not find constructive work, we shall have to find work that will cost the country an enormous amount of money and return nothing. But in order to get that work we must prepare now. Later will be too late.

I have here a quotation from the report made by the American Trade Commission. The Americans are wide-awake, and, as you know, are very keen and quick to seize opportunity as it goes by. They follow the old Roman adage that opportunity has hair in front, but is completely bald behind, and if you do not grasp it when it comes, your effort is useless when it has passed. Well, as soon as the Canadian Trade Commission set foot in France, an American Trade Commission was organized, and on the very day that your representatives sailed for their own country France received a very large and important group of highly-qualified industrial and commercial gentlemen representing the Stars and Stripes, who followed practically in our footsteps in every portion of France visited by us.

The report of that American Trade Commission states clearly what the needs of France will be after the war. I will read from it but one short extract:

According to the statement of Mr. Ringelmann, who has been the head of the Experimental Department of Farm Machinery for twenty years, about 17,200 tractors, 125,000 ploughs, 10,000 threshers, and a large number of harrows, cultivators, and other implements will be needed immediately upon the conclusion of the war, and more later. Under normal conditions France is capable of supplying a large part of her own agricultural implements and machinery, but under war conditions every effort is directed to turning out war supplies, and for some time after the war much will have to be imported.

I would like to quote also from a report made by an old member of this House, the Hon. Philippe Roy, Commissioner General for Canada in France, and I cannot do so without telling you what excellent work he is doing there. The late Government was indeed fortunate in selecting Mr. Roy for the position he occupies. I will give you just one fact to show the value of the man. When the troops of France were retreating towards Paris, and the population was pouring out of the gates of every city, the women and children being carried on little carts with whatever they could save of their furniture, when the poor people of France were fleeing hither and thither, when the streets of Paris were becoming more and more empty every day, when the French Government had to leave, when the representatives of the different foreign countries, including even the British Ambassador, had gone, one man stayed in Paris and took his chance with the Huns. That man was a Canadian. That man was Philippe Roy—I take off my hat to him. Philippe Roy has endeared himself to the hearts of Frenchmen because he has a broad, open mind, a sincere heart, and devotes himself unsparingly to the welfare of his country. The eminent services that Mr. Roy has rendered to Canada will be known later, and I hope will be justly appreciated. This is what Mr. Roy said in his report to the Department of Trade and Commerce for the year 1916:

The remarkable development of Canadian exports to France as shown by the report of Trade and Navigation Return of the Customs Department for the fiscal year ending March 31st, 1915, in spite of the steady rise in freight rates and scarcity of transportation facilities, clearly shows the trade possibilities between the two countries. It is true, quite a proportion of the Canadian exports to France is due to the effects of war conditions upon the industrial activity and general productive power of France, but it appears likely that for several years following the end of hostilities, excellent opportunities will offer for the export of such Canadian staples as lumber, cereals, flour, frozen meat, cattle, hams, canned goods, and other foodstuffs, cotton goods, and various special iron and steel products.

He goes on to say that during the year 1915 a great many orders had been given to the large metallurgical corporations. Indeed, we all know, for instance, that a large number of steel cars have been ordered from Canada and have been furnished by our Canadian companies. Then he refers to inquiries that have been made:

Many inquiries have reached the office during the year with regard to steel rails, structural iron and steel, sheets, tubes, and other metallurgical products. When the enemy is driven out of the invaded regions of France and Belgium, it seems likely that the representatives of Canadian manufacturers, who are on the ground keeping in touch with the trade, will have excellent chances of securing good business for their principals. An ever increasing number of inquiries were received from fresh sources during the year bearing on such articles as news-print, wood pulp, paper, wrapping paper, mineral products, tin, nickel, lead, zinc, asbestos, mica, copper and brass, and products of same, chemicals, canned and dried meat extracts, tallow, fats, dried vegetables, butter, cheese, flax, hay, straw, rubber goods, woolens, leather, belting and leather goods, agricultural implements, machine tools, electrical and steam machinery, electrical household appliances, enamelled tin, and ironware.

And these inquiries have continued generally in the year 1916, and have perhaps even increased.

I have heard some people say: "Opportunities certainly existed prior to the war, and these opportunities have been largely increased by the war, but will it be prudent for us to deal with France after the war? What about her financial responsibility? Is France not bled white in money as well as in blood?" Honourable gentlemen, an American exporter is a pretty shrewd man; he will not take the same chances in exportation that an Englishman will. The report made by the American Trade Commission shows clearly that the American exporter is extremely conservative. He will export only certain lines. Preferably he establishes manufactories—for instance, that of agricultural implements—in the country where the exportation seems profitable to him. What do these shrewd men of business think of the credit of France after the war? This is what the above report says:

> We believe there are few countries in which it is safer to grant credit, or make advances, or make loans, than France, in spite of the war and all that the war has meant. The French are an exceedingly rich and thrifty nation, careful in money matters, and little given to the speculative activity that prevails in our own country. Their practices, often so different from ours, are different because of their greater conservation, their greater thrift, and their hesitation in taking unusual risks. In spite of savings banks and the great national investments in foreign loans, the French people as a whole still hoard large sums of money.

Another objection made to me is this: Supposing we do trade with France, supposing we find there an opening for our goods, supposing her credit is good, and we can take a chance, what about return freights? No two countries can trade together unless there is exportation on both sides. Well, honourable gentlemen, I know that the goods we import from France are expensive goods and are not bulky, whereas the goods that we shall export to France are not expensive and are bulky, and I am fully aware that the hulls that will start out full may return without being completely loaded. There are two possible answers to this question. One is the answer made by the Americans, and the Atlantic is no wider for us than it is for them, and the hulls that will come back to us will be no emptier than those that will come back to them. What did the American Trade Commission find? They found a great many articles which the United States could import from France. This is what they say:

> The present prohibitive freight rates on American coal are due not only to lack of ships, but also to the fact that it is difficult to obtain suitable return freight from France; for French exports consist principally of fine goods of high value and small bulk. It was suggested that perhaps the following building materials and ores might supply the return freight needed:
> Alpha.—(Not to be confused with alfalfa). This is a low growing palm-like plant, which is found in Algiers in large quatities. It is convertible into pulp suitable for the manufacture of the highest quality of paper. The material can be had the whole year around. The annual production is now about 117,000 tons, most of which goes to England. A great deal more could be secured for American consumption, and the matter is well worthy of further study. Shipment is made via the port of Oran, and the cost is 70f. per ton—f.o.b. Oran. The freight from Oran to England was quoted at 12s per ton, but under present conditions, freight are subject to great fluctuation.
> Bauxite.—This is an aluminum ore, named after Les Beaux. It is found in the department of Bouches-du-Rhône, which produced (1912) 6,500 tons per year; in l'Héreault, 46,000 tons per year; in Var, 203,000 per year—a total of 255,500 tons. Large quatities could be mined in Southern France.
>
> Pyrite.—From Algiers.
> Tiles.—For roof, floor, and wall covering. The supply would be considerable, the availability depending upon freight and tariff conditions.
> Bricks.—The remarks as to tiles apply.
> Marble.—Since the outbreak of the war it has been found, however, that practically every marble heretofore imported by the United States can be duplicated by American quarries.
>
> Roofing Slate.—Dependent upon freight and tariff conditions.
> Caen and other Building Stone.—It is asserted, however, that a building material, almost identical, can be obtained from Texas more cheaply than this material could be imported.
> It is not impossible that, as available shipping becomes greater and correspondingly cheaper, it may become profitable to ship American coal to France, even in the absence of bulky return freight, as long as the war lasts, and perhaps afterwards.

I may add that the Minister of Commerce in France, M. Clementel, when the objection as to return freights was put to him, simply answered: "If we have not got the return freights required, we can always give a subsidy." In these words I find the second answer to this last objection.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I think I can claim to have shown, at all events in some slight degree, that it is well worth inquiring into the desirability of extending our trade with France. How can we do it? Again I repeat, by making our goods known. I will quote from the Canadian Gazette, published in London, on May 17, 1917:

Why Not a Canadian Fair?

What we should like to see would be an exhibition in London of Canadian products, manufactured as well as natural. The exhibition might afterwards be sent in turn to France, Italy and Russia. Of course, the question of transport would stand in the way of such an exhibition at present. But the preliminaries might be got through now, so that directly transportation becomes possible the fair could be held. The Export Association of Canada might be entrusted with the organization and all preliminary arrangements made forthwith. British buyers need a practical demonstration of what Canada can produce. No doubt buyers on the continent are equally ignorant of Canadian goods. How can we expect foreign buyers to give orders to Canadian manufacturers if they do not know what to order?

Therefore, honourable gentlemen, we must make our goods known in France. Well, at present especially, that is rather a difficult problem. With the desire of contributing, even in a very slight degree, to the solution of this difficulty and thereby of giving a practical result to the work of the Canadian Trade Commission. I made bold to submit to the French Government a plan for the purpose of advertising our goods in France, and French goods in Canada. I realize that it is useless to attempt to establish ordinary exhibitions in France. The difficulty in procuring materials, labour, and the large amount of money required—all that and much more—would render such a proposition impracticable. I know that; but it seems to me that a means of advertising these goods in a striking and economical manner should be found, and could be found. It occurred to me that two trains of sample goods might be equipped, one with Canadian goods to circulate in France, and the other with French goods to circulate in Canada. This project was submitted to and gracefully received by Mr. Clementel and later accepted by the French Government.

It seemed to me that the second step lay in obtaining the co-operation of the French railways. Well did I know the difficulties under which they were labouring; well did I know that the objection would be raised: "We are doing all we can; we can do nothing more." The four great railways of France were approached and were asked not only whether they would approve of the project, but whether they would contribute to it generously. After all, honourable gentlemen, every article that comes from France to Canada or goes from Canada to France, before yielding a profit to the manufacturer, pays freight and therefore a profit to the railway company transporting it. The railway companies get profit on the goods whether coming or going. It was shown to the railway companies that, if the manufacturers of France and Canada could make an effort to send their goods outside of their country in order to obtain one profit, surely the railway companies could make an effort to obtain profit on both the outgoing and the incoming article. The railway companies, I am glad to say, acquiesced immediately, and generously agreed to give free transportation to the proposed Canadian sample train. La Compagnie Générale Transatlantique has, with equal if not greater liberality, agreed to give free transportation to the Canadian as well as to the French samples, both going and returning. I cannot but refer to the very eminent and patriotic men who direct these large transportation companies, and more especially to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Clémentel. Their clear vision and prompt action have moved me with admiration, and their kind reception with deep gratitude.

After being approved by the French Government, the railways, and the French liners, the project has been endorsed by practically all the Chambers of Commerce of France, and by l'Association d'Expansion Economique, which is composed of the presidents of all the Chambers of Commerce of France, and also by the very important association called France-Amérique, having at its head, as you know, M. Hanotaux, an ex-minister and a writer of world-wide renown.

The papers of France, of which I will give you rapidly a list, have written articles commenting favourably on the project: le Phare de la Loire, la Dépêche Dauphinoise, la Paris-Télégramme, le Petit Courrier, le Petit Bleu, la Liberté, le Journal de Rouen, le Mémorial d'Aix, le Soir de Paris, le Droit du Peuple, le Radio, le Vigie Marocaine, and la France.

The project has also been approved here, not only by a very large number of influential business men, but also by the railway companies, who have gladly agreed to give free transportation. I may say that it has the sympathetic support of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. On the 7th of February last Sir George Foster expressed himself as follows in the House of Commons:

My own view was that this was an excellent idea, one that would be very beneficial if it could be carried out. But there was then, as there still is, some doubt in my mind as to whether this is the opportune time. . . . The question arises in my mind, and it sticks there yet, as to whether it will be possible under these conditions for the French people to favour the taking away from necessary transport of any portion of the effective power of the railway system. That I think must be settled first of all; and I am now in communication with Senator Beaubien, who, I know, has had this matter brought to his attention, to know whether or not he considers it possible that it can be done now, or whether it would be better at a more favourable and opportune time. That is where the matter stands. I have great sympathy with the idea, and would like to see it carried out at the most opportune time, when we are best assured of good results.

As a result of this pronouncement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, a despatch was sent to the Hon. Philippe Roy, who communicated with M. Clémentel, the Minister of Trade and Commerce in France. The answer from M. Clémentel was this: "Prepare immediately your samples and send them to Bordeaux, and at the first propitious time these samples will be taken all through France."

In Hansard of the same date, February 7, honourable gentlemen who are interested in consulting it will find sympathetic remarks by the Hon. Mr. Lemieux on this project.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I will conclude by quoting an opinion expressed by the Canadian Manufacturers Association. I think very few bodies are better qualified to express an opinion on this subject. The Canadian Manufacturers Association is composed of industrial interests from all parts of Canada, east and west, of all sorts and conditions. They have given this matter a great deal of attention. Delegations from Toronto and Montreal have at different times met the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister, and strongly advocated the carrying out of this project. They have expressed their view in an illuminating memorandum, from which I will, with your kind permission, read a few extracts. This memorandum was prepared by Mr. Murray, the secretary of the association, and whatever may be the value of the project itself, the reading of these extracts will show clearly the great value of the man who wrote them:

Under the circumstances, I have thought it well to lay our views before you in writing, partly because I fear that my hurried verbal explanations failed to do our proposition justice, and partly because I am anxious that your colleagues should all understand clearly just what it is we recommend and why we recommend it.

First and foremost, we are impressed with the desirability of making this project a truly national advertisement, one that will do Canada credit and of which Canadians can be proud. Our military achievements in France have given the French people a very high opinion of us, have caused them to look upon us as a nation of great determination and resourcefulness. They have had proof of the fact that we excel in the arts of war; they are prepared to believe that we may be equally proficient in the arts of peace. The eagerness of their Government and of their great railway corporations to further the objects of our proposed exhibit in every possible way is a clear indication that they expect it will be an event of international importance, and that they are looking forward with pleasure to being participants in an undertaking that will inaugurate an era of closer trade relationships.

In the face of such a situation, to do anything less than our best would be ungracious and unwise,—ungracious because it would be a poor compliment to a warm-hearted but sensitive host, and unwise because it would be neglecting an opportunity for trade promotion such as may never be offered to us again.

Just in this connection I am prompted to offer the opinion that when the war of destruction is over and the war of construction begins, when the organized forces of the great nations focus their attention on the problem of economic recovery, there will be nothing but defeat for the smaller nation that places its reliance purely on defensive operations. Competition will force a pace that will leave no middle ground between success and failure. Success will be the reward of the nations that wage well planned and determined offensives; failure will be the fate of those that neglect to do so. Canada will issue from the struggle triumphant only according as she organizes for national team-work and shows aggressiveness and resourcefulness in profiting by her opportunities.

Recognizing as I am sure you do the obligations of your Government to the wage earners of this country, and to the soldiers who will return to us, all of whom may be called upon to face dark days unless vigorous efforts are put forth to ensure their welfare, I know you will be desirous of aiding every legitimate endeavour that promises to be a means of providing remunerative employment.

We look upon the proposal to put a Canadian exhibition on tour through France, and afterwards perhaps through other countries, as a form of national advertising from which splendid results for our working people may be expected, providing it is carried out at the proper time and in the proper manner. . . .

Without elaborating our proposition in greater detail, I think I have said enough to make it clear that an exhibition carried out on these lines would be of immensely more value to Canada from the standpoint of results, than one carried out on the more modest lines we first discussed.

I may say here, honourable gentlemen, that the first proposition was to send to France an exhibit of those products only which were sure to sell in France. The Canadian Manufacturers Association have thought it wise to enlarge it, making it a true miniature representation of all that Canada can produce—raw materials as well as manufactured goods. The memorandum continues:

It cannot be done cheaply, but we believe it can be done at a price that will look small when measured alongside the trade it will ultimately bring. There are a number of firms in Canada to-day that are spending upwards of $100,000 a year in advertising their products to the consumers of this Country. If they have demonstrated that such an expense for advertising can be justified by the results it brings them, surely it should not be out of the question for us as a nation to spend a similar amount in promoting trade with a country that is already bound to us by the ties of common sacrifice, and that will shortly be in the market for enormous quantities of goods of a kind we can supply her. Canada has more than once spent an equal, if not a larger amount on exhibition which did not hold out nearly as much hope of direct results, and at times, too, when she did not need the results as badly as she will need them when this war is over.

Honourable gentlemen, the method proposed is new in France. On this continent it has been tried with good results; but in France, apart from the sympathy that naturally goes out to Canada, there will be in favour of this project the great attraction of novelty. Let me tell you one thing, honourable gentlemen—that when this train, preceded by the Canadian flag, goes through every city in France, large or small, and when the crowds, by thousands and hundreds of thousands, gather to look at it, the eyes of the world, now riveted on France, will be focussed on that train. Hundreds of papers published in France, and circulating the world over, will tell the universe what Canada can produce and export, and how Canadian samples are received in France. I really believe that this is par excellence the occasion to advertise our goods in France, and I sincerely hope that, with the help—let me say the great help—and the sympathy and support of this honourable House, the Government will see its way clear to carry this project into effect; and, if it is done, it is my opinion, and the opinion of eminent business men who have examined the project, not one of whom has been unfavourable to it, that its results will be immensely profitable and will come at a time when we shall most require them. Why could we not specialize now in certain products that will be absolutely required by France after the war, and why could we not now prepare our numerous industries, at present engaged in the making of shells and other war materials, so that when peace comes we may have the wheels of industry going and may keep the wolf from the door of the workingmen, who, in times of peace as well as in times of war, have the right to turn not merely to the Government but to the Parliament of this country for the protection of their interests?

Hon. JOHN S. McLENNAN: I have much pleasure, honourable gentlemen, in seconding this motion; but I think the House will feel that there is no necessity for me to add anything to the eloquent and thorough statement which our honourable colleague has just made. It covers the ground perfectly. It has been expressed with extraordinary clearness, and, I think, embodies and recommends to the attention of this House and that of the Government a project which is concrete, which is practicable, and which will produce good results.

Hon. FREDERIC NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure and interest to the eloquent and instructive address of the honourable gentleman for Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien). I may say that I am heartily in accord with his suggestion; but it has occurred to me that possibly the mere exhibition train might not accomplish all the results that are expected unless incidental matters were dealt with concurrently; I mean such questions as those dealing with banking and credits and also providing for proper sales representatives. The honourable gentleman has, in a manner, stolen a good deal of my thunder; but he has spoken with so much eloquence—greater eloquence than I could hope to emulate—that I am sure his remarks will be remembered when the debate on my motion continues. I am heartily in accord with this proposition, and probably it would be wise to let it go to the Government as a separate motion. At the same time, I am convinced that such an effort would not be effective, or as effective as it would otherwise be, unless it were accompanied by such other efforts as would make the commercial enterprise a success. I would leave the question whether or not it should go before the Government as a separate motion entirely to the honourable gentleman from Montarville, because I think the project itself is a most excellent one. Personally, as a business man, I feel that the matter must be dealt with ultimately in conjunction with other matters of equal importance, in the way of credit and banking arrangements.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I suggested last year that the Government should send to Europe commercial agents to survey the ground and report. The Government, which was pressed on all sides, acted wisely in sending the commission which the honourable gentleman has mentioned. That commission was composed of business men of note, and we have to-day their report, which is quite interesting. I read the report hurriedly in order to see if there were not in it some things which would not be supported by this body of gentlemen, but I found that they were all of my own way of thinking.

One conclusion which they have come to is that Canada should advertise its goods. I am glad that it fell to the lot of an honourable member of this House to accompany them as the mouthpiece of Canada, being able to express his thoughts in both English and French, and to come back and lay before this country a practical scheme for carrying out what this body of business men suggested, but without outlining the method. I draw the attention of honourable gentlemen to the fact that the often-decried profession called "the Bar" has been able to produce one member of that commission who has brought back a very practical method of advertising Canadian goods in France. For the last fifty years we as a country have advertised our goods by means of exhibitions. Up to 1900 we did so in a very humble way. We subscribed money to the British Treasury for the right to appear in some of the annexes under the title of British colonies. In 1900 we decided to strike out for ourselves, and in Paris, in front of the Trocadéro, in one of the most important of the international exhibitions that have taken place during the last thirty years, we put up our pavilion and showed our own goods in an autonomous way under our own roof and our own colors. From that date it was decided that we should have a department, I think under the Minister of Agriculture, which would take care of our exhibits throughout the world. It has been my lot to attend half-a-dozen of those exhibitions in Europe since 1900, and I must give praise where it is due. From exhibition to exhibition and from year to year our staff has been able to make a display that has been not only a credit to Canada but an example to the world. There has hardly been an exhibition throughout Europe which I have attended during the last seventeen years in which the name Canada was not on the lips of every tourist and sightseer who attended it. I have seen tourists promenading through the different stores and pavilions in tens of thousands carrying in their hands the literature which announced and described the natural products and the industrial productions of Canada.

What has been the result of our participation in these exhibitions in Europe? I would like very much to have the opinion of men whose business it has been to follow the effects of those exhibitions. My own impression is that Canada has obtained from them a general advertisement as an agricultural country. One must not close his eyes to the fact that 95 per cent of the people in attendance at those exhibitions are tourists and sightseers, and the other 5 per cent are business men who examine the goods of the divers countries to see how they compare with their own goods, and to find out how they can meet the competition. Occasionally there may be purchasers, but it seems to me that all those exhibitions of Canadian goods throughout the world have not done away with the necessity of the manufacturers seeking personal contact with their customers. Manufacturers who have felt the need of invading foreign markets have been obliged to come in more direct contact with the purchasing public. Large corporations have done so by establishing agencies abroad. This is a costly method, and only the few can afford the expense.

The honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) suggests that we now apply in the foreign markets the same methods as govern domestic commerce. We all know that for a number of years manufacturers and wholesalers have sold their goods throughout the land by means of commercial travellers, who carry their samples from town to town, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The honourable gentleman suggests that the Federal Government intervene and furnish the Canadian manufacturers and producers with an opportunity of bringing their goods direct to the purchaser, from town to town and from village to village, in France. Let the samples be carefully chosen, and let the train contain primarily what we expect the French purchaser will absorb; let every group of articles exhibited be in charge of an agent who will be able to explain it to the French public, and we shall then have brought our goods into direct contact with the purchasers within the four corners of France. It seems to me that if in the domestic market it has been found necessary to bring to the door of the consumer the articles that we produce, it is a hundred times more important that it should be done in a foreign market, because when we reach the foreigner we must dispel his fears and suspicions.

What are the difficulties to be encountered? They are very numerous. There is, first, the question of language; there is the difference in money; there is the rate of exchange; there is the difference in weights and measures; there is the question of customs duties; and there is the question, which is most important, of the value of the goods for customs entry, that of freight, and insurance. There is the possibility of damage in transit; there is the delivery of the goods, or delay in delivery, the question of payment, and the banking arrangements. All these questions arise in the mind of the would-be purchaser when he is offered an article that comes from a foreign land. These matters have to be adjusted before he will decide to place an order three thousand miles away. The ground can only be broken by that personal contact which will enable the seller to brush aside all these difficulties. As I have said, the individual could go about or send his agents to foreign lands; but we can see what an army of agents this would necessitate if the individual producers in Canada sent agents to France as they are now sent to Winnipeg or British Columbia. The cost would be enormous, and it would be left to the few to exhibit their goods.

It is needless to dilate upon the advantage of extending our trade relations. As my honourable friend has said, there are to-day 300,000 men making munitions who will have to do something else when the war is over; there are 300,000 men coming back. Let us assume that there are half a million men to be provided for when the war ceases. It seems to me that now is the time to obtain new markets abroad, because the needs of Europe are apparent, as well as the needs of an increased industrial production in Canada. In France we have advantages over the United States at the present time. We have obtained through two treaties—the first negotiated in 1893 by Sir Charles Tupper, and the second in 1907 by the Hon. Mr. Fielding and Hon. Mr. Brodeur—a constantly increasing list of things that can be exchanged between the two countries on the minimum tariff list. The enemy powers will be further handicapped because there will be, not only the general tariff, but very likely a surtax, against their goods. I do not express that as a wish, but simply as a state of things which may exist. There will be a great determination on the part of the French people to see that none of their purchases come from the other side of the Rhine. If by helping such a scheme as is now proposed to us the Government opens the way to the Canadian Manufacturers Association to make a proper display in France, I hope that the association will study the list of things which Germany and Austria furnished to France prior to 1914, in order to make the necessary effort to replace those goods with Canadian goods. As my honourable friend has stated, his suggestion is not new in Canada, but it is new in Europe. It will be very successful, and for advertising purposes its effect will extend much beyond the frontiers of France, and I am convinced that we in Canada shall derive considerable benefit from it. On our side, we shall have to make an effort to replace with French goods the things which we used to buy from Germany; I refer, of course, to articles that we do not produce ourselves.

I have on many occasions crossed the Atlantic, from Canada to Liverpool, or from New York to Havre, in the company of Canadian agents who were making their annual trip to Leipzig—sometimes they went two or three times a year—to place orders for German goods. I sincerely hope that these annual trips to Leipzig have ceased for a long time to come, and that our commercial agents who represent the wholesale and departmental houses will look to Lyons and Bordeaux for the filling of their orders. Last year France decided to try to replace the exhibit of samples held in Leipzig by the Foires d'Echantillons—two exhibitions—one held in the spring at Lyons and the other in September at Bordeaux, where our agents will have an opportunity to see samples of all the goods which they otherwise would have to travel all through France to purchase. I find in the report of the Special Trade Commission distributed to us to-day a chapter which speaks of these Lyons and Bordeaux fairs:

The advantages to exhibitors suggested by those having experience are:

(1) The exhibitor is enabled to meet buyers from all over France and from neighbouring countries without having to undergo great travelling expenses and without waste of time.

(2) An excellent opportunity is offered of getting in a short time an insight into the business methods of the people whom the exhibitor meets and he is also enabled to get information about the goods offered by his competitors.

(3) The exhibitor is placed in the favourable position of having the buyer "come to him" instead of having to approach the buyer.

The plan suggested by the resolution on the Order Paper will afford an opportunity of supplementing these fairs by direct visits from town to town and from city to city throughout the whole of France. Much of the trade between France and Canada has been done through commission agents situated in New York and in London. They have taken their commission; it has increased the cost and has been an impediment in the way of a freer exchange. Now we shall have the advantage, if we can succeed in placing our orders in France, of helping to diminish the cost of our own goods by creating a return trade and diminishing the cost of transportation on both sides.

I had some misgivings when this scheme was propounded to me, as to the proper display which could be made of our goods in such a small compass as a freight car. The system to be adopted has been explained to me more in detail. I will not go into it. According to a suggestion made by the representative of the Manufacturers Association, cars should be built specially for the purpose of exhibiting our goods; they should be built of Canadian wood, in our own shops, and the Manufacturers Association suggests that after the train has gone through France, it be made a gift to the French Government. Whether this suggestion be accepted or not, if the train is specially adapted for exhibition purposes, made up with cars having sides which can be opened as the train comes into the station. I have no doubt that a splendid display can be made, to the very great advantage of Canada and Canadian goods, especially when I remember the ability displayed by our exhibition staff, headed by Col. Hutcheson.

In closing, I would suggest that an old idea, which has often been mooted—the idea of opening a sample room in Paris in which to exhibit Canadian goods—should be taken up again, and that these sample goods, after they have been shown all over France, should be placed in a central sample room in Paris for permanent exhibition.

I must congratulate my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) upon his splendid idea of developing the proposed scheme, and upon the activity and energy he has displayed in approaching so many of the public bodies of France, such as the chambers of commerce and the railway companies, in order to obtain their co-operation. Before taking my seat I must join with him in stating that I have had occasion personally to notice the good and patriotic work done by the Hon. Philippe Roy, who, hailing from Edmonton, formerly had a seat in this Chamber, and that we are very fortunate in having chosen him as the representative of Canada in Paris.

Hon. A. B. CROSBY: Honourable gentlemen, I rise, not for the purpose of making a speech on the subject which is before us, for I am not prepared to do that, but for the purpose of congratulating the honourable gentleman who introduced this resolution (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) upon the very eloquent, able, and logical manner in which he has put the proposal before the Senate. With regard to what has been said by the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) as to exchange, insurance, and other matters of that kind, I desire to say that these are all covered. When our goods go into France we go for exchange to the London market, which governs everything that goes across the Atlantic. That has been the case in the past and will be the case in the future. We are going to seek in France a place which will be held no more by our enemies. After this war there will be no German goods and no Austrian goods in France. The goods must come from somewhere, and we are going to send our goods to France. It is not a new market. It is an old market; but, as has been stated by my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Beaubien), France had to open her market to Germany, and was dominated by the Germans to a very large extent. I say that condition is ended, and ended permanently, and we may enter that market without any interference from Germany, though we may have to meet competition from the country to the south of us and perhaps from competitors in Europe. We now have the opportunity of our lives, an opportunity more favourable than was ever open to us before. As has been well said by the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), the Dominion of Canada has tried to make arrangements with France. The late Sir Charles Tupper was, I think, particularly anxious to do so, as was also the late Government, represented by Mr. Fielding and Mr. Brodeur. Everybody knew that France afforded an excellent market in which to do business. As my honourable friend has well said, the French are a people to be trusted, and they were trusted in every part of the world, just as Britain is trusted. The finances of France were never questioned. France was therefore a market which was generally sought. There is not a man who has been in the export business but was delighted when he was able to do business with France.

My honourable friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) referred to his own motion. I desire to say a word or two with regard to that, having some interest in matters of foreign trade. That is a motion of great importance, but it is very different from the proposal now before us. We have no opportunity of sending goods to South America, either on the Atlantic or the Pacific coast, and we have never had any opportunity of trading with Africa, either on the eastern or the western coast. It is high time that the Government of Canada, however it may be composed, did something to assist the trade of Canada. The business men of this country are entitled to a great deal of credit. The part that Canada has taken in the present war has been a surprise to the world; but it is still more surprising to the world that the manufacturers of Canada should in a short time, in spite of all the difficulties they had to encounter, succeed so well as they have done without any assistance whatever.

It behooves every honourable gentleman in this House to do all in his power to impress upon the Government the necessity of helping our manufacturers and our exporters to place their goods in foreign markets. Our country is not so rich, nor so great, nor so old as the country to the south of us. But we have the men, the energy, and the pluck; and if our men are given the opportunity and a little assistance, they will do the rest. Let us have this excellent exhibition, which will effectually demonstrate the products of Canada in the old land of France, and then let our manufacturers follow up this effort with their agents, and I am sure, from what they have shown us they have been able to do in the past, that they will make the enterprise a success. As has been so well said by my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) in his eloquent address, you will find that the arms of the French people are open to us. The French people are asking for us. Where outside of France is the French language spoken as much as in Canada? In this country the French language is an official language, and that gives us some claim upon the people of France. But we have made good our claim, beyond the shadow of a doubt, by the fact that we have sent the best of our citizens to stand with them and fight for their land as well as our own. Therefore I say this is an excellent opportunity for us and now is the time for us to say to the Government, "Come forward and give us a helping hand." The Government should help the manufacturer, whom we sometimes treat with very little respect. There are times, honourable gentlemen, when the manufacturer is entitled to some consideration. I feel confident that the proposition which has been brought before us to-day, if handled in the way in which the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) has so logically and eloquently set forth, will result in the greatest possible success.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: I have listened wih a great deal of interest to the speech of my honourable friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien), and I am sure we are very much indebted to him for bringing this matter before the House in so eloquent a manner. The question is one of great interest to the country at the present time, and I feel that no time should be lost in making known to the people of France the products of Canada, as well as making known to the people of Canada what France can produce. My honourable friend referred to the natural resources of Canada as those that appeal to the people of France at the present time. I hope that every opportunity will be taken by the manufacturers to demonstrate to the people of France the natural resources of Canada. Sometimes we think that the manufacturers consider only their own concerns and are inclined to leave out of consideration the other interests of the country; but I am sure that, if an exhibition train is made up in France in the way proposed by my honourable friend, the natural resources of Canada will receive proper consideration.

In considering this motion, I was much interested in looking up the question of the trade that has been done in the past between Canada and France. The figures of that trade for the year 1913, as compared with those for the year 1916, were to me very interesting. I found that for the year 1913 the imports from France for consumption in Canada amounted to some $15,000,000, while the exports from Canada to France amounted to only two and a half millions. Coming to the year 1916, I found that the imports into Canada from France were nearly $6,000,000, while the exports from Canada to France amounted to $36,000,000. It is to be hoped, in the interest of Canada, that we shall be able to keep up our exports to that extent after the war is over. Of course, we must assume that a large portion of those exports are due to the munitions that are being made in Canada at the present time; therefore it is all the more necessary that we should be advertising to the people of France the goods with which we can supply them, in order that we may, instead of reducing those exports when the war is over, increase their volume as the years go on; and I am sure that all of us hope and expect that we shall be able to buy a great deal more from France after the war is over, to replace the goods which, previous to the war, we had been bringing into this country from other parts of Europe. The tendency of all is, of course, to buy in the cheapest market, and I presume that the questions of treaties of trade and of tariffs will play a very important part when this war is over, and that some arrangement may possibly be made which will have the effect of increasing the trade between these two countries. I congratulate my honourable friend on the way in which he has laid the matter before this Chamber.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: I desire to add a word of congratulation to the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) on the manner in which he has presented his motion. He has made a very important suggestion, a suggestion which should appeal to the Government and to the country at large, and my object in rising is to entreat the Government not to turn a deaf ear to the appeal of the honourable gentleman. His scheme has been admirably prepared and is strongly supported by the Canadian Manufacturers Association. My only regret is that the honourable gentleman, in referring to the very able letter from Mr. Murray, the secretary, I believe, of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, and which I had the privilege of perusing, has not read more copious extracts from the document, because it is worth being printed in full, it is so well written and supports so ably the scheme of the honourable gentleman.

The idea of an exhibition of this kind should commend itself to the Government, because the present time is very opportune for such a display, owing to the strong sympathy which the French people have for Canada by reason of the generous contribution which this country has made to the Allies, and especially to France, in men and in money. And I should hope that the exhibition would not be confined to France, but would be extended to Switzerland and to Italy; it might, indeed, be extended to England itself. This country would surely derive very great benefit from an exhibition of that kind.

What we want nowadays is to give an object lesson—to bring the product or the commodity to the consumer himself and let him see what he can buy, and on what conditions and with what advantage he can buy it. Advertisements of that kind are much more profitable than advertisements in the newspapers; and, when hundreds of thousands of dollars are spent profitably in newspaper advertising, it seems to me that it is beyond question that advertisement by means of an exhibition, as suggested, would bring a large return to Canada.

All who have had occasion to visit France must have been impressed by the fact that the products of this country are not known although they are sometimes sold. As a rule, they are known as American products. For instance, Cheddar cheese is sold in France as a product of the United States or England. When one travels in France he finds that the people of that country have no idea of the geography of this country. By reason of its wealth and large industries, they think that everything coming from this country comes from the United States. An exhibition of the kind suggested would be the best means of bringing home to the French people the knowledge that the United States is not the only country on this continent, but that Canada is a country with which they could advantageously trade. It would have the effect not only of establishing commercial relations but of encouraging immigration to this country, because of the knowledge they would gain of the resources of this country; and everyone will admit that we shall need immigrants very badly after the war.

For these reasons I hope that the suggestions of the honourable member from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) will receive the support of the Government, and that some action will be taken as soon as possible.

Hon. JOHN MILNE: I have listened very carefully to the discussion, and have followed it with a great deal of interest. Conditions in Canada to-day are not what they were some time ago. Conditions in France probably offer some inducements which were not offered before; but Canadian manufacturers have sent goods to France before this and have got no returns. My firm sent an exhibition of scales to Paris probably twenty years ago, and all they received in return were some medals. We have a great deal of competition in Canada, and I do not think that this is a good time to prepare for foreign trade, because, in the matter of skilled labour, conditions in Canada to-day are very hard to contend with. My firm, I know, has had to take travellers off the road; they cannot possibly make the goods because they are unable to get the necessary labour. I do not think that any manufacturing concern in Canada could compete with European labour at the present time. Pig iron to-day is quoted at $60 a ton. I can remember when I was managing a blast furnace it used to sell for $15 a ton. Wages have tripled in the last six months. We pay $4.50 for labour which, working by the day, does about half what it did before. If a man working by the piece cannot make $6 a day, he will not work at all. At the present time you cannot get labour or material at rates to enable you to compete successfully in the foreign market.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Has not the foreign market shown the same increase in wages?

Hon. Mr. MILNE: Not so much. As I have said before in this House, the international unions control the rates of wages of the United States and Canada, and wages in Canada are as high as they are in the United States. We have to compete with the United States, and we have no markets compared with theirs. We need immigration more than anything else. We have a very sparsely populated country as our market, and the American people have a part of that market. In France we will find the same condition of affairs. Americans will sell goods there in as large quantities as Canadians will. The whole question comes down to price: we all want to buy in the cheapest market. I have listened to the discussion very carefully, but I do not see how we can prepare ourselves to compete in manufactured goods in a foreign market. The question of natural products is an entirely different matter. It takes a lot of money to carry out these things; private capital is necessary. The Government has to have money; it has to take care of soldiers and their dependents, and will require more money all the time. This means that at the present time we cannot take up the question as we shall after the war, when we shall have some chance of getting men to fill up our factories and help to reduce the cost of manufacturing. One honourable gentleman said that the Government should give bounties. The Government can give bounties, as they did in the case of iron smelters. If there had been no bounties given at that time, there would be no smelters in Canada at the present time. We succeeded in getting the capital raised before a wheel was turned, and it was mostly Canadian capital at that; but, if it had not been for the bounties given by Sir John Macdonald at the request of the iron manufacturers of Canada, what would have been the result? It is fortunate that bounties were given to the smelting industry, because if they had not been given it would have been impossible to manufacture shells in Canada at the present time, because steel could not be purchased from the United States for that purpose. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power, Hon. Mr. Fielding, the Minister of Finance, said, "That is all right, but we will cut the duty in two." The duty at that time was $4.80, and he cut it down to $2.40, which is the duty now as against $7 in the United States. The Government said that bounties were all right, but that they would put them on a sliding scale; and after about five years there was no bounty, and $2.40 less duty. In 1913 and 1914 the smelting works could not pay dividends on the preferred stock. It is only since 1915 that they have been able to do so, which shows conclusively that a bounty is all right; but when it is taken off it leaves things in a worse condition than they were in before. At the present time, even if the Government were ever so willing to do so, it will not have the money to pay bounties. When it wants 25 or 50 or 75 per cent of profits in excess of 7 per cent it must have the money. Seven per cent is enough profit at the present time. My honourable friend talked about bounties and spoke of starting dye works and such things, but people who have money and are getting 7 per cent for it are not going to put it into something uncertain. It is better to keep the money where it is. There are many American manufacturers in Canada, and we are glad to have them here; it is owing to the tariff that they are here, because it is cheaper to manufacture here than to manufacture in the United States and pay the duty. I am a manufacturer and know that conditions in the factories at the present time are extraordinary. You cannot get people to work for you, because they can make more money in munition factories than in commercial industries.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, as this resolution suggests the assumption of a certain amount of responsibility by the Government, I may be permitted to say a word or two as to the relations of the Government to trade transactions and particularly to the extension of trade in foreign markets. Before saying anything on the subject, I desire to congratulate my honourable friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) on his interesting and excellent and eloquent speech. It is apparent that he has given this matter very careful consideration, and both the House and the country are indebted to him for the information which he has given us, which will, I have no doubt, excite a great deal of public interest, resulting, I hope, in a satisfactory conclusion.

However, there must necessarily be a limitation as to the extent to which the Government, either of this country or of any other country, can participate in promoting trade, particularly with foreign countries. It is regrettable that our trade relations with France do not represent a greater volume than would appear, not only from the blue-books, but from actual fact. The question naturally arises whether trade can be fostered by artificial means to such an extent as to create a volume that would be valuable to any country when brought about by that means. It seems to me that trade must be developed more or less through natural channels. It cannot be developed if there are not the natural factors for its development. I am not advancing this consideration with a view to disparaging in the slightest degree the various steps that are being taken to induce the Government to assist in the promotion of trade; but we in Canada, to a greater extent probably than any other country, have come to rely upon the assistance of the Government in developing, not only our trade industries, but the various public enterprises and undertakings of the nation. A railway cannot be built in Canada without the Government practically building it; scarcely any transportation scheme can be carried to a successful conclusion without the assumption of almost the entire responsibility by the Government. If a pier or a dock has to be constructed the Government has to do it. This, of course, contributes very largely to the development of our trade and all our commercial interests, but at the same time it very largely robs our people of the opportunity of exercising that initiative and that personal energy, effort, and confidence in themselves that they otherwise would exercise. The Governments of Canada—and this is not confined to the present Government—have, I think, to as great an extent as would be justified in the public interest, assisted not only in the development of our resources, but in the expansion of our trade, both domestic and foreign. No means has been neglected of advertising, not only to the people of Canada, not only to the people of this continent, but to the people of Europe and even to the people of Asia the possibilities of Canada, in order to develop our interests and to enlarge our markets. My honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has pointed out very effectively, I think, the results of the various exhibitions in which Canada has participated for many years, and in which our exhibits have not only upheld the honour of Canada, but in most cases have exceeded those of any other country. I think that foreign countries have to admit that our exhibits, by way of advertising our resources, have been superior to any other exhibits that have participated in these exhibitions.

Even the mission to which my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) has referred, and of which he was a valued member, is another indication of the desire on the part of the Government of Canada to advertise to the people of foreign countries what we are capable of doing. That mission proceeded to France, and I have full confidence that the results of its work will be satisfactory.

There is no question as to the desirability of our developing our markets; but the question arises—and it is a purely economic question, it seems to me—whether we can best develop our markets in this particular way. I do not think there is a people in the world possessing greater energy and enterprise than the people of Canada; but our possibilities are latent until the people become aware of them and are thrown upon their own resources. Let me cite as an illustration of this development in the manufacture of munitions which has taken place since the war began. Immediately prior to the war, if you had asked the manufacturers of Canada whether they could enter upon the gigantic undertakings which they afterwards so successfully assumed, they would have said no; they would have said at once, "We must have the assistance of the Government of Canada in the development of this particular industry." But they were immediately thrown upon their own resources, and there were no people, either in Europe or in America, who at that crucial time responded better than the manufacturers of Canada in the production of munitions, and to-day it stands to the credit of the enterprise of our people that they had such confidence in their own resources. I mention this simply as illustrating this very important economic fact, that immediately the people are thrown upon their own responsibility, upon their own resources, and recognize that an undertaking must be carried on by themselves, they will do it, and do it more successfully than could all the governments behind them.

We have in Canada the Manufacturers Association, comprising all our great manufacturers, one of the most representative bodies of the country. We have in every city of Canada boards of trade or chambers of commerce, representing the trade interests. Therefore, it seems to me that if there are great possibilities to be attained, such as my honourable friend has pointed out—and I have no doubt of the possibilities, the probabilities, which await proper attention— those organizations can carry out the object in view far more successfully than could be done by the Government itself. There is no more ponderous or cumbersome machinery for the purpose of assisting trade, or assisting private enterprises, than the government of any country. It is made up of so many elements that it is, in my judgment, absolutely ineffective in carrying out the purposes in view; and, if the manufacturers and trade interests of this country rely in all instances upon the Government to carry out the objects which they wish to attain, or to give them the incentive in the first place, and thus relieve them of the necessity of exercising that initiative which they themselves should exercise, I think it will be disastrous to the interests of the country.

I make these few suggestions, not for the purpose of disparaging or minimizing in any way the efforts which are made to induce the Government to identify itself with all these important subjects, but rather with a view to suggesting that it is impossible for the Government in all these matters to give the attention and the assistance which are desired and suggested by trade and commercial bodies. I can assure my honourable friend who has brought up this subject that I shall be only too glad to direct the attention of the Government, not only to the valuable information which he has given us, but also to the interest which has been taken by this Chamber in the recommendation that the Government should assume the measure of responsibility which he has urged, in connection with the proposal which he has so fitly made.

Hon. GEORGE GORDON: I also wish to congratulate the mover of this resolution. Like the rest of the House I feel that he has given us a great deal of information which is very valuable and which we all appreciate. One thing that the honourable gentleman said in the course of his remarks was that the people of France knew very little about the natural resources which this country possesses. He instanced nickel, asbestos, and some other minerals, also lumber and pulp. I would just like to point out to my honourable friend that, so far as these raw materials are concerned, he should not be at all uneasy in his mind. It is for the people who are dealing in these commodities to get them to France as quickly as they can after this was is over. There is, to my mind, only one thing that the Government can do to help the situation and give Canadian products the best possible advertisement. It would be very much better than any exhibition that can be sent over from Canada to France, to have as many ships as possible ready at the conclusion of this war and to provide in France storage accommodation to which Canadian products could be sent. There will be a market for them in France, no matter what quantities or what kinds of materials are sent over. The French people must have them, they will get them, and they will pay for them. If that is done, I think it will be the best advertising scheme that can be devised. And I feel that matters of that description cannot be shouldered upon the Government. If we, the people of Canada, do not exert ourselves and put forth great efforts on our own behalf, we cannot expect to get results. Nor can we expect the Government to do all. They cannot do it. I would therefore ask my honourable friend to let his mind rest easy in that respect. If there is any way in which the Government can possibly render assistance in carrying Canadian goods to France immediately after the war is over, we do not need to wait to find out anything about exchange, or what we are going to get for our product in France. That will all be found out in due time. The French people will be only too ready and willing to purchase everything that we can send them at reasonable prices.

The question of manufactured goods is a different matter altogether. While the demand for manufactured goods in France, after the war, will immediately be just as great perhaps as for raw materials, it will be a question of who is going to get there first, and more a question of price. The point that manufacturers should consider is how best to get their machinery into position and have it ready to supply that market. The manufacturer should not wait to find out by means of these exhibitions what is going to be required of him. If he is awake, he will send his men over to France now, and find out what is going to be wanted that he can manufacture, and will take his chances on being ready when the war is over. That is the only means by which good results may be obtained. If our manufacturers do not do that, but wait until all the countries which are nearer to France get into the game and get their manufactures there ahead of ours, then we shall be the losers and they will be the gainers. So I hope the manufacturers of this country will not lie back and expect to get from the Government something which they will not get from this Government and will never get from any other, but that they will organize and find out what is wanted in France, and will then secure large warehouses for accommodation, and get into the French market as soon as possible the products which they know are going to be required there. If they do that it will mean that our country's products will be extensively advertised; and if they have been manufactured properly, and if we are able to manufacture them as cheaply as or more cheaply than they can be manufactured elsewhere, we shall retain our trade with France. Otherwise we shall not be able to hold that trade. It will be a case of the survival of the fittest in that respect.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN: I have just one word to add, and it is not in regard to the merits of the resolution now before the House, but it is in regard to the credit that the honourable the leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) deserves from this honourable House and the credit which, when his remarks are published, will, I believe, be given him by the people of this country. So far as I have observed, in my thirty-five years of political experience, he is the first statesman in a responsible position to tell the manufacturing interests of this country, the railway interests, and the trade and commercial interests, in a manly way, that if they want to make progress they should stand on their own feet and should not be bottle-fed by the different Governments. I congratulate him on that manly, straightforward statement. I think he will have the endorsation of nine-tenths of the people of this country. The bottle-feeding of trade or commercial interests must be discontinued. Too much of the wealth of this country has gone, I will not say into the building of railroads, but into the pockets of railroad speculators. Too much of the money of this country has gone into the pockets, not of the labourers in the factory, but into the pockets of the privileged classes. The honourable the leader of the Government in this House has dared to state these facts in connection with this resolution. I admire him for his courage. I admire him for putting the people on their guard—and for putting any Government, Liberal, Tory, Nationalist, or any other, on guard—against what I call the bottle-feeding of industries. That does not mean that the Government of the day is not to give all the assistance possible on the basis of fair play to the producer and the consumer in this country; but the producer and the consumer in this country must not be burdened for the sake of foreign markets. That is the essence of political economy. The honourable leader of the Government, in his declaration of the true principles of political economy, will have the endorsation not only of this honourable House but of his fellow-citizens throughout the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Honourable gentlemen, it is my privilege, I understand, to close the debate. I will do so very briefly. I desire to thank the honourable gentlemen, especially the two leaders, who have made such kind remarks with regard to this project. I thank especially those who have offered their criticism. I know very well that they have criticised in the interest of the project, and especially in the interest of the country. I may be wrong, but I think that, although we may seem to be in opposition, we are absolutely in accord.

My honourable friend from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Milne) has stated, and very rightly, that normal conditions do not obtain—that we cannot get men, that labour is at abnormal prices, and that material is at prices absolutely unknown up to the present time; and he asks, how can we now attempt to get foreign trade? Honourable gentlemen, it is exactly because present conditions are abnormal and because abnormal conditions of a directly opposite kind are likely to prevail after the war that we must now prepare. At the present time we have too much work to do, and, owing to the number of our men overseas, labouring men are too scarce.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They will be scarcer.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: But when all these men return home they will have nothing to do unless we prepare now for their return. I claim that, because normal conditions do not obtain at present, because labour is high in price, and material is at impossible prices, it is not fair to say to the manufacturer: "You are busy at home; you have more than you can do; most of you are working for the country, preparing shells and other war material. Notwithstanding it all, you shall go across to France and on your own private initiative prepare the market of a whole country. It is neither fair nor possible. I agree with my honourable leader that business must rest first upon personal initiative; but this time of stress is no time to ask that personal initiative should do more than it has been asked to do in the years gone by, when normal conditions obtained, when you had labour at ordinary prices, when people were not too busy, and when half of their staff had not gone to the war, leaving the other half to work eighteen hours a day in order to supply war materials. Were private interests then asked to take charge of a national exhibition in other countries? No, Sir, they were not. Why? Because this is a matter that concerns the people as a whole; it does not concern only one man or any group of men.

What has been spent during the period of this war on the San Francisco Exhibition? $500,000 and more! Never did Canada have better advertising. People have gone from that exhibition to all parts of the United States more appreciative of what the Canadian people are, and what they can do, than ever before. What was done at Bruges before that? An exhibit was sent there which became the talk of all Europe. Is it to be regretted? No. At San Francisco during war time $500,000 was spent; at Bruges, in ordinary times, over $100,000 was spent; therefore in and out of war the Government has thought that this matter was the duty of the nation, and not of private individuals.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I think I need say no more; but, if I require other voices to plead for me, I have them at my call. I have the very greatest respect for what the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Milne) has said. He went over to Paris with scales and came back with medals. Well did he deserve them. My contention is, not that we can sell scales there, but that there are a great many wares which we could have sold before but which we did not. We did not make the effort. There are a great many things which we did not sell before but which we may sell now because conditions are altered. There were goods supplied under conditions which do not exist now. There are times when trade goes on by itself, and everybody is fed and grows fat on it, and there are lean days, hungry days, when people must exert themselves if they want to keep the nation alive; and those days are coming. May I ask my honourable colleague to remember the speeches of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who went from one ocean to the other preaching the gospel of extended trade relations, saying to four hundred business men in Montreal: "Didn't" we fall into war without preparation? Let us not go back to peace without preparation." In the one case what did we meet? We nearly met disaster. In the other case what shall we meet? We shall surely meet disaster if we are not prepared. All I want to do is to follow in the footsteps of the Minister of Trade and Commerce; and, if there are business men in this House whose voices should be heard before mine I am going to ask the hundreds of important business men who form the Canadian Manufacturers Association to rise up and answer for themselves. I have read their answer, and it seems to me conclusive. How long will it take private initiative in every line of business in which we have an opening in France to send its representatives to that country? How long would it take my honourable friend and his men to cover the ground? How long would it take him to go through the cities of France and gain the confidence of the people? It would take years to do it. How much money would it cost? Let my honourable friend figure that out and ponder on it. If this suggestion is carried out representatives of this country will go in preceded by the Canadian flag, and with the prestige of this country behind them, and within three months, the work will be accomplished. Three months and practically no expense! They will be in contact with every merchant in France, who will come and meet them, and open their books and their hearts to them, and say: "We want goods from Canada; there is our sample; take it home and prepare, and when the time comes I will buy from you.'

This question is well worth while. To put it in two words, the scheme is this: I want a peddler who will represent the nation to go to France with his pack on his back. The French people are ready to receive him. The Government has simply to help him make his pack, that is all. It will cost the Government a very petty amount compared with the trade which will result. I would like that peddler to be accredited to the Government by the Senate of Canada. I would be glad to see this resolution passed, so that it could be said to the Government: "This is in line with your policy as proclaimed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce; you will do well to accept this proposition; it will cost you little; the business men of this country favour it. You can accomplish in a very short time what otherwise it would take years and an immense amount of wealth to do."

I hope that this resolution will be placed in the strong and skilful hands of my honourable leader, and will find a kind and generous reception at the hands of the Government. My honourable leader may perhaps be able to accomplish in ten minutes what I have been incapable of doing in ten months of hard work, with the active co-operation of a very large portion of the brain and influence of the industrial and commercial community. What was done in three weeks in France has, I am sorry to say, not yet been accomplished after ten months in Canada.

RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS OF OVERSEAS FORCES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FARRELL inquired of the Government:

1. Has a record been kept of the religious preference of the men enlisted for overseas service?
2. If such a record has been kept, has it been tabulated?
3. And if so, what are the numbers given of each denomination?
4. Have the numbers been published or given to the press or to any person?

The inquiry was agreed to as an order for a return.

RECRUITS REJECTED, DISCHARGED, OR DESERTED.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN inquired of the Government:

1. How many officers and men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force have been classed as unfit for military service?
2. Have the military authorities given consideration to the possibility of utilizing the services of these men in a secondary capacity?
3. Do those who have been classed as unfit continue to draw military pay?
4. How many have deserted from the various units between 1st October, 1914, and 1st June, 1917?
5. How many have been discharged from the various units since 1st October, 1914?

He said: In view of the explanation given by the honourable the leader of the Government in regard to a previous question, which applies also to my own question, I accept his suggestion that the inquiry be changed to an order for a return of the information asked for. I hope the honourable gentleman will bring down the information as soon as possible—that he will tell the department to hurry.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will inform the department that the honourable gentleman from Victoria desires the return to be hurried, and I will see that it is brought down at an early date.

The inquiry was agreed to as an order for a return.

BUSINESS PROFITS WAR TAX.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a return of the assessments made under Chapter 11 of the Statutes of 1916, The Business Profits War Tax Act, together with any regulations made by the minister in relation to collection and enforcement of tax.

He said: I do not want to ask for a return which would contain too much private information. I do not think a return of this kind has yet been brought down to either House. I would suggest that the information that would be of value to the House and to the country can be brought down without disclosing any private information that it might not be advisable to make public.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSERVATION OF CANADIAN TRADE.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE.

The Senate resumed from June 22 consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Nicholls:

That, in the opinion of this honourable House, it is expedient to appoint a committee to inquire into and report upon the best method or methods of conserving and increasing our domestic and overseas trade, to the end that our present prosperity may not unduly suffer when the stimulus resulting from orders for munitions and other war supplies is removed; and that the said committee be composed of the Honourable Messieurs Beaubien, Edwards, McLennan, Dandurand, Gillmor, and the mover.

Hon. Mr. McCALL: In moving the adjournment of the debate on the resolution before the House it was my intention to make some observations and to express my concurrence in the proposal; but the debate of yesterday, in which many able speeches were delivered on a resolution which has a similar object in view, has rendered any efforts of mine quite unnecessary. I content myself merely with saying that the motion has my hearty concurrence, and I hope that the people of Canada will make the most of the opportunities that will be offered to them when the war is over, in every line of production. I will not take the time of the House in saying anything further.

Hon. JOHN S. McLENNAN: I intend to follow the excellent example of the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat in not making any extended remarks on this subject. I think the House and the country are seized of the necessity of our preparing for the conditions which shall await us after the war. What those conditions will be no one can exactly foretell. One thing is certain: we are inclined to dwell, and we dwell rightly, on the advance that Canada has made in being able to grapple with great industrial problems, to carry out great enterprises, to work to a standard of precision, such as was not dreamed of in the early part of 1914. Heartened by a knowledge of our great resources—as to which I differ, possibly, with one honourable gentleman who has spoken on this subject—we are apt to consider what headway we might make in competition with the other people who will be engaged in seeking the trade of the world. In this respect we are inclined to measure our country against the Europe of the early part of 1914. But we shall not be competing with such a Europe as that; we shall be competing with a Europe, and with the United States, which have made prodigious strides in production. The honourable senator (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) who yesterday afternoon described so eloquently his trip to France, referred to Grenoble, a place usually associated in our minds with the most excellent walnuts and with equally excellent gloves; but to-day that town, from the mountain streams which encircle it, is drawing electric power which enables it to manufacture munitions of war on an extensive scale. In France, as in England, there are, I suppose, literally thousands of square miles covered with factories and yards engaged in similar production. We have been told by persons who have recently visited England that British producers, by means of greatly improved machinery, infinitely greater skill, and a vastly increased number of trained workers, propose to alleviate the burden which this war will throw upon them by production on a scale such as the world has never seen. The United States, as we all know, have made equal strides in production. So that the industrial battle which will await us after the war will be just as important, just as great, and just as keen as the terrible conflict which is now going on. It will be a battle of Titans. But, as in this war Canada has done great things and has won great renown, so I believe, in the industrial war which will follow, if we are true to ourselves, Canada will again hold her own. What are the qualities which have made for our success in this war? Courage, self-reliance, inventiveness, the readiness of each man to do his own share and to stand shoulder to shoulder with his comrades, which is the equivalent of industrial co-operation—these are the qualities which our men have pre-eminently displayed in France and Flanders; and if when they return to us they display those same qualities, I feel sure, notwithstanding the difficult industrial and economic conditions which await us, that results will follow equal to those that have already been attained by our men at the front. But this question has already been fully dealt with. I think we are all seized of the fact that the proposed committee, of which I shall have the honour of being a member, if it is formed, will be the proper place in which to deal with the various questions on which we hope to make a fruitful report. I would suggest, however, if in order, that, as the staple production of this country is grain, the name of Hon. Senator Richardson be added to the committee.

Hon. FREDERIC NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, if there are no further speakers on this question, I shall rise to close the debate. In doing so, I desire to express my great satisfaction at the manner in which this debate has been carried on and at the views expressed, which will no doubt be helpful, not only to the committee, but to those in the country who shall have the opportunity of reading it.

I was at somewhat of a disadvantage yesterday in rising to discuss the resolution presented by my honourable friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien), because, while his proposal was one of the utmost merit, and while he presented incontrovertible arguments in favour of it, I felt then, and I still feel, that the exhibition train alone, valuable as it will be, will not be of as great value as it might be if it were supplemented by some method of following up the trade that might be induced by curiosity. The honourable gentleman read a letter from the Canadian Manufacturers Association, which dealt rather widely with the subject. I now take the liberty of reading a short resolution passed at the annual convention of the Canadian Manufacturers Association a week or so subsequent to the introduction of my resolution in this House. That resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, that, in the opinion of the Canadian Manufacturers Association, it is a matter of urgent importance that through some governmental channel inquiry be made into the best methods for conserving and increasing our domestic and overseas trade, to the end that our present prosperity may not unduly suffer when the stimulus resulting from orders for munitions and other war supplies is removed.

Further Resolved, that the Federal Government be petitioned to make immediate provision for such an inquiry, with a view to the preparation of a report that will supply a basis for organized effort in attaining the end desired.

The honourable the leader of the Government yesterday, in discussing the resolution of the honourable member from Montarville, took the ground that these matters should all, or most generally, be matters of individual effort. I quite agree with him that without individual effort we in this country will accomplish very little; but we cannot do it all by individual effort, as has been proven in a variety of ways. Let me cite, for instance, the Joint Stock Companies Act. That Act is based on the principle that an individual cannot alone carry on a great enterprise, and then makes provision that a number of individuals may do so in co-operation, and for that purpose will be given certain privileges, such as the privilege of limited liability. I may instance insurance companies, and many others. There is the Western Grain Growers' Association, a co-operative association which has, I believe, amassed a considerable amount of wealth. In all countries, especially young countries, individual effort must be helped wisely by the Government of the day. We are all proud of the banking system of Canada; but if our great chartered banks were not given such privileges as that of issuing notes over and above the amount of their paid-up capital, does any one suppose that they could have enabled the business of the country to be carried on in the way they have done, or that they would now be such a tower of strength, not only to the Government of this country, but to the British Government? Therefore, when a proposition in the interest of the industrial development of the country is laid before the Government through the medium of this House or of the other branch of Parliament, I claim that it is hardly fair that it should be regarded as unworthy of Government assistance, or at all events of careful consideration.

In introducing this motion I referred to the steel bounties. In that case the Government, though opposed to the policy, saw that if this country was ever to develop it was necessary to assist in the development of the fundamental basis of industry, the iron and steel industries. Relatively speaking, not very much was paid out; but what is the result of that assistance to-day? As I pointed out, the Dominion has received orders for upwards of one billion dollars worth of steel, $600,000,000 of which has already been manufactured and paid for. Without Government aid we could not have done that; we could not have got that steel outside of our own boundaries. Steel has been produced on the Atlantic coast and as far west as the Soo, and we have been able to tide over what, after the commencement of the war, threatened to be the greatest period of depression that this country had ever experienced, and to make Canada a prosperous country which, during the war, has increased its per capita wealth at a greater rate than at any other period of its existence. Wise government assistance helped to produce the steel which enabled us to secure orders for munitions. But steel was not sufficient: we needed lead; we needed zinc. We have turned out hundreds of thousands of tons of lead, in bullets for shrapnel, which were shipped to the Allies when they were badly needed, and when, without them, not only would they have been unable to advance, but the enemy might have broken through.

Now, let me read an article, "War's Stimulus at Trail," from the Montreal Gazette. It says:

The effect of war demands for special metals on the mining industry in British Columbia has been referred to from time to time in connection with developments at the Consolidated Smelters' plant at Trail. These developments have given the company, according to the assistant general manager's statement before an international mining convention the other day, probably as complete a metallurgical institution as there is on the continent.

"I do not mean to say," added Mr. Blaylock, "that it is as large as some others have. We are working about 1,300 men, though, and we are making electrolytic copper, copper sulphate, electrolytic lead, lead pipe, shrapnel wire, electrolytic zinc, gold, silver sulphuric acid, and hydrofluosilicic acid. All these with the exception of lead, gold and silver have been accomplished since the war was started, and their manufacture was caused primarily by the need for the metals by the Munitions Board."

This is another case in which government aid to individual enterprise has brought forth great results.

I want now to refer to another question. I remember some years ago, at the time the Hon. W. S. Fielding was Minister of Finance, attending his office with a deputation to request a bounty for the building of steel ships. Those who formed the deputation probably saw far ahead; at all events, history has justified their action and shown their foresight. I think the Government of the day was prepared to grant a bounty for steel shipbuilding; but it was felt, as a result of sounding members of the House, that the granting of further bounties would be unpopular at that time. Therefore no bounty was granted. If the bounty then suggested had been granted, if, through the upbuilding of the steel shipbuilding industry, we had established shipbuilding concerns on the shores of Nova Scotia and Cape Breton, in British Columbia, in the magnificent harbours of Victoria and Vancouver, and wherever they were capable of being established, how different would our situation be to-day. The cry is for ships and more ships; they are more urgently required than munitions. In France they are looking forward to the arrival of reinforcements from Canada and from the United States. Supposing the United States within the next three months organizes an army of only 500,000 men, how are they to get across to France? It will take 500 ships, or a ship-and-a-half a day for a year, to transport the 500,000 soldiers to reinforce the men at the front. And yet we are not now able to render any help of this kind. We are playing at building a few moderate-sized ships in British Columbia and elsewhere. This is helpful, of course; but if individual effort had been prepared and the capital had been ready, that enterprise could have been established. Even after the war shipbuilding enterprise will be just as necessary as it is to-day, if we are going to extend our area of cultivated land. If we are now exporting two or three hundred million bushels of grain, it will not be long before that quantity will be doubled or trebled, and we shall need ships to carry it.

The Canadian Pacific Railway company has shown what can be done by individual enterprise, aided in the early stages by the Government. To-day in London you can buy a ticket entitling you to cross the ocean on their steamships, travel across the continent on their trains, stop at their hotels, and cross the Pacific in their steamships to China and Japan. Do you think that would ever have been possible if the Government of the day had not aided individual enterprise? Then, when the company got the measles, the Government gave it first aid and loaned it large sums, in spite of a great deal of criticism. This has all been paid back, and to-day the Canadian Pacific railway is a tower of strength in this Dominion.

It is all very well to talk about individual effort. In this country I imagine that we have a population which is as well able to direct its individual effort towards accomplishment as the population of any other country in the world; but this is not the only country that assists individual effort. During the course of my remarks the other day I read some statements which went to show that even the bankers of Great Britain, who control the exchange of the world, and the Government of Great Britain, realize the necessity of government aid; therefore a Royal Charter has been granted to the British Trades Bank. Even Germany, though at war at the present time, sees the necessity of taking measures in advance. I have before me some information in regard to a new German bank, which reads as follows:

Copenhagen despatches state that plans have been completed for the establishment of a German export bank to assist in the restoration of trade relations with Central and South America and to promote trade generally. Germanic trade organizations and representatives of the Latin American export houses are stated to have met recently in Hamburg, and decided to establish branches in Central America, West Indies, East Asia and Austral-Asia. Where German bank representation is now inadequate the export bank will assist German import houses by granting credit on acceptances, and thus attempt to cut into American and Japanese trade in South America.

Great Britain has already taken action, Japan has taken action, and no doubt honourable gentlemen have all read in the despatches what Australia is doing. The Australian Government is now considering the expenditure of $50,000,000 to assist private capital, thus recognizing the pressing necessity of aiding individual enterprise. I am not one of those who believe that the Government should take any large measure of responsibility, but it can do a great deal. Whatever Government may be in power should show that they have faith in their country, by standing ready, when men are banded together, offering their labour and enterprise, to extend to their action the kudos of Government approval. I have referred to these facts only as evidence of what has been done, at little cost, to aid individual effort. Just as much can be done for the agricultural interest as for the industrial interest. I will not refer to that at the present time, because the honourable senator for Kingston (Hon. Mr. Richardson), whose name, it has been suggested, should be added to the committee, has intimated to me the outline of a suggestion for the development and increased production of agriculture, which I think is so excellent, that I am only anxious that the committee should be appointed quickly in order that he may place his proposal before them; and if it is adopted I am quite sure it will command attention.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS.

I did not intend to speak at any great length. I introduced my motion somewhat over a month ago. I think that every member of this House who has wished to do so has spoken, and has in an admirable way added to the interest of the debate. I have stated what Great Britain has done, what the United States has done, what Australia is doing, what Germany is doing. I have pointed out that we are now employing 300,000 work-people directly on munitions, and possibly 200,000 more in the production of other war supplies. When the war is over we shall have to provide these men with new employment, and we shall also have to take care of four, five, or six hundred thousand returned soldiers. I think I have made that clear. No concerted action has yet been taken, so far as I can see, in an endeavour to grapple with these problems; and I feel that if concerted action is taken there is no better place far the genesis of the movement than in the Upper House of the Parliament of Canada. The representatives in this Upper House are men who have in their various walks of life made their mark; they have had the requisite experience; they are imbued with ideas which experience alone can give; and therefore I thought it was fitting that I should move that a committee should be appointed from this Upper House and should bring forth, not too many recommendations, but certain recommendations which might appeal not only to this House but also to the Government and to the country. Honourable gentlemen, no committee of this House can cover the whole field; but I submit that if this committee can till only a small corner of the field of national endeavour and cause two blades of grass to grow where but one grew before, they will have justified their appointment, they will have done useful public service.

I have much pleasure in accepting the amendment moved by the honourable member for Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan), that the name of Senator Richardson be added to the committee.

The motion, amended as suggested, was agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILL—$40,172,951.53.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 108, an Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1918.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the object of this Bill is to vote supply to the extent of $40,172,951.53. This amount is made up of $24,054,845.38, the balance, or three-fourths, of the items set forth in Schedule A, which honourable gentlemen will find attached to the Bill, and $16,118,-106.25, being one-sixth of the items set forth in Schedule B.

It will be remembered that the first Supply Bill of the present session voted one-fourth of the amount of Schedule A, and also the Supplementary Estimates for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1917. That is to say, we are now to vote the balance, or three-fourths of that Supply Bill.

No part of the amount under Schedule B of this Bill has yet been voted.

The total estimated expenditure for the year 1917-1918, as shown in the Main Estimates, amounts to $203,472,765.94. Of this amount $182,359,215.94 is chargeable to Consolidated Fund and $21,113,550 is chargeable to Capital. The estimated expenditure on account of Consolidated Fund, of which $74,691,001.24 is statutory—that is to say, is uncontrollable expenditure, provided by the statute—has been greatly increased in consequence of the heavy charges for interest on public debt and pensions; but on other services the estimates now presented will be found to be materially reduced from those of the previous fiscal year.

I think, honourable gentlemen, that with this explanation it will be unnecessary for me to say anything further upon the subject.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

Certain rules having been suspended, the Bill was, on motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, read the third time and passed.

CONSERVATION OF CANADIAN TRADE.

ADDITION TO COMMITTEE.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, with the permission of the House, I would move that the name of the honourable member for Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) be added to the Committee for the Conservation Trade which was appointed yesterday.

The motion was agreed to.

THE FOOD SUPPLY.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. DANIEL GILLMOR: Honourable gentlemen, it is not often that I occupy the attention of the House; in fact, I think this is the first time that I have ever attempted to do so. I would not do so now were it not that I think that the question which I wish to ask the Government may be of assistance in helping to win the war in which we are all so vitally interested. I notice by the papers to-day that the Food Controller has issued a statement that the consumption of wheat, beef, and bacon in the Dominion must be reduced by at least one-third in order to meet the needs of the Allies and their armies at the front. On a previous occasion the Food Controller issued a request that the people of this country should use all perishable foods in order to stimulate the supply of non-perishable foods for our Allies. Therefore I would respectfully ask the leader of the Government if he will bring this matter to the attention of his colleagues in the Government and request them to remove the tax, or duty, whichever it may be called, now imposed upon the importation of these foodstuffs from the United States. I am sure that I shall have his sympathetic interest in this request, as I have that of all the members on this side of the House. The Government cannot object to removing this duty on account of the loss of revenue involved, because they can easily charge that to the feeding of the soldiers and our Allies who are doing so much for the protection of this country and for humanity in general. They are far across the sea, but I am sure that honourable gentlemen opposite will stand behind my honourable friend when he makes this request.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Questions of this kind are very important, affecting the whole policy of the Government, and I think we should be consulted on them. I am very glad that the honourable gentleman has drawn the attention of the House to this question; but I would not wish the Government immediately to adopt a policy which would not meet with the approval of this House. I think the privilege of asking questions when the Orders of the Day are called is for the purpose of asking something which does not involve quite so much as the inquiry of the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: At the request of my honourable friend, I shall be very glad to direct the attention of the Government to his remarks and suggestions, which may be of use, provided that in the meantime the United States does not put an embargo on the articles mentioned.

Bill P 2, an Act to incorporate the North American Accident Insurance Company.—Hon. Mr. Nicholls.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

NON-RESIDENT DIRECTORS—THE DEBATE CONTINUED—THE BILL WITHDRAWN.

The Senate resumed from June 20 consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton for the second reading of Bill L2, an Act to amend the Railway Act.

Hon. J. P. B. CASGRAIN: Honourable gentlemen, I do not intend to dwell very long upon the Bill introduced by the honourable member from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton). This Bill is for the purpose of preventing any person not resident in Canada from being a director of a railway company in Canada. I must say at once that, unless other reasons and stronger reasons are given than those which have been advanced up to the present, I intend to vote against the second reading of the Bill. I think the situation was well explained by the honourable member for de Salaberry (Hon Mr. Béique) when he said that in the near future the capital that would be needed for public enterprises in Canada would have to come very largely from the United States, as it was not likely that we could get very much financial help from the United Kingdom. It stands to reason, therefore, that if the capital is to be raised in the United States, the shareholders, or the people providing the money, would naturally desire to have some representation on the boards of the various railways. But they could not have this representation if the Bill presented by the honourable member for Hamilton became law. That is one of the reasons against this Bill. The hon. member for de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) gave other reasons which I think are very good.

But the honourable member for Hamilton was quite candid. When he introduced this measure he himself admitted that what he had in view was a sort of special legislation; his aim was simply to reach the Grand Trunk Railway company, whose board of directors has been for 65 years in the city of London, in England. He believes that all the mistakes and misfortunes of the Grand Trunk are due to the fact that these directors have not been well informed as to conditions in Canada. It really seems to me that the honourable gentleman from Hamilton has presented his Bill as an excuse for an onslaught on the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I regret very much the tone of his speech, and I am sure that many members of this honourable House will join with me in that regret. This is the first occasion, in the many years that I have had the honour of a seat in this House, on which I have heard the directors of a great corporation like the Grand Trunk Railway Company called wreckers, betrayers, hirelings, and the rest.

Now, I think the honourable member for Hastings (Sir Mackenzie Bowell) will bear me out. For more than fifty years he knew very well Mr. William Wainwright. If any one man was meant by the term hireling, it was certainly the man who, as a salaried official of the Grand Trunk Railway company, from year to year came before this Parliament to look after the interests of that grand old company. I am sure that the honourable member for Hastings will join with me in regretting that, after he is in his grave, Mr. William Wainwright, a man who was respected and well beloved by all on both sides of politics, who had not an enemy in the Canadian Parliament, should be called by an honourable member of this House a hireling, or a betrayer of his trust, or a wrecker. That was more than I could possibly stand, and one of the principal reasons why I moved the adjournment of this debate was that I might have an opportunity to say something in his vindication.

The whole burden of the honourable gentleman's speech was that the Grand Trunk Railway company had been mismanaged, and that one of the worst things that its directors had done to impair the credit of that company was to sign the National Transcontinental Railway contract, by which the company agreed: first, to pay a rent amounting to 3 per cent of the cost of the road for 43 years, no matter what its cost would be; and, secondly, to undertake the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert. The honourable gentleman contended that these mistakes were made because the board of directors sat in London and were not acquainted with the conditions existing in this country.

Now, who were the gentlemen who induced the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway company in London, England, to go into that scheme? First, it was Charles M. Hays, one of the best-known railway men in the United States, who had come to Canada and had managed the Grand Trunk railway for some years, but, finding that there was no expansion of the Grand Trunk, had accepted an offer from the Union Pacific Railway Company and had gone back to the United States. He occupied a position there for two or three years, when, the Grand Trunk company being anxious to obtain his valuable services, and promising him that the Grand Trunk would expand, Mr. Hays consented to come back and undertake its management. His intention, as we all know, was to extend the Grand Trunk from North Bay to Winnipeg and from Winnipeg on to the Pacific coast. It was Mr. Wainwright who acted on behalf of the Grand Trunk company in promoting the necessary legislation and the contract with the Government. No blame could possibly attach to the directors of the Grand Trunk, and the fact that the board was in England had nothing to do with the matter. On the contrary, as I shall prove in a moment, it was very difficult for Mr. Hays and Mr. Wainwright to induce those directors to go into that enterprise. Mr. Hays had been in this country and knew perfectly well the conditions here; no one can doubt that; and Mr. Wainwright had been living in Canada since before the days of Confederation. Therefore the directors had the best information that could be obtained as to conditions in Canada, and it is wrong to blame them. If there was any blame to be visited upon any one, if there was any wrecker, any betrayer of his trust, any hireling, the late Mr. Wainwright was the man; and I am sure that every member of this honourable House will regret that such epithets have been attached to his name. The argument of the honourable member for Hamilton falls hopelessly to the ground, because, if a mistake has been made, which I deny, it was not the directors who made it. It was made by Mr. Hays, who knew the conditions in Canada as well as any other railway man. He was perhaps one of the best railway men in Canada.

Now let us go back to 1903, the time of the inception of the scheme of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental. If the directors of the Grand Trunk Pacific and Grand Trunk railway had been in Canada, the very atmosphere of optimism that existed in this country at that period would have influenced them to favour that enterprise. Why, it was at the very time when Sir Clifford Sifton, then Minister of the Interior, was filling the Northwest with immigrants and its population was increasing by leaps and bounds. Never before the year 1903 had the Northwest been filling up so quickly as it was under that progressive administration. I am sorry that the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) is not in his seat. He has stated that the famous James J. Hill, every time he went to Manitoba, used to say that people without land were a mob and land without people was a wilderness, and therefore people should be put on the land. Sir Clifford Sifton understood that policy and put it into effect so successfully that it was expected that the three provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, would soon be filled up. I was present at a banquet given in honour of Mr. C. M. Hays, at the Windsor hotel in Montreal, when the Hon. A. G. Blair (who afterwards opposed the building of the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, saying that there was no need to hurry) said within my hearing that not only would one or two transcontinental lines be necessary, but it would not be long, if the Northwest continued to fill up at the present rate, before ten transcontinental railways would be required to carry the products of that territory.

Now, I do not want to be in any way personal; if I am, I hope the honourable member for Hamilton will forgive me; but it seems to me that there must be rancour in the heart of the honourable gentleman, either because he was somewhat disappointed or because he wanted to impair the credit of the Grand Trunk railway and the Transcontinental. We all know that the honourable gentleman has been connected with the National Transcontinental railway at a cost to this country of several thousands of dollars. We all remember that there was a commission, composed of Mr. Lynch-Staunton and Mr. Gutelius, appointed to investigate the construction of the National Transcontinental railway. Since the days of the Spanish Inquisition there has not been a more searching inquiry than was made by these gentlemen. They knew that a sum exceeding one hundred millions of dollars had been expended on that railway, and they could not relieve their minds of the suspicion that some improper use had been made of that money, therefore they entered the offices and took possession of all the papers, all the letter-books, all the documents, all the plans, profiles, contracts, specifications—everything. They were appointed in January of 1912 and their report did not come out until 1914; so that for two years they searched and searched among the papers—and I am even informed that some of those papers were not of a public nature. One of the investigators was a resourceful lawyer and the other was a clever engineer who acted as accessory to the lawyer. The National Transcontinental railway commissioners were brought before them in secret sessions. The commissioners had no solicitors; they were at the mercy of the investigators. They were examined separately, one on one day and another the next day, to see whether they would not contradict each other. After they got through with the commissioners they put the engineers through an examination. All the employees, from the highest officials down to the humblest servant of the commissioners, were examined; it being thought that some one might be dissatisfied and might peach on the other; yet, if honourable gentlemen will look at the evidence, consisting of thousands of pages, they will find that not one dollar was proven to have been stolen or misappropriated—that nobody was proven guilty. What a sad disappointment!—the investigation resulting in nothing except the greatest vindication that the late Government ever had. The investigators perhaps thought that, if they could find something wrong, criminal prosecutions would be instituted, and would land in jail those robbers who had stolen from the public treasury. But there was no such thing. There were no criminal proceedings such as we have had in the last two years in British Columbia and in Manitoba. No; it was a Liberal Government that had done the work, and everything was done honestly. If there had been anything wrong, if there had been any swindling, and the Government had known of it, they would have been guilty. If the present Government knows of the misappropriation of one dollar in connection with that work by any man, it has been their business in the last six years to land that man in jail. However, I claim that the money spent on this investigation has been absolutely wasted, and the investigation impaired very much the credit of the National Transcontinental, the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Grand Trunk. It dealt the Grand Trunk a blow under which it reels yet. The commissioners both received their reward. Mr. Gutelius was appointed manager of the Intercolonial railway at the highest salary ever paid to anyone by the Government of this country since Confederation; and the other gentleman has been given the sweetest of all rewards—he is amongst us to-day, and we welcome him in the Senate of Canada.

How could the Transcontinental railway have been mismanaged badly when the chairman of the commission in charge of it was the Honourable S. N. Parent? We all know that that honourable gentleman was for years a minister of the Crown in the province of Quebec, and was at one time the Prime Minister of that province; and during his administration neither friend nor foe accused him of doing anything wrong, or of permitting any of his departments to go wrong or to squander a single dollar of public money. He was also mayor of the city of Quebec for twelve years, during which time he not only promoted the general interests of the city, but secured the building of the city hall at a cost of only $160,000. It was the first instance, so far as I know, in which the public got full value for their money, and there were not sixpence worth of extras when the building was finished and handed over by the contractors. The work was done exactly at the contract price. This was the man placed at the head of the National Transcontinental Railway Commission, and he saw that everything was done properly.

The honourable gentleman from Hamilton says that he knows something about this question. Well, he should know something about it. It has cost the country a good many thousand dollars to teach him something about it. But I submit, although I have never received anything for it, that I also know something about the question, because I had the honour in 1903, when the Transcontinental Railway measure first came before the House, to be asked by my leader, Sir Richard Scott, to reply to no less a man than the leader of the Opposition, the honourable member for Hastings (Sir Mackenzie Bowell). Again, in 1904, when the honourable member for Hastings was still the leader of the Opposition, it devolved upon me, at the instance of my leader, to answer his criticism of that great enterprise. In 1909 the present leader of the House was leader of the Opposition, and on that third occasion I had the honour of dealing with the question. Perhaps that is the reason why I may be a little more familiar with the details of the question than some other members of this honourable House.

The honourable gentleman from Hamilton referred to the contract of the National Transcontinental railway. He was quite right when he said that the Grand Trunk Railway company was to pay three per cent of the cost of the road, whatever it might be, for the term of fifty years, excepting the first seven years. For forty-three years the Grand Trunk Railway Company was to pay rent for that part of the railway between Winnipeg and Moncton. But I claim that the present Government has absolutely relieved the Grand Trunk of any obligation in that regard, because the contract was made according to certain specifications, the very essence of which was that there should be a grade eastward of four-tenths of one per cent, or, in common parlance, 22 feet to the mile; that there should be no adverse grade coming to tidewater at Quebec, or to Moncton, and then via the Intercolonial railway to St. John or Halifax. To build a railroad of that kind requires a great deal of money, and, as we know, it cost much more than was estimated; but that does not prove that there was any fraud. It simply demonstrates that the people were not aware how costly it is to build a railroad of that standard.

However, I will give you one instance of how the contract was lived up to. The present Government, or the National Transcontinental Railway Commission appointed by them, wrote to the Grand Trunk Railway company, saying: "If you will allow us to change the grade at La Tuque, on the St. Maurice river, from four-tenths of one per cent to six-tenths of one per cent, $1,000,000 can be saved at La Tuque alone." Mr. Hays wrote to the Government protesting against the change, saying that the Grand Trunk Railway company would not accept the road if such a change were made, because the money had been raised and the contract agreed to in England by the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway company, who would be responsible for the whole cost of the railway. The low gradient was the essence of the contract. What did this new commission under Major Leonard do, and what did the Government do? They simply degraded the road. One of the brilliant ideas of the two commissioners, Messrs. Lynch-Staunton and Gutelius, was that the road should have momentum grades. Let us pause for a moment and think what a momentum grade is. A momentum grade means, I take it—and I stand to be corrected if I am wrong—that a train coasting down one hill is supposed to acquire sufficient momentum to enable it to coast up another; the steeper the grade the more momentum acquired and the better the coasting. That is one of the ways in which they would have saved some of this $40,000,000. Fancy a railway train coasting down a hill and trusting to the momentum to enable it to coast up another. I have here the report which states that out of $40,000,000 momentum grades would have saved $6,200,000. The idea was not even original. Anybody who has been to our lunar parks has seen the scenic railways and the children on them coasting up and down the hills. We all know that there is snow in this country in the winter time; and if there were snow on the track when a train coasted down a hill it would have to stay there, I suppose, until the next train ahead could get out. This is what the report says about momentum grades:

> Had momentum grades been adopted, as is the usual practice in high-class modern railway construction, they would have in no way impaired the usefulness of the railway, or increased the cost of operation, or reduced its hauling capacity, and $6,200,000 might and should have been saved.

That is a part of the report of the honourable member for Hamilton and Mr. Gutelius.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Mr. Gutelius is a railway engineer.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes. There are lots of beautiful things like that in the report. For instance, it says that wooden trestles would have cost less than iron trestles. That, of course, is something that we did not know. And the information in that report cost the country $100,000.

The Grand Trunk Railway company, if the honourable gentleman from Hamilton had his way, would be taken away from the shareholders and given to the Dominion Railway company, the formation of which is proposed in the report of Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. W. M. Acworth. This railway would be taken away from the shareholders to punish them because they cannot pay for the Grand Trunk Pacific as well as pay the rent of the National Transcontinental. I think that the management of the Grand Trunk railway were perfectly justified in not accepting the railway, and in repudiating the whole contract, because the road had been degraded under the direction of Major Leonard.

The Canadian Pacific railway has been held up to our admiration as a perfect railway. The administration and the officials of the Canadian Pacific railway may be perfect, but the topography and the location of the railway is about the worst that could have been found in Canada. I know something about that, because, in 1874-5, I was one of the chainmen and levellers on that road. The total adverse grade on the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental from tidewater on the Pacific to tidewater at Quebec amounts to 5,300 feet. What is the total adverse grade on the Canadian Pacific railway? It is 23,000 feet. We all know that the Canadian Pacific railway, at the Selkirk range, has an elevation of 4,400 feet. In crossing the Rocky mountains it drops 2,000 feet, then rises again, and then drops again to Calgary. With all these grades added together a ton of freight carried on the Canadian Pacific railway from tidewater to tidewater has to be lifted 23,000 feet, while on the Grand Trunk Pacific it has to be lifted only 5,300 feet, in the one case four miles, in the other only one mile. I could give you the grades of several transcontinental railways; I have the figures here, and I can safely say that no other railway has such easy grades as the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental. This railway has never been given a chance since 1911, because those who were against it then have been against it ever since.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: Tried to destroy it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes. I have frequently stated in this House how cheaply one bushel of wheat could be carried on the Transcontinental railway from Winnipeg to tidewater at Quebec. People have doubted what I have said, but what has the present Minister of Railways done within the last two years? He has given a rate of six cents per bushel from a point called Armstrong, on the National Transcontinental railway, to Quebec. The honourable member for Kingston (Hon. Mr. Richardson) knows that that is right. I think he took advantage of that rate to transport wheat to Quebec by that route. The distance from Quebec to Armstrong is about 900 miles, and the distance from Armstrong to Winnipeg is about 450 miles, so for the latter portion of the haul the rate would be three cents. Allowing one cent for terminal expenses at Winnipeg, you would have a rate of 10 cents per bushel. That is not supposition, and one should not be called a visionary, as was Hon. Mr. Charlton in another place, when he explained how cheaply wheat could be carried, because this is the rate fixed by the Government of the country. As I have said, the total distance from Quebec to Winnipeg by the Transcontinental railway is 1,350 miles; by the Canadian Pacific railway it is 1,575 miles, or 225 miles longer. Via the old Grand Trunk line the distance is still greater. If this Government had any intention of utilizing the National Transcontinental, it would have been very easy to have advertised the fact. I ask honourable gentlemen if they do not think that passengers coming off the steamers at Quebec would have preferred to take this beautiful road and travel 1,350 miles to Winnipeg, and thence across the continent, to travelling 1,575 miles by the Canadian Pacific railway—which has a passenger train waiting on the Government's own wharf in Quebec?

The same argument applies to people coming from Winnipeg and the West on their way to the Old Country. They want to get the quickest and shortest route, and none of them are anxious to go 225 miles out of their way and to pay $6.75 extra for their tickets. If the Government had advertised the National Transcontinental railway, I think it would have got 99 per cent of the through passenger traffic.

There is another peculiar thing about it. The Transcontinental to-day does not run from Quebec. It runs from the city of Toronto to North Bay; from North Bay it goes to Cochrane, and then turns to the left towards Winnipeg. Cochrane is about 580 miles from the city of Quebec. A person in Quebec wanting to go to Winnipeg could take the Transcontinental railway; but he would first have to go from Quebec to Montreal, a distance of 180 miles; then, from Montreal to Toronto, a distance of 330 miles; then, from Toronto to North Bay, another 220 miles; and then, from North Bay to Cochrane, a distance of 250 miles; or 980 miles in all; whereas, by travelling directly across the gap on the railroad built and owned by the Government, he would have to travel only 580 miles.

Honourable gentlemen opposite from the beginning decried the enterprise. They were in opposition at the time, and, after all, people are human and I do not blame them. It was good party warfare; but when they investigated the National Transcontinental railway, they proved it to be of some use, and it will turn out to be all right yet.

Compare the time necessary to travel from Montreal to Winnipeg. Honourable gentlemen know that by the Canadian Pacific railway it takes 48 hours to go from Montreal to Winnipeg and five hours longer from Quebec—53 hours from Quebec to Winnipeg. If the Government used the road which they own, and if the trains on it travelled at the same speed as the Grand Trunk train travelling every day of the year between Montreal and Toronto, a distance of 330 miles in seven hours and a half, or at the rate of 44 miles an hour, including stops—which is not so bad for the poor old Grand Trunk railway, which has been doing nothing well, and which you are going to take away from the people who put their money into it—passengers could travel in less than thirty-two hours from Quebec to Winnipeg by the Transcontinental. This road from Quebec to Winnipeg is built on the same standard as that between Montreal and Toronto, and 21 hours, or nearly a full day, could be saved in making the trip. The Government has it in its own hands to do this, but I suppose they will wait until after the general election. I am afraid the election will be postponed so long that we shall not hear very much about the bad features of the National Transcontinental railway; there will be too many other questions to occupy the time.

It may be said that the Transcontinental railway line can be used only in the summer time. In winter the passengers coming west on the Intercolonial railway could very easily be transferred to the Transcontinental railway at Quebec, where the Government has a beautiful railway ferry, and in that way they could save 21 hours of time and $6.75 on every ticket purchased.

The portion of the National Transcontinental railway from the Quebec bridge to Moncton has been very strongly criticised in this report. I must confess that I have never favoured that portion of the road. I know that the topography of the country is such that it is very difficult to overcome. There is more difference in levels between the Quebec bridge and one portion of the road in the county of Temiscouata than there is in the Rocky mountain section. After that part of the line is passed the railroad goes down, crossing the St. John river at an elevation of 440 feet, and then goes up over another range of hills, and then down again and up again.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Will the honourable gentleman allow an interruption?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I want to know what all this has to do with the status of the directors?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We are the directors and have a good deal to say.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY I thought it was a motion on the Order Paper that was under discussion. My honourable friend is discussing the levels of the different railroads.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) is quite right. He thinks I am digressing. I am sorry that I am occupying so much of the time of the House. But I think this discussion is absolutely necessary. The purpose of the honourable gentleman's Bill is that the directors shall not sit in London, for the reason that they do not know what takes place in this country. I desire to prove to this honourable House, first, that the inception of that enterprise was not the work of those directors, but the work of Mr. C. M. Hays and Mr. William Wainwright; and, secondly, that it was not a bad enterprise at all; and, if the honourable gentleman will bear with me for a few moments, I think I shall convince him, if he can be convinced.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I am convinced; so the honourable gentleman may dispense with that effort.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Then I will try to convince the honourable gentleman from Hamilton.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let us know something about the level and grade of the directors.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: And the momentum.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Well, the part of the railway east of Quebec has proven most useful, and honourable gentlemen who are interested in the war will be surprised to learn that, if it had not been for that additional piece of road, the troops, the munitions, and other freight could not have been handled by the Intercolonial railway. I have been assured of that on the very best authority. No less than ten freight trains a day have gone over the Trans continental railway east of Lévis to Moncton, relieving the congestion on the Intercolonial railway. The road has proved to be most useful in that emergency. The Intercolonial railway would have been congested, as were the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk, and the railroads in the United States, but for the aid of that road. I do not think that the directors of the Grand Trunk in England should be blamed if they assented, because they had no knowledge of the conditions in Canada; it was done on the recommendation of men like Mr. Wainwright and Mr. Hays, who had full knowledge.

The part of the railway from Quebec to Cochrane is the part that for the last year or so has helped the Intercolonial railway to make money. That may be doubted, but I have good authority for the statement. If honourable gentlemen will take the trouble to inquire, they will find that it is true, notwithstanding maladministration of the road, and notwithstanding the fact that the Lynch-Staunton-Gutelius report impaired its credit and discouraged people from using it. But why should it not be the most profitable? It is the shortest line and has the easiest curves and grades. One locomotive on the National Transcontinental railway can do as much work as two locomotives on the Canadian Pacific railway.

The honourable gentleman from Hamilton has quoted the report of Sir Henry Drayton and Mr. W. M. Acworth. I take exception to that report. It is a majority report. There is a minority report. There were three gentlemen appointed by the present Government, the third member of the commission being Mr. A. H. Smith, the president of the New York Central lines. In quoting Sir Henry Drayton's report the honourable gentleman from Hamilton accepts its conclusion that the Grand Trunk railway should be taken away from those directors, who are betrayers, wreckers, and hirelings. While Sir Henry Drayton may be an excellent lawyer, and I do not doubt it, it would be in my opinion very extraordinary if he knew as much about railway matters as do men who have spent their whole lives in managing railroads or in studying the railway question. The honourable gentleman from Hamilton also quoted the other member, Mr. Acworth. Mr. Acworth arrived in Canada on December 16 last. He was here three months before the report was issued.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Will the honourable gentleman point out what opinion of Mr. Acworth or Sir Henry Drayton I quoted in my speech? I do not remember quoting any of their opinions; I remember quoting only the evidence of Mr. Chamberlin.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman did more than quote them; he adopted their suggestions—swallowed them holus bolus.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Will the honourable gentleman be kind enough to point out where I adopted any of their suggestions?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I have here the speech of the honourable gentleman, in which he said:

> I say that now we should at least step into the breach and endeavor to save the Grand Trunk Railway Company shareholders from themselves.

I understood the purport of the honourable gentleman's speech to be that the Grand Trunk Pacific, the National Transcontinental, and the Canadian Northern should all be amalgamated.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: When did I say so?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Well, I understood him to say so. I am very glad if he did not. I am glad the honourable gentleman is not in favour of taking away from the 65,000 shareholders of the Grand Trunk their railway—if he is against the report of Sir Henry Drayton, which he had in his hand when making his speech. There is plenty of information in that report, too. For instance, you find in it that the total railway mileage of Canada at the present time is 40,000 miles, which is a greater mileage than there is in England or in France, and nearly as much as in the whole German Empire, with its 67,000,000 people, as in Russia, with its 170,000,000, and as in India, with its 300,000,000. We find in that report that we have one-sixth of the total railway mileage of the United States and only one-fourteenth of their population. That shows that the increase in our railway mileage has been much greater than our increase in population. The population of Canada increased in the years from 1901 to 1911 34 per cent, while the railway mileage increased 40 per cent, a difference of only six per cent. In 1901 the total population of Canada was 5,300,000, and we had 18,000 miles of railway. In 1911, the population was 7,200,000, according to the census, and we had 25,400 miles of railway. We had at that time one mile of railway for every 284 inhabitants. Ten years earlier we had one mile of railway for every 300 inhabitants; so the difference after the 10 years was only 16 inhabitants per mile of railway. What do we find to-day? The population has apparently not increased much since the change of administration. It is estimated that the population of Canada in 1917 is 7,500,000. We now have 40,584 miles of railway, or one mile for every 185 inhabitants, a decrease in six years of 99 inhabitants per mile. The railroads have kept on increasing, though the population of the country has not increased.

Now we come to the question of Government aid. What aid did the Grand Trunk Railway company receive from the Government? May I be allowed to compare it with the aid received by other railways, in order that we may see whether the Grand Trunk Company deserve to have their railway taken from them?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Compare the steel also.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Take, for instance, the Canadian Northern Railway company. They received in about fifteen years $298,000,000 in guarantees, subsidies, etc., according to the report of Sir Henry Drayton, made at great expense to this Government. I would commend to honourable gentlemen in this House the reading of that report, which they will find most interesting.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Not to-day.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The Canadian Pacific Railway company received in 35 years $347,000,000. What did the Grand Trunk company receive? The Grand Trunk proper received $28,000,000 altogether, which is less than one-twelfth of what has been granted the Canadian Pacific and less than one-tenth of what the Canadian Northern has received; and that $28,000,000 included $12,000,000 which was never used by the Grand Trunk, but had been voted as subsidies to small branch lines that were bankrupt and were taken over by the Grand Trunk, very often at the instance of various Governments, after the subsidies had been exhausted. So, of the $28,000,000 debited to the Grand Trunk, there was $12,000,000 which they never got, but which had been given to branch lines by municipalities and by provincial and federal governments.

What aid was given to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway? From Winnipeg to Wolf Creek, a distance of 915 miles, the Grand Trunk Pacific, according to the first contract for that mileage— and this is a thing unheard of with reference to any other railway—received not a single dollar of subsidy nor a single acre of land. It received a guarantee of $13,000 per mile; and later on, in 1909, a loan—mark you, a loan—on which it had to pay interest. And the honourable gentleman from Hamilton compares that railway, which has received practically no aid from the Government, with the Canadian Pacific.

What did the Canadian Pacific Railway company get? That company, as we all know, received $25,000,000 in cash at its very inception. Nobody denies that. It received also 25,000,000 acres of land; also 614 miles of railway already built; and the advantage of surveys that had been going on for nearly ten years, with the entire land surveyed. Then it was granted a great privilege, that of exemption from duty on anything that entered into the construction of the road. They could import, from the United States, England, or anywhere else, anything they wanted, without having to pay any duty. Moreover, they were exempt from land taxes. They were given a monopoly of the whole Northwest territory, and they were guaranteed freedom from competition for twenty years. Competition was allowed afterwards. And, above all these privileges, they were allowed by the charter to charge their own rates, and merchants or farmers in the Northwest had to pay what the Canadian Pacific railway company chose to charge them. There was in those days no Railway Commission or other authority to regulate the rates; so the people had either to pay them or walk.

What would the Grand Trunk Railway company not be to-day if it had received some such concessions? The Grand Trunk Pacific from the beginning had to meet competition from the Canadian Pacific, which was already bulit, and from the Canadian Northern, which was partly built. The fact that the Canadian Northern was then being constructed added considerably to the cost of railway construction, because of the scarcity of labour. On the other hand, the Canadian Pacific benefited tremendously by the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, because every labourer who went to work on the Grand Trunk Pacific had to travel by the Canadian Pacific to get to his work and had to pay toll to the Canadian Pacific in buying his ticket. Every bit of rail, every piece of machinery, every pound of explosives, every pound of provisions, went by the Canadian Pacific railway. When one of the directors of the Canadian Pacific railway was protesting against the former Government allowing the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill, some one said to him: "It will be an advantage to your company. A large proportion of the money will revert to the Canadian Pacific railway, because the Grand Trunk Pacific will have to pay the Canadian Pacific railway for the transportation of railway labourers and construction material." The stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway company, which was then selling at $135, rose within six or seven months or a year after the commencement of the Grand Trunk Pacific to $175, as high as it is to-day.

The old Grand Trunk railway has also been criticised by the honourable gentleman from Hamilton. The original cost of building the Grand Trunk railway was $127,000 a mile, but dividends have been paid on only $48,000 a mile. Still the honourable gentleman says the dividends have been too high. The capital of the Grand Trunk railway, which is in pounds sterling, is equivalent to $240,000,000. According to the latest information, which is absolutely correct, the company has paid in the last ten years an average of $3,600,000 a year in dividends, or 1½ per cent. That is all that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk have received. Sir Henry Drayton was good enough to say, at page 45 of his report, that Canada is under some obligation to the Grand Trunk railway shareholders. Well, I should think he is right. The railroad was built entirely with British capital, with the exception of the $28,000,000 which I mentioned a few moments ago, and twelve millions of which had been used by roads which became bankrupt and were taken over by the Grand Trunk. For 65 years the Grand Trunk has been giving good service, and honourable gentlemen know that $30,000,000 in actual money, of the common stock of the Grand Trunk, has for 65 years never paid one cent. That sum of money, at an interest rate of between four and five per cent, compounded, would make to-day over $500,000,000. The investment of all that money has inured to the advantage of Canada. The Grand Trunk Railway company was not given twenty-five or loaned thirty million dollars, as was the Canadian Pacific Railway company. The money came from the British people, and that money has been earning interest in the service of Canada. If there is one railway in this country to which Canada is indebted, it certainly is the Grand Trunk.

You will find most of what I have just stated in a letter which has appeared recently in the newspapers, signed by Mr. Alfred A. Smithers, the chairman of the Grand Trunk board.

The honourable member for Hamilton says also that in the purchasing of their feeders the company were ready to buy anything that was offered. Well, it was Sir Joseph Hickson who was responsible for buying most of those feeders, and, according to good railroad authorities, he made a very judicious choice, for those feeders are now considered, I understand, on very good authority, to be the best assets of the Grand Trunk. Those are the feeders which the honourable gentleman from Hamilton decried.

The honourable gentleman said also that it was a shame that the Grand Trunk did not give better service to the city of Hamilton, and that representatives of that city actually went to Mr. Van Horne and offered him a bonus of $500,000 if in his kindness he would bring the Canadian Pacific railway to the city of Hamilton. If that is so, how is it that after all these years the Canadian Pacific Railway company is using the Grand Trunk track to get into Hamilton? It is very strange that an enterprising company like the Canadian Pacific would not have grabbed that $500,000 and had a railway of its own going into that city. I must say that it is a progressive place; it has apparently made more progress than any other city in Ontario. If the Canadian Pacific Railway company had received the same treatment as the Grand Trunk, is there an honourable gentleman in this House who will deny that it would long ago have become hopelessly bankrupt? On the other hand, if the Grand Trunk Railway company had received $347,000,000, it would have been—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Will the honourable gentleman kindly explain in what way the Canadian Pacific Railway company received $340,000,000 from the Government?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They have not finished getting it yet.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Here is what the report says:

> Completed roads and surveys cost Government $37,785,320; cash subsidies, $66,905,481; lands sold, $123,810,124; total public assistance, direct and indirect, $228,500,925.

It must be noted that this sum is not net to the company, as it represents the gross receipts, while the company has expended large sums of money in irrigating a portion of the lands sold. As pointed out, however, the company values its unsold lands at $119,250,000. These two sums together make a total of $347,000,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I think the honourable gentleman could make that amount much larger if he put the present value on the lands.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I take the values given in the report as published by the Government. I hope they are not wrong, as sometimes happens.

The principal grievance of the honourable gentleman from Hamilton was that the Grand Trunk board was in England, and that it was impossible to manage a railway from across the water. Surely the honourable gentleman knows as well as I do that there are railways in many parts of the world which are managed in Canada. For instance, there is the railway built in Cuba by Sir William Van Horne, with its head office in Montreal; and there are railways in Mexico and South America with head offices in Canada; so the argument of the honourable gentleman does not hold good.

My honourable friend has said that the Canadian Pacific railway is the best railway in the world. I must admit that it would have been almost impossible to find a better man for the position he occupied than Sir William Van Horne. I am willing to take off my hat to him as the best railway man we ever got from the United States, and I do not know of any better in Canada; but if the Grand Trunk railway had got $347,000,000, it would have been as prosperous as the Canadian Pacific.

The honourable gentleman has said that the Grand Trunk is a mendicant at the doors of Parliament. Well, during the last 65 years it has brought $430,000,000 into the country. If there are any mendicants of that kind in Hamilton I would be glad if my honourable friend would send them to my door in Montreal. If ever men gave money cheerfully, the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway company have done so. Show me any other railroad promoters who have put their own money into railway enterprise. There are 65,000 shareholders of the Grand Trunk in England to-day, and when the company wants money it can raise it among its own shareholders. In June, 1915, the day on which Scarborough was bombarded, when telegraph lines were down and communication was cut off, within the short space of five hours the Grand Trunk Railway company raised $12,500,000 in London among its own people. If my honourable friend thinks that looks like the action of a mendicant, I certainly must differ from him. I do not want to say anything in disparagement of those who organised the Canadian Pacific Railway company; but there is a great difference between the Grand Trunk Railway company's shareholders and the members of the syndicate that organized the Canadian Pacific Railway company. The whole syndicate could not scrape up from all its members $2,000,000. That has not been denied. A few years afterwards the same people could raise $100,000,000. They received very different treatment to that meted out to the shareholders of the Grand Trunk. The stock of the Canadian Pacific was allotted at 25 cents on the dollar, but paid a dividend of 6 per cent on the par value of the stock, and after five years they had all the money which they had invested, with interest, and they still had the shares. No wonder that company has been prosperous. On the other hand, the $30,000,000 put up by the shareholders of the Grand Trunk railway never paid a cent in dividends. There is one feature which is worthy of notice: the Grand Trunk Railway company never defaulted in any of its obligations. How many railroads across the border, and even in Canada, have been in the receiver's hands, some of them several times, while the Grand Trunk has met its obligations without aid from anybody.

The honourable gentleman from Hamilton has said that the Grand Trunk railway lacks equipment. Will he be surprised to hear that the Grand Trunk railway has more cars per mile than any railroad in Canada? The only railroad that I know of which has more cars per mile than the Grand Trunk, is the Michigan Central, which is only a short line.

A great deal has been made of the fact that the Grand Trunk Railway company lost a golden opportunity when it did not undertake to build what is now the Canadian Pacific railway. We know that Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Adolphe Caron went to London to try to induce the Grand Trunk Railway company to build the Canadian Pacific railway; but what we do not know is what inducement was offered. I see the honourable member for Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) smiling. Perhaps he knows: he was in the Government at that time. Those who were interested in the Grand Trunk railway could not have dreamed of the generosity of the Government.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: They lived too far away.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: In 1882 the building of the Canadian Pacific railway was commenced, and the company got $25,000,000; yet in 1884, when the loan of $30,000,000 was made, the company was hopelessly bankrupt.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: They paid it all back.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Certainly, every dollar. Sir William Van Horne came here, saw Collingwood Schreiber, and spent the whole morning trying to induce the Government to give them some assistance. When Mr. Schreiber held out no hope—so the story goes—Mr. Van Horne actually wept. When he was going back he met Sir Francis Smith and Mr. Stephen, now Lord Mountstephen, at the old Russell House, and they said to him: "Stay in Ottawa forty-eight hours and we will see what we can do."

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: You can make that statement shorter by saying that the money was advanced and that it was all paid back.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Certainly. Sir Francis Smith then saw Sir John Macdonald and told him—

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: You might add this, too, that when they were in difficulties the late Lord Strathcona gave his own money to help them.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Sir John A. Macdonald, in conversation with Sir Francis Smith—according to his biographer, Sir Joseph Hope—said: "I cannot do any more; I have done enough. If I do anything, I shall be put out." Sir Francis replied: "You will be put out if you do not, so you might as well do it anyway." How could the directors of the Grand Trunk railway dream that such assistance would be given?

I think that the Imperial Government would be absolutely justified in vetoing a Bill proposing to take away the Grand Trunk railroad from the 65,000 shareholders of he Grand Trunk Railway company, and I am sure that His Majesty would be well advised if he exercised his power of disallowance with respect to such a measure.

The Grand Trunk charter was granted in 1852 and building commenced in about 1853. To obtain a fair view, the mind must be carried back to the position at that time, and the promoters of the railway must not be judged as if in 1853 they were possessed of the knowledge and experience possessed by those living to-day who have seen the growth of railways in Canada during the last sixty-five years. The Grand Trunk was the first railway built by British capital outside of the British Isles. No Government assistance was rendered, and the money to start the work had to be procured in London. The only means of obtaining it there was to associate such names known in London as would command public confidence. This was done. The house of Baring Bros. was associated with the enterprise, as also were Messrs. Peto, Brassey, Betts, and Jackson, the eminent contractors. One of the oldest and best-known banks in Great Britain, with a world-wide reputation, Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie, and Company, became the bankers of the company and have remained so up to the present. The undertaking was indeed a venturesome one.

My honourable friend does not believe that the recommendations in the report should be carried out.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I will tell the honourable gentlemen as to that when it comes before the House.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If the honourable gentleman's ideas prevail, the oldest railway in Canada, which on its own resources has done more for the country than any other, is to be held to its bargain with the strictness of a Shylock, while the Canadian Northern railway and the Canadian Pacific railway, both with Canadian boards, are to receive and continue in the enjoyment of the enormous benefits which the Canadian people have so liberally granted. If ever there was a case of harsh treatment, it was when a great company which has had a long and honourable career, especially at such a period as this, should have its difficulties increased by every possible means being used to injure its credit.

I apologize, honourable gentlemen, for speaking at such length. I regret very much the uncharitable remarks that were made about the directors and about hirelings of the company. If I have spoken with a little heat it is only because, having had the advantage of knowing Mr. Wainwright, I regretted deeply the remarks that were made.

Hon. FREDERIC NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, I have been waiting throughout the course of this debate to hear the principle of this Bill discussed; but I have been taken down in the valleys, and up on the hills, and over the grades, and have renewed the acquaintance of many old friends; but I have not heard a single word in reference to the principle of the Bill. I am still hoping that sooner or later in this debate the principle of the Bill will receive some attention; therefore I desire to move a short amendment. In general, I believe that Canadian enterprise should in the main be directed by Canadians. I realize, however, that it is quite impossible for us, by legislation or otherwise, to compel all members of a board of directors to be resident in Canada. If we had sufficient capital in this country to finance every enterprise that we undertook I think such a proposal would be a good one. I give notice that when the Bill is in committee I will move that section 4 be amended to read:

The majority of the directors shall be bona fide residents in Canada.

I think that the persons who furnish the capital for an undertaking should have some say in the administration of the company, whether they reside in this country or abroad, but I think that the majority of the directors should live in Canada.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN: Honourable gentlemen, the amendment is not much better than the main motion. The main motion says that the directors shall all be residents of Canada. The amendment calls for a majority of the directors to reside in Canada. What does the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) mean? Is this a drive at the Grand Trunk Railway company? It has been stated here to-day that there are 65,000 shareholders in that company not one of whom is a Canadian. Where are we going to get a board of directors unless the directors have some responsibility and interest in the company? It is puzzling to me, and it will be puzzling to the country, to find that honourable gentlemen in this House demand sacrifices from 65,000 British investors because none of them are residents of this country. It is an outrage, and a bitter outrage, on account of the circumstances that exist to-day. What right has this House, or this Parliament, to confiscate wealth belonging to British people to the extent of $47,000,000? What do the honourable gentlemen mean? In whose interest are they working? It is evidently not in the interest of the original railway of Canada, which developed Canada and made the Canadian Pacific railway possible. That railway would not be in existence to-day but for the Grand Trunk. Only for the 65,000 British investors Canada to-day would be in a state of wilderness. Why is the West developed to-day? Because the Grand Trunk set to work in this country, from Riviere du Loup to Toronto, and turned that area into two prosperous provinces. If the Grand Trunk had not done that sixty-five years ago, we should have heard nothing of the building of the Canadian Pacific railway. What do honourable gentlemen mean by asking Parliament practically to confiscate the wealth of these 65,000 British investors? I say that the proposition put before the House is not tenable; it is not debatable; it should not be entertained; and I hope it will go forth from this House that the 65,000 British investors have in this House defenders who will maintain their rights and uphold their claim to their wealth.

I am not going to enter into questions of grade or momentum. No, I am upholding broader principles—broader, but not more essential than the facts which the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) has given to this honourable House. He has given you reasons from the gravel-pit up, showing the value of this road to Canada, what it has done and is doing for Canada. I admire his statement of facts. I admire his quotations, even from the speeches of the honourable senator from Hamilton and from the adverse report of Sir Henry Drayton, a lawyer who was honest enough to return the $15,000 cheque which he had received for his investigation. He was honest in that. We had another one who was honest, the late Chief Railway Commissioner, Judge Mabee; he also returned a cheque which he had received as a commissioner for some inquiry. And Mr. Justice Duff also declined to accept money for similar service.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That vindicates the legal profession.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I cannot see why the honourable senator from Hamilton should insist on asking for an amendment to the Railway Act, as he has done. He has absolutely no ground on which to stand, because it is the plain, obvious fact that you cannot have a board of directors unless they are qualified to represent the shareholders. The same remarks apply to the amendment regarding the majority of the board of directors. It is the majority of the shareholders who elect the directorate of a company. What is the aim in introducing this measure, which I consider to be unfair to a company that has done and is doing so much for Canada?

Hon. W. C. EDWARDS: I understand the practice to be that only the principle of a Bill is discussed on the second reading—that a Bill is generally only amended in committee.

So far as the principle of this Bill is concerned, it is, in my humble opinion, wrong, and I hope that this House will not accept it. All matters of this kind should be dealt with in the general Railway Act, and my recollection is that in the general Companies Act as it now stands any company organized here must have a certain number of directors who live in Canada.

Looking at the history of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, it seems to me most unreasonable that the directors of a company of that character, coming into Canada to build a railroad for the benefit of the people of this country, should not control the money which they have expended or that any Canadian should have anything at all to do with the administration of that money.

Now, may I say just a word upon the question of administration? I know something of companies, and to my mind it matters very little who compose the board of directors if the general manager is inferior. The general manager is the important person in the administration of any company, as any honourable gentleman here who is connected with large companies knows quite well. As to the original manager of the Grand Trunk railway I cannot speak, for I did not know him very well; but certainly Mr. Hays was a very strong and able railway man, in whose hands I think the administration of the affairs of that railway was perfectly safe. The building of the Grand Trunk Pacific was largely the outcome of a desire on the part of the Canadian people for more railways. There was a time when it was thought that railways could not be built fast enough to keep up with the requirements of the country. That may have been a mistake; but to pass legislation of this drastic nature now, which would have a special effect upon this particular railway, would in my humble opinion be a great mistake, and I sincerely hope that the principle of the Bill will not be accepted.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: We have had a long discussion on this matter, and I think that the fact that this Bill is an amendment to the general Railway Act has been to some extent overlooked. The honourable gentleman who has introduced the Bill (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton), in speaking to the question, referred principally to a particular railway. But we must not forget that this Bill, if it were passed, would seriously affect all railways in the country. I think also, as has already been said, that it is largely a question for the shareholders of a company. They have the right to say where their directors shall be. If they consider that the directors are not capable of managing the affairs of their company, they can surely appoint other directors who are. I think it would not be right for this Parliament to bind them by a law which would permit them to have as directors only persons who are living in the country, when possibly the shareholders themselves are scattered in different parts of the world, as is the case in a large number of companies. We have been in the habit of granting charters to companies to do business in other parts of the world; and, if legislation of the kind proposed were to be enacted, it would be rather curious for us to insist that companies who are doing business say in South America must have directors in South America; for I presume the granting of a charter implies a confidence in those persons who have been chosen as directors of the company, and the shareholders would consider that the directors they had chosen possessed a knowledge sufficient to enable them to manage the business down in South America or in any other part of the world. I hope that my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) will see his way to withdraw this Bill, or that, if for any reason he desires to have it sent to committee, we shall not be committed to the principle involved. I think that the House should not adopt the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: The honourable gentleman who moved the amendment (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) said that he thought the 65,000 shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company residing in Great Britain should have some say in the management of the company. I would like to know what he means by "some." Where would he draw the line as to their authority to control their own company?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I have not expressed any opinion on the principle of the Bill. When I rose I stated that I had not heard the principle of the Bill discussed, but that personally I was not in any event in favour of the principle of a Bill which would provide that all the directors should reside in Canada, and I suggested as an amendment that a majority of them should be in Canada. I have been waiting since the commencement of the debate to hear the principle of this Bill discussed. I moved in amendment something which I think is probably less drastic than the Bill itself. I should be very glad to give my opinion after I have had the opportunity of hearing the principle of the Bill discussed, rather than a discussion as to the relative merits of various railways.

Hon. H. W. RICHARDSON: I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to this discussion. Whether or not I agree with all that has been said is a different matter. However, I think we have to some extent lost sight of the object of the Bill. We are not attacking the Grand Trunk Railway Company, or thinking of doing so, because, as we are all aware, this country owes a debt of gratitude to that company. But we do think that the Grand Trunk railway, or any other railway, or any other organization, can be managed better at home than abroad. I think every honourable gentleman in this House will agree to that. Certainly the stockholders must have representation, and we ought not to deprive them of that right. But what I should like to see would be an attempt to improve their position, if possible. Is there any honourable gentleman here to-day who will not agree with me in this, that if the president and board of directors of the Grand Trunk had lived in Canada, they would, before the Canadian Pacific railway was constructed, have realized the resources of this country and been ready and anxious to take considerable risk, and the Grand Trunk would to-day be in the position of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. We all know it. I think this question would be solved if a portion of the board of the Grand Trunk were Canadians, men who are alive to the country's needs, and how to meet them. Do you think, honourable gentlemen, that that would be an advantage to the Grand Trunk?

We have heard about the easy grades of the railroad from the West to Quebec. The Grand Trunk Pacific hauled wheat from Armstrong, a divisional point north of Fort William. This wheat did not come from Fort William, but from grain elevators on the prairies. They hauled this wheat to the city of Quebec for six cents a bushel; but, honourable gentlemen, they have never made any money in doing so; on the contrary, there has been a deficit. The farmers on the prairie had large quantities of grain, the western elevators were filled, and some means had to be devised to relieve the congestion; so the sacrifice rate of six cents a bushel was put into force simply to move the grain from the West. It was transported to a vacant storehouse in the city of Quebec. In that way the grain was moved. I moved a considerable portion of it. But, really, it was a shame to take advantage of the rate, it was so low. But it was winter time, and this grain had to be bought and paid for, and had to be carried until June, July, or August before it could be shipped. We have found the port of Quebec a favourable port from which to make shipments, and yet, strange to say, it is only with the greatest difficulty that ships are induced to go to Quebec, although Montreal is from three-quarters of a day to one day farther, according to tide. The vessels prefer going to Montreal for loading to stopping at Quebec.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: What is the difficulty?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: That question ought to be threshed out, and we ought to appoint a committee of this House to consider it. So far as I know, it has not yet been taken up, and before I leave this House this afternoon I hope to submit a motion for an inquiry into this question, to find out why things that are done in Montreal are not done in Quebec, where they could be done more easily.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Perhaps directors were appointed from outside Quebec to manage that work.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: I will not discuss this question now, but if this matter were dealt with by a committee I think figures could be obtained from the Harbour Commissions of Montreal and Quebec, and some improvement might be brought about.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Will the honourable gentleman allow me to put a question to him before he takes his seat? He has just made the statement that he is in favour of having a majority—

Some hon. SENATORS: No, no.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: I have not made that statement. I said that in my opinion there should be in Canada a strong representative of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. There is not a man in this House who has spent more on the Grand Trunk railway than I have.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The question narrows down to this: how can there be a representative in Canada on the Board of Directors if there is nobody in this country qualified to hold the position?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Does the honourable gentleman mean to say that qualified men cannot be found? There are thousands of men who would be competent.

Hon. Mr. MITCHELL: According to law, the shareholders have the right to elect their own directors. Would you take that right away from them? It seems to me that would be nonsense.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If such a law were passed in Canada, it would be disallowed by the Imperial Government.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I rise to a point of order. We are not in committee. I should like to know what is the question before the Chair. Is it a public Bill or a private Bill?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: A public Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: All these questions can be discussed in committee.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The only question before the House is the second reading, when the principle of the Bill is the only matter that may be discussed.

Hon. GEORGE LYNCH-STAUNTON: Honourable gentlemen, I am not going to enter into a political discussion. This is not the stump; this is the Senate of Canada. I am not going to discuss the question of the report on the Transcontinental railway. With my limited intelligence, I cannot see that it has anything to do with this question at all. The question before the House is whether or not it is a wise, a proper, and a just thing to require that the directors of a railway company in Canada, or the majority of them, should reside in Canada. I have heard honourable gentlemen say here to-day that this was a new principle, or words to that effect. When the Grand Trunk Railway Company was incorporated, it was specifically provided in their charter that all their directors' and shareholders' meetings should be held in Canada; that at least three directors should be English and three should be appointed by the Government. The head office of the Company was to be in Canada. It was a well-recognized principle of the Bill that this was to be a Canadian enterprise, governed, directed, and controlled by people resident in this Dominion, or in the two provinces which were then Canada. After the railway was built, after the money was subscribed, after the English shareholders were committed to the enterprise, in 1862 they induced the Government to amend the Grand Trunk Railway Act by striking out that clause with regard to the qualification of the directors, and by providing that there should be a head office in London and a head office in Montreal, and that the directors or the shareholders might meet either in London or in Montreal. In my humble opinion the proposed Bill does not take away the right of the shareholders, who subscribed their money on the faith that they should have the privilege of electing English directors, because they subscribed to the building of the road on the distinct legal understanding, as declared in their Act of incorporation, that it should be a Canadian enterprise, managed, governed, and controlled in Canada.

This is not a new principle. It is a principle that is in every Act that I know of other than railway legislation. The companies that we incorporate must have their head offices in Canada, and must hold their directors' meetings in Canada. There may be some exceptions, but it is a departure from the recognized legislation of Canada to allow company directors to hold their meetings outside of Canada.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is it not a provision of the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I have gone through all the Grand Trunk railway legislation for the purpose of ascertaining these facts, and I am speaking by the book. The honourable the leader of the Government has asked a question which I am not sure of, although my impression is——

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The majority have to live in Canada.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They meet in Montreal.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The money invested in the Grand Trunk Railway Company is English, the shareholders are English, and it is begging the question to say that I am bringing this measure before the House out of any animosity to the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I believe that this country owes an enormous debt to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and I say the shareholders would have been receiving dividends if it had not been for the unwise provision inserted in the Bill of 1862. To say that I am hostile to them is unfair and improper. My idea is to have this Bill passed for two purposes: first, that this enterprise, which is so essential, should be well and properly managed, and should develop this country as it ought to be developed; and, secondly, that those English people living outside of this country who invested their money in the enterprise should get the return to which they are entitled. If we allow enterprises to be mismanaged, as I say with great confidence this enterprise has been mismanaged, the effect is to discourage outsiders from investing their money in the country. We should treat this question as a matter of public interest, and not as a matter of partisan politics. It is a matter of principle, whether it is right or proper in the interests of Canada, and whether it is just or unjust with reference to the rights of the shareholders. I do not desire to interfere with anyone's property or anyone's rights. I do not believe in public assemblies robbing anybody; but I do believe that we should pass legislation which will benefit this country unless it is shown that it will inflict a material injustice, not a theoretical injustice, upon the shareholders of any corporation carrying on business here.

A lot of time has been taken up in telling us that, if the Grand Trunk railway had had all the advantages which the Canadian Pacific railway has had, instead of being in its present condition, it would have been a flourishing institution. That is exactly my contention. If the Grand Trunk railway had had a board of directors in Montreal with the astuteness and business ability of the gentlemen who commenced the building of the Canadian Pacific railway, men who were able to drive a good bargain and take good care of their shareholders, it would occupy a similar position to that of the Canadian Pacific railway. The Grand Trunk railway had a board of directors in England, composed of gentlemen who knew nothing of conditions in this country. If I were a shareholder in that company I would say: "If you had been in Canada you would have got the same concessions that other people got." The Canadian Pacific railway is owned in Europe; the great majority of the stockholders are Europeans. Do you suppose that they would trade boards of directors to-day? Do you suppose that the shareholders of the Grand Trunk railway would not be delighted to have the board of directors who guided the affairs of the Canadian Pacific railway so wisely? I believe that there are 20,000 shareholders in the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I have heard it stated to-day—as the cats in our gardens multiply—that there are 67,000 shareholders. There are 20,000 men who have invested their money and have had no proper profit out of that enterprise, but who would have had that proper profit if the men who were directing the Canadian Pacific railway had been in charge of their affairs. The Canadian Pacific railway was built only twenty years after the Grand Trunk railway. The Grand Trunk Railway company had the opportunity of taking up that enterprise. Sir John Macdonald tried to get them to take it up, but they did not know enough to do it. If I were a stockholder in that company, I would not be insisting on my fancied rights; I would be insisting on my profits.

The honourable gentleman who accused me of bringing in this Bill for partisan purposes——

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No, excuse me.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I am perfectly willing that he should abuse me and my conduct from Dan to Beersheba, because I know that in what I have undertaken I have tried to do my duty as I saw it. Some people do not agree with me, but that has nothing to do with this question. If you are going to condemn it because I, forsooth, was a Commissioner to investigate the building of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, then I imagine that when we discuss legislation concerning Canada we should argue the principles of something that concerns China, for they are just as closely related.

I have made inquiries of the Government, and I find that they prefer that this question should be considered when the general Railway Act is brought before us, and for that reason I am quite willing that this Bill should be withdrawn; but I shall bring it up when the Railway Bill is before this House.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Honourable gentlemen, I would like to read a paragraph relating to this question from the Montreal Gazette of Saturday, June 16. It is as follows:

A Bill to amend the Railway Act has been introduced in the Senate by Mr. Lynch-

Staunton. It proposes to exclude from the directorship of railway companies persons who are not residents of Canada and to ordain that all meetings of directors of railway companies held elsewhere shall be of no effect. The need of such a law is not established. In modern days men invest in many countries beside their own, and to deprive any who, living in other lands, put their money in Canadian enterprises, of their natural right to oversee the management of their property is neither wise nor wholesome.

The Bill was withdrawn.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Honourable gentlemen, as we have nothing on the Order Paper for to-morrow except a Bill which may well stand, if there is no objection I would ask the honourable the leader of this House to propose that when this House adjourns it do stand adjourned until Tuesday evening next at eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Before that motion is carried, may I ask the honourable the leader of the Government what has happened to the Supply Bill?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am really unable to say. I fancy that the Government of Canada is so prosperous that it can struggle along without it. As to the suggestion of my honourable friend from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry), I invariably follow his advice in matters of that kind.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, July 17, at eight o'clock in the evening.

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED.

The following newly-appointed senators were introduced and took their seats:

Hon. Lytton Wilmot Shatford, of Vancouver, British Columbia, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Mr. Crosby.

Hon. Albert Edward Planta, of Nanaimo, British Columbia, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

APPLICATIONS FOR DISALLOWANCE OF ONTARIO STATUTES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired of the Government:

1. Has the Governor in Council received, since the last session of the Ontario Provincial Legislature, applications for the disallowance of certain legislative Acts passed by the said Legislature?
2. What are the Acts for which disallowance has been applied for?
3. On what dates were the petitions for disallowance presented?
4. By whom were these petitions signed?
5. Has the Governor in Council replied to these petitions, and when?
6. In what sense was the reply made?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Yes.

2. Chapter 21, "An Act to authorize the construction and operation of works for the development of electrical power and energy in the vicinity of Niagara Falls by the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario on behalf of certain municipal corporations." Chapter 59, "An Act respecting the appointment of a Commission for the Ottawa Separate Schools." Chapter 60, "An Act respecting the Roman Catholic Separate Schools of the City of Ottawa."

3. 21st April, 1917, and 10th May, 1917.

4. As to Chapter 21,—by J. W. Langmuir, Wm. Mackenzie, Henry M. Pellatt and Frederick Nicholls. As to Chapters 59 and 60,—by Samuel Genest and forty others.

5 and 6. No action was taken on the petitions.

ALLEGED OMISSIONS FROM THE ORDER PAPER.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I wish to direct the attention of the House to some important lapses in the Order Paper. For some weeks past I have had before the Government a series of questions. I think the honourable gentleman from Liverpool (Hon. Mr. Farrell) has also made an inquiry. At the time the questions were put, we were both informed by the honourable leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) that he was not in a position to answer them, and he requested us to change them into motions for returns. After some hesitation I consented to do so, not for the purpose of relieving the Government, but to relieve the honourable the leader of the Government in this House from further trouble in the matter, and I requested the honourable the Speaker to have my inquiry changed into the form of a motion for a return. That was done with the unanimous consent of this honourable House. Now I observe that the motion is not on the Order Paper, nor is the motion of the honourable gentleman from Liverpool. I would ask the honourable the Speaker, who has supervision over the procedure of this House, to see that these two motions be placed on the Order Paper of the Senate for to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The honourable gentleman will find at page 478 of the Minutes of Proceedings the motions to which I think he refers.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, they are absolutely contrary to the facts. I made no such motion. My motion was to have the inquiry changed into the form of a motion for a return.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: It was done.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Certainly it was done. The motion should now appear on the Order Paper, and it is not there. What the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Landry) states is in the Minutes of Proceedings, but it is absolutely contrary to what was said on the floor of this House.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Am I going to say that it is absolutely in conformity? I would be out of order then. I am stating what I know and what are the facts. I am not responsible for clerical errors, and when a senator stands on the floor of this House and asks to have his rights protected nobody should find fault, not even the Speaker. All that I am asking for is the recognition of my rights and those of the honourable member for Liverpool. I ask the Speaker to rule that my inquiry in the Minutes of Proceedings of July 11 be placed on the Order Paper to-morrow, in the form of a motion for a return.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: It is not possible for me to give orders to place these motions on the Order Paper for to-morrow or the day after, because they were put from the Chair on the 11th instant, and it was agreed that, instead of appearing as inquiries, these questions should be placed on the Order Paper as motions, and with the leave of the Senate the question was put from the Chair. If the honourable gentleman wishes to raise another question, he will have to give due notice.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I stood by the leader of the Government and I ask him to stand by me.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I misapprehend the question which the honourable gentleman is discussing. Do I understand my honourable friend to be under the impression that, when a motion is moved for a return, and the House orders the return, the motion continues upon the Order Paper?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is not my honourable friend content to have had his motion carried?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The motion was carried, and it so appears in the Minutes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If the papers do not come down, the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) cannot make his speech.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The resourcefulness of the honourable gentleman is such that he is always able to make a speech on any subject.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable the leader of the Government has gone half way, and I go half way also. I admit that these statements are in the Minutes of Proceedings, but they are false all the same. I do not want the information alone; I want to drive it home to the Government. If the honourable the leader of the Government had replied to my inquiry, that would have settled the question; but he forced me to make a motion for a return, and now I am determined to go one better, and when I get that return I will bring home facts and figures that the Government will not approve of. Surely the Government would not be a party to suppressing free speech. The information will be brought down and put on the Table, and I shall never see it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes, you will.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It will be too late. I may have to make the speech before the extension of the term of Parliament is granted. My motion is not at an end. The leader of the Government has shown on many occasions, in spite of his own party, that he is capable of defending the interests of the country, and I ask him to have these inquiries put on the Order Paper in the form of motions.

THE APPOINTMENT OF NEW SENATORS.

PROPOSED RESOLUTION.

Hon. L. G. POWER rose to move:

That the appointment of new Senators prior to the dissolution of Parliament would be an act of partisanship derogatory to the prestige, dignity, and independence of this honourable House, and would be a violation of the understanding arrived at between the two parties in regard to the cessation of party strife during the war.

He said: During the first session of Parliament after the commencement of the war, in 1914, while there was no express agreement or understanding arrived at, it was understood that party warfare was to cease from that time; and during the session of 1915, if I am not mistaken, this understanding was given expression to publicly, and it was agreed between the two parties that there should be no contested elections in constituencies where vacancies occurred through the death of members. There are at the present time, I think, twenty-three vacancies in the House of Commons subject to that understanding. There is the further circumstance, which deserves to be taken into consideration, that since the year 1911 the western provinces have been deprived of the representation in the House of Commons to which they are entitled. It would seem to follow that from the same date—I think it was in February, 1915—the Senate should be dealt with in the same manner as the House of Commons, and that vacancies caused by the decease of members should not be filled, or should be filled by the appointment of members of the same political stripe as those who had previously occupied the seats vacated. That would have been carrying out the understanding in a fair and liberal spirit. But this policy was not adopted by the Government. While the electors in some constituencies were were left unrepresented in the House of Commons, the Government exercised the power given to it by the strict letter of the law and appointed to the Senate a number of gentlemen of their own political complexion. It must strike every honourable gentleman in this House that that proceeding was not in accord with those democratic principles which even Mr. Balfour, for so long a time the leader of the Conservative party in England, has declared should govern us at the present time. But a further step was taken on the 10th of February, 1916, when an address to the Crown, asking that the life of this Parliament should be extended for a year from the time when it would have expired, in October, 1916, was concurred in by both parties. That was the action of the whole Parliament.

It seems to me that from that time forward, with respect to the constitution of the two Houses, the Government were in duty bound not to take advantage of the power which they had under the strict letter of the law. They were bound either to allow the vacancies in the Senate to continue or to have them filled by the appointment of gentlemen whose politics were of the same character as those of the senators whose decease caused the vacancies. If the policy of alternate appointments had been adopted, we should now have, instead of a House decidedly one-sided, a House in which there would be good fighting forces on both sides. But, since the adoption of that address and practically the adoption of that understanding or agreement, the Government have continued to appoint to this House gentlemen of their own political persuasion—good, staunch Conservatives. I do not wish any honourable gentleman to suppose that I reflect in any manner whatever on the honourable gentlemen who have been appointed to this House. I am not thinking of doing so. Some of these honourable gentlemen would be looked upon as members of great value in any legislative body in the world, and I am glad to see them here; but I should have liked to see a few more of our political friends also.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Have you not enough?

Hon. Mr. POWER: Now, it seems to me that in the course adopted by the Government they are not playing the game fairly. The rights of the electors have been suspended, and the Government have been strengthening their own position by appointing gentlemen who will stand by them, not only for one Parliament, but as long as these honourable gentlemen live. If, for instance, an election were to take place during the next few months and the Government were defeated, the incoming Administration would find themselves confronted and their measures blocked by gentlemen who have been appointed really in violation of the understanding that existed. It is something like bringing up fresh troops during a cessation of hostilities, or taking war measures under the protection of a flag of truce.

There is, to my mind, this other point with reference to the appointment of these honourable gentlemen. No matter how high the character and how great the abilities of the gentlemen who have been appointed may be, I regard these appointments, in the words of the resolution, as derogatory to the prestige, dignity, and independence of this honourable House; and membership in the House is not as great an honour as it would have been if the game had been played fairly by the Government.

That is about all I have to say, honourable gentlemen. But I wish to make one further remark before I close. It seems to me that the Liberal party should be very particular, when they come to understandings or agreements with the present Administration, to see that those agreements or understandings are reduced to writing. Of course, it is barely possible that the written agreements might be treated as "scraps of paper"; but still there would be some guarantee on which to take action. I think it also entirely fair and proper that I should mention the fact that the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) a considerable time ago declared that a mistake had been made by the Liberal party in not having the agreement as to the Commons extended to the Senate and covered by some writing.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Mr. Speaker and honourable gentlemen, is this motion in order?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Honourable gentlemen, I had no intention on this occasion——

Some hon. SENATORS: Order. The point of order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Before I give a ruling on the question of order, I should like to have a few words of explanation in order to learn on what ground the point of order is raised.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: It would seem to me, notwithstanding the views of the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), who is a very able and competent man and has been a long time in this Parliament, that it is the prerogative of the King to appoint members of the Senate. I think this is the first time in the long period during which my honourable friend from Halifax has been a member of this House that he has raised his voice against the manner of appointing senators. However, before entering into a discussion of the question, if we are to have a discussion, I would like to know if it is not the prerogative of the King to appoint members of this honourable House, and if the resolution proposed is in order.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is the point of order.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) is always out of order, and I intend in the future to see that he keeps in order. There is too much disorder here. I do not wish to cast any reflection on his honour the Speaker, but his kindness and the kindness of this House too often allows honourable gentlemen to speak who are out of order. The appointment of senators is the King's prerogative, the same prerogative as that by which the honourable gentleman from Halifax was appointed to this honourable House.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I believe that the motion presented by the honourable the senior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) is only an expression of opinion, and, even if it were adopted by the House, I do not believe it would prevent the Government from appointing new senators.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Is not the King always right?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The motion is not out of order.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN: As the motion is not out of order, may I be allowed to supplement the very fair presentation of this case by the senior member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power)? The junior member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Crosby) has suggested that the Speaker ought to call to order members who rise too often. I hope the leader of the Government will take note of the demand made by his subordinate. I do not believe there is any man in this House who rises oftener than the honourable leader of the Government, so I hope the junior member from Halifax and the leader of the Government will come to an understanding on that point. I have no objection to the leader of the Government speaking as often as he does, because he is one of the few on the other side who are able to say something.

This motion is perfectly in order; and, not only before this honourable House, but in a short time before the electors of this country, we shall have ample opportunity to demonstrate the incompetence, the neglect, the oversight, if not worse, of the Government, not only regarding the internal administration of affairs, but regarding certain war measures which were calculated to aid the Allies, to help the cause of civilization, and especially to support the Canadian boys who are at the front. It would be futile to try to impress on the other side, composed as it is now, the correctness of my statement, but the efforts that we shall put forth in the coming general election will have their effect.

Now, this Government has asked the people of Canada, through its friends, subsidized or otherwise, through its public speakers, through ministers in various churches, and through Parliament, not to have a general election during the war—it would cause turmoil; would disunite the people; it would divert their attention from the prosecution of the war. That has been the policy of the right honourable the Prime Minister, his Government, and his followers, both in the House of Commons and in the Senate. Have they lived up to that policy? Has the Prime Minister kept his word as a man of honour, as a man of fair play and justice, to the Liberal electorate of the Dominion of Canada? He called for non-partisanship, and as late as yesterday afternoon he asked in the House of Commons that the life of the present Parliament be prolonged. He, gasping for breath, made the plea that the members of the House of Commons should show no partisanship in regard to his resolution for the extension of the present Parliament.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: Was that agreed to?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It was carried by the very small majority of 17. Does the honourable gentleman wake up now? I listened to the Prime Minister during his entire speech. It was an able and eloquent one from his point of view. But why has not the Prime Minister shown during the past two years an example of non-partisanship? Instead of showing that example, he has throttled this country through its legislature. He has attempted to stifle the Liberal opinion of the Dominion of Canada by appointing to this honourable House members adverse to Liberal principles—against justice, against fair play, and against his own policy. What right has a prime minister of that calibre to dictate any longer to the people of this country regarding either war measures or measures of internal welfare and progress? I say, honourable gentlemen, the people will give him and his supporters the lash for thus ignoring the rights of over half the population of the Dominion of Canada.

If we are to calculate the Liberal sentiment of Canada by the general elections held in Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, New Brunswick—in all the provinces except Ontario—we find that nine-tenths of the people of Canada to-day are Liberals. The Tories were swept out of power in Manitoba not later than a year ago; they were wiped out in Alberta and in British Columbia. And it was about time for the change, especially in the provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia—and in New Brunswick also. The only governments maintained in power by the electors during this war are Liberal governments, and they have been returned by increased majorities;

I refer to the governments of Quebec, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Nova Scotia. What has happened during this war to the Tory governments that were in existence? What has happened to the Government in Manitoba, of which the Minister of Public Works, who has not resigned, but has stepped aside, was the inspiring spirit? That Government was annihilated—why? Because of incompetent and dishonest administration. It is too bad for the reputation of Canada to have to say that. Why was the Tory Government of British Columbia cast aside? For the same reason—incompetency, and, unfortunately, dishonesty. Why was the Government of New Brunswick, which had to its credit only two Liberal members before the general election, which took place a few months ago—why was that Government swept from power? Because of incompetency, and, unfortunately, dishonesty. Why was the Government in Quebec, a Liberal Government, maintained? Because it was a progressive Government, and no finger of scandal could be pointed at it. The same is true of the Government of Nova Scotia, and all along the line.

I am therefore justified, taking all these facts into consideration, in saying that the vast majority of the people of this country are standing under the Liberal flag and are prepared to support it, not only in provincial contests, but in the contests for Federal power and supremacy. I say that the war measures of this country would have been better handled under Sir Wilfrid Laurier than under a Patenaude, than under a Blondin, or any other Nationalists who shot holes through the British flag six years ago to get a breath of liberty. The Tory party has been feeding at the public crib and heaping honours upon men who trampled the British flag in the dust, men who cried out against any aid to the Empire. Such men have been the colleagues of Sir Robert Borden in the Cabinet, and some of them still are. Does the Government expect, by appointing Tory members to this Senate, to gain the confidence of the country in the face of these flagrant acts of public dishonour and public dishonesty?

The two words are strong. It is a crying shame that Canada should have to submit to a régime of this kind, composed of two discordant elements, the ultra Loyalists and the ultra Sinn Feiners—if the name is applicable to them. This is done in the name of patriotism. Patriotism is a fine thing; it is a glorious thing when it is not abused. I am afraid that the country will come to the conclusion that during the past two or three years the Government has abused the holy and sacred cause of patriotism to maintain itself in power and to feed and honour the Nationalists of Quebec by putting them in places of honour—by appointing them commissioners, ministers without portfolio, and so on.

In view of these facts, the Government has no justification for sending men into this House to replace old-time, stalwart Liberals who have died during the extension of the term of Parliament. Parliament is a misnomer. There is no such thing as extension of the term of Parliament. The word Parliament, under the constitution, means a composition of the two branches of the legislature, the House of Commons and the Senate. The Senate is a permanent body and needs no extension of its term. The wording of the Bill and the discussion should be based on the extension of the life of the Administration headed by Sir Robert Borden and a depleted House of Commons. That is what the extension is wanted for—nothing else. This House needs no extension under the constitution, and therein lies the great danger to the welfare of this country in the Government appointing men permanently when it has no right to do so.

Two years ago I foresaw the present situation. I gave notice to the House that the agreement between Sir Robert Borden and Sir Wilfrid Laurier should be in writing, and that it should affect this House as well as the House of Commons. I am sorry that the most serious objection came from honourable gentlemen on this side of the House who had absolute confidence in the Tories. They said: "My dear senator, you do not suppose that the Government would take advantage of such a condition; you do not suppose that they would name the ten new senators from Manitoba until after a general election." I said, "Do not trust them." I was right then, and I am right now; but my leaders said: "Oh, the Government will not avail themselves of such an opportunity when our blood is being shed on the battlefields, and when our money is being spent by the hundreds of millions." But up to last night the Government has taken advantage of the situation, to the detriment of the rights and interests of the great Liberal electorate of the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Does my honourable friend state that Sir Robert Borden agreed not to appoint any senators?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, I am just saying that it is a pity that we did not have that agreement in writing. The understanding was not an agreement between Sir Robert Borden, the leader of the Government, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the leader of the Opposition. They came to an agreement as gentlemen, not as politicians, that the representation in Parliament should remain in statu quo. Does the honourable gentlemen know that?

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: No, and I do not think my honourable friend does either.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I refer the honourable gentleman to Sir Robert Borden and Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Sir Robert Borden has kept faith in regard to part of that agreement; he has not kept faith in regard to the part of it which affects the dignity, the justice, and the honour of this House. That is what I find fault with, and it is that with which the country will find fault. Sir Robert Borden and his Government cannot know too soon that if he continues to fill Liberal vacancies with strong, hearty, young, reliable Tories——

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: —he will find a strong, hearty, young, Liberal electorate in the country to punish him. The time is coming. It is only a matter of a few days until he will have to appeal to the electorate of the country.

The resolution proposed by the honourable the senior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) is perfectly in order and is more than justified. All it can do is to show the opinion of this House in regard to the state of things political as they exist to-day between the Government, the Parliament, and the people. I fully endorse the remarks which he made, and I hope that this expression of opinion will have some influence upon the Prime Minister of this country. I doubt it, because the influences surrounding him are too strong to allow him to act independently, honourably, and fairly by this honourable House and the people of the country.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I have done.

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I know you are glad, but you will get more of it before it is over, and you will get it on the raw hide, too. By way of showing the party spirit during this war, prominent members of the House of Commons resigned their seats and went to Manitoba to bolster up the rotten Government there that was driven from power, and I believe that some of them are in this House to-day.

Hon. JOHN W. DANIEL: Honourable gentlemen, I must say that I am a little surprised at this motion when I consider the source from which it comes. I think that most of the members of this House, on both sides of Your Honour, generally give the honourable member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) credit for possessing a good logical mind and a good memory for political occurrences of the past. I should like to remind the honourable gentleman of the stand which the Liberal party took when under the leadership of Sir Wilfrid Laurier they were formerly in Opposition in the House of Commons. I know that I am speaking correctly when I state that they took the position that, as soon as an equality of members on either side occurred in the Senate, the party in power should appoint alternately Conservatives and Liberals.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Who took that position?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The statement was made to me by an honourable gentleman who at that time was one of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's chief supporters and who afterwards became a member of his Cabinet. After Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power, and after he got a large majority in this House, that same gentleman called the attention of his leader to the policy which had been advocated when they were in Opposition, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier acknowledged the corn, but said, "Well, you know, there are a great many difficulties in the way." I think the Liberal party in this Chamber are given to squealing a little too early. They squealed when they were formerly in Opposition because they could not get their men in, and now they are squealing and saying that the Government should not be allowed to carry out the policy which has been followed by every Government from 1867 to the present time.

I think the honourable gentleman from Halifax said that on account of the extension of Parliament the present Government could not make any more appointments to the Senate. The extension of the term of Parliament to which he refers was granted. It was granted for one purpose, and for one purpose only—the vigorous carrying on of the war and the avoidance of an election under war conditions. I ask, honourable gentlemen, is it not really incumbent upon the Government of the day—is it not absolutely essential, if they wish to vigorously carry on the war—to have a sufficient number of members in this House to give their measures the support which will enable them to successfully carry on war operations? The very argument which the honourable gentleman from Halifax has presented to this House, and which he says should prevent the Government appointing Conservative members of this House, is to my mind one of the strongest arguments why they should do so.

The Senate of Canada, I believe, is differently constituted from any other legislative body in the world. I quite agree with the opinion expressed some time ago in this Chamber by the honourable gentleman from De Lorimièr (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), that the Government of the day should have at least a small majority in this House. As we all know, the efforts of the present Government in 1912, very shortly after they were returned to power by the people, when they wished to make a contribution towards the Royal Navy in order to prepare for the time which many people saw approaching when there would be war between Germany and the present Allies, were absolutely paralysed, so that they could not put into force a policy which they thought was right and proper under the circumstances. I do not think it was the intention of the framers of Confederation that the members of this House, appointed by the method which was adopted, would continue to act in a purely partisan manner when they came into this House. If the fathers of Confederation had foreseen any such thing I do not believe they would have advocated the present mode of appointing members to this House. I think the people generally are disappointed that the members of this House do not take a different view of their duties, and do not carry them out more after the manner of judges, for instance, after they are appointed. Most of the judges, before their appointment, have taken a very active part in the politics of this country; but, once they are appointed to the Bench, they throw their party proclivities to one side and deal with matters that come before them in a non-partisan manner. That, I take it, was the idea of the fathers of Confederation when they placed the appointment of the members of this House in the hands of the Governor General, which I presume means the Government of the day.

For these reasons, I think the motion of the honourable member for Halifax should not be considered for a moment as being more than a little by-play to fill out an hour or two and to give the members of this House something to talk about. I think he must realize that, under the present circumstances and the necessity for an extension of the term of Parliament, due to the war, no Government could do otherwise than what this Government has done, and done very slowly. I think the Government would have done much better if it had filled up the vacancies as rapidly as they occurred. Even now there are a number of seats which have not been filled, and in my opinion they should be filled. I shall have very much pleasure in voting against the motion.

Hon. T. L. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I would be disposed to go a long way to agree with some of the remarks which have been made by the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat. I am one of those who regret that this country has not yet grown big enough to have vacancies in this important House filled irrespective of partisanship, and not exclusively by the appointment of persons who have strong political opinions. I think that this honourable Chamber could render very valuable services to the country at large, and would render those services much more effectively, if it were more evenly divided and there were less politics in it than there is at present.

But the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Daniel) has misapprehended the purport of the motion of the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power). The honourable gentleman from Halifax makes his motion not for the purpose of objecting to the Government filling vacancies in this House by the appointment of persons favourable to the political faith of the Government in power. It is but fair to do that, and I am quite sure that the honourable gentleman does not expect that anything different will be done; but, as I understand, he takes the ground that there was an understanding between the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition, that this understanding was the result of a pact between the Liberals and the Conservatives in the House of Commons in 1916 when the life of Parliament was extended for one year, and by his resolution he submits that the appointment of new senators is a violation of that understanding and is in the nature of a breach of faith.

One has only to refer to what was said by both the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition in 1916 to see that the position taken by my honourable friend from Halifax is perfectly justified. I would refer honourable gentlemen to Hansard of 1916. In the first volume, at page 624, it will be found that the Prime Minister, speaking of correspondence that had been exchanged between himself and the leader of the Opposition in the fall of 1915 on the subject of a truce between the parties, and especially on the question of the prorogation of Parliament, said:

I had a conference with my right honourable friend on the 14th October and, later, on the 2nd November. Certain correspondence took place between us with which, as we agreed, neither he nor I need trouble the House or the country at the present time. Generally speaking, the discussion which took place between my right honourable friend and myself was along these lines: as to the advisability of an extension for one year after peace, or for one year absolutely; the avoidance of any general election during the war; the proposal that by-elections should not be contested in the meantime, and that each party should retain the seats it now holds, or had held previously to the vacancy; the suspension of party warfare during a war which obviously threatens the existence of the Empire; and, lastly, the restriction of legislation to matters arising out of the war, or occasioned thereby, or directly connected therewith, except possibly minor matters or matters of urgent need and unavoidable necessity as to which I would desire to consult my right honourable friend.

That was the statement made by the honourable the leader of the Government.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Was anything said to the effect that the Government of the day would make no appointments during that time, or that nominations for appointments would be left to the leader of the Opposition or to some body formed for that purpose?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I have read the words of the right honourable the Prime Minister, and the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Daniel) can interpret those words for himself, as I can for myself. But I submit to this honourable House that the meaning of those words was that a truce had been offered by the Prime Minister to the leader of the Opposition and that matters were to remain in statu quo pending the dissolution of Parliament. I think that those words are perfectly clear, and the only question is whether good faith has been kept with this honourable House. What was the answer given by the honourable the leader of the Opposition?

Hon. Mr. TANNER: Did Sir Wilfrid Laurier ever agree to that?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am just going to quote the answer of the leader of the Opposition. I am referring, at page 634 of Hansard, to part of the speech which was made by the right honourable the leader of the Opposition in answer to Sir Robert Borden:

There is another consideration. If we pass this resolution I take it as a pledge from the Government that we shall be delivered from the threat, which was held over our heads last year, of an instantaneous and premature dissolution at any time the Government thought fit. If the Government asks us to extend the life of Parliament, I take it that there will be no election until the fall of 1917. We shall then know exactly where we are, and shall not be subject to all the uncertainties which have been hanging over us for the last twelve months.

That was, I think, a clear acceptance of the proposition as made by the Prime Minister; and the proposition was made not only in his speech but in the written correspondence which had been exchanged between himself and the leader of the Opposition, and to which he referred.

What do we now see? We see that, after this promise made by the Prime Minister that no legislation of any consequence should be enacted within the extension of the term of Parliament, a measure is proposed which is very much contested in the country. In fact, a number of members of the other House, speaking on the question of a referendum, stated that if the proposed measure were referred to the people it would receive the support of a large majority in the country. I do not say that that is my own opinion; I am referring to the opinion expressed by a number of leading members of the House of Commons of Conservative persuasion. The Conscription Bill is a very, very grave measure. It is brought up during the very term of the extension of Parliament and in the face of the promise made a few months before by the Prime Minister that if the extension were granted no contentious legislation would be brought before Parliament within the term of the extension.

A ministerial organ, the Montreal Gazette, in its issue of last Saturday, July 14, referring to the passage of that very measure, takes this position:

It is the desire of the Liberal conscriptionists, about 20 in all, who are prepared to support a Union Government, that there be an appeal to the country. They believe that success at the polls would be their justification in changing leaders, and that a Union Government is necessary for the reconstruction period as well as during the war. An immediate election would give a long lease of power, while a parliamentary extension would only lead to further difficulties at the end of the war or the term for which Parliament would be extended.

Interest has now changed to the fate of the Military Service Bill in the Senate. Liberal senators have refused to enter into negotiations with Conservatives to secure the passage of this measure. The vote in the Senate on party lines is equal, but Senators Landry and Montplaisir will vote against the Bill, so that the vacancies must be filled to make certain of its passage. It is understood that all the Senate vacancies with the exception of two or three in Ontario will be filled at once, thus guaranteeing a good majority independent of the Liberals, who have recently become very non-committal on their policy toward the Military Service Bill. A number of the new senators, probably those from Quebec, will be named to-morrow.

We have the statement made by the main organ of the Government to the effect that while the Government disregarded the pledge given during the last session, when the term of this Parliament was extended, that no contentious legislation should be brought down, the Government will go the length of filling all vacancies in this House for the very purpose of enabling itself to carry out this kind of legislation.

I think I have shown in this honourable House that I am not a partisan. I have very often thought it my duty to give my support to Government Bills, whether the Government was Conservative or Liberal; I have been guided solely by the light of my own conscience; but I must say that I have a high opinion as to what should be the dignity of this honourable House, and I strongly resent the position in which this honourable House is placed by such acts as I have had the privilege of laying before you.

Hon. A. B. CROSBY: Honourable gentlemen, I regret the ruling of his honour the Speaker, though I am taking no exception to it, because it seems to me——

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman cannot discuss the ruling of the Chair.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I am not going to discuss the ruling of the Chair, but the resolution. My honourable friend probably thinks he knows what I am going to talk about, but it is always better to listen before attempting to answer. What I wanted to say was that his honour the Speaker, in ruling this resolution in order, declared that it would have no effect. If it has no effect, and can have none, it is not worth very much of the time of this honourable House. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the arguments of the honourable gentleman who preceded me (Hon. Mr. Béique); but, although he argued very well, he did not discuss the resolution, but spoke upon another subject. The resolution states that the appointment of new senators prior to the dissolution of Parliament would be an act of partisanship. Now, I should like to ask the honourable gentleman who moved the resolution (Hon. Mr. Power) if he means that after the dissolution of Parliament the Government may appoint new senators.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Much less.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I am asking the honourable gentleman who moved the resolution.

Hon. Mr. POWER: What is the point?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The honourable gentleman who moved the resolution ought to be able to answer my question. The motion states that the appointment of new senators prior to the dissolution of Parliament would be an act of partisanship derogatory to the prestige and dignity of this House. The honourable gentleman knows as well as I do that after the dissolution of Parliament the Government remains in office until after the election is held. Would the honourable gentleman expect the Government to make the appointments after dissolution?

Hon. Mr. POWER: That is a hypothetical question. If when Parliament has been dissolved the honourable gentleman asks me again, I may be in a position to give him an answer.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: That shows how much there is in this resolution. I have known the honourable gentleman for a long time and look upon him as one of the highest literary men we have in Nova Scotia. I might go further. He has been looked upon as an authority on questions of procedure and order; but, when my honourable friend brings in a resolution the first line of which he cannot explain, I am satisfied that he has practically no knowledge of the question.

The honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran), during the short time I have had the honour of being a member of this honourable House, has made many speeches; but there has been no difference in them, no matter what was the motion before the House. Whether it referred to Vancouver or China or Japan he made always the same speech, and it was not a partisan speech. The right honourable gentleman who nominated him for this honourable House certainly must have known he was not a partisan, and, at least since I have been a member of this honourable House, he has shown himself to be entirely free from partisanship.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You are making a mistake there.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: There is a great deal of difference between a partisan and a man having a political opinion. What kind of men should be appointed to the Senate? Should a man be appointed who has no politics? Where could such a man be found? It may be my view that protection is the best thing for this country; another honourable gentleman may think that free trade is the best thing; and another honourable gentleman may believe in a little free trade and a litlte protection. We all have the right to our own views, and we certainly have our views and principles; there is no good man in this House who has not been selected for some good reason or other.

Coming to the question of the existence of an agreement, the honourable gentleman from Halifax knows very well that there was no agreement. I will undertake to say that he has not the authority of his leader to say that there was an agreement between the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition. Has he asked the leader of his party if such an agreement existed?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It is in Hansard.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The honourable gentleman distinctly says no. I would have expected this motion to come from somebody who was not so well posted in parliamentary matters; but, when a gentleman of the knowledge and experience of my honourable friend, who prides himself on that kind of thing, brings in such a resolution, what are we to think? We are always glad to listen to the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran). He has his views and I have mine. I am prepared to argue with him on these questions at any time; but I say that this resolution has no foundation on fact, and the honourable gentleman who has introduced it knows that.

The honourable gentleman says: "Do not appoint senators until after dissolution of Parliament." I ask, when is the Government going to appoint them? He cannot tell me. Did any honourable gentleman ever hear of anything more ridiculous than an honourable member of this House asking that a certain thing should not be done for a certain time, and when he is asked when it should be done he cannot answer. The fact that a gentleman of the standing of the honourable gentleman from Halifax is responsible for this resolution makes it all the more ridiculous, if that is not too strong a word—makes it all the more unreasonable that we should accept such a resolution.

My honourable friend complains of the Government for not filling the vacancies in the House of Commons. If the vacancies in the House of Commons have not been filled, is it not well to have the vacancies in this House filled, in order that the people should have representatives here? There has been only one gentleman elected to the other House apart from partisan considerations; I refer to Mr. Copp, the member for the county of Westmorland. Notwithstanding the fact that the Liberal Conservative party had nominated a candidate to contest that seat, what did they do? Notwithstanding the fact that there was no agreement, no understanding, they withdrew their candidate and let Mr. Copp go in by acclamation. Can any honourable gentleman point out a single case in which partisan support was withdrawn by the Liberal party when a Conservative candidate was nominated? I do not think I would have been a member of this House, even if I had been an ardent Liberal, even a calm and collected Liberal like my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran). I think that is reasonable. I am a member of this House, and I hope and trust that I may conduct myself so as to meet the approval of every honourable member, no matter what his views may be in regard to the Government of this country. We have had some elections forced upon us. Take, for instance, the election in Dorchester. My honourable friend laughs. Why should he laugh?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I laugh because the ministers of the Crown told the people that if conscription came into force they could leave the country and just cross the boundary of the United States which was close by.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Not before the election came on.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The trouble is that, while a man's memory may be very good and very exact on many occasions, sometimes he forgets about things, and that is where partisanship shows up. I do not wish to get into a controversy with my honourable friend, but it is very clear in my mind that that was not said.

The question of putting up a Conservative candidate was never mooted but a candidate was nominated by the other side to oppose him. My honourable friend from Halifax knows that there was no agreement; but there was an idea or an intention to make an agreement, and I am not going too far when I say that I believe that the leader of the Government of this country wished to make an agreement. Whether he did or not, my honourable friend knows that there was no agreement, but only a kind of understanding, something flying through the air, which indicated that there should be an agreement, and as a result of that we allowed the seat in Westmorland to go without a contest; and my honourable friend from that county (Hon. Mr. McSweeney) at least will agree with me that there would have been a good contest. We cannot very well order the House of Commons to open up the seats in that House. I think that honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House as well as honourable gentlemen on this side have had something to do with elections, and know very well that it is a great thing when one is running an election, especially a by-election, to be running in favour of the Government, and that, if the Government wanted to open up those constituencies one at a time, their candidates would be running under more favourable circumstances than those in Opposition. Therefore I say that when the Government did not open up those constituencies they were not taking advantage of all their opportunities.

There was a Bill before this House not very long ago, and it was passed, providing for further representation in this Chamber from the West. The West should be represented here, and it would be more strongly represented here than it is but for the fact that that Act was so amended that appointments could not be made until after the dissolution of Parliament. Can there be anything more farcical than honourable gentlemen coming here and asking the Government not to appoint any more senators until the dissolution of Parliament? The Act says "new senators." I think myself that a mistake was made, but at that time this House did not intimate for a moment that the vacancies in the Senate should be left open. Nobody ever thought anything of the kind. I am sorry that my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Power) has left the Chamber. He never thought of any such thing. It never entered his mind until now.

But suppose that there had been an agreement, in writing and under seal, would not that agreement have been broken by reason of the situation which has developed in the other House? What is the condition in the other House? The Opposition comes up, after having turned a somersault—and I believe they are turning them yet—to say, "We are not going to do this year what we did last year." Was not the agreement broken last night? If there is anything in the world on which my honourable friend can base his argument I would be glad to know what it is. There is not one reason, not one single situation, not one intimation, nothing that he could possibly bring up, as a reason for introducing this resolution.

I am not going to weary the House. My honourable friend from Victoria will say that is what I am doing.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, no, I am listening with pleasure.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I consider that a very high compliment.

My honourable friend who moved this resolution should have been in the other House last night. I think that the motion should be withdrawn and that it would be unfair to divide the House on it. I am not speaking in a partisan sense; there is no partisanship in my make-up. I admit freely and distinctly that I have my political views and always will have, but I do not set myself up as a partisan. I want to play my part in this Parliament.

My honourable friend has spoken about the dignity of this Parliament. If the dignity of this Parliament is not what he would like to have it, there is nothing in the world to prevent his handing in his resignation. That is a question that only he can decide.

Hon. J. J. DONNELLY: Honourable gentlemen, while speaking in support of his motion the honourable member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) based his argument largely on the fact that he believed that there had been an agreement that party strife should cease. If the honourable gentleman had been anxious to get any evidence that party strife had not ceased, I think he had only to listen to the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran), who followed him in what to my mind was a strong party speech. There are other evidences that party strife has not ceased. A great deal of campaign literature emanating from the Liberal headquarters has been circulated through the country during the last few months. I do not believe that there has been any agreement between the leaders of the two parties that vacancies in this honourable House should not be filled. I do not think there is any warrant for saying that there was such an agreement. If there was, the parties to the agreement would be the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition. I sat in the gallery of the House of Commons last night for some time and listened to the leader of the Opposition advancing reasons why the term of this Parliament should not be extended. He did not include among his reasons any charge that the Government had violated any agreement of this nature. I am satisfied that no such agreement was ever made.

The honourable member for Halifax appeared to be very anxious lest the incoming Government might find themselves with a minority in the Senate. I do not remember that in 1912 the honourable gentleman expressed any great sorrow that such a condition existed at that time. He was quite satisfied at that time that the leader of the Government in the Senate should have a minority, while the leader of the Opposition had a majority of about thirty.

My principal reason for rising is to refer to the remarks of the honourable member for de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique). He read extracts from the speech of the Prime Minister and the speech of the leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, and based his argument on what he claimed was an agreement that no legislation of a contentious nature should be introduced. As I listened to the extracts which the honourable gentleman read, I understood that the Prime Minister said that any measure affecting the war would be excluded. Surely the measure of conscription is a measure affecting the carrying on of the war. I believe that the Prime Minister is convinced in his heart that it is very important that this measure should be passed and should be enforced; and, believing as he does, he regards it as his duty to appoint senators to fill the vacancies in this House, to see that that measure receives a majority in this House when it comes before it.

Hon. GEORGE LYNCH-STAUNTON: Honourable gentlemen, it seems to me, from what the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Béique) read from Hansard, that Sir Robert Borden agreed that he would not do certain things. Now, the honourable gentleman, as a lawyer, knows that every agreement not to do certain enumerated acts excludes all others. If honourable gentlemen are thinking only of what their position will be when the next Parliament meets, how can any such agreement in any way benefit them? Under the statute for the appointment of new senators, they must be appointed by this Government, and, if this Government must appoint them, they must do so before the new Government comes in; consequently, the Conservative party will in any event have a majority here when the next Parliament assembles. So it seems to me that all the advantage for the Opposition would be the present advantage of being able to defeat some legislation which might be proposed within the next two or three months.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I feel some diffidence in rising to speak on a question which necessitates the striking of the discordant note of partizanship in this Chamber. I think it was singularly unfortunate that the honourable the senior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) considered it his bounden duty to import into this House the discussion of a matter having so little foundation as the one under consideration. I was not at all surprised at my honourable friend the member for Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) dealing with this question. I did, however, expect him to charge the member for Halifax with stealing his thunder, as the honourable gentleman has clearly done. I remember that my honourable friend from Victoria did, some time ago, make a speech filled with righteous indignation at the idea of vacancies in this Senate being filled during the war, but that the echo of it should have been taken up by my honourable friend the senior member for Halifax is a surprise to me.

My honourable friend from Halifax probably labours under the impression that he is not animated by that bitter partizanship which characterizes some politicians. I think the honourable gentleman really does labour under not only the illusion, but the delusion, that he has been able to exclude from his judicial and impartial mind all sense of partisanship and is dealing on impartial and judicial terms with all questions which come before this House. However, I look forward with a certain amount of Christian fortitude and resignation to my honourable friend being consistent during the remainder of his life as a strong partisan of the Liberal party, not excluding his feeling in any pronouncement which he may make upon any question which comes up for consideration by this honourable House.

I would not have risen on this occasion, notwithstanding the speeches which have been made by my honourable friends opposite, if I were not fully convinced that the stand which they have taken upon this question is absolutely unjustified, and that those honourable gentlemen understand fairly well that such is the case. I cannot, however, leave unchallenged the statement that there was an agreement between the two leaders and between the two great political parties in Canada that vacancies in this honourable House should not be filled during the continuance of the war. I say, in the first place, most emphatically, without any qualification whatever, that no such agreement was ever entered into. I say, in the second place, that the leader of the Liberal party, the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, has never attempted to assert that such an agreement was entered into. The right honourable gentleman sat in his place in the House of Commons when it was represented, or misrepresented, by one of his followers in the House, that there was such an agreement, and he did not for a moment attempt to confirm or corroborate the assertion that there was any such agreement, or that any arrangement existed which could be tortured into an agreement to the effect that the Prime Minister of Canada should not fill vacancies in the Senate during the continuance of the war. I say, furthermore, that I am absolutely convinced that if my honourable friend, before placing this motion on the Order Paper, had approached the leader of the Liberal party, that right honourable gentleman would have had sufficient honour to have told him that there was never any such agreement, and that there was nothing to warrant any such conclusion as that which has been sought to be drawn from the very shadowy agreement which my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) read this afternoon from Hansard. Allow me to say that my honourable friend from de Salaberry has not shown his usual skill as a lawyer of great note and distinction in his native province, in drawing that conclusion from the remarks which were made by the Prime Minister. I venture to say, without any hesitation, that if my honourable friend were asked to give an opinion upon this language to a client, and if the client asked the honourable gentleman if he would be warranted in drawing that conclusion from the statement made by the Prime Minister, my honourable friend from de Salaberry would have said, "No, it warrants no such conclusion."

Let me say, further, that what the Prime Minister did refer to in February, 1916, when he was addressing the House of Commons on this question, was an agreement that had been established by correspondence exchanged between himself and the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier; but, owing to certain happenings which took place shortly after that correspondence, the so-called agreement fell to the ground, and there was no agreement nor any arrangement of a continuing character after the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier refused to agree to certain proposals advanced by the Prime Minister during those negotiations. Consequently, for a period before Parliament prorogued in 1916, such an agreement did not exist.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: May I ask if we are to understand that it was not agreed in the terms stated by the Prime Minister and by the leader of the Opposition that there should be a truce between the parties to the extent mentioned?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will explain that, and I shall explain it to the satisfaction of my honourable friend. The Prime Minister said:

> Certain correspondence took place between us with which, as we agreed, neither he nor I need trouble the House or the country at the present time. Generally speaking, the discussion which took place between my right honourable friend and myself was along these lines:—

—"the discussion which took place." It was not an agreement.

> —as to the advisability of an extension for one year after peace or for one year absolutely; the avoidance of any general election during the war; the proposal that by-elections should not be contested in the meantime, and that each party—

Will my honourable friend pardon the emphasis I place upon these words?

> —in the meantime, and that each party should retain the seats it now holds, or has held previously to the vacancy.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Seats in the Senate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, not in the Senate, and my honourable friend knows very well it is not seats in the Senate. Then a difference occurred between the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition as to the filling of certain vacancies and the avoidance of by-elections, and this agreement then fell through.

Now, let me ask honourable gentlemen who say there was a truce, to what extent have they, to what extent has the Liberal party, contributed to the observance of a truce from that time down to the present?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The election of Mr. Kemp.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I appeal to honourable gentlemen in this House, if they desire to play this game fairly, to point out to me, in answering that question, a single public act by which they have contributed, and which they to-day regret?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The election of Kemp in Toronto.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Did those honourable gentlemen not wish to win the war? Did they not wish to join with the Conservative party in the effort to win this conflict upon which we ventured? Were their sympathies not with the Allies in this war? Will they point out to me wherein they joined hand in hand with this Government and what it is they now regret because, forsooth, certain vacancies in the Senate have been filled? Honourable gentlemen will have the opportunity, if they desire it, to show to what extent in their magnanimity and generosity they have observed this truce and assisted the Government beyond what they would otherwise have done. I am not aware that they have done so.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The election of Mr. Kemp in Toronto.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: There was no chance in Toronto.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have asked my honourable friends on the Liberal side to point out their acts of magnanimity, generosity, and patriotism, in which they practised self-denial and abstained from partisanship. But I will point out to my honourable friend wherein this Government, showing large generosity and absolutely eliminating all political feeling, has contributed to the public service during this very critical period. This Government could have brought on every by-election in Canada. Did it do so? No. This Government could have declared for a general election. Did it do so? My honourable friends know perfectly well that there was a period when this Government did want to bring on a general election—

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: —when the leader of the Liberal party appealed to them in the strongest and most convincing language that it would be unpatriotic to do so; and they consulted the feeling which he so expressed. Have the Liberal party desisted from attacking, in season and out of season, from early morning till dewy eve, the Conservative Government in regard to its policy since the beginning of this war? I say there has never been a moment when the Liberal party, in any portion of this Dominion, have let up in their attacks upon this Government in relation to its war administration.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They have the right to attack.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend knows very well that this country has been deluged with the literature of their political organizations, attacking this Government in the most vicious way—literature that within its four corners contains more misrepresentation, more of the spirit of party strife, more bitterness and venom, than ever issued from the party press at any previous time. I have some of this literature before me—

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: Franked by the whip of the Liberal party.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: —and we find that bound volumes of the Canadian Liberal Monthly can be obtained for $1.50.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Did you get any?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This, honourable gentlemen, is current literature, not ante-war literature. The first volume runs from September, 1913, to September, 1914; the second volume from September, 1914, to September, 1915, and the third volume from September, 1915, to September, 1916; and they deal with such subjects as war scandals. I am referring to publication No. 47. And yet my honourable friend the senior member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), in his innocence, in the purity of his mind, would convince this honourable House that the conditions of a truce are being carried out. Here I find—and my honourable friend to my left, the Honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry), may be interested in the inside story of the Conservative-Nationalist alliance—"Why Sir Robert has kept Bourassa's colleagues in his ministry."

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I leave it to your colleague, Mr. Sévigny, to answer that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This pamphlet consists of extracts from articles published by Mr. Bourassa and from records of the House of Commons; and yet my honourable friend who has moved this resolution would, peradventure, have us believe that a truce, not only in the letter, but in the spirit, has been observed by the Liberal party. And now we have tariff reduction by the Liberals, free wheat, free agricultural implements, free potatoes, free food—the only thing not admitted is, apparently, free cement. I refer to only a few of these documents; but I am informed that a sufficient number of volumes have been issued to establish a fairly good library for any thinking politician.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Has the honourable gentleman any literature from the other side?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: There is none.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will venture to say that my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Béique) has not received any. I would say, furthermore, that during this so-called truce the Liberal party has never desisted for one moment from hounding particularly the French ministers who represent Quebec in this Government, and who have been patriotic enough to give their service to the carrying on of this war. From the time the Hon. Mr. Monk entered this Government down to th present time there has not been a French minister in this Government who has not been hounded to his political death, so to speak, by the Liberal party, not only in the province of Quebec, but throughout the whole Dominion. Owing to that pressure the Hon. Mr. Monk had to resign, the Hon. Mr. Pelletier had to resign, and we know that the Hon. Mr. Casgrain had——

Hon. Mr. POWER: Will the honourable gentleman pardon me for interrupting? Do I understand that the Hon. Mr. Monk retired on account of attacks?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, I would say that unhesitatingly. I happen to know why the Hon. Mr. Monk retired: the Liberal party, through its misrepresentations in the province of Quebec, made it impossible for the Hon. Mr. Monk to discharge his public duties with satisfaction to himself and to the province of Quebec.

Then, has the Liberal party ever desisted from attacking the Government in its war policy? We can recall that last session and the session before the most serious charges were brought against the Government in reference to their munition contracts and their munition policy.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: And the Ross rifle.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We very well know that a minister of the Crown was practically placed on trial before a commission—which exonerated him. And yet, notwithstanding these facts, my honourable friends will deliberately rise in their places and charge the Conservative party with violating a political or a party truce during the carrying on of the war.

I am sure my honourable friends on the opposite side will not consider that I am speaking in any venomous tone or from any spirit of antagonism to them, for some of my best personal friends are those on the other side of the House; but, as I viewed my honourable friends opposite while they listened to the very judicial statement made by the senior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), and the very intense and indignant statement made by the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran), and attempted to look serious—attempted, in fact, to look outraged at this violation which was going on of the truce between both political parties—it did appear to me a grotesque situation indeed.

It seems to me that there could be no better refutation of the charges made by my honourable friend from Halifax and other honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House than the partisanship which they have exhibited this afternoon in charging the Government with violation of a so-called agreement which I say never existed, and which, if it did exist, could not possibly be tortured into any such meaning as my honourable friends would attach to it.

I do not wish to continue this discussion except to say that my honourable friend from de Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) could scarcely have been serious when he attempted to give the House the impression that conscription would be excluded from the measures which the Government would be justified in bringing before Parliament under the statement made by the Prime Minister. These are the Prime Minister's words:

> Lastly, the restriction of legislation to matters arising out of the war.

Can my honourable friend by any process of reasoning come to the conclusion that conscription is not a measure arising out of the war? If my honourable friend's interpretation is correct, then I have no knowledge of the meaning of language.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Have you read the following language?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have read all of it, and I venture to say that the Prime Minister has made it as clear as the light of day, and that there is no obscurity about it. In any measure that would contribute to the winning of the war the Government had the greatest possible freedom: it was their duty to introduce that measure into Parliament, and it was the duty of both sides to give it their unanimous support.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Is it not the fact that the Prime Minister declared at that time that it was not the intention to introduce any measure of conscription?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. (Reading):

— and, lastly, the restriction of legislation to matters arising out of the war, or occasioned thereby, or directly connected therewith, except possibly minor matters, or matters of urgent need and unavoidable necessity as to which I would desire to consult my right honourable friend.

Allow me to say, in conclusion, that notwithstanding the protest which has been made by honourable gentlemen opposite with regard to the filling of vacancies in the Senate, the Government, in view of the fact that no such arrangement was ever entered into, either expressed or implied, intend, in the administration of the public affairs of this Dominion, to fill up every vacancy at the earliest day possible.

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Honourable gentlemen, as the mover of the resolution, I think I have the right to say a few words in reply to the honourable gentleman (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) who has just taken his seat. To my surprise, the honourable gentleman seemed to misapprehend the position which I took. I appeal to honourable gentlemen to say if I said, in the few remarks which I made in introducing this resolution, that there had been any agreement with respect to the filling of vacancies in the Senate. I did not say that. What I did say was that there had been an agreement, a sort of truce, made practically to the effect that there should be no partisan warfare, and that there should be no contested elections. I then took the line that under these circumstances, if the vacancies in the Commons were not to be filled, and if there was to be practically no partisan advantage taken, that understanding should apply to this House also. It was a natural consequence. I concur with the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) in thinking that it is to be regretted that the agreement between the leaders of the two parties had not embodied that provision and that the agreement was not reduced to writing.

The honourable the leader of the Government undertakes to tell us that the Opposition have opposed, with the most bitter hostility, I understood him to say, almost every action of the Government having the purpose of bringing the war to a successful termination. The honourable gentleman has apparently forgotten that there has never been any opposition to any Government measure calculated to bring the war to a successful issue. The Government have introduced measures in order to realize such sums of money as no Canadian ever dreamed of before. There was never any criticism of these proposals of the Government; the Opposition united with the followers of the Government in voting the most liberal sums for war purposes. Does the honourable gentleman think that the Liberals of this country should have sat by when the revelations in connection with Colonel Allison, for instance, were made? Does the honourable gentleman think that the members should have sat quietly in their places and made no criticism?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, decidedly not; but I do say that, when honourable gentlemen profess to believe that there was a truce and that they observed it in every particular, they are not justified in carrying on party warfare, which is perfectly legitimate——

Hon. Mr. POWER: I may say that I have not carried on any party warfare on any matter connected with the war; but where would the country be to-day if the Government had been allowed to continue doing the things that were being done in connection with the contracts in which Colonel Allison was involved?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is not that the best evidence that there was no truce?

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think the honourable gentleman should express his gratitude to the Opposition for having saved the Government from the depths of iniquity to which they would otherwise have gone. It is all very well for the honourable gentleman to get up with a show of indignation, which I believe is only show, and denounce the conduct of the Opposition. The Opposition in this House, at any rate, have given the Government very little trouble in connection with the war, and do not propose to give them any unnecessary trouble. We are not discussing the question of conscription now, and I repeat that I quite concur in what was said by the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) some time ago. We should have all our agreements with the honourable gentlemen in writing, and the agreement which has been mentioned—the viva voce agreement—should have embodied provisions for appointments to the Senate as well as for elections to the House of Commons.

The motion was negatived on division.

PRIVATE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill N2, an Act respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Beaubien.

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA JURISDICTION BILL.

THE BILL WITHDRAWN.

Hon. J. P. B. CASGRAIN moved the second reading of Bill C, an Act to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I may be permitted to read the Bill, so that honourable gentlemen may understand what is desired:

1. The appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada is abolished in all cases where the matter in dispute relates to property and civil rights in any of the provinces or to matters of a merely local or private nature and coming within the exclusive jurisdiction of the legislature of any of the provinces according to the meaning of the British North America Act, 1867, and Acts amending the same.

2. This Act shall not apply to cases decided by the Exchequer Court of Canada nor to cases where the matter in dispute affects the constitutionality or validity of any act or statute of any of the said provincial legislatures, which cases continue to be subject to appeal to the said Supreme Court as now or hereafter shall be provided for.

3. This Act shall not apply to appeals already instituted or pending before the said Supreme Court.

As you will see, this Bill follows the same direction as other Bills or resolutions which I have brought before this House. It is intended to restrict the multiplicity of appeals. Last year I had the honour of dealing with restriction of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. It is intended that matters within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures should be dealt with in the provinces. I see the honourable gentleman for Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) looking at me. I have read in Hansard that he approved of that in 1881.

I am not the originator of this Bill. It was presented in another place in 1881 by a gentleman who afterwards became a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada—Mr. Désiré Girouard. At that time there was a very lengthy argument in favour of the Bill, and it was considered very important, even by Sir John A. Macdonald, but it did not become law. As time goes on it becomes more necessary.

We all know that under existing conditions in case of an appeal it is generally the longest purse that wins. There is no doubt in the minds of most of the people of Canada that abuses have been committed, that the weak have been at the mercy of the strong, and that the poor have very often had to come to a settlement, although they had a good case, because they were compelled to run the whole gamut of the courts, going ultimately to the Supreme Court, or perhaps to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The various legislatures have been given the absolute right to legislate on certain matters, and, after a judgment is finally rendered and a lot of expense has been incurred, the legislature at the following session says: "Oh, if that is the way they understand the law, we will amend it," and the law is amended. I could quote many cases of this kind. Would it not be better to have the final decision rendered in our own provinces? This is the system that obtains even in the British Isles. Scotland and Ireland, as I am informed, have their own courts of appeal.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No, the House of Lords.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That is a different court altogether. Many years ago they wanted to establish in England a court of appeal for the British Isles, but Scotland and Ireland protested. The honourable gentleman will not contend that the committee of the House of Lords is a court of appeal.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It is the final court of appeal of Great Britain and Ireland.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The House of Lords is a court of record.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If a measure of this sort were put on the statute book it would stop the multiplicity of appeals, and I believe it would be a move in the right direction. We should take some measure to give the people justice in less time, and for less money, and to prevent the longest purse winning, as it does in many cases.

This is a question of policy, and I desire to draw the attention of the honourable gentleman from Hamilton (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) especially to that fact. It is not a question of law. If it were, I would not venture to speak upon the subject. Across the border, when a local case arises in a state, it is decided within that state under the state laws; the federal laws do not intervene. If the litigants are resident in two different states, the case falls under the federal law; or, if there is trouble between one state and another, that comes under the federal law; but anything arising in a state and coming exclusively within state jurisdiction is decided within the state. I think it would be well if such a system were in effect in this country.

Again, in referring to early volumes of Hansard, I find that some of the legal lights in the House of Commons stated that it was very doubtful whether the Dominion Parliament ever had the right to establish a provincial court of appeal. The authorities to whom I refer are Mr. Girouard and Mr. Henri Taschereau, afterwards Chief Justice of our Superior Court of the province of Quebec. If the central Government had a right to establish provincial courts of appeal, then the right granted to the various provinces at Confederation to establish their own courts would be cancelled.

It must not be supposed that the adoption of this proposal would mean the abolition of the Supreme Court. It would not by any means have that effect. There are any number of other matters that would still remain under the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. They would still retain jurisdiction in matters pertaining to trade and commerce. They would have jurisdiction as to the raising of money by taxation or in any other way. They would also, as at present, have control of all cases regarding navigation and shipping, seacoast and inland fisheries, ferries connecting one province with another, and ferries connecting a Canadian province with any other British territory or with foreign territory. They would also retain under their jurisdiction questions of currency and coinage, banking, the incorporation of banks, the issue of paper money, savings banks, weights and measure, bills of exchange, promissory notes, interest, legal tender, bankruptcy, insolvency, patents of invention or discovery, copyrights, marriage and divorce, all classes of subjects pertaining to the criminal law, federal railways, and all matters not exclusively assigned to the legislatures of the various provinces. Honourable gentlemen will readily see that the usefulness of the Supreme Court of Canada would not be impaired and that the judges of that court would still have plenty to do . The object of the Bill is simply to prevent matters of purely local concern from being carried outside the province. There are not many purely civil cases coming before the Supreme Court, anyway, so the Supreme Court would continue just the same.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman says there are not many civil cases before the Supreme Court?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: With the exception of those subjects which I have mentioned, there are not very many cases affecting civil rights. The matters which come before the Supreme Court are questions affecting trade and commerce and the other subjects which I have read.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Is there any limitation as to the amount to be involved before a case can be sent from the King's Bench of Quebec to the Supreme Court here?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: $2,000.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Will the honourable gentleman permit me to ask him, what is the difference between this Bill and the Bill which he brought up last year?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I shall explain with much pleasure. The Bill which I brought up last year was a Bill to restrict appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Is that the only difference?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I wanted to have the cases tried in Canada, and I think I gave very good reasons.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: We are not speaking of that.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The present Bill is for the purpose of having matters of absolutely local interest decided finally within the province and according to the laws of the province, as local matters are decided in the various states of the American Union.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Have we in this Parliament power to restrict the provinces' right of appeal?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am not attempting to decide a legal question; but the honourable gentleman himself made a speech in another place in favour of this very Bill, which is copied verbatim from the Bill presented by Mr. Désiré Girouard. It will be found, word for word, in Hansard of 1881. Surely I may take it for granted that Mr. Girouard was well qualified as a lawyer. When he presented that Bill and it was discussed in the House of Commons no one raised the question whether or not this Parliament had the right to decide what cases should come before the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I presume that Bill did not become law.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No; it was a private member's Bill, and the session ended before it was disposed of.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I do not see that the point has been settled in favour of the contention of the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), because Mr. Girouard and the others who tried to have a similar measure enacted did not succeed. I think that, before proceeding with this measure, we should ascertain whether we have power to limit the right of appeal given to the provinces. The constitution of our lower courts is left to the provinces, and under the British North America Act——

The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time provide for the constitution, maintenance, and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada and for the establishment of any additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada.

That refers to our Supreme Court; but I do not think we have the right to prevent the legislatures from taking an appeal to this court established by us, nor have we the right to prevent them from going to the Privy Council.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not at all agree with the last speaker. In the first place, it goes without saying that we cannot impose limitations on the exercise of the royal prerogative to allow appeals. The Supreme Court of Canada—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I had not finished my remarks. I stopped because the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) was asking a question. I might cite a concrete case. The great and enlightened province of Ontario, for instance, with all its lawyers and judges, could not decide the question of a ditch in the county of York, it had to be decided by the members of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. There are other instances of that kind. What I claim is that the province of Ontario, or any other province, when dealing with matters exclusively assigned to it by the British North America Act, should have the right to render final judgment. If this war lasts much longer the people will have enough taxes to pay and will have no money to waste on numerous appeals. They will be very glad, in the near future, to adopt a system which will prevent the waste of money in cases which could just as well be decided in the provinces concerned.

I do not wish longer to occupy the attention of this honourable House. I have brought up this question at the request of some legal gentlemen, who are of the same opinion as myself. Last year, when I brought up a similar Bill, I was able to read letters from very prominent lawyers in favour of the measure. This is only the first planting of the seed in the soil; the seed will grow before long, and not only will the provinces decide their own cases, but I dream of the day in the near future when, after this war is over, we shall be able to decide our own affairs without—to use the words of Sir John A. Macdonald himself—having to go 3,000 miles across the water to get justice.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not agree with the honourable gentleman from Stadacona.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I did not decide the question; it was a point in dispute.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: In my opinion this Parliament has ample power to pass this Bill. The Supreme Court of Canada is a purely statutory court, on an entirely different footing from a provincial court. There may be a question about a provincial Act, but if you read the Act creating the Supreme Court of Canada you will find that the matters on which it has jurisdiction are mentioned in detail. Now, Parliament may strike them all out, or it may strike out any one of them.

At the same time, I doubt very much the wisdom of this Bill. The difficulty is that you are drawing the line as to when there is to be an appeal and when there is not, basing the decision upon the difference between a matter of a local or provincial nature and one of a general or Dominion nature. That would mean that in almost every case that comes up there would be a fight in the Supreme Court of Canada as to its jurisdiction—whether the matter in dispute were an entirely local matter or a Dominion matter. We know that the fight on such questions began shortly after 1867 and continues just as intense as it was at the beginning.

I would prefer to see, in place of section 1, a provision which would allow no appeals at all to the Supreme Court of Canada from a provincial court, except where the Supreme Court of Canada itself, on motion, allowed an appeal on the ground that an important point of law had been wrongly decided in a lower court, or there had been a mistake or a total failure of justice. To say that there shall be no appeal from a court is a little tyrannical, and in some of our provinces there are courts inclined a little in that direction. Therefore to abolish all appeals would be unwise and might result in gross injustice. Instead of leaving the door wide open for an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, as at present, an appeal might be allowed on certain specific grounds —first, that an important point of law had been wrongly decided; secondly, that a mistake had been made; and, thirdly, that a fraud of some kind had been committed and had deceived the court. Those three conditions would satisfy me. I think it would be perfectly safe to pass an Act of that kind. I have always thought that that would be the right kind of appeal to allow from a provincial court to the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I cannot agree with the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) as to the advisability of this proposed legislation. In the first place, I think that the honourable gentleman who has just spoken is quite right in saying that this Parliament has the power to limit the jurisdiction of a court of its own creation, but it is only a question whether or not it is advisable to do so. The Supreme Court of Canada was established by the Dominion Parliament. I think it is for the legislature of each province to decide whether the judgments rendered by provincial courts shall be final or may be appealed to the Supreme Court or to the Privy Council; and, as a matter of fact, the legislature of each province passes legislation of that kind. Are we to interfere with that legislation? Is it not logical and more sensible to let the legislatures settle the question whether it is advisable to have an appeal or not? Are we going to deny to the province of Quebec or the province of Ontario or any of the other provinces who may be in favour of allowing an appeal to the Supreme Court—are we going to deny to them that right, and force them to have an appeal to the Privy Council in England? This Parliament can curtail the jurisdiction of a court of its own creation, but this Parliament cannot say that in the province of Quebec a judgment rendered by the Superior Court cannot be appealed to the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I did not make that contention.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Will the honourable gentleman, who has spoken for half an hour, allow other members to have their turn? These interruptions are very disturbing, especially when one is dealing with a question of law. Therefore, without expressing any opinion on the question whether the judgments of a provincial court in civil matters should be appealed to the Supreme Court or not, I say that it is a question for the province to settle for itself, and that it would not be appropriate for this Parliament to settle that question; moreover, that, instead of curtailing the expense, it might open the door to increasing the expense; because, if we deny litigants the right to appeal to the Supreme Court, their only recourse will be an appeal to the Privy Council, and the attempt will be made to appeal many cases to the Privy Council instead of to the Supreme Court, where the costs are much lower.

There is another very serious objection to the Bill as it is drawn. It is sought to abolish the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in all cases where the matter in dispute relates to property and civil rights in any of the provinces. There are a great many cases in which matters of commerce and matters of civil rights are involved, and, in such cases, because a matter of civil rights would be involved, although it might be rather insignificant, the appeal on the commercial matter would also be abolished. Surely that is not the intention of the honourable gentleman.

Then, take the second branch of clause 1, which relates " to matters of a merely local or private nature and coming within the exclusive jurisdiction of the legislature of any of the provinces according to the meaning of the British North America Act." There are cases, and they are in the majority, in which matters coming within the exclusive jurisdiction of the province, and also matters coming within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, arise. The proposal of the Bill would not be practicable; it would tend to create a great deal of disturbance and it would be impossible of application. I hope the honourable gentleman will not insist on the second reading of this Bill. For my part I shall have to enter my vote against it.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The honourable gentleman who introduces this Bill says that it is drawn by a lawyer. To my mind it means, in short, that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall be abolished in all cases excepting those which come within the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada, because, as has already been said, there are two classes of cases in which civil property and civil rights are involved. No action which involves anything substantial excludes property and civil rights; so all actions affecting property, all actions in which there is anything to fight about except theory, are covered by this proposed legislation. The Bill intimates in clear language that it is intended to abolish appeals to the Supreme Court in all provincial actions, because it goes on to declare that it shall not apply to cases decided in the Exchequer Court. Some people think it would be well to abolish the Supreme Court; they think there are too many appeals; but this House should understand that if it votes in favour of this Bill it is going to abolish the Supreme Court in so far as it affects litigation originating in any provincial court. It does not say that the Act shall apply only to civil rights within the jurisdiction of the province, but to all civil rights. Civil rights arise out of trade and commerce; civil rights arise out of taxation; civil rights arise out of navigation and shipping. According to the criminal law and practice in all the provinces, there are very few cases now appealable to the Supreme Court; by the Code they are all terminated in the provincial courts. My view is that any action instituted in a provincial court would have the last appeal in a provincial court, with the right to go to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, if this Bill were passed.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not wish to press the Bill. I presented it at the request of some legal gentlemen. It was drawn by Hon. Mr. Désiré Girouard, for many years a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada; it is not the work of a land surveyor. The provincial legislatures might raise the amount subject to appeal, or fix it so high that cases could not be taken to the Supreme Court. But it was thought that there was a very strong feeling, especially in Quebec, against appeals to the Supreme Court. I think that, when a ditch has to be made in one of the provinces, legal gentlemen should put their heads together and decide on some judicial system in the provinces which would be able to say who is going to pay for it, without having to go to England to find that out. With the permission of the House, I will withdraw the Bill.

The Bill was withdrawn.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

RAILS FOR WAR PURPOSES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired of the Government:

1. Have any rails been taken up on the railways in Canada to be used for war purposes?
2. If so, how many miles of tracks were thus taken up?
3. Where are these miles, if any, located?
4. From what railways were these rails taken?
5. Does the Government know if the whole or some of these rails thus taken up are still in Canada?
6. Did the Government find it impossible to procure rails for war purposes without tearing up rails already laid?
7. Will the Government have also to tear up rails on existing railways to lay the 92 miles of rails announced by the Government to be placed on the Hudson Bay Railway this year?
8. If not, where will the Government procure rails for these 92 miles of the Hudson Bay Railway?
9. If the Government can procure rails for the Hudson Bay Railway without tearing up rails now in use, why not for war purposes?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Yes.
2. We are under agreement with the British authorities to furnish 600 miles of track with the necessary accessories.
3. Shown on plan herewith.
4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Military reasons preclude answering.
6. Yes.
7. No.
8. When the Government made the announcement that 92 miles of rail were to be laid on the Hudson Bay railway this year, the Algoma Steel Company had been under contract since July 20, 1916, to roll this rail, but it is now doubtful whether they will be able to procure the steel to do so, owing to the Imperial Munitions Board requiring same for the manufacture of munitions.
9. Answered by No. 8.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The Senate again went into Committee on Bill 66, an Act to amend the Judges Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed. Hon. Mr. Watson in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved that the following be inserted as section 5:

Sections 20, 22, 25, and 26 of the said Act are repealed, but such repeal shall not be construed to affect the pension of any judge who has resigned or been retired since the passage of this Act.

He said: The sections that it is proposed to repeal were taken from an Act passed in the year 1903. They provide that if a judge has served for twenty or twenty-five years, and has attained the age of seventy or seventy-five years, he may retire on full pay. I do not think there is such a law anywhere else in the civilized world. Previous to that time the law was quite generous to the judges. It allowed a judge to be retired on two-thirds of his salary after fifteen years of service. It was found that certain judges who had been on the Bench for a long time did not retire, and in order to induce them to retire the Act of 1903 was passed, providing that they might retire on full pay. The object of the Bill, of course, was to get gentlemen off the Bench who by reason of age or infirmity were unfitted for their work as judges; but the remedy proved to be much worse than the disease. Up to that time, if a judge had spent fifteen years on the Bench, and felt that he was becoming incompetent, he gained nothing by remaining on the Bench, and naturally he retired, as a rule, on two-thirds of his salary. To-day, when a judge finds himself becoming incompetent, instead of resigning, as he ought to do, he determines to hold on until he has put in his twenty or twenty-five years, so that he may retire on full pay. In the province from which I come we had the spectacle of three gentlemen drawing the pay of Chief Justice at the same time; one had retired under the fifteen years' limit, another had served for twenty-five years, and the third was the acting Chief Justice. I think that this is a particularly objectionable state of affairs, especially when we have the Governor in Council making an appeal to us to save money.

One of my honourable friends, who is tender-hearted, says it would be rather hard on the judges who are now in office. The judges who are now in office have nothing to complain of. Any person who is appointed to an office under the Crown takes that office subject to the possibility of a change in the law. The gentlemen who were in office as judges before 1903 got the advantage of the concession made in the statute of that year. Of course, the judges who are now in office will not fare quite as well as those who have been retired; but, if a judge does not wish to retire on two-thirds of his salary, he can remain in office as long as he pleases, and draw full pay. I think the argument is altogether in favour of putting the judges on substantially the same footing as other civil servants. No other civil servant can draw a pension in excess of two-thirds of his salary. The clause which I propose provides that such appeal shall not be construed to affect the pension of any judge who has resigned or been retired before the passing of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is there anything in the Bill affecting the present Minister of Justice?

Hon. Mr. POWER: He has retired from the Bench on a two-thirds pension.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I have very much pleasure in seconding the motion of the honourable member for Halifax. Section 20 of the Judges Act deals with the superior court judges. Other sections deal with the railway commissioners and judges of the county courts. Section 20 superadds to the old law a provision that had no existence until chapter 138 was passed. It reads as follows:

If any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, or of the Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any superior court in Canada, resigns his office, His Majesty may, by letters patent under the Great Seal of Canada, reciting such judge's age and period of service, grant to him an annuity equal to the salary of the office held by him at the time of his resignation, to commence immediately after his resignation, and to continue thenceforth during his natural life, if such judge has—

(a) attained the age of seventy-five years, and continued in office as judge of one or more of the said courts for twenty years and upwards; or,

(b) attained the age of seventy years, and continued in office as judge of one or more of the said courts for twenty-five years or upwards; or,

(c) continued in office as judge of one or more of the said courts for thirty years or upwards.

The evil that the honourable member for Halifax points out is that judges who have become incompetent and are entitled to superannuation on the basis of two-thirds of their salary are led to hold on until they complete the necessary number of years to retire on full salary. When that sort of thing is going on among the judges of the superior courts, how can we expect common honesty from the men who are working in the drains for $1.50 a day? It is a great scandal in connection with the judiciary, and no injustice will be done by abolishing the practice. Two-thirds of a judge's salary is a very handsome retiring allowance.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Has my honourable friend considered the case of a judge retiring and drawing his pension and then engaging in some other business? If I understand the Act, it is intended to provide that, after a judge has given a certain number of years of service to the country, he shall be entitled to retire and to live comfortably for the rest of his days. I do not think it was intended to provide a salary for a judge who was competent and who might retire simply in order to engage in some other walk of life; yet under the Act this can be done. There are some cases in which it has happened, I believe, and which have caused very severe comment.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I have fully considered that point. The honourable gentleman should not mix two different things. That ought to be dealt with under another section of the Act. It is not connected with section 20 at all. The objection to section 20 is that it enables judges to retire on full pay. The salaries of our own judges are large; and two-thirds would be a very generous allowance. This provision tempts them to hold on after their usefulness is gone. It is a fact within my own knowledge, and it must be within the knowledge of others, that judges hold on for three or four or five years after they have become stone deaf. If anything is said, the explanation is: "Oh, I just want a couple of years more, then I shall be able to retire on my full salary." It places a direct premium on not doing the right thing.

I am going to make another motion with regard to the case of commissioners. A judge may sit as a commissioner and draw fees in addition to his regular salary. A great virtue was made of one of the railway commissioners giving for patriotic purposes $15,000 which he had received as special fees. If he was engaged in a special investigation, what was he doing in regard to the regular duties of his office?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Why should not the system of pensions be placed on all fours with the system prevailing in England, under which it is provided that if a person receives any emoluments from the Imperial Government, even in the colonies, in addition to his pension, the amount of those emoluments shall be deducted from the pension, and if the emoluments are greater than the amount of the pension they wipe it out altogether.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: It seems to me that the gentlemen who have spoken on this question have overlooked the main reason which was advanced for passing the clause allowing the judges to retire on full salary at certain ages and under certain circumstances. I remember very well taking the same objection to the passage of the clause which my honourable friend has taken to-day; but it was met with the argument that there were certain judges on the Bench who were totally unfit to perform the duties of their office, and who did not perform them, and that it was necessary to amend the law in order to induce them to retire. I may say, without violating any confidences, that the Minister of Justice at that time canvassed me to support the legislation, as I happened to be leading the Opposition in the Senate. I answered in very much the same strain as my honourable friend from Halifax. I thought that there ought to be some means of getting rid of a judge who was unable to perform his duties; but the answer was that the appointment of the judge was independent of the Crown, and independent of the legislature, for so long as he desired to remain on the Bench. Certain provisions with reference to county court judges were made by Sir John Thompson when Minister of Justice. In the district in which I lived there was a county judge who, owing to the loss of his reason, was totally unfit for the duties of his office. The Bill introduced to meet his case and all similar cases provided that a judge of the superior court should be appointed to make an investigation, employing medical assistance, in order to ascertain whether the man was in his right mind, and, if it was found that he was not fit for his office, the Government could remove him and give him a competency for the balance of his life. It was argued that that could not be done in the case of the judges of the superior court, for the reason that the commission appointing them placed them beyond the power of the legislature for the time being, or of the Crown. These were really the reasons that were given at the time for the passage of that clause in the Act which my honourable friend desires now to have repealed. As a layman, I did not think it was just to other employees. I thought it was placing upon the statute-book something that was not equitable in its character, and for a purpose which should not be approved by the legislature. Personally, speaking as a layman, I am very glad, from the views that I have always held upon this question, that my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) and my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) have taken the view that the judges of this country should be placed in the position which they held prior to the passage of that Act—that they should receive a two-thirds retiring allowance, which to my mind is ample compensation for the services they have rendered.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: On principle I fully agree with the amendment moved by my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) and seconded by another Haligonian (Hon. Mr. Ross); but there are certainly difficulties in the way. The difficulty which has been referred to by my honourable friend from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) can be remedied and ought to be. Abuses such as those which have been mentioned have also existed, and most scandalously, in my province. Could not the points that have been raised be met effectually by amending the law so as to provide that after a judge of any Supreme Court has reached the age of 75 he could be retired by an Order in Council? The means would thus be placed in the hands of the Executive whereby a judge who had become incompetent, and who, if he could draw his full salary, might—if I may use the expression—stick to his position, could be quietly and gently removed and be given whatever allowance the law accords, either full pay or two-thirds. I would prefer an allowance of two-thirds. Such an amendment would meet the very serious objection raised by my honourable friend. The inability of the Government to remove a judge is at present the cause, I will not say of mischief, but of much unpleasantness.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Do I understand that the amendment my honourable friend from Halifax proposes affects the judges who are now retired on a pension equal to their full salary?

Hon. Mr. POWER: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should like to point out to honourable gentlemen, particularly in view of the fact that the House seems to be in a very drastic mood in proposing to deal with the judiciary, that if we were confronted with any difficulties when these sections were passed, their repeal would simply mean a renewal of the same difficulties. As the honourable gentleman who has introduced this amendment has pointed out, there were certain abuses at that time, and these sections were introduced into the Act to remedy them. I have no doubt that the human nature in the judges of to-day is much the same as human nature was at the time that these sections were passed.

Under the British North America Act, as honourable gentlemen know, a judge is appointed for life or good behaviour. We cannot interfere with the term of his office. Hence we have to work out some scheme by which a judge whose usefulness has become exhausted can be satisfactorily dealt with. We have already made provision for a superannuation allowance of two-thirds pay being granted to a judge at the expiration of 15 years; but the judge is not bound to accept two-thirds pay at the end of 15 years: he may continue in office for the rest of his life, and we cannot interfere with him. It seems to me that it would be necessary to have the British North America Act amended, so that an age limit might be fixed for superior court judges.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: A limit of age or incapacity.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The difficulty would be to determine what is incapacity. That is a feature as to which there might be a difference of opinion, as we have our differences of opinion to-day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I suggested that the honourable leader of the Government should say incapacity. He says age is one factor. I take exception to that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: County court judges are in an entirely different position. We can legislate as to the length of time they may remain in office, and we have already done so.

There is another feature to be considered in connection with the Act as it now stands on the statute-book. When those amendments were passed in 1903, they became to all intents and purposes conditions upon which a judge accepted office. That is to say, he had at that time, and has had since, the right to consider, before he accepted office, whether it would be in his interest to do so, in view of the inducements offered. He knew that at the end of 15 years he would be entitled to accept a superannuation allowance of two-thirds of his salary and retire. There was also the other condition, that if he continued to act for the additional period provided for in the statute he would become entitled to a full retiring allowance. Now, the question naturally arises, would it be equitable to those judges who accepted office subsequently to the passage of that Act to repeal those provisions?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Does the honourable gentleman not think that the judges would resign immediately if we passed the amendment?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am not prepared to say what they would do; but there is no doubt an expectation on the part of many of the judges who have accepted office since that time that they may avail themselves of the advantages of the Act. If we now withdraw those advantages, it is a question if we are not interfering with the vested rights of the judges, who accepted office under certain conditions. I am not pronouncing upon the desirability of continuing those conditions upon the statute-book; I am simply pointing out the relation of Parliament to the judges who have accepted office under those conditions. It is for the Senate to consider whether, in view of these considerations, the statute should not be left undisturbed.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think the honourable leader of the Government has missed the point made by the honourable member for Halifax. It is admitted that prior to 1903 there existed the difficulty of some of these judges continuing in office after they had become incompetent. Then some one thought that this wise section 20 would obviate that difficulty; but the remedy is worse than the disease. The point made by the honourable gentleman from Halifax is that in trying to retire one or two incompetent judges you induce the whole body of judges to continue in office in order to qualify for the full pension under the terms of section 20.

I would like to take the opportunity of saying also, with regard to the appointment of judges during good behaviour, that there is a fallacy abroad. It is generally supposed that "during good behaviour" is a moral qualification—that a judge must not get drunk or otherwise misbehave. That is not the meaning of it at all. The phrase "good behaviour" is a free translation of a Latin phrase contained in an old form of commission which was in use down to comparatively recent years. In the time of William III. and the kings who came after him judges were appointed for good conduct. When that principle was introduced, the phrase used in the appointment of a judge was "diu bene gesserit"—he was appointed for so long as he should well conduct his office. That phrase has been translated "during good behaviour."

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Let us put it back into the Latin.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: But the good behaviour relates to the discharge of the duties of the office, and the moment a man becomes insane or deaf he is not giving good service—good behaviour; he is not "well conducting the duties of the office." That point came up in England within perhaps the last ten years, when Judge Grantham, as some honourable gentlemen will remember, got into trouble by making a political speech when he was down in the country trying an election case, and the Attorney-General of England made a statement with regard to this very subject. He said that it had been before Parliament three times: it was dealt with once by Mr. Gladstone, once by Lord Russell, and once by Lord Palmerston. He said that Lord Palmerston had written to a Baron Smith in Ireland telling him that he thought he ought to retire; for the Government and the Chancellor in England do suggest to judges, when they become incapacitated, that they should retire. The Attorney-General stated that Baron Smith had written back that he had been appointed for good behaviour and not for good health, and Lord Palmerston thereupon replied, "You had better translate the phrase 'diu bene gesserit'." Baron Smith took the hint and immediately resigned. I do not agree to the proposition that a man can be appointed a superior court judge in Canada and remain in office so long as he lives, even if he becomes insane or blind or absolutely incapable, or incapable to the extent of not well administering the duties of his office. His life may be bad: he may get drunk occasionally, and do many other objectionable things, and he could not be impeached for them; but the moment he becomes inefficient he is guilty of fraud if he remains in office, because it is a fraud to draw a salary after becoming unfit to discharge the duties of the office. If Parliament had the courage which it ought to have, it would provide that when a judge became incapable the Minister of Justice should suggest to him that he resign, and if he did not do so he could be impeached and removed from office.

The question of the allowance of two-thirds of the salary has as much to do with the other sections referred to in the amendment as with section 20, or rather more, because section 20 stands by itself, and I should like to see it disposed of first. Then, if there are complaints with regard to the other sections, they can be dealt with in the proper place.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: I am fully aware that judges in Canada, as in England, are appointed for life; but what I meant, in suggesting that the Government should have power to retire judges when they reached a certain age, was not that the British North America Act should be amended, but that the Government should be enabled, in some easier if more indirect way—for instance, by retrenching their pay—to force them out of the office which they do not adequately fill. I believe the means of retiring incompetent judges can be found without going to the trouble, if trouble there is, of applying to the Imperial Government for a change in the constitution of Canada.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I do not know whether I would approve of the Government having the power to retire or dismiss judges. If the Government had that power it might be used as a matter of patronage, or might be exercised at times when it would be questionable whether or not it was right to exercise that power. I think the cure suggested by the honourable member from Westmorland (Hon. Mr. Poirier) is very much worse than the disease. I apprehend that gentlemen at present occupying judicial positions throughout the country would not immediately ask to have their appointments cancelled. If they did that, I can imagine that there are many gentlemen at the Bar who would think it was a very happy event for them. At the time this legislation was passed there was plenty of money in Canada. About that time a sort of annuity was granted to gentlemen who had been members of the Government of Canada for five years or more. I am not sure what amount they received.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Half the amount of the salary which they had enjoyed during their term of office.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: That also was claimed to be a vested right. Parliament stopped that, and some gentlemen thought that they had been harshly dealt with; but the practice was not in line with what the country believed to be just. I am quite sure that the amendment now suggested by a leading member of the Bar indicates the way in which we should move in the matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: The honourable gentleman is not strictly correct in his statement with regard to the pensions which were allowed to retiring ministers. As I understand, there was no complaint that any minister was improperly treated. The complaint was that gentlemen who had been in the Government only five years were treated as generously as those who had given their services for fifteen or twenty years.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The amendment proposed by the honourable member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) is to my mind a very important one. I think it is the usual practice to give notice of such amendments. The honourable member from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) has given notice of his amendment. We have had time to think it over and we know what it means. This is not the case with the amendment which is now before us. The honourable gentleman from Halifax moves an amendment to repeal four sections of the Judges Act. With the exception of two or three gentlemen who may have thought of this question before, I do not suppose that there is another member of the Senate who is sufficiently acquainted with the Judges Act to know what would be the effect of repealing those sections. I think the honourable gentleman might let his amendment stand as a notice of motion and bring it up at a future time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: When the honourable the leader of the Government stated that this question comes under the provisions of the British North America Act he was quite right, but he failed to give an adequate explanation of how those provisions were to be carried out. He said that judges were appointed for life, subject to good behaviour.

I think the committee owes a debt of gratitude to the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) for the clear statement which he has made in regard to the meaning of good behaviour. He has brought the question right home, and it does not take twenty-four hours to find out what it means. Good behaviour is not dependent on a man going to mass or to the kirk or to vespers; good behaviour means that a judge shall be able to fulfil the duties of his office; otherwise it would signify nothing. It is true that judges are appointed for life; but cannot Parliament impeach a judge and have him removed from office? I understand that this can be accomplished by a two-thirds vote. Who is to be the judge of good behaviour? Surely not the judge himself. The Minister of Justice should say whether a judge is competent to fill the office which he holds. I would leave the matter in the hands of the Justice Department, which is the most competent body to deal with it. The Department of Justice is not going to remove a judge for paltry reasons; but if the department finds that he is incompetent and unable to fulfil the duties of his office, then it should exercise its right—without referring to Parliament at all—and state that he is lacking in good behaviour—meaning not moral conduct, but competence to fill the office. I do not see any need of amending the Judges Act as to the paltry question of salaries every five or ten or fifteen years. It is humiliating to a man of honour, to a man who is willing to render service to his country, to be pointed at and to have said of him, "Oh, you are sitting on the Bench to get a few dollars more." The judges will maintain their own dignity. Very often they cannot maintain their efficiency, but the Department of Justice ought to be in a position to deal with that branch of the question.

I am in favour of the amendment offered by the honourable gentleman from Halifax and endorsed by the honourable gentleman from Middleton. I quite disagree with the honourable gentleman from St. John (Hon. Mr. Daniel) that it would take a week, or two days, or twenty-four hours, to find out what the amendment means. Some brains may be dull and some bright; I do not know whether mine is bright or dull, but I do not need twenty-four hours to find out what the amendment means, especially after the clear statements made by the honourable gentlemen who have this question in hand.

I throw out the suggestion that, if it is at all possible, Parliament should be relieved of the disagreeable duty of regulating the financial affairs of the courts of this Dominion, whether county court, superior court, or appeal court.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman thinks that the Minister of Justice should deal with this question himself.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If the honourable gentleman thinks that, I did not make myself clear. What I say is that the behaviour of the judges should be left to the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Nobody is questioning that, but honourable gentlemen must remember that the Minister of Justice cannot remove a judge from the Bench. There must be an address from both Houses of Parliament, and under the old dispensation that was looked upon as being impracticable. There were judges whom the Minister of Justice wished to have removed from the Bench, but he did not care to undertake to get addresses from both Houses of Parliament for the purpose of doing it. The measure which it is now proposed to repeal was introduced in order to get over the difficulty. The honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) has made perfectly clear, what I stated but perhaps did not make perfectly clear, that since 1903 this law has simply aggravated the evil which it was intended to cure. Whereas previously only an occasional judge held on to office, under this law nearly every judge holds on until he is able to retire on full pay. Some judges remain on the Bench for five or six years after they become incapable.

Referring to the objection made by the honourable gentleman from St. John (Hon.

Mr. Daniel), I think that, at an earlier stage of this Bill, I outlined the amendment which I have put in the hands of the Chairman. I think it is so clearly in the interest of the administration of justice and in the interest of the economy which we are recommended to exercise with reference to public votes that there is no necessity for any further discussion on the question. I would be quite satisfied to rest this matter altogether on the speech of the honourable gentleman from Middleton.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Will the honourable gentleman kindly inform this committee what is contained in the four sections of the Judges Act which he wishes to repeal?

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman from Middleton read the section.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I read section 20, which deals with Superior Court judges. The other sections deal with the Railway Commissioners and the County Court judges.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: How do they deal with them?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Section 22 deals with the annuity of the Chief Commissioner of the Board of Railway Commissioners; sections 25 and 26 deal with County Court judges.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The proposal before the Senate is to compel the judges, if possible, to retire at a given age.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: At all events, there is certainly a great objection to a judge remaining on the Bench after his usefulness is gone. I know of many cases of judges continuing in office for the purpose of obtaining their full retiring allowance. The honourable the leader of the Government has said that under the British North America Act Parliament has no power to fix an age limit for the judges—that they must be and are appointed for life. Of course, that does not apply to the inferior courts. It seems to me that if an Act were passed providing that a judge's salary shall be so much until he arrives at the age of seventy, and that thereafter it shall be one dollar per annum, we would obtain the object desired. There is no doubt that a great number of judges, after they have passed seventy years of age, are not in full possession of their faculties and their physical strength, and are therefore not competent to perform the duties of their high office, and as a result the public loses confidence in the administration of justice. On the other hand, there are judges—we have them in Ontario—who are quite as efficient between the ages of seventy and seventy-five, and even later in life, as they were in their earlier years. I have had a long experience at the Bar, and I have in mind men, before whom I have practised for over twenty years, who are now as competent as ever they were; I have in mind others who are not, men who should not be administering justice, and I take it that the honourable gentleman's proposal is to remedy this condition of affairs.

In the province of Ontario it is very difficult—in fact, it is almost impossible—to induce a leader of the Bar to accept an appointment to the Bench, because the emoluments at the Bar are many times greater than the rewards on the Bench. I know a distinguished judge who I am sure accepted the office because of the honour, as he was, to my knowledge, earning a great deal more at the Bar than he is on the Bench. When the time comes for that gentleman to retire I consider that it would be a gross injustice to cut his retiring allowance down to two-thirds of his present salary. These gentlemen do not seek; they are sought. For many years I have been of the opinion that there should be an age limit for judges, and that when a man reaches that limit he should be retired on a sufficiently large allowance to keep him in comfort according to his station in life. If that is not done, you will not obtain, at least in Ontario, the best talent to administer justice. When I commenced to practise law, an appointment to the Bench was considered a prize; nowadays it is not a prize for a man who has been successful at the Bar, and judicial appointments are not sought by the leading lawyers in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: The honourable gentleman has already stated that he knew of men who were administering justice in Ontario who ought to be retired.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON. The last case to which the honourable gentleman referred is the exception, not the rule.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Although I know several judges who, both physically and mentally, are eminently fitted to discharge their duties after 70 years of age, I have had experience of judges who were not, and in my opinion all judges should be retired at that age.

Hon. Mr. POWER: We cannot alter the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: No, but we should not cut down the salaries of men who were induced to go on the Bench.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Did I not understand the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Lynch-Staunton) to suggest that after they reached seventy years of age they should be paid one dollar a year?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Let me explain. It should be provided that if they remain on the Bench after they are seventy they should get one dollar a year and that if they retire they should receive their full salary.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Without saying anything further upon the subject, I would ask my honourable friend to allow this matter to stand until I can take it up with the Department of Justice. I have discussed the other phases of the Bill with the Minister of Justice. Ample time will be given for dealing with the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I will let this amendment stand and we can take up the other.

The proposed amendment was allowed to stand.

Hon. W. B. ROSS moved that the following be added to the Bill as section 6:

Section 33 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

2. And every such Judge shall, in the month of December in every year, file a statement with the Minister of Justice that he has complied with the terms of this section, or, if not, in what manner he has departed therefrom. No salary shall be paid to any Judge failing to file such statement.

He said: For the benefit of members of the committee who are not conversant with it, I will read section 33 of the Act:

No judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or of the Exchequer Court of Canada, or of any superior or county court in Canada, shall either directly or indirectly, as director or manager of any corporation, company, or firm, or in any other manner whatever, for himself or others, engage in any occupation or business other than his judicial duties.

That section was passed at the time of the general increase in the salaries of judges. The increase amounted to about fifty per cent; that is what it was in Nova Scotia. The salaries of puisne judges in that province had been $4,000 a year and were increased to $6,000. At that time the Government said: "In giving you this handsome increase we put upon you the disability that you shall not engage in the shipping business, or the shoe business, or any other, but that you shall devote yourself entirely to the duties of your office." I have no objection at all to section 33. I think it is a wise section and is well drawn. When I spoke on this question a few days ago my complaint was that section 33 is not observed by some of the judges. I believe that over 90 per cent of the judges are honourable and honest men and do observe the terms of this section; but there are a few men who are disregarding it, and these are the men I am trying to reach. I mentioned two cases. I know of one case where a judge who began at $4,000 and is now receiving $6,000 is engaged in a business from which he draws $2,000 a year, and, to my own knowledge, that outside work interferes with the discharge of his judicial duties.

Now, I doubt very much if subsection 1 of section 33 is the only way of dealing with cases of that kind. I find that a good many members of this House think that to require judges to make a declaration annually is a sort of reflection upon them —that it would be somewhat infra dig. If that is so, I am inclined to think that section 33 itself is a reflection upon them. A record of attendance is taken at the door of this Chamber every day, and each senator before he draws his salary at the end of the term must make a statutory declaration as to the number of days he has attended. I cannot see that we cast any imputation upon a judge when we ask him at the end of every year for a similar statement, that is, a statement that he has devoted himself entirely to the duties of his office, or, if he has not done so, in what way he has departed therefrom.

But, as I said the other day, there is another way to deal with this matter. I have no doubt at all that an impeachment would lie against a judge doing what this man whom I have specified is doing—and perhaps that course will be taken if these amendments are not adopted. I think it is a pity to have to go through the cumbersome process of an impeachment if the matter can be remedied in a shorter and more direct way.

There is another clause which I should like to see added. Section 33 provides that a judge shall not engage in any other occupation. I have looked up all the dictionaries as to the meaning of "occupation." It is quite true that a judge may discharge small duties, such as the duties of an executor, or a trustee for a church, without violating section 33; but, when he engages in another occupation, that is, when he takes up any substantial business and makes a part of his annual income from it, he is violating the Act, because what he is doing is an occupation—something by which he is earning his living. Solitary acts by a judge, such as delivering a lecture, or acting as trustee for his father's estate, could not in any sense be construed as being an occupation.

The practice has been followed by the Dominion Government and governments of different provinces—and it is an objectionable practice—of appointing judges as members of commissions of all kinds. In some of the provinces there is rather keen competition among the judges for appointments to commissions. A good sum of money goes with such an appointment; and I believe that the practice of appointing judges to commissions is doing more than anything else to lessen confidence in the judiciary of this country—and I know there are persons with perhaps more experience than I who concur fully in that opinion. I should like to have a section to this effect added:

No judge of any of the courts mentioned in section 33 of the said Act, who may be appointed by competent authority—

—that is to cover all the Governments, Dominion and provincial——who may be appointed by competent authority a member of any commission, or to any duty outside his usual judicial duties, shall receive any pay for such services, but may receive necessary travelling and living expenses.

If a judge is drawing twenty or thirty dollars a day as a judge and is sent out to investigate some labour trouble or some political squabble, there is to my mind no reason why he should, while continuing to receive his salary as a judge, get another $30 a day as a commissioner.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: But you would approve of allowing him travelling expenses?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: A man cannot be in two places at the same time, and if he accepts appointment as a judge on the condition that he give his whole time to the office, there should be no addition to his salary when he accepts outside work.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: It is proposed that the amendment read as follows:

Section 33 of the said Act is amended by adding the following subsection thereto:

"2. Every such judge shall, in the month of December in each year, file a statement with the Minister of Justice that he has complied with the terms of this section, or, if not, in what manner he has departed therefrom. No salary shall be paid to any judge failing to file such statement. Such statement shall be in the form of a schedule to this Act."

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am willing to go some distance with the honourable gentleman from Middleton in this matter, but it is going perhaps a little too far to require that every judge shall in the month of December submit this certificate. I think that to require the thousands of judges scattered over this country to submit in the month of December a statement to the effect that they have been doing their duty is perhaps a little too drastic. The obligation to submit such a statement should, in my opinion, be limited to cases where a complaint has been made to the Minister of Justice against a judge and the minister calls upon the judge to make such a statement. My suggestion would be to make my honourable friend's amendment read somewhat like this:

Every such judge shall, within one month from the date of a notice to that effect from the Minister of Justice or his deputy, file with such minister a statement to the effect that he has complied with the terms of this section, or, if not, in what manner he has departed therefrom; and the statement shall be in the form of a schedule to this Act. No salary shall be paid to any such judge during the time during which he fails to file such statement.

My idea is that the statement need not be filed unless it is asked for.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The only thing I would say about that is that I desire to simplify the matter as much as possible. It is a very short statement.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I desire to raise the point of order whether it is competent for this House to amend this Bill as proposed. In Bourinot, fourth edition, it is set forth that:

All aids and supplies granted to His Majesty by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all Bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint in all such Bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants which are not alterable by the Senate.

The limitations, as I understand, are set out in the Appropriation Bill and in the Act which grants the judges' salaries. That is, the salary of a judge is granted by statute, and that, in one sense, must be a money Bill. It is granted upon certain conditions, and now we propose to amend those conditions by providing that, in the event of a statutory declaration not being made that the judge has observed all the provisions of the law under which he is acting, his salary shall be cut off. It seems to me questionable whether we are not going further than we are justified in doing, if we are to be guided by the rule which I have quoted.

The CHAIRMAN (Hon. Mr. Landry): I quite agree with the honourable gentleman. My opinion is that this is a money Bill. We might deal with it; but, if the Commons asserted their right, we should have to drop any amendment we might have made. I may say that at one time an allowance was granted to retired ministers, as honourable gentlemen may remember, and some years ago an attack was made in this House upon that retirement allowance. The Senate on that occasion decided that it was within its right in dealing with such a matter. I was against that decision, and I am now giving my own opinion that the Bill to amend the Judges Act is a money Bill. However, I will leave the decision to the committee.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Perhaps we had better leave the question whether we are going farther than we ought to go in this respect to be determined by the Commons. I do not think that we should first decide as to the rights of the Senate.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It is perfectly certain that this Bill does not impose any new tax, and in that sense of the term it is not a money Bill. I would not like to start an argument on what is a money Bill; but my idea is that it is one which imposes something in the nature of a charge. This amendment is to provide relief from a charge. But let the Commons raise that point.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think the honourable gentleman from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule) might with a better show of reason have objected to the amendment that I proposed. I fail to see that there is any objection to the clause with which we are now dealing, which simply refers to the filing of a certificate. It was said in the House of Lords in a somewhat similar case that if that House was not allowed to deal with a question of this sort they might as well abandon their business altogether. In this particular case we are undertaking, not to interfere with the revenue, but to save a little.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: My objection was intended to apply to all these clauses. I think they are of a similar character and purport. The honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) said that a money Bill is a tax. A money Bill has the double purpose of taxation and appropriation. After a tax has been levied, and is payable out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, Parliament appropriates it by voting so much of it to pay the salaries of the judges. In the statute providing for the appointment of judges, the limitations, conditions, and provisions have been laid down, and now we propose to change those limitations or conditions or provisions. To that extent, in my judgment, if the rule which I have quoted holds good, it is not competent for the Senate to change the conditions of appointment.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does my honourable friend mean to say that we cannot deal with any clause of a Bill relating to matters of that kind? If I remember rightly, it has been held that when a Bill contains certain money clauses, those clauses cannot be dealt with by the Senate, but the other clauses of the Bill can be dealt with. When a Bill contains any clause for imposing a charge of any kind, that particular clause is passed without alteration when the Senate is dealing with the Bill; but the other clauses of the Bill can surely be dealt with by the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Inasmuch as the leader of the Government desires to consult his colleagues, and inasmuch as the question of the competency of this House to deal with this measure has been raised, I think that perhaps it would be well if the committee were to rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again; and when we meet again the leader of the Government will be prepared to tell us what his colleagues think. In the meantime, we shall have an opportunity of looking up the question of parliamentary procedure that has been raised by the honourable gentleman from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule). If my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) does not object, I would move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Before the motion is put, I think it is the duty of the Senate to determine the question of prerogative. I do not think we should leave that to the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. POWER: We want to look up the authorities.

Progress reported.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 73, an Act to amend The Meat and Canned Foods Act. He said: This Bill consists largely of provisions for the inspection and canning of shellfish and lobsters. About two years ago the administration of the Meat and Canned Foods Act was handed over to the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: At that time it did, but it is now administered by the Department of Marine and Fisheries, which is more closely in touch with the subject-matter of the Bill. The Bill provides for the inspection of canneries and the labelling of shellfish when canned. Certain exemptions are provided for. It is unnecessary to say that it is desirable that the most stringent inspection should be established in matters of this kind. The question of canning lobsters is dealt with particularly in clause 12d. Honourable gentlemen who come from the Maritime Provinces will have a wider knowledge of that than I have. The question of British Columbia salmon is dealt with in clause 12e.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The honourable leader of the Government has said that this Bill is in the hands of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. I cannot find anything transferring it to that department. The Minister of Agriculture is referred to in the original Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Two years ago the administration of the Meat and Canned Foods Act, so far as canned fish and shellfish were concerned, was transferred to the Department of Marine and Fisheries by Order in Council.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 74, an Act to amend The Fisheries Act, 1914. He said: This Bill makes provision for licensing canneries and giving a greater latitude to the establishment of fish oil factories, which, under the present law, cannot be within fifty miles of each other. The Bill also deals with the question of regulating fish guards, particularly in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba, owing to the construction of irrigation ditches and flumes. It also proposes to change the name "dogfish" to "grayfish," in order to bring it into harmony with legislation which has been passed in the United States. It is said that a rose by any other name would smell as sweet, and I have no doubt that the "dogfish" will taste quite as well when the name is changed to "grayfish." It is proposed in the Maritime Provinces that closer attention should be given to inducing the public to indulge in these luxuries.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I rise for the purpose of congratulating the Government on having made the amendment which is contained in clause 4 of this Bill. The question of placing screens in the irrigation ditches and channels of the West has been a very acute one for a number of years. The farmers who were irrigating found that the placing of these nets and screens in the headgates of their irrigation ditches was a very great source of trouble and annoyance, and I do not think they produced the desired effect. Honourable gentlemen will probably understand that the streams very often go dry late in the year, and although screens may be placed in the headgates in the early part of the year to prevent the fish going down into the irrigation ditches, if the fish remain in the screens they are killed when the streams dry up, and consequently the object of putting the screens in the ditches is defeated. I hope, therefore, that we shall be relieved of these troubles in the future. In certain places, of course, where water remains in the streams all the year round, it might be advisable to put the screens in, and I hope that the Department of Marine and Fisheries will try to devise a screen which will be of some use, and which can be put in without it being necessary to watch it pretty nearly every hour of the day. I think the honourable gentleman who has lately been appointed to the Senate and who comes from a part of British Columbia where irrigation is carried on (Hon. Mr. Shatford) will agree with me that this is a very wise provision.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SAINT JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILWAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 91, an Act to amend the Saint John and Quebec Railway Act, 1916. He said: The object of this Bill is to extend the time for the completion of this road so that the Government of New Brunswick may take advantage of certain subsidies which have been voted on its behalf by the Government of Canada. Part of this road has already been constructed.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: How much of it has been constructed?

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: It runs more than 10 miles above Woodstock and 42 miles below Fredericton. It is constructed from Centreville to Gagetown.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does this road operate in connection with the National Transcontinental?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is owned by the New Brunswick Government.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: It is operated by the Intercolonial railway.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 99, an Act to amend the Interest Act. He said: In the province of Manitoba judgments carry only 4 per cent interest, whereas, according to legislation of this Parliament, judgments in the other western provinces carry 5 per cent interest. The Bill is intended to bring the four western provinces into harmony by permitting of judgments in the province of Manitoba bearing the same rate of interest as those in the other three provinces. The province itself has not authority to legislate upon this subject, as the question of interest is one peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is the Provincial Government in favour of this measure?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand that it is introduced at their instance.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, as there is nothing on the Order Paper for to-morrow, if it is agreeable to honourable gentlemen, I move that when this House adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until next Tuesday evening at eight o'clock. I would also move, with the permission of the House, that during the adjournment the committees have authority to sit.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, July 24, at eight o'clock in the evening.

THE SENATE.

Tuesday, July 24, 1917.

The Senate met at Eight o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATOR INTRODUCED.

Hon. George W. Fowler, of Sussex, New Brunswick, was introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Mr. Daniel, and took his seat.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The Senate again went into Committee on Bill 66, an Act to amend the Judges Act. —Hon. Sir James Lougheed. Hon. Mr. Watson in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: At the last session of the committee, my honourable friend from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule) raised the point of order that this Bill was a money Bill and that the Senate had no authority to amend it. The honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) was in the Chair at the time, in the absence of my honourable friend the Chairman of this evening, and he was inclined to consider that it was a money Bill. I would suggest that we might proceed with the consideration of the amendments which have been moved. If my honourable friend (Hon. W. B. Ross) who has moved the amendment under consideration desires to say anything upon the point of order, there is no reason why it should not be taken up. The question may possibly be appealed to the Speaker, who might then require a little time in which to deal with it.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There are two amendments, one moved by the honourable member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), for the repeal of four sections of the Judges Act, and my amendment to section 33 of the Act. The amendments are not quite on the same footing. The amendment moved by the honourable member for Halifax does not attempt to impose any tax or burden on the people of Canada. On the contrary, the effect of it would be to relieve them, indirectly at all events, of the payment of certain sums of money in certain cases. The amendment which I moved was not a fiscal proposition in any sense of the term, but was merely intended to provide a method for the more careful observance of section 33 of the Act. The standard authority on these matters, Sir Erskine May, at page 574 of his book, gives the origin of the objection on the part of the House of Commons to the House of Lords dealing with a fiscal question. The House of Commons claims that it is its privilege to decide these matters and that the House of Lords cannot initiate them and cannot amend them. May says:

> The Commons, having during nearly three centuries claimed the right to include the members of the House of Lords in the taxation levied upon the subjects of the Crown advanced this claim still further in 1671 by resolving "that in all aids given to the King by the Commons, the rate or tax ought not to be altered by the Lords"; and, on the 3rd July, 1678, by a second resolution, "that all aids and supplies, and aids to His Majesty in Parliament, are the sole gift of the Commons; and all Bills for the granting of any such aids and supplies ought to begin with the Commons; and that it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint in such Bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords."

That is the position, that, whenever there is a tax or any charge levied upon the people, the House of Commons must state the amount, on whom and on what it is to be levied, how it is to be collected, and how it is to be disposed of. But when you come to deal with acts which are not fiscal acts, whose object or intention is not to levy a tax at all, but which relate to questions of administration, you find the position is different. May says:

> The Commons, in dealing with amendments by the Lords to Bills for the administration of local and other rates and charges, which touched matters of privilege, have had regard to the principle that, if the Lords' amendments deal with legislative and not fiscal objects, a rigid adherence on the part of the Commons to their privileges might exclude the Lords from the practical consideration of such Bills.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Then, he says, on page 514:

> In 1849, the Commons adopted a standing order, based on a resolution passed in 1831, which gave the Lords power to deal, by Bill or amendment, with pecuniary penalties, forfeitures, or fees, when the object of such penalties or forfeitures was to secure the execution of an Act; and when the fees imposed were not payable into the exchequer, or in aid of the public revenue.

As I understand it, the meaning is this. My amendment to section 33 provides that the judges shall file a certain statement, and if they do not file that statement they shall not be paid their salary until they do. That is not for the purpose of raising revenue, but it is to carry out, to work out, section 33. Now, according to Sir Erskine May, instead of saying that they should not draw their salary, we could have taken another course, that of saying they should be fined $500. That would be perfectly within our rights; but, if we had gone on to say that that $500 should be payable into the consolidated fund, or that half of it should be given to the informant and half should go into the consolidated fund, that would be invading the privileges of the Commons. If we stopped short at imposing a penalty of $500, we should be perfectly in order. Now, we do not go that far; we simply say that we want section 33 carried out—we want a statement filed, and if the statement is not filed, the salary of the judge shall not be drawn. It is not a fiscal Bill in any sense of the term, and is not an invasion of the rights or privileges of the Commons in any particular whatever.

Hon. T. S. SPROULE: I regret that I cannot agree with my honourable friend who has just taken his seat, that the proposed amendment does not infringe in any way upon money bills. We take up the statute for the appointment of judges. By it a given salary is attached to the office of judge. That salary is appropriated out of the consolidated revenue. If the Act came before us, I am quite sure there is no honourable senator in this House but would admit that that was a money bill—that it involved the appropriation of money payable out of the Consolidated Revenue and that we could not change that in any particular; because we would have no right to interfere with the appropriation of money raised by the levying of a tax. The statute provides that the incumbents of these offices shall receive so much money. Now, if the rule distinctly laid down be applied to this case, that Bill fixing the salaries of the judges at a certain figure was a money bill and we could not amend it. But if the next year we take up that same statute and tack on a provision saying that if the judges do not do so and so they shall not receive their salary and cannot claim it, would that not be interfering with the rights of the Commons, who alone have the right to amend in that way a money bill? I quote from Bourinot, fourth edition, page 491, on Appropriation and Taxation Bills:

A rule of the House of Commons declares explicitly:

"All aids and supplies granted to His Majesty by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all Bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint in all such Bills, the ends, purposes, considerations,"—

What is the consideration in this amendment? The consideration is that in the event of the judges refusing to make that statutory declaration they shall not be entitled to the money that has been voted to them under a money Bill.

—"conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants which are not alterable by the Senate."

Whether I am right or wrong—although I have gone over this a good many times—I never could see the difference between our taking away the rights of any one who was entitled to money under a specific grant from the Crown, whose appointment was made by statute, and changing that statute, which is a money bill, by limiting his right to a salary. We propose to limit that right or to make considerations upon which the salary shall be received. We are making conditions or limitations which, if my interpretation of the rule is correct, we have not the right to make.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Honourable gentlemen will remember that the Bill entitled the Judges Act was introduced by the then Minister of Justice, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. There were provisions in that Bill which did not please the Government side of the House, and to which grave objection was taken by Liberal members. The Minister of Justice at that time wanted to protect one of the governors of the province of Quebec by having him included under the provisions of the Bill so as to benefit equally with the judges who were to come under its provisions. The ex-governor of Quebec had been on the bench for a few years. He had previously been a minister of the Conservative Government of the province under the Hon. Mr. De Boucherville. He became governor of the province and was, I believe, in hearty sympathy with the ex-Prime Minister (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) who is now in his seat in this House—if not in hearty conspiracy with him—in regard to the Baie des Chaleurs railway. The honourable gentleman and the ex-governor had a committee appointed here to investigate the affairs of the Quebec Government regarding the Baie des Chaleurs railway deal, whereby one Conservative, another ex-governor, Robitaille, got $75,000 and Mr. Armstrong got $100,000. The result was that the honourable gentleman, who was no longer Prime Minister, but was at the time leader of the Senate, got a committee appointed to probe into this matter, with the aid and conspiring influence of the then governor, Raoul Angers. The outcome was that the Quebec Government was driven from power. When the Minister of Justice, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, came before Parliament, a Liberal Parliament, and asked that a generous pension be granted to that man, we resisted, and finally triumphed in our resistance, although the Bill was a money Bill like the one now before the House. We amended government Bills in those days. In the Railway Bill we put, I think, over ninety-nine amendments, and it was a money Bill from first to last. All Government measures in those days underwent a rigid scrutiny and criticism by the supporters of the Government. These facts are well known, though not to all honourable gentlemen in this House. Some honourable gentlemen are too young to know of these things; but they are facts contained in the records of this honourable House. At the time to which I have referred I contested the right of Bourinot or of Erskine May or of any other authority to limit the powers of this legislative assembly. This House might as well go out of existence now if we can deal only with Bills which are not money Bills. Every Bill that comes before this House is a money Bill, because it takes money to put it through. I hold that under the law a Bill should be considered a money Bill only when it involves taxation and increasing the burdens of the people. My view is the sound one and is upheld by many. We have no right to initiate Bills of taxation, which are the only money Bills aimed at in the constitution which governs this country and this Parliament. It would be easy for any minister or member of the House of Commons to introduce a small clause with reference to the expending of $5 or $10 in order to prevent this House from considering or amending a Bill. The position is absurd. It would stultify the Senate; it would make its existence intolerable. We should have no right to consider or amend any Bill which contained a provision for the expenditure of any money, from a farthing up to a pound. Honourable gentlemen, can you not see the ridiculousness of the proposition? It is absurd on the face of it. I care not how much honourable gentlemen may quote Erskine May and Bourinot as compared with the intelligence of to-day? I am with Lloyd-George: down with precedents! Why should the intelligence of to-day be guided by intelligence which has been dead for centuries and knew nothing of our present conditions? I am glad to know that the Prime Minister of England is in agreement with the thought that the conditions of to-day ought not to be dictated by the intelligence of the past. We have all respect and reverence for it; but let us put our own intelligence and experience, our own knowledge and observations, to the test. That will be better than quoting dead men's opinions or following dead men's dictation. I hold that this is not a taxation Bill and is therefore not a money Bill—that a Bill can be a money Bill only when taxation is involved and included therein. These are views which I put forth ten years ago, when the original Bill was brought up and amended in the Senate—the Liberal Senate of that time. The facts which I have given held good then, and they ought to hold good now and for the future. This body, as I say, would become absolutely useless if we were to be confined to discussing only Bills that involved no money expenditure—I do not say taxation, but money expediture. Honourable gentlemen, this is a serious question, and it is time for this honourable House to take a stand in the matter and declare that a Bill is a money Bill only when it involves taxation and increasing the burdens of the people.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: May I ask the honourable leader of the Government if this Bill was introduced in another place by resolution?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say to my honourable friend that the amendments do not refer to any of the clauses in the Bill which has come before us and is now under consideration; but it is proposed to amend certain clauses in the Act which this Bill proposes to amend. The Bill was introduced by resolution.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN .

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Then it is a money Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, within my recollection we have twice dealt with the Judges Act and amended it. The records will show that in 1899 or 1900 a number of amendments to that Act were made. Among those amendments was one increasing by three the number of judges in the city of Montreal, and the honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), then the leader of the Opposition, moved to strike out that clause. If my memory serves me, a number of amendments were made reducing the charges provided for in the Bill, although it had been presented by a resolution in the other House. No objection was taken in the House of Commons to the Senate making these amendments—and my honourable friend from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule) was in that House at that time. Again, in 1903, as one honourable gentleman has said, a Bill amending the Judges Act was proposed, and clause 7 of that Bill provided that the Government should have the right to allow a pension to a judge who, not having served fifteen years, had been for a certain time governor of one of the provinces. It did not say for a time sufficient to complete the fifteen years, it gave no definite time. The Senate took objection to this clause, and the leader of the Government moved to drop it. The honourable member for Belleville raised the point and the Speaker, my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), when appealed to on the point of order, thought that possibly we were amending a Bill which should be held sacred in this Chamber as being a money Bill. The majority of the House held differently, owing largely to the precedent which had been established in 1899 or 1900. So, twice the Senate of Canada has altered the same Act by amendments which did not increase the charges upon the people, but, on the contrary, decreased those charges. It was held that we could amend the Act in several respects. My honourable friend's amendment, however, strikes me as being tantamount to an impeachment of the judges, because, if we withheld their salaries by any kind of legislation, we would have them under our control. This is a question to which I have not given very much thought. I am not in favour of the amendment as it stands, but I am against the point of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The honourable gentleman who has preceded me (Hon. Mr.

Dandurand) has quoted two precedents. I do not know who made the first ruling.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Hon. Mr. Pelletier.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I have it in my hands, and it is as follows:

It has been maintained, during the discussion of the point of order, that the Senate had no right to interfere with Bills which increase the expenditure of money, but would have a right to amend such Bills in order to decrease or prevent the expenditure of money. I admit that, at first sight, I was of that opinion, but the authority of May, cited by the Hon. Secretary of State, at page 542, after saying that the House of Lords is excluded, not only from the power of initiating or amending Bills dealing with public expenditure or revenue, but also from initiating public Bills which would create a charge upon the people or which would deal with the administration or employment of those charges, add:—

"It follows accordingly that the Lords may not amend the provisions in Bills which they received from the Commons, dealing with the above-mentioned subjects, so as to alter, whether by increase or reduction, the amount of a rate or charge, its duration, mode of assessment, levy, collection, appropriation or management, or the persons who pay, receive, manage or control it," etc., etc., etc.

To this the honourable the leader of the Opposition said that there is in that amendment neither a question of increasing or reducing the expenditure of money, but of transferring the grant of land from one line to another. But in reading the amendment as it is, I cannot now come to any other conclusion than that this amendment would really interfere in the disposition of public money, and the very words of the amendment say:— "And the company's lands subsidy shall apply to the line hereby authorized."

By this, the amendment goes to say that the disposition of the land grant will be changed. And, as the honourable gentleman from Montarville pointed out, if this amendment is carried, then the land already granted will be removed from its destination or appropriation, that it is from one line to apply it to another, and then there will be no grant of land for one line which had it before— and as I am of opinion that public land ought to be considered as public money, I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the point of order is well taken, and that the amendment is out of order.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That does not refer to the Judges Act and does not bear on the precedents which I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: No. The Judges Act is not involved in the decision then given. It was a Bill to pay ex-ministers of the Crown.

In 1903, the Honourable Mr. Power, then Speaker of the Senate, ruled out of order an amendment to a money Bill, on the ground that it was reducing the expenditure asked for by a certain Bill and that such an amendment was attacking a clause which might have been a Bill by itself.

Hon. Mr. POWER: That is good law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: That was a good decision. Like my decision, it was appealed against and was reversed. I think that the amendment which is proposed to-day attacks a money Bill; but I would not go so far as to say that the Senate has no right to amend the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Let the honourable gentleman wait until he understands what I am going to say. If the amendment attacks a money clause, in my opinion it is out of order; but if it relates to a clause which may by itself form part of an independent Bill, then I think the amendment is in order, subject to the decision of the House of Commons. If the House of Commons claim their privilege, then we must drop the amendment. In the case quoted by my honourable friend, though the decision of the Speaker had been overruled, if the House of Commons had claimed its privil ge, the clause would have been restored; but the House of Commons chose not to claim its privilege, and the Bill was amended as the honourable gentleman says.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I submit that the question is solely one of intent. What are we trying to accomplish by these amendments? Are we trying to carry out the administration of justice more effectively, or are we, under cover of a motion, trying to deal with a fiscal matter which is the privilege of the House of Commons? All I ask is for any man to take these amendments and give them an impartial reading, and say what is intended. If their purpose is to better the administration of justice, they are not an infringement on the rights and privileges of the House of Commons. If they were a subtle way of dealing with a fiscal matter, I think they would be out of order. That was not my intention, and I do not believe that it was in the mind of the honourable gentlemen from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power). There is abundant authority, if that is a fair reading, for saying that the amendment is quite in order.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not question the decision read by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry), but I think that what the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) has just said touches the heart of the matter. What is the intent of the amendment? Is it to interfere with the appropriation of public money? It is not. The object is simply to impose a penalty on a judge if he miscon-ducts himself. If a judge violates this law, instead of being fined, as the honourable gentleman has suggested, he would lose his pay for the time during which his negligence continued. Unlike my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran), the honourable gentleman from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule) has a great respect for past decisions; but I do not think that he would claim that there is any real violation of the rights of the House of Commons, or of parliamentary law, in saying that this penalty shall be imposed, even though it happen to affect in an indirect way the Consolidated Revenue Fund. It is laid down in Bourinot and May that the upper House has the right to impose penalties. Any action on their part in dealing with penalties does not come within the prohibition against dealing with money bills.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The honourable gentleman says that we have the right to impose penalties?

Hon. Mr. POWER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: We have a right to pass a Bill, but with blanks to be filled by the Commons as to the amount.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: We have the right to impose penalties and forfeitures, and to name the amounts, but we cannot name their destinations. We cannot appropriate them.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: We have no such powers.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I have not had time to look up this question, but there is one point made by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) which I think very important. It is not for the Senate to say or do anything which diminishes its own powers. Here is a question upon which there is some doubt, and the Senate should uphold and insist upon exercising its powers, or insist that it has the powers. Then, if the House of Commons chooses to raise the question of our interfering with its exclusive privileges, that is another matter. As I understand it, we are dealing with the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross).

The CHAIRMAN (Hon. Mr. Watson): I am somewhat taken by surprise by this point of order. I was not in the Chair when it was raised, and I would not be disposed to give a decision after hearing the opinions of ex-Speakers. I would prefer that some one move that we rise and report progress, and refer the matter to the Speaker for his decision.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: In reality we are not dealing with the Bill. We are dealing with two proposed amendments, one by the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), and one by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross). I was not here the other day, but I understand that the point of order was raised with regard to these amendments. Let us consider the amendments as if they were made independently of the Bill. Would it be contended that it was a money Bill if either of the amendments had been made the subject of an Act? Clearly, it would not. Will it be contended that this House has not the right to deal with a public servant? Surely not. We have amended the Railway Act. Under that Act we have the Board of Railway Commissioners. Will it be contended that this House has no right to pass upon the duties of the members of the Railway Board? Surely not. To do so would not be dealing with a money Bill at all, but clearly with a matter pertaining to the appointment of officers and their duties. I think that we are carried too far by this doctrine, which has been referred to by the honourable member from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule), as to appropriation Bills. That is not the question before the House. The question is merely whether either of the amendments could be brought up as the subject-matter of a Bill. Therefore, I submit that these amendments are clearly in order, and, even if there were any doubt, I think that the facts which the honourable member from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has drawn to the attention of this House should be conclusive. On two different occasions it was decided by this honourable House that Bills of this kind were not money Bills and therefore were within the powers of this honourable House, and that decision was acquiesced in by the House of Commons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: The honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), in the remarks that he has made, referred to two cases with which he has connected my name. I confess that the first one to which he referred has passed from my memory, or I have not been able to catch the full tenor of his remarks; but of the second case to which he referred I have a distinct recollection. Judges are appointed to perform certain duties. The Bill which was sent to the Senate for its approval provided for the allowing of five years' time, which had been spent by the gentleman concerned as governor of a province, as if he had during that time performed the duties of a judge. That was asking the Senate to affirm something which was not true. Judges are appointed, as the honourable gentleman knows well, for a certain number of years, to perform certain duties. It was at that time proposed by the Government not to curtail the length of time that a judge was considered to be in the performance of his judicial duties, though five years of that time was spent as governor of a province, and as governor he performed none of the functions pertaining to the office of judge. I remember distinctly making strong objection to the proposal, on the ground that it was affirming what was not correct, and that a man who had received a salary as governor of a province, performing not the duties of a judge but those of an administrator, was not entitled to be allowed five years as part of the fifteen years in the capacity of judge.

As to the present point before the House, there is, I must confess, a very nicely drawn distinction as to what were to be considered the functions of the Senate in the case of money Bills. My own impression is, and has been, that money Bills are Bills proposed by the Government of the day which appropriate certain moneys to be paid to Government officials or others. We have no power, as I have always understood, to amend a money Bill, but we have the power to reject the Bill altogether; and if the amendment proposed by my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) is declared out of order, I would suggest to him the propriety of withdrawing it and introducing a special Bill imposing a penalty upon any judge who fails to perform certain duties which the honourable gentleman thinks ought to be performed. There is nothing in the law to prevent the Senate from passing a Bill imposing a penalty upon any individual for certain offences, and we might declare the non-performance of duty or the performance of certain acts by a judge as illegal, and impose a penalty upon him. I see no reason why a judge should be exempted from doing his duty, any more than any other citizen.

With reference to the amendments proposed by the honourable member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), I do not see that they come within the same category. The Senate has the right to pass a Bill to repeal any portion of the law as it stands on the statute book, and I would suggest to him to push his amendment to a vote, if necessary.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Inasmuch as the chairman of the committee has indicated an unwillingness to pronounce upon this point of order, I think it would be desirable that the committee should rise and report progress, so as to permit him to appeal to the Speaker on this particular question. It appears to me that this is one of those border-line cases which in May and other works upon parliamentary procedure are termed "privileged amendments." We know that there is that class of amendment to legislation which arises in the House of Lords and which the Commons do not regard as an infringement upon their privilege. That class of amendment is referred to particularly in May, at page 576, which says that if otherwise unobjectionable the Commons shall accept amendments by the Lords which, though not strictly regular, do not materially infringe upon the privileges of the Commons, and they justify their action by an entry in the Journal under a direction from the Speaker, explaining the motive for their agreement, and stating, for instance, that the amendments are verbal. Then, again, this statement is made by May:

> The difficulty also of separating those amendments from other legislative provisions or amendments, to which there was no objection, has frequently prompted their acceptance by the Commons.

This further statement is made:

> More especially when those amendments effect charges upon the people incidentally only, and are made for the purpose of giving effect to the legislative intentions of the Commons.

Now, is it quite clear that the fiscal considerations, so to speak, are only incidental to the legislative provisions of the Act with which we are dealing, and it seems to me that it is a matter for the Commons to say, once we legislate, or once we send our amendments down, whether or not they regard those amendments as an infringement of their privileges. If they indicate that they regard the amendments as infringements, then it will probably be for us to reconsider the position which we have taken. But so frequently do financial considerations enter into general legislation that it is utterly impossible to draw the line clearly and distinctly; and we sometimes have to venture, in the public interest, to make an amendment, and deal with it as a privileged amendment, feeling that we are not encroaching upon the privileges of the Commons. I therefore move that the committee now rise and report progress, in order that the Chairman shall have the opportunity of appealing to the Speaker for a pronouncement upon this point of order.

Progress was reported.

Hon. Mr. WATSON, from the said committee, reported also that the point of order had been raised, that the Bill, being a money Bill, cannot be amended; and desired the honourable the Speaker to rule on the point of order.

FISHERIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 74, an Act to amend the Fisheries Act, 1914, Hon. Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 4—fish guards only where minister deems it necessary:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That has relation peculiarly to the western provinces, where flumes have to be used, and where unnecessary expense is sometimes incurred in protecting the flumes against the entry of fish.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I have often tried to get the Department of Marine and Fisheries to design a proper trap or guard to be put at the front of the headgates. I do not know whether my honourable friend would have sufficient influence with his colleague in the Cabinet to induce him to take up that question. I think it would be a valuable piece of work.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The difficulty is, I am sorry to say, we are not fertile in inventing traps.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But the department has several officers who could probably devote some valuable time to assisting men who are interested in the question in designing a proper kind of trap. It is very difficult to get one that is satisfactory.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is.

The section was agreed to.

On section 5—name of "dogfish" changed to "grayfish":

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen will see that it is proposed to change the name "dogfish" to that of "grayfish." That has been done in the United States, where the dogfish is now known under the respectable name of "grayfish," and there is no reason why we should not protect the interests of the dogfish equally well in Canada; consequently we propose doing the same as has been done in the United States.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I have only one suggestion to make in this respect. I see that it is proposed that this alteration should be inserted in the original Act as "62a." As this is more or less in the nature of a definition, would it not be much better to put it at the beginning of the Act? It seems to be a rather curious place to put a definition of that kind, practically in the middle of the Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That possibly is the only place where the name is mentioned.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I have looked at the Act, and find that the dogfish is referred to in clause 9.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will look into that point before the Bill is given a third reading. We want to give every opportunity to the dogfish to be properly recognized.

The section was agreed to.

On section 5—returns of quantity of fish caught, etc.:

Hon. Mr. POWER: Before that is adopted, Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to consider it a little. This clause provides that:

> The owner or manager of every fish-curing or canning establishment or fresh fish business, and the captain or owner of every fishing vessel, and the owner of every fishing boat, fishing trap, weir or other fishing instrument in Canada, shall, at the request of the minister or a fishery officer furnish a true return covering the period specified by the minister or such fishery officer containing the whole or any one or more of the following particulars.

The fishermen of this country are not men who are in the habit of keeping very careful accounts or of filling up forms; and, while it might be well enough that the captain of a schooner or of a steam fishing vessel should make these returns, I think that to call upon a shore fisherman, who goes out in his little whaler or flat and catches a few fish, to make up this elaborate statement, is, I do not say cruelty to dumb animals, but cruelty to a very deserving class of men who do not deserve to be treated in that way. I appeal to any honourable gentleman who is familiar with the fishermen around our shores if there is not very much force in what I say. Honourable gentlemen had better think over that point.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I hardly agree with the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), that the fishermen are not of a sufficiently educated character to be able to fill up forms of this kind.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I did not say exactly that.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think he is entirely mistaken. I have come across a great many fishermen; the fishermen of the Bay of Fundy are those I know the best; and I do not know a more intelligent set of men.

Hon. Mr. POWER: That goes without saying.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: They are well educated, and just as well able to fill up a form as is the captain of any schooner—and most of them are, I think, a little better able. If inability on the part of the fishermen is the objection, I do not think that objection holds good. As to the quantities, I do not suppose that it would be necessary to count every fish in a boat load; there are wholesale methods of determining quantities of fish. I do not think there is much in the objection as to the difficulty of furnishing returns.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman has tried to represent that I was reflecting upon the intelligence of the fishermen. Nothing of the sort; but I say this, that if the honourable gentleman himself were earning his living at fishing, in a flat, for instance, I think he would find it rather inconvenient to try to fill out all the returns that are called for here. The honourable gentleman can fancy himself in that position. He has gone out at three o'clock on a spring morning and hauled his trawls and brought his fish in; then he has to make a return giving the following information:

The value of the fish caught, bought, packed, or canned; the number of fishermen employed and their nationality; the number of shore workers employed; the number and value of the fishing vessels and boats employed; the quantity and value of fishing gear used; the number and value of buildings and fixtures used.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Each individual is to give the value of his own buildings only. That provision refers to canning establishments. The owner knows what they are worth.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am not objecting to this information being required from a cannery, but it is required from all fishermen. Listen to this:

Such other details and particulars as may be required by the minister or such fishery officer.

You do not know what sort of voluminous and circuitous returns would be called for.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: There are many questions asked in regard to the value of this, that, and the other thing. I think the honourable gentleman from Halifax is as likely as not to ask what is the value of the buildings used in certain canneries, what is the value of the boats used, and how many fishermen are employed. How can the Government give that information unless it is furnished by the individuals themselves? If we are going to have full and reliable statistics in regard to the fisheries we must get the information from those engaged in the business.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The law requires that fishermen should furnish this information, but it has not been obligatory and has not been enforced. We have been discussing in all seriousness the undesirability of having any provision in the Judges Act which is not obligatory and enforcible. This is practically the same principle. It is manifest that the fisheries of Canada are one of the greatest resources which we possess, and statistical information is absolutely essential to the promotion of the development of any of our natural resources; and unless we are able to secure the fullest information with regard to all industries we are not going to make very much headway. I think it is safe to say that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is not going to make these provisions unnecessarily oppressive. These provisions are in the public interest, and only contemplate the securing of this information from fishermen who are extensively engaged in the business.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Will all the men who fish for the different canneries in British Columbia be required to put in a return, or will it be sufficient if the canneries put in a return?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That will have to be worked out by regulation; it would be impossible in a clause of this kind to define all the machinery that will be necessary to make the Act effective.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

THE ST. JOHN AND QUEBEC RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 91, an Act to amend the St. John and Quebec Railway Act, 1916, Hon. Mr. Sproule in the chair.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: How much of this line has been completed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand that a fairly large portion of the road is constructed, but I could not tell my honourable friend the mileage.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is it in operation?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Some of it is. It has been taken over by the Government as it has been constructed, and is being operated by the Intercolonial railway.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: It is completed from Centreville to Gagetown, and there is 45 miles or thereabouts to be completed. How much time do they ask for?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They ask for an extension of time from the 1st day of August, 1917, to the 31st day of December, 1918.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: They have built 120 miles; they might as well finish it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I suppose the province has no objection to taking the subsidy?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: It seems not; but unfortunately, the amounts granted have not been sufficient.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

INTEREST ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 99, an Act to amend the Interest Act. Hon. Mr. McSweeney in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The object of this Bill is to bring Manitoba into the same category as British Columbia, Saskatchewan, and Alberta with reference to the rate of interest collectable upon judgments.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the rate?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is four per cent in Manitoba at the present time, but in the other provinces it is five per cent. Inasmuch as Manitoba was not included when the Interest Act was passed, it is desirable that it should be placed in the same position as the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Has Parliament the power to fix the rate of interest in any province of Canada?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The exclusive authority rests with this Parliament.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think I am correct in saying that the legal rate of interest in New Brunswick is six per cent. The rates should be uniform.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Am I correct in understanding that a province has a right to deal with usury and to fix the rate of interest in contravention to the authority of the federal Parliament, which alone has the right to deal with usury? There is a federal statute which provides that to make a contract binding as between individuals, where the rate of interest is not named, the rate shall be 5 per cent? If I understand it correctly, that must apply to every province in the Dominion. Therefore, under what authority does the province of Manitoba or any other province make a different rate of interest?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think my honourable friend misapprehends the object of this Bill. The province of Manitoba has not legislated at all and would have no authority to legislate on the matter, but the Interest Act provides that a certain rate of interest shall be chargeable upon judgments in the three western provinces exclusive of Manitoba.

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: Will this apply to all overdue debts?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I should say it would not be retroactive.

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: Will it apply to overdue debts if there is no specific rate of interest arranged for?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It only deals with judgments in the province of Manitoba.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

CONSERVATION OF CANADIAN TRADE.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS moved that the First Report of the Special Committee appointed to inquire into and report upon the best method or methods of conserving and increasing our domestic and overseas trade, etc., be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I am sorry to have to object to the report of my honourable friend, but I do not think that we would be justified in allowing it to go through as it stands. It says:

The committee recommend:

1. That the quorum of the committee be reduced to three members.
2. That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records.
3. That the committee be authorized to sit during the sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and during the recess of Parliament.

Although we may have the best intentions in the world and the greatest desire to help my honourable friend, I am afraid that we could not agree to adopt a report which recommends that the committee be authorized to sit during the recess of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: Is it inexpedient? It was my suggestion that we might get forward more rapidly with this work, which, if it is to be effective, will require a good deal of time while Parliament is not sitting.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: As far as I am concerned, I am quite agreeable to withdraw that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Strike out "and during the recess of Parliament," so that the clause will read:

That the committee be authorized to sit during the sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and also to hold meetings at any time and place outside of the city of Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The committee cannot meet outside the city of Ottawa. I leave it to the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry), who has been for a long time Speaker of this House, to say whether a committee can meet outside of the city of Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think the honourable gentleman had better address himself to the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: We have had a joint committee of both Houses sitting in Toronto, Montreal, and other places. I can see no objection to that.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What committee sat in Toronto?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The joint committee on the question of returned soldiers.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is that a members' committee?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I was at the sessions of that committee in Montreal and in Toronto. There is nothing unusual about that.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: We thought it might be more convenient and less expensive if the committee went to Toronto or Montreal, or any other place where a dozen or possibly a score of persons could be heard, than if those people were to come to Ottawa, and we therefore made the suggestion. At all events, our intentions are honourable.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Would the members of the committee charge their travelling expenses to the Government? That would be a money Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved to strike out the words, "and during the recess of Parliament."

The amendment was agreed to, and the report as amended was concurred in.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

RULING BY THE SPEAKER.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: If I understand correctly the point of order raised by the honourable gentleman from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule), it is that the Bill now before us, No. 66, in amendment to the Judges Act, being a money Bill, this House has no right to amend it.

There are numerous precedents in relation to this Bill which may lead to different conclusions; but, after a careful study of the same, I have come to the conclusion that the Bill can be amended in the way which has been proposed by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross). It is not proposed to increase or decrease the salaries of the judges, no taxes or appropriations of money are intended by that amendment, but its only object is to complete clause 33 of the said Judges Act, by adding a sanction to the said clause. If the Senate had no power to adopt an amendment of this kind, it would be of no use for this House to study any Bill from the House of Commons embodying any clause involving in any way the appropriation of money.

I find, in May, 11th edition, page 577, the following:

> Nor have the Commons, in dealing with amendments by the Lords to bills for the administration of local and other rates and charges, which touched matters of privilege, refrained from acting on the principle that, if the Lords' amendments, both in object and intention, dealt with legislative and not fiscal objects, a rigid adherence on the part of the Commons to their privileges might exclude the Lords from the practical consideration of such bills. On an occasion of this nature, in the session of 1838, when the Commons had before them Lords' amendments, many of which dealt with privileged matters, Speaker Abercromby explained the course which in his judgment should be followed. Speaking as the authorized guardian of the privileges of the house, he remarked, after reference to a precedent which had occurred in the year 1834, that the bill affected "not only the proprietors of the land, but the great mass of the people of Ireland;" and that, "as the principle of rating was necessarily incidental to such a measure, he considered that, if the privileges of this house were strictly pressed in such a case, they would almost tend to prevent the House of Peers from taking such a measure into its consideration in a way that might be on all grounds, advisable."

I also find, in Bourinot, 3rd edition, page 627:

> That on the 23rd of May, 1874, a Bill was returned from the Senate, with an amendment providing for an increase in the quantity of land granted to settlers in the Northwest. The premier and other members doubted the right of the Senate to increase a grant of land—the public lands being, in the opinion of the House, in the same position as the public revenues. The amendment was only adopted with an entry in the journals that the Commons did not think it "necessary at that late period of the session, to insist on its privileges in respect thereto, but that the waiver of the said privileges was not to be drawn into a precedent."

I am also of the opinion that, when there are doubts concerning the rights of this House to amend Bills, the Senate should proceed to amend them, leaving to the House of Commons to decide whether their privileges have been infringed or not.

I am therefore of the opinion that the amendment proposed by the honourable member for Middleton is in order.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The Senate again went into committee on Bill 66, an Act to amend the Judges Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed. Hon. Mr. Watson in the Chair.

On the amendment moved by Hon. Mr. Power, that the following be inserted as section 5:

> Sections 20, 22, 25 and 26 of the said Act are repealed, but such repeal shall not be construed to affect the pension of any judge who has resigned or been retired since the passage of this Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER: As this amendment was discussed at some length at an earlier stage of the committee, I do not think it necessary to go over the ground again. I pointed out that up to the year 1903 a judge might retire, or might be retired for inefficiency after serving for fifteen years, and he was retired on two-thirds of his salary. It was found that some judges remained in office after they had ceased to be efficient; and, with a view to remedying that condition of things, this Act was passed, providing that under certain circumstances the judges, after continuing in office, in one case for 20 years and in the other for 25 years, should be allowed to retire on full pay. The effect of that, as stated by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) and myself, was that the cure was worse than the disease—that, whereas previously an occasional judge remained on the Bench when he should have retired and accepted a pension, since the passing of that Act almost every judge feels that it is his duty to his family and himself to remain on the Bench until he can retire on full pay. I pointed out that in the case of the province from which my honourable friend from Middleton and I come, we had at one time three chief justices: one who retired under the old law on two-thirds pay; one who had retired under the Act of 1903 on full pay; and the third, who was discharging the duties of the office. Clearly that is a scandal, and particularly at this time when we are called upon to exercise the strictest economy. We should try to abate the scandal. I therefore moved that these sections should be repealed, and it is provided that such repeal shall not be construed to affect the pension of any judge who has resigned or has been retired before the passing of this Act. Some honourable gentleman did ask a question as to the effect on the judges now on the Bench. I think the judges, like any other civil servants, accept office and take the risk that the law may be altered while they are in office; and if, when a judge has served his fifteen years, he does not choose to retire, he can remain in office as a judge until he becomes completely incapable, so that the judges now on the Bench have no special grievance to complain of.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I have always been in favour of some provision that would control the judges or some of them, because it is well known that a few of them do abuse the functions of their office to the extent of getting a salary which I think and the general public think they are not entitled to enjoy. I am in favour of some method of controlling them in the future better than they have been controlled in the past; and, in the absence of a better suggestion than the one proposed, since it is held to be in order, I am decidedly in favour of the amendment. I have in my mind instances of judges who I think have not acted as they should have done; but I neither want to use their names here nor to deal with them to such an extent that they might be recognized. If the proposed amendments will control them, I think we cannot pass them too soon.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I understand that the honourable the Speaker has given his decision in reference only to the proposed amendment to section 33, and not the one now under consideration.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The decision covers both, practically.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The point of order was raised as to both amendments.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But the decision is in regard to only one.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: As I explained, I understood that the point of order applied only to the motion made by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross), and I gave my ruling on that motion only.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am in favour of the amendment, but I do not think it should apply to judges who have been appointed since the law was changed in 1903. It seems to me that they would be entitled to set up the claim that they had made a bargain with the Crown.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I am disposed to agree with the honourable member for Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt). A prima facie bargain has been made with the judges appointed since that amendment to the Judges Act was made, and to pass an Act wiping that out would be an injustice to them. Otherwise, I am in full accord with the amendment.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: It is important to know if there is a question of order raised as to this amendment. I understood yesterday that the point of order was raised as to both amendments.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That does not help the situation. The House of Commons is not going to be governed by that.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: It is well to know if this point of order has been withdrawn. Speaking on the merits of the question, I agree entirely with the honourable member for Ottawa that we must not go back on what was done; but I go further. I am entirely opposed to the amendment. The law was passed after mature deliberation, and no reason has been given so far for changing that law. I may say that in 1904 I had just resigned from the Bench after having served for several years, and I said at the time that the salaries of the judges were too small. It is for the Government to appoint to the Bench lawyers who know their duty and who will be ready to resign when they cannot longer perform their duties, without waiting until they can draw full pay. If this law were repealed, it would make no difference as to the payment of the three chief justices in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: As I raised the point of order, perhaps a word of explanation would be permissible with reference to the statement that the point of order applied to both amendments. I may say frankly that I had not an opportunity of carefully reading the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Halifax, and only heard very indistinctly a portion of the argument; but I understood that it proposed a diminution of the salaries of judges, and therefore I assumed that it was of a similar nature to the amendment proposing that they should make a certain return, and, in the event of their not making that return, that their salary should not be paid to them. I took it that both amendments had the same relation to the Bill, because both dealt with money. There was the question of our right to interfere with the provisions of a money Bill that had originated in the other House. When the money was voted, the provision of the statute was attached to it that the judges should receive the benefit of that vote, and I thought that neither of these provisions could properly be interfered with. I therefore withdraw the point of order.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think it would be foolish to send Bills to the Commons only to be told that we are dealing with matters that we have no business to deal with. I am strongly of opinion that this is a money Bill. What are we doing? We are repealing a provision under which judges are entitled to a certain pension, namely, an amount equal to their full pay. The effect of doing that is to restore the provision entitling them to two-thirds of their pay after retirement. Therefore this is a money matter.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) noticed the decision of His Honour the Speaker—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I was not here when he gave it.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: He gave a very clear explanation of the decision that he had arrived at. He arrived at his conclusion on two grounds: one was that these amendments were not in the nature of a money Bill, and the other was that, if there was any doubt about it, it was right and proper that they should go to the other House, where the question might be raised. He pointed out that it was entirely a matter of intention; if the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Halifax was intended to improve the administration of justice, and incidentally it affected the income of the judges, it was not a money Bill, but a Bill for the administration of justice. If, on the other hand, it is felt that this is an underground way of dealing with the money—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That argument might be applied to any Bill.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: So it might. It is entirely a question of intent, whether you are dealing with a money Bill or with an ordinary legislative Act. In dealing with an ordinary legislative Act we have pretty wide powers.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: On the other hand, if we are dealing with a money Bill we have not the same powers.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Mr. Chairman, after you left the Chair we had a full discussion on money Bills. Now, let honourable gentlemen get it into their brains what a money Bill is before they talk about it. Under the constitution and under our parliamentary rule, a money Bill is one involving taxation—initiating taxation, increasing the burden on the people. These are the only things which can make any Bill a money Bill. Let honourable gentlemen get that into their heads once and for all. I have been preaching this ever since I have been in this honourable House. It is a fundamental principle. The honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), who did not hear the discussion yesterday, still clings to the old tradition. He has occupied the Speaker's chair, and has given decisions according to Erskine, May, Bourinot and other dead men. What we want is decisions according to the conditions, the intelligence, and the experience of to-day. The honourable gentleman holds that this is a money Bill. Why, the Criminal Code of the Dominion of Canada is nothing but a money Bill from top to bottom. Every second provision in it calls for penalties, fines, and so on. The Customs Act is a money Bill. Why cling to the old idea that because there is some mention of money in a Bill it therefore must be a money Bill, and we are precluded from amending it, though, as the honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) said yesterday, we have the privilege of throwing it out? The proposition that an intelligent body of men have simply the right to throw out a Bill that is absolutely good in ninety-nine provisions out of one hundred, but would have no right to amend the one faulty provision, is absurd. If we have a right to throw out the Bill we have a right to amend it. That is philosophy, and there is a good deal of theology in it too.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The honourable gentleman says that if we have the right to reject a whole Bill we have the right to reject a part of it. We have the right to reject a subsidy Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is provided by the constitution.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Well, let us see how far the honourable gentleman's principle goes. If we have the right to reject a subsidy Bill, have we the right to amend it?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The question is plain and is very easily answered. A subsidy Bill is purely a money Bill, foreshadowed and guaranteed by the Constitution, and initiates taxation. I admit that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not wish to interrupt my honourable friend, but it seems to me that there is nothing before the Chair. I do not understand that a point of order has been raised as to this Bill being a money Bill. The point of order was raised upon an amendment, and on that His Honour the Speaker has already given his decision. Possibly during my absence from the Chamber for a few moments another point of order has been raised—for I have heard my honourable friend from Grey say that he withdrew the point of order which he had raised. Consequently, I understand there is no point of order before the Chair.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I admit that. If the honourable the leader of the Government had only waited a second, I should have explained.

The CHAIRMAN: The Speaker gave his ruling on the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from Middleton. He did not consider the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Halifax. However, the honourable gentleman from Grey has withdrawn his point of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The point before the House is that raised by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), who is going to oppose this amendment on the ground that it is a money measure.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I raised no point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: There is no point of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I know that, but the honourable gentleman's argument is that he is opposed to this amendment because it involves a money question.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: To expedite matters, I will withdraw my observations.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am gaining some headway. Therefore, I agree with the honourable the leader of the Government, now that the honourable gentleman has withdrawn his dark project, that there is nothing before the Chair.

The amendment moved by Hon. Mr. Power (p. 290) was agreed to.

On the amendment moved by Hon. W. B. Ross:

That the following be added to the Bill as section 6:

Section 33 of the said Act is amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

2. And every such judge shall, in the month of December in every year, file a statement with the Minister of Justice that he has complied with the terms of this section, or, if not, in what manner he has departed therefrom. No salary shall be paid to any judge failing to file such statement.

3. No judge of any of the courts mentioned in section 33 of the said Act, who may be appointed by competent authority a member of any commission, or to any duty outside the usual judicial duties, shall receive any pay for such services, but may receive necessary travelling and living expenses.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) has, I understand, proposed an amendment to that of my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross).

Hon. Mr. POWER: I agree in principle with the honourable gentleman from Middleton, but I feel that the amendment which he proposes is a little drastic and that we should consider it carefully before passing it. My idea is that it is not desirable to insist that every judge in the country, of whom I understand there are a couple of thousand, shall in the month of December make a return to the office of the Minister of Justice. I think the object which the honourable gentleman from Middleton has in view, and which we should all have in view, the proper administration of justice, can be attained just as well by something that does not go quite so far, and I submit this as a substitute for the earlier part of that amendment:

Every such judge shall, within one month from the date of a notice to that effect from the Minister of Justice or his deputy, file with such minister a statement to the effect that he has complied with the terms of this section, or, if not, the manner in which he has departed therefrom. No salary shall be paid to any judge failing to file such statement.

The point is this, that if any complaint is made to the Minister of Justice that a judge is not doing just the right thing, that he is violating the provisions of section 33. then the Minister of Justice calls on him to submit this statement. I think that is going far enough.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: In one way I should have no objection to the honourable gentleman's amendment, if it were not for the fact that it involves some person making a complaint against a judge and the Minister of Justice writing to the judge. The amendment which I have drawn makes the requirement automatic, and does not throw upon any lawyer, or any fellow judge, or upon the Minister of Justice, the invidious duty of interfering with a judge. It has been pointed out that every member of this House, although his attendance here is taken every day, is required at the end of the session to go to the office of the Clerk and make an oath concerning his attendance. That does not hurt the dignity of any one here. If the requirement were worded otherwise, to the effect that only those members should be required to make an affidavit who the Speaker thought ought to do so, it would be throwing an invidious task upon the Speaker. The requirement is similar to what I propose with regard to the judges, and it works automatically. I have no doubt that the honourable gentleman from Halifax has in view the same object as I have, that is, to improve the administration of justice. I have nothing else in the back of my mind in this matter. But I do know this—and I think those honourable gentlemen who are not so much in touch with the courts as I am ought to know it—that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction in this country about what is going on in connection with our judges. There are judges who are carrying on big business.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Judge Galt.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: There are many cases. Nearly every day a new one comes to my attention. Judges are neglecting their judicial duties, in the teeth of the solemn compact that was made with them by the late Government giving them 50 per cent more salary and requiring them to confine themselves to their judicial duties. Then, there is another point. There is quite a competition among the judges in some of the provinces as to who are to be appointed members of commissions. Now, in my amendment I have proposed that if a judge chooses to go upon a commission he is not to be paid for it. Of course, that amendment could be put the other way and be made to provide that if a judge is paid as a member of a commission he is not to be paid as a judge. No man can be in two places at one time, and no judge has a right to draw two salaries at the same time. If he is receiving $20 a day as a judge, he has no right to receive $25 a day in addition to that as a commissioner. The present practice of some judges is sapping the independence of the Bench and is also destroying the confidence of the general public in the Bench, which is a vital thing. It is our business to do all we can to safeguard the administration of justice without casting any reflection upon the judges. We are speaking of them as respectfully as we can. I am trying to be careful on that point, for I believe that fully 90 per cent of the judges are perfectly loyal to the Judges Act. It is our business to try to have justice administered so that people will feel that, no matter who is concerned, whether he be a millionaire or a day labourer, there is a place where he can go and get an independent and honest decision as to his rights. It is solely from that point of view that I have been led to move the amendment which I have proposed. I have nothing in view with regard to the Judges Act but the improvement of the administration of justice, and I think that the amendment suggested by the honourable gentleman from Halifax is really a retrograde step.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am in favour of the amendment as it stands, and I am not in favour of the change suggested by the honourable gentleman from Halifax. It would probably be a lawyer who would have to complain of a judge, and human nature is such that if a lawyer who is at present persona grata with a judge were to make a complaint, he would find on the next morning after making his complaint, or after the judge had heard about it, that he would be far from being persona grata; he might get justice, but it would be very cold justice. Then, it is an invidious thing. Why should the Minister of Justice require a statement from a particular judge? The public would say, "The Minister of Justice has asked every Liberal judge to give an account of himself, but he will not ask those on his own side." If the judges have done right during the twelve months, it is very easy for them in December to say, "We have obeyed the law." That is the least they might do.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Being a layman, I feel more diffidence in speaking about this matter than I would if I were a lawyer; but I think, as between the two amendments, that the honourable gentleman from Middleton has made a very strong argument in favour of his amendment, and it appears to me that if the amendment to that amendment, introduced by the honourable gentleman from Halifax, were adopted, the whole matter would become practically a dead letter. I cannot see that it is any reflection on members of the Bench to ask them to certify each year that they have been obeying the law. It might be said, for instance, that to require members of the Senate to take oath that they have been present here a certain number of days, or that they have not been absent more than a certain number of days, and that sort of thing, is a reflection on the honour and honesty of the members of the Senate. I think the amendment proposed is no more a reflection on the honesty and honour of a judge than the regulation with regard to members of the Senate is a reflection upon us. I think that, if there have been infractions of the law by judges in the past, they should be called upon to obey the law, just as every other person in the community is called upon to obey the law; and that if they refuse to obey the law they should abide by any penalty for its infraction; and I think it only right that penalties should be imposed for infractions of the law by judges, just as by anybody else. I am in favour of the amendment originally introduced by the honourable gentleman from Middleton.

Hon. Mr. POWER: With the permission of the Chair, I will withdraw my amendment. It is a thing that does not often happen; but I have been convinced by the speeches of the honourable gentleman from Middleton and one or two other honourable gentlemen that I was wrong.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I say to the committee that the Deputy Governor is waiting? Under the circumstances, it might be well for the committee to rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again after the departure of the Deputy Governor.

Progress was reported.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

The sitting having been resumed:

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The Senate again went into committee on Bill 66, an Act to amend the Judges Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.—Hon. Mr. Watson in the chair.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: The amendment proposed is entirely useless. As the law stands now, the Minister of Justice has the power in his hands to compel the judges to do their duty. While I am sure the honourable gentleman does not intend it as such, that part of his amendment is somewhat of a slur or slander on the judiciary. I agree entirely with the provisions of subsection 3 of the amendment. I am of the opinion that the judges ought to confine themselves to their duties as provided by law. When the salaries of the judges were increased it was understood that they would cease to act as commissioners and trustees, and that all their time would be given to their judicial duties. If there has sometimes been delinquency on their part, it is not the fault of the judges, but the fault of the Government, both Liberal and Conservative, who in the past have asked judges—men who had been their friends in the past—to be commissioners to investigate various political matters. This is what has caused loss of confidence in the Bench. During last year we have seen ministers of the Crown abusing judges appointed by themselves. Who was to blame for that? Was it the fault of the judges? No, it was the fault of the Government that appointed them. Judge Galt, after having accepted a commission from the Government—

An hon. SENATOR: What Government?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: The Manitoba Government, with the sanction of this Government. He had no right to act. Naturally he should have refused to act as commissioner of the provincial government; but the provincial government, to show that they had no political bias, appointed him, and he accepted. Judge Galt found against an honourable minister—I do not say whether rightly or wrongly; but prima facie he was right. What was the result? The result was that in the House and outside of the House he was abused by the men against whom he had reported. He was abused by his late friends—because after a man is appointed to the Bench he has no political friends. A man who boasted that Judge Galt was one of his friends recommended his appointment. Was it the fault of the Judge that he was appointed? No, it was the fault of the Minister of Justice. If it is necessary to amend the law, I would be inclined to accept the last subsection of the amendment; but I repeat that it is not necessary, because, as the law stands now, judges have no right to act as commissioners. The Minister of Justice has the necessary powers to prevent the judges abusing their position. To pass a law requiring them to give themselves certificates of good behaviour each year would be a great reflection upon them. Any man has the right to petition both Houses of Parliament to impeach a judge if he is guilty of wrongdoing. That is essential to their good behaviour. We do not want to go any further. I feel very strongly on this matter. Generally speaking, our judges of to-day are the best that we could have. They are human and may make mistakes; but when they act as commissioners it is with the tacit consent of the Government. I am entirely against the amendment.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think the honourable gentleman must have overlooked the provisions of the amendment. Section 33 provides that a judge shall not engage in any occupation—

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: That is enough.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: The amendment which I propose does not prevent his acting as a commissioner; it provides that if any competent authority appoints him a commissioner, he shall not draw a salary as a commissioner.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: If you do that, you imply that he may act as a commissioner, and give him authority to do so.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Does the honourable gentleman want to deprive the Dominion and provincial governments of the right to appoint a judge a commissioner?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: They are doing wrong.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: If the majority of the members of this House were in favour of not allowing a judge to act in any capacity whatever outside of his judicial duties, I would agree to that; but I doubt very much if such a proposal could be carried under existing conditions in Canada. My proposal will go very far towards stopping the practice of judges canvassing for commissions. If a judge wants to act on a commission, and a competent authority appoints him, he shall not draw pay for it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: We should thoroughly understand what these three provisions mean. I have been trying to work out their meaning. Section 33 of the Act at present provides:

> No judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or of the Exchequer Court of Canada or of any superior or county court in Canada shall, either directly or indirectly, as director or manager of any corporation, company or firm, or in any other manner whatever, for himself or others, engage in any occupation or business other than his judicial duties; but every such judge shall devote himself exclusively to such judicial duties.

If we adopt the proposed subsections separately, we shall probably find that we have adopted conflicting legislation. It is first provided that a judge shall not act as a commissioner in any case, because there is profit attached to the office; then in subsection 3 it is said that he may. What I want is to protest as strongly as I can against a provision which permits the appointment by any Government of a judge to act as a commissioner. I am not concerned with the question whether money is paid to him as a commissioner or not, and I have not in mind any particular judge; but in my opinion it saps the respect which the country ought to have for the judges. Honourable gentlemen within my hearing know that, no matter what decision a commissioner gives, half the people of the country think he has sold himself and has given a decision for which he has been paid. If there is anything that makes the name of the judges of the country a byword, no matter how fairly they discharge their duties, it is that. We are proposing to sanction the very thing which I think the great majority of Canadians object to most strongly, and which does not exist under the law to-day. We are opening the way to a judge doing something which he cannot now do under the law. The section of the Act would prevent any judge from accepting a commissionership; yet, by this amendment, we are doing away with that provision for the proper administration of justice. I hope the Senate is not going to commit itself to the appointment of judges as commissioners. We shall be blamed if we adopt any such legislation.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) does not feel any more strongly on that point than I do. When I drafted this amendment, if I had thought that there was any chance at all of passing a provision that a judge should not under any circumstances whatever act as a commissioner, or in any capacity outside of the judicial duties indicated in his commission, I would have proposed that instead of subsection 3. I am not wedded to this subsection. The honourable gentleman can substitute an amendment providing that no judge shall act as a commissioner, and I am prepared to support it and withdraw this amendment; but if his amendment is not carried, then I propose this amendment, because I do not agree that it is in conflict with section 33. Section 33 prohibits a judge from engaging in any other occupation; but a commissionership would not be a change of occupation. The honourable gentleman is only expressing what is in my mind, and what I hope will come some day; but I thought that it might perhaps be found a little inconvenient, owing to the present disturbed state of the country, and that it might be wise to allow the judges to act as commissioners for some few years to come. In order to do away with a practice which in some parts of the country is a public scandal, I provided that if a judge acted as a commissioner he should only act as a judge.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: A judge is not allowed to act as a commissioner now.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: It is done every day.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Judge Galt was appointed and made a report, and what has the Government done? In spite of the law, the Government at Ottawa has appointed two other judges, the Chief Justice of New Brunswick, a very able man, and Judge Tellier, as commissioners to revise the report of Judge Galt. What will be the consequence? Either the commisisoners will reverse the report of Judge Galt or they will confirm it. If they reverse his report, they will be accused of having been appointed to whitewash this one or that one, and if they confirm his report, the gentlemen reported against will have three judges to abuse instead of one, and the judges generally will lose the confidence of the country. We are working to that end in passing a law of this kind. We should not touch the law. As it stands, the Minister of Justice has the necessary authority to prevent judges going outside of their jurisdiction; and, in addition to that, every citizen of this country has a right to impeach a judge if he is at fault.

Subsection 2 of the amendment moved by Hon. W. B. Ross (p. 293) was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER: After subsection 2, I should like to insert an amendment as follows:

This section shall not be construed to prevent any judge from acting as executor or trustee under the will of a deceased relative, or as a commissioner appointed by any Government to inquire into a public matter, or with the consent of the Minister of Justice as a professor or lecturer in a school of law.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I have not had time to draft an amendment, but I wish to follow up the speech I made a few moments ago by proposing an amendment to cover the case of commissions. I would suggest that section 33 of chapter 138 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows:

No judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or of the Exchequer Court of Canada or of any superior or county court in Canada shall act as a commissioner appointed by any Government or by any municipality to inquire into and report upon any public or other matter, and no judge of any of the courts mentioned in this section shall, either directly or indirectly, as director or manager of any corporation, company or firm, or in any other manner whatever, for himself or others, engage in any occupation or business other than his judicial duties; but every such judge shall devote himself exclusively to such judicial duties.

A controversy has arisen in Canada over the right of a judge, under section 33 as it now stands, to act as commissioner. Quite recently there was a great deal of discussion as to whether Mr. Justice Galt was not contravening section 33 in investigating and reporting upon a matter which we all know about. Some lawyers and some judges contended that section 33 did not prohibit Mr. Justice Galt from so acting. My own opinion, whatever it is worth, is that under the section he had no right to act as a commissioner; but I think that in the interest of the administration of justice we ought to remove the doubt. We ought to make the section perfectly clear, so that no judge may plead ignorance, and every judge will know exactly what Parliament expects him to do and what not to do; and, among the things he should be expected not to do, is to act in a capacity similar to that in which Mr. Justice Galt has acted recently.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: May I ask the honourable gentleman if it would not be better simply to substitute his amendment for subsection 3 of the amendment?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There would be no objection to that, but I do not know that it would be any better.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Strike out subsection 3 and insert the words which the honourable gentleman has read.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Would not the amendment proposed have the effect of preventing provincial governments from appointing judges as commissioners in municipal matters? On three or four occasions judges have been appointed in Montreal to make inquiries into certain provincial or municipal matters. Would the amendment prohibit such appointments?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes. Not so much harm would result from a judge acting as commissioner under a provincial statute in municipal matters as from a judge acting as a commissioner at the instance of the Dominion Government in a matter of general public interest; but to my mind the difference is only a question of degree.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: How about a judge acting as a police commissioner? Judges act not only as police commissioners but also as official arbitrators. We must draw the amendment carefully, so as to avoid interfering with those functionaries.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think that subsection 3 of the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Middleton meets the objection raised by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If they do not receive pay they will not act, that is sure.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It is all very well to say that judges should not be employed as commissioners; but has the honourable gentleman stopped to think what would be the effect of an absolute prohibition of judges acting as commissioners? The public sentiment and the sentiments of all Governments have recognized that, as a rule, a judge, from his education and from the practice of his duties as a judge, is better qualified than nineteen out of twenty other men to act as a commissioner; and if, as the honourable gentleman from Middleton has proposed, a judge is to get no pay for his services, I fail to see that there is any serious objection to his acting as a commissioner.

With regard to the amendment that I have just put into the hands of the Chairman, I do not myself see that there is any serious objection to a judge acting as executor or trustee under the will of one of his own relatives. That privilege does not seem to me to be open to very much abuse, and I know there are judges who are acting in such capacities and who do not neglect their judicial duties.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not see the necessity for the honourable gentleman's amendment at all. The word "occupation" is used in section 33. If a judge happened to be appointed executor for his father, you could not fairly say that he was going into an occupation. I think the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman would only encumber and make complicated what is now a very simple clause. That section 33 is a pretty well-drawn section. I am not finding fault with section 33, but I am trying to add something to the Act in order that section 33 may be carried out.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I think that the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from Middleton goes far enough. That amendment will do a great deal of good. I think that, if the judges are not paid as commissioners, they will not be inclined to act very often, and they would consent to act as commissioners—in municipal matters, for instance—only because they would feel in duty bound to do so. But if provincial governments or municipal authorities cannot have a judge appointed to make an investigation into municipal matters, to whom can they apply? To doctors? To engineers?

An hon. SENATOR: To lawyers.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Lawyers? I think there would be more objection made to the choice of lawyers than to the appointment of judges. So I will vote for the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Middleton and against the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It has just been pointed out to me by an honourable senator that the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Middleton does not go far enough. It is a step in the right direction.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I am willing to accept the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Ottawa and go the whole way.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I think it is a step in the right direction to enact that if judges are appointed commissioners they shall not be paid for their services. But this has been pointed out to me: there are many judges who have little to do, and who would be only too glad to go upon a commission so as to be able to travel around the country and have their travelling expenses paid, making a junket or a picnic of their trip; so, if we added that not only shall judges receive no pay, but they shall receive no travelling expenses, very few of them would accept such appointments, and the evil would be remedied in that way.

There is another point, in regard to appointing judges as executors. I understand that in the case of a poor man, one who leaves only three or four thousand dollars, there would not be much harm caused if a relative who happened to be a judge were appointed to administer that little estate; but what about relatives who die leaving tremendous concerns—timber limits, financial concerns of vast wealth, pulp mills, dry goods concerns, railroads? Suppose a judge were named as an executor or trustee of such an estate, how could he find time to attend to the duties of the bench? It is opening the door to allow judges to act as trustees or executors under a deceased relative's will. I think that privilege ought to be struck out. Or, if it is so desired, it might be provided that a judge might act in any case where the will does not cover an amount exceeding $5,000, or $10,000, or $15,000, and where the administration of the estate will not involve any loss of time by the judge or distract his attention from his judicial duties. I would take no exception to a provision of that kind; but, as I have pointed out—and I think the honourable gentleman from Middleton will agree that I am right—it would be much to the detriment of the bench and of the cause of justice in this country to permit judges to undertake the administration of large estates of every description. If, in addition to prohibiting that, it were provided that judges acting on commissions shall not be paid for their services and shall not receive payment of their travelling expenses, then we should have the judges paid their salaries for the performance of their judicial duties, and doing other work unselfishly and from patriotic motives.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I agree entirely with the honourable member for Middleton. I think that we should be satisfied with section 33 as it stands. Under that section a judge, especially a relative, can act, provided that there is no interference with the discharge of his duties. So far as I know, there has been no abuse, no complaint made in this regard, and there is no need to amend the section as proposed. I do not think it is necessary to add a clause permitting the appointment of judges as professors with the consent of the Minister of Justice. Section 33 does not prevent such appointments. I intend to vote against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Mr. Chairman, no doubt all the judges in the country are reading about the drastic amendments which are being prepared for their guidance in the future. As the legal talent of the House seems to be divided, I move that the committee rise.

The motion that the committee rise was negatived.

The amendment moved by Hon. Mr. Power to the amendment (p. 298) was negatived.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: On the suggestion of the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), I will make a slight alteration in my amendment, which is that subsection 1 of section 33 of the Act read as follows:

> No judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or of the Exchequer Court of Canada or of any superior or county court in Canada shall act as a member of any commission or perform any duties outside of his judicial duties.

My honourable friend has pointed out to me that under the amendment as it was originally worded provincial appointments might not be excluded.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That is proposed to be substituted for subsection 3?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I have always read section 33 as excluding judges from acting on commissions. There is a distinct provision there that every judge shall devote himself exclusively to his judicial duties. If my recollection serves me, the Minister of Justice, who introduced this amendment to the Judges Act, declared in the House of Commons that it was intended to exclude judges from acting on such commissions. I am going to support this amendment, but I think we should add to it a clause something like this:

> This section shall not be construed to apply to appointments made by virtue of any statute applicable to all judges of the same class to prevent the appointment of any judge to a permanent position under provincial statute.

The section is aimed at judges who are acting in controversial matters or who are devoting their time to commercial affairs. It is not aimed at judges who are acting as surrogate court judges, police commissioners, or auditors of criminal accounts, as they do in Ontario. Under the Ontario statutes, many duties are placed upon the shoulders of the county court judges, and the practice is not objected to in any way by the people. If a sweeping enactment of this kind is to remain on the statute books, and is going to be more severely enforced, as I think it is, a judge should be able to satisfy himself that he is not infringing a statute. I mention this because, under the Criminal Code, any judge or any person who does anything forbidden by any Dominion or provincial statute is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to a year's imprisonment in the penitentiary. If a judge acts on any commission, which is contrary to this enactment, any person can lay an information in the police court, hale him before a magistrate, and have him go before a grand jury. The impression seems to prevail that a judge may only be impeached for delinquencies; but he is subject to the law.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think my honourable friend is mistaken. Section 33 says:

Engage in any occupation or business other than his judicial duties.

My honourable friend has referred to the case of a county judge acting as a police court commissioner or as a probate judge. In such cases the judge is acting under the provisions of the statute which defines his judicial duties.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The judicial duties of every judge are set out in his commission. The authority which appoints him clothes him with his powers, and no other authority can endow him with any other functions as a judge unless the Dominion statute says that he shall perform the duties specified in a provincial statute.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The Dominion Government does not specify what the duties of a judge shall be.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is all done by statute.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: A judge is appointed under a Dominion commission, and the courts are constituted by provincial authority. A county court judge is appointed to serve in a court erected by provincial authority, and that is as far as any statute that I have ever seen goes. The judge who is directed to audit accounts for enforcing criminal law has a statutory duty, but not a judicial duty.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Would the proposed amendment prevent a judge revising the voters' lists in the province of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think not, because the revision is a judicial duty imposed upon a judge by the statutes of the province.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Could not a similar statute clothe a judge with authority to act under commission? Take the statute passed many years ago providing that a county court judge should be an arbitrator in the settlement of disputes with reference to school sections, and that he should be paid $20 a day. Would that be part of his judicial duties? If so, it is laid down by provincial statute. If the province can clothe judges with authority to do one thing, it can clothe them with authority to do another thing. It would be necessary to know what the duties are.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me that we are conjuring up difficulties that will not arise. Section 33 has been the law for some years. My honourable friend from Ottawa, I think, intends to prohibit a judge from acting on a commission; so the question raised by my honourable friend from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule) would not arise.

The amendment moved by Hon. Mr. Belcourt (p. 300) was agreed to.

The Bill was reported with amendments.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should like, honourable gentlemen, that a few days be allowed to elapse before the consideration of the amendments. Those amendments are of a rather drastic character, and I should like to have an opportunity of discussing them with the Government.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend has approved of them; so there is every chance that they will carry.

It was ordered, that the report of the committee on the Bill be taken into consideration on Tuesday next.

CONSERVATION OF CANADIAN TRADE.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS moved that the Second Report of the Special Committee appointed to inquire into and report upon the best method or methods of Conserving and Increasing our Domestic and Overseas Trade, etc., be concurred in.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would the honourable gentleman give us a little explanation of the recommendation which in this report he asks the Senate to make? The report states:

Your Committee therefore recommends:

1. That the Senate of Canada forward to The Right Honourable the Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, G.C.M.G., a copy of this second Report of the Special Committee on the Conservation of Canadian Trade, with the request that due regard and consideration be given to the importance and advisability of aiding in such manner as may be deemed prudent and advisable the formation of a Canadian Trade and Banking Corporation which will meet the requirements set forth.

I think it would be of advantage to the House if the honourable gentleman would give us some slight explanation as to what is intended by that recommendation.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I think the recommendation really speaks for itself. It reads:

With the request that due regard and consideration be given to the importance and advisability of aiding in such manner as may be deemed prudent and advisable the formation—

And so forth. This committee does not undertake to recommend anything special to the Government; it simply recommends that the Government take the matter into consideration, and that they give such aid as they may deem prudent and advisable, provided that aid is asked for. This is simply drawing the matter to the attention of the Government. It does not recommend, nor have the committee been recommending, anything specific. Honourable gentlemen will remember that in my remarks during the debate I said that I believed it was necessary in the interests of this country that some persons, in a more or less patriotic way, or rather in a business way, should undertake an organization which might in some manner prepare for conditions after the war, when the very large sums of money that are coming into this country for munitions and war supplies of every kind will not longer be available. In fact, I have myself taken a somewhat active part in getting a number of leading gentlemen—whose names I do not at this stage wish to mention, but who are at the head of some of our greatest institutions—who are willing, if such a proposal is found advisable, to aid the Government and the country, not only with their services, but also with their capital and the capital of the institutions they represent. This committee only goes so far as to suggest that, if such a proposition is made to the Government, the Government will give it due consideration and give it, in the words of the report, such aid "as may be deemed prudent and advisable."

The report was concurred in.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday at three o'clock p.m.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, July 26, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE OLIVER AND WEBB EQUIPMENTS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired of the Government:

1. Are our troops in Canada still being supplied with the Oliver equipment?
2. Is the Oliver equipment still scrapped when our troops arrive in England?
3. Is the Oliver equipment still being replaced for the Webb equipment by the Imperial Government?
4. Does the Canadian Government intend to continue to supply our troops with the Oliver equipment?
5. Does Canada have to pay for the two equipments?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. When C.E.F. take the field in France, Webb equipment is supplied from War Office supplies.
4. No.
5. No.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I understand that the Oliver equipment consists of a leather belt, 2 pouches, and 2 leather shoulder straps. I am informed by men who have been at the front that these pouches are very awkward to use. When the men are in action, in order to take out cartridges they have to open the pouches, and these must remain open. The result is that when the men move the cartridges drop out, and men have been shot down while on their hands and knees picking up cartridges. The Webb equipment, I understand, is made of cotton, and the cartridges remain in the pouches no matter what position the men are in. I understand that the Government has insisted upon giving the Oliver equipment to the troops, but that when they arrive in England it is scrapped, and is replaced by the Webb equipment. As we have to pay for the Webb equipment as well as for the Oliver equipment, the country is paying twice.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Government of Canada has not been paying for the Webb equipment. It is furnished by the Imperial Government without charge to the Government of Canada. The Oliver equipment has been used, and is being used, in Canada for training purposes, but not in France. Before any of our divisions have gone to France they have been supplied by the Imperial Government with the Webb equipment. A report has been in circulation that the Oliver equipment has been destroyed from time to time. Such is not the case. The Oliver equipment has been maintained, and is doing good service for the purpose for which it is used.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: At the front?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, not at the front, but in Canada and in England.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is it not a fact that the Government of Canada will have to pay its share of the cost of ammunition and other expenses to the Imperial Government? Therefore, shall we not have to pay for it in the long run?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. The Imperial Government, as I have already said to my honourable friend, is furnishing the Webb equipment without making any charge to Canada or having any intention of doing so.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: I desire to say, in addition to what the honourable leader of the Government has just said, that, after the Oliver equipment is taken from the soldiers in the old country, it is returned to Canada and is used for training purposes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It goes to the junk shop, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: No; it is used for training purposes.

THE OFFICIAL LANGUAGES OF CANADA.

MOTION.

Hon. P. A. CHOQUETTE rose to move:

That, in the opinion of the Senate, no delegate, agent, or representative of this country, to any economic or other meeting or conference between different countries, should be appointed by the Government, unless he can speak and write both official languages of Canada.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I do not intend to do more than call the attention of the English members of this House, the English members of the other House, and the English-speaking people generally in this country, to the necessity of having, as delegates, agents, or representatives of this country, at any economic or other international conference, men who are able to read and write the two official languages of Canada. My intention is not to press this resolution or to ask the Government to accept it at once. I do not believe in coercion in any shape or form. I am quite willing to withdraw my motion after placing the facts before this House and the country, in order to show the necessity of every educated public man in this country knowing both languages.

I wish to place before this House the opinion of an eminent Canadian, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, Sir George Foster, as expressed in a declaration made before the Canadian Club, I think in Toronto, regarding the necessity of a knowledge of French, after his return from the Economic Conference in Paris. The Evening Telegram of Toronto of November 6, 1916, gives the following report of the meeting:

Public men need French—So says Sir George Foster—Tells Canadian Club about Economic Conference at Paris, deliberations of which were in French.

"If I had to commence my life over again, and was going into public life, I would make it my duty to have a perfect mastery of the French language," said Sir George Foster to the members of the Canadian Club this afternoon. Sir George was giving an outline of the Economic Conference in Paris, and remarked about the efficiency of the delegates in their speaking the French language, in which the work of the Conference was carried out. With the exception of the Premier of Australia and Sir George they spoke the French language fluently.

It is time to bring before this House and this country the necessity of a knowledge of the French language in view of the opposition to it in some of the provinces. I may say that in England every public man—indeed, every educated man—is able to write and speak the French language. I am reminded of a remark made by the late King Edward VII on the occasion of his visit to Quebec as Prince of Wales in 1860. He was then a young man. At a ball which was given in his honour, he invited a young lady to dance with him. He addressed her in French; but the young lady, thinking perhaps to pay a compliment to the Prince, said, "Oh, I do not understand French." The reply of the Prince of Wales was: "Mademoiselle, I am very sorry, because in London every young girl who is supposed to be educated can speak French." That was a lesson for the young lady, and the incident was reported all over Quebec.

Now, it is true, in Canada as in London, that every public man, and every man who professes to be educated in public matters, ought to be able to speak the French language. I do not wish to say anything harsh or humiliating to my English-speaking colleagues who cannot speak French. It would seem easy to learn French sufficiently to speak it as badly as I am speaking English. At any rate, we all know that at all international conferences the language in which the debates are conducted is always the French language. Two years ago, in the course of a discussion in this House on the subject of the French language, I took the liberty of referring to another conference, which took place in Toronto. I stated that it had been reported by a member of the conference at which thirty-two nationalities were represented, that of all the delegates present there were only three who could not speak French. One was the representative of the Ontario Government, the Hon. Mr. Hearst, now Premier of the province, the second was the President of Toronto University, and the third was the Mayor of Toronto. All the others present were speaking in French. The Governor General of Canada was represented by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, who, fortunately, was able to open the conference in behalf of the Canadian Government in the French language and afterwards to speak in English, speaking either language as fluently as any of the delegates present. It was a humiliation, not only for the representative of the Ontario Government, the Mayor of Toronto, and the President of Toronto University, but also for this country, that they were unable to speak French, an official language in this country.

Let me refer to the recent visit to this country of the official delegations from France and from England. The French delegation was the first invited to address a joint session of both Houses of Parliament. M. Viviani made a speech on that occasion —a most eloquent speech in French.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How about English?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: How many public men, how many members of Parliament, how many officials, how many newspaper men, among those present, could understand him? The English-speaking newspaper men were turning to their French colleagues and asking, "What is he saying?" Sir Wilfrid Laurier was able to speak in both languages, English as well as French; but Sir Robert Borden could not understand M. Viviani speaking in French, and had to reply to him, a stranger, his guest, in English.

What did we witness later on, when Mr. Balfour, one of the best speakers in the British House of Commons, visited us, and when, as an object lesson to our members of Parliament, he spoke in French, and afterwards delivered an eloquent speech in English? The French members, officials, and newspaper men were not obliged to turn to their neighbours and ask, "What is he saying?" They understood his speech in English as well as they had understood M. Viviani speaking in French. Sir Wilfrid Laurier answered Mr. Balfour in English. Was it not a humiliation for the Prime Minister of this country and his colleagues that he was unable on the first occasion to understand M. Viviani speaking in French, and on the second occasion to reply to Mr. Balfour in French after he had addressed the two Houses of Parliament in that language?

To show how the young students in the province of Quebec recognize the necessity of learning English so as to be able to speak both the official languages of this country, I will take the liberty of reading an article from L'Universitaire, a French paper published at Quebec by the students of Laval University, with reference to these very visits of M. Viviani and Mr. Balfour. The article, written by a young student, is perfect and is absolutely true. It is entitled "Which is the Superior Race?" We hear very often in this country that there is a superior race. I do not say that there is a superior race. If I thought it I would not say it, but I do not think there is a superior race. There may be in a particular person superior abilities, superior qualities, or superior education. After discussing the visit of M. Viviani and Mr. Balfour, the article closes not with an answer, but with a question. It says:

Hon. Mr. POWER: Read it in French, so that we shall all understand it.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: The article is as follows:

[Translation.]

Which is the superior race?—M. Viviani and Mr. Balfour at Ottawa.

M. René Viviani, ex-Prime Minister of France, distinguished orator, statesman—whose opinions it is not for us to discuss here—accompanied by some members of the French delegation to America, has just gratified the Capital with an official visit the memory of which its citizens will long cherish. The reception was full of enthusiasm, the newspapers tell us, and the scene in Parliament a most impressive one. The audience, composed of members of Parliament and senators in joint session, together with an enormous crowd in the galleries, literally filled to overflowing the temporary, and comparatively small, legislative chamber of the Dominion.

Of course, there were speeches, and for once the parliamentary system was not the "triumph of incoherence" it has been, particularly during the recent budget debate. The war, necessarily, was about the only subject. M. Rainville, in the absence of Mr. Rhodes, occupied the Speaker's chair, and read in both languages an address of welcome to the distinguished visitors. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, out of respect for the language of the majority of his colleagues, spoke first in English. Then, with equal ability, he continued in French:

"France is not forgotten in this country, where live 2,000,000 of her descendants. We love and admire her more than ever since the day when she cast aside the internal differences tearing her asunder, in order to prevent the domination of Germany. We have preserved the heritage of the French language, which, as M. Viviani has very truly said, is beautiful and as clear as crystal."

Mr. Foster, acting Prime Minister, stated eloquently and with evident sincerity his admiration for France and the heroes of the Marne; but, owing to his inability to speak the language of the delegates, he was obliged to express himself in his own.

M. Viviani was thrilling. His every expression, marked by the most ardent patriotism, went straight to the hearts of his hearers. "We desired," he said, "to cross the American boundary and to come and pay our respects to Canada, a British country on which great Frenchmen of times gone by have left an indelible impression. Other reasons also impelled us to visit you, for since we have seen in our country the gallant soldiers of Canada, wearing so proudly on their helmets the maple leaf, we have better understood the deep significance which you attach to your motto: 'I remember.'" These last words of the orator were greeted with a tremendous outburst of applause.

We must, of course, congratulate our English-speaking fellow-citizens on the cordiality and sympathy which they have shown towards the French visitors; but, on the other hand, it must be admitted that nine-tenths of the audience had to keep a constant eye upon the rest of the gathering in order to time their applause, for only one-tenth of the senators and members of the House of Commons understood M. Viviani.

And from this distance we can see in the press gallery of the House of Commons the group of journalists from Ontario and the other provinces worrying the newspaper men from Quebec with the question, "What does he say?"

Next week the British mission will in its turn visit the Canadian Parliament. the reception will certainly be not less cordial. Speeches will again be delivered. The Speaker of the House, if it is M. Rainville (perhaps he will sing "Rule Britannia") and Sir Wilfrid Laurier will have the courtesy to address the illustrious visitors in their own language. Mr. Balfour will speak; and, amongst the entire assembly, French-speaking as well as English-speaking members, whether of the Upper or the Lower House, there is not a single member who will not understand the words of the delegate from Great Britain and enjoy his eloquence. Our journalists will not have to turn to the reporters of the Toronto Globe or of the Orange Sentinel to ask "What is he saying?" Why? Because senators, members of the House of Commons, stenographers, civil employees and public functionaries, of French origin, all understand the two official languages of this country, the languages of the two great nations which are to-day fighting side by side for the protection of their dearest liberties.

From all these facts we will draw no conclusion; but, under such solemn circumstances, we may be permitted to ask—and the question arises before the entire country—which is the superior race if there is one?

On the question with which the article concludes everyone may come to his own conclusion.

I recall what Sir George Foster said in Toronto. I recall what happened in the other House when M. Viviani delivered his address. I recall what happens in this House, where we French members are obliged to speak broken English in order to be understood by our English-speaking colleagues, but where we follow with pleasure the remarks made in English by any honourable gentleman who chooses to address the House.

In order to show you, honourable gentlemen, that our education in the province of Quebec is somewhat superior to education in Ontario, let me remind you that the English language is on the curricula of our colleges, and students are obliged to study it—not as much as French, perhaps, but they are obliged to pass examinations in English in order to qualify for a diploma. Though our colleges are said to be run by the priests—and we are glad they are run by the priests, especially our institutions of higher education—in those institutions the English language is respected and is taught; we are anxious to learn it, because we recognize that we must learn it if we would occupy any public position in this country, inhabited as it is by two great races. If we wish to have a united people, we must see to it that every citizen is in a position to be understood by his neighbour.

As I said at the beginning, I do not intend to press this resolution. I am willing to withdraw it now; but I was anxious to have this important declaration by Sir George Foster, as to the necessity of learning the French language, brought to the attention of this House, the other House, and the people throughout the country; and I hope that the appeal of M. Viviani will have such an effect on the Minister of Education of Ontario that he will cease to persecute the French Canadians of that province in connection with their schools. I beg leave to withdraw the resolution.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I have always regarded resolutions of this kind as of rather a deleterious character; and this resolution is, it seems to me, a little out of place, coming from the source from which it comes. What would be the object of carrying such a resolution? What would be the reason for making it compulsory that every representative of a British country should be able to speak both languages? Presumably that the majority of the conference which he attends consists of French scholars who may not understand other languages. The statement of the honourable member from Grandville with regard to what took place when the French delegation were here would lead one to that conclusion. If that be the case, let us apply the principle a little nearer home. The honourable gentleman is in a House where, if I am correctly informed, every French member understands English and speaks it fairly well, but where the majority do not understand and cannot speak the French language.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Why don't they?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Applying the same courtesy which he desires to the Chamber in which he sits, one would naturally expect that he would address the House in the language understood by the great majority of its members. As a principle of courtesy, that would be the course adopted by English-speaking people. Let me give an illustration. If two or three of us went into a room where there were a number of French people who did not understand the English language, we would refrain from carrying on a conversation, except to the most limited degree which courtesy would demand, in a language which they did not understand. By a parity of reasoning, if there were half a dozen persons present, every one of whom understood English, and only one or two of whom understood French, we would expect that these would talk in the language understood by all. That is regarded as proper courtesy to extend to strangers, or to those about us. The honourable gentleman does not apply to the House of which he is a member that principle of courtesy which he desires to apply to a gathering in some part of Europe. If he did, he would show that he was imbued with the ideas and principles which he endeavours to promulgate in the speech which he has just made. How many representatives of the Dominion of Canada, or of any of the provinces, can speak and understand the French language? If the principle of this resolution were carried out, it would deprive a British country of the right to send its most representative men to these conferences because by reason of the accidents of life they were not taught the two languages in their youth. The country would be deprived of their services, and would be limited in the choice of its representatives. I think it is known the world over that at these conferences there are many present who cannot understand the language in which the discussions are carried on. It may not be creditable to them, but it is not detrimental to the country which they represent. They are able to represent their country faithfully and intelligently, and we hear no complaints regarding them.

It seems to me that the practice of constantly raising such questions and forcing them to the front is not the best thing that can be done in the interest of what is called the minority of this country. It is not a good thing for the minority always to be forcing their views upon the people and trying to make them compulsory. I think it is not the highest type of wisdom or the highest type of propriety. It has always seemed to me that the less discussion we have on such questions in this Parliament the better it is for the country.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I quite agree with the honourable gentleman that the less we have to do with such discussions the better it will be for the country, but why does not the honourable gentleman inspire the Orange Sentinel and the Tory organs of Ontario not to promulgate the doctrine of "No more French prime ministers in Canada"? Is he aware that there is such a campaign being carried on by the Orange organization?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am aware of it, notwithstanding the affirmation to the contrary of the honourable member for Hastings (Sir Mackenzie Bowell). There is a campaign now going on in the Ontario press, Orange and Tory, against any more French prime ministers in Canada. Why does not the honourable gentleman go to his lodges and express these sentiments—which I endorse?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I rise to a point of order. I think that the resolution can be discussed without discussing the Orange order in Ontario or anywhere else.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What is the point of order?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: That you are not following the resolution.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am following the previous speaker.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I rise to a point of order. The honourable gentleman who moved the motion has withdrawn it.

An Hon. SENATOR: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If he has not withdrawn his motion, he has asked the House for permission to withdraw it, and that is the point that must be discussed, not the subject-matter of the motion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It cannot be withdrawn without the unanimous consent of the House.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of this House that the honourable gentlemen have leave to withdraw his motion?

Some Hon. SENATORS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I object.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: When a motion is made, everybody has a right to discuss it, and the fact that the honourable gentleman who moved it has asked leave to withdraw the motion does not prevent discussion. It can be withdrawn only with the permission of the House. I want to speak on the motion. I do not see why I should forbear because the Speaker—

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The request to withdraw has been made by the honourable gentleman who moved the resolution, and it is for the House to decide whether he may withdraw it or not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Before the honourable the Speaker put the question the debate had commenced.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Unfortunately for Canada, a majority of the members of both Houses of Parliament are not up to the standard of the constitution; they have got only half way; they know only one of the two official languages of this Dominion of Canada. That is very unfortunate, for it is a bad example to the rest of the people of the Dominion. Children in the back concessions will say, "Oh, what is the use of learning French? Our member doesn't speak French; our senator doesn't understand a word of French." It is a bad example particularly for the youth of the entire Dominion, that representatives of the people do not know the two languages guaranteed by the constitution. That is one lesson for honourable gentlemen. They may regret that in the days of their youth they did not learn French; but they should have learned it when they came into public life and had to serve, not only the interests of their own little section of county or district, but the interests of the entire Dominion. It is the duty of the man who wants public recognition or public confidence to learn at least enough French to be able, if not to write it, at least to understand the arguments and demands put forth by the minority. The minority has been trampled upon by the honourable gentleman who preceded me (Hon. Mr. Sproule). "What right," asks the honourable gentleman, "has the minority to be always dogging the majority?" Well, what does a minority exist for but to dog a majority, to get justice at the hands of a majority, sometimes unintelligent, sometimes dependent on external influences, sometimes, as was said in the House of Commons, a brutal majority. Honourable gentlemen, I prefer the autocracy of a Kaiser or a Czar to the domination of a brutal majority. When you are subject to autocracy you know you are dealing with only one man; but when you are under a brutal majority you are dealing with a vast number.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I rise to a question of order. I do not think my honourable friend has a right to use the term "brutal majority" with respect to the majority in the House of Commons.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I believe that the word "brutal majority" is not parliamentary, and I would strongly advise the honourable gentleman to withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, I am very sorry that people do not understand what I say. I did not say a brutal majority in this House. I would not dream of saying anything of that kind. Some people have ears and do not hear; some people have brains and do not understand; but I am not responsible for their failure to hear or understand. What I stated was that there are majorities, not in this House, but outside, in the country, and not only in Canada, but also in the United States and in England, which are brutal. The power of a majority, especially a popular majority, which goes crazy sometimes and gets hysterical on some questions, is more despotic than the power of Kaiser or Czar, and the minority must knuckle down because the majority has spoken. Then begins the right of the minority to dog the majority, to dog it until it withdraws or retracts, until it remodels the legislation under which the minority is suffering. That is my point, and where the honourable gentleman from Halifax saw ground for his point of order I do not know. But I am right, and nobody can dispute my statement.

I hold, with the honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette), that this is an opportune time to discuss this question. Sir George Foster, after visiting nearly every commercial centre in the universe, went as the representative of Canada to Paris, where the leading financial, commercial, and trade people of the world were assembled in conference. All the discussions were in the French language. Sir George Foster had to confess to his constituents in Toronto that he was unable to follow the proceedings and the debates of that congress. He lamented the fact that in his youth he had not had an opportunity to learn French, but stated that if God gave him another youth it would be his first duty to learn that language. That is the opinion of probably the coming Prime Minister, a man who perhaps should have been Prime Minister. That is the word of the leader of the Conservative party—not leader of the party as a voting power, but leader of Conservative thought—the most eloquent and brilliant member on the Government side in the House of Commons. That is his declaration, formal, plain, and readable, delivered through the medium of the Canadian Club, to the entire population of this Dominion of Canada.

I say that the honourable gentleman from Grandville has rendered a service to the country in bringing up this question, because the coming international conference will not be a trade conference in regard to a small treaty respecting wine, or silk, or spools, or feathers, or matters of that kind. No; the subject of discussion will be the cause of humanity, of human liberty, and the salvation of democracy in this world. The coming conference will deal with questions of a magnitude greater than the world has ever seen; and whichever side gains the advantage, whether the entente powers or the Central Empires, the debates of that conference will be in the French language only. Even Germany will have to talk French in stating her terms of peace. The French language is the diplomatic language, not only of France and England, not only of Russia and Italy, but of the civilized world. What a nice showing Canada would make at that conference if represented by men who were not able to understand what was going on. They would be there simply as deaf and dumb people, unable to participate in the discussions and unable to insist on their rights in the language of the conference.

The subject brought before the House is most timely. If there are to be no more French prime ministers in Canada, the Government will have to be on their guard and have men qualified. It will probably be two or three years before this conference takes place, and these men can in the meantime be sent to a primary school—a bilingual school—and graduate to the university; and inside of three years the Government will be able to secure men who can speak for the nation as a whole, and not only for a part.

These considerations, I think, appeal to the good sense and the common heart of the Canadian people. The common heart of the Canadian people is not bound up in any one section, any one organization, or any one society. The day has passed when a political party or any other organization can wrap itself in the British flag and cry, "Mercy, mercy! Forgive us all our past sins; we are under the British flag; we are wraped up in its folds." That day has gone. Have not we on this side of the House the right to stand under the shelter of the British flag and say to Canada and the Empire, "The Tories and the Orangemen are not the only loyal sons you have to defend the cause of the Empire and the Allies?" Liberal blood has been shed in the trenches, and any party that denies us our rights ought to be hounded to death. This motion will not appeal to the prejudice that is rooted in certain districts and certain lodges, for certain purposes, especially party purposes; but it will appeal to the common heart, the common sense, and the judgment of the people of Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Honourable gentlemen, I have no doubt that in introducing this resolution the honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) had the very best intentions; but I think he might have remembered that the thermometer at the present time stands somewhere about 90 degrees in the shade; and such a temperature does not promote calm discussion. I should not say anything but for the fact that the honourable gentleman from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule) found particular fault with the honourable gentleman from Grandville because he read an extract from a newspaper—L'Universitaire, I think it is called—in French. I feel that I was the innocent cause of that offence on the part of the honourable gentleman. I suggested that he read it in French so that we should all understand him.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That was sarcasm.

Hon Mr. POWER: I do not know that there is anything objectionable about the general sentiment contained in the resolution. I think that probably the majority of the ablest and most experienced public men in Canada are not able to speak and write both languages, and the honourable gentleman from Grandville surely would not wish to disqualify gentlemen who now occupy the leading positions in the country from attending the meetings referred to in the resolution.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They are no good when they get there. They admit it. Sir George Foster admits it.

Hon. Mr. POWER: In some way they contrive to have their views put before those gatherings, and their views carry a certain amount of weight. On the other hand, I think it is to be regretted that in this country, where both languages are official, and where the population is nearly evenly divided between the people who speak one language and those who speak the other, so few of the English-speaking people make it a point to become familiar with the French language. The honourable gentleman from Grandville very properly called attention to the fact that in England all public men, and young ladies, are able to speak French.

I think, however, this is an inopportune time for such a question to be raised. Instead of accentuating the differences which exist between certain sections of the population, we should be doing all we can in the other direction.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Let the other side start first.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I have no doubt that the intentions of the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) are particularly good, but in some ways they do not appear to be appreciated by his colleagues as they should be. On the whole, I think it is a pity that this resolution was introduced.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: With the temperature that we are now enjoying, it is not my intention to make it warmer. I will not indulge in a discussion of the bilingual question, but I want to answer some of the remarks made by my honourable friend from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule). I think that he should not deny us of the minority the right to complain if we are suffering—he is a doctor and a philosopher. We are suffering at the hands of—I will not say a brutal majority, but an ungenerous majority. They may have the right, they may have might, but they have not generosity. By forcing us to learn the English language, our friends in Ontario are doing us a good turn, and all that I ask of them is that they do not try to choke the French syllables in the throats of our young children. Give them fair play. Give them what you enjoy yourselves. It is well known in the Dominion that we have no school question in Quebec—why? Because we give the English minority all that the English minority wants. We give it generously. There is no school question in the maritime provinces. There was at one time; but generally speaking — with some very notable exceptions—the people in the maritime provinces have broader minds than the people of the West, and in the maritime provinces the majority and the minority live together in friendship. Why should we not have the same relations with the people of Ontario?

More than once we have had discussions in this House, as well as in the other House, on this very question. I think there is a very simple way of settling it. If we had a conference between the leaders of the two parties—I am speaking of the two parties in the bilingual sense—I think we would be able to settle the question immediately. We do not ask what we will not ourselves give. We ask what we think is a right—at all events a natural right, which any one who makes a thorough study of the law will admit is more than a political right. What is going on in Ontario could be very easily met. In that province there is a Minister of Education who made Regulation No. 17. What is Regulation No. 17? Nobody knows yet, not even the minister, because whenever he is asked he says, "It is in favour of the French language." Regulation No. 17 says in a few words that it shall apply only to bilingual schools. What is a bilingual school? According to that regulation, a bilingual school is a school declared to be so by the Minister of Education. It is not determined according to the population of the school district. I will give an example. In Windsor there are three French schools. In one 45 per cent of the pupils are French; in another 65 per cent are French; and in the third 85 per cent are French. Naturally one would think that the school where 85 per cent of the pupils were French would be a bilingual school. Not at all. Not a word of French is spoken in that school, nor in the next one, because the minister does not choose to declare them bilingual schools. It is the will of the minister that makes a school bilingual, and it has to be declared so every year. That is what we are contending against. We say that it should be declared by law that when 40 or 50 per cent of the population of a certain section is French. the school in that section should be a bilingual school. That is refused to us, and the consequence is that in schools where 85 per cent of the pupils are French the French language is not taught at all, or, if it is taught, the teachers are sent to jail and subjected to penalties. That condition cannot last; it causes unrest all over the country.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: For what crime are they sent to jail?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Because they are teaching French. Take, for instance, the school at Green Valley, a few miles from here. This was not a bilingual school. It was a school under Regulation No. 12 or Regulation No. 15, in which it is said that where a school is not bilingual, French or German will be taught if that nationality is in the majority in the surrounding country. If one tries to open a French school under that regulation he is sued immediately, or is sent to jail, because, although the pupils attending the school may all be French, the school is not situated in a French district. It is not the Minister of Education, it is not the people, but it is the courts that interpret the laws, and when the courts say that we have no right to speak French, or to teach catechism in French in those schools, we must bow our heads and pay the fine, or else see the teachers sent to jail because they taught French.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is the act of a brutal majority.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Then, what did we see? A movement called the "bonne entente" was started in Ontario. A body of men went to Quebec, where they were cordially received by the population. They came here, and went back to Toronto. M. Garneau, the president, gave one thousand dollars to the University of Toronto. En passant, I should have preferred him to have given the thousand dollars for our own pupils; but, at all events, he performed what he thought a generous act, which was well appreciated by the English-speaking population. While this was being done the provincial legislature at Toronto, to reward M. Garneau for his generosity, passed an Act to revive a law that had been declared unconstitutional by the Privy Council in England, and that Act is now on the statute book. The Minister of Education for Ontario has been given the power to establish a new School Commission for Ottawa if the Ottawa people do not submit to the dictates of Regulation 17. Another vicious measure was enacted while the reception to the entente cordiale was in progress, and it was the answer of the people of Toronto to all that was being done to reach an understanding. The federal Government has been requested to disallow that Act. I made an inquiry of the Government the other day to learn who are the parties asking for the disallowance. I hope that the clause of our constitution which permits the federal Government to disallow provincial Acts will not be a dead letter. We want the constitution respected, and if the Privy Council in England declares a law to be unconstitutional, I do not see why that law should not be disallowed, if re-enacted by the same persons, when it is the cause of so much mischief in this country. We must live together. We ought to be friends. It is very easy to be friends if we so desire; but I do not agree with the statement of my honourable friend from Grey that we have nothing to complain of. An attempt is being made to kill the French race. But I will tell you this: it is impossible to kill a people who are determined to live. They may bow to you to-day, they may bend under intolerance for a time, but you will never kill such a people. Where is Poland to-day?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Where is Ireland?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Where is Ireland to-day? I leave my honourable friend to answer that question. But all peoples who have been coerced, what are they doing?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Fighting yet.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: They are all living to-day, and they will live on.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You are right.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I would not complain of the treatment that is meted out to us. I would tender my best compliments to the hierarchy of Ontario, who commenced this movement against us, because they are keeping us alive; they are preventing us from dying; and I hope they will be good enough to continue, and stir us up a little more, until some day the reasonable people of the Dominion interfere and give us what we ask, and what we are entitled to.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I desire to say only one word in reply especially to the honourable gentleman from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule). I do not see that any exception should be taken to the resolution, which states simply that no person shall be appointed delegate, agent or representative of this country, at any economic or other international conference, unless he can speak and write both the official languages of Canada. In that motion I do not refer more to French than to English. As there are two official languages in this country, it is not only fair but necessary that a delegate whom we send to a foreign country should understand both languages. I do not see why any fuss should be made about that proposal, or why the French language should be brought into the question. All that is proposed is that any one who does not understand both languages shall be deprived of the chance of being sent abroad as a delegate of Canada. If that rule would not apply to French as much as to English-speaking persons, it would be because the French are intelligent enough to learn to speak and write the English language.

My honourable friend has said that such a rule would deprive the country of the services of very able men. That may be true; but whose fault is it if an able man cannot qualify in both the official languages of this country? Are not the diplomats and even the agents of all other countries required to understand the language of the country to which they are sent? That is plain common sense.

If my honourable friend from Grey had followed his own reasoning, he would have endorsed all that Sir George Foster said, because, if I am correctly informed, his first action, upon being appointed Speaker of the other House, was to obtain a French teacher and try to learn French; and he has mentioned time and again to his neighbours how sorry he was not to have learned it in his youth. Honourable gentlemen, are we not acting in the best interests of the young people of this country in calling upon them to learn French and thus preventing them from having to express later such regrets as those expressed by Sir George Foster and the honourable gentleman from Grey, at their inability to speak both languages? Is it not a patriotic duty to tell the young people that they ought to qualify themselves for their future obligations and be in a position, when called upon, to accept appointments as agents or delegates or representatives of this country, where, I repeat, the two official languages are on the same footing.

As I said before, I do not want to press the motion, because I have enough respect for the intelligence of this honourable House, or at least the majority of its members, to recognize that they will understand my motive, which is the very best. If I were not able to speak English in this House, I should say, as did Sir George Foster, how much I regretted being obliged to listen to speeches of which I did not understand a word.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: I believe Sir George Foster understands French very well, and that the Prime Minister speaks it fairly well.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: That shows the necessity of knowing the French language, and I congratulate them both; but when the opportunity presented itself of welcoming to Canada the delegate of the French republic, they had not a sufficient knowledge of French to enable them to speak to him in that language, and Sir George Foster says that when he was representing Canada at Paris he could not speak French. But if twenty years ago some members of this House, or of the other House, had called the attention of the public to the necessity of learning French, Sir Robert Borden and Sir George Foster would now perhaps thank them for having done what I am doing now.

I have submitted this resolution with the best of motives, the patriotic motive, that of trying to unite both races in this country, and I regret that the honourable gentleman from Grey, for whom I have the greatest respect in spite of his views, has seen in my efforts an attempt to raise the race and religious cry. Far from it. I desire only to call the attention of the young men of this country to the desirability of preparing themselves for the future by acquiring a knowledge of both our official languages in order that they may be prepared to accept the best situations that the nation can offer. The purpose I had in view is now attained, and I ask the consent of this honourable House to withdraw the resolution.

The resolution was withdrawn.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill 67, an Act to amend the Customs Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

FIRST READING.

A message was received from the House of Commons with Bill 75, an Act respecting Military Service.

The Bill was read the first time.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved that the Bill be placed on the Order paper for the second reading on Tuesday next.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would ask my honourable friend if he has a copy of the Army Act and Regulations, in case it may be needed. I think those papers were brought down in the other House for the purpose of the discusion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I shall be glad to lay on the table any papers that were brought down in the other House.

The motion was agreed to.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 92, an Act respecting a certain Convention between His Majesty and the United States of America for the protection of Migratory Birds in Canada and the United States.

He said: According to the title of the Bill, its purpose is the protection of migratory birds in Canada and the United States. That is the subject-matter of a convention between the Governments of the United States and Canada. The subject-matter was, I understand, submitted by the United States authorities to the different state governments and likewise by this Government to the different provincial governments. Consequently there is an explicit arrangement among the different states of the Union and the different provinces of Canada, who exercise authority in matters of game protection, that this convention should be ratified by the Governments of the United States and Canada.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: What is it?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It relates purely to migratory birds. Owing to the lack of proper protection of those birds of late years they are disappearing, and it is obviously very desirable that they should be protected as much as possible and that the Governments of both countries should adopt such regulations as will ensure their protection.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Does the Bill propose to take any powers from the provinces?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, it does not in any way infringe upon the authority of the provinces. The provinces of Canada, the states of the Union, and the two federal Governments are co-operating in order that the provisions of this Bill may be carried out.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to ask the leader of the Government if there has been any objection on the part of any of the provinces of Canada to this convention?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I understand not.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It does not conflict in any way with their regulations?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; all the provinces approve of the convention.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I just wish to say that I most cordially endorse this measure.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SUPREME COURT ACT AND EXCHEQUER COURT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 98, an Act to amend the Supreme Court Act and the Exchequer Court Act.

He said: There are two objects in the Bill which we have before us. One is to make provision for the payment to the Crown of costs in any action in the Supreme Court or the Exchequer Court in which the Crown is successful and in which it was represented by one of its own officers. Up to the present time, apparently, no provision has been made for the collection of costs in such a case as that which I have mentioned. In many such cases, as is very well known, the law officers of the Crown appear before the court, and there is no good reason why the costs should not be collected by the Crown—not by the officers in question. The Crown will profit by the measure proposed; that is to say, if those officers are salaried officers and appear before the court and become entitled to counsel fees or costs by reason of the Crown succeeding in the proceedings before the court, the Crown will receive the costs which will thereby become payable.

The other amendment is intended to overcome a difficulty which has arisen from a judgment of the Supreme Court whereby it is held that an action for damages against the Crown would not successfully lie in any case where a servant or officer of the Crown, acting within the scope of his duties or employment, was charged with negligence, unless the party who suffered the damage was actually upon the public work. There are cases, as honourable gentlemen can very well conceive, wherein negligence may have resulted in damages to a person who was not upon the public work at the time the damage was caused, but may have been ten feet away, or more distant; and yet he cannot, according to the decision of the authorities, succeed on a question of negligence against the Crown. The Bill therefore proposes to protect the public to this extent, that the Crown will be liable if it is shown that there was negligence on the part of its officer while he was acting within the scope of his duties or employment upon any public work, though the victim was not actually upon the public work at the time.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to have a clear understanding as to the question of costs. I presume that these costs would be taxable in the same way as any other costs.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understood my honourable friend to say that the Crown had not received any costs when it won an action.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I did not make myself clear. What I say is that there is no provision by which the Crown can collect costs in a case in which it is successful if one of its own officers appears as counsel. If the Crown retains outside counsel, then of course the costs are collectable. We now desire to make provision that the Crown may profit by the collection of costs where one of its own salaried officers appears before the court and is successful.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think it is a very proper change.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: By leave of the House, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. POWER: If the House adjourns until Tuesday the Military Service Bill, which was brought down to-day, cannot be read a second time until Wednesday.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If it cannot be read a second time on Tuesday, we must sit to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not wish to cause any inconvenience, and do not press the objection.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Some other honourable gentleman might raise an objection. I desire it to be understood that the second reading of the Bill will be proceeded with on Tuesday afternoon.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The proper course would have been to suspend the rules, but I do not think it is necessary to insist on that at the present time.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: By leave of the House, the Bill may be ordered for a second reading on Tuesday next.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned until Tuesday next at three o'clock in the afternoon.

THE SENATE.

Tuesday, July 31, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED.

The following newly-appointed Senators were severally introduced and took their seats :

Hon. Richard Blain, of Brampton, Ontario, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

Hon. John Henry Fisher, of Paris, Ontario, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

Hon. Lendrum McMeans, of Winnipeg, Manitoba, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. W. H. Sharpe.

Hon. David Ovide L'Espérance, of Quebec, Quebec, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. C. P. Beaubien.

Hon. George Green Foster, of Montreal, Quebec, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. R. H. Pope.

Hon. Richard Smeaton White, of Montreal, Quebec, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. J. S. McLennan.

THE SMITH-DRAYTON-ACWORTH REPORT.

STATEMENT OF COST.

Mr. CASGRAIN inquired of the Government:

1. What is the total cost of the Smith-Drayton and Acworth Report to date?

2. How much did each of the Commissioners receive?

3. How much has been paid to each engineer whose name is mentioned in the said report, in salary and in expenses, separately?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Cost of Smith-Drayton-Acworth report to date, $70,088.41.

2. Wm. Acworth: services, $15,330.00; expenses, $1,127.99; total, $16,457.99.

A. H. Smith: services, not paid yet; expenses, $138.00.

H. L. Drayton: a cheque was sent to Sir Henry Drayton for $15,000, but was returned by Sir Henry with the statement that in view of the present times and conditions he would make no charge for his services.

DISMISSAL OF G. V. DAMBRUGGE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying His Excellency to have laid on the table of the Senate all documents relating to the dismissal of G. V. Dambrugge, employed at the Quarantine, Grosse Isle.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, before entering upon a heavy debate in this hot weather, it is perhaps better to dispose of what may appear to be a small matter, but which involves an important principle. Mr. Dambrugge is a Belgian, who had been at the war and was wounded. Being a good gardener, he came with his wife to Canada to find a position in which to make a living, and in June, 1915, he was engaged by the Department of Agriculture, as a gardener at the Quarantine Station at Grosse Isle. According to a letter which I will produce, he was dismissed from that position without any reason being given. As I happened to know him, he wrote to me to find out why he had been dismissed, having, he said, written to Ottawa several times and having received no reply. Upon receipt of his letter I wrote to Mr. Montizambert, the Director General of Public Health, who I understand has the Quarantine Station under his charge. He referred me to the minister, to whom, on the 27th of June, I wrote asking the reason for this man's dismissal. On the 29th of June I received the following letter from the minister:

I am in receipt of your note of June 27th in reference to G. V. Dambrugge, the gardener at Grosse Isle, whom I recently dismissed from the Service.

In a letter from Dambrugge he referred me to Mr. Goor, the Belgian Consul General, and for your personal information I may say that Mr. Goor confidentially informs me that the information he has on record about this man is entirely unfavourable. Other information from one of my own officers in whom I have confidence confirmed this, and I did not feel justified in keeping Dambrugge in the Service.

I feel sure that you would concur in this decision, but, of course, if you wish to ask a question in the Senate, I am not raising objections.

I sent this letter to Mr. Dambrugge who said that, far from having a bad record with the Belgian Consul, he had been recommended by that gentleman. Not knowing exactly how the matter stood, I thought that the minister, in mentioning one of his officers, referred to the head of the Quarantine Station. So I wrote to Mr. Martineau and asked the reason for the dismissal of the man. The answer to my letter is in French, and is as follows:

[Translation.]

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 5th instant, in which you inform me that a report was made against Mr. George V. Dambrugge, employed at this station, which report has resulted in his dismissal, and that you wish to know who has made this report and request a copy thereof.

In reply I may say that I regret not to be able to inform you on this subject. You seem to be under the impression that it was I who made this report, and you accuse me of not having informed Mr. Dambrugge of it. You may be assured that I have had nothing to do, directly or indirectly, with this report, nor with the person who made it. I will even add that for my part I have no complaint of any kind to make against Mr. Dambrugge and that he has always done his duty. In fact, he is one of the best employees we have had at this station. If you desire to learn the details in regard to this affair, I would advise you to address the minister direct.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. E. Martineau, M.D.,

Medical Superintendent.

Now, the question arises, how is it that the head of an important service like the quarantine station at Grosse Isle should not know the reason why a good officer has been dismissed? If there are some informers there who have made a report behind the officer's back against an employee, we ought to know it; and that is why I have brought this matter up. The letter of the minister stated that one of his own officers had made a report against Dambrugge. That officer must have been employed at Grosse Isle; if not, he is a traitor and a spy behind the head of the department. Who is that officer? I asked for the report and they refused to produce it. Here is a good man who has been fighting in the war, who is a wounded soldier, who comes to this country because he thought he could find here something to do and not be a charge upon his own country; who is employed, but is one day dismissed; and the man under whose directions he has been working says he never made a report against him, and is sorry he has been dismissed, because he was one of his best officers. It is necessary to have these facts before the Senate and to know where we stand. Are wounded soldiers to be treated in that way? Are Government employees to be dismissed in that way? If so, we ought to know the reason. That is why I make this motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: It seems to me the leader of the House ought to be able to give me an answer. He represents the Government here. The notice has been on the Order Paper for two or three days, and must have come to his notice; and he ought to be able to give the name of the officer who made the recommendation, and the reason why this man was dismissed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It appears to me my honourable friend has moved for the papers so that he may get the information. Does he want me to give him the information, or is he satisfied to wait till the papers come?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am satisfied.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If it was the intention of my honourable friend that I should give the information, he should have simply made an inquiry.

THE CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

INQUIRY.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I would like to ask the honourable leader of the Government if he will answer questions I put some four weeks ago. At that time he informed me that he could not answer them, and at his request I turned them into a motion for a return. Now, whether a senator on this side of the House puts an inquiry or makes a motion, he gets mighty little satisfaction. The information that I wanted has a direct bearing on the most important Bill that has ever come before this Parliament since the birth of Confederation. I do not blame the leader of the Government for he represents sixteen ministers here, and I wonder how he gets through the business; but I want to know:

1. How many officers and men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force have been classed as unfit for military service?

That information is on the records of the Militia Department, and could be given off-hand and sent to the honourable leader of the Government here on a typewritten sheet; but the leader of the Government said to me, "You cannot get it unless you make a motion for a return." Then I asked:

2. Have the military authorities given consideration to the possibility of utilizing the services of these men in a secondary capacity?

Well, the Government ought to know its own mind on the spot. You have ten, twenty, thirty, forty, fifty thousand people returned, here and there, not doing a blessed thing except walking the streets, sporting canes, smoking cigarettes, and going abroad breaking up anti-conscription meetings; but I cannot get any information. My third question was:

3. Do those who have been classed as unfit continue to draw military pay?

That question ought to be answered on the spot by the Government. Where is the harm in the Government telling the country that men who have been classed as unfit, that remain at home—slackers, as they call them—are not on the pay-roll of the Dominion of Canada? The Government should give that information off-hand, but no; I have had to change my inquiry into a motion for a return, and it is not yet down, and never will be. Then I asked:

4. How many have deserted from the various units between 1st October, 1914, and 1st June, 1917?

Any Minister of Militia, unless he were a tinpot minister, would be able to answer that off the bat. I can tell you how many deserted from the camp at Renfrew, but I do not know all the units and all the camps. What I want is official information; but the Government says, "We cannot answer you; you must make a motion for a return." The Government is in a wrong position and is plainly trifling. What does the Government mean? I do not blame the leader of the Government here; God knows he has enough to do to answer all the questions for the other departments; but when a Cabinet council is held and information is asked he should see that it is given on the spot. The next question I asked was:

5. How many have been discharged from the various units since 1st October, 1914?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

That information is on the records in the Militia Department. All the minister's clerk has to do is to dictate the figures to the typewriter and hand them to the leader of the Government here, and we would have the information within twenty-four hours; but the Government is playing fast and loose with the rights of the people through their representatives in Parliament. I want the Government to understand that when I put these questions and similar ones, it is not for my own convenience or comfort, but for the people for whom I am obliged to talk, and who want to know. All that information is absolutely necessary in discussing the compulsory Military Service Bill, and we have not got it. What does the Government take us for? Well, people will take the Government for what it is worth, and that is very little.

DIVORCE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Bill T2, an Act for the relief of Albert Edwin Gordon.—Hon. Mr. Taylor.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 67, an Act to amend the Customs Act.

He said: The object of this Bill is to place upon the statutes a declaration of what the Government considers to be the interpretation of the Customs Act touching the importation of goods into the Dominion of Canada by the Crown whether in the name of a province or in the name of the Dominion. It seems the contention has been raised that the provinces are entitled to import into Canada dutiable goods entirely irrespective of the duties imposed by the Customs Act. The question is very largely an academic one, but possibly may exceed that point and prove rather troublesome to the revenues of the country, if the contention raised by some of the provinces should be tenable that they have a right to import goods into Canada entirely irrespective of the Customs Act because they represent the Crown.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Which province says that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGEHED: I am not designating any particular province. I know that the province of my honourable friend would not place such a construction as that on any Act of Parliament. It is very undesirable that there should be any uncertainty concerning the matter; therefore the object of the Bill is to place an interpretation upon the Customs Act in this respect. If the Parliament of Canada did not do so, recourse might of course be had to the courts to determine what is really the meaning of the Act.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I had occasion to ask for a return of all the correspondence in connection with this Bill, which I think has a greater object than simply to put an interpretation on the Act. I think the object is to put the different provinces out of court. From this correspondence it appears that four different provinces have taken the matter up, and, have expressed an opinion different from that of the Customs Department. While this Act has been in force for a number of years, it has probably not had same importance or effect as at the present time, because we know that some of the provinces are now undertaking various public utilities, and are importing goods for the purpose of carrying on these works. The province of Manitoba took this matter up with the Government, and they have been waiting a great quantity of materials that are not manufactured in Canada and could not be purchased here, that are needed to carry on their work. They apparently made one test case with reference to a gas-producer plant purchased in England and erected in the town of Souris for experimental purposes. In taking the matter up with the Government, they claimed that they should not be obliged to pay duty on the goods, because they had been imported by the Crown. The Customs Department, after some months, during which several letters were exchanged, claimed that the Dominion Government had the right to collect the money. Finally, in order to get the goods out of customs, the Manitoba Government had to pay the duty; but during the course of this correspondence the Manitoba Government apparently convinced the Customs Department that it had no right to collect it. So well were they convinced that an Order in Council was passed remitting to the province of Manitoba the duty on the gas-producer plant. I find by this correspondence that there was also a case in which the Quebec Government protested against paying the duty on a shipment of revolvers.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does my honourable friend say that an Order in Council was passed remitting the duties?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Yes; on the Manitoba gas-producer plant.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am entirely unaware of it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: He will read the Order in Council.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: On what grounds was the remission made?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I suppose because the Manitoba Government was demanding that the duties should be paid back, and the Dominion Government came to the conclusion that they would have to pay them back.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Minister of Customs made a statement directly to the contrary in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Here is the Order in Council:

The Board recommend that authority be granted for the remission and refund of Customs duties amounting to $404.80 paid by The Public Utilities Commission, Manitoba Government, on Gas Producer Machinery, at the outport of Souris, Manitoba, per entry 195/3263.

From the papers submitted to the Board it appears that this plant is of a class or kind not made in Canada and has been imported for experimental purposes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Therefore it was not dutiable.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Why not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Because the report so states.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: But it would be the same with the other articles.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, no.

Hon. Mr WATSON: Then, another matter. The Manitoba Government have undertaken to assist agriculture in that province by purchasing cows and distributing them to the farmers. It has been necessary for them to buy those cattle in the United States, and they object to paying duty on them.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Certain stock for breeding purposes comes in free.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The Manitoba Government was obliged to pay the duty.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then they were dutiable.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No, no.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I say this is a matter which this House should not allow to pass. It appears to me that the provinces should not be put out of court by an Act of Parliament. In this correspondence the Minister of Customs tells the Attorney General of Manitoba that this matter will be brought to the attention of the Prime Minister when he returns from England; but the Manitoba authorities have had no answer from the Minister of Customs since the Prime Minister has returned. The first intimation they receive regarding this matter is the suggestion that the Customs Act should be changed in such a way as to put them out of court. I say this is not fair, and I do not think it should be done. The provinces are greatly interested in this matter now, because various provinces are undertaking public utilities which were not thought of a few years ago, and consequently are called upon to pay out a very large amount of money. I do not think that any province which desires to develop a particular industry or to provide any facility for the convenience of its people should be taxed for doing so. The province of Manitoba is very largely interested; they have paid under protest over one million dollars in customs duties on telephone equipment in the last six or seven years. For the reasons I have given, I do not think this Bill should pass.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The objection I have to this Act is based on section 125 of the British North America Act, which says:

> No lands or properties belonging to Canada or any province shall be liable for taxation.

I take the stand that a customs duty is a tax, and that by this Act the Dominion Government is proposing to tax the property of the province in a way which, under that clause of the British North America Act, was, I think, never intended. The question whether the Dominion has the right to tax the property of the provinces is one which, I think, has never before been brought up, and the proper way to deal with it would be to have it submitted to the courts and threshed out before them or, if necessary, to refer it to the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Manitoba asked for that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understand that the province of Manitoba asked that the question should be referred to the courts or to the Privy Council, but for some reason the present Government has not seen fit to accede to this request.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN.

This Bill is, further, an attempt to pass retroactive legislation. If honourable gentlemen will look at the first clause of the Bill, they will see that it proposes to give the Government power to deal with the matter as if it had been in effect ever since Confederation. That, in itself, seems to be an admission on the part of the Government that they have not the power to tax the provinces in this way; and I think it would be very objectionable for this House to pass such retroactive legislation. The Bill also will empower the Dominion to tax the province on the business that they are doing. At the present time the provinces are inclined to undertake the development of public utilities to an extent that was not contemplated in the past, and the whole question of the development of public utilities by the provinces is one that will come more and more to the front and will very seriously affect their interests. By this legislation the Government is apparently proposing to deal with the matter by an Act of Parliament, instead of submitting the case to the courts and having it threshed out there. I think we should make a very great mistake if we allowed this Bill to pass.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Before the question is put, I wish simply to make a protest. The question whether the property of a province, or property imported for a province, is liable to duty is an important question; and if it has not been decided—and apparently it has not been decided—should be referred to the courts, and I should have no objection to the question being settled in that way. But, instead of referring the matter to the courts, the Government here introduce a Bill which not merely states that hereafter property imported by a province shall be liable to duty, but is intended to be retroactive, stating that property which has heretofore been imported should be liable for duty. That is clearly most objectionable legislation. Nowadays we are to a certain extent adopting the views of our neighbours to the south of us, and I think this is a case in which we should do well to follow their example. In the United States Constitution there is a provision that no such law as this shall be passed. An ex post facto law cannot be passed in the United States, and I think it is very much to be regretted that this Government should have undertaken to do what they have done. It is most unfair and unjust, and is, in my humble opinion, contrary to sound parliamentary law.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I should like to ask the honourable leader of the Government a question with reference to the suggestion made by the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat. Under the provisions of this Bill, could a customs tax be imposed upon all direct importations by the various governments from 1867? Is this Bill retroactive to that extent? It would seem to me that the House ought to be in possession of the facts, and should know how far-reaching this legislation may be in respect to the right of the provinces.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I be permitted to make an explanation, which really should be made, touching this legislation? My honourable friend has made to the House, perhaps unwittingly, a misleading statement. It is only of late that this question has arisen. Since Confederation, until recently, the provinces of Canada have recognized the liability of their being subject to duty just the same as individuals. Hence, on all goods or property of a dutiable character imported by the different provinces of Canada down to a recent period they have paid duty. But recently some of the provinces have taken the ground that as representing the Crown they are not responsible for the payment of duty or obliged to pay it, because the Crown has not been specifically mentioned in the Act. I am informed by the Minister of Customs that the Department of Customs has consistently insisted upon that interpretation being placed upon the Act which has been placed upon it since Confederation, namely, that the provinces are obliged to pay duty. There has recently been a tendency on the part of many of the provinces to embark upon enterprises which previously were carried on largely by individuals. My honourable friend from Portage la Prairie (Honourable Mr. Watson) has referred to the provinces engaging in public utilities.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: May I ask the honourable gentleman what would be the case if the Dominion Government should do the same thing—should engage in public utilities?

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say that up to the present time goods imported by the Dominion Government are, I understand, dutiable. The only goods that are not dutiable are those imported into Canada by the Imperial authorities for Imperial purposes.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Or by Allison.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, I understand that he was an agent of the Imperial Government.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman states that all goods imported by the Government of Canada are dutiable; but that is mainly a question of book-keeping between the Customs Department and the Department of Finance.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I complete my explanation? Since this matter has become a question of controversy between the Federal Government and the provincial governments, it has been referred to the Department of Justice, and the Department of Justice has very properly taken the ground that if we could not impose duties upon the provinces as representing the Crown, no legislation, of course, would give to us that authority; hence the question would be one for the courts to decide. But it would be desirable that legislation should be placed upon the statute book which would be effective from Confederation, so that the provinces which have paid duty from that time down to the present should not for that reason have an overwhelmingly large account against the Dominion Government. The question would then be a matter for adjustment by the courts; but for the purpose of having it decided by the courts it is very desirable that the Dominion Government should now by statute assert the right to collect duties from the Crown. If that right is vested in the Dominion Government, it is justified in asserting it. If the legislation proposed by this Bill is placed upon the statute book, no injustice will be done to the provinces, because the provinces will still have a right to invoke the courts to decide whether or not this Parliament has the power to impose duties upon the Crown as represented by the provinces.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Would not the honourable gentleman think that by this Bill the real situation of the litigants would be changed? Are you not by passing this Bill increasing the strength of your case, in the event of litigation, by asking Parliament to buttress your proposition by legislation?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My answer to that question is that if we have not the power to legislate, the court will so hold, and the legislation will therefore be ultra vires.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If I understand my honourable friend correctly, this legislation is proposed in order to give the provinces a chance to contend that it is wrong?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To put the matter in proper shape.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Supposing that the Dominion Government imposes duties upon itself, it is simply taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another, so far as the payment of duty is concerned; but the imposition of duty upon the provinces is an entirely different thing. That is my point. I think it is an injustice to the provinces.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: This Bill not only raises the question whether the Dominion Parliament has power to pass this legislation—as to which, as stated by the honourable leader of the Government, the provinces may appeal to the courts—but it is a declaratory Act whose effect would go back as far as the date of Confederation. If, as a matter of fact, duties have been levied on the provinces from Confederation, by what right would this Parliament now pass legislation which would prevent the provinces from reclaiming duties which they had paid and which it had been discovered they were not obliged to pay? I think we should pause before adopting this measure and make sure that the provinces consent to it—that they are willing to forego rights which may appertain to them and which may involve a considerable sum of money.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I can assure my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), that the provinces will not be consenting parties; but, if they have been acquiescing in paying this duty since Confederation, then they should pay.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am afraid they are not knowingly acquiescing. If they asquiesce when they know such legislation is before Parliament, well and good; but I think they should have an opportunity to make representations as to their rights being affected.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: This is not the first time that this question has been discussed by the Parliament of Canada. It has been broached more than once; but, according to my understanding, it has always been settled by the provisions of the British North America Act with regard to the respective powers of the federal parliament and the provincial legislature. The British North America Act says that the powers of the Federal Parliament include jurisdiction over all matters not assigned exclusively to the provincial legislatures, and in no portion of that Act can I find that any power has been given to the provincial legislatures to deal with the regulation of trades and commerce. The levying or collecting of customs duties is a matter which assuredly comes under the regulations governing trade and commerce, and such powers confined to the Federal Parliament. The question was also raised as to whether it would not be good policy, if the provinces required to import largely for their own work, to remit the duties. Under the provisions of the Customs Act if an article is very much needed, and is not manufactured in Canada and is not likely to be manufactured in Canada in the near future, the Government can remit the duty by Order in Council. Application was made under that provision, and, if I am not mistaken there was a remission of the duty upon some ditching machines upon that ground, not upon the ground that the provinces had the right to refuse to pay duty or that the Federal Parliament had not the exclusive right to impose duty.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: How does the honourable gentleman explain this:

> No land or property belonging to the Dominion of Canada or any province shall be liable to taxation.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I would understand that to mean real property belonging to the province.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The honourable gentleman may take it as real property. He has a right to do so. I have the right to take it in another way. Who is to decide?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The courts.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am not going to discuss the details or the merits of the Bill, but I am going to take objection to the doctrine laid down by my honourable friend the leader of the Government. I think the objection is a serious one in a parliamentary body, which is the supreme power in enacting laws. The honourable the leader of the Government lays this proposition before this honourable House and the country, that if a law is ultra vires, or unconstitutional, or irregular, it will be left to the courts to decide. To my mind, and I think to the minds of reasonable people, the people who do not want to be involved in law suits, the position taken is most unreasonable. This body is supreme, and the Government which directs both houses of parliament should be in a position to guarantee the regularity, the intra vires, and the constitutionality of any law which it proposes before bringing it before Parliament. That is common sense. That is a prevention of wastage of effort and money before the courts. After all, who are the courts? According to the law, they may be composed of a Galt, or a McLeod and a Tellier—one upsetting the other. We are here to enact laws, and neither the House of Commons nor the Senate should be called upon to pass a law which is under suspicion, or which may be considered irregular or ultra vires or unconstitutional, with the explanation from the Government that we shall find that out later—that if there is anything wrong it will go to the courts. I put my foot down on that. That is a most absurd way of working out the destinies of a free and democratic people. The destinies and the rights of the people should be protected and cared for by the representatives of the people, and not by servants of the Government, whether in the Department of Justice, the Customs Department, or on the Bench. We are the masters of the law, and if the Government is not able to have a law enacted without its being considered irregular, ultra vires, or unconstitutional, the sooner that Government is out of business the better for the country. I hold that the country cannot accept the declaration made by the honourable leader of the Government, that a Bill may go through Parliament, subject to the approval or disapproval of one or two judges on the Bench, irrespective of its sound sense, or of its respect for the constitution. That is a wrong principle to lay down. It is a wrong principle to force this Parliament to adopt. I hold that the men in this House are just as able as any clerk or body of clerks in a department, or any judge on the Bench, to enact laws in the interests of the country. Since I entered this Chamber fourteen years ago, I have been told by men, most eminent lawyers, "Let the courts interpret the law." My idea of legislation is that the courts have no right to interpret the law at all. The only right the courts should have is to apply the law. Parliament should enact the law, and make it so clear and distinct that there would be no need for interpretation. What is the result of interpretation by the courts? The powers of legislation are handed over to one or two men on the Bench, who may be very capable, but who, alas, too often are incapable; alas, too often cranky; alas, too often something else. Parliament should retain these matters in its own hands, prevent the laws from being interpreted, and thus save the people needless worry and tremendous expense, and the giving of fat retainers to the lawyers.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—AMENDMENT PROPOSED BY HON. MR. BOSTOCK.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 75, an Act respecting Military Service. He said:

Upon the declaration of war between Great Britain and Germany being made on the 4th of August, 1914, Canada, along with the other overseas Dominions, at once assumed its obligations for participation in the war as being part and parcel of the Empire. This was not simply the result of parliamentary action, or of public discussion, but the expression of that underlying sentiment which recognizes that when Great Britain is at war every section of the Empire likewise is involved in the struggle. The enthusiastic response which every part of the Empire made at the time, and particularly the steps which they took to give effect to this sense of patriotism, was the highest tribute that could be paid to the unity and strength of the Empire. As the war progressed public sentiment in Canada apparently warranted the Government in committing itself to maintain an army of five hundred thousand men. The necessity of Canada committing itself to maintain approximately a fixed strength became obvious as the war developed. The enormous force raised and placed in the field by the Central Powers made it imperative that the Allies should determine upon reaching the limit in mobilizing armies that would more than equal in strength those of the enemy. Canada, being as deeply interested in the war and the results thereof as any of the Allies, had every reason to believe that we should be able to maintain in the field as large a percentage of our population as the other overseas Dominions. Canada at this time had the right to count and depend upon the loyalty and patriotism of this Dominion responding as spontaneously to the call to arms for the defence not only of the Empire, but of our own shores as much as any part of the Empire. In expectation of this response we mobolized our forces, forwarded them to England and placed them in the field, where their ability, their courage, and their gallantry became unexcelled and one of the brightest spots in the war. It was scarcely expected at that time that this war would continue for the period which it has. At that time three years was regarded as the maximum period of the struggle. Those three years have expired, and still the struggle looms up as colossal, as threatening, and as overwhelming in its dire results as at any moment since it started.

Every step which could have been reasonably taken has been taken by Canada in endeavouring to meet its obligations in maintaining in the field Canada's quota of men. We have reached the point when the voluntary system of enlistment has failed, when it has become apparent that we cannot fulfil our obligations except through a departure from the voluntary system, and the adoption of a compulsory system. Owing to the professions of loyalty to the Empire which had already characterized this Dominion, we had the right to rely upon practical effect being given to those expressions and to our being able, under the voluntary system, to fulfil our obligations. We now realize that this cannot be done, and that the duty falls upon the Government of the day to adopt practically the same system of compulsory service as that which prevails amongst our Allies and practically all over the world. We are aware that amongst certain classes of the population compulsory service is not a popular measure. Yet recognition must be given to this important fact, that there are crucial times in the history of every state when the Government of that state is called upon to adopt extraordinary legislative measures for the preservation of the state, notwithstanding the angle from which the popular mind may view them. In this matter we have arrived at the crossroads of national duty and of public indifference. The duty is cast upon the Government to carry out its obligations, not only to the Empire and for the defence of our own shores, but to Canada's forces who are to-day engaged in this titanic struggle. This is one of the occasions on which the Government has to forego considering what may be the popular will, but to determine the grave and crucial question as to what the interests of the state demand regardless of what may be the consequences to the political fortunes of the Government. Hence we submit this Bill, not only for consideration, but for its adoption by Parliament.

Evidencing the necessity for the adoption of this measure and our failure to meet our obligations under the voluntary system, I present the following statistics of our Canadian Expeditionary Force:

Reported enlistment to 31st July, 1917, 418,102; gone overseas to same date, of whom 136,400 in France, 127,543 in England and elsewhere, 263,943; 31,010 killed, died missing and prisoners, and about 20,000 discharged or returned for discharge, 51,010; in Canada, or about to embark, 22,812; discharges, etc., in Canada, reported discharged as shown on detailed statement attached, 64,552; discharges not yet reported through districts, or for whom documents are not yet available for classification, about 10,910; total, 418,102.

Roughly estimated, we require at once to further recruit 100,000 men. The provisions of this Bill are so designed that this number shall be obtainable from that class of men in Canada that long ago should have readily responded to the call of duty and upon whom falls the obligation to defend the state of which they are citizens.

The first question that may arise is, why on national grounds this legislation should be passed. The manifest reason is that the first duty of the citizen is to defend the state in which he lives. Failing in this, he is recreant not only to his duty but in his sense of citizenship. It is unnecessary to point out that the evolution of defence is clearly traceable in mankind from the tribal days of the race, through the feudal ages, and through every stage of human evolution up to the highest point of our national civilization. It is an instinct in man as human and as clearly expressed as is any instinct which animates him. It may be strangled by his love of ease and luxury, or by his political or racial prejudices, or by his cowardice to perform the supreme duties of citizenship and manhood; but nevertheless it is a sense or instinct that animates all men from the most primitive to the most highly civilized. In tribal warfare a man of the tribe who would refuse to engage in the struggle of his tribe would at once meet with death. Why in this more advanced stage of civilization men should enjoy immunity for this obligation it is hard to understand.

No measure is more defensible than a law of public service, making the duty imperative upon every citizen to defend the state in which he lives. If the state in which he lives gives him protection of life and property, it is worth defending, and the law of compulsory service placed upon our statute books is nothing less and nothing more than the very instinct which prompts the primitive savage to fight for the defence of his tribe and his family. Of all our state systems nothing is more illogical than a voluntary system of defence. It places a premium upon the want of manly courage, of cowardly recreancy to the highest institutions and likewise to the defence of the state. It throws upon the man who is loyal to his country the duty of jeojardizing his life that recreancy and disloyalty may be protected in all their odium and viciousness. It disturbs and dislocates all the machinery of the state that should be manned and used for the orderly and systematic carrying out of the war.

The basic principle of the tate is compulsion. This is fundamental in its entire organization. It runs through every system of law, both civil and criminal, through practically all the conventions of society, without it law, order, system, and organization could not exist; and there is no element constituting the State so important to its existence as that of defence. If the same principle of compulsion that is applicable to its whole body of law is not applied to that of defence, it is manifest that the state may at any time be crushed by its enemies.

Furthermore, the principle of equality and of equal responsibility on the part of the citizen is recognized and asserted in the application of all our laws. Therefore to say that the all-important subject of defence, which must necessarily be the fundamental principle that protects the state, must be so promiscuous in its make-up as to be voluntary and not obligatory as to leave it to one man at the sacrifice of his life to defend the state and to the discretion of another to escape the jeopardy of defending the country, to which he belongs, not only will not admit of argument, but is obviously a violation of the primal law of nature on which all law is based.

It may be asked at this point, who is to determine when a man should place his life in defence of his country? The answer is, the Government of the day. The Government is charged by the people of the state with the supreme duty of determining what the safety of the state requires, what military necessity demands from us in the hour of danger. Upon the Government of the day and upon it alone rests this important and solemn duty. If the Government does not voice the sentiment of the state, then it is subject to displacement; but so long as the Government is the Government of the state nothing short of a revolution can say it nay in pronouncing on this all-important question. This is so obvious as not to require any elaboration. No group nor clique nor section of the country can logically claim immunity from the duty of defending the state when the Government of the day has issued the call to arms. The refuge of the recreant and those who fail in their duty is naturally a denial of the duty of the Government of the day to say what the state demands. But a great people need never be deluded by the voice of the unpatriotic, who are recreant to the representative institutions under which they live and are protected.

The question may also be asked, to whether the citizen of the state has not a right to pronounce upon the justice of the struggle which is now being waged, or the results which may flow from it in relation to our own country. My answer to this is that the Government of the day must necessarily speak for the whole people, and likewise pronounce not only upon the justice of the struggle, but what its probable result may be and what the imperative duty of the citizen is under such crucial conditions as those through which we are passing.

To talk of a referendum at such a time does violence to every instinct of defence. To say that the Government should ask every craven to his country, every pacifist, every slacker, every recreant to public defence, every coward who fears to face the enemy, every Socialist who preaches disloyalty, every alien who asks the protection of our country at the expense of the lives of the men who fight for it—to say that the Government shall ask a verdict from the thousands who proclaim their disloyalty from the house-tops, would constitude a farce out of the greatest tragedy that the world has ever seen enacted. If this proposition is unsound, then nothing short of a revolution must supersede the right of the Government to thus defend the state.

Time will not permit of saying much about the present struggle, except that the human mind cannot conceive its proportions, the destruction of life and property involved, and more particularly the inconceivable results to civilization which would flow from the triumph of the Central Powers. For over forty years Germany has concentrated its national mind, forces, and energies upon world power. For over a generation all German life, thought, and energy have revolved around this one idea. Practically every living German, from the date of his birth up to the date of the war, has been inoculated with this fixed idea of Germany's triumph over civilization. He imbibed it with his mother's milk; he was taught it in the primary schools. It was impressed and elaborated upon his mind through every stage of his more advanced education. The commercial, the scholastic, the military life, in a word, the whole national life of Germany, has never ceased to be animated with this hallucination. It has become an obsession of the whole people of Germany; it has so saturated them as to amount to a national form of insanity and fanaticism. This with Germany is peculiarly a war of territorial aggression. I have heard it said frequently in Canada that this country has not been in danger in this struggle—that the shores of Canada enjoy the greatest possible immunity from German invasion. When Germany suggested that England should remain neutral on condition that none of the territory of France in Europe should be encroached upon, she reserved to herself the liberty to take all the colonial possessions of France.

For a generation the literature of Germany has teemed with not only the idea, but the fixed intention, that on the continent of America Germany must build up a transatlantic and greater Germany for its congested millions. If Germany succeeded in this struggle the shores of Canada would become alive with the transports and cohorts of the Teutonic powers. The shores of Canada are threatened to-day as much as the shores of England and as much as the territories of France. Let us not run away with the idea that this is simply a European struggle. It was not territorial aggression in Great Britain nor in France that Germany wanted, but it was the Overseas Dominions and the great colonial possessions of the Allied powers that she sought. If Germany triumphed in this war, then so surely as the sun will rise on the morrow would the heel of Germany be on the neck of the people of Canada. This northern half of the American continent would pass into its possession and there would be established here a transatlantic Germany in which the people of Canada would be a tributary to the Germanic power.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

When certain people in Canada, with a view to concealing their recreancy to Canada, talk about this country not being in jeopardy, they speak without a knowledge of actual conditions and thus become blind leaders of the blind. The participation of the United States in this war is unanswerable evidence of what that nation fears and what a Germanic victory would mean. No later than last night there appeared in the Ottawa papers a speech by the Secretary of State of the United States in which he said that the United States was not entering upon this war for the purpose of assisting Great Britain or France or the Allies, but for the protection of herself, for the purpose of keeping the Teutonic powers from the shores of the United States and of protecting their own lives and property. I say that if Germany triumphed in this titanic struggle it would be a world power of which its rulers have dreamed for a generation. Notwithstanding the hesitation of the United States in embarking upon this struggle, desisting as they did until the enemy threatened to be at their gates, this should in itself constitute one of the manifest evidences of what the fate of Canada would have been did the Allies not succeed in the war and Great Britain should fall a victim of Germanic triumph. Should Great Britain be defeated, how long, think you, would Canada be able to maintain the freedom and independence which she enjoys to-day?

Certain sections of people in Canada talk glibly about their willingness to defend our shores upon the approach of the enemy; but how long would the unfortified shores of Canada, covering thousands of miles of sea line, be proof against the transatlantic attack of the Central Powers? What fool's paradise is this in which a section of our people are living when they talk of awaiting the approach of the enemy to our gates before making preparation to receive them. Do they think we should wait for the tumult of the war and the clash of battle to be heard from our shores? It is but a commonplace to say, as was said recently by Mr. McAdoo, the United States Secretary of the Treasury, that it were infinitely better to fight the enemy on European territory than to await its approach to our own shores, where the people of Canada would be as helpless as new born babes. Men who talk of defending Canada on our own shores are men who are destitute of a knowledge of actualities, blinded to German intentions and to the literature of a semi-official character which has circulated in Germany for a generation, a literature that has saturated the people of that state with ambition of world-wide power, and, more than all, of the acquisition upon this continent of Great Britain's great colonial possessions, and the building up on America's shores of a Germanic empire.

From the dawn of history down to the present time the defense of country has appealed to men's minds more than any other subject of thought. The pages of history have been illuminated with the gallantry and courage and achievements of humankind in responding to the call of country. For this reason no offence in the category of human crimes looms up so odious as treason, the offence of betraying one's country to the enemy. The name of the man guilty of treason goes down through the centuries with contempt, scorn, and odium. And yet treason to country may have many definitions. It may be active; it may be constructive. The man who actively betrays his country, thus handing it over to the enemy, is not only subject to death at the hands of his countrymen, but his memory for all times becomes a byword and reproach. And yet results almost as serious may be committed, perhaps unwittingly, by men who refuse to defend their country in the hour of danger.

At that crucial point in the beginning of August, 1914, when Germany declared war on Russia and France, it became manifest that, if England did not intervene, both France and Russia would have been crushed under the heel of the most tyrannical and barbarous power that ever waged war during the centuries of civilization. Let us ask ourselves what then would have eventually happened to England. If Germany, after crushing Russia and France, had attacked Great Britain, and she had failed to rise in defense of her shores, as certain parts of Canada are doing to-day, Great Britain would likewise have been overrun and have been to-day under the heel of Germany.

There is in Canada to-day a powerful element that declaims its disloyalty to England and repudiates the duty of Canada to be engaged in this struggle. Let them understand that, so long as we are in the Empire, then while the Empire is at war so is Canada to our last man and our last dollar. Canada is part of the Empire of its own volition. The thread which binds it to Great Britain is that of British sentiment and loyalty to the Empire. Never has Great Britain sought to hold Canada within the bounds of the Empire one moment beyond the wishes and the will of the people. Should the day ever come when Canada wishes to separate herself from her obligations to the Empire, then so quickly as those wishes can be cabled to the Imperial Government, so quickly will be flashed back the reply that it is for Canada and Canada alone to sever the tie. At the present time Canada's status in the Empire is as free as the air we breathe, and of all the privileges we possess none is greater than the privilege of standing shoulder to shoulder with not only Great Britain herself but also the other overseas Dominions, in fighting for the maintenance of liberty and human rights of which the British Empire has ever been the guardian.

What, then, of Canada? Think you, would we be enjoying our freedom, independence, and security to-day had not Great Britain espoused the cause for which she is now fighting. Let me ask, what would be the result if every man in the State took the position which is being taken by the anti-conscriptionists to-day in refusing to subscribe to compulsory service in defence of the State? It is clear that treason could not effect any greater result in favour of the enemy than the non-resistance of the people who refuse to defend their State. To my mind it is difficult to draw any substantial distinction between treason and non-resistance. The same result is accomplished by both, and if one is odious, equally odious is the other. Better and more manly would it be for the anti-conscriptionists to say they are prepared to sacrifice Canada to Germany, prepared to sacrifice Canada's sons who are today fighting the battle of human rights in France and Belgium, than under their colours of anti-conscription to play into the hands of the enemy. Think of a race of people so indifferent to their country's interests as to depend upon those who are sufficiently loyal to jeopardize their lives to defend those who refuse to fight. Think of a race of people growing up oblivious to the grandeur of love of country, of patriotism, and of the self-denial and sacrifice by which men are prepared to place their lives on the altar of their country. When we think of men indifferent at such a time to all the best interests of civilization involved in this struggle, indifferent whether the enemy should crush out the freedom and liberty which they have enjoyed under their country's protection, it shakes our confidence in human nature. A thousand times better are those who fell in action and sleep beneath the daisies on the distant battlefields of France and Belgium than those who to-day in Canada are declaiming against conscription and are simply concerned about the paltry affairs of the particular party or race to which they belong.

In conclusion, let me ask, is Canada of all the Allies to be alone in refusing to defend herself and the Empire? No excuse, when analyzed, can be made in opposition to this Bill except that of refusing assistance to the Empire or that of cowardice in facing the jeopardy of war.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What about Australia, which declared against conscription?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but Australia answered to the last man. Australia, with little more than half the population of Canada, has placed as many men in the field as Canada. I say to my honourable friend Australia did not need conscription.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Its Prime Minister thought she needed it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The loyalty and the patriotism of Australia responded to the call of duty, and the greatest tribute that can ever be paid to Australia is the way in which she responded to the call to arms. Australia has placed in the field, not only in the battlefields of Asia, but also in those of France and Belgium, a number almost equal to that of Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER: She did not respond to the call of conscription.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It may be said that the Government lacks a mandate to pass this legislation. We are charged with being a moribund Parliament. This I deny; but if this is a moribund Parliament, at whose instance is it such? When this Government wanted to dissolve Parliament, to have a general election, and to appeal to the people of Canada for an expression as to their administration of the war, who protested against this being done? For an answer read the speeches of some of the present anti-conscriptionists in Parliament, not only in the House of Commons, but in this Chamber. The period of this Parliament was extended peculiarly at their instance, and properly so. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, addressing the Ontario Federation of Liberal Clubs at their annual banquet at the Ontario Club, 21st May, 1915, said:

> I do not care, for my part, so long as the war lasts, to open the portals of office with that bloody key. * * *
> But I have this to say to the Prime Minister and his colleagues: I do not care for an election. Let the Prime Minister and his colleagues say that there shall be no election as long as the war shall go on, and I will pledge myself and the party that we shall stop all preparations and think of nothing but the war.

Again he said:

> In so far as I have authority over the destinies of the Liberal Party, I have only this to say: we shall not do one thing to prevent the Government from going on with the war policy.

That right honourable gentleman has, since making his speech, receded from the position which he then took. During the present session, upon the introduction of the Bill for the extension of the life of Parliament, his attitude was entirely contrary to that which he took in the speech to which I have referred. He now wants a general election at once, notwithstanding the offer made to him by the Prime Minister for a coalition Government pledged to its utmost effort for the prosecution of the war. Notwithstanding his protest before the Ontario Federation of Liberal Clubs as to opening the portals of office with that bloody key, he is apparently now enamoured of making this same bloody key the open sesame to office.

When the sons of Canada are falling by the thousands on the battlefields of Europe in defence of our freedom and of humanity and of the Empire, when thousands of homes in Canada are being desolated by the terrible consequences of war, when the blood of Canada's sons is yet wet on the lintels of the door posts of the homes in which they lived, at a time when all the energies of Canada should be marshalled to win this war, is it a time to talk about moribund parliaments, about referendums, about general elections and the petty claptrap of party warfare? I say a thousand times no. Notwithstanding the imminence of a general election forced by those opposed to the Government, I say unhesitatingly that public opinion in Canada protests against it; and, no matter what may be the results thereof, it is nothing short of a national crime that at this time Canada should be plunged by anti-conscriptionists into the throes of a general election.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the Prime Minister offered it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Because you refused coalition.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He offered it a month ago to the leader of the Opposition—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND—if he would join a coalition.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Prime Minister proposed to form a coalition. Did he not approach Sir Wilfrid Laurier?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And proposed to go to the people.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And did he not offer him an equal representation in the Cabinet?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Did he not offer to dissolve Parliament immediately?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes; there was to be a general election. That is all I say.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I say it was forced by the anti-conscriptionists upon the Government.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: And they will put you out too.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, this Government was given a mandate by Parliament, in the extension under which it is at present administering the affairs of this country, to pass the most effective war measures that could be adopted. Pursuing this policy, the Government submits this Bill for your consideration, and asks for its adoption, confident in the knowledge of its military necessity and that no more just and defensible legislation has even been placed upon the statute-books of Canada.

One of the most inspiring features of the controversy which has been waged about this Military Service Bill is that most of the representative sections of both political parties have united in defence of this measure. Party lines have largely been obliterated. It is no longer a fight between Conservatives and Liberals. They have discarded their shibboleths. There is a practical solidarity of the English-speaking press in favour of the Bill. The most representative of Canada's people are forming in line to win the war at all hazards. Loyalty to Canada and to the Empire is triumphing over party, and a spirit of loyalty and of patriotism hitherto unexcelled is being exhibited.

In conclusion, I cannot better give expression to this spirit than by reading the words of the Toronto Globe editorial of July 21, 1917:

The Military Service Bill is a fresh dedication of Canada to the cause of liberty, sanctified by the bravest blood of free nations. It is a pledge of her resolution to sustain her gallant sons who are in the fiery furnace of war, and to summon all her remaining power for the crucial phase of the world struggle. The first and paramount duty of Parliament is to put the measure on the statute book. The Act must be enforced without fear or favour. It should have the support of every Canadian, Liberal or Conservative, whose mind can rise above party or sectional or selfish considerations to the height of the great argument between freedom and despotism, between civilization and barbarism. The laurels won by the valor of her children on the battlefield must not be snatched from the brow of Canada by her own hand on the very eve of victory.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I have listened with great pleasure to the honourable gentleman's speech, but there was just one point which was not made clear to my intellect, and that was: suppose we passed this conscription measure, do the Government propose to put it into force before the general election?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot speak for the Government, but I can speak for myself.

Hon. Mr. POWER: But you are supposed to speak for the Government.

Hon, Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If I have anything to say about the matter, I would say this, honourable gentlemen, that no sooner would the ink be dry of the signature of the Governor General to this Bill, giving the Royal Assent, than the Act should be put into effect.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman simply answers for himself, not for the Government which he represents.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, I know of nothing to the contrary. I understand that to be the intention of the Government.

At six o'clock, the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, in approaching the question that is now before this House, we do so from the point of view that this country should put forward every effort to further to the utmost the prosecution of the cause of the Allied nations to a successful issue, and at the same time maintain the unity of the country. The question that presents itself to the mind of every one at the present moment is as to what is the best and most effectual way of accomplishing these objects. The Government have, by their action in bringing before Parliament this measure for the purpose of giving them the power to enforce compulsory service, told the people of the country that they do not see any other way of dealing with the situation. This country has been so fortunately placed that up to the present time they have not felt the stress or the pressure that has been felt in the Allied countries. It is only now that it is being brought home to them that if they are to maintain the part that they have played up to the present, if they are to stand by the men at the front and give them the assistance they require, if they are to put every possible ounce of force into our striking power with men, guns and munitions in order to help the Allies to win the victory for liberty, they must be prepared to make sacrifices, to give those things that they hold most dear to make the extra effort that is necessary when there comes the heavy strain, the bearing of which will help to turn the scale in favour of victory.

Before entering upon a discussion of the Bill itself, I desire to refer to a letter addressed to me which appeared in the morning Citizen of the 24th of July. I had no information beforehand that this letter was being sent to me, further than a note saying that it would appear in the paper the next morning. Therefore I was not in a position to take any action with regard to the letter at the same time that it was published, and every other honourable member of this House and the people throughout the country had an opportunity of reading that letter just as soon as I did. The letter appeared in the Ottawa Citizen and in the Manitoba Free Press on the same day. I have not seen the papers from the Pacific coast, but would not be at all surprised to find that it had been published there at the same time. When I saw the letter it was impossible for me to reply to it or to get all the papers in which it probably appeared. I thought the best way in which I could answer the statements made in that letter was by addressing myself to the matter before this House. The letter read as follows:

Ottawa, July 23.

Hon. Hewitt Bostock, the Senate, Ottawa:

My Dear Bostock,—Will you permit an onlooker to respectfully express his views on the present grave crisis in the affairs of Canada.

As the leader of the Liberal party in the Senate you will shortly be called upon to deal with the Military Service Bill. You and your colleagues will be faced with a grave responsibility.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK.

The world is in the final stages of a death grapple. No such dire and fearful tragedy has ever before occurred in the known history of mankind. The forces of tyranny and reaction throughout the world have rallied for a last desperate struggle. This fate of liberty, human rights and free modern civilization are at stake. The issue is still altogether undecided and hangs in the balance.

We have 80,000 men in the fighting line. It is not more than our share. Their numbers are being daily diminished by death and the casualties of war. They are driven to the utmost of their physical powers by lack of reserves. Our reinforcements are almost exhausted.

All That Matters.

I am confident that I voice the sentiments of many thousands of Canadians when I say that at this supreme moment we care nothing for Borden or Laurier, Conservatism or Liberalism. The overwhelming importance of the crisis absolutely obliterates all considerations of persons or parties. The only thing that matters is:

1. To put every possible ounce of force into our striking power with men, guns and munitions in order to help the Allies to win the victory for liberty.

2. To stand by our men at the front and give them abundant reinforcements and reserves to admit of rest and recuperation.

3. To maintain the honour of Canada and redeem our pledge to see the war through to the limit of our capacity.

In common with many others, I had hoped that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, if he could not join a union government, would agree to an extension of the life of Parliament so as to permit the Borden Government to get on with its war policy. To the profound regret of many thousands of his best friends, he has decided upon another course. I have no criticism to offer upon his course, nor anything except respectful sympathy for the difficulties of his position.

Issue is Conscription.

The facts, however, must be squarely faced. The meaning of Sir Wilfrid's attitude, and that of his principal supporters in Quebec, is that they have determined to force an election on the single issue of conscription. Read the speeches which are daily being delivered and you will find that their policy in effect is:

1. No conscription.

2. No more men. No more money.

If Sir Wilfrid is returned to power in the approaching election, two-thirds of his followers in Parliament will be pledged to the hilt against conscription and pledged to the hilt against any but a perfunctory and ineffective participation in the war. Then:

1. There will be no conscription.

2. There will be no recruiting in Quebec.

3. Under these circumstances it will be obviously impossible to raise troops in the other portions of Canada. Imagine a Laurier Government trying to raise troops in the other provinces, while Quebec scornfully refuses either to submit to conscription or to recruit.

4. Our regiments at the front will be left stranded and will dwindle and disappear as an effective fighting force.

Will Allow No Prosecution of War.

The predominating and controlling element behind Sir Wilfrid Laurier will not allow him to prosecute the war. No one who has the slightest experience of Parliamentary Government in Canada can honestly gainsay this conclusion.

It is said that a great effort is to be made to unite behind a solid Quebec all the elements in the population who are hostile or lukewarm in regard to the war, together with certain of the larger business interests who feel that conscription will interfere with their operations. Thus a determined effort is to be made to return Sir Wilfrid to power.

What will be the result of this effort if it succeeds? How is the war to be carried on with vigor by a parliamentary party which is controlled by a hostile majority?

To ask these questions is to answer them. With Sir Wilfrid in power the anti-war party of Quebec will dictate his policy. It is dictating his policy now.

It is said that the Government has made many mistakes. Probably it has. All the other war Governments made mistakes. To err is human. It is said that more skilful piloting would have avoided this crisis. Perhaps it would. It is hard to say. On the other hand, it is alleged that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, had he chosen to do so when applied to, could have found a way out of the difficulty. It may be so. It is easy to criticize.

Face to Face With Facts.

What is certain is that none of these things matters now. We have to face facts, not theories. The issue is simple. Either:

1. We put our whole strength into the war, or

2. We abandon our men at the front and dishonor our solemn obligation.

I will go further. The decision of this issue will determine, once for all, whether Canada is a nation, dominated and held together by a national will, and a national sense of honour, or is a helpless aggregation of sectional communities, held together only by time-serving considerations of sectional interest.

If anything in this troubled world can be absolutely clear, it is clear to-day, that we can grapple with this situation in one way and in one way only, by the formation of a union war government, administered on non-partisan lines, which will straightway appeal for a mandate to the people of Canada, and can consistently be supported by every element in the population that is loyal to the cause.

Germany is fighting desperately to wear out the fortitude of her opponents. If she succeeds, the peace will be inconclusive. It will be no peace for us, but the beginning of an intolerable strain of constant preparedness for war.

We are not fighting for sentiment, for England, for Imperialism; we are fighting for the rights of ourselves and our children to live as a free community.

Shall Canada be the first of all the allied nations to slink from the field? Let us realize the position now. It will be no use to wake up when it is too late.

Yours faithfully,
(Signed) Clifford Sifton.

I think that everybody in this House can agree with a number of the statements made in that letter; but there are certain statements contained in it which are not founded on fact, and to these I want to draw the attention of honourable gentlemen. One statement is:

The meaning of Sir Wilfrid's attitude and that of his principal supporters in Quebec is that they have determined to force an election on the single issue of conscription.

There is the further statement that "no more men and no more money" are to be supplied.

The statements referred to are possibly statements that have appeared in a number of papers in Quebec and have also been voiced on several platforms, but to say that Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself is responsible for those statements—that he has said that no more money and no more men are to be given in the event of his being in the position to control the affairs of this country—is not correct, and I think those statements should be refuted. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is desirous of doing all he can to assist in the war and to help the country to do its very best in that respect, but he is not prepared to force upon the country this policy of conscription without giving the people an opportunity of expressing their opinion on it. That is an attitude with which, I think, the country will agree. He considers that the people have a right to say what shall be done in regard to such a proposal, which is the result of a change of policy such as was not expected a few months ago.

The further statement in this letter, that there will be no recruiting in Quebec and that under the circumstances it will be obviously impossible to raise troops in the other portions of Canada, I do not think is in any way justified. The Government has said that the limit of recruiting has been reached, but there has been a great deal of discussion in the House and in the country on this very question. The methods that have been adopted have been, to a great extent objected to, and it is an open question whether everything that could be done in the way of obtaining recruits by voluntary enlistment has been done up to the present time. The statement is made that it will be obviously impossible to raise troops in other portions of Canada if troops are not to be raised in Quebec—that the people in the other provinces of Canada would not be prepared to do their part if such a thing were to happen—which I do not admit would happen—as that Quebec would refuse to do her part in fighting the country's battles. The question of how much recruiting has been done in Quebec is not one which I propose to take up now. The figures in regard to that have been given in another place, and honourable gentlemen can form their own opinion. But I will say this, that the French-Canadian regiments that have gone to the front have given as good an account of themselves as any of the other regiments who have gone from Canada, and I am sure that the men from Quebec who have fought in Flanders and in France would be only too glad if they could see a great many more of their fellow-countrymen coming over to assist them.

There is not a predominating and controlling element behind Sir Wilfrid preventing him from prosecuting the war along reasonable lines. He is anxious to do everything he can to help the country and to uphold its integrity and honour, and it is not right to say that he is being dictated to by an anti-war party in Quebec, who have been known for a long time to be opposed to Sir Wilfrid and his policy, and who did most to oppose him when his naval policy was before the country. In the election of 1911, the Hon. Clifford Sifton himself took a great part in opposing that policy. For the purpose of opposing the Liberal party at that time he used the whole organization that he found in the province of Quebec, the Nationalist organization, which was opposed to sending any men to fight in the battles of the British Empire. Had the naval policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier been carried out we should have had ships not only on the Pacific but also on the Atlantic, ready to take part in the defence of the coasts on both sides of the country. Not only that, but we should have had shipyards in operation and have been in a position to attend to the building of ships, which at the present time is a most important matter for the whole British Empire. If, at the time the war broke out, we had had ships on the Pacific ocean, we should not have been dependent, as we were at the time the war commenced, upon Japan for our defence against a possible raid by the German ships then in the Pacific. One of the great factors in defeating that whole policy was the stand taken by Sir Clifford Sifton at the general election of 1911. That is a fact with regard to the writer of this letter which honourable gentlemen should bear in mind.

The further question raised in that letter with regard to a union government is one that has been discussed a great deal in the country. At the time when it was found impossible for the leaders of the two great parties to unite to form a coalition government, when it was found that they could not agree, that the Prime Minister had not considered asking the leader of the Liberal party to join him in a coalition government before he adopted a principle to which the leader of the Liberal party could not assent, the only method of arbitration left was an appeal to the people; and, in my opinion, the only way in which this whole question can be settled is by an appeal to the people. The question has been taken out of the hands of the Senate. The Senate has had nothing to do with deciding the question of the extension of Parliament. The matter has been settled in another place, and there is to be an election before many months.

With regard to the Bill now before the House, I think it would be advisable to compare the way in which the question of conscription has been dealt with in this country and the way in which it was dealt with in England. Honourable gentlemen have probably assumed that Englishmen raised no question about conscription. When the war began conscription was just as foreign to the ideas of an Englishman as it is to any man in this country today. No one ever thought that the British nation would be obliged to have recourse to conscription in order to carry on the war. It was not realized at that time that England would be engaged in a war such as this war has turned out to be. But when the British Government had to face the situation, when they found voluntary enlistments were not sufficient to provide the number of men it was necessary to obtain, they took steps to educate the people to the necessity of conscription. In January of 1915 the question was first brought up in the House of Lords by Lord Middleton, and was then discussed and carefully considered. This was the first announcement to the country that the question might have to be taken up later on, and it had the effect of educating the people of the country to the necessity of what was coming, or of what they might expect.

Honourable gentlemen will remember that it was in May, 1915, that the British Government, headed by Right Hon. Mr. Asquith, came to the conclusion that the only way to carry on the business of the country was to form a coalition government. Mr. Asquith went to the leaders of the Conservative party, the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, the Right Hon. Bonar Law, and others, and to the leaders of the Labour party, and likewise tried to get Mr. Redmond, the leader of the Irish party, to join him. In this latter effort he was unsuccessful, but he got all the leaders of the other two parties into the Government with him.

It was not until October of 1915 that the question of conscription was brought up in the British House of Commons, and the Derby system of enlistment was introduced. Later the Compulsory Service Bill was brought forward and became law. Even then, after all this preparation, there were found in the British House of Commons a number of men who were opposed to conscription. The then Attorney General, Sir John Simon, resigned his seat rather than vote in favour of conscription, and some forty other Liberal members in the House at the time voted against it. I mention these facts to show honourable gentlemen that this question is one that agitates the minds of the people very much, not only in this country, but also in England, where they have had the evidence of raids and of bombardments which would bring home to the people, a great deal more strongly than anything we have had in this country, the necessity of being prepared and of putting forward their very best efforts for the purpose of carrying on the war.

But when we come to consider the action of this Government in dealing with the question of conscription, we find a very different state of affairs. Even as late as April of this year a question was asked of the Minister of Militia in the House of Commons, which reads as follows:

> In view of the position taken by the Government through the Premier last year that they were emphatically not in favour of conscription, and of the letter of the Minister of the Interior published in the Western United States and advertisements by the Interior Department to the effect that conscription was not deemed either advisable or necessary to Canada, I would like to ask the Minister of Militia and Defence whether it is the intention of the Government to change their policy in regard to enlistments and provide for a policy of conscription, or whether they intend to put in force compulsory the provisions of the Militia Act.

The answer given at that time to the question by the Minister of Militia was:

> The question to which my hon. friend refers has not yet had the consideration of the Government.

Yet on the 18th of May, only a few weeks later, the Prime Minister, speaking in the House of Commons, on his return from attending the Imperial Conference in London, announced his policy of compulsory service. The contrast between those two methods of dealing with the people and bringing home to their minds the necessity of this action is very striking.

In 1916, when the question of an extension of the parliamentary term had come up, the Prime Minister stated that there was no intention of adopting conscription, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in replying to him, also confirmed the idea that there would be no conscription. Extension of time was granted unanimously by the House, and it is only fair to assume that the people throughout the country considered that there would be no conscription, at any rate until the Prime Minister found it necessary to tell the country that he had evidence that a change would have to be made.

Then, further, in connection with this matter, and as showing that the minds of the people had not been prepared for this question, I may remind honourable gentlemen that while the Prime Minister was in England, the United States had decided to come in and do their share in fighting the battles in Europe. The effect of this is, of course, that a very large number of men will in time be prepared to go, and will be shipped to Europe as soon as transportation facilities will permit of their being sent. Therefore, there was an opportunity for giving the people of this country a chance to discuss this question and arrive at a conclusion as to whether they could by a further determined effort raise more men by voluntary enlistment, or whether they desired that a conscription Act should be put into effect.

From the figures brought down to the House in reference to recruiting, it is fair to maintain that, provided the Government have made up their minds that they will maintain four divisions at the front, they have enough men on the other side of the Atlantic at the present time to maintain those four divisions at their full strength till the middle of November. At the present time they are obtaining by voluntary enlistment over six thousand men per month, according to the figures of the last six months. Of course, there is a certain amount of wastage in these figures, and further, the men so enlisting go into all branches of the service. It should have been the aim of the Government, in view of the splendid service that has been done by the Canadians at the front under the system of voluntary enlistment, to have maintained this system up to the very last minute.

When the United States agreed to allow recruiting in their country for the Canadian army, the Government should have established a proper system of recruiting depots throughout the country. At the present time, according to the United States census of 1910, the white population of foreign origin in the United States of French Canadian parentage amounted to 932,238; the population of other Canadian parentage, including Newfoundland, amounted to 1,822,377; making a total of 2,754,615. The foreign-born population of the same date was: French Canadian, 358,083; and other Canadian, 819,554. The total was 1,204,637. Taking these two totals together, we have 3,959,252. I think it is fair to assume that, if the Government established an energetic and enthusiastic recruiting campaign throughout the New England States, where this population is mostly located, as well as in other parts of the States, they could at least obtain recruits amounting to one per cent of these figures, or, roughly, 40,000, between now and the end of the year. This is saying nothing of the English, Scotch, and Irish population in the States, some of whom at least might be prepared to enlist in this way, and who, according to the census of the United States in 1910, amounted to: English, 2,322,442; Scotch, 659,663; Irish, 4,504,360. The recruiting in the States can be carried on on thoroughly business lines, the men as enlisted and passed sent over to Canada and outfitted, and then forwarded to England for their training. The work so far done by the one office that has been established in Chicago, and the men that were raised by Colonel Guthrie when recruiting for his battalion in Boston, is an assurance that very useful results can be obtained. And without giving any definite figures, I make the statement that enough men should be obtained in this way to keep up the necessary supplies of men until the end of February or the first week in March of 1918, without in any way detracting from the efficiency of the four divisions now at the front. And this is without taking into account the men who may be enlisted in Canada during the same period. The Government is not therefore so pressed for men and the opportunity for enlisting more men that they cannot, now that they have to go to the country, defer putting this Bill into operation until after the time that the people have had an opportunity of expressing their opinion at the polls.

It further seems from these figures that between now and the end of the year the Government should be able to obtain as many men as they can conveniently arrange to transfer to England. It must be borne in mind further, that the question of housing men in this country in the winter is not by any means an easy one. Although as many as 100,000 men can possibly be easily handled during the spring and summer and fall, no such number of men can be provided for during the winter with any degree of satisfaction or with comfort to the men themselves. Moreover, the ships to transport those men must be arranged for in conjunction with the United States.

It may be well to recall the operation of the draft system in the United States during the Civil War and the consequences of the introduction of that system as reflected in the volunteer figures. The Confederate attack on Fort Sumter began on April 2, 1861. The North at once called for volunteers, and during the first eighteen months of war no fewer than 679,000 men responded. But at the beginning of 1863 the enthusiasm had almost died away. There was grave discontent in the North; the Confederates were outplaying the Union generals, and it began to look like an ultimate triumph for the Confederates. Desertions were common, too, and, after two more calls for volunteers, conscription was put into force. The law was passed on March 3, 1863, and under it all men from twenty years of age to forty-five were declared to constitute the national forces and liable to be called upon for military service. The exemptions were as usual. The bachelors of military age and married men between twenty and thirty-five were called first. At the second call married men from thirty-five to forty-five were taken. But before the law was put into effect each section of the country was given a quota of men which it was required to raise. The effect of this provision was remarkable. Although volunteering had practically stopped when the draft law was introduced, the measure stimulated it to such an extent that no fewer than 1,075,538 recruits joined the ranks voluntarily. The draft itself produced only 168,649 men! Had the Government, when they started recruiting, divided the country into districts in this way, and told each district that they would be responsible for a certain number of men, and given them the opportunity of raising that number of men, and placed them in a position that there would have been a certain rivalry between those different districts to obtain the men, and the battalions representing those men at the front, before they put into force this question of conscription, I think that we would have seen a very different result from what we see to-day.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Is the honourable senator aware that that was the very course that was adopted, in Ontario at least?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Not as far as the West was concerned. If that was so in Ontario, it certainly was not done in other parts of the country, because one of the greatest troubles about the whole question of recruiting was that at the start men came from the West in battalions, and they were all broken up and turned over to other regiments of which they and their friends in the West knew absolutely nothing, with the consequence that they very largely lost the interest which they had had when they left the West, and there was not the enthusiasm to keep up the recruiting. Nor were there proper reserve battalions to send forward to fill up the ranks of other battalions as they were required.

The leader of the Government this afternoon stated as his personal view that he would put this Bill in force at once. That is not in line with what we have been led to suppose was going to be done, for the Prime Minister, when he made his proposal for the formation of a coalition Government, agreed to the statement that the terms were:

That a coalition Government should be formed.

That the Military Service Bill should be passed.

That a pledge should be given not to enforce it until after a general election.

That Parliament should be dissolved and a coalition Government should seek a mandate from the people.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but Sir Wilfrid did not accept that proposal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But it was the proposal at the time.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That was the proposal made at that time by the Prime Minister, and I do not think the Prime Minister has ever made such a definite statement as my honourable friend made this afternoon as to the putting of this Bill into effect immediately.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: He did not make that statement on the part of the Government; he made no such statement on the part of the Government. What he said was that if he had his own individual way it would be put in force.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Exactly, but we are interested in knowing what the Government was going to do about this matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Pass the Bill first, and then we will tell you what we are going to do.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: My honourable friend looses sight of the fact that the position he took this afternoon is a very autocratic position—and the battle we are fighting to-day is a battle as between autocracy and democracy. If we are fighting for anything, we are fighting against autocratic government, a Government that tells the people exactly what they have to do and what they have not to do; and we are fighting for the liberty of the people, and for the right of the people to have a say as to how they shall be governed and what laws shall be passed.

Now, I would like to refer honourable gentlemen to the speech that was made by the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, when he addressed both the Senate and the House of Commons on his visit to Canada. He used these words:

> Ever more clearly as the months go on, it becomes evident that this is becoming a world war between the powers of democracy on the one side and the powers of autocracy on the other side. We in this room, whatever shades of differences may separate us, can in such a contest take only one side. We can only be on the side of democracy. We are convinced that for every human combination who have reached the degree of civilization and development that has been reached by all the great western communities there is but one form of Government, under whatever name it may be called, and that is the government in which the ultimate control lies with the people. We have staked our last dollar upon democracy, and if democracy fail us we are bankrupt indeed. But I know that democracy will not fail us.

These words used by the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour in his speech to the Senate and the House of Commons when he visited Canada express better than I can the attitude in which the Liberals face the situation that now confronts the country. We on this side of the House are prepared to trust to democracy, to trust the people that they will realize that the honour of their country is in their own hands, and at an election they will have an opportunity of saying what they want done, what policy is to be pursued.

I have therefore pleasure in moving, seconded by the Hon. Mr. Power:

> That to the motion for the second reading of the Bill, after the word "time" the following words should be added, "with the understanding that this Bill will not come into force until after a general election."

Before I sit down I want to say that in voting on this Bill it is understood that honourable gentlemen on this side of the Chamber are free to vote as they think best. This is such an important matter, about which there are wide differences of opinion both in Parliament and in the country, that every one should act according to the dictates of his own conscience, as he thinks best in the interests of unity.

Hon. FREDERIC NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, I am very sorry that my honourable friend, the leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) did not make out a better case. I have heard him to much better advantage. So far as I was able to understand his remarks, they were largely in the nature of apologies for the action that had been taken by the leader of the Opposition in the other House and the section of the party behind him. I cannot recall that I ever knew the motto "Qui s'excuse s'accuse" to be better exemplified than by the speech of the honourable the leader of the Opposition. It was nothing but apologies from start to finish, and there was no note of true Canadianism struck.

I am strongly tempted to speak at length, but I believe that I can best serve the country and the men at the front by doing nothing to delay the passage of this Bill and the consequent sending of reinforcements to the front, and will therefore only occupy the time of this House for a few brief minutes. One day's delay may mean a battle lost, and the loss of one battle may mean a list of casualties that will bring grief and sorrow to many a Canadian home, and mayhap bring sadness to honourable members of this House whose best and bravest are in the far-flung battle line. To prevent such an untoward occurrence we should be willing to set the hands of the clock around so as not to delay for one moment the passing of this Act. Do we not know that Russia has failed us at the critical moment? Do we not know that France, to use a popular expression, has been bled white? Do we not know that every available man in England is in khaki, and do we not know that, if the motherland and the Allies are defeated, this Canada of ours of which we are so justly proud will come under the domination of the mailed fist of Prussian autocracy?

There is an old Turkish proverb which says, "The night is pregnant with the morrow; God knows what the dawn may shine upon." We all know, however, that the dawn will shine on our brave troops fighting and dying for the protection of our country, fighting and dying for the protection of those at home who are heedless to their cry, "Send reinforcements or we perish." We know all that, but God alone knows if the dawn may shine on these same brave troops being done to death by superior numbers because of the lack of reinforcements which did not come, and—I say it with sorrow—which certain sections of our community have hesitated to send. Shall we desert those brave troops at the eleventh hour, or shall we flash across the ocean the inspiring news: "the Senate of Canada, the last parliamentary court of decision, has said, and said promptly, that the cause you are fighting for is your country's cause, and your country and your fellow-citizens will stand by you to the last man and to the last dollar"?

Honourable gentlemen, we are of mature age; most of us are past our prime, and the shadows of the evening of our lives are growing longer. Have we not reached the time when national aspirations should be placed above political and racial considerations? Our patent from His Majesty the King, if I remember correctly, reads as follows: "Know ye that as well for the special trust and confidence we have manifested in you, as for the purpose of obtaining your advice and assistance in all weighty and arduous affairs which may the State and the defence of our Dominion of Canada concern." Who can deny that the first line of defence that may concern the Dominion of Canada is the first line of defence in France and Belgium? We know this on the authority of no less a person than General Lord French, who said that the Canadians had saved the situation, that they had held back the Huns from Calais and mayhap had saved Great Britain from invasion. Honourable gentlemen, those brave troops are our own flesh and blood; many of them have made the supreme sacrifice; many are halt, maimed and blind; and is there a man with soul so dead whose blood does not warm and his pulse quicken when he reads the tales of their heroism? A mile of an advance is a mile nearer peace and the liberty of the world; a mile of a retreat is a mile nearer humiliation and our self-effacement as a patriotic and liberty-loving Dominion.

I have no more to say. The time has passed for words; it is the deed that will live in history that counts; and I hope and believe that the deed soon to be recorded in this House will be of such national patriotic import that when it is read of by future generations, our children and our children's children will be unashamed.

Hon. WILLIAM ROCHE: Honourable gentlemen, in his speech this afternoon the leader of the Government stated very truly that Great Britain had declared war on Germany on the 4th of August, 1914. He said that Canada is a dependency of Britain, and that mechanically we were at war when England was at war. I do not know whether Canada was consulted; it has not been disclosed to us whether the sense of Canada was taken before Great Britain declared war. The argument of the leader of the Government this afternoon proceeded on the assumption that Canada was a sovereign state. Canada has none of the characteristics of sovereignty; she can make no coinage; she can make no treaties; she can make no war; and she can make no peace.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: How about the French treaty?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: The treaty that the honourable gentleman speaks of was negotiated by the British Government.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: What about the mint?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Every intelligent man knows the difference between a militiaman and a regular soldier of the King. The militiaman is a volunteer. The militia is a sort of police to prevent internal disturbances, and if necessary to repel any invader who comes to our shores. The conscript is a regular soldier of the King, and the King alone can call him out; he has to go wherever the King commands him to go, and there is no limit to his term of service. The conscript is subject to the provisions of the British Army Act, and he is officered, very probably, by officers of the British Army. This is not a levee en masse, where everybody is called out. It is quite true that the State can command every citizen in time of invasion; but the people can turn out of their own accord; they can go in force to repel an invasion; they can oppose any invader without the Government, without a popular Government, or without that autocracy which was outlined by the honourable the leader of the Government this afternoon, which autocracy is more absolute than that of Louis XIV., and on a par with that of the Kaiser. The Kaiser talks of "Me und Gott;" but now it is the Government that is independent and omnipotent, and that can call out every man.

Who has shown the necessity for this Bill? Who has shown the supreme exigency which necessitates so severe and extensive a measure? Who has shown that the troops are in dire extremity, that they are dying, as my honourable friend has said? In the newspapers we read of continual advances. Are we not told that our soldiers are succeeding everywhere and that the enemy are defeated and disheartened, that they have lost all morale, and in fact that they are on the verge of destroying their own Government and setting up a Government by the people? Who has shown the need? Has the leader of the Government shown it? Did the leader of the Government in the other House show it? There was not a word said as to the dire necessity which was depicted to us in such graphic language by my honourable friend opposite this afternoon.

What is this Bill? I am not competent to go into the details of it with all its categories, its classes and subclasses interlacing one another, and its provisions for a great staff of officers and officials. There is one item of benevolence in this Bill. It aids a poor, obscure class, the lawyers. Some poor wretch will be marked out and will probably be dragged to the appeal court, and if he has any money behind him he may succeed, but the benevolent class, the lawyers, are provided for in the Bill.

Then, there is the administration of the Bill. Who can be selected? Who may be exempted? He may be exempted who has friends enough to guard against his being brought to the recruiting officer or the barracks, or whatever it may be. There may be the opportunity, which has always offered under every system of conscription in every land, for the people to mark out victims of conscription and make them go with the other soldiers when, perhaps, with lenient management they might show some claims to exemption.

Then there is the enforcement of the Bill. Some honourable gentlemen do not know what the enforcement of such a Bill means, because they have not lived in times of war. There is the picketing of the people, there are the press gangs—this Bill provides for recruits in both the army and the navy; there is the billeting of the soldiers on the inhabitants, and there is the clause to put down the people if they show any resistance to this Bill. So much for the Bill.

As has been recited by my honourable friend in his very eloquent speech this afternoon, Canada has contributed immense sums of money—millions more than we know about or can afford to pay. The Finance Minister has cudgelled his brains to find out new objects of taxation, new sources from which to derive revenue. We are taxed by municipal government, we are taxed by local government, and we are taxed by the Dominion Government. If we have money in the bank we are taxed on that; if we have profits we are taxed on them; if we have a business we are taxed on it. By means of taxation revenue has been drawn from every source, and we are to go on indefinitely, according to the programme laid out by my honourable friend who has just spoken (Hon. Mr. Nicholls). There is to be no limitation as to what can be done in the way of taxation, except the utter inability of the people to pay, and the utter bankruptcy of the country.

It was proclaimed that we should have no more truck nor trade with the Yankees, and yet we see the spectacle, which calls forth laughter from some people and regret and sorrow from others, our Minister of Finance making sundry trips and begging of "Brother Jonathan, dear Brother Jonathan," to brew his hands in blood and lend us a little money to help us out of the hole.

In the course of his speech the other day, the Prime Minister said that there were 1,500,000 eligible men in Canada who were subject to this Bill and who might be selected for conscription. I invite the attention of the honourable the leader of the Government to this point, that this afternoon he called everybody who did not go to the war by opprobrious names: traitors, slackers, cowards, and other offensive names. Apply those epithets to the 1,500,000 people, if you think they deserve them, but remember that the 1,500,000 people have a means of resenting that. We should speak respectfully of people when in a month or two we may be on our knees asking for their votes and their approval of our conduct. I say, and I think it is a reasonable declaration, that when there are so many eligible men in the community who have not gone and do not wish to go and fight, that this measure, which is so extensive, so far-reaching—a measure without limitations—ought to have the sanction of the people behind it. It ought to be known whether the people approve of a measure of this kind before the country is committed irremediably to this Herculean exertion which my honourable friend calls upon us to bring into effect. I should like to know what right I have, who do not want to go to the war, to say to my neighbour: "You shall go to the war and lose your life." I know of no social or civil right by which a man can say to his neighbour: "You shall lose that which is most precious to you in the world. Give up your life; I do not want to lose mine, but you shall give up yours." It has been said eloquently this afternoon, and with rhetoric and declamation elsewhere, that these men in the trenches, our own men, the 400,000 who have gone overseas of their own free will, sent and paid by Canada and for whom Canada is providing hospitals, pensions, and, where necessary, other assistance—that that has been the most splendid contribution that has ever been made by any dependency to a parent state. Do those 400,000 men, with their piercing voices, call upon us to send over to them—what?—reinforcements?

Some Hon. SENATORS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: No. Conscripts. That is what you are going to send over to them.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Reinforcements just the same.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Hear them coming down the street. Look at the sad, despondent faces. Look at the armed guard with their glittering bayonets around them. Listen to the sobs and cries of the women. The conscripts, torn from their homes, to listen to the commands of officers whose language they do not understand, giving up all their prospects in life, all they hold dear, going over to a foreign land to give up their lives, and to be put under officers who will regard them as only food for powder—as inferior beings, the Helots to the front!

Who are the most vociferous of these people? Gentlemen from the old country largely. I beg pardon of the honourable leader of the Government—for I think he was as loud this afternoon as any of them. Who hounds the Canadians to the front, to go and fight and lose their lives, while they themselves sneak into snug billets and laugh at the credulity of their dupes? Who are the most vociferous? The newspapermen, the clergymen, and certain orators that we have. But the sensible people of the country, the thinking people, do not approve of conscription. It is the surface current, which is clamorous and violent and overpowering, that goes for conscription in this country, and it is the sober, common-sense people of the country who are not in favour of it. That is my assertion. But be that as it may, the people should decide the question whether, by a measure so extensive as this, men shall go to the front as conscripts.

In a speech on the resumption of negotiations with Napoleon, at a very dreary time in the history of the British Empire, when the Bank of England had failed and the resources of England were very low indeed, and when it was stated that it would be desirable to have a peace with France, William Pitt once said that war should go no further than the consumption of the available resources, but when any of the radical resources of the country were touched, then an honourable peace, if obtainable, should be sought. Gibbon, in his account of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, designated as one of the principal causes the immense taxation which was placed upon the empire as a consequence of its foreign wars. We know that in our own hemisphere the taxation which was imposed upon the Thirteen Colonies on account of the French war, which was so long conducted, was the cause of the disserverance of those colonies from the Empire. Great Britain lost the brightest jewel in her crown as a consequence of unlimited taxation. Some British statesmen said, in something like the language we have heard to-day: "Oh, a peppercorn of acknowledgment of the sovereignty of the state is worth a great deal more than the warm affections of the people of America." In consequence, the United States of America, which is a world-power to-day, was lost to Britain forever.

Russia is the coming antagonist of Great Britain. Russia is the rival—

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: The honourable gentleman, in his speech on the Naval Bill, four years ago, said that France was the coming antagonist of Great Britain. The honourable gentleman seems to have changed his opinion.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: The two opinions are quite consistent. My honourable friend is quite a stickler for consistency. I will show that they are both going to be antagonists.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Both?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Will that suit the honourable gentleman? Russia stretches from Poland to the Pacific ocean. Her frontier is along by India. She covets India. She has half a suzerainty over Persia. Her armies are pushing on in the Caucasus and Mesopotamia. Russia, from the great changes in her government and the violent reverses in her policy, will have the British Empire as its antagonist in the future. You may say that is only the opinion of an obscure person from Halifax; that opinion is isolated, and confined to one person. Napoleon, one of the most far-seeing men that France ever had, said: "In fifty years Europe will be either Cossack or Republican. If I had succeeded in Russia, Europe would have given law to Russia. I failed, and Russia will give law to Europe." That is French opinion. Now let me give you English opinion. I will give you the opinion of a nobleman who was most assertive of British rights, one of the greatest statesmen England has possessed since Cromwell or William III. What is his opinion on the subject? He cannot be accused of being a traitor or a slacker, or being unfriendly to the British Empire. Lord Palmerston was a nobleman who was for twelve years Secretary of War and twice Prime Minister of England. Addressing Lord John Russell, he said:

My dear Russell:

It was dishonest and unjust to deprive Denmark of Schleswig and Holstein. It is another question how these two duchies when separated from Denmark can be disposed of best for the interest of Europe. I should say that with that view it is better that they should go to increase the power of Prussia than that they form another little state to be added to the cluster of small bodies politic which encumber Germany, and render it of less force than it ought to be in the general balance of power in the world.

Prussia is too weak as she now is ever to be honest or independent in her action; and with a view to the future, it is desirable that Germany in the aggregate should be strong in order to control these two ambitious and aggressive powers, France and Russia, that press upon her west and east.

As to France: we know how restless and aggressive she is, and to break loose for Belgium, for the Rhine, for anything she would be likely to get without much exertion.

As to Russia: she will in due time become a power almost as great as the Old Roman Empire. She can become mistress of all Asia, except British India, whenever she chooses to take it; and when enlightened arrangements shall have made her revenues proportioned to her territory, and railways shall have abridged distances, her command of men will become enormous; her pecuniary means gigantic; and her power of transporting armies over great distances most formidable.

Germany ought to be strong in order to resist Russian aggression, and a strong Prussia is essential to German strength. Therefore, though I heartily condemn the whole of the proceedings of Austria and Prussia about the duchies, I own that I should rather see them incorporated with Prussia than converted into an additional asteroid in the system of Europe.

Yours sincerely,

(Signed) Palmerston.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: May I ask the honourable gentleman if those are his own opinions?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I say, with regard to Russia, that is the outline of the future by that eminent statesman, the most enlightened and farseeing man of the time; and I say this, that England is not wise in jeopardizing her resources, in spending all her accumulated wealth, and depleting her armies and man power when she may be brought face to face with a world-power like Russia, and when, in addition to that, the only power that has the standing army in Europe to hold off Russia may be an ally of Russia against her. What is this country's first line of defence? Is it, as gentlemen say, away off in France? I say no. Our first line of defence is the Atlantic ocean. Our second and our third and our fourth lines of defence are those very men whom you are going to conscript and send away, to lose their lives and be left in those long trenches in the north of France and in Flanders where "in one red burial blent" the unforgotten dead lie.

The purpose of this Bill, as candidly announced by some honourable gentlemen, is that Quebec is to be coerced, because Quebec has not rendered a sufficient contingent; that Quebec is to be forced, if necessary, with armed troops, to provide a sufficient contingent. Let me tell the honourable leader of the Government that there are other provinces as opposed to conscription as Quebec is, and then when the opportunity is given to the people to speak out, they will manifest their condemnation of it. If they do not, if they say they want conscription, we shall all fall in with it; but if the present designs were carried out with armed force upon a reluctant people, would it not be a melancholy spectacle to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of Confederation in the blood of our fellow citizens? Is that the holocaust that we seek? Is that the supreme sacrifice? Is that the consummation that is held out before us? Civil war in Canada, in order to carry out the programme of liberty, Christianity, and democracy in Europe? I do not know what "democracy" does not mean. I heard the Right Hon. Mr. Balfour the other day, when he wished to round off a period, state that the war was for liberty and Christianity and democracy. I do not know the extent or the limitations of democracy. I do not know how far the iron rule of the people will go. I like to trust to our own institutions, that we know. I am for the old régime. I am for the King in England upon the throne, King George, and the House of Lords, and the House of Commons, and in Canada the Governor General, the Senate to protect our rights and liberties, and a House of Commons that reflects the will and the sentiments of the people.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: I do not propose to take up any time in replying to the remarks of the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Roche) further than to say that the honourable gentleman's speech will be better understood when it is known that he is the Halifax agent of the Hamburg-American line of German steamers.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I beg to say in reply to the honourable gentleman that his statement is totally untrue.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Well, then, he was. He has been for a quarter of a century the Halifax agent of the Hamburg-American line——

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: More than that; but not now.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: And that explains his whole speech.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The head of our Intelligence Department in Canada up to about a year ago was a German. Many of the King's relatives are Germans.

Hon. RAOUL DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, as it is quite evident that the campaign which is being prepared in ministerial quarters will be mostly directed against the province of Quebec, I intend to preface the remarks which I desire to make with a short history of the people of my province, whose ideas and opinions I intend to champion in this Chamber. The honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) complained that the remarks of the honourable gentleman from British Columbia (Hon. Mr. Bostock) had not the true Canadian ring about them. I think that when I take my seat I shall not be accused of having failed to strike a Canadian note. I think that it matters little in life and in Parliament that we differ. An opinion conscientiously held is entitled to respect, and I am convinced that if we are sincere in the expression of our opinions we retain the confidence of those with whom we differ. This Bill recognizes that principle, because it exempts from its operations the conscientious objector, such as the Quaker or the Doukhobor. I may state that since the 4th of August, 1914, I have not uttered one word that could be considered a partisan word. Since the 4th of August, 1914, all my energies have been devoted to helping in this great cause. I have done my bit in attempting to recruit. I have sat with some members of this honourable House on recruiting committees and other committees which have helped in furthering the cause. It may be said when I am through that some of my remarks will recall the old days, the ante-war days. They will, perhaps, but only incidentally. I am still in the fight, in the fight to the finish, and there is no conscriptionist who is more desirous than I am to win this war, although I am against conscription.

Very few English-speaking Canadians know anything of their French Canadian compatriots. To know them well one needs to live among them and to speak their language. Even then, if my English friend is not a psychologist or an observer, he will probably never have the occasion of knowing the feelings or sentiments of his neighbour on certain questions.

I very much doubt if many French Canadians, before the war, thoroughly analysed their own feelings towards the outside world and their sense of obligation towards it. "Know thyself," says the philosopher. This war will furnish to many the occasion for finding themselves. One is always likely to attribute to others his modes of thinking and his own sentiments. He may himself gradually, unconsciously at times, alter his own opinions, but he will always be somewhat surprised that his views are not held by everybody.

There was a call to arms in August, 1914. 33,000 men offered their services and were enlisted. When they had reached Valcartier the rumour began to circulate that there were very few French Canadians among them, and I met in many places Anglo-Canadians who were scandalized at such a poor showing on the part of my compatriots. I was told that the judgment of some of them was expressed in harsh, very harsh terms; but the resentment thus felt and expressed gradually vanished when it was learned that out of the 33,000 men in camp 28,000 were British-born, 4,000 British Canadian-born, and about 1,000 French Canadian-born.

The last figures given recently by the Department of Militia of enlisted men show 155,000 British-born and 125,000 British Canadian-born. If the latter had proportionately done as well as the British-born, he should have enlisted to the extent of 333,000 instead of 125,000. Why is there such a difference between those two groups, which claim the same ancestry, which are of the same blood? When you have found a satisfactory answer you will be in a frame of mind to understand the situation of the French Canadian. My contention is that all have enlisted in inverse ratio to the number of years which they have been in this country. The British-born has been here an average of ten years, the British Canadian-born about 60 to 70 years, the French Canadian over 250 years.

The French Canadian had already been a Canadian for over a hundred years when Canada was ceded to England by the treaty of Paris in 1763. He was called a Canadian by the French civil service and the military who came here for a time to direct the affairs of the colony. There were already between them divergences of opinion. Their points of view were not the same. The French left in 1763. The Canadians remained. Their French rulers went away and were replaced by English rulers. For the Canadians the newcomers were naturally foreigners. They had to put up with them and to resist their many encroachments and trespasses. In 1763 colonies were won to be exploited, and many of the newcomers were very exacting. The old Canadians defended themselves as best they could against the English. All contact between the French Canadians and their old mother country had absolutely ceased. Henceforth they would only turn their eyes towards Europe to protest against wrongs inflicted and to free themselves from Downing street rule. I will not recall the various features of this long-drawn struggle. They took up arms it is true, to protect their leaders against being jailed, but they also took up arms twice to repulse the invader. In 1849 Baldwin and Lafontaine at last obtained free parliamentary institutions, and from that date the Canadians of Quebec have attended to their own affairs and are perfectly happy. We have an old French saying: "Les peuples heureux n'ont pas d'histoire"—happy nations have no history. They have no history because history worth recording is generally that written in blood, and this is not conducive to happiness. Our people have lived happy and unknown. Canada was too weak to attract attention. It was such a negligible quantity that when Confederation was discussed and passed by the British Parliament we were told by prominent members of that Parliament that if we had asked for our independence we would as easily have obtained it. That was in 1866. Have you stopped to ask yourselves, honourable gentlemen, what had become of the French Canadian soul during that one hundred years which they passed under a foreign flag? They already were Canadians, mark you, in 1760. Their mother country, France, had dropped them here in the grip of a mother-in-law, and they struggled and fought for one hundred years to free themselves from European or Downing street control and misrule. Do you think that you will find them less Canadian and more European after that experience? They have, during that long period, laboured incessantly for liberty at home. All that they possess is here. No sentimental tie binds them to Europe. The link is solely political, and so insignificant in the eyes of many of the most important men of the colony in 1849 that they sign, both English and French, the famous annexation manifesto. Among the thousand names attached to that manifesto I will mention a future prime minister, Sir John Abbott, the Molsons of Montreal, the Mackays, Sir John Rose, Hon. L. H. Holton, Benjamin Holmes, Stanley Bagg, Charles Doherty, Edwin Atwater, John Bethune, K.C., Henry Bulmer, Edward Carter, K.C., John Cassidy, Theodore Hart, and Jacob Dewitt, M.P.P. The link binding Canada to Europe was so insignificant in 1866 that many statesmen in England expressed their readiness to sever the connection.

The Empire-builders were not yet born. Perhaps some of them were in the cradle, but certain it is that their voices had not yet crossed the ocean, for the province of Quebec would have then paused before taking a first step leading towards imperialism by entering Confederation.

Interest is the measure of men's actions where sentiment does not interfere. With the senior Canadians, neither sentiment nor interest draws them outside their own country. It is idle to look in many directions for an explanation. The greatest artisan of nature, time, is the principal agent responsible for the moulding of the national soul, under all climes. 250 years in the valley of the St. Lawrence have transformed a son of Normandy and Picardy into a Canadian exclusively, a change of allegiance undoubtedly also helping in that direction. Did it take longer for the sons of Normandy and Picardy who crossed the Channel with William the Bastard to become Englishmen?

Happy and unknown were my compatriots when, in 1899, they were somewhat startled by the loud appeals of the Imperialists, led by Chamberlain, for colonial help in the South African adventure. Up to that year there had been many academic discussions as to the possibility of creating an Imperial Federation wherein the Dominions would be favoured with the honour of contributing men and money for the defence and aggrandisement of the British Empire. Some conferences had already been held in London, but nothing of any definite character had been agreed to. Our South African contribution in men and money brought home to the Canadians the responsibilities which they would have to assume in the larger association suggested, and the Nationalist movement was the result of our first participation in foreign Imperial wars. The young men who joined that movement adopted a platform the first article of which reads as follows: "No participation by Canada in Imperial wars outside her territory." Many of them were journalists, and they neglected no occasion to formulate their doctrines and their aims through the many newspapers at their disposal and at public meetings. They had an opportunity, at a by-election held in Drummond and Arthabaska, to test the feelings of the province of Quebec after the Laurier Government had, in the session of 1910, carried through Parliament the Naval Act, which provided for the creation of a Canadian navy. This was a safe riding for the Liberal party by a margin of two thousand majority and more. A Nationalist candidate was brought forward who carried the constituency by 300. This Naval Act brought into full relief the two extreme conflicting currents of opinion in Canada. The Act was bad for the Tory Imperialists, because whenever war was declared it called for an Order in Council or a vote of Parliament to put the navy under the British Admiralty, while, according to that group, in every case it should automatically pass under British control. The Act was bad for the Nationalists, because the navy would be Canadian in time of peace and Imperial in time of war.

The result in Drummond and Arthabaska showed to the Opposition the trend of thought in Quebec and how the Laurier Government could be defeated. It was realized that the sentiment in that province was Canadian and not Imperial, and the Opposition, by agreement with the leader of the Nationalist party, Mr. Bourassa, gave the Nationalists a free hand in the French counties in the election of 1911. The campaign which followed had the effect of transforming into a concrete principle what had heretofore been but a latent sentiment. It is not my object to charge the Conservative party with the creation of an exclusively Canadian sentiment in my province in financing that campaign throughout; it is simply responsible for intensifying it and crystallizing the sentiment into a doctrine. The Nationalists had no money individually, and no party fund other than the moneys furnished to all of them by the Conservative party, and their needs were liberally provided for. Under the agreement entered into the Conservative party took charge of the English-speaking counties and the partly English and partly French counties —some eighteen in all—which remained under the immediate supervision of the Conservative organization represented by Sir Herbert Ames. The campaign in all of those counties was carried on along the same lines: the French were urged to overthrow the Laurier Government because of its naval and anti-Canadian policy, while the English-speaking electors were asked to vote against reciprocity because of its anti-British tendency. Sir Herbert Ames took from the electoral lists of those bilingual counties all the names and addresses of the French-speaking electors, and brought those lists to Mr. Bourassa's paper, Le Devoir, and paid for the service of that newspaper to those electors for the whole period of the elections. During six weeks all the counties of the province were thus appealed to. One of the main arguments heard against the Laurier naval policy was that it was the beginning of an Imperial organization which would inevitably lead to conscription, and that our young men would before long be embarked by force upon ships to go and fight upon the seven seas the battles of the Empire. The Liberal candidates gave their pledge that the Naval Act meant nothing of the kind—that enlistment in the navy, as in the army, was and would remain voluntary. Twenty-seven seats were carried in Quebec for the Conservative-Nationalist coalition with the cry: "No participation in Imperial wars! No Laurier navy nor Borden contribution to the British Admiralty!" Yes, Borden's policy was denounced vigorously by the men who on the morrow of the victory accepted portfolios from him without asking any explanation as to what was to be the naval policy of the coming Government. The Liberals carried 38 seats while proclaiming that the Canadian navy was but the development of the Canadian defence under the voluntary system of enlistment.

I recite these facts so that you may understand the mentality of the French Canadian. The Conservative party seemed to understand it thoroughly when it organized its campaign six years ago. It found a ready answer to them. Where were the leaders in that coalition leading to with diametrically divergent programmes? The ones, the many, were simply leading to power, the others, the few, towards their ideals. The idealist was the dupe of the materialist. According to Mr. Bourassa's official statement as to the basis of the coalition, the agreement was that the two parties should join their efforts to defeat the Laurier Government, and no permanent naval policy would be adopted without submission to the people. The Laurier Government was defeated, and the product of that coalition movement, the Borden Government, now submits a Conscription Bill without a reference to the people. It is quite useless to ask the question as to who is the dominant partner in that coalition Government. The Nationalist wing is at the vanishing point. When the present Government was being denounced for its hybrid formation during the debate on the demand for the building of three dreadnoughts, in 1913, the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not deny the coalition, but, pointing to the measure under discussion, he said: "Look at the child we have brought forth—it has no Nationalist features. As between Imperialists and Nationalists, who won?"

The victory had been an easy one, for most of the elected Nationalists were Conservatives who returned to the fold the day after the elections. But what about the electors who had been given the Nationalist doctrine and had accepted it? The Minister of Trade and Commerce could boast that Imperialism had won in the House of Commons, but must he not now confess that, with his co-operation and that of his party, Imperialism lost in the province of Quebec? "Anything to beat Laurier" had answered the same minister when he was asked his opinion on the Nationalist campaign in Drummond and Arthabaska.

Laurier was defeated by Nationalism supported and subsidized by Tory funds. When one has before him the above facts, he cannot but be amused at the daily tirades which he reads in the Conservative press against the slackers of Quebec? What is a slacker? It is the man who, hearing and feeling the call of duty, has not the courage or virility to answer it. This epithet does not cover the case of the man in Canada who takes no interest in European or African or Asian affairs, and who was persuaded some five years ago to go to the polls and vote against any participation by Canada in Imperial wars outside her territory. Was it not Sir John Willison, of the Toronto Evening News and of the London Times, who wired his congratulations to Mr. Bourassa on the night of the elections? How can a Conservative muster up enough courage to reproach a man on the very attitude which he urged him to assume through his subsidized Nationalist ally?

The Montreal Gazette on the 9th of this month preached a long and solemn lesson to the French Canadians of Quebec upon their duties in this war, and with feigned innocence asked if the province had not been bedevilled by its politicians. Again I repeat that the Nationalist movement did not create a sentiment in Quebec; it simply gave expression and body to it; and if I mention the Conservative party as having given its aid to that movement and as having helped to transform that sentiment into a creed, it is because a campaign of villification is being organized by that party against my province on this very question of the participation of Canada in European wars.

The Montreal Star has lately gone the length of suggesting that German money was possibly helping the anti-conscriptionist movement. It was made as an innocent guess. Against that surmise I will oppose a cold fact: the anti-conscriptionist movement received its greatest impetus at the last general elections, when candidates were lined up throughout the province of Quebec to uphold the principle that Canada should not participate in Imperial wars outside its territory. The principal owner of the Montreal Star was very much interested in the outcome of those elections, and he subscribed liberally to the Conservative-Nationalist alliance. And in the last days of that struggle Sir Hugh Graham, who has always been a most generous contributor to the Conservative party, added out of his own pocket a supplement of $2,000 to each of the 20 counties which seemed most likely to be swayed to the Tory-Nationalist column. These counties, so I am informed, were all being contested by Nationalists. In this case it was Conservative and not German money which was at the back of the anti-conscription movement.

That campaign of education, which culminated in the elections of 1911, had a special and stronger effect on one class of our population which I must specially emphasise. I have so far spoken of the French Canadians in general. I desire to speak of the young men coming out of college, of the university students, of that generation which came into intellectual contact with the world during the last decade. We all know the profound impression which our first emotions and preferences make upon our mind and soul. The young man of twenty, whose interest is concentrated within the boundaries of his own country, readily answers the question when he is asked: "Will you consent to furnish cannon fodder for objects with which your own country is not concerned?" This is the very question which has been put to him during the last fifteen years, and which he answered in the negative when he went to the polls in 1911 and voted for Nationalist candidates; and he meant to make a similar answer when he voted for the Liberal candidates and a Canadian navy.

I may be asked at this point: "Has not this young man been stirred by the Germans' monstrous pretensions and actions? Has he no concern for the survival of democracy and of liberty?" Yes, he was stirred by these events, and all his sympathies went towards the Allies just to the same extent as the democracy to the south of us was stirred. Mr. James M. Beck, in his address to the Pilgrims of London last summer, stated that all the thinking Americans were strongly pro-Ally from the outset, but that the nation had been a pacifist nation for a century, and it was thoroughly convinced that it had nothing to do with European entanglements. The Americans were not ready, mentally or materially, to go to war. Such was the situation of the French Canadian race. Yet when war was declared many young men came forward and offered their services. No regiment stood in need of officers or men, and I verily believe that we should have gradually made a better showing if the bilingual question had not, in 1915, taken an acute form in Ontario. It was seized upon by the doctrinaires of the Nationalist movement as an argument against enlistment for service abroad to defend the small nationalities when our own people were being oppressed at home. I simply mention this incident as a factor which tended to dampen enthusiasm. At the same time munition factories were being opened and a call for labour was heard. More than 100,000 French Canadians are engaged in munition work, and our rural parts have been since clamouring for help.

The situation of my province would not be completely explained if I did not add that the recruiting campaign was directed by the Department of Militia under Sir Sam Hughes, who knew nothing of the province of Quebec. Men were chosen to raise regiments who should never have been selected. While the English commandants were generally men of influence and of wealth, who could command the necessary funds for the recruiting campaign, the French officers chosen were too often young men with no influence and no substance.

My conviction is that the French Canadian enlistments will be found to total 18,000, if not 20,000. I should have been most happy if they had doubled that figure, but when I realize their situation I need only state it as an explanation and not as an apology.

The state of mind of the French Canadian which I have described to you, and its unpreparedness to answer the call, are not peculiar to my province. The recruiting figures in the other provinces show it eloquently. If we except the British-born, who furnished 50 per cent of their available men between the ages of 18 and 45, we find that the British Canadian-born have given less than 20 per cent of their available men of the same class; and we have the admission from many members of Parliament who support this Bill that if it were submitted to the people, a majority of their electors would most likely vote against it, just as was the case in Australia.

I am not surprised to hear such statements when I read what takes place in England. The Daily Telegraph, a responsible paper, was speaking in May last as follows:

> There may be various reasons for the apparent slackness, some of them local in their character, others of more extended application; but it is a lamentable fact that even now in certain parts of Britain there is not a sufficiently acute realization of what it means to be involved in a tremendous Continental war. Even in London one sometimes wonders whether all classes of the population make any attempt to understand the far reaching issues of the great European conflict, and the very fact that we are spared all the horrors of an invasion, that we do not see before our eyes ruin and desolation overtaking our fairest cities, helps atrophy our sensitive nerves. We acknowledge with our lips the portentous menace, but our hearts remain unaffected, as though war were some incredible thing not entering within the circle of our daily thoughts and occupations. It is this spirit of apathy against which we have still to fight at home. We believe that many things will tend to dissipate it; above all, perhaps, the scarcity of food supplies, a fact which comes home to the business and bosoms of all members of the community. Apart from this, however, there is, we fear, a degree of selfishness at the bottom of our negligence.

If these facts are exact, we are deprived of the right to throw stones at the Canadians, for they have done wonderfully, when their situation is realized.

I desire now to address myself to the measure itself. I am opposed to it because I deem it not only unnecessary but harmful. Although Canada was a young nation hardly on its feet, with comparatively little accumulated wealth—a debtor nation—it was unanimous in its decision to join Great Britain and the Allies. We all felt the cause to be a just one. We were not directly concerned, nor remotely responsible. We never were in the race for more territory or spheres of influence or world domination, and yet we were all happy to be able to do our bit for the cause of liberty and justice. We were drawn into war through sentiment only. What was to be our effort? All that our hearts would dictate and our means would allow. We did not begin, as we should have done, by examining our possibilities in men and money. We plunged into the war without looking ahead. We never asked ourselves what was the number of men we could send into the trenches and maintain there throughout. Even to this day the Government has not stopped to work out that problem. When we had equipped and sent forth our first contingent, a prominent Conservative journalist from Montreal came to me to suggest that Sir Wilfrid urge the Government to send 100,000 men. He thought the country could go that length. We have gone beyond 400,000, and he now calls for conscription in a most extravagant way.

"The last man and the last dollar" is a figure of rhetoric which some people feign to take seriously. The ordinary sober-minded Canadian is not affected by that species of hysteria. He wants to help all he can, and he believes that he can do it without bankrupting the country. We have made an extraordinary showing, and we are already bearing a formidable burden. We can continue to appeal for men to join voluntarily, and we will gradually reach the 500,000, which is the limit fixed by this Bill. No special effort, however, should be made to that end presently. We can as effectively help the Allies by organizing our productive forces during the next twelve months.

I am met here with the cry oft-repeated that we must support our boys at the front, that they call for help in the trenches, and will we abandon them? Let us see what this means and where it leads us to if taken literally. Are we bound to replace a Canadian soldier with a Canadian soldier? If so, will not the same rule apply when we have 500,000 men enlisted, or 1,000,000? There must come a time when we will be no more able to do so. If this young country had said at the outset, "Our contribution in men will be 300,000," the Allies, English and French, would have greeted this announcement with the greatest enthusiasm. This figure represented more than the French before the war expected from Great Britain alone for the protection of Belgium.

We will reach, at a certain point, our maximum. It is fatal, and this necessity sets at naught this other coined phrase uttered by the unthinking: "We have not gone into this war under the limited liability principle."

The present Bill disposes of this catchy phrase. It limits our effort in men to 500,000, and it exempts many classes of citizens from serving at the front. This legislation recognizes that there are other means of helping than through military service. Food and munitions are as valuable as men, and our last man will not necessarily go into the trenches. And yet it is affirmed that our boys cry for more men. They will get that needed support, and it will come from North America.

"What do you mean?" exclaims Dr. Clark; "you will accept the humiliation of seeing our boys supported or replaced by Americans?" You have already my answer. If we had reached the figure of 500,000, or 1,000,000 if you will, we would have to submit to that so-called humiliation. We would submit to it just as the French submitted to England taking part of their line and trenches; just as the British and French will gladly shorten their lines to make place for the newcomers, be they Portuguese, North or South Americans. We are all but one family in the allied camp.

An hon. SENATOR: Black sheep.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, I find there are black sheep in every fold. Each nation brings its contribution according to its power and situation, and when a small nation like Canada has directed the best of its efforts for well nigh three years towards the prosecution of the war, and has incurred stupendous financial obligations, is it an humiliation to allow its big, wealthy and powerful neighbour who just comes in to furnish its first quota of men, which, standing at 1,500,000, will only represent a quarter of our contribution in men? 500,000 of them will be ready sooner than our last 100,000 men can be raised under this Bill.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What harm is there in collecting the men, even if they are not going to be used?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have just stated that I would not specially hurry to gather that 100,000 men.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The election will make loafers of them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What does France officially say to-day to the Americans? "Hurry up and send us your men in order that we may withdraw from the trenches 100,000 soldiers who are reaching the age limit, and whom we need for food production."

What did we say ourselves to the Americans? Our Government has been, during the last winter, advertising in the American press for 50,000 farm hands, promising them special homesteading facilities and complete exemption from military service. The Americans joined in the war on the 2nd of April, and then closed their frontier. They cannot furnish us the 50,000 needed men because they must raise an army to be sent to France. Are we not all working together to the same end? We are pooling our divers organizations. London, Paris and Washington have linked their fortunes, and are helping each other as if they were but one. What does it matter if, after we have contributed our 400,000 men without the co-operation of our neighbours, they, in their turn, contribute 1,500,000 while we organize our productive forces? 400,000 men were raised here in the north, and now the south starts moving. We are co-ordinating our divers services. The shipping facilities are limited. Ships are apportioned to transport food, munitions, and men. The same transports which would carry our men will carry our American comrades-in-arms. How long will it take to ship 1,500,000 men across the Atlantic after they have been enlisted and trained?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Is that the only objection to conscription?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, it is not the only objection to conscription. I will give my honourable friend something more in a few moments.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I have never heard any; I would like to hear some.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will give my honourable friend more. I have told him I will be sincere and candid, and I will be.

Verily, I have looked in vain for an explanation for that new policy sprung upon us when that immense reservoir of men was just offering itself. These are some of the reasons which justify me in declaring that this Conscription Bill is unnecessary.

I have to add that it is harmful. It threatens the unity of the nation, and it weakens the effect of our splendid contribution in the eyes of the world. The first duty of a government is to so act as to maintain harmony within the nation. It is a glorious deed to help to establish peace throughout the world, but it must not be at the cost of regrettable divisions and conflicts at home. It has been Canada's misfortune that in these critical times we have not had at the helm one of the fathers of Confederation, or one of their contemporaries, whose experience would have steered the ship of state through safe channels. I venture to affirm that a John A. Macdonald or a Charles Tupper would have steered clear of conscription because of their knowledge of the varied soul of the Canadian nation. Devoted as he was to British ideals, Sir John A. Macdonald knew that the essential duty devolving upon a prime minister of Canada was first to help to forge a Canadian ideal and a Canadian soul. To rend the nation asunder is not, cannot be, the part of its Government. It is the elementary duty of our leaders to recognize and respect certain fundamental differences of opinion and convictions in the nation. We are a federation which came into being by the free will of two distinct peoples. This fact stands out as a guide and as a warning.

This country cannot easily stand the comparison with another country. It has an old population which first opened and colonized it. For more than a century that population has lived in a state of complete peace of mind, in the intimate conviction that no menace of war could ever disturb its serenity. Its thoughts have been exclusively directed to Canadian interests. All of a sudden it is asked to join in a world war which is raging three thousand miles away. You will not be surprised if that population is slow in understanding the vast problems which are being solved, and the interest they, as Canadians, must take in them. Many are those among the newcomers who are in the same state of mind throughout Canada, more especially in the rural parts.

Then, again, Canada claims an autonomous life. Tens of thousands have come here from all parts of Europe with the intention of settling permanently in Canada. They have left Europe to free themselves from many burdens, and in order to establish their families in a free and peaceful country, and all of a sudden we ask them to return to Europe to fight the battles of the Empire. I agree that under the circumstances it is fair to ask them to help in this all-important struggle, but I have no hesitation in saying that it is impolitic to coerce them—and all the more so when there is no dire necessity for doing so.

I may be answered that the United States fairly presents the same physiognomy as that of Canada and that conscription has been decreed there. I will fairly and squarely state the distinction which I make. The United States is an independent nation; Canada is not.

Some hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Nonsense.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Did they have any referendum?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman speaks of nonsense. Will he get up on his feet and answer my remarks?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Yes, indeed, and I will have plenty of room, too.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The American's interest and patriotism are one and undivided. He knows that when he goes to war he is fighting for himself, and that he has gone voluntarily into it. Not so with the Canadian. He may find himself at war for causes which his conscience would not accept. In my lifetime I have been at that situation. Two men destined to become Prime Ministers of Great Britain—and one of the two is now at the helm—felt as I feel. So long as we continue in that state of dependency I will resist the creation of such a dangerous principle. I owe it to the Anglo-Canadian to tell him that on this question my vista is surely clearer than his own. He believes that he is a free agent, as free as I am. He is mistaken. He thinks that conscription, and contribution in money as in men, will only be voted when Canada deems it opportune and so decides through its Parliament. My opinion, based upon experience, is that my Anglo-Canadian friend will be an easy prey to the wiles of a determined group with imperialistic tendencies which may for a time hold sway in the British Parliament. The immense prestige which the men at the helm in England at all times enjoy in the eyes of the innocent and confiding colonial to whom distance lends enchantment, and the formidable influence which they can and do exercise over our newspaper editors and others through the lavish bestowal of titles, make it a necessity that we should create no such dangerous precedent as the establishment of conscription in this dependency. It is because I desire to retain over these lands of ours the British flag that I will not be a party to the creation of the impression that we can in future be relied upon to contribute cannon-fodder for adventures interesting British commerce exclusively.

These are questions which I would have much preferred treating in times of peace, but I have not the choice of the hour.

When this war is over it is admitted that a great effort will be made to reorganize the Empire on some different basis. The last Imperial conference has officially stated that the readjustment of the constitutional relations of the component parts of the Empire should form the subject of a special Imperial conference to be summoned as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities. That conference also expressed its view that the Dominions should have an adequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations. If Canada endorses that principle, it will have to recognize at the same time its joint responsibility for any decision which may lead the Empire into war in any of the four corners of the world. The majority in Canada may decide to form such a close partnership, and may be able, for a time, to load a dissenting minority with a share of the financial burdens which such a partnership will involve, but I deem it my duty to tell the adepts of Imperialism that conscription is the worst possible introduction they could make of their policy to the electorate of Canada. The Canadian people may, without wincing or crying aloud, consent to bear taxation for causes in which they do not clearly discern any material Canadian interest, but I have not much doubt of their frame of mind on the day they will be conscripted in order to obtain for Great Britain a sphere of influence in Mesopotamia or in Persia.

The war we are now waging is one which interests all mankind. It may end in such a way as to insure peace and justice to humanity for all time to come. If such is the outcome, the relations of Canada with the Empire may be more easily settled. In the meantime, let us strive to maintain unity in the nation, in the Canadian nation, by mutual forbearance. Let us never forget that we are all here to stay, and that, nolens volens, we must together work out our national destiny.

I cannot conceive that the Government would think of bringing this Act into force before consulting the people. A minority will always accept the will of the majority, but it has the absolute right to know that there is a majority behind such an important Act as this one. The Prime Minister recognized that this claim was not illogical nor injudicious, since he agreed to a submission of this Bill to the people after its adoption by a coalition government. If it were judicious so to act with a coalition government, how much more is it not when proposed by a party government.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Poirier, the debate was adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Wednesday, August 1, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

STATISTICS OF EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to ask my honourable friend the leader of the Government, if he could give us more particulars than he gave yesterday about the number of men at the front and the number of men in England. My attention has been called to the fact that the figures given by the honourable gentleman are not very intelligible. Could not my honourable friend give us further statistics or a more detailed explanatory statement?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will indicate what he desires, I will try to give him the information. It seemed to me that the figures which I gave yesterday summarized fairly well, for all the purposes of this debate, the information that would be needed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: But in adding the figures we do not come to the same result as that reached by the honourable gentleman.. There is a difference of 4,000, I think; but in a war like this perhaps that does not count.

MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND HON. MR. BOSTOCK'S AMENDMENT.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I should like to ask the honourable leader of the Government if he can give us a more positive or clearer answer than he gave yesterday to the question which was put by the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power). The honourable leader of the Government said that, so far as he was concerned, as soon as the ink of the Governor General's signature to the Military Service Bill was dry the Act would be enforced. Afterwards he hesitated to repeat that statement, and a little later the honourable and venerable gentleman from Belleville (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) said that the honourable leader of the Government must have spoken for himself. It is very important, before proceeding with the Bill, at least so far as I am concerned, to know if the answer given by the honourable gentleman yesterday was his personal opinion, or if since yesterday he has had occasion to meet his colleagues and if his answer is corroborated by them, especially by the Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, and if he is now in a position to say that the Military Service Bill will be put into force—to repeat his own words —as soon as the ink of the signature of the Governor General to this Bill is dry.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the honourable gentleman will read the Bill he will be able to conclude, or should be able to conclude, what the effect of the Bill will be.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Excuse me. I have read the Bill——

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am now speaking upon the question and am in order. This is an important matter, and I desire to have the information. If I do not receive it I will move the adjournment of the House. I wish to have an answer, yes or no—whether or not the honourable gentleman yesterday spoke in his own name, and whether or not the Government repudiates that answer. I will go further. I was informed last night by a prominent Tory, a member of the other House, that the honourable leader of the Government was not authorized by the Government to answer as he did.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I rise to a point of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Choquette) is in order. He wants information for the country. What is the matter? Why is the information not given to him?

The Hon the SPEAKER: An answer was given by the honourable leader of the Government, and, whatever it may be, the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Choquette) has no right to speak after the reply is given.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: He got an answer that was not acceptable.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am not discussing the opinion of His Honour the Speaker; but there was no answer, and I am insisting on an answer.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I should like to know if the honourable gentleman will not answer.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You cannot bulldoze this side of the House—not yet. When you get the House sufficiently packed, you may be able to do so, but not now.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Sir James Lougheed, that Bill 75, an Act respecting Military Service, be now read a second time, and the motion of the Hon. Mr. Bostock in amendment thereto:

> That the following words be added after the word "time":
> "With the understanding that this Bill will not come into force until after the general election."

Hon. PASCAL POIRIER: Honourable gentlemen, when the House adjourned last night, my honourable friend from de Lorimier, as a last argument in his eloquent speech, told us that by opposing the Military Bill now before us, he was simply showing his greater love for the Empire; that by keeping our young men at home to harvest our fields he was working in the interests of the Allies better than by forcing them to enlist. This species of argument reminds me of the story of Ugolin of Pisa, during the wars between the Guelfs and the Ghibellines, in Italy. He was taken prisoner with his two sons by his enemies, and thrown into a dungeon, there to die by hunger. After a couple of weeks his captor went down with some friends to see what had become of his starved enemy. He found him alive and in good shape. "Where are your sons," he said to him. "I ate them," was the reply. "And why did you eat them?" he asked. "Because I loved them. I ate them to keep their father alive." This, by reversing the roles, is the sort of love my honourable friend bears to England and France. He will let them perish if only Canada is prosperous and content, and his friends are in power.

My honourable friend made a long, and, in less momentous times, interesting incursion into the history of the province of Quebec. What bearing has all this past history on the urgent requirements of this moment? Are we going to do as the Byzantines did when the Turks besieged Constantinople, their capitol—keep discussing controverted points of history, or some unfathomable attribute of divinity? While they kept arguing and fighting among themselves, the Turks took Constantinople, and have held it ever since to this day. It is folly to discuss the quality of water when the house is afire. Any water will do. You will analyse that water after the flames are put down and your house is saved; but begin by putting out the fire and saving your house; bring the water first.

Another argument was put forward by the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) which failed to impress me. It is this, and he built a scale upon it. Our citizens enlist in this war in inverse ratio to the duration of their sojourn in Canada. For example, among English-born citizens, 50 per cent of eligible young men have enlisted, because they have but lately settled here; about 17 per cent of the English Canadian-born have enlisted because the English have been longer in Canada, some for a century and a half. The reason why French Canadian-born are slower to join the colours is because our forefathers have been here from the beginning, some 300 years ago. If there is anything in this argument it is that the longer one stays in Canada the denser one becomes. This is a doubtful compliment to the pioneers of Canada. The habitant might well say in the present instance, "O Lord, deliver me from my friends." Let me try to put in a word for them in order to put them right before the English-speaking public.

If their response to the call of arms has not been, if statistics be true, as numerous as that of the English-speaking inhabitants, it is not because, having lived in Canada two or three hundred years, their intellect has become slow; it is not that the beating of their heart is less generous; it is not that they are unwilling; it is not that they love Canada less than their English-speaking fellow-citizens do. It is because they have been misguided. And by whom? Here I would refrain from going into details. But misguided they have been; and it is a pity that through this misguidance they should now stand somewhat compromised before the world. I do not belong to the province of Quebec, but I know its habitants well, and respect them and love them, and let me say this, in answer to the inference that may be drawn from the speech of my honourable friend from De Lorimier. No keener-witted peasants are to be met with in the whole Dominion than in the province of Quebec; none more intelligent; none more sober; none more moral and law-abiding; none more willing; none more patriotic; none braver. Look at them at Vimy Ridge and more especially at Courcelette. A French officer, witnessing their gallantry at the latter engagement, could not refrain from exclaiming: "Oh, the brave boys! The best among our soldiers could not do better." This, honourable gentlemen, is the stuff the French-Canadian habitant is made of. The French habitants have been maligned, I should say slandered, by the honourable senator from de Lorimier, in some other passages of his speech. It is not true, as stated, that Sir Hugh Graham in 1911 did, or could, buy 20 counties in the province of Quebec at $2,000 apiece.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I never said so.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Yes, you did; you insinuated it.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: The House so understood it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If my honourable friend will read my remarks, he will see that I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: Does the honourable gentleman take it back?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will not take back what I have never said. I said that gentleman had subscribed; I did not say that he had carried the counties.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: So much the better. I am glad to hear the explanation I am now getting from my honourable friend; but, verily, I understood his remarks to be as I now state.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I did not say that he had even carried the counties. He attempted it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Withdraw.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: Venality, most unfortunately, exists in all parts of Canada, in all parts of the world; but it exists in the rural counties of Quebec, among the habitants, possibly less than anywhere else in Canada, or than anywhere else in the world. They do not love war—but they will fight and fight well for country and Empire, if called upon in the right way to fight. Nor do you likely, honourable gentlemen, nor do I certainly, love war.

By nature, by reason, by religious conviction, I am opposed to murder, and consequently to war, which is murder on a larger scale.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Poor theology, that.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: As a consequence of this I am opposed, on principle, to conscription, as it is understood in Germany, because conscription is a perpetual preparation for offensive acts of violence. But, on the other hand, if a murderer attacks me and makes attempts upon my life, I will defend that life of mine to the full extent of my power. If that enemy, or a number of them assail my home with foul designs of wrecking it, and of ruining the beloved ones that dwell within it, then, if there is no other way of saving my home and self, of protecting my wife and children, I will turn, for purposes of legitimate protection, a man of blood. Such is exactly my position concerning forced military service, or conscription, to-day. On principle, I am opposed to preparing, by conscription or otherwise, young men and old, and training them to works of carnage, and making homicide a permanent human calling, a vocation, an institution. But, since my country is assailed, and all I hold sacred under the sun is threatened with violence and destruction; as countries endeared to my heart are also invaded and threatened with destruction; as democracy and liberty are at stake; as civilization now perilously hangs in the balance; I repudiate all my former pacific professions, and with the Marseillaise I clamour, "Aux armes, citoyens!"

A promise, nay an oath, to do what is wrong is not binding on one's conscience when that wrong is later on discovered. Neither is a promise to abstain from doing one's duty binding. Duty is paramount—duty to God; duty to country; duty to fellow men.

The honourable leader of the Opposition in this House said yesterday that Sir Robert Borden, at the beginning of hostilities, had said there would be no conscription and that he is now breaking his pledge by the introduction of this Bill. Because Sir Robert Borden, at the beginning of this terrible war, said on one occasion that he would, if possible, save Canada from conscription, is he now to be held strictly to that declaration? Let me illustrate. Because the chief of the Ottawa fire brigade, at the beginning of a fire, says, "We will call out but one or two companies," is he going, if the flames make headway and conflagration threatens the whole city with destruction, to refrain from calling the whole brigade, because he thought at the beginning he would not have to, and because he said so? If for these or similar reasons he did abstain from calling out the whole brigade, he would simply prove himself not equal to the trust imposed on him. If to keep an indiscreet word, if for vanity he allows the city of Ottawa to be destroyed, he is criminally guilty; he is something worse—a blooming lunatic, or a religious fanatic. We have in French a saying that covers this case of lunacy: "l'homme absurde est celui qui ne change jamais.'" If instead of the fire chief himself it is the surrounding crowd or mob who opposes the calling out of the whole brigade, of all the resources of the city of Ottawa, when the whole brigade, when all the available resources are needed, and at once, to save the city, the roles are merely reversed, but the obligation remains the same. Why, because I have publicly declared that I am a peaceable man, will I allow those of my kin and blood to be defiled and murdered before my eyes, without making an effort, a supreme effort, to save their honour and their lives? I will not rise to defend my benefactors, my countrymen, my friends, because, forsooth, I have declared myself a man of peace?

All the good reasons, all the justifications, all the excuses I may give for not doing what it is my human duty to do, may delude me and my crowd; but they will not delude other men; they will not deceive future historians.

It is to be regretted that in this controversy some orators, mostly outside of the precincts of this Chamber, have gone beyond the issues raised, and have assigned motives to and assailed the good faith and honest intentions of men differing from them in opinion. Personal attacks upon Sir Robert Borden have been particularly regrettable. Now, I hold no brief for defending Sir Robert Borden; he is well capable of defending himself, and if he is too proud to do it, his deeds will take care of him. I have only to say to my compatriots that when certain facts now hidden are revealed, when for example, the history of the formation of his first cabinet is known, the traducers of Sir Robert Borden will be forced to acknowledge that in those trying hours he showed himself and proved himself to be their most enlightened and best friend. He is the same enlightened and trusted friend of those of my creed and race to-day. His constructive work is now obscured by haze and mist and clouds, but when the sky becomes clear again he will be shown to all to be a totally different man from what he is represented to be by some extremists.

The world to-day is waging a war for which there is no equal in the annals of the world, saving possibly two—the Crusades and the invasion of Greece by the Persians. The Crusades were religious wars, the fighting for supremacy between Islam and Christendom. The invasion of democratic Greece, of Athens and Sparta, by the absolute kings of the east, was a war parallel to the present one, where republican France and democratic England are assailed by autocratic Germany, and all the reactionary powers of the world. History is likely to repeat itself. The flower of the Persian hordes was beaten at Marathon by the Athenian army of Miltiades, practically alone, just as the one million and a half of picked Teutons were lifted off their feet, beaten and hurled back by Joffre and the French at the battle of the Marne. Then came the invasion of Lacedemon and the penetration of the Thermopylae Pass by the three million men composing the army of Xerxes. Everything seemed lost; the Athenians deserted and burnt their beautiful city, and the whole of the peninsula prepared to die fighting for country and liberty.

What saved Greece and civilization at that time? The naval battle at Salamis, won by Themistocles over the Persians. May we not hope and expect another Salamis naval victory to be won by proud England, determining the fate of this war? The fleet of England is protecting the whole world to-day, including the United States and Canada, and saving it.

Honourable gentlemen, when this war is over, and the battle is won, and the world finally saved, accounts will have to be rendered; there will be a reckoning. The book of deeds will be open to the whole universe. What sort of a page will the pacifists, will the slackers, will the quitters, will the sinkers show? By slackers I mean no particular section of Canada, but all of them; and there are some in each and every province of the Dominion—English slackers, Scotch slackers, Irish slackers, French Canadian slackers, French Acadian slackers. If you want to know, go back and see what became of the Greek shirkers at the time of the invasion of their country and allied countries by the Persians. What remains of the grandiloquent speeches of their Agora demagogues? What is thought now, and what was thought then, of the reasons they put forward for not fighting alongside the soldiers of Miltiades at Marathon, or those of Leonidas at the Thermopylæ, or for not taking part in the naval battle of Salamis? Nothing remains of them but oblivion and shame. The same will be the fate of our deserters if there should happen to be any in Canada.

Many reasons have been given for Canada discontinuing its participation in the war. I find none that is not dominated by this warning of the Lord of Hosts: "He alone will be successful who perseveres unto the end." In sporting parlance, they have another way of putting it: "A quitter is a licked dog."

We are plunged into this war, honourable gentlemen, our swords deep to the hilt in blood. Canada went into it freely, deliberately, unanimously, Tories and Grits agreeing; the records of both Houses bear this out. Are we going to quit now, when the crisis is supreme? Will the leaders of the ring order our Canadian fighters to go to their corners, letting our allies—French, English, Americans, Australians, Italians—fight our battle, the battle of civilization? A blush rises to my forehead at the thought.

But let us examine some of the reasons that were given out to persuade us to desert the rest of the civilized world now fighting for freedom and liberty, abandoning at the same time our heroic soldiers now at the front who, one and all, are calling for further help.

"This is England's war," I hear it shouted; "let England fight out its own battles, and fight them without our participation; we owe nothing to England." We owe England nothing? These words sound strange in the mouth of a daughter colony, referring to its mother country. Even had Great Britain not granted us the federal charter which has made Canada practically an autonomous country; which has made us all free citizens in a free country, she all the while protecting our first attempts at walking alone among the nations of the world; these words, "We owe nothing to England," would still sound strange. There is a ring of unnatural ingratitude in them. If we in Canada owe nothing to England, the rest of the civilized world owes it their civil and political liberties. They alone deny this debt of gratitude who have not tasted true liberty, who have not drank its wine, who, knowing nothing of its intoxication, have no craving for it. These are more to be pitied than angered at. We owe nothing to England? Why, if England and France fall, the struggle for freedom will have once more to be fought over again along the old lines, against the old-time tyrants and usurpers, and another Cromwell will have to be resuscitated, when the measure of oppression is once more full to overflowing; and the horrors of the French revolution will have to be repeated, and the citizens of the United States will have to fight again, not to liberate the negroes, but to free themselves from the bondage of militarism.

But who says that this is England's war? Did England declare this war? Did it prepare it, or prepare itself for it? Did it desire or provoke it? It is needless to recall what everybody knows. This war was forced on England by confederate Germany arrogantly starting on the conquest of the world, for which it had been preparing since 1872. The Hun plan of campaign, which is becoming better known, was to stagger France by a first fell blow, invade England by way of Calais, take Canada—which no Munroe doctrine could have defended—and make of this magnificent country the premier Hun colony, while the same wave of conquest would have flooded the Balkans down south to Bagdad.

The mighty fleet of England has rendered vain this hellish design, has saved us from German domination, has preserved for us our heritage of human freedom and political liberty. Who will say after this that Canada owes nothing to Great Britain?

So much for old England. The same has been said of France, and worse. He who says that we owe nothing to France, that humanity owes her nothing, might as well say that we owe nothing to the sun which illumines the heavens; that its light is offensive, because it dazzles; that its heat is dangerous, because it burns. And true enough, some species in creation shun heat; to the owl light is offensive; it prefers to it the darkness of night. "If all European nations had to perish except one, and that one were to be chosen for being the best fitted to continue civilization, that one would be France." This I quote from an American author. "Every man has two countries, his own and France." Who first uttered this laconism? An Austrian statesman, long before this war.

France and England stand to-day hand in hand at the head of human progress. With the United States they are the guardians of human rights and liberties. But of the three France perhaps is the most lovable. France, better than any other nation, either ancient or modern, has taught the meaning and shown the value of the words: chivalry, glory, liberty, honour. These constitute true civilization and true Christianity. She is among the nations of to-day what Greece was in olden times; she has the soul of frivolous, esthetic, heroic Greece; while in Great Britain dwells the spirit of ancient Rome. The two, England and France, are necessary; God has apparently made them necessary. Let France and England cease to-day leading nations onward, and freedom will shriek and human progress will soon come to a standstill. If they be replaced by the Prussians, if the torch were to pass into the hands of Kaisers and Sultans, then higher civilization would be disrupted; humanity would turn its face backward; tyranny and darkness would once again enshroud the world just as they did in the fifth and sixth centuries, when Attila and the Huns, sires of Kaiser William and of his subjects, succeeded in destroying Rome and overrunning Europe.

We owe nothing to France? The principles for which France stands are not worth fighting for? But look at what the French nation did three years ago, when practically alone on the western frontier, she stemmed the flood of Prussian invasion. Look at what she has been doing ever since; look at what she is doing now. The entire world is amazed at the sight. Had the battle of the Marne been lost, or had the French, after winning it, deserted their allies, and concluded peace with Germany, then the Kaiser would have walked untramelled over Russia, in the east; and, in the west, he would have brought a million men and more to Calais; would have strewn the North Sea with mines just as he is doing around the island of Heligoland; would have planted along the northern shores of France and Belgium long-range canons which he was then alone to possess; would have made the strait of Dover less secure for ships than that of Gallipoli; and when the mighty and otherwise unconquerable English fleet would have been immobilized and rendered powerless to dislodge the Germans from Calais, then, with the aerial fleet of Zeppelins in readiness, the invasion of unprepared England would have been consummated. Consider, if you can without a shudder, what would have happened to Canada, the United States being at that time even less prepared than England was. And you say we owe nothing to France!

Strangely enough, the victory of the Marne is but a repetition of what France has, in centuries past, on more than one occasion, done to save Europe from barbarians when all human resources and hopes were apparently gone. At Soissons and at Tobiac she saved Europe from the Huns just as she is saving it to-day, and at Poitiers Charles Martel hurled back the Saracens and Turks in their victorious march over Christian Europe. It is for these and other similar deeds that a poet has said:

The soul of France is like a torch
That goes before the nations.
Glory has crowned her; truth has made her strong;
Her soul is freedom, and her name is song!

France at this moment is bleeding from wounds all over her body; she is bled white. Two millions of her sons have perished; as many more are wounded; she is using her last reserves; when Joffre came to Montreal and was asked what the Allies stood more pressingly in need of, he answered, "Men."

The other day, when the American contingent marched through the streets of Paris, children, orphaned by the war, knelt in reverence to the American flag, thanking, with tears, the great American republic for sending men over. Are we Canadians not morally bound to do all we can possibly do to help these heroic and silent defenders of Canada in Europe—to save them, and to do it quickly?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER.

But Canada is not at war, I hear a great many people say, and this war for which we are bleeding blood and money is not our war; it is none of our funeral. It would be folly to try to convince a blind man of the existence of light, more especially if he has made up his mind not to be convinced.

Germany's aim and plan, honourable gentlemen, was primarily to get possession of the colonies of Great Britain and France, and more especially of the Dominion of Canada, after England had been invaded by way of Calais and reduced to submission. As late as the week before last a supreme effort was made to break through the Yser river and reach Calais. Even to-day, when the Allied victories at the Marne and at Ypres have shattered these hopes, the Junkers of Prussia still cherish the old dream.

Speaking about the indemnity they intend to exact from England after the war is over, Prince Frederick of Lowenstein recently, at Munich, proposed as an installment the cession of Canada to the fatherland.

One of the many excellent reasons why Germany so ardently covets this our fair Dominion of Canada is to be found in the following lines of the Rhenish Westfalische Zeitung of late publication:

Germany will claim Canada as an indemnity of war, because this will permit the German Americans to shake the dust of the United States off their feet and pass across the line to Canada, where they would live under the folds of the German flag.

But the yell is heard: "We will fight and die when Canada is actually invaded." Canada, honourable gentlemen, is actually invaded. Our fighting lines, on land, are Flanders and the North of France; on the waters, they are the North sea and the Mediterranean. Would ye rather have them at Halifax, or Quebec, and wait till then to fight? Following this same logic, New Brunswick might say, after Halifax was blockaded by the German fleet, "We are willing to fight, but we will wait till St. John or Moncton is attacked;" and when St. John and Moncton were besieged, Quebec would shout, "We are ready to fight and die, but only when Quebec is actually invaded;" and when the glorious old city of Quebec was invaded, Toronto would clamour, "Wait until Ottawa is assailed and then, by jingo, we will show them what Scots and Loyalists can do;" and when the holy city of Toronto is in the throes of Hun aggression, Winnipeg and Vancouver will sit unconcerned, because war has not been carried yet as far as the wild and woolly West.

This plea is a criminally absurd plea. If we wait until the shores of Canada are invaded, it will be too late; Canada and all our hopes will be gone irretrievably. As the Dominion of Canada is a political unit, made out of and diversified by several distinct elements, I will take up one of those elements, the French, and from among the French I will deal more particularly with the ethnical group to which I belong, the French Acadians. I need not and will not refer any more to the French Canadians. The descendants of the heroes of Chateauguay can well take care of themselves. Their history contains many, if not most, of the glorious pages in the annals of old and new Canada. En passant, let me regret that the proposition of my honourable friend the senator for Montmagny (Hon. Mr. Choquette) to establish a commission to review the finding of the Department of Militia, has not been agreed to. The figure 14,100, which is given out as being the total number of French-speaking-born soldiers who have enlisted in this war seems to be much below the reality. According to the statistics of the Militia Department 6,750 only, or less than one-half of these, hail from the province of Quebec. This seems to be erroneous. Many French Canadians, possibly thousands of them, having English surnames, were put down by the department as of English or Scotch or Irish extraction and nationality, who in reality are French. The same natural error has no doubt been made in the count of the Acadians, amongst whom we have Johnsons, O'Briens, Caissy, McWilliams, Young, White, Parry, etc., with not a drop of English blood in their veins. These were put down respectively as English, Scotch and Irish. Some, unfortunately too large a number, of Acadians, have taken English names upon enlisting. I will cite one case. Some nine months after the declaration of war a cablegram came with the news that a Shediac lad, by the name of Patterson, had been dangerously wounded and was being sent home. We knew of no soldier of that name having enlisted at Shediac; however, we prepared to receive him well. On his coming out of the train it was found out that the hero Patterson was an Acadian by the name of Petitpas. If you, honourable gentlemen, take into consideration that the proportion of recruits is greater in cities than in rural districts, and that, except for minor towns, the Acadians are mostly peasants, you will arrive at the conclusion that those of my nationality in the Maritime Provinces have done fairly well. We have one Acadian battalion, the 165th, and in some English battalions 30 or 40 per cent of Acadians are to be found in New Brunswick alone.

I heard it said, or read in an English paper, that in Prince Edward Island my compatriots had taken the cake, had beaten the record, stood on top of the list. Bravo for them! And why not? While the English, and Scotch, and Irish and Welsh of this Dominion have one good reason to fight in this war, we French have two. Not that we love England more than the Loyalists or the Scots do. We Acadians might well love it less or love it not at all, if we were to go back to 1755 and recall the horrors of the deportation and spoliation of our forefathers. But we do not go back to 1755, except for matters historical. As a philosopher has put it, human eyes have been placed in the forehead that men may look forward and onward and upward.

The generations of to-day are not necessarily responsible for what generations have done centuries ago; nor, in the affairs of to-day, is the whole Empire to suffer because we may have faults to find with a few—because some of our rights are denied us. What we Acadians in the Maritime Provinces look to and expect at the hands of the English majority is fair play, meted out to us with a liberal hand, in return for our absolute loyalty to them and to the Crown. We either have fair play now or have it not. If we have it, we will make it more secure and permanent by doing our full duty as British subjects and Canadian citizens. If we have it not, our refusal or hesitation in doing our full duty at this moment of supreme crisis will simply make it more difficult to obtain, at the hands of the majority, in school matters and other matters.

This is merely a digression. The other motive, the double motive, the Acadians have for joining the colours is because, alongside England, there stands beloved and beautiful France, land of our ancestors, prostrate, reeking in blood, terrible. It will not be said that when England, Italy, Serbia, Montenegro, Rumania, Russia, South Africa, Australia, New Zealand, Greece, San Marino, Portugal, Cuba, Panama, Japan, the Fiji Islanders, the Siamese, the United States of America, the savages of the United States, our own Canadian Indians, are joining in a common effort to repel the Huns, liberate Belgium, save France and civilization, Acadia, the oldest of the French colonies on this continent, will sit silent, indifferent, unconcerned. If no one else from Canada would volunteer to join the colours and cross over to the gory plains of France, we of French origin should. This war is pre-eminently a Latin war. It is a struggle for supremacy between the Huns on the one side and the Latins, the Saxon-Celts and Slavs on the other. It is also a religious war in the widest sense of the word religion, Prussia representing brutal Christianity and the rest of the world humane Christianity.

My present attitude, honourable gentlemen, and coming vote on this question, is not wholly one of political partisanship. It is one of deep conviction, born of the duty I owe to my country, of the allegiance I have sworn to my King; it is innate in my French heart. Others, more prominent in the Maritime Provinces, took the same attitude at the beginning of the war; in fact, the leading Acadians in New Brunswick, in Nova Scotia, in Prince Edward Island, did so. Some, and more particularly the late Chief Justice, Sir Pierre Landry, the leading spirit among those of my nationality, at the beginning of the war, not only called upon his compatriots and countrymen to enlist, but also upon the Dominion Government asking for laws making conscription compulsory.

Shortly after war had been declared Mgr. LeBlanc, the Acadian Bishop of St. John, N.B., at a public meeting of citizens of all creeds and nationalities and political preferences, made a most impressive appeal to his people and to all Canadian peoples to enlist and to fight. And to fight for what? Listen:

> For England, our mother land, and France the land of our ancestors, the two nations that are in the fire front of civilization and human liberty.

Among other reasons for enlisting, he gave the following:

> As Canadians, our cause is bound up with the cause of Great Britain; her interests are our interests; if England falls, we are going to fall with her, and we are going to lose all the glorious privileges we enjoy. Canada, now so free, Canada that has such a brilliant future before her, will be reduced to a condition of vassalage..
> Failure for England in this war will mean England's destruction.

These words, honourable gentlemen, were uttered shortly after the battle of the Marne, but before our victory at Ypres. We had at that time just lost a naval engagement off the Chilean coast. His lordship, continuing, said:

> Our hope is in our young men. There is still enough patriotism and heroism in the young men of this province (New Brunswick) to make a supreme effort now for England's cause.

These ringing appeals for recruits ring with even greater force to-day, at this final and supreme crisis, than at the beginning of the war:

> Young men of New Brunswick, we appeal to you not to allow Britain, to whom we are indebted for our civil and religious beliefs, for our just laws, and for the protection and prosperity that we enjoy, to have her very existence imperiled without striking a blow in her defence. To-night from over the seas is wafted to us the cry of the Motherland: More men, more men! It is England's call to arms. Let every man, who is willing to heed that cry, enlist.

With my bishop, I will say to all Canadians, but more particularly to those of my blood and kin:

> Go forth to battle now, while the future of Canada is being fought for on the plains and river banks of France. Let the spirit of patriotism prompt you to say: "England never was nor ever shall lie at the proud foot of a conqueror."

These are, honourable gentlemen, some of the reasons to-day why all Canadians should rise to a man and make a final superhuman effort to win this war. There are other motives less lofty. These will appeal to the Canadian taxpayers, to those who hold that business is business, who say that Borden is ruining this country. This war will come to an end, and will be wound up in some sort of peace treaty. The Allies will either win or lose or make a draw of it. If we should lose, then God help us; we might as well be where the Kaiser is going, where the butcher of Belgium is gone. If we win, peace will be based on victory, and to the victor belongs the spoils. Leaving the other Allies to look out for themselves, England will no doubt hold what she has won in South Africa. Lloyd George gave it so to be understood the other day. She will take back Heligoland, with which she never should have parted; she may also send the German fleet to the bottom of the North sea, either before or after the terms of peace are signed.

But think ye that she will forget her colonies? What will be Canada's share in the compensation and reparations Germany will be condemned to make, if the treaty of peace is based on victory? It will not and cannot consist of territory; it will be in money, in making Germany refund to us the one thousand million dollars we shall have spent helping to defeat the common enemy. If we want to be refunded our money, we must win this war; and to win it is necessary that the Allies, all the Allies, persevere with might and main to the end. Let not the example of Russia be followed in Canada, brought about by similar internal and external causes.

There remains this third angle to the triangle—a stalemate peace, a draw. If this war ends in a draw, let Canada prepare, not for one call to arms, but for permanent conscription. Germany will at once prepare for another invasion of the world, and the world will have to be ready to repel that invasion. It is because I am opposed to permanent conscription that I am in favour of the Bill that is now before us. Let us have this one application of the law of conscription, so that we may save our children and our children's children from having permanent conscription forced upon them. Let us spare Canada conscription for all time by voluntarily or otherwise submitting to or enforcing conscription for this one time, and doing it at once.

Hon. W. C. EDWARDS: Honourable gentlemen, having no romance in my nature, I shall have to try to give you a few commonplace facts. Making the same apology to this honourable House which I made when I addressed it three weeks ago, I will endeavour to deal for a short time with the question which is before the House. I shall deal with it perhaps differently from any other member, because I intend to discuss it more particularly from the economic point of view.

This question should be approached in moderation. It is a very delicate and very important question, and should be dealt with on its merits, and not politically.

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: My honourable friends say, "Hear, hear," but I should like them to confirm that expression by their actions.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: It shows that they approve of the honourable gentleman's statement.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Well, I should like to be sure that they do approve of it. As I have said, the question should be dealt with on its merits and not from any political consideration or bias. The whole question, not only of conscription, but the whole question of the war, is a very important one, perhaps the most important that has ever engaged or ever will engage the attention of Canada. I think I may claim that there are not two opinions in Canada as to the merits of this war and the part which Canada should take in it; but Canada, like the other countries engaged in the war, has her limitations, and I am much afraid that, with the exaggerated idea which Canadians have of the resources and capacities of this country, Canada has undertaken more than she can perform. If any one had suggested three or four years ago that it was possible for Canada to send to Europe 500,000 men, the statement would have staggered any Canadian, and, in my humble opinion, the idea of sending 500,000 men should never have been suggested, for it will be discovered before two years have passed that it is impossible for Canada to maintain such a position. The suggestion of 500,000 men being sent to the front was made by a visionary of Toronto, the leader of the Liberal Opposition in the provincial legislature. That honourable gentleman must never have studied Canada, her resources or her possibilities, or he would not have made such a suggestion.

In computing the number of men who may be spared by any country for military purposes, it is customary to allow a certain percentage of the total population, and it is a common practice, in making that calculation, to compare Canada with Great Britain or France, or sometimes Belgium; but there should be no comparison at all between Canada and those countries. In Canada, because of her sparse population, more men are required to perform our undertakings than would be required in any of those densely-populated countries. A statement was made before one of the committees of this House a short time ago that of the 7,000,000 people in Canada, 500,000 are engaged in railway occupations. I can hardly believe that statement; but if out of our population, which certainly does not exceed 7,000,000, any number approaching 500,000 are engaged in railroading alone, we can well understand what a great number of men are required to carry out all other undertakings in which Canada is engaged. It is not at all possible, I repeat, for a sparsely-settled country like Canada to send from her shores as many soldiers as a densely-populated country.

Then there is another consideration. Up to the present Canada has been a very large borrowing country. She cannot stand the same strain as a lending country such as Britain or France; it is perfectly impossible. In the consideration of this question we have to think of her economic and financial capacity; and I say again it is simply insane—and I have no other word for it—to suggest that we can send the number of men suggested to engage in this war. Again, so far as that is concerned, this country has never committed itself to sending 500,000 men. The Prime Minister, I understand, on a New Year's day, supplemented the suggestion of the visionary from Ontario that Canada should send 500,000 men. No such suggestion was made by the Government or Parliament of Canada. I submit it is a mistake, and I now make the prophecy that it will be found to have been a fatal mistake, as far as Canada is concerned.

When an honourable gentleman last year spoke to some extent adversely of recruiting to the extent to which it was being done, I then felt as I feel now, and meant to follow him; but because of the exaggerated way in which he dealt with the question I did not feel at liberty to follow him, for I did not want to be put exactly in the same category as the one in which he placed himself. I then foresaw, and foresaw before that time, the famine that I claim is going to overtake the world; because if you take men from the productive forces of the world and engage them in military exploits to the extent that is now done, there can be no other result; and it is just as necessary to supply food and the other war requisites to the Allies as it is to send men. I claim that we are on the verge of a greater danger as regards food supplies than we are as regards the supply of men. The United States is now engaged in this unhappy and terrible war; and I take it that that great country, which up to the present time has made enormous sums of money out of the war is going apart from that consideration to do its duty in this war; and if that country does its duty in the supply of men to the same extent as Canada, she will send between 6,500,000 and 7,000,000 men to the front. If that is the case, is it not ridiculous for the Canadian people to suggest going far and away beyond their possibilities when that great country is obligated just as much as Canada is to supply its quota of men? The statement which I will now make may not be accepted by honourable gentlemen on either side of the House; but I say that Canada's obligation in this war is precisely what the obligation of the United States is, no more and no less.

While I speak as I do, I join with all Canadians in their general desire, without regard to section or province, to do everything that can be done for the prosecution and termination of this unhappy conflict; and I know of no dissenting voice from that desire except perhaps from a very few firebrands. But the question is, what are the best means? I claim that the means now suggested are not the best means, and that, instead of assisting in the prosecution of this war, they will be a detriment and an injury to the prosecution of it, as I will try to show later on.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Has conscription been a detriment and an injury in England, where six million men have been raised?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: As to that question, I will endeavour to show later on that the cases are not at all parallel.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: And France, and Italy, and Germany?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: When this unfortunate war broke out and it was determined that Canada should take part in it, I was one of those strongly opposed to any such thing as an election during the time of the war. I believed that such would be a mistake, and I think the majority of Canadians felt that way. Conditions are such that I have changed my mind on that question—and I want it perfectly understood that I am not following any party, but I am speaking my own independent views according to the dictates of my own conscience.

When the Conscription Bill was brought down in the Commons, the Journal newspaper called me up and asked me if I had anything to say on that measure. I replied that I had not, that I would be called upon in my place in this House to say what I thought of it, and that it would be premature at that time to say anything. I was then asked if I would mind saying whether I was in favour of or opposed to the principle of conscription. I replied at once: "I am absolutely opposed to the principle of conscription." As to the extension of the term of Parliament, I firmly believed that it was undesirable to have an election during the period of the war; but at the same time I believed just as firmly that immediately war was declared the Premier should have invited the strongest and most capable men he could find in Canada to come to his councils under the difficult conditions that obtained. In that respect I thought a mistake had been made. I thought that what France did should have been followed here; that, disregarding parties, the Premier should have obtained the strongest and most capable men he could find to come to the councils of the nation.

At the present session the question of a union government was suggested. The statement that I am now about to make will, I know, horrify perhaps both Houses, but I cannot help making it. The House of Commons, as constituted to-day, has not among its members, taking both sides, half a dozen men who should be in the Government under present conditions. There are more men sitting in this Chamber possessing the necessary experience—and I exclude myself from that number—to enable them to conduct the affairs of Canada than there are in the House of Commons. The reason for that is that in both political parties the question of party advantage is more studied, continuously and forever, than the great questions that should be studied by every deliberative body. Since Confederation we have had in Canada two strong governments—the government formed at Confederation, and the Government formed in 1896; but neither of those great governments possessed men capable of meeting the requirements of Canada under existing conditions. Parliaments such as we have had in the past cannot cope with the conditions that will face Canada in the future. Legislattion of an absolutely different character will be required if Canada is ever to recover from the terrible position of distress in which she will be placed in consequence of this war. The men required for the future will be men of strong, business calibre, men who understand and are capable of large things. In business undertakings, in Canada and every other country, a very limited number of men ever become capable of taking hold of the administration of large affairs; but it is a common thing for men of no consequence, with no experience whatever, to be placed at the head of the administration of the great departments of the Canadian Government. That may have been possible under past conditions, and we have struggled along; but for the future it will be impossible; and I say that nothing can save Canada from destruction but the administration of its affairs by the strongest and ablest men that Canada possesses.

I have said that I have changed my mind on the question of the extension of the term of Parliament. I am not speaking from a party standpoint. I am frank in saying that, while I am a democrat and a radical, I have no politics whatever in this Chamber; If I were in the Commons I might have a different view of things; but here, I am thankful to say, I have not. Since I entered this Chamber, I have dealt with every question on its merits, without any political consideration, and I will do so while I sit here. But I have changed my mind in the matter of the extension of Parliament, for the reason which I have given, and for this further reason, that so far as my observation goes the Canadian people generally feel that the present administration is incapable of administering, and that there should be an election—and I have heard this a great deal more frequently from Conservatives than from Liberals. Well, there is going to be an election, and I have not the slightest knowledge as to who is likely to win; but, unless the leader who is successful at the election chooses the strongest business men obtainable to assist him in administering the affairs of this country, absolutely irrespective of whether they are from the elected or not, then I say his Government will be a failure. But I make this prediction, that, no matter what happens, you will have in Canada a quick succession of changes of government for some time in the future: no government can administer for any length of time; for I am convinced that the people to-day are dissatisfied and unsettled, and nothing will satisfy them but an election. For that reason, I have changed my view as to whether there should be an election now or not. Taking my own personal feeling, I am sorry that an election should be necessary; but the people of Canada demand it. Whether it be bad or good, an election is absolutely necessary at this time.

Now I come to what is perhaps the kernel of this question of conscription. A great deal has been said of loyalty. There are probably a great many men on both sides of politics who are in the habit of waving the flag and displaying their loyalty. I do not belong to that class. I am so certain that I am a good loyal Canadian Britisher that I do not require to do any such thing. In this country to-day there is a disposition to point to certain men and a certain province on that question of loyalty. My honourable friend the leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) said yesterday that he would not name the Province; but I will name it: it is the Province of Quebec. The finger of scorn is pointed at the province of Quebec, claiming that she is not loyal to Great Britain. I deny absolutely in the strongest terms that the province of Quebec is not loyal to Great Britain. That province is loyal to Great Britain; but she is not as loyal to France as she is to Great Britain, and I will give you the reason a little later. It is true that the province of Quebec has not volunteered to the same extent as the other provinces. I admit that, but there are many reasons for it. I have no doubt there are in that province a larger number of people who hold the views I personally entertain on the question of conscription. But, after all, the difference is only one of degree. It is nonsense to say that there are not throughout the other provinces of Canada many who are opposed on principle to conscription; and if there are a larger number in Quebec, it is only a question of degree. Quebec has sent thousands of men to the front, who are doing their duty there. Then why condemn the province of Quebec body and bones when the difference between that province and other provinces is only a question of degree? Quebec is a rural province; but the rural parts of Ontario have not responded to volunteering at all as the western provinces have done or as the cities and towns of Ontario have done, by any manner or means; and I venture to say that, if a referendum were submitted to the people, you would find that in the province of Ontario and in all the provinces there would be a large vote against conscription. As to whether it would carry or not I have no knowledge and therefore cannot say. As I have said, the population of Quebec is largely rural, and people are influenced largely by the education which they receive. In Canada there is a very considerable feeling that Canadians are under no obligation to serve outside their country. That view I have no doubt prevails in Quebec to a greater extent than in any of the other provinces. The people of Quebec have been educated to believe that service outside of Canada is voluntary.

There is another matter which I call to your attention. In considering the proportion of men who have been sent we must not overlook the fact that the families in the province of Quebec are about twice as large as those in Ontario; so that, if the proportions were properly calculated Quebec, in order to send her full quota should send to the front only about half or one-third as many men in proportion as Ontario.

I know the people of Quebec intimately; nobody in Canada knows them better, either in a business way, in a social way, or in any other way; and, with the exception of a few firebrands, I have yet to meet any French-Canadians who are not loyal British subjects. I have said that the people of Quebec are not as loyal to France as they are to Great Britain, and there is a good reason for it. It is many years since the forefathers of those who now live in Quebec came to Canada; there is no immigration to that province from France, and there is no association between the people of France and the people of that province. The leading citizens of Quebec visit Paris and are familiar with France and its conditions; but the habitant of Quebec knows nothing at all about France.

There is another matter relating to this question which must be considered. The clergy of Quebec have been largely instrumental in turning the sympathies of the people of Quebec against France because of conditions which I need not mention. The French Canadian people love Great Britain, there is no doubt about it, and they have given proof of that love in two of the wars in which Canada has been engaged. They love the freedom and the privileges of the British rule under which they live. There is a large section of our people, particularly in the province of Ontario, who do not know the French Canadian people as I know them, and who, in my humble opinion, are doing them an injustice on the language question. I think that if the people of Ontario understood the French Canadians of Quebec as I understand them, and if they had a greater number of French Canadians living among them, they would be a broader-minded people than they are. I am sorry to say it, but I think it is time that the people of the province of Ontario stopped pointing the finger of scorn at the province of Quebec. They think the French Canadians are an immoral people, they think they are an illiterate people, they think they are no people at all.

Some hon. SENATORS: No, no.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: What are the actual conditions? The standard of morality in the province of Quebec is higher than that of any other province in Canada. If any one wants proof of it, he can easily turn to page 653 of the Year Book and look at the list of convictions, imprisonments, and so forth, and he will find that what I say is borne out.

In all the learned professions Quebec stands quite the equal, and in some respects even the superior, of the great and proud province of Ontario, to which I myself belong. The people of Quebec are an agricultural people, a pastoral people, a law-abiding and peaceful people, and a people who naturally hate war; but, notwithstanding that, are they not a courageous people? If I were going on an expedition to the North, or on any expedition requiring endurance and skill, I would choose above all others French Canadians from the province of Quebec to accompany me. Let the consequences be bad or good, we will have to live together after this war is over. A large portion of the population of this country are French Canadians. They were here before we were, and we should consider them, and should cultivate a good understanding with them. The reverse is done. I would not repeat here some statements which I have heard made by very prominent men in this country as to what should happen and what may happen after this unfortunate war is over.

In the prosecution of this terrible war we want to carry out that which will produce the best results for Canada and the Empire, and I want to ask—because it is plainly indicated that this Conscription Bill is directed more at the province of Quebec than at any other province—I am sorry to say it—

Some hon. SENATORS: No, no.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Honourable gentlemen say no, but there is no question about it.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: How can it be?

Some hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I ask the permission of the Speaker. I want to ask in what particular is it indicated that this Bill is directed at any one province more than at another. I should like the honourable gentleman to explain how it is directed at the province of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: There is nothing in the Bill that indicates it; but the spirit of the Bill and the spirit of the speeches which have been made, indicate it clearly.

Some hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Which will contribute more to the welfare of this country and the Empire a united Canada or a divided Canada?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Who is dividing Canada?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I claim that the suggested conscription, instead of aiding in the prosecution of this war, will be destructive and hurtful to Canada and the Empire; and I regret excessively that this step is being taken, as a Canadian Britisher I do not desire that Canada should do less than her full duty in this war. As I have already said, Canada has undertaken far more than she can perform. Is it wise to diminish the productiveness of Canada at a time when Great Britain is dependent on the United States and Canada for her food supply?

We heard a speech yesterday in which an honourable gentleman made it appear that the result of this war was dependent upon the pittance of men that Canada could send to France. It is true that each country has to do its share; but all that can be added to what Canada has already done will not count for very much in bringing about the termination of the war, whereas the time will come when we shall be called upon to supply food, and therefore the people of this country should be engaged in production rather than in sending more men. A fatal mistake is being made. Volunteering is not absolutely at an end. It has lessened very much, and why? At the inception of this war, there were a large number of idle men in the West, and they all offered their services. $1.10 a day was the compensation offered; but wages have advanced enormously in this country consequent upon the war, and of course there is not the same incentive for enlistment today that there was. There is still an incentive, however, and I claim that greater good will accrue from the voluntary system than from conscription. I would rather have one volunteer than four or five men who are compelled to go to the front.

I wish to make a few remarks with regard to the speech of the honourable the leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) for whom I have the greatest respect and esteem. I will relate a little incident as to the motives of jingoes —I am not calling the honourable gentleman a jingoe—and their views. At the time of the Tercentenary in Quebec a few years ago, a dinner was given to Lord Roberts. I attended that dinner. A gentleman from Toronto sat at the opposite side of the table from me. Like all professional soldiers, Lord Roberts was not much of a speaker, but he did fairly well, and he expressed the pleasure that it afforded him to meet so many gentlemen who had participated with him in the South African war. He said he was quite sure that at any time when England was engaged in just wars Canada would participate. In a loud tone the Toronto gentleman said, "Just wars be damned," intimating, of course, that whether England was right or wrong, Canada would be with her. Well, honourable gentlemen, I may say for myself,—and I have striven to find the justification—that I have never found a justification for the South African war. In my humble opinion it is one of the blots on British history. I would not have sent men to participate in it. The present war is entirely different. Unquestionably this is a war in the interest of humanity and the liberties of the world. I am not prepared to subscribe to the statement that I would join in a war or have Canada join in a war unless it was a just war. The statement has been made that this war is Canada's war. I dissent absolutely from that. The right honourable the leader of the opposition in the other House has made that statement several times, but I do not agree with it. There is no question at all that Canada should do its part in this war; but I differ from my honourable friend who made the statement yesterday that those who were anti-conscriptionists were slackers and cowards. I and my family have perhaps more immediate connections engaged in this war than any other Canadian family. At least from twenty to twenty-five of my near relatives are taking part in it and as many of my close connections, and I venture to say that we have had more relatives killed than any other Canadian family. I am confident also that if I were a young man I would be there; but, while that is true, the idea of conscription is repulsive to my nature; it is inconsistent with Canadian ideas, and is a condition to which a dependency such as Canada is should not be subjected. Canada's obligation is a voluntary one, and the condition of volition which is extended to the country should be extended to the people who compose the country. The principle of conscription is wrong, and it will be found that it is a very serious mistake.

My honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) yesterday pronounced a doctrine from which I absolutely dissent. My doctrine, honourable gentlemen, is that the people are king, and must be king; and the suggestion of introducing into this country the very condition which we are supposed to be fighting against is something to which I cannot agree. I am sorry that my honourable friend—inadvertently, I presume, and not intentionally—made the statement that this Parliament, a Parliament existing to-day practically on suffrance, should take the responsibility of passing such a measure as this without submitting it to the people. Opposed to conscription as I am, and fundamentally opposed to it, if the people of Canada decide in favour of conscription, then I shall be for it, because I believe that the majority should rule; but I do not agree with the statement that a government such as the present one should assume the terrible responsibility of declaring that they are king and that the people of Canada are not king. I dissent, and dissent in the strongest terms, from any such declaration. No, honourable gentlemen; before any such law is put into effect the people should be consulted, and, whether it is right or wrong, the dictum of the people should prevail.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Will the honourable gentleman allow me a question? Is not the principle of conscription contained in the Militia Act, and has not that Act been in force almost since Confederation?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I would ask my honourable friend, when was it enforced?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Fortunately for Canada, there has never been any occasion for putting it into force.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: The Militia Act, of course, provides that every man in Canada may be called out for the defence of his country; but there is nothing in the Act which says he shall go 3,000 miles away.

Honourable gentlemen, I dissent, and dissent in the strongest terms, from the idea that Canada has been in danger of invasion during this war, or in danger of German oppression. I know that such statements have been made in the United States by responsible men, including an ex-president; but I cannot accept their views. This country is just as safe from invasion as the great American nation.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Well, she is not safe.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: No army in the world could be transported across the Atlantic and successfully invade that country. And just so long as that country is safe, this country is absolutely safe.

Some hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Honourable gentlemen, there are too many who do not think, never did think, and are not capable of thinking.

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Just before the outbreak of this war a book was written by a German showing the impossibility of Germany successfully invading Great Britain, because of the difficulty of transportation across a narrow channel only thirty miles wide. The transportation of troops for a successful invasion of the American continent is an absolute impossibility. It cannot be imagined for one moment that the great American republic could be suppressed and put under the rule of Germany. Why, it is absolutely an absurdity, a foolish absurdity; and, just so long as that nation is safe in that respect, I claim that Canada is also safe.

Honourable gentlemen, no greater mistake was ever made, in so far as the interests of Canada or the unity and welfare of the Empire are concerned, than this suggestion of enforcing conscription in Canada. I am unalterably opposed to it. If an amendment had not been moved, I was prepared to move, seconded by my honourable friend from Prince Edward Island, the six months hoist. I am willing to accept in lieu thereof the amendment which has been proposed, but it would have given me pleasure to move the motion which I have mentioned, much as I regret being obliged to vote against any Government measure. Honourable gentlemen, I am unalterably opposed to the principle of conscription, because I think it is detrimental to the best interests of Canada and of the Empire.

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. C. P. BEAUBIEN: Honourable gentlemen, my opening words really mean an appeal to you. These are trying times, politically. Many a man who feels the currents of public opinion in this country growing swifter and swifter every hour, knowing that some day those currents must clash, is conscious of a great weight on his heart. I will sincerely confess that I am one of these men. This is a time for a man to speak his whole mind. There are reasons to be given; there are truths that should be heard, and warnings also, and this Senate, it seems to me, is the haven created by Confederation for voices, which, perhaps, could not be heard in a storm of public opinion such as the one we are at present experiencing. I come to this haven. I well know that I have no particular qualifications for it, except this, which I claim, of absolute sincerity and a desire to do my full duty.

My honourable colleague from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has pictured to you the state of mind of the French Canadian from the province of Quebec as far as patriotism is concerned. He has shown him to you as being, by force of circumstances, practically limited in his patriotism to Canada, his own land, and he has said that this natural propensity has become a creed. Honourable gentlemen, I believe there is such a creed, such a gospel, in our country. That is the Nationalists' gospel. True it is that we ought to be first of all faithful to our own land.

But, honourable gentlemen, are there not other duties? I may be wrong, but I hold this—and I have heard it not only from Liberals and Conservatives, but from Nationalists: we have the duty of gratitude. In this country we have British institutions; are they worth nothing to us? To my mind they are worth a great deal. Indeed, I have heard my countrymen, time and again, say that there are no political institutions in the world to be compared to British institutions. Honourable gentlemen, I am far from being an Imperialist; I confess it candidly. I know that when England is at war de facto we must be at war; that is self-evident. But in regard to active participation, I think the nation has a right to be consulted and to decide for itself. It has done so in the past; it did so in 1914; and I hope it will ever do so in the future.

We have other and deeper reasons for gratitude to England. In 1914, when war was declared on France, there was a painful tightening of the heart-strings of every man in this country who has French blood in his veins. For three days we asked ourselves in the province of Quebec, "Will France be crushed, or will England come to the rescue?" There was no treaty between the two countries. Oh, I know that it was England's interest to enter into that war at that time; still there are great resources in diplomacy, and England might have avoided war. What did Sir Edward Grey say when he faced the British Parliament? He said: "You are not obliged to go to war; there is no treaty, secret or otherwise binding you; but it is for you Britishers to say whether you should stand shoulder to shoulder with France. Look in your heart and give the answer." The answer came, and I and most of the people of my race were grateful for that, and we will so remain,—and when I say that I do not think very many of my people will deny it.

There is still another reason why we owe a duty of gratitude to England. We have lived for the past three years in war; but has our territory been invaded? If not, why not? Is it not because the English fleet has defended us? Tell me, do we not live now under the protection of those mighty guns of the British fleet? True, the creed of my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Edwards) holds, that we are obliged to defend only our territory; but with the British fleet protecting us by its chain of mighty dreadnoughts and guns, if we had not sent our Expeditionary Force to France what would we have spent for our defence? Not one cent; not one man. Should it have been so? Let me answer by asking: Is this our war, or is it not? If it is not our war, then I understand that we might have told England to fight single-handed; but if this is our war, if we are truly and seriously and terribly menaced, I do think a jury of my own people in the province of Quebec, with all the facts put fairly before them, would say that we are bound to assume a full share of the common defence.

This brings to me to what my honourable colleague from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Edwards) has said. He has said that in this war Canada is not and never has been menaced —that Canada need not have feared conquest or aggression of any kind. Is that true?

Some hon. SENATORS: No.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: It was a very specious and very dangerous argument. The argument is simple and it seems forcible. My honourable friend said that the United States had an unlimited number of men, that they had all the fleets of the Allies to carry their men; and yet he said, if the United States, with all the fleets of the Allies at her disposal, can hardly send an army overseas, how can Germany do it? I will answer the question as best I can. No doubt my views will be contradicted, but they are my sincere convictions. In the newspapers we saw recently a very disturbing cablegram sent to the New York Times from London stating that the submarines had sunk 1,600,000 tons of shipping in one month. That statement proved to be erroneous; but the truth was that during that month there had been 600,000 tons of shipping lost through submarines. Mark the preface of the message, which was sent by Mr. Grasty to New York Times:

> Excluding steamers damaged or beached, but not sunk, raider losses or other losses, which the authorities deem it unwise to publish, shipping losses (actual sinkings) by U-boats for the first six months of 1917 were 3,507,257 tons, but at the present rate will exceed 7,000,000 for the year. The total losses, with the exceptions noted, from August, 1914, to July, 1917, were 7,706,291 tons.

Therefore, honourable gentlemen, up to the first of August present, 7,000,000 tons of the total world's tonnage of 40,000,000 tons had been sunk, and by the 1st of August, 1918, at least 14,000,000 tons, or more than one-third of the total shipping of the world, will have gone to the bottom of the sea. Mr. Grasty's message appeared to be so serious that the New York Times asked for confirmation from Arthur H. Pollen, a very prominent writer on naval matters, whose articles in "Land and Water" in London, caused radical reforms to be made in naval matters, and who subsequently was asked to go to Washington to advise the United States Government. What does Mr. Pollen say? He says that the probable sinkings will be between 700,000 to 750,000 tons each month. Further he says:

> If we are to be sure of inflicting military defeat on Germany we must first conquer the submarine. Conquering the submarine is an operation the right form of which has not yet been ascertained. It may be unattainable. If so, we must hope to beat Germany on land before our sea supplies give out. It is on the rightness of the American naval policy, on the swiftness and courage with which decisions are made, on the scale and inventiveness with which experiments are pushed forward that the attainment of victory and escape from defeat depend.

The New York Times says:

> Whether German submarines are destroying 1,600,000 tons of shipping every month, or 1,000,000, or half of 1,000,000 tons, the danger, not merely to the people of England but to the whole cause of the Allies and of democracy, is too great to be ignored for a single moment. Least of all, can we in the United States be pardoned if we shut our eyes to the extreme gravity of the submarine menace.

On June 29 Lloyd George said:

> Victory is assured, under two conditions. The first is that the German submarine attacks must be defeated or kept within reasonable bounds.

What does that last phrase mean? It means either that the sinkings must be reduced or that the construction of new boats must be increased. What is the rate at which boats and submarines are being constructed? This is what Mr. Grasty says:

> To arrive at conditions one year from now at the present rate of destruction and new construction, add 1,500,000 tons to the present total of shipping and subtract 7,000,000 tons.

Lloyd George recently sounded a more optimistic note. He said that next year

Britain would construct 4,000,000 tons of ships. Very good. What about Germany? The Germans now have 200 submarines operating in the Atlantic. How many do you think they build in a week? The average production is four a week. How many do you think they lose in a week? The average is one. What conclusion is to be drawn from these figures? The conclusion is that at the end of a year the number of submarines will have been about doubled and the shipping tonnage of the world will have been reduced by at least one-third.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend allow me to ask him what is the source of his information?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Certainly. I find that in a newspaper. It is in a despatch from Washington coming directly from the American Government. I do not think there is any doubt as to its authenticity.

Now, in answer to the new chancellor, Lloyd George has lately said, that if Germany thought she could either starve England or stop the efforts of her army she was sadly mistaken. He said there was every reason to believe that the number of submarine sinkings would be reduced. What is the latest news? We find on the 26th of July that in the last week on record, submarines have sunk 21 ships of over 1,600 tons, instead of 14, which was the number sunk during the previous week. This is an increase of fifty per cent in one week. That is the condition of things on the Atlantic.

What is the condition on land? Honourable gentlemen know as well as I do what it is. I do not want to enlarge upon it. Every one in his heart feels that the hopes of the Allies have been crushed this year by Russia's retreat. From day to day, from week to week, from month to month, everybody has been expecting a crushing offensive. We have been waiting for it a long time, but it has not come. Why? Because nearly all the German armies of the Eastern front have been mobilized against the Allies on the Western front. Is it possible for a nation of 160,000,000 people, struggling in the throes of a revolution, to keep its armies together and to exact from them the greatest of sacrifices? You can answer that question as well as I. What is the opinion of Mr. Bonar Law on this question? This is a report of some of his remarks on July 27:

The speech of Andrew Bonar Law, the Government leader in the House, dealt largely with the Russian crisis. He said that all the nations engaged were staggering under the blow, but that the resources of the Allies were sufficient to make it absolutely certain that unless their hearts failed them, they must secure the results for which they entered the war. The struggle had reached the point where it was a question of staying power, and in this matter he had absolute confidence in the Allies. He was equally certain that if anything could delay peace, it would be any sign of faltering.

It seems to me, that for the time being at least, Germany is holding its own and more than its own. Gentlemen, what would be the result if Germany, freed from pressure on the East, should crush the French and British armies? What would be the result, think you, if Germany should enslave France as she has enslaved Belgium? Germany is to-day using 7,000,000 Belgian people. They are working for her, making submarines and preparing munitions and guns for the war. What would be the result, think you, if she conquered France and used 38,000,000 more people to work for her? How many submarines would be produced every week? How many months would it take to sink the rest of the British fleet? How many weeks would it take to starve England into submission?

Honourable gentlemen, do not think that I am saying this without serious consideration. If my voice does not appeal to you, let me give you an authority that I think you will listen to with deference. Mr. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury in the American Government, lately said:

We have always been an unarmed nation because we felt that we were secure. Our love of democracy has been so great that we did not want to take even a chance of militarism. We can no longer delude ourselves. Do you know what would happen if Germany should be victorious, as she would be if she could bring France and England to their knees? She would take the entire British and French fleets, release her own great fleet, which has been tied up in the Baltic during the war, and combining these with the most destructive submarine fleet on earth—because she has it—she would come here and put the iron heel of conqueror upon your shores. We should have to fall back to the interior, and there is no telling how long it would take to expel the enemy, if we ever did. If we could not do it promptly, do you know what would happen to America? We should have to make the most humiliating terms that any great nation ever made to get peace. We should have to pay an indemnity that would represent probably half of the wealth of America, which is $250,000,000,000, and you would have taxation upon your shoulders to meet that indemnity for a century to come.

I am not trying to alarm you. It is not my purpose to exaggerate. I would not misrepresent. I only want to make you realize, if you do not already realize, that you are in the midst of one of the greatest wars of all time. Because you are not actually contiguous to it in a physical sense as the nations of Europe are, do not think that you are not concerned and that your future security and safety are not immediately involved. This is something you must realize if you would know what to do in the present situation.

I will next quote from an article written by a remarkable man, Mr. Wilfley, the Attorney General of the United States in the Philippines, the following:

We are at war with Germany because our independent existence as a nation is at stake. We are at war for the reason that if the French Republic and the British Empire are brought down, probably we will be forced to pay an indemnity of $25,000,000,000, which would involve our paying tribute to Germany for a generation at least and result in making that nation the most colossal empire the world has known. It is Germany's purpose, if her publicists are to be believed, to make us foot the bills of this war if she can. It is certain that should France and England be slain and Europe Prussianized our fate would be sealed.

We are fighting to guarantee, forever, our right to exercise free and absolute sovereignty over our own land—unrestricted, unhampered, and unproscribed by any foreign power. Victory to our cause undoubtedly will guarantee the independent existence of other nations, but it is a mistake to say that our main purpose in entering this war is to spread democracy throughout the world.

The time has come for plain speaking and candid dealing with the fundamental, essential things that control men's motives and direct their actions and cause them to fight. The quicker our people are made to realize that they are fighting for the most sacred and vital things of their existence—their homes, their fortunes, their freedom, and the independence of their nation—the better it will be for all of us and for those who are to come after us.

On July 14, President Wilson said:

The facts are patent to all the world, and nowhere are they more plainly seen than in the United States, where we are accustomed to deal with facts and not sophistries: and the great fact that stands out above all the rest is that this is a people's war, a war for freedom and justice and self-government amongst all the nations of the world, a war to make the world safe for the peoples who live upon it and have made it their own, the German peoples included; and that with us rests the choice to break through all these hypocrisies and patent cheats and masks of brute force and help set the world free, or else stand aside and let it be dominated a long age through by sheer weight of arms and the arbitrary choises of self constituted masters, by the nation which can maintain the biggest army and the most irresistible armaments—a power to which the world has afforded no parallel and in the face of which political freedom must wither and perish.

Honourable gentlemen, that is a great man speaking to a great people. The people of the United States, who number 110,000,000 and possess untold wealth, do not need to listen to mere political talk. They have already adopted conscription; there is no need to appeal to them for voluntary enlistments. It seems to me that a great man like Wilson, talking at this time to his people, perhaps the most powerful and the most wealthy in the world, must be speaking the truth. Every word that falls from his lips is pregnant with the warning of the danger that he sees, the danger against which he desires, if possible, to protect his country.

A great French writer, one of the greatest philosophers of our time, Bergson, has said of this war: "There are bees which sting their victims and paralyze them before they capture them. What if Germany should take Paris or London, the nerve centres of the two countries?" When I was in France last summer I heard from people who knew, what Germany had determined to do with Paris. She had cut that immense city, the metropolis, I may say, of the intelligence of the world, into seven big sections, and it was decreed that when Paris was taken by the Huns, France should receive the notification, "Either you must quit, or one-seventh of the city will be destroyed"; and a torch would have lit the four corners of that first section, and everything that the genius of man had erected there during unnumbered generations of the finest people in the world would have gone up in smoke, just as Louvain and Rheims have been destroyed by the Huns, without the slightest hesitation or remorse. Then another notification would come to the French people: "You know what has happened? Do you want a repetition of it?" And after a given time the torch would again be applied; and so forth, until either Paris was no more or the French people had lost their liberty.

Honourable gentlemen, may I cite another authority? I feel that I ought to do so—that I must strengthen as much as possible the arguments I am laying before you. I am conscious of my own weakness; so I crave your indulgence and the privilege of trespassing on your patience while I refer you to these authorities. They plead much better than I could ever do. What does Sir George Paish, the first man to be called in by Lloyd-George after the outbreak of war—what does he say? Let me read you his remarks as they appeared in The Statist:

If, instead of bothering with Paris, Germany had struck at once with all her ability against Calais she might have seized the port, and if she had done so it was quite upon the cards that she might shortly afterwards either have seized London or else utterly destroyed it.

I have one last witness to quote. You have heard him. The echo of his eloquence still vibrates in this building. What did M. Viviani say—another great man, coming from a great nation, a man who knows, and who can speak the truth?

You Canadians who listen to me, you freemen who sit in this Parliament, pray mark my words. I realize that you are farther away than we are from the battlefields; the roar of guns does not reach your ears; you do not see the return of large numbers of wounded men; but morally speaking, you are just as close as we are to the fray. Confronting one another we have autocracy and democracy, and should, perchance, the freemen fail to win the war, democracy and universal justice would be defeated at the same time. It was in the cause of justice that at all epochs we drew the sword; it was in the cause of justice that Great Britain and France, together with their noble Allies, entered the war; it is to enable the children of men to enjoy after the war the advantages of a well assured and prolonged peace that we are fighting.

Mothers who now listen to me, it is for your children's freedom, it is to prevent the recurrence of any wars and to secure the peace of the world, that a whole generation is now giving its blood, and making to-day the supreme sacrifice.

Honourable gentlemen, the conclusion that comes forcibly to my mind—I wish I could repel it, but I cannot—is that we are menaced like France. Not at the same time; that is the only distinction. If France is conquered to-day, we shall not be conquered to-day; that is true; but what of tomorrow? If France is slain, what of us? Have we any special privilege to protect us? What is it that marked the poor people of the north of France for all the slavery and all the atrocities which they have suffered? What is it that distinguished the poor Belgians, who are now crushed so utterly that the whole world is horror stricken? Nothing. Their homes have been destroyed, their houses burned, their children shot like rabbits. What of our hearths and our homes, our families and our children? Is there anything to protect them? I cannot see that our fate would be different. Where is the man big enough to stand up alone in this country and say in reply to Mr. McAdoo, "you have a population of 110,000,000 people behind you, with unlimited wealth and resources, you are furnishing the Allies with guns and ammunition; you must be wrong in your apprehension." Where is the man who is big enough, in this age of big men, to stand up before President Wilson and tell him that he is wrong? If there is danger threatening the United States, how much truer is it of Canada? In this haven where, as the current of public opinion stops at the door, my voice can be heard, let me say this: How much greater would be the danger for my own dear province of Quebec, where a four-inch gun, brought up the river, could slay half its population? Who would bear the first blows? What would be the first targets for the guns rushing up the river, if not the steeples of our churches, if not our public institutions, our convents and colleges? Am I wrong or am I right? I wish sincerely that I were wrong, but I cannot come to that conclusion.

There is another article of that creed. You men of experience in politics, you who have held crowds spellbound, you can truly estimate the value of a captious argument. The argument is: "We are menaced? That is your conclusion. It is, you say, the conclusion of great men? Well, then, tell us, in the name of all that is sacred, why, if we are menaced, why do you send our men and our guns out of our country instead of keeping them at home?" Honourable gentlemen, I do not intend to answer that question myself. Again I call upon a big witness from the south. This is what Mr. Lansing said on the 30th of July, with reference to that argument:

Saying that the "future of the United States is at stake," Mr. Lansing continued, if any of you have the idea that we are fighting others' battles and not our own, the sooner he gets away from that idea the better it will be for him, the better it will be for all of us.

Imagine Germany victor in Europe because the United States remained neutral! Who then, think you, would be the next victim of those who are seeking to be masters of the whole earth? Would not this country, with its enormous wealth, arouse the cupidity of an impoverished, though triumphant Germany? Do you think that they would withhold their hand from so rich a prize?

Let me then ask you, would it be easier or wiser for this country single-handed, to resist a German Empire flushed with victory and with great armies and navies at its command, than to unite with the brave enemies of that Empire in ending now for all time this menace to our future?

Primarily, then, every man, who crosses the ocean to fight on foreign soil against the armies of the German Emperor goes forth to fight for his country and for the preservation of those things for which our forefathers were willing to die.

I think that is a complete answer, and should be accepted, coming as it does from the Secretary of State of the United States.

Another article of that creed is this: Canada has limited powers and resources. If you do not stop the expenditures incurred in the name of this country, and stop drawing upon its manhood for the purposes of war, you will precipitate us into bankruptcy. I will try to answer that as best I can, and briefly. Are we doing more than the rest of the Empire? That is the first question. Canada has a population of seven and a half millions; she has under arms about 418,000 men, or 5½ per cent of her population. Australia has a population of 4,900,000; she has 362,000 men under arms or 7 per cent of her population. New Zealand has 1,100,000 people; she has under arms 65,000 soldiers, or 6 per cent of her population, The white or European population of South Africa is 1,275,000; South Africa has under arms 60,000 men, or 5 per cent of her population. Newfoundland has 250,000 people; She has under arms 31,000 men, or 13 per cent of her population.

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Wait, honourable gentlemen. I want your applause for the last. Great Britain has 44,000,000 people she has under arms five and a half million men, the equivalent of 12½ per cent. France has 38,000,000 people; she has six and a half million soldiers, or 17 per cent of her population.

Some hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Are we suffering financially? There are, briefly, two ways of finding out by touching the pulse of a people whether it suffers from poverty or not. Firstly, the savings bank deposits; secondly, the vehicle of business, the note circulation. In 1917 the savings deposits in the banks totalled $909,505,000. Are we losing or gaining wealth? What did we have last year? Last year we had $767,600,000. The increase in savings deposits in one year amounted to more than $132,000,000.

In note circulation we have $165,267,000, as against $123,373,000 last year, a gain in one year of $41,894,000.

Now, honourable gentlemen, one objection, and a serious one, can be presented to me. It may be said: "True, we are living in prosperity, but it is only artificial prosperity." I admit that readily. There are other countries as much exposed as we are; for instance, France, leaving aside Belgium—France, that has saved our life twice at least. But is she prosperous? I was through France last year, and I saw the untold misery of her people, although they were not complaining—no, but smiling through it all. Is France prosperous in that condition? France is exposed to be crushed at any minute; and our turn may come next. Is that true, or is it not true? The danger is the same; the maturity of the danger is different. We have artificial prosperity, but we have more: we have untold resources in the country, the resources of every young nation. Old nations which are tottering under the blows and misery and loss of blood brought about by the war have not our resources untouched; they have not our artificial prosperity, and still their effort is infinitely greater than ours. What is the war? It is an undertaking with unlimited liability. Whether you want it or not, everything we have is at stake in this war, and if we do not defend it, what is the difference, except that it is still more at stake? But do not let us run away with the idea that if we keep our money, if we keep our men, we keep our country free, we keep all those resources, we keep all that is worth living for; no that is a lie.

And there is more. Our debt is going to be a crushing debt, but if we are beaten what will the Kaiser make that debt? And why not? Why, the Germans rob in the north of France; they steal in Belgium, and they kill the people who defend their property. We are not sacred and above those threats and menaces. No; the hand that has crushed those people can crush us tomorrow just as well; and that is why I say, if the war is crushing to us, the consequences of the war if we lose will be infintely worse.

Another article of that creed referred to by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Edwards) is this: "We should cease our efforts to fight; we should devote all our efforts to feed the Allies." That also is a catchy objection. It is true we have unlimited land, and we can be of great assistance in that respect. But there is an answer to that. The soil of France can produce twice as much as our own soil. If the French people called back from the trenches the requisite number of men they could feed themselves copiously, and they would not require assistance from us. What are they doing? They are fighting the Hun, and they are fighting hunger. They have both duties. We have both duties, for the same reason; we must fight the Hun and we must fight hunger. It is true that it is more difficult to make two efforts than to make one. When you have two such tasks, one or perhaps both may not be as well performed; but when you have to meet them, you call on all the resources of your courage and manhood and face them, and do the best you can.

The last objection to which I intend to refer is this: "Why should the United States not continue our effort?" I admit that is a serious objection. It is true that the United States has an unlimited number of men, while we have few. We require more for the field and for industries, I admit. But now is the time to put forth all of our strength—not to-morrow. When the armies of the United States are in the field, and have replaced those of Russia, upon whom we can hardly count to-day, there will, I believe, be a certain relief for Canada. But now the fate hangs in the scale; now, when the enemy and the Allies are gripping each other by the throat, so to speak, and looking into each other's eyes for a sign of exhaustion, is the time for us to make our supreme effort. We must do all we can, and the Allies must do all they can. Later on, when the tide has turned, and the mighty armies of the United States will have been thrown with full force into the scale in our favour, then perhaps Canada will take a breathing time.

But there is another answer to that objection. Do you remember what the leading men of this nation said at the beginning of the war? Do you remember that momentous day when Canada freely but proudly went to the rescue of our two mother countries? Do you remember what was said in the name of this nation? We said that we were in to the end. That declaration was ratified by the country. It was heard over the sea. Still at that time there was no very serious danger for Canada. Everybody thought that with the coalition of the Allies, Germany would surely be crushed. Did you at that time entertain any serious expectation of aggression? No. At that time we thought that it was our duty to go and fight for liberty and justice, and we went. But the danger was remote. Still, with that danger as remote as it was, our public men, those who really led in Parliament, those who represented the nation, without distinction, without one dissenting voice, they said we were in to the end. We now know the tremendous force developed by Germany, and what kind of a foe she is. She has laid waste part of Europe; she has accomplished practically the dream of her statesmen for twenty years past; she holds that portion of Europe stretching from Antwerp to Warsaw and from Bremen to Jerusalem and the Upper Euphrates, for which she has been craving for so long. With terrible offensives that we never could foresee, Germany is every day menacing the world. Now that we have that frightful danger face to face, what shall we say? Have we not said, "To the end"? Is it not our national and individual interest to stay to the end?

There is another reason. When we began we never dreamed of atrocities such as have been committed, for we thought that there would be a certain humanity in the way war would be carried on. Is there any to-day? What pity can you expect from such a foe? Is there any quarter that we can hope for? We did not think that Germany would have the audacity to conquer by terror; that she would respect nothing; but now we know it. That danger stares us in the face; it is upon us if we lose. What shall we say? Nay, what can we say? If it is true that we are menaced by what has happened to Belgium, what can we do but fight to the end? I know that it is customary to wave the flag, but I do not intend to do it. I think too much of that has been done, as we shall realize a little later on. Politicians on both sides have aroused dangerous sentiments and bad passions. But let me tell you candidly what I think of our soldiers. They have been called to arms, and they have responded nobly. The call was to the proud standard when we said, "To the end;" and the boys came, and they went across, and their motto was, "To the end." When the Canadian Trade Commission was in France last year, at every city where we stopped people said, with enthusiasm and emotion and gratitude that I cannot depict, "You brave little free nation, you have come of your own accord, you have come to stay with us to the end; your soldiers have said so, more than that, they have lived up to their motto." It is true there are no braver soldiers; there are no soldiers more esteemed, more revered in all the armies of the Allies, than the Canadians. They have gone into the fight with that motto, "To the end," they have died for that motto; and they are now mourned for that motto.

If you want to know what a promise of that kind means for France, please remember Verdun. What happened there? They mustered the best arms of France and the best generals, knowing that the pressure of the whole army would be applied there to reach the heart of France. They told those men, "Stand and die;" and the men answered, "They shall not pass!" and the Germans did not pass. That motto, "they shall not pass!" is now written across Verdun in letters that will be flaring centuries from now. Those are the people who received the promise brought by our soldiers to France; and side by side with the Canadian soldiers, are those men who said, "They shall not pass!" the men who saved France, who saved Europe and the world, the men who are now decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honour because they have lived up to their pledge, and made true the words,

"They shall not pass!" Let the people in my country who have been honoured by that Cross of the Legion of Honour not forget that it is the same cross that now decorates the city of Verdun and all those brave men who have fought and lived up to and kept their word, "They shall not pass!"

There is an objection made with reference to France. The question is asked: "Do you think that if we went to war France would help us?" Honourable gentlemen, I need not tell you that that also is a very specious argument. Are we going to war for France? Are we breaking peace and giving the best that we have when we are not obliged to do so for our own sake? What is the real situation? How should that question be put? It should be put in this way: If France were defending herself and the world in Canada, instead of on her own territory; if we had borne the brunt of the first blow; if France were interested in the war, as she is to-day, and if we called for more men, what do you think that brave and generous country would do? That is the fair way to put the question, and if it is put in that way I need not call for an answer, because there is but on judgment on the chivalry and generosity of France. If France were in our place to-day, she would do what we are doing and more.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I am coming to the Bill. If it is true that we must continue our effort, how shall we do it? By the voluntary system? There are two objections to that. The first need is for infantry; and, considering the wastage and losses, the voluntary system does not produce satisfactory results. But let us waive that objection. There is another and very much more serious objection. We have withdrawn from the life of the country 400,000 men. We are suffering from that loss. Agriculture is suffering. Certain essential industries are suffering. Why? Because men have been withdrawn indiscriminately. We all know perfectly well that 400,000 men cannot be taken from a population like ours without the country suffering. The prime objection is that men have gone who should not have gone. Men have gone when agriculture and industry claimed them principally and primarily.

Honourable gentlemen, if the war were beginning to-day, if we wanted to avoid that error, what would we do? That is a plain, frank question. I have heard even Nationalists say that they would prefer conscription to the voluntary method of enrolment. I have heard them say time and again that undue pressure was brought to bear in certain cases, and that married men with obligations, and men who were especially required to feed the nation had gone away. If we had the power to retrace our steps, would it not be in the interest of the nation to select the men who should go? If that was the case before any men had gone at all, now that our population is impoverished to the extent of 400,000 men is it not much more necessary now to take the precaution of selecting those who should go?

But there is more, Sir. Under the voluntary system how can the idler be made to do his duty? I am not talking of slackers; I will come to them later on. Take the case of the man who does nothing. In my opinion there is no place for him to-day in the life of the nation. The man who does nothing is a nuisance, and we cannot afford to have nuisance in the country. Men must work. Those who foresee the difficulties that will face us after the war must come to that conclusion. Those who cannot fight the Hun must work if they are able; they must fight hunger; if they cannot go to the trenches, they ought to go to the fields. How can that be accomplished?

The people of my province are opposed to conscription. I am not fatuous enough to think that there are not a great many men among them with more intelligence and with as much patriotism as I have. The immense majority of them are sincere. They hate compulsion. I cannot help saying that this is one of the most trying things that I have ever done in my life. I am conscious that I am now standing in opposition to the will of nearly the whole of my people. I am deeply sorry for it. There is but one thing that I plead for, fair play. I have nothing to gain but everything to lose, by the course which I am going to take, and even my good friends on this side will agree with that when I have finished. I do not share the opinion of those who oppose conscription. I have fought them for years, especially since the war, but there is one thing which I cannot deny, it is that when everybody else was in favour of the war, some of them had the courage to be against everybody else. They were wrong. That is my deep conviction. But there is one thing I can learn from them, that is to have courage, and I intend to have it.

Selection is the best way of avoiding the errors and the difficulties that have existed in the past; therefore I am in favour of the principle of the Bill. Of course honourable gentlemen, you will readily understand that I reserve to myself the right to offer amendments to the Bill if I think they may render it more acceptable. Now comes my second sacrifice because—and I have absolutely no shame in saying it. I am a confirmed and convinced Conservative and always have been. I have the deepest reverence and affection for my chief, and if I vote against my party on this question it will be with regret; but I confess not with as much pain as if I found myself against my people when they were assailed as they are now, when they do not deserve one tithe of the accusations aimed at them. I need not say that my people are not brought up with military ideas. I do not want you to take my word for that, although I believe you credit me with sincerity. I ask you to accept the testimony of one of your own witnesses. What does the Montreal Star of the 16th of June say? I will read it:

> The British-born with their instantly-acting instinct of patriotism, enlisted at once. They constituted something like eighty-five per cent of the first contingent. This was not because they were more loyal than the rest of us when we all had time to think it out—it was merely because their patriotism was more instinctive and automatic. It took the Canadian-born a little longer to emerge from the miasmic fogs of pacifism; but they were presently marching into the gap bravely.
> French Canada—with much the same mental attitude to begin with—was much slower in taking fire. Why? Largely because their instinctive patriotism had become wholly local. They were loyal to Canada alone. They were long divorced from France—first, by the conquest when they were deserted; next (let us remember in fairness) by the British demand that they cease to look to France which was then our enemy; next, by the Revolution and its subsequent war upon their cherished religion.

I could read an article from the Winnipeg Telegram along exactly similar lines, but I will not do so. Let me simply tell you that when the campaign for voluntary recruiting took place in the province of Quebec, those who did their best were met by one man and his friends. This man raised louder the clamour and menace kept alive by him before the people of Quebec for fifteen years. That man was Henri Bourassa. What did he say? For fifteen years, he has said: "If you allow soldiers to leave this country to go and fight the wars of England, you will have conscription." Others of us went to our countrymen, both Liberals and Conservatives, and asked them to do their duty. We said that there was no danger of conscription, that it was a menace held out by Bourassa to frighten the people. We were sincere in saying so. What was the effect, Sir, when like a thunderclap, conscription was announced in this country, the man who had been prophesying conscription was regarded as a real prophet by the people of my province. What was the effect on those who wanted to do their duty, and affirmed that there would be no conscription? Those were believed to have deceived their countrymen. Those upon whom the load had been placed, those who had answered the call of their country, were heard no more, and the man who had been preaching the opposite creed was proven to be right. I am not blaming anybody. It is useless to blame anybody, and that is not my purpose, but it seems to me that it is my duty to show how circumstances govern things. Ten, fifteen, twenty—yes, one hundred years might have passed and we might not have had this war. This war is the greatest that the world has ever seen, but circumstances brought it about and at the same time seemed to prove to the whole of my province, that what this man had said was true. There is no use in denying it. Why am I telling this to the people of other provinces? Because I do not want you to believe, what has been stated too often, that my countrymen do not know how to answer the call of duty. They are misled, yes; but they are a generous and courageous race.

What happened next? For the past year, or more, what has been printed in the newspapers of the province of Quebec—the Liberal newspapers? My honourable friend from de Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), who I know is sincere, has trespassed on political ground for the purpose of showing where the responsibilities lie. Well, I will continue and finish the story. What has happened during the past year? In all the leading Liberal papers of the province of Quebec you have seen statements like this: "We are for the war, but we are against robbers. We desire to put forth our best efforts, but we want efficiency. In other words, we desire to serve the mighty interests of this war, but we cannot ignore our own private interests."

What has happened to the Conservative party of the province of Quebec? Let me tell you. Those who have tried to lead that party have done their best to stem the tide, but the Conservative party in the province of Quebec is dead to-day; it has died of the war. The Conservative leaders fought against Bourassa. It was shown by circumstances that he was right and they were wrong. They have resisted the Liberal party, but what could they do? When, in spite of the indifference which often confronted them, they had given the best of their intelligence and energy, and thought they had convinced their people, what happened? Just a few words were said, and all their work was undone: "Those are politicians. They are not playing an honest game. That is petty politics. They are for the war, because they are making money out of it."

Now, honourable gentlemen, let me cite an article which will show whether I am exaggerating or not, an article which appeared in the Montreal Daily Mail of the 30th of July last. A political leader of no small importance in the Liberal party of the province of Quebec tells my people why he is against conscription. Listen and you will understand:

Why did Borden introduce conscription? Not to win the war; he deceived you on that, it was to gain the elections which are now coming. (Applause). He introduced conscription, not to win the war, but in order to set the English of Ontario against the French of Quebec and the French of Quebec against the English of Ontario. He introduced conscription after we had voluntarily sent 420,000 of our men to the front. A system which allows us to get 420,000 men voluntarily is good for another hundred thousand.

An Hon. SENATOR: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I want my honourable friend to continue to say, "hear, hear." We all know where we stand in this matter. Let my honourable friend be patient.

Sir Robert Borden said on many occasions that he would never introduce conscription. He told us clearly that not a word was said to him in England about conscription, yet three days after he left the steamer he came to Ottawa and immediately proposed conscription. Do you know why? Because he went to the other side with a man whose biography was written by Judge Galt, the Hon. Bob Rogers. He crossed the sea with Borden.

Rogers said to Borden, "If you don't bring conscription we are lost; you know we stole so much, we administered so badly, etc., that we will have no one to support us. We must have conscription in order to set the French Canadians against the English Canadians and vice versa." That is the political pact of the Tory party to-day. We see in the Ontario papers and in the Conservative papers of Montreal columns upon columns of matter written to excite one race against the other. That is the policy of Sir Robert Borden.

Do you understand, honourable gentlemen, why it is that we in the province of Quebec who have tried to do our best have been defeated? Do you think that those words were uttered by a man of my race, a man of no standing perhaps, a man of no influence perhaps? No. Those words fell from the lips of an Englishman, a man of authority and position in the province of Quebec, a man highly respected in that province. Under circumstances such as those, how can you expect that my own people will not be misguided? How is it possible, when your own people—for that gentleman is not the only one—men of your race in high positions have spoken with as little restraint or truthfulness? I do not wish to name anybody. My purpose is not to arouse acrimony, but quite the reverse.

Further, mistakes have been made. I quite understand that war cannot be carried on without mistakes. Very often our own counsels were not heard. Perhaps there were good reasons for that.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Will the honourable gentleman give us the name of the person whom he has just quoted?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, no.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I would ask the honourable gentleman to give the name of the person whom he quoted with reference to Sir Robert Borden.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I would say to my honourable friend that perhaps we do not look at things from the same angle. That is my answer. I will tell the honourable gentleman in private, after the sitting, if he so desires. I have nothing to gain by doing it; the only result would be perhaps to humiliate a man, and I do not want to do that.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: There is no humiliation in it.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Well, if the honourable gentleman accepts these words which I have quoted as being up to his level, let him do so. I will name no one now, but I will give my honourable friend——

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE:—Is he an Englishman?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) has already said he was an Englishman.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I was saying that mistakes have been made. Yes, very serious mistakes have been made. So far as we are concerned, there may have been not a word about them; but it is results that count. What was the result? For instance, we worked hard to assist Asselin in raising a regiment. Asselin was a brave, intelligent and deserving man, who went overseas through sheer patriotism. Moreover, he was a Nationalist. We had great hopes that such a regiment would go to the front. It did not. I blame nobody, but I say that also was an obstacle which we had to meet.

I have here a newspaper not one word in which is written without the permission of the chief of the Liberal party here and those who advise him. I do not say, remember, that he actually controls the newspaper; but the policy which he dictates must be followed. It is a newspaper which is now being fed with a spoon. The day after conscription was voted in the House of Commons, what did that newspaper say? There appeared in it, in big, flaring headlines: "Borden with his majority, has voted the condemnation to death of 100,000 Canadians."

These are facts. But there are still more. Systematic attacks have been made on the province of Quebec—on my race. They all have come from the same quarter. I will not name it; it would be useless. My purpose, I repeat, is not to create more division, but to show you how it is that the mentality of my people is being moulded. If you want evidence of that, I could quote from newspapers which I have before me, not one of which is controlled by a French Canadian. I have here an extract from an editorial in the Montreal Star of the 6th of July, addressed to the English race in this country. It says that conscription is not a punitive measure, that some people in this country evidently think it is, and that the sooner that impression disappears the better. Do you think that this editorial in an English paper in my own province would have been written without cause? It was written because the attacks were daily becoming worse and worse, until English-speaking people who live amongst us could not help crying out: "Stop! You are killing the cause which you desire to serve." I could cite an article from the Montreal Gazette along practically the same lines, in which that paper says it is not by kicks that you make people do their duty.

Honourable gentlemen, what is the conclusion to be drawn from all this? The elections must take place. It makes no difference whether people who think they should not take place go on praying that they may be averted. The elections will take place within such a short time that, whether the Government desire it or not, they cannot put the compulsory service law into operation before the elections are held. It is a physical impossibility. Why, then, attempt it? Within that short time you cannot have conscription but you produce more irritation. I am now addressing myself in all sincerity to my party. I have served it to the best of my ability for years. I appeal now to my chief. Why make the situation more difficult? Why make it worse than it is? Do you not think that we, who have our pride of race, are not sufficiently humiliated by what is taking place at meetings where people who have nothing at stake say anything and everything? Do you want this state of things to continue? What will it bring to this Parliament? Do you think that people in such a state of agitation can well choose the men whose shoulders are strong enough to bear the burden? Is it not a time for my friends in the Government to say to the country: "We will not put this measure into operation before the elections," so that trouble makers shall not be elected by our people and by yours? For it must not be forgotten that every shout of anger coming from one province has a deep echo in the other. There are on both sides of politics persons whose interest it is to make trouble, because trouble only can make them. They are, I know, the minority, and I am appealing to the majority. Those who love but their party may want to cause trouble, but it is to those who love their country more that I am making this earnest appeal. Give us the assurance that this Bill will not be put into effect until after the elections. Then, honourable gentlemen, those who say it is a punitive measure will find it very difficult to maintain their accusation.

Those who make all sorts of false pretenses will have a last chance to lead my own countrymen into error. You will have less hatred on both sides, and that is what the country most requires. Do not forget that the most troublesome days are to come. Yes, unhappily I believe so. We have still to finish the war, and we have to carry the weight of the war; and is it not true that this is a duty for the best men? Let us have the best men. I am thoroughly imbued with that idea, and, being so, I must vote for the amendment. I am sorry to leave my party, but still more pained to part from my own people. This is the only course open to me, and I follow it. My vision may be short; that is not my fault; but, seeing where my duty lies it would be my fault if I did not follow the way of duty as I see it the right way, the high way.

To every man there openeth
A way, ways, and the way,
And the high soul climbs the high way
And the low soul gropes the low,
And in between, on the misty flats,
The rest go through and fro,
But to every man there openeth
A high way and a low,
And every man decideth
The way his soul shall go.

Hon. P. A. CHOQUETTE: It was not my intention and my desire to speak to night, but one of my colleagues, being my senior, being absent, asked me to take his place. I am somewhat disturbed by the extraordinary speech delivered by the honourable gentleman who has just sat down —extraordinary by its delivery, extraordinary because it was evidently prepared for the next election, for some of the parishes where the honourable gentleman gave views directly opposite to those he announced to-night. The honourable gentleman said that his vision may be short; but we cannot say the same thing for his speech, and my hope for him is that his vision may be a little longer, but that in future his speeches may be a little shorter, which will be better for the House and for the questions that may be debated. For the present I would like to refer to some extraordinary statements made by the honourable gentleman, because I saw some weeks ago in the Montreal Gazette a very complimentary reference to him as a strong conscriptionist who was going to vote for the Bill. He has denied that entirely, but he did not deny it until to-day. On the contrary, the Ottawa Journal states that the honourable gentleman has changed his mind and is now going to vote for the amendment. It seems to me that the honourable gentleman is thinking one way, speaking another, and as to voting I am not sure what he will do. I was very much surprised, after hearing him shouting about conscription and describing how the Huns might come to this country with machine guns, burning churches and convents and kicking out the people, to find that the honourable gentleman has four or five brothers, all young, good-looking like himself, and rich, and I thought that surely he was defending his own brothers who were at the front fighting the Huns; yet to my surprise I am told that they have not enlisted, but are waiting for the Huns to come and smash their houses. I do not like to say these things; but when a man speaks so strongly for conscription, saying that a man must go and fight the Huns, I think he should first give an example not only by words but by deeds, and go over there and fight when there is so much necessity to prevent the Huns from coming over here and killing everybody.

Before entering on my argument I wish to make some more preliminary remarks. I was scandalized when I saw the honorable gentlemen on the other side yesterday heartily applauding the reading of the letter addressed to my honourable friend the leader on this side (Hon. Mr. Bostock) by Sir Clifford Sifton. If I were wicked enough to punish them for their applause, I would read the attacks I find in the Tory papers and speeches of some Tory gentlemen to the effect that Mr. Sifton was the greatest boodler we ever had in Canada—that he was not only a bad and dishonest politician, but was put out of the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier because of things pertaining to his private life. We find all that in black and white in the Tory papers of some years ago. But he was applauded yesterday by the honourable gentlemen opposite because his name was affixed to a letter which was intended to injure Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his friends, although it contradicted what he said a few weeks ago to the effect that Sir Wilfrid's amendment asking for a referendum was right, and that he was going to carry the country with that. I could cite two or three names of members of Parliament to whom he made that statement. What has happened since then? Mr. Sifton must have said to himself: "I am going to support the Tory party, because that will be a whitewashing for me, and it won't leave in their eyes any crime of my private or my political life, and then I can say what I like in politics without being attacked by them." We know also that Mr. Sifton has made money in the war, and if my information is correct he has made a million or two on wheat in the last few weeks and also in buying horses for the French Government last year.

The honourable leader of the Government said in his speech that there were slackers and quitters, and that conscription was to get them. In saying that he was insulting his own chief. Who was the biggest slacker if it was not Mr. Borden himself, when he said that there would be no conscription in this country? Was he not then a slacker? Sir Sam Hughes, the ex-Minister of Militia, said that Sir Robert Borden had not only opposed conscription, but opposed recruiting—that Premier Borden had asked him on many occasions to "slow down on recruiting;" and Sir Sam added that the reason why the voluntary system fell down was because of the influence of prominent men who wanted cheap labour and big profits; that they had influenced the Imperial Munitions Board, the Cabinet and the Prime Minister; that Sir Thomas White had warned the Premier that manufacturers were protesting because Toronto's recruiting was too fast. I assert that there was an unjust attack against the province of Quebec made by the honourable leader of this House in his speech.

What is a slacker? Here is a little clipping from the Montreal Gazette of August 27, 1915, speaking about civil servants and a lack of patriotism:

Toronto, August 26.—A severe attack was made on the patriotism of the Ontario civil servants by John Beverley Robinson—

A big man up there—who declared that although 300 in the Parliament Buildings had been promised full pay during absence if they enlisted for overseas service, only 10 had answered the call. Of these, two were married men and five of the others were unable to pass the medical examination.

Are those men slackers? Are they the men to whom the leader of the Government was alluding yesterday? If he says they are, then I will let him settle the case with those men in Toronto.

Now, passing the other subjects, I must congratulate the honourable member for de Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) on the clever speech he made yesterday about our past. He gave a short and true history to show the mentality of the people in our province. I wish to cite a good authority to show why our province thinks that we are not obliged to defend any land, but that if Canada is ever attacked it will be for England to defend us to her last man and last dollar. In the debate on Confederation, page 665, Sir John Macdonald himself said that the Canadian delegates would discuss in Britain the question of defence, and he had no doubt they would be met in the most large-hearted and liberal spirit by the English Government, and that that Government would pledge itself to its utmost resources in men and money for our defence. My honourable friend from De Lorimier referred to the signing in 1849 of the annexation manifesto when the Tory Loyalists, because an act of justice was signed by Lord Elgin, went down to Montreal to sign that document, and, aided by prominent men, burned the Parliament Buildings and sent rotten eggs to the Governor General. There were no Frenchmen in that; there were no Liberals in that, I think. They were all English Tories, and you know what happened. When they are slandering Quebec they do not say a word about this, but I intend to repeat this here, and to send back these true accusations to those who are accusing us wrongly.

The honourable gentleman from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards) has this afternoon rendered justice to Quebec, and has spoken of the morality, the good conduct, and the true loyalty of the people of our province. He has brought before his compatriots of Ontario the fact that we are a loyal, moral, law-abiding people, and that criminality is ten times less in Quebec than in Ontario. It is only fair that he should be asked for proof of this statement. As he is not a lawyer, I will furnish the proof, not to injure my friends in Ontario, but simply to prove that his statements were true. In the criminal statistics of 1915 published by this Government, Parliamentary Documents Nos. 17 and 18, Volume 51, No. 13, 1916, there is a compilation of the convictions in the whole Dominion, and they were as follows:—For murder: Ontario 7, Quebec 5. For manslaughter: Ontario 17, Quebec 9. For abortion: Ontario 10, Quebec 2. For rape: Ontario 172, Quebec 34. For bigamy: Ontario 42, Quebec 3. For procuration: Ontario 20, Quebec 6. For shooting, stabbing and wounding: Ontario 120, Quebec 37. For assault: Ontario 729, Quebec 347. For refusing to support family: Ontario 73, Quebec 9. And so on. So we find that for one conviction in Quebec there are five or six or eight in Ontario. I do not say this with the intention of shaming my honourable friends from Ontario, but to bear out the statements made by my honourable friend from Russell, who so bravely defended us this afternoon.

More than that, Sir, in the speech made in the other House by the honourable member for Red Deer, Dr. Clark, it was said that in certain sections of the country the people were losing their sense of proportion. In the Montreal Gazette of June 25 last I read of an incident concerning Lord Beresford. This is the article:

Smashed Plates at Savoy Hotel—Lord Beresford Found He Had Been Eating Off German Ware.

There was a curious scene when Lord Beresford was speaking at a luncheon of the British Empire Productions Association at the Savoy Hotel to-day. He was dealing with the presence of Germans in the country, when he happened to pick up a plate from the table, and saw, according to the inscription on the back, that it was made in Germany. "Here is a pretty state of affairs," exclaimed Lord Beresford, "we actually have been eating off German plates." A succession of crashes followed as a number of guests raised their plates and hurled them to the floor, smashing them.

When men like Lord Beresford are losing their heads in that way, I am not surprised that some of the people in the provinces are losing their heads over conscription. While speaking of people losing their heads, I may quote some statistics about insanity in Quebec and in Ontario. In 1914 the number of persons committed for insanity in Quebec was 8, in Ontario 237; in 1915 in Quebec the number was one, in Ontario 195. I state these things to show that we are just as good, morally and mentally, and just as loyal as the people of any of the other provinces.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Choquette, the debate was adjourned until to-morrow.

RESEARCH COUNCIL BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill 83, an Act relating to the Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, August 2, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATORS INTRODUCED.

The following newly-appointed senators were introduced and took their seats:

Hon. Angus Claude Macdonell, of Toronto, Ontario, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Brigadier-General Hon. Mr. Mason.

Hon. Roderick Harold Clive Pringle, of Cobourg, Ontario, introduced by Hon. Sir James Lougheed and Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell.

STATISTICS OF EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I should like to inquire of the leader of this House as to the accuracy of the figures given in his speech on the Military Service Bill. There was something said with regard to this question yesterday, but I think we might come to an understanding if I were to point out the figures that are missing. The honourable the leader of the House said:

> I present the following statistics of our Canadian Expeditionary Force: Reported enlistments to 31st July, 1917, 418,102; gone overseas to same date, of whom 136,400 in France, 127,543 in England and elsewhere, 263,943; 31,010 killed, died, missing and prisoners, and about 20,000 discharged or returned for discharge, 51,010.

The statement is correct to that point.

> In Canada, or about to embark, 22,812; discharges, etc., in Canada, reported discharged as shown on detailed statement attached, 64,552; discharges not yet reported through districts, or for whom documents are not yet available for classification, about 10,910.

Taking all these figures, he gives a total of 418,102; but when we add them together we find that they total only 413,227. If we deduct that figure from the 418,102, we have a difference of 4,875. I do not know where to put that difference.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say to my honourable friend that I presented the statement furnished by the department. Honourable gentlemen will observe that the numbers of discharged or returned men are approximate, which may account for the discrepancy. I think the figures should be sufficiently accurate for the purposes of this discussion.

IRREGULAR NOTICES OF MOTION.

QUESTION OF ORDER.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I wish to call the attention of this honourable body to the method of dealing with notices of inquiries which is being adopted, I do not know by whom or upon whose authority. Yesterday I gave notice that I would ask the Government if they had tendered a seat in the Senate to the Hon. Thomas Chapais, a leading Conservative in Quebec. I want a plain answer to that. It does not appear in the Minutes of Proceedings.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I do not see it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am asking why it is suppressed. This is a very grave matter. Are we going to introduce Kaiserism and Prussianism just because honourable gentlemen opposite have a majority of one or two? What is it going to be when they have more.

I put another question: "Is it the intention of the Government to bring men from the House of Commons, after voting on a public measure, and to allow them to vote again on the same question?"

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I rise to a point of order. There is nothing before the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yes, there is. I am calling the attention of the Chair to the suppression of facts.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yes, you can call order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I find in May, 12th edition——

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen——

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I beg leave to say what I intended to say. I am calling the attention of His Honour the Speaker to the fact that if there is a point of order we should have an opportunity of discussing it before his ruling is given. If a ruling is being given——

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I am answering the question. I find in May, 12th edition, page 217:

> A notice wholly out of order, as for instance containing a reflection on a vote of the House, may be withheld from publication on the notice paper.
> When a notice, publicly given, is obviously irregular or unbecoming, the Speaker has interposed, and the notice has not been received in that form. He has also directed that a notice of motion should not be printed, as being obviously designed merely to give annoyance.

I heard the inquiries read by the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran), and I asked the Clerk to give me those two inquiries. Upon reading them, I found that they were out of order, and were designed merely to give annoyance.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I understand that His Honour the Speaker is not deciding the point of order, but is just relating what he has done.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I decided that those two questions were out of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The honourable the Speaker is not now giving a decision on a point of order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: There was no point of order raised.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I gave a decision, and if any honourable gentleman is not satisfied, he may appeal from it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: No. His Honour the Speaker is just relating what he has done.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: What is the point of order?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I have given my decision.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I am not appealing from the decision. I am saying that the Speaker has not ruled on the point of order, but has related to the House what took place. The honourable gentleman from Victoria gave notice of two inquiries, and the Speaker said that he found them out of order, and accordingly told the Clerk not to have them put on the Order Paper. All that is very proper; but perhaps His Honour the Speaker will tell us whether he communicated with the gentleman who gave notice of the inquiries. That should have been done as a matter of courtesy.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: He was absent.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: May I call the attention of His Honour the Speaker to the answer which he gave me? I rose because it seemed to me that the honourable the Speaker was going to give his decision on the point of order, and he said that he was merely going to answer the question. Therefore I call the attention of His Honour to the fact that, unwittingly no doubt, he has misled me, because I was claiming the right to speak on the question of order before the House if there was one. I think His Honour the Speaker is confusing two things. Undoubtedly he can exercise the right to which he has referred of allowing these questions or not, subject, of course, to the judgment of this House, but he has not the right to prevent discussion on a point of order. In other words, he cannot transform the decision, which he has made ex parte, into one from which there can be no appeal and on which there can be no discussion.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Once again I say that I gave my ruling on these inquiries, and there is an opportunity to appeal from the ruling.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Suppose the Speaker ruled out something in error—I am not speaking of this case—would there be no appeal to this House? Would it be within the power of one man to rule out anything he chose, like a Czar of Russia?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Are we to understand that hereafter points of order are going to be decided by the Speaker without an opportunity of members discussing them? For my part, I strongly protest against any such thing.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friends are becoming unduly excited.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I rise to a point of order. There is nothing before the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not know whether it is due to the heat of the day or not. The senator from Victoria division, Montreal, yesterday gave notice of certain inquiries. They were manifestly improper. I assumed the responsibility of having the attention of the Clerk directed to the impropriety of permitting them to appear on the Order Paper. It is a principle laid down in May and other books on Procedure——

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I call my honourable friend's attention to the fact that he is now discussing the point of order, whereas my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) was prevented from doing so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I say no one prevented his doing so. It was when His Honour the Speaker was on his feet stating why he held that the questions were out of order that my honourable friend rose and said that he proposed to discuss the question of order.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, no, that is not the fact. My honourable friend could not have been listening. His Honour the Speaker had not given his ruling when my honourable friend rose. The Speaker told him to sit down as he was going to decide the point of order, and then he went on to decide it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I did not understand it so. I would ask His Honour to recede from that position if he misunderstood the attitude of the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), and permit a discussion of the point of order. I am sure that if His Honour the Speaker did take that position, he did it unwittingly. I was under the impression that my honourable friend had risen after His Honour had proceeded to give his decision.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, no.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I had no intention of stopping the discussion.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That may not have been the intention, but that is what was done.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Pardon me, I did not do it. All that I said to the honourable member for De Salaberry was that the ruling was that the two inquiries which were read yesterday by the honourable member for Victoria were out of order, and that if my ruling was not satisfactory he could appeal to the House. Everybody knew what those inquiries were when they were read yesterday. I decided that they were entirely out of order and gave my ruling accordingly.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If His Honour the Speaker will allow me to say so, I think that perhaps he went a little further than he should have gone. It was his duty to notify the Senate that he had decided that the questions should not appear on the Order Paper, which would explain their absence. Then it appertained to the Senate to challenge that ruling and to call upon His Honour for a full discussion and a full explanation of the point. If the ruling were challenged and the question discussed, then a judgment could have been given, and there would have been a full and general discussion of the question. I am speaking academically, because I was not in the House at the time.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: My purpose was not to discuss the merits of the question, because I did not know what question had been put; but I saw clearly that the honourable the Speaker was acting under a misapprehension, and I wished to prevent his closing the door prematurely to a discussion if any member wished to claim his right to discuss the point of order.

Hon. Mr LANDRY: Are we to understand that, when the honourable the Speaker decides to prevent the insertion in the Order Paper of a notice of motion by any member, that decision is final, or have we a right to discuss the question before he gives his ruling?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: When a notice of an inquiry or of a motion has been given, and is considered completely out of order, surely it is the right of the Speaker to rule whether that notice should be placed on the Order Paper or not. After that, any honourable gentlemen who is not satisfied has a right to make a motion to blame the Speaker, and to have an order given by the House that the notice which has been presented shall be inserted in the Order Paper.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think the honourable the Speaker misunderstood me. The Speaker has the right to prevent the insertion in the Order Paper of any motion if he thinks it improper; but the question I asked was whether that prevented senators from exercising their right to discuss the question.

DIVORCE BILL.

On the Order:

Third reading of Bill T2, an Act for the Relief of Albert Edwin Gordon.—Hon. Mr. Taylor.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Before that motion is put, I would like to have this order discharged and put on the Order Paper for Wednesday next, the 8th instant, so that we may have a chance to know what we are voting on.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: It has not been the custom in the past to vote on these Bills without the opportunity of reading the evidence, and I thoroughly agree with the suggestion to postpone.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: If objection had been made that the evidence had not been printed, I would have been quite willing for the order to be discharged and placed on the Order Paper for a later day, and then discussed with closed doors. This case was heard two years ago, and a Bill was reported, which passed this House and went to the House of Commons; but Parliament was prorogued before the Bill could go through. The case came before the Divorce Committee again this year. It was defended two years ago, and also this year, and I think every member of the committee, including the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition, will agree with me that, although the evidence is now laid on the Table and every member can read it if he wishes to, that evidence should not be circulated throughout the country. That was the opinion of the committee If the House discusses the matter with closed doors, it can then, if it so decides, have the evidence printed; but I am satisfied and every member of the committee will agree with me, that it should not be distributed through the country.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Do I understand that the evidence is going to be printed, or is not going to be printed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is not going to be printed.

Hon. Mr TAYLOR: It has been printed for the first Bill that was granted, but not for the last one.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: As a member of this Senate, I dissent entirely from the contention that we are justified in passing any Bill of that nature without having before us the evidence upon which such Bill is based. No man should desire to go it blind in that way.

Hon. Mr TAYLOR: The evidence is on the Table.

The order stands for Wednesday, August 8th.

MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING AND HON. MR. BOSTOCK'S AMENDMENT.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Sir James Lougheed, that Bill 75, an Act respecting Military Service, be now read a second time, and the motion of the Hon. Mr. Bostock in amendment thereto:

That the following words be added after the word "time":

"With the understanding that this Bill will not come into force until after the general election."

Hon. P. A. CHOQUETTE: Honourable gentlemen, having yesterday made some preliminary remarks, I will now for a few minutes discuss the particular reasons I have for opposing this Bill.

Of all the motives that impel me to oppose the enactment of conscription in our country, the one which I deem to be the most powerful and convincing is the pledge to the Canadian people that there would be no conscription whatever—a pledge officially and publicly made by the Prime Minister on the floor of the House of Commons in the clear words which we all remember; a pledge which was repeatedly given, and in which we put our faith until, all of a sudden, the same Prime Minister so strangely wheeled about. Some honourable gentlemen of this House may think that I am rather touchy, and I will not deny that, as a Canadian, I feel greatly humiliated when I see the Prime Minister of my country going back on his word so light-heartedly and unceremoniously. I am still more humiliated when I realize that his rating of the majority of Parliament proved to be almost correct: a majority was indeed found ready and willing to tread in his footsteps at his first beckoning. On the other hand, I may say that I doubly rejoice, both as a Liberal and a French Canadian, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier considered himself bound by his words as recorded in Hansard of January 17, and felt that only by the people's will could he be released from his promise.

All of us are agreed that a most ignominious stain, which Von Bethman-Hollweg and the German Government can never blot out of history, is their phrase, "a scrap of paper," and their refusal to honour a treaty which they had signed. I fail to perceive any distinction between the German case and that of the Canadian Government. An elementary pride forbids us, it seems to me, from giving more worth to the declaration of a German Prime Minister than to that of a Canadian Prime Minister. Our public pledge to the people of Canada should especially impress our English fellow-countrymen. They know—at least it is they who claim—that England has entered this war in order to honour her signature. Although for eight days she tried to avoid being drawn into the conflict, she at last decided to join in—not on account of the Entente Cordiale, say her political men; not because her trade and her dominion over the ocean were endangered; not because France was in peril, and Germany triumphant; but simply because, after having pledged the neutrality of Belgium, she was no longer free to choose, according to the official declaration of the British Government. Later on I will have a word to say on all that. Acting under the same principle, I wish to make it clear that in opposing conscription in my country I am moved not so much by a desire to oppose that measure as by my conviction that a pledge made to the people of Canada should be respected. If I censure those in power for their unexpected change of mind and lack of good faith, it is not, as some honourable gentlemen may be inclined to believe, because I intend to pity my people and those who are about to be conscripted. Some members may give a wrong interpretation to what I am going to say, and accuse me of lacking patriotism. Those whom I really pity, and whom I consider to have been betrayed by the sudden wheeling round of our Prime Minister and his colleagues, especially his French Canadian colleagues, are the volunteers who have gone forth, the maimed and the dead, whom we induced to sacrifice their lives by imposing upon their courage and self-denial—those young men from whom we have stolen one year, two years, three years of life under the false and delusive pretense that there would never be any compulsory military service in their country. I pity also the mothers and fathers who placed confidence in the pledge of the Prime Minister, and who to-day sadly and bitterly reproach themselves for having urged their sons to enlist before their turn.

In the midst of the unjust denunciation of the people of my province which we hear in these days, and all the invective intended to cast opprobrium on them, it is no little gratification for me to note how their character is made up. For, if they fully trusted the pledged word of the Government, the leader of the Opposition, and the Parliament of this country, it shows what they are—trustworthy men accustomed to the laws of honour. It never occurred to them that such a pledge could be broken, except by the people's will. When the Prime Minister suddenly dashed conscription at them, they were stunned, wondering whether it was the same man who had made the pledge, and to-day they cannot enter a protest strong enough to do justice to their feelings.

It does seem strange that French Canadians should to this day remain trustful and confiding, when Ontario has enacted that odious Regulation 17, and other provinces have treated as "scraps of paper" the constitutional rights of the French to their own schools and to the use of their language. Nevertheless, Canadian Frenchmen have kept on trusting a man's word, no matter who or where, and I doubt whether honourable gentlemen of this House will not respect them the more for having done so. For my part, although I am not a perfect model of party discipline, I can easily understand, especially under such circumstances, the reluctance of all the English Liberal members to part from their old leader. They must have felt that, besides their political allegiance, they were breaking a still more inviolable tie—a compact, I would say—that absolutely bound them to follow the conduct of their leader in order to be true to the laws of honour and to the Canadian people. Indeed, to break that tie would amount to breaking their word.

Although deceived, the people of Quebec find some comfort in thinking that we can be very proud of the great Canadian statesman hailing from our province, the true Canadian statesman, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who would not end his straightforward and highminded career, based upon the principles of democracy, by allowing history to record of him such a derisive and scornful treatment of the Canadian people.

If we never differed in opinion I am afraid that public life in Canada would be "the dullest and dreariest walk." Nothing is more to be feared than stagnant blood in the veins of a nation. So I hasten to say—contrary to the general opinion which prevails at the present moment—that I do not apprehend any fatal outcome for our national unity from the existing cleavage. When I study the inner nature of this conflict of French and English elements, I find that it is essentially a sign that Canada is growing in population and in years; that we have come to face more difficult tasks and more complicated problems; that we have decidedly gone beyond that particular period of time in the development of the nation when we had chiefly to concern ourselves with the material existence of our people. Up to the present time public men in Canada have had to discuss figures more than ideas. The contending parties as a rule have argued about the burden of taxes and the increase of our national debt, about scandals imputed to the Administration, about dry and arid questions of trade and commerce, that is to say, about matters that concerned more our material welfare than our way of thinking and thwarted the natural inclination of each race. But this time we come to a concept, to an ideal, the nature of which is to oppose to each other the two predominant elements of our country—the French race deeply rooted and with a chauvinistic attachment to the land, and the Anglo-Saxon race, a cosmopolitan race, found in all parts of the world, and with the characteristic of being at home in any country but without local attachments. For it is a trait of the Anglo-Saxon to take with him, wherever he goes, the land of his birth, and to remain tied to the apron strings of his mother country. There lies, in my opinion, the cause of the unexpected conflict respecting conscription. Whenever atavism, which is the constitutive element of a race, has anything to do with a question arising in this country, we must expect divergent currents of opinion, which cannot be kept in restraint.

Does this imply that our Canadian unity must inevitably cease to exist? Not at all. For the time being it may be weakened, but it will spring up again as soon as the subject of contention shall cease to exist, and our whole population will be exclusively interested in the welfare of Canada. Whatever may happen, national unity never dies in a country merely on account of a diversity of religions and languages. To really endanger this unity or give it a mortal blow, the conflict must arise between people belonging to the same ethnical group and speaking the same language, as, for instance, is the case in Ireland. How can it be expected, indeed, that, with two distinct bloods running in the veins of the Canadian people, this nation will live perpetually without any difference of opinions and contrariety of sentiments springing up now and then? It would be contrary to the laws and history of humanity. Has not Belgium given and is she not still giving a magnificent example of national unity, although her whole history is made up of language and school conflicts, brought about by the different mentality of the two groups forming that heroic little nation? Is there any country more jealous of its liberty and independence than Switzerland? She freed herself from tyranny and she stands ready to resist invasion and oppression. And yet how many intestine wars have been fought by the Celtic, Germanic, and Latin elements that constitute her population. Her national unity remains unaltered and cannot be questioned.

As for ourselves, if we are placed to-day in this sad predicament, it is because—why not say it frankly?—we hastily, heedlessly, and extravagantly blazed abroad blustering protestations of our unbounded devotion and absolute self-denial, offering to sacrifice the life of all our young men and to lead our country as a victim to the altar of Great Britain. French and English Canadians equally blundered in so unconsciously deceiving themselves and suffering each other to be imposed upon. For our part, we in Quebec spoke and thought of sacrifices for the Empire that we could not afford and had no right to make; you in the English provinces took those ideas of sacrifices for granted and expected still more. Well, it is not true, in spite of all that has been sometimes loudly declared in our name, that the Quebec province, though glad and ready freely to help England, stands ready to give for the benefit of the Empire "her last man and her last dollar." When the honourable Solicitor General of Canada, for instance, announces that he is quite ready to bankrupt our country to help to win the war, English-speaking people may be sincere in applauding his utterance—although I doubt whether any among them realizes what national bankruptcy would mean; but in the province of Quebec we think that this proffer is absurd and reasonless; and I know that I am not mistaken when I assert that a great many sensible Englishmen think as we do. Also we consider that the honourable Minister of Railways and Canals talks through his hat when he says that he is prepared to remove the rails on all of our railroads to ship them to the Allies. Upon hearing the honourable minister announce in the House of Commons his readiness to do that, English members again clap their hands and acclaim the speaker. We in Quebec, together with many judicious and patriotic people in the English provinces, believe that such ideas border upon aberration, if, indeed, the Minister of Railways and Canals is not playing to the gallery. We certainly admire you, all English-speaking men, when you spontaneously rise and take off your hats to sing "God Save the King"—an English hymn, the origin of which is essentially French! In fact, we rise with you, take off our hats and heartily sing, "God Save the King;" but we feel that you should kneel down with us afterwards to sing our true national hymn, "O Canada," instead of voting its banishment, as have done scores of your leading social women in this very city of Ottawa, the capital of Canada.

It is, then, because we place Canada before the Empire that you accuse us of disloyalty—and some wretched and irresponsible people go so far as to accuse us of cowardice. It is because we place Canada before the Empire that so many newly-born Anglo-Canadians, fresh hands on our ship of state, cannot understand the attitude which the province of Quebec is assuming towards conscription.

But, I ask you, is not ours a most reasonable and right-minded attitude? Could any stand be manlier, more truly democratic, and marked by more consideration for what is fair, than the protest of my province against conscription, especially when this protest is immediately followed by the manliest, fairest and most democratic offer: "Show us that the majority in our country are against us, and we will submit; let the electorate decide, and we will submit if the majority are in favour of this nefarious conscription law!" But never will Quebec submit to such a law passed in the House of Commons by servile members without a mandate, and approved in the Senate by a majority secured through a transfer from the other House of men who had already voted upon this wicked Bill.

In this connection I may quote, in proof of what I have said, an editorial which appeared in the Montreal Gazette on July 24, headed, "New Senators To-day," and which said:

> The vacancies will be filled to insure the passage of the Military Service Bill. . . .There are nine vacancies, one from Manitoba, three from Quebec and five from Ontario, and the Government will fill enough of these to-morrow to make certain of the adoption of the Bill.

That shows the absolute disregard for the will of the people by the Government which is pressing this Bill on the country. Under other circumstances I should be glad to welcome to this House these men, who are able and highly respected in their respective professions, and some of whom I know personally; but I am sorry to see them coming to this House pledged to vote for the Government, in order that the Government may be assured of a majority for this nefarious Bill. The Government must have sent for those gentlemen and said to them: "Here is a vacant place in the Senate; will you accept it?" The answer would be, "Certainly." But the Government, or the Prime Minister, would say, "Well, you may accept it on one condition." "What condition?" And the answer would be, "That you vote for the Bill." "Certainly, I will vote for it." I know some of them who were against conscription not long ago, but who, according to my information, now intend to vote for the Bill. I say that is a disgrace—not to the honourable gentlemen who have been appointed, for I have nothing to say against them; but I say it is a disgrace to the Government to bring in members to repeat their votes on conscription and to ensure the passing of this objectionable measure without referring it to the people. If I were speaking outside of the Senate, before a Board of Trade or a shareholders' meeting, about such a transaction, I should say that this is a transaction "c.o.d."

If this law is enacted under these conditions, I am bound to say that we will fight it to the bitter end by all legal and constitutional means. And yet such is the attitude that you will characterize as being tantamount to disloyalty, cowardice, and desertion of a sacred cause, as some have dared to say.

Since the question of conscription has come up for discussion in the House of Commons, French Canadians have had to bear up under numerous attacks and under insinuations so framed as to be even more injurious than slanders. But English-speaking people should know by this time the history of our country; and, if they do not, they should learn it before proceeding further with their bitter denunciations. You understood, honourable gentlemen, did you not, why it never occurred to us that we should take those attacks too seriously, and why we have only answered them from time to time. If your numerous mushroom colonels who have been so bravely hurling insults at us had taken the trouble to open a book and study the history of our people, they would never have dared to talk about us as being slackers or poltroons. Every page of the peace treaties concerning the French Canadian race gives the lie to their insinuations and reproves their statements with a stinging irony. In reading the history of Canada, the mushroom colonels I am referring to, and birds of the same feather, would have learned that it is not in our blood to be afraid of firearms any more to-day than yesterday, since the first guarantee demanded by the treaties, the first precaution taken by the victors towards the handful of Frenchmen who remained here, always consisted in taking their firearms away from them. At all events, I suppose that the father of the Conscription Bill, the right honourable Prime Minister, who comes from Grand Pré, is not thinking of deporting and dispersing the French inhabitants of Quebec, as were expelled the faithful and unfortunate Acadians, in whose name, I suppose, the honourable gentleman from Shediac (Hon. Mr. Poirier) spoke yesterday, thanking this Government for what their forefathers had done against his people.

Speaking about mushroom colonels, let me refer for a moment to a matter of history in this country. This is not the first time the French Canadians have been attacked. We have been similarly attacked since the cession of Canada to Great Britain. In 1760, at the time of the cession, we were accused of being cowards. But who were those who accused us? What was their calling in life? I will quote from a book—not a French book, not even a Canadian book, but one published in England, "The History of Canada," by Kingsford—to prove what sort of men were those who, after the cession, so unjustly accused the French Canadians of cowardice. There are some of their offspring in this country to-day, but, thank God, the great majority of my English-speaking fellow-citizens are honourable men and do not hold the same opinions as certain people in Toronto. What does Kingsford say about those who were slandering the French Canadian race after the cession, and who took to task the then Governor General of Canada, General Murray, for giving justice to those to whom justice was due? Here is the report which General Murray made to the Earl of Shelburne, as taken from the history of Canada, by Kingsford, volume 5, page 188:

> The whole population, exclusive of the King's troops, doth amount to 76,675 souls of which in the parishes are nineteen Protestant families, the rest of that persuasion, a few half-pay officers excepted, are traders, mechanics, and publicans, who reside in the two towns of Quebec and Montreal. Most of them were followers of the army, of mean education, or soldiers disbanded at the reduction of the troops. All have their fortunes to make, and I fear few of them are solicitous about the means when the end can be obtained. I report them to be in general the most immoral collection of men I ever knew; of course little calculated to make the new subjects enamoured with our laws, religion and customs, far less adapted to enforce these laws and to govern.

I desire to say here that those men, especially in Toronto, by whom we are so bitterly attacked, must be the descendants of that "immoral collection of men" following the army who, in order to make their fortunes, were ready to do anything to crush the French population, the first inhabitants of the country, who were trying to respect and obey the laws under which they were living.

There is another point, one which the honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien), who preceded me, has tried to impress upon us: it is the German scare. Last evening the honourable gentleman pictured our population in the hands of the Germans, our churches destroyed or burned, and the population of this country dispersed. Honourable gentlemen, it seems to me that the German scare was not very great in England a short time ago, for I recall a speech which was made in December, 1898, by Joseph Chamberlain, the father of Imperialism. Speaking at Leicester, Mr. Chamberlain said:

> The natural alliance is between ourselves (that is, England) and the great German Empire.

Mr. Chamberlain only nineteen years ago declaring that the natural ally of England was Germany! That, I admit, is not the present position, but I do not see why the German scare should be so great. If we are not afraid of handling firearms when need be, there is another fear which we in Quebec are equally proud not to know, and that is the German scare.

There is a laughable picture clumsily drawn to stir us up and win us to conscription; that is, the coming of the Boches—it is a repetition of what the honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) said yesterday—our country occupied, our homes in ruins, Halifax, Quebec, Montreal, Toronto, under a shower of shells, and even Mr. Cochrane's mines destroyed! Along this line of thought, a pretentious saying was coined which does not lack a certain literary effect, but which, when looked at closely, sadly reflects upon the Allies. "Our first line of defence is in Flanders," is the eloquent cry going up in Parliament and in public meetings. We have heard that cry from the lips of the honourable leader of the Government and from the honourable gentleman from Montarville. I really do not know how much deceit or how much sincerity enters the minds of those who have invented and invent these and similar ghastly stories, but I heard them the other day fall with so much seriousness from the lips of as grave a personage as the honourable Minister of Trade and Commerce that I hasten to allay his fears. If any one feels a great anxiety about Mr. Cochrane's mines and Mr. Flavelle's bacon, we are not in the least worried in this respect in Quebec, and such silly talk will never convince us of the necessity for conscription. No, the German nightmare does not obcess us to that extent. We do not allow ourselves to entertain doubts that are so offensive concerning the valour, courage, and power of resistance of the French, English, and Belgian troops fighting overseas for their own homes; nor do we think that it is absolutely necessary to send over a handful of Canadians to prevent the soldiers of the Kaiser from trampling the Allied armies under their feet.

That we should be afraid of the Boches here? That we should fear an attack from them? That we should dread our country being occupied? But do they not realize that, in having recourse to such an argument to make us favourable to conscription, they are, on the contrary, furnishing us with a most formidable proof of the ineffectiveness of conscription? Does this fact not mean, and publicly acknowledge—to the high gratification of the Boches, I am sure—that out of the two hundred million Russians and thirty million Italians; out of the forty million French and seven million Belgians, who constantly have before their eyes to stimulate their courage and excite their anger the red glare of their burning homes; out of the forty-five million English who daily find among ruins the blood-stained limbs of their wives and children, and who have but to step across the Channel to witness the carnage of their own people; out of the one hundred million Americans who have ringing in their ears the groans of the Lusitania victims—does it not, I say, attest that the conscription which they want to force upon us has not, after all, succeeded in drawing out of these five hundred milions enough brave men to stand their ground against peoples notably inferior in numbers? I do not see that any other conclusion can be arrived at in regard to the usefulness of conscription, especially if we take into consideration that we have succeeded under voluntary enlistment, without being bound in any way, as far as Canada is concerned, in recruiting over 430,000 men out of our seven millions, and sent them to the battlefields over the seas.

No, this picture of the German scare does not worry us a bit. But, in the event of such an unlikely occurrence, should it happen that for the lack of a few hundred thousand Canadians more the mass of our Allies were to be overthrown by the Huns, with the terrible results which may well be imagined for the Board of Trade of Toronto, the nickel mines of Mr. Cochrane, the cold storage plants of Mr. Flavelle, the shoe factories of Mr. Ames, as well as for the dividends of steel company shareholders and manufacturers of munitions, in all of which are directly interested quite a few members of both Houses—well, I maintain even then that it would not be for the Americans and the peoples of Europe to put to shame our small Canadian nation, any more than the Prime Minister of England or the President of the United States could make our Canadian Prime Minister bow his head. What would be patent to all would be that they had not made for themselves one-half the effort that we have contributed for them. And I assure you that would have no weight with me in favour of conscription.

Is the Conscription Bill necessary? I answer no. One of the reasons why there have not been more enlistments in Quebec is that the affairs of the Militia Department have been improperly administered. It will be sufficient for me to state what happened at the opening of the Valcartier camp. 33,000 men were sent there, a good percentage being French Canadians, although the majority were English-born. It was said by the English officers and soldiers: "We do not want any French Canadians—the war will be very short." They said that it would be a big picnic for them to go to France, and that they would carry the day easily. That was the opinion of the English-born element. More than that, the French Canadians were insulted and discouraged from enlisting. The English officers decided to have their mess separate from that of the French Canadians, and not to associate with them. The Governor General had to come in and rebuke those officers. While the Governor General was there, an English lieutenant endeavored to pass in front of a French Canadian colonel who was a member of the staff, and who told him that he had no right to pass. What was the result? He was insulted. He, a good French-Canadian soldier, resented the insult, and, as a consequence, this mean, small officer had to spend two or three days in camp under his tent. These are some of the incidents that were reported to me. I intended to bring them up in the House, but I was told by French officers that it would be no use, that it would simply make matters worse. So French-Canadian officers and soldiers were continually insulted. I am glad to add that in the majority of cases the insults were offered by Englishmen, men not born in this country; but, considering the circumstances, is it surprising that the enlistments among French Canadians were not greater?

Sir Wilfred Laurier was himself insulted by Tory papers accusing him of not assisting in recruiting, when, as a matter of fact, he spoke in many places in the province of Quebec, urging men to enlist, and, though he was doing as many Liberal leaders have done, that was the treatment he received. If proper men had been put in proper places, not only 5,000 men but 50,000 would have enlisted. I say without hesitation that if Sir Wilfrid Laurier were to come into power to-morrow, and call for more men under this same voluntary system, within a very short time we should have 20,000 more French soldiers, many of them from Ontario, provided they were officered by men of their own race.

We have not even received credit for what we have done. According to the records, we have given 14,000 men. I challenged that statement in the House and asked the Government to give me an opportunity to go through the records of the Militia Department without cost to the Government, and I would prove that more than 25,000 French Canadians had enlisted; but the Government has refused to accept that challenge. While speaking on this matter, I will read from the Montreal Star of the 30th of October, 1916, an article taken from the New Witness, which is as follows:

> The first Canadian contingent contained 5,000 French Canadian volunteers. Since this contingent left Canada, six battalions of French Canadians, containing in all 7,200 men, have been raised in the province of Quebec. At least twenty-five per cent of the Scotch and English battalions of the province—7,000 men—are French Canadians. The Maritime provinces have furnished a French Canadian battalion of 1,200 strong, while some 3,000 French have enlisted in the other battalions of those provinces, Ontario and the West have furnished at least 4,000 French Canadian volunteers, who have enrolled in English regiments. If we added to the 27,400 already mentioned the French Canadians of the Army Medical Corps, the Army Service Corps, the Engineers, and the battalion of foresters (ninety per cent of whose personnel is French Canadian), we should probably find that at least 40,000 French Canadians were enrolled in the Canadian army at the time when the article of the correspondent of the Times was written. For the purposes of this argument, however, we may put the figure at 35,000. But the statistics previously cited for the enlistment of the Canadian-born population must now be rearranged. The 20,600 added to the French Canadians must be deducted from the English Canadians enlistment. In other words, taking the figures of the 1911 census as a basis for calculation, 1.7 per cent. of the French Canadians have enlisted, as against 1.9 per cent of the English Canadians, in whose favour the balance has been deliberately inclined. It is needless to comment upon these figures.

When National Service cards were sent out in Quebec everybody was anxious to sign them and to assist the Government. I read an article from the Quebec Chronicle of the 9th of January, 1917, which says:

> It cannot be made too clear that both the public men and the clergy of the province of Quebec are doing their duty towards National Service and doing it well. Illustrations of this fact are furnished by the public meetings held last Sunday in three of the leading French districts of the province. While illness prevented the presence of the Hon. Dr. Blondin, M.P., at the Plessisville meeting, it was announced by Cure Dupuis, and addressed with much success by Mr. H. A. Sirois, representing Colonel Chauveau, while three Cures of the neighbourhood summoned the Fraserville meeting which was also largely attended, and was addressed by a number of public men, including Mr. Gauvreau, M.P. At Montmagny again, the Rev. Mr. Grenier was amongst the speakers of the day. As was so well said the other day by the Montreal Gazette, "the strongest pronouncements against the work of the National Service are coming from English-speaking provinces, and in some cases at least originate with men of English birth. In Quebec, where representative bodies or representative men have spoken, in French, the National Service has been commended. The attempt to make it appear that Quebec is the recalcitrant and disagreeable member of the federation family is getting some bumps over the facts."

As we all know, the Quebec Chronicle is a Government organ, controlled and published by General Watson, now at the front. The article which I have just read from that paper confirms what I have said, that in cases where we have been called upon we have done our duty in the past, as we are doing it to-day, and doing it freely and frankly, as men ought to do. But we do not want to be coerced or compelled to do it. How is it that some of the best French officers in the country were put aside? How is it that General Lessard was not given an appointment, and that General Landry of Quebec was nearly left out in the cold? What has not been said about Quebec and Sir Wilfrid Laurier? I do not know whether Sir Wilfrid Laurier will be the new Prime Minister or not; I hope he will. I no not know whether he will resign the leadership of the party or not. But all I know is that, defeated or successful, leading the party or otherwise, in this country Sir Wilfrid Laurier will always be head and shoulders above the ministers of the day, above those who have slandered him, above those who have deserted him, particularly at this crucial moment, not for the party, but for the country. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberals and the French Canadians are not cowards. You must remember, especially you Liberals, what happened in 1896 on the question of provincial autonomy in Manitoba. We were then fighting for the principle of autonomy. There was strong opposition to us Liberals in Quebec, especially to Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Religion was somewhat mixed with politics on account of the Remedial Bill; the clergy were fighting us; but, taking our political life in our hands, because we thought we were right, and that it was a free question, we put our faith in the people, and we won. Though it was a burning question, the people of Quebec were not more stampeded then than they would be now if this Conscription Bill were submitted to them. Sir Wilfrid Laurier came back to power after that great fight, and the great principle of autonomy triumphed. He remained in office for fifteen years, and I may say that he kept in office those who to-day, on a principle still greater, I maintain, than the one fought on in 1896—those who now desert him, and on so liberal and democratic a question.

I do not see why to-day these Liberals, as we from Quebec did in 1896, do not take their political lives in their hands, if necessary, and show their confidence in the people. This all goes to show that neither Sir Wilfrid Laurier nor the Liberals nor the people of Quebec are cowards. When a question is put fairly before them, they are able to decide of their own free will. They do not like to be compelled to do what they are willing to do of their own accord, in military matters or otherwise. I repeat, let them have officers of their own race, who understand their language; let them have chaplains of their own religion, and within a month there will be twenty-five or thirty thousand more Frenchmen willing to go to the front. The French Canadians were not only insulted in camp, but also in this House, and I was myself one of the victims. Last session the honourable member for St. John (Hon. Mr. Daniel) took the liberty of saying that he was ashamed that I had said in this House on April 21 the following:

> In Quebec I have seen men walking about the streets for twelve months. They are good men, and I have nothing to say against them, but for the past year they have been putting in their time going to the theatres and cafés.

It was a very plain matter to an outsider. Why should so many soldiers be loafing in the streets when they are paid by the Government for going to the war, having freely enlisted? Why should they not, then, be sent to the front? I was taken to task for having said so, though it was absolutely true. In the House of Commons Debates of January 30, 1917, I find, on page 273, the following statement of Sir Sam Hughes, ex-minister of Militia:

> I wish to relate another incident. One day I drove fifteen miles through the Valcartier camp, and I found 21 officers on duty out of some 1,500. Having made inquiries, I found that the fishing was good up in the mountains, and that the company was very genial at the summer hotels. In other words, the whole camp had degenerated early in the game into a huge picnic party.

Though the Minister of Militia made that strong statement against the soldiers, and especially the officers, the honourable member for St. John never opened his mouth to rebuke him, probably because he was an Englishman. Why should we have so many officers and soldiers sent on a picnic like that, an enormous sum of money spent every day for nothing, as money is now spent for the thousands of officers who are picnicking in London, and, in spite of that have the Conscription Bill to compel more men to enlist? I see in Quebec to-day men in khaki walking on the streets, rich young bachelors under thirty, who were in camp in 1914. Why not send them to the front? Some of them knew that I was going to speak in this House and came and begged of me not to name them. I promised them, but I hope that they will be very soon sent to the front, or will discard their khaki dress and cease to draw their big salaries. The small places they are filling in Quebec, I am told by competent men, might very easily be filled by wounded returned soldiers. Yet, in spite of that, the Government is asking that men be taken from the farms and sent to the front. Is this not a disgrace? Let us proceed first with the men who have already enlisted, and then, if it is absolutely necessary, we will send more.

It has been said that only the province of Quebec is against the Conscription Bill; yet, in the other House, almost thirty members from Ontario and the West have declared from their seats that if a referendum on it were granted, the Bill would be defeated. That shows how the Government respects the people's will.

The day before yesterday I received the following letter from a man in Toronto, who asked me not to give his name, because if it were published the bank with which he is doing business would crush him. He writes:

Conscription has created much gossip in this part of Ontario, especially in big-hearted Toronto, and more especially against your native province. We have an element of ineligibles who are the loudest talkers in favour of conscription, as they well understand that their hides will not be taken off; but the younger element is strongly opposed to it but do not talk loudly. They are doing much thinking, and if a referendum could be given us the question would be decided. Bordenites are divided, and everything points to defeat of his party in the coming general election, which cannot be far away. Old time Tories like myself have never so far recognized Borden's Government only as a mongrel government. All petitions that are gotten up here for the holding of pro-conscription meetings in Toronto are signed by ineligible persons of over 45 years of age and this fact impresses itself upon the young and eligible men very much. Native-born eligibles up here are saying: I thank God for such men as the Quebec Canadians; and say: You may lead Quebeckers, but you cannot drive them. Give us a referendum.

That shows the feeling in Toronto—and I have several dozens of letters like that.

It is not necessary for me to read what Baron Shaughnessy and other prominent men have said about conscription. From an important Montreal paper, the Pharmaceutical Journal, the organ of the Pharmaceutical Association of the whole of Canada, of June 28, 1917, I take this extract:

If it could be seen that Canada could, from this on, help more by producing food and necessary requirements for Great Britain and for the war than by sending 100,000 more men and as a consequence fail in production, what a solution it would be! It would avoid a disruption of our people; it would avoid national bankruptcy—for we must produce to be able to pay our increasing liabilities; and finally it would ensure its natural future to Canada.

This paper says what every business man asserts, that what is necessary is food and munitions, not men. What would you do with 100,000 men if you could not feed them? Is it right to say that if we send 100,000 more men the Allies will have victory? No. Keep the men on the farms and in the factories here, and you will get better results over there. Though we are against conscription, we are all willing to help voluntarily, though for my part I do not believe that when the Empire is at war Canada is at war. I am willing to do my share, but I believe that the production of food and sending it to Europe is what is necessary to beat the enemy.

Honourable gentlemen have said that they are in this war for liberty and for humanity. That is all very true. But I find that no less a man than Sir George Foster, speaking in Toronto before the Canadian Club on the 6th of November, 1916, was reported in the Toronto Telegram as follows:

Sir George outlined the work of the conference at which the allied nations of Japan, France, Russia, Belgium, Serbia, Britain, Italy were represented, and pointed out the findings of the conference were absolutely unanimous. "This war is not an offensive war, but a war of defence," said Sir George. "It is not only a challenge at arms, it is also a challenge of economic superiority."

Thus we see that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, coming direct from the war-zone, says that it is a war for economic superiority. Is it, then, also advisable for us in Canada to bleed ourselves to send men over there? England has never asked for men, still less for conscription. I find a Canadian Associated Press despatch, which I translate as follows:

The Canadian Associated Press is authorized to say that the attention of Hon. Walter Long, secretary of state for the Colonies, was drawn to the publication of despatches saying that Sir Robert Borden had proposed conscription in Canada because he had been forced to do so by the Imperial War Cabinet. Mr. Long declared that there was not the least foundation for this claim, and that Sir Robert Borden had not been forced to impose conscription either by the Imperial War Cabinet or by the Conference. The question had never been mentioned, and the last thing which the members of the English Government would do would be to intervene in a matter which affected only Canada. Mr. Long added that he had seen Sir Robert Borden frequently, up to the day of his departure from London, and when he departed Mr. Long had not the least suspicion that conscription would be imposed in Canada. He added that he regretted that conscription was to come to this country to divide the races in the country.

Now, we know that public sentiment cannot have free expression in this country. We know that shortly after the commencement of the war, when Mr. Bourassa came to Ottawa to express his views on this question, he was prevented from speaking in the Russell Theatre by men wearing the King's uniform. We know that meetings have been prevented at Toronto and at Winnipeg, and that within the past few days soldiers have gone so far as to wreck a church in England where a peace meeting was being held, and break up the meeting. So we see that free expression of opinion on this important question is prevented.

Now I wish to address myself especially to the honourable leader of the Government. When the Naval Bill was before the Senate in 1910, I had to take a stand against my friends. I took the same stand on that important Bill as I am taking on this one, because it was going to change the political situation of this country and make us take part in the business of the Empire. I took the position that such an important question ought to go before the people. I took that stand honestly and independently, as I do now. When that Naval Bill came before the Senate, the present honourable leader of the Government here moved an amendment about similar to the one that has been moved in the House of Commons in regard to this Military Service Bill. That amendment read as follows:

> That all the words after the first word "That" be struck out and the following inserted:
> This House is not justified in giving its assent to this Bill until it is submitted to the judgment of the people.

I voted with him on that. I should have been glad to have him vote with me this time.

Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You had better come with me.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: The amendment moved on this side of the House is that we ought to consult the people, and I do not see why my honourable friend should change his view on a question that is more important than the Naval Bill of 1910, for the principle at stake in this instance is much greater. It is a question of life and liberty for the people of this country. This Bill is brought forward by a moribund Government, one-fourth of the seats in the Commons being vacant, and these same words are before us now, asking us to vote that before the Bill is enforced we should consult the people. What harm is there in that? My honourable friend will probably vote against that. He will then be in the same position as the honourable member from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien): he changes his view. I believe in the people. They may be wrong sometimes, but not very often. When they pronounce on a question which is fairly put before them, their general opinion is pretty correct. I am of the same opinion as that expressed by the Right Hon. Mr. Balfour in the other House, when he used the following words:

> We are convinced that for every human combination who have reached the degree of civilization and development that has been reached by all the great western communities, there is but one form of government, under whatever name it may be called, and that is the government in which the ultimate control lies with the people.

If there is a political question on which the liberty and life of the people are at stake, let them have their say on it, and especially so, as I said before—and I cannot insist too much on that—when the mandate of those representing them has expired. The present question involves all that is dear to the electors of this country—the leaving of their homes, their families, their fathers and mothers, their sisters and brothers, to go and have their lives taken from them. If there is a question that ought to appeal to every man, especially to every Liberal, every real democrat, it is this one, because those especially interested in it are those who will pay with their money and their lives. If, under our form of Government, the ultimate control, as Mr. Balfour said, lies with the people, it is the very time to apply this principle. As for myself, being against conscription, I would rather vote for the six months hoist; but I am willing to put aside my strong antipathy for the Conscription Bill, because by this motion, if it is adopted, the people will have the last say. Put the Act on the Statute Book if it pleases you. I do not like that, but I will accept it provided you ask the electors whether it shall be enforced or not. If there is an election and conscription, I will be the first to say to my friends and compatriots: "Vox populi vox Dei—if you have no legal or constitutional means to oppose it, your duty is to submit to the law and go;" and with me they will all bow to the will of the people. That is the reason why, though with reluctance, I will vote for the amendment.

Hon. E. L. GIRROIR: Honourable gentlemen, I do not propose to follow the honourable member from Grandville (Hon. Mr.

Choquette) in all the arguments which he has made, as there are some questions which he has discussed of which I know absolutely nothing. There is one point, however, upon which he and I can agree, and it is this, that neither of us is especially afraid of the Germans. I admire the honourable gentleman's courage and valour in that respect, and, with these few remarks regarding what he has said, I shall proceed to discuss this question as I understand it and believe it should be discussed.

I intervene in this debate to say that I am opposed to conscription as much as I am opposed to war and rapine and plunder. I believe in the fullest liberty, the widest liberty. I am opposed to militarism, which has been the curse of Europe, and it is for these very reasons that with all my heart I support this Bill.

I have heard many arguments in opposition to this measure which would be all very well in time of peace, but which, in my humble opinion, have no application under present conditions. We all love peace, but surely that does not prevent us from realizing that our rule of conduct in time of peace would be a very silly rule to follow in time of war.

In peace there's nothing so becomes a man
As modest stillness and humility;
But when the blast of war blows in our ears,
Then imitate the action of the tiger—
Stiffen the sinews, summon up the blood.

We all wish to win this war, but are we not tempting fate if we do not take the sternest measures to ensure a lasting victory?

Let us pause for a moment to consider what Germany stands for and the system under which we would have to live if she were victorious.

General Friedrich von Bernhardi, a German military officer, in his book, "Germany and the Next War," a translation of which was published in this country in 1914, said, speaking of the Hague Convention:

But it is quite another matter if the object is to abolish war entirely and to deny its necessary place in historical development. This aspiration is directly antagonistic to the great universal laws which rule all life. War is a biological necessity of the first importance, a regulative element in the life of mankind which cannot be dispensed with, since without it an unhealthy development will follow, which excludes every advancement of the race and therefore all real civilization. War is the father of all things. The sages of antiquity long before Darwin recognized this.

In such cases might gives the right to occupy or to conquer. Might is at once the supreme right, and the dispute as to what is right is decided by the arbitrament of war. War gives a biologically just decision, since its decision rests on the very nature of things.

The apostles of the peace idea must be confronted with Goethe's manly words:

Dreams of a peaceful day
Let him dream who may.
War is our rallying cry,
Onward to victory!

Then he says:

Thus we must look at the business of war or the sword with the eyes of men asking, why these murders and horrors? It will be shown that it is a business divine in itself, and as needful and necessary as eating or drinking or any other work.

Let those, then, whose desire it is to live in peace, who think we should be permitted to till the soil and continue in our peaceful occupations rather than be forced to take up arms in this struggle, ponder over the words of this exponent of German thought. Is it possible that we in Canada object to sending a small proportion of our population to the fighting line to prevent the propagation of these German ideals, and that we have no fear of the German military system, which compels every man of military age to bear arms, and which imposes on its population even in times of peace the most rigid militarism the world has ever seen? Surely we are prepared to make a stern effort to prevent the establishment in this country of the rankest kind of militarism under German domination. We are asked, honourable gentlemen, nothing more than this, that we adopt compulsory military service temporarily in order that it may not be permanently imposed on this country.

But it has been said there is no danger to Canada from Germany. I have never been able to discover on what that assumption is based. But if it were true, would we, a part of this great Empire —which is fighting for liberty and freedom and justice to all—to the weak as well as to the strong, which is battling for the greatest cause for which war was ever waged—would we, I say, be playing the part of men if, because we, isolated as we are, far removed if you will, from the actual scene of the conflict, refused to come to the assistance of England, Scotland, Ireland and Wales, which may suffer an attack at any moment? Remember, also, that nothing stands between Germany and Canada but the British fleet.

Britain has, with her armies and her fleet, protected us for centuries. We Canadians, no matter in what part of the world we might be, were able in every danger or difficulty to call for the protection of the strong arm of the motherland. And when that mother calls out to us for help, are we to reply: "Canada is not in danger?" Surely we are not going to render ourselves unworthy of the great races from which we have sprung, those races that because of their sterling manhood, their courage and fidelity, have so long dominated the world and shaped its course.

This Empire and her Allies are holding back and pushing back the German hordes in a struggle the greatest the world has ever seen. There is as yet, I am bound to say, no striking gain on either side that has not been compensated for by a corresponding gain on the other. Do we realize that Germany to-day holds 548,537 square kilometres of territory seized by her since this war began? Against this we could show 900 square kilometres held by France and 25,500 square kilometres by Russia, which is fast disappearing from Russian control. Let me give you the items that make up these figures. Germany holds to-day, in Belgium, 28,980 square kilometres of territory; in France, 19,220; in Russia, 280,490; in Roumania, 100,000; in Serbia, 85,867; in Montenegro, 14,180; in Albania, 20,000. Mr. Arthur Henderson, of the war council, estimates that seven millions of men have already been killed in this war; that the total casualties of the war exceed the whole population of Great Britain and Ireland; that as many young men have already been crippled for life or severely wounded in Europe as there are of the same age in all the United States.

Can any one, seeing these things, knowing these facts, say there is no danger? Why, honourable gentlemen, the whole world is in danger. No one can truthfully say that England is not in danger. Her ships are sunk on the high seas, of which she has been so long the undisputed mistress. Her coasts are bombarded—a thing never before believed possible. Even innocent school children, little boys and girls of tender age, are ruthlessly slain. Any one who reads the press must be impressed with the seriousness of the situation. And yet they tell us that we are not hearing the worst. The very heart of the Empire has been invaded on sea and in the air; lives and treasure have been destroyed at the very foot of the throne.

What is the situation in Russia to-day? Is it not alarming? Miles of territory are being wrenched from the grasp of one of the most powerful of our allies. Thousands of her soldiers are being made prisoners. Guns and ammunition and supplies that have cost the allies untold millions and the value of which, measured by the toil and labour and sweat and blood even, that it has cost us to put them on the Russian front, is enormous, are daily falling into the hands of our enemies. Will Russia be able to recover herself? Will that mighty nation on which we counted for so much assistance be a hindrance instead of a help to victory? I will leave it to some of those wiseacres who seem to me to be like Nero, fiddling while Rome burned, to answer that question. And if Russia fails us, do you think it will be less fatal to our finances than the sending of some of our workers, if you like, to France and to Flanders? It does seem to me, though I am no captain of industry, that we are tied up with England and with Russia and the rest of our allies, financially, as well as otherwise, and that our future prosperity and financial security depend more upon whether we can secure an early victory than on the number of workers that we shall have left in Canada now or after the war.

Some seem to think that we can win this war without making sacrifices; that the business of this country can go on as usual while we are beating Germany. I am not of this opinion. I believe that Germany will fight to the last ditch and that we shall have to work for victory—yes, fight for it with our coats off. This morning's papers tell us that there is gloom and anxiety in London. It is plain, is it not, that the great drive that has succeeded a fortnight of intense artillery preparation, has not been entirely successful.

We have lost Lens; we have lost Westhoeck. Our brave boys are falling bleeding and dying; are we going to smile and smile, and theorize, and argue over things that can well wait, or shall we send men to replace them, not next month or next year, but now when they are wanted?

The danger is self-evident; it is appalling. I am not an alarmist, I hope, but I believe we owe it to those who have placed in our keeping this great heritage that we take no chances. The system of our defence is a chain of many links. What if one of those links should break? Is it not a fact, an undeniable fact, that some of those links have already been strained almost to the breaking point? The output of ships in the whole world in 1916 was about two million tons, and in the last four months the enemy has sunk about a million and three-quarter tons of British shipping alone. Lord Beresford, in the British House of Lords, in a debate which took place about July 26, said:

The statistics showed that between August, 1914, and January, 1917, the British, allied and neutral loss was 4,000,000 tons sunk. From January, 1917, until now we had lost nearly 4,000,000 more. The average rate of loss, taking the months from January till now, was 8,000,000 tons a year. When we commenced war there was 49,000,000 tons of shipping in the world, of which the British, allies and neutrals had 30,000,000. That has been reduced already by 8,000,000 tons.

His opinion was that now we had not much more that 22,000,000 or 23,000,000 tons. Against that we had to consider what the Americans could put in the water, including ships taken from the Germans, which was about 2,000,000 tons; but a large number of these ships were not suitable for cargo carrying. The output of the British and the allies was about 2,500,000 tons. After the first two years of war shipbuilding went down terrifically, so we were not nearly beginning to make it up.

He did not think we could make up altogether more than 4,000,000 tons a year.

They had not only to consider the shortage in steel, but the shortage in engines, too. He thought the position very dangerous and asked the Government once more to alter the returns of losses which were most misleading. They put in the arrivals and departures of all ships, but only the losses of British ships and did not put in the tonnage which was really the whole question.

Do we, honourable gentlemen, sitting here in this House, believe and understand this situation better than a man like Lord Beresford, who sits in the House of Lords, at the very seat of government of this great Empire, and who is in a better position than we are to obtain the facts? Is not that alarming? Is not that a hard blow at England, who depends mostly on these ships to supply her with food? And if England, the heart of the Empire, is in danger, does that not involve the colonies? If the heart ceases to beat will the blood continue to flow through the arteries, animating the whole body of the Empire with life and warmth and vigour. When the flag of England is swept from the seven seas, God help Canada.

We are told that we should not fight so far away from home, that we should wait until the shores of Canada are attacked before we undertake to make a defence. I cannot agree with that position. I think that on this question we should take the conclusive evidence which is furnished by the action of the Government of the United States, a power that did everything that it was possible for any power to do to keep out of this war, a power whose doctrines and teachings have been from the first that it should not interfere in European wars. This nation, holding these views, has been forced into the struggle because it knows that if England, or France, or Russia is conquered, if the British fleet is swept from the seas, then the shores of America will be attacked. The people of the United States know and realize that it would then be too late to defend their liberties, their privileges and institutions, which they all hold so dear. Let me quote Secretary Lansing, addressing the members of the Officers Reserve Corps:

Emphasizing the peril of German imperialism to the United States and the world, he declared his belief that the German people would not cast off the yoke of autocracy "until the physical might of the united democracies of the world have destroyed forever the evil ambitions of the military rulers of Germany." That, he added, is the only way to restore the peace of the world.

Mr. Lansing sought to drive home to the student officers the righteousness of the cause for which they had volunteered to go to France and fight, asserting that the allies would win "because our cause is the cause of justice and of right and humanity."

Asserting that "the future of the United States is at stake," Secretary Lansing said that "if any of you have the idea that we are fighting others' battles and not our own, the sooner he gets away from that idea the better it will be for him, the better it will be for all of us."

"Imagine Germany victor in Europe because the United States remained neutral. Who then, think you, would be the next victim of those who are seeking to be masters of the whole earth? Would not this country with its enormous wealth arouse the cupidity of an impoverished though triumphant Germany? Do you think that they would withhold their hand from so rich a prize?

"Let me then ask you, would it be easier or wiser for this country single-handed to resist a German Empire, flushed with victory and with great armies and navies at its command, than to unite with the brave enemies of that empire in ending now and for all time this menace to our future?

"Primarily then, every man who crosses the ocean to fight on foreign soil against the armies of the German Emperor, goes forth to fight for his country and for the preservation of those things for which our forefathers were willing to die. To those who thus offer themselves we owe the same debt that we owe to those men who in the past fought on American soil in the cause of liberty."

I subscribe to every word that is uttered by that able statesman of the United States.

If, then, there is danger, how can we meet it? Not, in my opinion, by sending food and supplies alone, not by sending men alone, but by sending both food and supplies and men to the fighting line. Lord Kitchener early in this war called for men and yet more men, and every one in a position to know what is required has ever since re-echoed that call. Have you ever heard of any one in a high office in any of the allied countries, at the front or elsewhere, who has not at one time or another emphasized the need for men? The Premier of this Dominion, bearing manfully and well the great responsibilities which this titanic struggle has placed upon him comes home from the front with a full knowledge of conditions there, and one of his very first acts is to make the statement to Parliament that it would be necessary to introduce a measure of compulsory service. The men now in the trenches, or who have been in the trenches, say that the great need is for more men. This is clear from their letters home and from the resolutions passed in support of this Bill by the different War Veterans Associations. Only last night Sir Robert Borden on Parliament Hill addressed the returned soldiers of this city, and when he told them that we were going to send more men to assist their comrades who were dying and falling in the cause of liberty and justice at the front, his words were cheered to the echo by those wounded men. After all, are not these men the best judges of what is required in order to complete what we have set out to accomplish—to overpower, as I have already said, a well-organized and powerful enemy? Sir Robert Borden tells us that Germany has added one million men to her fighting line this spring. She has added guns and ammunition and supplies as well. Could she have done without any one of these things? Are we to believe that any one seriously contemplates leaving our men to be killed off one by one, well fed it may be, but without adequate reserves of Canadians to replace and relieve them? Such a thought is, I believe, unworthy of our great ancestry, and should not be entertained for a moment.

The voluntary system has not been an absolute failure with regard to the number that have enlisted under it. It has failed miserably to obtain results at all adequate to the sacrifices it has entailed on the manhood of our country.

There seems to be a general opinion in this country that we have sent more men in proportion to our population than any other part of the Empire. Mr. N. W. Rowell, the great Liberal leader in Ontario, speaking on July 10, at Harrington, Ontario, said that had Canada done as well proportionately as her sister dominions in furnishing men for the battle line in France and Belgium, she would have sent overseas, up to February last, 20,000 more men than had gone. The magnificent work of the Canadians on the firing line, said Mr. Rowell, had placed Canada among the leaders of the nations of the earth, but people should not feel because of this that she has done her share. Figures corrected up to February first showed that Canada, with a population of eight millions, had sent 284,400 men overseas. Australia, with a population of 4,900,000, had sent 300,000 men overseas; New Zealand, with a population of 1,100,000 had sent 65,000 men to the front; South Africa, with an European population of 1,276,242, had contributed 60,000 men to the war; Newfoundland, out of a total population of 250,000, had sent 31,000 men. Canada, the largest and most thickly populated of Britain's colonies, has sent only a little more than 3½ per cent of her population, while Australia has sent six per cent, New Zealand six per cent, South Africa five per cent, and Newfoundland twelve per cent. Great Britain, continued Mr. Rowell, has given more than three men, and France more than four men, for every one given by Canada.

Lady Aberdeen, speaking at New York on July 15, declared that Ireland had given 310,000 recruits to the allied cause since the war started, 140,000 having enlisted from Ireland, and 170,000 men of Irish birth having enlisted in England. She declared that Ireland, with a population of four millions, had sent a greater proportion of her manhood into the fight than had Canada.

I believe these figures are substantially correct and ought to be a complete answer to those who say Canada has done enough. Those who say that Canada has done enough mean that Canada has done her share. It seems to me that what each nation at war with the Central Powers must and should do is its utmost. Nothing short of that will bring this war to a speedy conclusion. Had Belgium and France waited until their Allies had done their share before throwing their whole available force into the conflict what would have been the result? The result would have been that Germany would ere now have conquered.

If we are to stay in this fight it is time we adopted some systematic way of securing the men we require. It is no answer to say that the Government has made mistakes; every Government does. The ex-Minister of Militia was not infallible. Sir Robert Borden at one time thought there would be no need of conscription; so did we all. If my memory serves me rightly, it is not so long since some of us thought there would be no war, and we said so. But war did come, and if conscription is necessary to win the war, and I believe it is, then I am for conscription.

The present Bill is a fair and equitable measure. Its very strongest feature is that it adopts the selective system. The burden is not, as under the voluntary system, all placed on the willing horse. The state benefits in that those most needed at home are kept there, while those best suited for work at the front are sent to the front. The individual benefits because those who have the greatest responsibilities at home remain there, while those who have lighter duties and less binding ties at home go to the fighting line. Can any man tell me that a system which compels this country to support the children and widows, the fathers and mothers of the men at the front, as against one which first sends there the men who are not charged with these responsibilities, is a rational system?

"But," it is said, "you have established courts of appeal to decide finally who should be selected; the rich man will appeal from one court to another, and the poor man, not being able to appeal, will suffer." Could we not apply the same argument to the poor man's position in our courts of law? And does any one suggest that we abolish our system of courts? Is the power of money greater with these courts than it would be without them? Ask yourselves this question. I do not fear the answer.

I am opposed to submitting this question to the electorate either by means of an election or by referendum, for the following reasons:

First, because, if this question were referred to the people, the soldiers at the front would not have an opportunity to vote.

Second, because those who failed to respond to the call would thus have a greater influence in determining the result than that to which in my opinion they are entitled.

Third, because in many parts of Canada the British and Canadian born men of military age have practically all enlisted, leaving there a foreign-born population, the majority of whom are opposed to Canada's participation in the war.

Fourth, because I fear that many of our people, though thoroughly loyal, are not in possession of the information in the hands of our military authorities and for this reason fail to realize the momentous character of the struggle in which we are engaged;

Fifth, because I believe that the referendum is opposed to our system of responsible government.

I do not think it can be questioned that we would find it practically impossible to record the votes of our soldiers. The hospitals, the trenches, yes, even the prisons of Germany, would have to be invaded by the returning officer in order that anything like a fair proportion of our fighting men could be given an opportunity to vote. Many are so sick from wounds and suffering that they could not be asked to vote, and these heroes are, in my humble opinion, the best entitled of all our people to have a hand in the determination of this question. Those who failed to respond, and their relatives and friends, would naturally seek to justify the stand they have in a manner taken against their going to the fighting line. I am not questioning their right to have stayed at home. Our system was a voluntary system, and the moment you question the right of any man to do as he pleases, to stay at home or go as to him seems right, you imply that the system is compulsory and not voluntary.

Is it not a fact, Sir, that in many parts of Canada the young men born within this Empire have practically all enlisted? Can you expect that the foreign-born population in these districts will have the same interest in this war as those brave fellows who have died and are dying that this great Empire shall live? Is it too much to say that the members of the two Houses of Parliament are in a better position to judge as to what measures are necessary in the present crisis than a large part of our population who have not been able to make as careful a study of the situation? I wish to reflect on no one, but surely this proposition is self-evident. It may be said that this is true of all questions. That may be, but no question that I know of has ever come before this country that is so vital to its very existence as this one. Under our form of government the people govern, it is true, but only through their representatives in Parliament. If every question that is to be decided by Parliament has to be first submitted to the people by referendum, then we must frame a new constitution. Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the Debate on the Naval Bill in 1912-13 made this clear. He said:—

I have only one word to say as to the sub-amendment which asks for a plebiscite. This has been discussed in the press at great length. Speaking as an admirer of the British system of parliamentary government, I do not see any possible reason why we should depart from the usage and rules of that system. Many of our friends derive their ideas upon such a proposal from the United States and from Switzerland, both republics, in which the executive is elected by the people for a term of years, and has no right to initiate legislation. But under the British parliamentary system we hold the executive responsible for their action or non-action, as the case may be; we hold them responsible for presenting necessary reforms and for failure to present such reforms. Therefore, while I am strongly in favour of consulting the people, I am in favour of that consultation, not by the method in vogue in the republic to the south of us or in Switzerland, but by means of a general election, which is the custom under the British parliamentary system.

And yet the leader of the Liberal party, the same man who in 1912 and 1913 uttered these words the other day rose in his place and moved that the matter be submitted to the people by means of a plebiscite.

If we were not at war and this question came before Parliament, I would favour an election; but since we are at war, and because I do not believe we should delay, I should like to see this law enacted as soon as possible. We are placed here with the responsibility of dealing with this question, and we have no right to shirk the responsibility or endeavour to escape it by placing it on the shoulders of others. We are bound, in our duty to Canada and the Empire, to act promptly and energetically. Precious time would be lost before a law based on a referendum or election could be enforced.

It is not an easy thing to give one's life for one's country. It is because it is so hard that such an Act is regarded rightly as the highest form of patriotism. Nevertheless, if the safety of the State requires it, if the preservation of our homes and our institutions require it, it has always been held that the sacrifice must be made; otherwise no country could maintain its integrity.

At the beginning of the war our leaders and public men defined the cause for which we are contending. Let me quote from a few of them. Mr. Asquith, then Prime Minister, spoke as follows in the House of Commons in England:

> If I am asked what we are fighting for, I reply in two sentences: in the first place, to fulfil a solemn international obligation, an obligation which, if it had been entered into between private persons in the ordinary concerns of life, would have been regarded as an obligation not only of law but of honour, which no self-respecting man could possibly have repudiated. I say, secondly, we are fighting to vindicate the principle which in these days, when force, material force, sometimes seems to be the dominant influence and factor in the development of mankind, we are fighting to vindicate the principle that small nationalities are not to be crushed, in defiance of international good faith, by the arbitrary will of a strong and overmastering power.

Sir Robert Borden, in our House of Commons, on August 19, 1914, made this statement:

> Not for love of battle, not for love of conquest, not for greed of possessions, but for the cause of honor, to maintain solemn pledges, to uphold principles of liberty, . . we have entered into this war.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the same debate said:

> The testimony of the ablest men of these nations, without dissenting voice, is that to-day the allied nations are fighting for freedom against oppression, for democracy against autocracy, for civilization against reversion to that state of barbarism in which the supreme law is the law of might.

Surely in a fight for such ideals we are prepared to make the greatest sacrifices. And not the least of the sacrifices that we should make would be to practice a little more moderation in our treatment of those who do not see eye to eye with us on this question. But while we are prepared to practice the greatest moderation in the discussion of this question, once the law is enacted by the majority of this Parliament I trust that no man will be permitted to defy it with impunity. Minorities have their rights, but the will of the majority must be final.

With a full realization of the magnitude of the struggle in which we are engaged, and of the great issues that are involved, issues so far-reaching and of such vital importance that if we should fail in securing a complete victory this world would be set back a thousand years, and the blood which our ancestors through the centuries that have passed have poured out for the sacred cause of liberty, security, and justice, would have been shed in vain—with these thoughts before us, I say, is it too much to ask that we put aside recrimination and fault-finding and racial prejudices and present an united and unyeilding front to the enemy? We have our internal disputes and disagreements which, after all, are the greatest stimulus to a vigorous and healthy manhood, and can do no real harm provided they are always kept subservient to national interests. Can we not let our special claims be filed away till the war is over, when our hearts, relieved from the great burden of anxiety which we have borne during three long years, will be opened with a wide and generous sympathy for our brothers in arms and a compelling desire to smooth away their difficulties.

May I be permitted to quote the concluding words of President Wilson's message to Russia, which expresses better than I can what I have in mind:

For these things we cannot afford to pour out blood and treasure; for these are the things we have always professed to desire; and unless we pour out blood and treasure now and succeed, we may never be able to unite or show a conquering force again in the great cause of human liberty. The day has come to conquer or submit. If the forces of autocracy can divide us, they can and will overcome us; if we stand together, victory is certain and the liberty which victory will secure. We can then afford to be generous, but we cannot afford then or now to be weak or omit any single guarantee of justice and security.

Let Canada, then, go into this fight with every sail unfurled. And when we have won a glorious victory, and the flags of that higher civilization for which we stand are planted on every summit and nailed to every masthead the world over, we will then, during a lasting peace, freed from the anxieties and worries which now beset us, put our own house in order.

I am very glad to be able to say, that in the province and county from which I come the young men of all races and creeds have done their part nobly and many have already paid the extreme penalty for their devotion to this country and this Empire. We are proud of their valour and of their loyalty. I cannot but mention the fact that in the Diocese of Antigonish the voice of His Lordship Bishop Morrison has been a potent factor in arousing our young men, encouraging them, and instilling into their minds lessons of loyalty and patriotism. He has in this respect in a sister province, New Brunswick, a worthy fellow-worker in the person of His Lordship Bishop LeBlanc, whose eloquent and noble appeal was so aptly quoted in the other House by Mr. Robidoux, the honourable member for Kent. It would be well if all our leaders and men of influence followed the example of these eminent bishops. In the years to come it will be said of them, in grateful remembrance by their people, that in a great and trying crisis in the history of this country their instinct of true leadership never once failed them, and that they directed the footsteps of their faithful flocks along the paths that would redound to their honour and glory and help to preserve for their children this splendid heritage.

Before I conclude I wish to say a few words in regard to the subject of a coalition government. I believe the time has come in the history of this country when men of all political parties should get together and try to form a government that will be able to enforce conscription. I realize that in some parts of the country the opposition to this measure is very strong and I believe that the representative men from those different parts, with the responsibilities which they have as members of this great commonwealth, should put aside their feelings with regards to racial, religious, or political differences, and stand shoulder to shoulder with men of other creeds and nationalities in this the greatest fight the world has ever seen for justice and for liberty. The great men of Canada in the past did this. We know that Confederation, which is the foundation of our national existence, was brought about by the union of men of different political parties. Men who were sworn enemies politically got together and laid the foundation upon which our national edifice stands. This country can never repay the debt it owes to men like Macdonald and Cartier, Brown, Tupper and Tilley. Those men gave a service to this country that our people will remember for all time to come; and I feel sure that, if a similar sacrifice were made by our leading men on both sides of politics now it would redound to their glory and that of this country in years to come. I know full well that it would be of the greatest possible assistance to Canada and to the Empire in this tremendous struggle. Surely the principles for which we are contending are worth the sacrifice. I know that I occupy a very small part in the political activities of this country, and I realize that my voice is a very feeble one, but feeble as it is, and uninfluential as I am, I do sincerely and from the bottom of my heart make this appeal—that, be we French or Irish or Scotch or English, Catholic or Protestant, Liberal or Conservative, we should get together once and for all, and stand as one man in the effort to win this war.

As a British subject I am proud of the splendid part which my country is playing in this great conflict. Her fleets and her armies have never once failed to live up to their glorious traditions. We realize to the full, and it shall forever be our proud boast, that our country has stood to the last invincible and unconquered in her noble fight for justice and freedom and liberty.

But while I cherish these thoughts with gratitude and with pride, may I be pardoned if at the same time my heart dwells with satisfaction on what France also has accomplished? That country has been devastated; her beautiful treasures of art, the work of her greatest minds during centuries of toil and effort, have been utterly destroyed; everything that the labour of her people through the long years of her civilization has accomplished has been entirely swept away; her cities, towns, villages and hamlets have been burned to the ground; even the very land itself, and the trees and the shrubs have been all ground into one mass of filth, amidst which stand all the marks of utter desolation. Her children have been ravished and carried into captivity; her bravest and best, young men and old, mowed down as with a scythe; yet she stands forth and fights on with a calmness, a devotion, and an unflinching bravery that claim the admiration of the entire world. It has been said that the ideals of her people are not our ideals; that she is not worthy of emulation, and that we should not be asked to fight for her. For my part, looking at the grand role which France has played in this great tragedy, I may say fearlessly that I can think of no higher ideals than hers.

I will conclude by reading a letter from a young French soldier to a confidante in France, showing what the French ideal is in this war:

Dear J——: To-morrow at dawn, to the strain of the Marseillaise, we shall charge the German lines. The attack will probably finish me. On the evening before this great day, which may be my last, I remind you of your promise. Keep up my mother's courage; for a week or more she shall receive no news. Tell her that when an advance is at hand no soldier can write to his loved ones; he must content himself with thinking about them. And if the time goes by and she hears nothing about me, let her live in hope; keep up her courage. Then, if you learn at last that I have fallen on the field of honour, let your heart speak those words that will bring her solace.

This morning I attended mass and took communion some few metres back of the trenches. If I die, I shall die as a Christian and a Frenchman.

I believe in God, in France, in victory. I believe in beauty, youth, and life.

God guard me to the very end. But if my blood is needed for our triumph—Thy will be done, O Lord!

Would that we in Canada could all be animated by the same lofty sentiments!

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. L. G. POWER: Honourable gentlemen, before entering upon the subject which is immediately before the House, I think that it is only right to say a few words with respect to a doctrine that was laid down by the honourable the leader of the Government in this House (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) on the day before yesterday. It is a somewhat extraordinary doctrine to be laid down in a democratic country like Canada, inhabited by an intelligent population, like the population of Canada. Here is what the honourable gentleman said, as appears at page 385 of our official report:

It may be asked at this point, who is to determine when a man should place his life in defence of his country? The answer is, the Government of the day. The Government is charged by the people of the state with the supreme duty of determining what the safety of the state requires, what military necessity demands from us in the hour of danger. Upon the Government of the day and upon it alone rests this important and solemn duty. If the Government does not voice the sentiment of the state, then it is subject to displacement; but so long as the Government is the Government of the state nothing short of a revolution can say it nay in pronouncing on this all-important question. This is so obvious as not to require any elaboration. No group nor clique nor section of the country can logically claim immunity from the duty of defending the state when the Government of the day has issued the call to arms. The refuge of the recreant and those who fail in their duty is naturally a denial of the duty of the Government of the day to say what the state demand. But a great people need never be deluded by the voice of the unpatriotic, who are recreant to the representative institutions under which they live and are protected.

I desire simply to make this observation regarding these remarks, that, whatever might be said with respect to that doctrine during the recess of Parliament, it will strike every parliamentarian as a most extraordinary doctrine to lay down while Parliament is actually in session.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend tell me who expresses the opinion of Parliament but the Government of the day? When I used the term "the Government of the day" I referred to the opinion of Parliament as expressed by the Government.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman did not say so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is manifest; any one can read that. The Government only represents Parliament.

Hon. Mr. POWER: If the honourable gentleman will wait, I shall deal with that a little later.

The question may also be asked, whether the citizen of the state has not a right to pronounce upon the justice of the struggle which is now being waged, or the results which may flow from it in relation to our own country. My answer to this is that the Government of the day must necessarily speak for the whole people, and likewise pronounce not only upon the justice of the struggle, but what its probable result may be and what the imperative duty of the citizen is under such crucial conditions as those through which we are passing.

Now, honourable gentlemen, it will be remembered that in August, 1914, at the beginning of the war, the Government did not take that view. The Government summoned Parliament, intimated what they thought should be done and asked the authority of Parliament to do it, which Parliament freely and unanimously granted.

To talk of a referendum at such a time does violence to every instinct of defence. To say that the Government should ask every craven to his country—

I call attention to the very vigorous language in which the honourable gentleman speaks of those who do not agree with him.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes; so intended.

Hon. Mr. POWER (reading):

To say that the Government should ask every craven to his country, every pacifist, every slacker, every recreant to public defence, every coward who fears to face the enemy, every Socialist who preaches disloyalty, every alien who asks the protection of our country at the expense of the lives of the men who fight for it to say that the Government shall ask a verdict from the thousands who proclaim their disloyalty from the house-tops, would constitute a farce out of the greatest tragedy that the world has ever seen enacted. If this proposition is unsound, then nothing short of a revolution must supersede the right of the Government to thus defend the state.

The honourable gentleman, in speaking of the referendum, was, I suppose, referring to the amendment moved by the right honourable leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons. What was that amendment? In the negotiations which took place a short while ago between the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition, the proposal of the leader of the Government was that a coalition should be formed and that the Conscription Act should not go into operation until after the general election. Remember, that was the doctrine laid down by the leader of the present Government. The doctrine now laid down by the honourable gentleman (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) is that all who think differently from him, all who think as the leader of the Government thought a little while ago, that we should wait and not put this Act into operation until after the general election, deserve all the opprobrious epithets that he applies to them.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have not said that.

Hon. Mr. POWER: When he talks about the thousands who proclaim their disloyalty from the housetops, I do not know of whom he is talking. I am not aware of any thousands. I do not know anything about the alien enemies who may be in the Northwest, but the only people in the part of Canada that I know anything about, of whose loyalty there is any question, are Mr. Bourassa and his friends, the gentlemen through whose alliance the present Government came into power. Our great object is that the cause of civilisation and liberty shall triumph in the present worldwide conflict with barbarism and tyranny. That is, or should be, our great object; and, honourable gentlemen, with the possible exception that I have referred to, I think that is the great object of our people.

I have seen the question raised, I think in one of the Government papers of the attitude of the leader of the Opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. That right honourable gentleman, in his speech on the second reading of this Bill, in declaring himself in favour of a referendum, said that if the people pronounced in favour of the Bill he would accept it with his whole heart. On the third reading of the Bill, when it was clear that the referendum was not going to take place, he said:

I have been asked as to what my policy is. I may say that it is the same as it has been from the first. I am in this war to the finish.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Some Hon. Members: Oh.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: I am in this war under the voluntary system to the last. I am in this war as Australia is in it to-day. Australia voted against conscription but still she is in the war. I am sorry that on an occasion of this kind I cannot see eye to eye with my honourable friends on the other side.

Since then, only yesterday, I think the right honourable the leader of the Opposition brought up the very, as I think, discreditable letter which was read the day before by my leader in this House, and he contradicted the statement contained in it and said again in the most emphatic way that he was in the war to the end. I think that is quite enough to say about the leader of the Opposition. We are all in favour of winning this war.

I may venture to express my dissent from the attitude taken by some of my own political friends with respect to the war. For instance I cannot agree with the honourable gentleman from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) when he says that there is no danger to Canada, that Canada is not running any risk, and that apparently it is not absolutely necessary that Canada should do so much. The honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) said something of the same kind. I cannot agree with those honourable gentlemen, I think that the existence of Canada as a free state depends upon the result of this war, just as much as does the existence of freedom in England and France. It is our duty, as a matter of course, to do anything that is reasonably within our power to help to win the war.

The practical question arises, then, how can Canada best help? Some honourable gentlemen seem to think that Canada can help better by sending food across to the other side of the Atlantic. Others think we should send munitions and warlike supplies. Well, I think these things are necessary. I think that if Canada is sending food and munitions of war to the old country she is helping, and I do not know but that possibly it is the best way she can help; but I quite agree with the honourable gentleman from Antigonish (Hon. Mr. Girroir) that, after all, it is our duty to send more men to help those who have already gone, and to do it within a reasonable time. I think most of us agree that more men should go. Then, the question is, should this service be voluntary or compulsory? On that point, perhaps honourable gentlemen will allow me to quote a short speech that I made in this House on the 29th of May last. I quote from the report of the Senate Debates, at page 97:

> My position is this, honourable gentlemen. I do not undertake to pronounce an opinion as to the merits of conscription. Conscription may be wise or it may be unwise. If I were called upon now, without any further consideration, to vote on the matter, I do not feel quite clear as to which way I should vote. There are a great many considerations to be weighed and thought over, operating on both sides of the question; and, as I have not given the matter the serious consideration which I think every member should give to an important question, I do not feel prepared to express any opinion on the subject. By and by, when one has had time to weigh the arguments pro and con, he may be in a better position to form an opinion.

That was a perfectly honest expression of my sentiments at the time, and I may say now that, as far as my inclination leaned one way or the other at that time, it was to vote in favour of conscription. Naturally one would like to know why I did not continue in that frame of mind.

There are two or three things to be said in favour of the voluntary system. In the first place, the service which is given by the individual's own free will is a better service than that given under compulsion; and, further, it is more consistent with the British theory of individual liberty and independence. If you can get the men that you need by voluntary enlistment, then I think it would be a great mistake to resort to compulsory enlistment. Every one admits that under the voluntary system Canada has done nobly. I think that no one would have dreamed in August, 1914, that within three years Canada would have sent over 420,000 men to back up the Allies. I think it is quite an important consideration that up to about three months ago the people in this country—and in the legislature—almost without exception, were in favour of the voluntary system. I take the liberty of quoting what Sir Robert Borden, the First Minister of this country, said in 1916, in the House of Commons when challenged by the leader of the Opposition:

> My right honourable friend has alluded to conscription, to the idea in this country or elsewhere that there may be conscription in Canada. In speaking in the first two or three months of this war, I made it clear to the people of Canada that we did not propose any conscription.

Then he said:

> I repeat that announcement to-day with emphasis.

Could anything be clearer or more to the purpose than that? When Parliament met in January of this year, the right honourable gentleman made a speech in which he assumed the same position. There was no reference to any change in policy. It was only in the month of April or the month of May that this wonderful change took place.

I know that there have been gentlemen who have said, "Oh, well, we ought to have had conscription from the first." I do not think that the Government is to be blamed because it did not introduce conscription at the beginning, because to have introduced a complicated measure like this in the August session of 1914 would have involved very considerable delay in getting our first contingent on to the other side. The then Minister of Militia succeeded in sending 33,000 men to the other side within two months. I think that was a great achievement; and, while I do not propose to enter into the differences between that honourable gentleman and the right honourable the leader of the Government, I think Sir Sam Hughes deserves credit for the celerity with which he got our first men off. Those men got to the other side in good time, and made themselves felt in a very emphatic way within a very short time after they landed in France. The question is, what particular reason can any one give for the change of system? I have not heard any reason given. It has been alleged in a sort of general way that voluntary enlistment has not been successful, but that has not been made clear, and before I sit down I propose to show that it is not true.

I have already quoted what Sir Robert Borden said in January, 1916. Now, a certain number of gentlemen who habitually vote with the Liberal party have, on this question of conscription, ceased to follow their leader; but I notice this. Take, for instance, the case of the senior whip of the Liberal party in the House of Commons. I find that while he voted against his leader on the referendum question, he used language which went to show that he doubted the wisdom of the change. This is what Mr. Pardee said:

> The Prime Minister has asked members of this side of the House for suggestions. May I meet that request by earnestly urging the national advisability of preceding the operation of the Bill by a last big and sincere appeal to the patriotism of young Canadian manhood to voluntarily come forward to back their brothers at the front. Under direct and real Government leadership in this respect—and with the conscientious co-operation of Canadians of all parties, all classes, all provinces—I believe that Canadian patriotism would yet make the actual operation of the compulsory service measure unnecessary. Such an appeal, backed by an earnest educational campaign, and conducted in the true spirit, would, I verily believe, result in the coming forward of the 100,000 men required, and more. If this can thus be done—and I yet believe it can—is it not worth while to save a situation fraught with serious possibilities of schism and strife, a situation which may all too easily produce a moral effect neither creditable to Canada nor helpful to the cause we aim to serve? I sincerely trust that the Prime Minister will give earnest consideration to this suggestion.

Here is a bit of evidence showing what the feeling of the country was up to a short time ago. I find that Mr. McCoig quoted this from Mr. Hearst, the Premier of Ontario:

> The Prime Minister found little, if any, sentiment among the British people, urging compulsory service in Canada. There may be some among Canadian army men, but the British people have received so much more help from Canada than they looked for at the outset, that they are not disposed to demand more.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: What is the honourable gentlemen quoting from?

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am quoting the comment of Mr. McCoig.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: In what paper?

Hon. Mr. POWER: That is my affair. It is taken from the Commons Hansard. If the honourable gentleman will go to the Commons Hansard he will find it there. The honourable gentleman has no right to cross-examine me.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Have I not the right to know the name of the paper you are quoting from? I leave it to the Speaker. Mr. Speaker, I think I have the right to know.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It is taken from the Commons Hansard. I cannot give the honourable gentleman the page. Then, we know the attitude which has been assumed by the Toronto Globe of late, and that has carried a good deal of weight. The Toronto Globe resembles Sir Robert Borden in this way, that it has made a complete change of attitude. This is what the Toronto Globe published editorially:

> The Globe, in its editorial columns, has constantly pointed out that in a country such as Canada conscription is an impossibility, and that no responsible statesman of either party, capable of forming or leading a Canadian War Ministry, would propose compulsory service. Nor has The Globe unduly criticised the failure of the Borden Government to do more than it has done to assist volunteer recruiting. The criticisms of The Globe and of most Liberal papers have been exceedingly mild when compared with the vitriolic denunciations of the Toronto Telegram, the Winnipeg Telegram, the Montreal Mail, and other journals that have absolutely no sympathy with the Liberal party.

So that honourable gentlemen will see that up to a recent time there was no sentiment in favour of conscription. I shall show a little later that there was no necessity for resorting to conscription. But I wish now to call attention to the fact that the gentlemen who are advocating the forcing of conscription on the country before the elections are really doing more to weaken Canada and injure her future prospects than they would do by letting the conscription Bill wait till a later date. The truth is that one would almost imagine that we were going to have something in the nature of civil war, from what we see in the papers and hear from people on both sides. I do not think there is any danger of civil war; but as a matter of fact, there is an unfortunate gulf opening between the people in favour of conscription and those opposed. The labour element and the bulk of the French element are strongly against conscription; and, with a very general sentiment throughout the country amongst certain classes against it, I am satisfied that it would be almost impossible to carry this measure into effective, honest, and just operation. In the Bill, as I think will appear when we go into committee on it, there are opportunities for favouritism and dishonesty which are very likely to be made use of.

I stated a while ago that the voluntary system was more creditable to Canada than conscription. Honourable gentlemen are fond of quoting what the men in the trenches say. Here is a well-known young Ottawa gentleman, Lieutenant James, who was one of the writers for the Citizen newspaper, and who is now at the front. The Citizen published a letter from him the other day, in which he said that if conscription were necessary it ought to come, but he was sorry that Canada was not able to keep up the voluntary system to the end —that it would have been more creditable. Undoubtedly it would.

The position is just this, that Sir Robert Borden, for reasons best known to himself, changed the opinion which he had expressed in a public and emphatic way on more than one occasion; and now, any of the numerous people who agreed with Sir Robert Borden in believing in voluntary service are denounced as if they were traitors and all sorts of evil things because they have not been able to change their base as rapidly as he did. I think that Sir Robert should give very satisfactory reasons for his change of base before he expects other people to follow him.

The bulk of the Liberal party are now where they were before. They believe in carrying the war to a successful issue, but they believe in doing it by voluntary service.

As to the necessity for this change, I would first direct attention to the fact that the Prime Minister of Canada, in April last, reviewed in England a Canadian army of 50,000 men. That did not look as though there was any shortage, for reinforcement or otherwise. I have not noticed that Sir Robert has talked about that incident, but that statement was published, and was undoubtedly correct.

Now let us turn to the official reports and see what they show. I have here a statement dated the 14th May, which was submitted to the House of Commons by the Minister of Militia a month later, and he said that while there was another return out, the change between this statement and the later one was so trifling that he thought better to use this. What does this statement show? It shows that on the 14th May there were in England 126,241 Canadian troops who had not yet gone across to the Continent. The wastage would not amount to more than 8,000 per month; I think that is what is permitted in a force of that size. At that rate it would take between ten months or a year before all that force would be exhausted; so that there is not any excessive urgency.

The statement also shows that Sir Robert Borden knew what he was talking about when he proposed to allow the Military Service Act to remain unacted on until after the elections, because he knew there were sufficient troops in England to keep the Canadian force at the front up to the required number for several months. I noticed that on the same day the Minister of Militia submitted that statement in the House of Commons, the First Minister made a statement, but restricted his remarks to the infantry regiments. I am willing to accept the view that we have to consider the infantry, because reinforcements are not so necessary in the artillery and other branches of the service. But what do I find? I find that at that time, in May last, there were 67,387 men belonging to infantry reserve regiments. There was also a fifth division not included in that statement which contained 11,015 infantrymen; so that we have 78,402 infantrymen for reinforcements.

Another thing that has to be taken into consideration is that at least one-half of the men who are reported as wounded come back. The ex-Minister of Militia stated in the House of Commons that sixty-five per cent of them came back. But I am willing to take it at only fifty per cent, which would mean 6,000 more men. So that we would have in England 84,000 men for reinforcing purposes. That seems to me to be a very respectable number.

The Minister of Militia brought down a report on the 11th of June. The allegation was made that the number of recruits was less than the number of casualties. But honourable gentlemen will bear in mind that fifty per cent of the wounded come back. Taking the present year —because up to the end of last year, at any rate, no question was raised— the casualties reported to the record office from February 1, 1917 to April 30, 1917, were 17,645. This same statement shows that the number of recruits enlisted during those months—February, March and April—was 19,584. That is, there were nearly 2,000 more men enlisted than there were casualties.

With a force of 126,000 in Europe, with the recruits in Canada exceeding by 2,000 per month the number of casualties, where is the necessity for resorting to this autocratic, and I think crooked and very objectionable, means of raising men. It does not strike me as being necessary at all.

As honourable gentlemen will see, this Bill is based on the declaration contained in the preamble, that recruiting has failed. I do not undertake to go into the questions that have arisen in the province of Quebec; but we all know that great mistakes have been made in dealing with the question of recruiting in that province; and since the Prime Minister made the announcement with respect to conscription there has been practically no serious effort made to secure voluntary recruits. I say that if we had kept on, if a better system had been introduced in Quebec, we should have had no difficulty in securing more recruits than there were casualties.

I might mention that the Halifax Chronicle, which is looked upon as the mouthpiece of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia, was at first very strongly in favour of conscription, but now takes the same line as Mr. Pardee, Mr. McCoig and others, that the Government should make a vigorous effort to promote voluntary recruiting so as to avoid the necessity for conscription.

There is this to be said with respect to voluntary enlistment, that if the Government were to start even now a vigorous recruiting campaign they would get more men in shorter time than they will get by this complicated Bill which is before us. Any one who has read the Montreal Gazette of to-day will see that that paper condemns the attitude of the honourable leader of the Opposition in this House respecting conscription. The article says:

> He objects that conscription has been sprung on the country, without preparation. Has Mr. Bostock spent the last six or eight months under the soporific influence of the Catskills? During those six or eight months the enactment of a conscription law has been repeatedly and insistently urged upon the Government by men and newspapers of Mr. Bostock's own party.

That is what the Gazette thinks now. And this is what the Gazette said not long ago. I read from the Gazette of the 24th of March last:

> An Ottawa newspaper remarks that "wrestling with a straw man called Conscription has been a favourite political sport since war began in the province of Quebec." There is considerable justification for the charge, it must be admitted, but the game has by no means been confined to this province. In Winnipeg there has been much agitation in the same matter, and aldermen have denounced the conscriptionists and won votes by it. Also, current issues of the London, Ont., papers report that, in accordance with the request of the British Columbia Federation of Labour, the local Trades and Labour Council has "unanimously passed a resolution opposing conscription in Canada, embodying a vote of non-confidence in the Government in connection with the National Service registration, and demanding that the Militia Act be not enforced without first taking a referendum vote of the people on the question." The bogey man, or the straw man, it will be seen, is travelling through more than Quebec.

That paper speaks to-day of the demand for conscription, and here, in this article, written four or five months ago, you find it ridiculing the idea of conscription. By the way, I may say that while I do not agree with the sentiments of the Gazette, I am very glad indeed that one of the gentlemen who control the paper has been made a member of this House. He is one of a family who deserve well of the country. I have known more than one of them, and I think highly of them.

To summarize, honourable gentlemen, I say that the voluntary system is a nobler and more manly system than that of conscription; that the voluntary system does not tend to cause disunion or trouble throughout the country; that by the voluntary system you avoid the expense, the complication, and the botheration involved in the other system, and you avoid also the delay. Here we have the bridge that has carried us over, and we had better continue to use it. It is not well to swap horses while crossing a stream. Honourable gentlemen, I think I have shown—I think the figures given by the Minister of Militia himself show—that this change is unnecessary.

I am obliged to you, honourable gentlemen for having listened to me so patiently. I expected it from my own friends, but I am thankful when I am treated in that way by the other side.

Hon. D. O. L'ESPERANCE: Honourable gentlemen, before I enter into the remarks which I intend to make on the subject now before this honourable House, I wish to refer to a matter which is more personal to me, that is, the point raised this afternoon by my honourable colleague from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette). He was at great pains to find out whether the senators who have been recently appointed had come here bound by a promise or a guarantee. I will answer for myself, and I know that my honourable colleagues will be able to answer for themselves. I wish to tell the honourable gentleman, and to tell this honourable House, that, so far as I am concerned, I have never been approached, either directly or indirectly, by any one in the Government or outside of the Government, to ask me whether or not I would support the Bill now before the House. I am sure that the honourable gentleman from Grandville, who knows me well, and all who are listening to me will take my word in this matter. The honourable gentleman from Grandville has known me for over twenty-five years. He well knows that when I take a stand upon a question, neither fear nor favour will cause me to change. He will no doubt remember that in 1896, when I was penniless, a poor employee of the Canadian Government railways, I withstood for three years, practically alone, the threats and even the promises that were made to me by the influential politicians in Quebec district; I stood practically alone to protect the bread and butter of the poor employees on the Intercolonial railway who were threatened with dismissal. I stood my ground then, as I stand my ground to-day. I am responsible to no one, only to my own conscience. I hope that this question will not be referred to again in this House.

I listened with a great deal of attention to the remarkable and very eloquent speech made last night in this House by my honourable colleague from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien). If I had the slightest doubt as to the stand which I should take regarding the measure now before the House, I am bound to say that his arguments and the witnesses whom he quoted in his speech would have dispelled any doubt remaining in my mind. I am only sorry that I cannot agree with him in his conclusion, because I think that this measure must be either adopted or rejected immediately. If the question is left open until the next election, the very calamity which the honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) fears will take place.

Three long years have elapsed since the news was flashed all over the world that Great Britain had at last declared war against Germany. Her navy, her army and her great financial resources were to be unreservedly thrown in to the balance alongside those of France, and not until her last sailor, her last soldier had been disposed of, her last dollar spent or victory achieved, would she withdraw from the conflict Germany had forced upon her through the criminal violation of Belgian neutrality. Who of those among us has forgotten the long hours of suspense and anguish we lived through from the time Germany violated Belgian neutrality, in order to better jump at France's throat, to the very minute that the German Ambassador in London received his passport? I remember that the day previous, while passing through Montreal, I had met some of my English-speaking Canadian friends who expressed indignation on account of Great Britain's hesitation. One of them went so far as to declare that he should be ashamed in future to call himself an Englishman should the British Government keep out of the conflict. Among my compatriots, honourable gentlemen, the suspense was not less painful. Numerous were those who openly expressed the fear that the United Kingdom would repeat the almost irreparable mistake of 1870 and abandon France to her fate. Had Great Britain then refused to accept the challenge thrown to the civilized world by the German Kaiser, and allowed Belgium and France to be crushed and bled to death, she would have incurred the condemnation of the present and future generations; and I venture to say that in passing judgment upon the cause of her abstention, none would have been more severe than we Canadians of French descent. And I may add, honourable gentlemen, that the same tendency of ideas existed when it was ascertained that England's whole power could not be exercised unless, like France, she adopted conscription. Many were those in my province, and I am not ashamed to say that I was one of them, who, until conscription was brought into force, did not consider that England was putting her whole effort into this war.

Our great and noble neighbour, the United States, was not slow to realize the gravity of the situation, and across the border conscription of man power immediately followed the declaration of war upon Germany.

Canada's turn has now come either to adopt or reject this grave policy, of which we all approved so long as it applied to other nations.

Early in August, 1914, the Canadian Parliament was convened. The speech from the Throne conveyed to the world that the Government of Canada was not merely content to consider this country at war as an integral part of the Empire, but had decided to give to the Allies all the moral and material help that lay in the power of this young nation to give. Not a dissenting voice was raised in or outside of Parliament. Liberals, Conservatives, Nationalists, Protestants and Roman Catholics followed the noble example given to us by France: we gave our full and complete assent to the Government proposal; we all forgot our political and social differences on that great historic day which saw the birth of a new Canadian nation.

But, Sir, what is the position to-day? After three years of war, the discontent and dissensions which started with the sending of the first contingent, caused by grave mistakes on one side and false representations on the other, have since increased in volume and at last have brought us to a serious crisis. The extremists, for or against conscription, are willing to start a conflict of races that would ruin the efficiency of our contribution and bring upon us calamities far more ruinous to this country than any measure of abstention or conscription could possibly do. Is it not time, honourable gentlemen, that the sensible people in this country—and they are the vast majority, I hope—assert themselves by uniting their efforts, not with the sole ambition of enhancing our contribution to the cause of the Allies, but also with the firm resolve of saving this country from a bitter and lasting conflict of creeds and races? The fault for the present disagreeable situation does not rest alone with the people of my province. Public opinion in Quebec, already exasperated by the unwise and anti-British legislation enacted in some of the provinces of this Dominion—legislation which has deprived the French Canadian minority of rights or privileges which had been enjoyed since and prior to Confederation—was further provoked by the mismanagement of voluntary recruiting, which seldom took into account the special conditions existing in the province of Quebec. Acts have been performed, words have been spoken, and articles written which, distorted and amplified by indiscreet and selfish politicians, have added to the discontent and have succeeded in rending apart the two great races inhabiting this country as they never have been before. And all of this, Sir, has been taking place at a time when, on the other side of the water, our two mother countries, bound together in brotherly love, are pouring out their blood and treasure for the maintenance of the ideals we cherish in common.

Let us pause on the brink of the abyss before it is too late. To those who think that they can settle this grave problem by openly advocating the coercion of Quebec, I will say with all the energy and courage inherited from the chosen settlers which France sent to these borders three hundred years ago: "You cannot subdue, by force, the two million French Canadians living in the province of Quebec. You may, perhaps, kill hundreds, thousands of them, devastate some of their homes, but the spirit of the dead and the living will rise higher than ever. You would soon have facing you the combined spirit of Ireland, which has resisted three centuries of oppression; of a Belgium, which has defied and still defies the whole power of Germany; and last, but not least, the unconquerable spirit of that immortal country—the spirit of France at Marne and Verdun."

Just as much as most of us were ignorant of the real spirit of modern France before this horrible war, just so much are you to-day ignorant of the real spirit of the French Canadians of Quebec. And this is why, honourable gentlemen, I now turn to my own compatriots and, with all the sincerity and energy God has given me, with all the love I bear them, with all the ambition of which I am possessed for their prosperity and welfare, I cry out to them: "Do not allow your good heart, your good sense, your ancestral virtues to be obliterated by the shadow of the provocations of the past and present—some very real, others imaginary or amplified by ignorant or selfish politicians."

Christianity was founded and expanded on sacrifice and brotherly love, not through resistance of order and law. If we resist any longer, the world at large will ignore the real cause of our present abstention, and may brand us by a name that will make our children and our children's children blush forever. We are facing a grave duty. Whatever the causes, good or bad, that have brought upon us this duty, let us answer "Ready!" just as our forefathers did at Carillon, St. Foye and Chateauguay.

I am voting for this measure, which may very shortly send my young and only son, by a first marriage, to the trenches. God knows how willingly and cheerfully I would give the few remaining years of my life in order to save his young and promising existence. But he who did not wait for this measure to offer to make the supreme sacrifice would be the first to blame his father should I shirk to-day from what I consider to be my duty towards my children, my compatriots, and my country.

Hon. J. H. LEGRIS (Translation): Honourable gentlemen, at this critical moment in our history, it is the duty of every man bearing a public responsibility to study seriously the grave problems of the present as well as the consequences which will flow from them, and to express calmly, and with frankness and sincerity, his opinions thereon.

Allow me to say that I have no great faith in the agitations of the last few years on behalf of our particpation to the uttermost in this war. Our public men and our newspapers are not all sincere in appealing to the patriotism of others to do their duty. Love of country! Some often invoke it only for the purpose of covering their unpatriotic schemes to make money out of war contracts of every kind.

Now, honourable gentlemen, with your permission, and for the convenience of the majority of this Chamber, I will continue my speech in English.

(Text): I do not propose to discuss at any great length the bill before the Senate, because I am inclined to believe that the members of this House have their minds made up on this question, the most serious, I dare say, we have ever had in Canada. I wish only to put myself on record and give briefly a few reasons upon which I base my convictions.

I may say, first, that I am always willing to grant to my opponents the full privilege of adhering to and standing by their opinions on any public question; but I claim as an inherent right the same privilege for myself and my fellow French Canadians, as long as we respect the laws of the country; and failing this, the word "right" ceases to stand for what it means and the old saying that "might is right" would be strongly applicable under those circumstances.

In the course of the discussion which took place in the other House it has been said and repeated time and again that the French Canadians had not done their duty, by reason of their failure to enlist in greater numbers. These reproaches have sometimes been expressed quite injuriously towards the province of Quebec, and even these have only been the logical continuation of a stream of insults constantly poured out by the entire press of Ontario, with a few exceptions. Yesterday we had another illustration of what I say in the eloquent speech delivered by my honourable friend the leader of this House. He exhausted his vocabulary of offensive words, such as: unpatriotic clique, section, slackers, cowards, recreants, craven and others, uttered in this Senate with some malice or anger in the tone as well as in the expressions themselves, and evidently addressed to the French Canadians of the Dominion and particularly of the province of Quebec. His speech under the present circumstances is a new cause of national dissension.

Let me tell my honourable friend that I deeply regret his charges made against my fellow-French Canadians. They do not deserve the disdain which has been heaped upon them. My honourable friend should know better. He should know that the French Canadians are as good citizens as there are in this Dominion or elsewhere. I have no doubt that later on the honourable gentleman will regret having made such charges as he made the other day.

My honourable friends from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Edwards), from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette), and from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. Beaubien), in their eloquent addresses yesterday and the day before, stated conclusively, I think, some of the reasons why the French Canadians did not enlist in greater numbers. However, I wish to add a few remarks on this point. Is it not a recognized fact that the first necessary condition for the voluntary enlisting of a soldier for active service is based upon the faith which he has in the officer commanding him and with whom he must very often face death? The French Canadians knew that they would usually be under the direct orders of officers who did not understand their language, and who were still less able to speak it, thus eliminating all possibility of these officers commanding the sympathy of their subalterns. Moreover, the French Canadians are very much in sympathy with their compatriots in Ontario, who are made to suffer in some respects at the hands of the people of that great province, and who are of the very same origin—the so-called "superior race"—as officers who would be commanding them. If you will place yourself in their position, you cannot fail to realize how uninviting it is to them under such circumstances.

Is it not evident that such a state of affairs must have prevented many from enlisting? I have no hesitation in saying that I understand their feelings, and I share them entirely. In addition to this, one can safely say that the Government has done everything in its power to substantiate the natural apprehensions of the French Canadians, and after all they had the right to do as they did. They were perfectly free to enlist or not to enlist. I say, they were not properly invited to do so, and the moment that we respect the laws of the land we are at perfect liberty to do whatever we please, even if such actions are absolutely against our neighbour's ideals, whatever they may be.

Some people have charged the French Canadians with having failed in the accomplishment of what they think is a duty. Though I respect that idea, I cannot agree with it, and I ask if we have not the right to differ with those who stand by it, more especially when there are so many strong reasons to substantiate our beliefs that there is an excess of zeal on the part of a great number of ultra-loyal subjects who are reaping a harvest of abnormal profits on account of the war. They completely forget Canada, our only home, where we have to make our living, and that it is our duty to preserve that heritage for our children, instead of directing our whole energies towards the affairs of the Empire in which we have no voice. The statesmen of Britain are quite capable of managing their own affairs without any intervention on the part of "colonials" as we are sometimes called. It does not matter to them if our country is ruined and bankrupted. With their unreasoned zeal for the Empire they are blind and deaf to the needs of our only patria. I venture to say that when the lamentable state of affairs, brought about by the present infatuation is realized by the Canadian people, it will be recognized that the French Canadians were not only right and wise, but that they were more patriotic than their accusers of to-day and that they did their just and reasonable share in helping the Mother Country and the Empire. Why forget, or purposely ignore the fact that England is still keeping at home, for profitable purposes, at least three millions of her own men who are eligible for service?

If Canada persists in her run towards extreme militarism, in order to supply the armies of Europe with a number of men, which is wholly insufficient to influence the fate of arms, she will soon find herself utterly unable to give to the Allied nations the real help which ought to be, and could be, her most valuable contribution to the common cause, namely, the food supply. We French Canadians are denied the credit for what we have actually done. But what are the facts? We have good reason to believe that over 25,000 French Canadians have enlisted, although the official figures show a smaller number. Moreover, Dr. Mignault stated in a letter addressed to the Prime Minister and published in the papers of the 14th July last, that, apart from those employed in the hospitals, we have over 100,000 men working in shops or elsewhere manufacturing munitions of war. Surely munitions are just as important to win the war as soldiers at the front. If, as stated by Colonel Mignault, there are over 100,000 French Canadians working in munition shops, these men cannot, at the same time be at the front. I may add that Colonel Mignault's statement cannot be contradicted, because Dr. Mignault, though a French Canadian, is surely a very reliable man. He knows what he is speaking of, and he must be as loyal as any English-speaking-war-money-maker such as Mr. Flavelle, Mr. Sifton, and a great number of others of that same loyalty. Dr. Mignault has no war contract. He has organized the 22nd Battalion for which he paid with his own money. Later on he put up, still with his own money, a great military hospital, at St. Cloud, near Paris. He has been at the front and now that he is back, and able to talk about the French Canadian soldiers, he cannot speak too highly of them.

Dr. Mignault also tells us why the French Canadians did not enlist in greater number. After reading his letter one can easily understand that when recruiting amongst the French Canadians in the province of Quebec, a great number of men were refused, and that the success of Colonel Mignault's efforts was prevented to a considerable degree by the slowness with which the Militia Department dealt with the formation of French Canadian battalions when English battalions were receiving satisfactory orders, immediately after a demand was received by the department. Knowing these facts and many others, are we not justified in saying that the Government did everything to prevent the enlistment of French Canadians in order to raise the feeling of the English-speaking population of this Dominion against the French speaking population of Quebec with the expectation of gaining some petty advantages in the coming general elections?

Now, may I be permitted to say that I sincerely think this autocratic Bill to increase the Canadian army is most regrettable and will bring the most deplorable consequences to Canada from the view point of harmony between the different races in this country of ours, as well as from the view point of finances and production producing necessaries of life. It will hasten the disaster towards which we are headed and running at full speed, without helping proportionally the allied nations. I believe that the whole energy of our people should be directed towards the economic organization and development of the forces of Canada so as to ensure to the Allies, whose cause we have adopted, and particularly to Great Britain the greatest possible assistance they desire and insistantly claim from us and to reduce the high cost of living in Canada. I think that our financial position is such that we cannot go further without permanently crippling our industries, arresting our agricultural development and bringing this nation to bankruptcy and financial disaster.

Honourable gentlemen remember, no doubt, that not long ago Mr. Bonar Law, speaking for the Government in the British Parliament, uttered these most significant words: "We are not so much in need of men as we are of foodstuffs." At about the same time, speaking in the French Senate, Senator Humbert, one of the leading men in France, said among other things that the famine threatened the whole world, and that the Government should call back 200,000 or 300,000 men from the army to cultivate the land and help in the production which was necessary to feed the soldiers and the people of France.

The Montreal Gazette of June 22nd published a despatch dated London, June 19th, which reads as follows:

> Lord Rhondda took over the duties of Food Controller to-day and this was his first interview with members of the American press.
>
> "The whole problem of the nation's food primarily depends upon the supply," he continued, "and unless we can be assured of food sufficient to enable this and other allied countries of Europe to carry on the war to a successful conclusion, it would be almost superfluous to appoint a food controller. The most perfect system of distribution and the most equitable regulation of prices would be a mere waste of time and effort unless every measure is taken to keep up the Allied food supply.
>
> "For this we depend to a vital degree upon the United States and Canada."
> "We are doing what we can 'off our own bat' by increasing home production, but, in the main, the solution of the primary problem of supply lies in the hands of our American allies and Canada. I am sure they will not 'let us down.'"

The same paper on the 7th inst. published a despatch from Toronto saying that Mr. Hanna, Canada's Food Controller, addressed a largely-attended meeting of the Women's Club. He intimated that it was his intention to give the press from time to time information as to just how desperate were the needs of the Allies, and what is being done to meet them, because he was satisfied that when people realize what the situation really is they will co-operate in an endeavour to solve it. "The situation is desperate," he said. It is desperate in this sense, that it will have a terrible meaning to us and to Great Britain and her Allies if the situation is not met. Mr. Hanna says that to meet the needs of Allies the United States and Canada should export 460,000,000 bushels of wheat. The estimated exportation of both countries will be 300,000,000 bushels, leaving a clear shortage of 160,000,000 bushels. To this deficit we have to add the quantity being sunk at sea. In another place Mr. Hanna said: "Save food or lose war." He did not say, "Supply men or lose war." Mr. Hoover, the United States Food Controller, has spoken in the very same way. Mr. Bonar Law and Mr. Balfour not long ago emphasized the point that the task of feeding the allied nations rests on the United States and Canada. Sir George Paish, England's foremost economist, summed up the situation as follows:

> Victory over militarism will depend as much upon the world's farmers in general, and upon those in America and Canada in particular, as it does upon the armies at the front.

Mr. Prothero, Minister of Agriculture for the United Kingdom, also uses similar language.

On the 8th of May last, our Minister of Commerce (Sir George Foster), in the House of Commons, said:

> The great question of the war at the present time is feeding the Allies; feeding the Allies for the rest of the war, and more especially for the next six months . . .

On July 23rd the Morning Citizen publishes the following declaration:

> King George has expressed his gratification at the steps being taken in Canada to provide "those increased supplies of food which are absolutely essential to the defeat of the enemy's devices and to a speedy and successful termination of the war."

On July 23rd the newspapers published a message sent to the people of Canada by His Majesty the King, which reads as follows:

> I learn with deep gratification of the effective steps being taken in the Dominion of Canada toward providing those increased supplies of food which are absolutely essential to the defeat of the enemy's devices and to a speedy and successful termination of the war. I have no doubt that the self-sacrifice displayed on the battlefields of France by my heroic Canadian troops will find its counterpart in the efforts of those who, at home in the Dominion, are devoting themselves to this work. All those thus loyally engaged contribute in important measure towards assuring victory.

Honourable gentlemen, this is my last quotation on this point. But, if it is the last, you will admit it is not the least. It is the British Government, in the name of His Majesty the King, asking the people of Canada to send what? More men for reinforcement of the armies in France? No, not at all, but supplies of food.

These appeals from such authorities should command the most serious consideration on our part and stop the progress of this Bill for now. No one calls for men, but we hear repeatedly the call for food supplies. Instead of complying with the need expressed by these men the Government is forcing our boys to give up their occupations here and cross overseas to consume a part of the food necessary for the army, but produce nothing. This is a great mistake, because it will endanger national production and jeopardize our quota of supplies to the Allies.

As no one has called for more men on our part, why does the Government show such an excess of zeal in imposing this measure in the face of so many great difficulties?

The ministers of the Government, many honourable members in the House of Commons and in this Senate, and many people outside of Parliament, seem to believe that we ought to take the lead in this war, as if we alone had the whole responsibility of it, and as if it completely depended on us. For my part I cannot agree with that belief. Let us help the mother country as far as we can; but greater effort on our part would place greater obligations on the shoulders of the people, and would not fail to be disastrous for us and detrimental to Britain. We have already gone beyond the limit of our paying capacity and Canada has already contributed to the war all the man-power she can supply without endangering her own existence and at the same time injuring our Allies. I will repeat here the word of Lord Shaughnessy, one or two years ago when he said: "Stop! you have already gone too far!" It is not a conscription law for destroying that the country and the Empire want; it is conscription for production of food supplies the Government should enforce.

I cannot understand why the Prime Minister so persistently demands the sending of Canadians across the sea when it is a well known fact that Canada's farms are being depleted; that farmers are short of men to help produce wheat and other cereals. More than that, many farms under cultivation in the West have already been given up. The same scarcity of labour exists from one end of the country to the other, and in Ontario a number of farmers are desperate to save their crop. The quantity of land under cultivation is much less this year than last, although the supply of food is likely to be the main factor of the situation in Europe. Under these circumstances surely it is far more important for us and the Allied nations, in order to insure the greatest possible assistance to the Empire and reduce the cost of living to the Canadian people, to retain our boys in Canada where they are so urgently needed, knowing that Great Britain and the United States can supply more than the necessary number of men, without being affected as seriously as Canada is to-day. Our most important duty is to produce, produce, and produce again, mostly food supplies, to keep the soldiers alive; otherwise we will have national suicide, for famine and world hunger are on our threshold as well as on that of the Allied nations! This is a startling statement indeed, which should lead to a more intelligent and more patriotic move than the Government is now making. The ministers of the day are unwilling to see and understand the real situation and by a display of false patriotism and a lack of foresight and energy on their part they have but a single aim in view; namely, the war, accompanied with borrowing of hundreds of millions of dollars without regard to anything outside of that idea. This if not unpatriotic, is to say the least, the greatest mistake of their life.

We have read recently how England and France have called back a number of soldiers from the Army to make them produce foodstuffs and other necessaries of life. In Canada the Government is labouring to reverse this plan. We all know that the Government a few weeks ago spent money to advertise in 600 or 700 American newspapers for 70,000 men to come from the United States to Canada to work on farms. Is that not the strongest proof that the Government knew, as they should remember today, that we had already lost too many of our men?

Here I might say to the Government: Give up your blind conscription scheme and give a thought to the people of Canada, who are threatened with starvation in a few months. Remember that Canada has already done more than her full share in the present gigantic struggle, which is completely independent of us. Our sacrifices in men and money are heavier in proportion than those of England herself. It is unpatriotic to try to go farther and quicker.

Is it because the Prime Minister, very imprudently indeed, to say the least, without consulting either the country or his colleagues, promised 500,000 men, together with the last Canadian dollar, that the Government persists in imposing upon the country this conscription law, which the Prime Minister in the House of Commons asserted would not be imposed upon Canada? Many of his colleagues, just a few weeks ago, particularly during the Dorchester election, repeated the same promise many times. For my part I cannot agree that the country is bound by so rash a promise. If the Prime Minister had been wiser and promised only 200,000 men, surely that offer would have been a liberal one, and more in accord with the position, the obligations and the means of this country. We would already be far exceeding the expectation, and no doubt this country would be highly eulogized for such a voluntary effort, and the peace-loving Canadian people would not be threatened with an odious and autocratic military conscription law, which will contribute to precipitate famine and other disasters of different nature.

I say that to-day the honour of Canada and the honour of the Government are at stake. The Prime Minister and his colleagues having declared, from one end of the country to the other, that there would be no conscription in Canada. Is that pledge to be broken? Are we to have in this country another kind of German "scrap of paper"? I say, furthermore, that it is humiliating for the citizens of Canada to be governed by men capable of ignoring their pledges as the ministers have done on this occasion.

To conclude my remarks, I wish to say that I am opposed to this Bill for many reasons: First, because it is useless, the voluntary recruiting having been satisfactory according to the obligations and possibilities of the country. Secondly, because, if it becomes law it will be a bad law on our statute books and unworkable under the present circumstances. Thirdly, because it will provoke the greatest calamity that could befall Canada in this war, by deepening the line of cleavage between Ontario and Quebec, when it is so important to retain our national unity. Fourth, because it will bankrupt Canada without helping proportionately the Empire. Fifth, because the present parliament has no right to pass it; the members of the House of Commons having ceased to be the authorized representatives of the electors. Moreover, a great number amongst them and amongst the Ministers have been elected to enact a very contrary policy.

Now, my last word is to say to the ministers and to the Government: Don't go further against the will of the people. Go to the electors to have your present dead mandate renewed by way of a general election, or, still better, by way of a plebiscite, if you wish to know the true feeling of the country on this very question of conscription. Then, and then only, you will be entitled to legislate on such an important matter, and after that you will be relieved of your pledges and you will have the whole country behind you to enforce the law.

Hon. T. J. BOURQUE: Being a new arrival in this honourable Chamber, I will confess that it is with no small degree of hesitation that I arise to take part in this debate, particularly when I see before me so many experienced parliamentarians. My embarrassment is much greater on account of the fact that the question before us is one of great importance to all Canadians, and one that carries with it departures of very serious nature. Nevertheless, I think it is my duty, honourable gentlemen, to say a few words at this moment on the question. In fact I would be remiss in my duty, did I not express my opinion, and that very briefly, and add to what has already been said in favour of this Bill.

We ask ourselves, why should Canada still be expected to make further sacrifices when we look back to the past three years and see how great a part we have already played in this gigantic war. For a new country, like ours, not a military country, our achievements have been the admiration of all other countries; not only in point of number of men who have enlisted voluntarily, but also on account of the splendid way in which our financial resources have stood the test. We cannot give too much praise to the young men who responded so nobly to the call; voluntary enlistment has certainly been a great success. It is needless for me to recall the glorious part played on the firing line by our Canadian soldiers. Their heroism and their deeds are the admiration of the world, the heads of the armies cannot give them too much praise, and the Huns have learned to fear them.

Honourable gentlemen, we all remember how in 1914, immediately after the outbreak of the war, political partisanship was thrown to one side, and how we all agreed to take part in this war, and justly so.

Recruiting meetings were held all over the country, and we united in an appeal to the young men to enlist in order to help our Mother Country and her Allies. Over 400,000 men, hailing from every part of Canada, leaving those dearest to them, leaving comfortable homes, throwing aside business affairs, fully aware of the hardships in store for them, listening only to the call of duty, voluntarily enlisted and joined the overseas expeditionary forces to fight for King and country.

Honourable gentlemen, now that the cry comes from the firing line, from our exhausted Canadian heroes, "Come to our assistance; we may not hold much longer, as our ranks are fast depleting," will we not respond? If I can read the minds of our people, I think Canada will respond. The Canadian soldiers have endured all sorts of hardships, and many of them have laid down their lives for the common cause, the cause of liberty. Then I say that in justice to those who have already gone to France, in justice to Great Britain who is giving us her protection and our liberties, in justice to the allied cause, in justice to the fair name of Canada, it seems opportune at this stage to pass this measure. Reinforcements are needed, and are needed at once, to enable our army, of which we are so proud, to hold the Canadian line at the front. And unless those reinforcements are forthcoming there is danger of the Canadian line disappearing. On the other hand, Joffre, the great French Commander, when addressing the Canadian people in Montreal, stated that men, and still more men were needed; and no man will dispute the authority of this great military genius.

As for me, there is an additional reason why Canada should remain in this war; possibly it is only a sentimental reason. A descendant of those hardy pioneers who, three centuries ago, left the shores of fair France and came to the new world to plant the cross of civilization, and spread the glorious name of their country and founded the colony of Acadie, I have always had a lingering love for the land of my forefathers. I believe that in this I express the sentiments of my Acadian compatriots.

The feeling of anxiety that existed in my own province, as well as in other parts of Canada where there is a French population, was well expressed in a speech delivered in the House of Commons on January 28, 1916, by the honourable member for Kamouraska, Mr. Lapointe, and I shall quote from his speech. He said:

> When, on July 30, it became apparent that France could not avoid a conflict with Germany, many people in my province, especially those who could remember the dark and painful days of 1870, were watching with anxiety what Great Britain would do. During these days of expectation feelings of uneasiness were expressed in many quarters. Would England stand aside and let Germany crush Belgium and invade France? Finally, all efforts towards the securing of peace having failed, the voice of Britain was heard on the side of right and justice against might and tyranny. A feeling of relief was experienced everywhere; enthusiasm replaced anxiety, and from that day, Mr. Speaker, I have favoured and supported all measures that would help the Mother Country in this war. I have supported them as a national duty and as a profound expression of gratitude. I believe that if England had refused to declare herself in favour of the Allies and to unite her efforts with those of Belgium, France and Russia, many of those who now criticise our participation in the war would have raised indignant voices against the attitude of Great Britain,
> I claim that under the circumstances, notwithstanding what has been said elsewhere, the province of Quebec has done her duty. Her people have contributed their full share, and they are still willing to contribute their full share.

I need only add, honourable gentlemen, that just as we were desirous that Great Britain should go to the rescue of France, our old mother country, threatened with annihilation by a powerful foe, we are equally desirous of remaining in this struggle until final victory. Moreover, as far as Great Britain and her Allies are concerned, this is a just war. Therefore, in the words of Sir Lomer Gouin in a speech delivered in Montreal on the 14th of September, 1914:

> Let us show our patriotism by action; this is a just, a holy war, which the allies are waging against Germany and we should not hesitate to assist the Mother Land in the full measure of our abilities.

He further said on this occasion to the young men who were listening to him:

> Enlist! Give your names to the recruiting officers; go and battle for the integrity of the Empire.

Let us also quote Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who, in addressing a large meeting in Montreal on October 15, 1914, said:

> Yes, this appeal means a great sacrifice, but no such consideration should enter our minds. If there still flow in the veins of the French Canadians a few drops of the blood of "Dollard" and his companions, you will enlist en masse; for the cause is just as sacred as the cause for which Dollard and his companions gave up their lives.

Conditions have not changed since the beginning of the war. The integrity of the Empire is as much in danger to-day as it was then. In fact, I may be permitted to say that the situation is graver to-day than is was then. I am proud to say that New Brunswick's enlistment has been good.

As has been so well said in an able speech in the House of Commons a few days ago by my honourable friend from Kent, Mr. F. J. Ribidoux, as well as by the honourable gentleman from Antigonish (Hon. Mr. Girroir) and the honourable gentleman from Shediac (Hon. Mr. Poirier) yesterday, in New Brunswick people of different races and creeds live in harmony, and the best understanding prevails among all classes. They all have a common aim, the succesful termination of this war in favor of democracy, and against German domination. Being of Acadian descent, it naturally gives me much pleasure to be in a position to say that the Acadian people responded nobly to the call. I know some families who gave two of their sons, and I know particularly one by the name of Thibideau, in my own neighborhood, who have given three. The first casualty among the Canadian soldiers, as was referred to in this House in 1915 by my honourable friend from Antigonish, was a French Acadian named Gallant. He died at Valcartier, it is true, but we know his aim was to get to the firing line. We find Acadians in every unit in New Brunswick. The same applies to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I know of some who enlisted in Ontario.

I am of the firm opinion that our people are still prepared to make further sacrifices if required, and give their further support to those who have preceeded them. I feel confident that our people will accept the bill in the proper spirit, a spirit of duty and of patriotism. I can assure them that no undue hardships will come to them in the administration of the act. I have enough faith in the public men who may be named on the selection board, to feel that justice will be done to all, independent of race or creed. Knowing also how imperative it is, that the necessaries of life must be looked after, due regard will surely be given to the agricultural pursuits and to the fishing industries.

We are told that now that the United States are in the war it is time for us not to take further part. Honourable gentlemen, I will only say in reply to this argument, the fact of the States having decided to join us at this stage, after apparently hesitating so long, is a sure indication of the seriousness of the situation, and to me a further reason why we should continue what we commenced so well in 1914. No, honourable gentlemen, the time has not come to quit, but the time had come to fight on till victory comes to our allies.

In closing, honourable gentlemen, let me say that I favour the Bill because I wish to assist our Mother Country, England, which gives us unlimited privileges and protection; also to help "bleeding France" who is fighting a death struggle; and also for the honour and protection of our homes and our fair Canada.

Hon. JULES TESSIER: Honourable gentlemen, the question now submitted to us is one of the greatest concern to the minds of the citizens of Canada. All Canadians would like to see victory crown the efforts of the allies and would like to see it come as soon as possible, in order that we may return to that life of peace which is the greatest blessing that Providence had granted to us during so many years. But, does contribution to war mean destruction of our economic resources, and bankruptcy? I do not think so, and I can say the Solicitor General did not voice the sentiment of public opinion of Canada when in a public speech he said that he would not hesitate to bleed the country to the extent of putting it into a state of bankruptcy in order to find means for the prosecution of the war.

A great mistake was made by our Government from the commencement when it decided to contribute to the war without counting our resources, and under the illusion that there was no limit to our gold, to our credit and to our means. It strikes me that the duty of any prudent administrator is to know what is the limit of his trust and his power. If this inventory had been taken at the inception and the Government had said, "We are able to spend so much in money and men, and no more," this would have been understood and more easily accepted by the people.

But what have we seen? An administration of affairs conducted with the greatest extravagance and lack of judgment; war contracts given to political and personal friends without discernment, allowing them to make enormous and scandalous profits. We have seen a Prime Minister, leading a Parliament whose mandate has expired, arrogating to himself the right to promise an army of 500,000 men without consulting Parliament. And now he wants to force the fulfilment of his imprudent promise by imposing obligatory conscription.

When it is objected that before adopting this new policy the people ought to be consulted, one of the answers is that the people are not competent to settle this question so vital to its destiny, and that anyhow, if a referendum is granted, conscription will not be approved by the majority of the electors. That is why a referendum is not granted. This is an example of autocratic reasoning against the privileges of democracy.

The citizens of Quebec are not slackers or traitors, as has been insinuated by some of our speakers. But they know what are the privileges granted to the people under responsible government. They have fought to obtain these privileges and they will take all legal means to preserve them, even if they have to enter into conflict with the great autocrat who is now leading the Government of this Dominion. That is the reason why conscription is not generally approved, not only in the province of Quebec, but also by many citiizens of the other provinces.

The province of Quebec has shown many times its loyalty to the British Crown, and those who have studied our history know that if the British flag is now flying in this Dominion, it is due to the bravery and loyalty of the French Canadians of the Province of Quebec. I should understand the violent ardour of some in favour of conscription if Canada had not made in the present war a military display in men and money proportionately equal to other nations. Assuming that Canada has supplied 420,000 men, is this not equivalent to an army of 2,400,000 men for France, 2,700,000 for Great Britain and Ireland, 6,000,000 men for the United States. And we are paying more for each soldier than any other nation in the world.

Now, honourable gentlemen, this is to show that Canada is not delinquent to its duties to the allies and to the triumph of right, although it was not consulted as to the propriety of entering into the war. When war broke out it was specified that military service was, and would remain, voluntary. When in January, 1916, Parliament decided to allow the increase of enlistment, Sir Robert Borden made the following declaration:

> In speaking in the first two or three months of the war, I made it clear to the people of Canada that we did not propose any measure of conscription. I repeat that announcement with emphasis to-day.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier said at the same time:

> Conscription has come in England, but conscription is not to come in Canada.

This is the pledge given to the people, and Sir Wilfrid thinks that he is obliged to be faithful to his word, and that the only way to adopt a contrary policy is by the way of consulting the people. This is also my view, and when the law is passed and approved by the majority of the people, we all hope that all will be obedient to the law.

I should like to quote the opinion of Sir Lomer Gouin, expressed in Quebec a few days ago. He said:

> The attitude of the province of Quebec on the conscription question is a sincere one. It feels that a Government elected six years ago on a programme which did not include one word of war is not the government that should now impose conscription on Canada to-day. Let us have elections, and if the majority of Canadians show themselves in favour of the measure, then I am confident that the province, like the others, will fall in line with the people's decision.

In supporting the action of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, he asserted that his own statement, made some time ago, to the effect that Canadians count on Sir Wilfrid to guide them to the solution of the present problem, still held good.

Under the circumstances, I have no hesitation in supporting the amendment proposed by the leader of the Opposition.

Hon. GIDEON ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, it was not my purpose originally to participate in this discussion, because this question has been fully debated both here and in the House of Commons. But to-night I feel compelled to say something, particularly because of the remarks made by my honourable friend the senior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), in which he referred to the labour element in Canada. He said he feared that conscription could not be well enforced because labour was against it. At the present time Canada and the people of Canada are standing at the bar of history, and I do not propose to permit a statement of that kind to go down in the records of our country without protesting against it, because it is not true. It is impossible that all labour men in Canada should hold the same views. Every labour man in Canada, and I believe almost every citizen, is opposed to the principle of conscription; but when imperative necessity presents itself, as it has, we must be guided by the circumstances and act as our judgment dictates.

Prior to the time that war was declared by the United States, organized labour in that country was absolutely opposed to conscription; yet, on the 16th day of May, two days prior to the time when such a policy was declared here, the question was discussed in Washington at an allied labour conference, at which I had the honour to represent our Government. One hundred and forty labour leaders were at that conference, and their opinion was that conscription was the policy which would best meet the situation and the requirements for the successful prosecution of the war. There are 2,200,000 men who are members of organizations which are affiliated with the American Federation of Labour, and the position taken by the heads of that organization is well known to you all.

Labour organizations in Canada are international in almost every instance. For example, the organization of which I am a member is an international organization with 50,000 members—7,000 in Canada and the balance in the United States; and the policy which is good enough for the members in the United States, and which is being followed by them, is good enough for and is being followed by the members in Canada. I speak with definite knowledge of the men employed in the great transportation systems of this country, and can say that I have had many protests, written and verbal, from various lodges, divisions, and members of these associations, urging that something be done to disabuse the public mind of the sentiments expressed by some recognized labour leaders who hold different views. It is true, I believe, that the gentleman to whom I refer and whom you all know was quoted by the leader of the Opposition in the other House, who implied by the remarks which he made that one of the reasons that he was opposed to this Bill was because of the attitude taken by labour. In my opinion a few of the recognized labour leaders in Canada have been absolutely sincere in making such statements. They are more closely connected with workmen who have not been treated fairly since war broke out. I refer to men who have been engaged in the manufacturing of munitions, men who have been denied their rights by their employers, who in many instances would not meet a committee of the men. As you probably all know, Mr. Watters, the gentleman to whom I refer, made efforts to have that condition righted with the Chairman of the Munitions Board, but without success. To a great extent that is the reason that these men feel as they do, and I therefore excuse them to a very great extent. But, honourable gentlemen, organized labour generally—the Canadian-born English-speaking organized labour—almost unanimously takes the view that although they may have grievances, although there may be many matters in this country which are not properly adjusted, and although they think that there should be some control of the prices and the distribution of foodstuffs, yet they feel that there is no reason or justification for declining to join in doing all that can be done to assist the country in meeting the emergency which has arisen.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: What position does Mr. Watters take now on this question?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON. I have not talked with Mr. Watters, neither have I seen any public utterance of his in the papers since the Minister of Finance spoke on the Income Tax Bill.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: He has written several letters.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Not within the last few days. He said that he was not opposed to conscription if it was shown to be necessary, but he urged that action be taken to impose an income tax or some other conscription of wealth at the same time. The Government has taken steps in that direction. Whether it has gone far enough for Mr. Watters I cannot say.

I should like to point out reasons why for many months I have been of the opinion that the Military Service Bill ought to be passed without delay. After all, the main reason is the imperative need. It is well known, as one honourable gentleman said to-night, that 8,000 casualties are occurring every month. That means that one man is laying down his life or is being wounded every five minutes, day and night, and we are not filling the gaps by any means. If the war is to be successfully prosecuted and finally won, we cannot afford to take any chance of the reinforcements becoming exhausted.

There is one other reason that I have not yet heard mentioned. There are thousands of young men in this country who are willing to go, but who say, "We have no right to go unless our neighbour goes." I have had a little personal experience of that kind myself. When I was on the other side a few months ago I received a letter from my son, saying, "Father, I think I ought to enlist, because, if I do, I think there are half a dozen other boys in the class at college who will do the same thing." Subsequently he did enlist, and his opinion was borne out. Therefore, I believe that if a selective conscription measure is put into force there are many young men who will go willingly.

I had not intended to make any extended remarks. I do not desire to take up the time of the House, but wish to say—having two members of my own family engaged in the war—that I fully realise the importance and the gravity of the step which we are proposing to take, and which I am supporting. The ambition of the individual or the desire of the community cannot be taken into consideration. These must at all times be subordinate to the welfare of the State when the State is in danger. I believe that the great majority of organized labour men with whom I have the honour to be associated are in favour of this Bill being passed and put into effect without unnecessary delay. I believe that there need be no delay in enforcing the measure if it is once passed, because there are thousands of young men ready and willing to go so long as there is no discrimination, and their fellows are not left at home when they go.

I hope that this question may be dealt with, not only by honourable gentlemen in this House, but throughout the country, without any feeling of animosity towards any one, and without any feeling that this measure is directed against any part of the country or any section of the people, because I do not believe that such is the case. We should all realise the necessity, and remember that in these dark days stringent measures must be taken if the war is going to be won. The sacrifices that the Canadian people have made thus far can in no way compare with those made by our Allies and the people of the mother land, beside whom we are fighting and whom we are bound to support.

Hon. LOUIS LAVERGNE: Honourable gentlemen, I have a few remarks to make about this bad Bill which has been submitted to us. Quite a number of speeches have been made in the House of Commons and in the Senate in favour of this Bill, but no one has told us whether the Prime Minister received orders from the Imperial Government to secure more men in Canada by means of conscription. For my part, I am quite sure that no such orders have been given to the Prime Minister of this country. This Bill was introduced in order to fulfil the declaration which he made in the House of Commons in 1916, that Canada would furnish 500,000 men. He was wrong when he made that declaration; but he would not admit it, and so he resorted to this Conscription Bill. In March or April last Sir Robert Borden was present at the Imperial Conference, and as yet we do not know what he said, nor what promises he made at that conference.

I have listened to the speech made by the honourable the leader of the Government in this House, but he did not mention the Imperial Conference at all. The honourable gentleman is a member of the Government. He made a great deal of this Conscription Bill, and of the necessity for its adoption in order to help the cause of the Allies and the cause of liberty. Allow me to say, honourable gentlemen, that I differ from the honourable gentleman, and from the views expressed by him and by the Prime Minister and his Government. The Government had no right whatever to submit a Bill of this kind to Parliament. This Bill is contrary to the Constitution of this country, which does not permit of the coercion of men to go to fight in foreign countries, either for the British Empire or for any other country. Canada has not been attacked, and if it were it is here that our men would fight in the defence of Canada. The Militia Act of 1904 says plainly that men can be called out for the defence of Canada. It does not say any more than that. Canada has done its share in sending nearly 440,000 men to fight in the old country. It is too much for a population of 7,000,000 to stand; but Sir Robert Borden and his ministers and his profiteers were not satisfied. After having ruined this country by their mismanagement and extravagance, the Government desires to make the ruin worse by sending 100,000 more of the young men of the country to the front, with the intention that more will be called if necessary.

This is awful, but it was expected since the famous speech of Mr. Meighen in the House of Commons, when he said: "We will put Canada into bankruptcy if necessary to save the Empire, and give our last man and last dollar to the defence of the Empire."

I blame the Government for interfering with the progress of this country, for paralyzing our efforts for more production in agriculture, mines and manufacture, by taking men who are now working for the country, which needs them. I blame the Government for having refused to submit this Bill to the people of Canada by referendum, as proposed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. This Government is not willing to ask the people for their approval or disapproval of this measure because they believe that the people are absolutely against it. To me it is pure Toryism to coerce the people; surely it is not Liberalism, because Liberalism would do as its leader does, trust the people.

Why should Canada have conscription?

There is no conscription in Australia, where the people had the privilege of a referendum; nor in South Africa, nor in New Zealand, nor even in Ireland, which forms part of the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. It appears that England has 250,000 of her soldiers in Ireland. Why are they not sent to the front with the British army? All these soldiers, having been trained for many years, could surely help the Allies.

Be sure that the young men of this country who did not enlist voluntarily are against conscription and are not willing to be coerced by any Bill of conscription.

It is said by some newspapers of Ontario that the province of Quebec alone was against that miserable measure, but we heard much opposition from many cities and towns elsewhere; for instance, from Vancouver, from Calgary, the city where resides the leader of this House, an honourable minister of the Borden Government; from Winnipeg, which has for member of Parliament the minister of Public Works; from Hamilton, Ottawa, and even Toronto, Berlin and others. The labour party and a large number of citizens in those cities have used very strong language against this Bill, and have notified the Government that it was their intention to use all the forces they have to resist conscription, selective or not. In some of those cities some meetings were called in open air to protest against that Bill, but the conscriptionists used force to disband the people. This shows that conscription is not popular.

I have said enough to show that I cannot support this drastic and coercitive Bill, and will vote against it, and against the principle of conscription. This Bill is a crime committed against the Canadian people, against the men who would be coerced, against the relatives of the conscripts, against all elements of justice and equity.

This Government has no mandate from the people; the only way to get a mandate was by referendum. This measure has created great excitement amongst the people, and has given rise to all sorts of passions, religious, racial and political, which have spread all over Canada.

This Bill is the most drastic and inhuman that has ever been imposed by any Government in the whole world. The people of Canada are treated like slaves and perhaps worse. It reminds us of the time of Inquisition many hundred years ago; also the slavery in Africa. It provides that a conscript must obey or he is sent to jail for three years. Here in Canada we are not prisoners of the Government, but the Bill provides for the same treatment for conscripts as the prisoners in Germany. If a man who is called to the ranks of the army refuses, he is sent to jail and has no right to have his liberty by way of habeas corpus—a privilege that exists for thieves and murderers; but our young men of Canada are by this infamous Bill regarded as too dangerous to be on the same footing as a criminal. I say it is a shame for the Government and I hope that the people will resent this insult, and will remember the ferocity of this Bill at the polls.

Do not think, honourable gentlemen, that the majority of the people of Ontario will approve this drastic Bill. If it should pass we would have no right to discuss that Bill, no right to speak or write against it, or organize or if we disobey, a slavery clause provides imprisonment for from one to five years in penitentiary or jail. An editor who writes against the Bill will see his paper suspended and refused access to the mail. We must remember it is a Bill for selective conscription. I suppose the friends of the conscriptionist candidate will speak of "Win the War," and will explain the so-called good things in that Bill, but the anti-conscriptionist candidate will have no right to answer, or the penitentiaries will be open for them.

My honourable friend the senator for Shediac, N.B., put the question, "Who said Canada owes nothing to England?" I am glad to be able to answer him. Those who said that many times are: Hon. P. E. Blondin, Postmaster General and Lt.-Colonel recruiting for overseas; Hon. Mr. Sevigny, who said it in 1910 and 1911; Mr. J. H. Rainville, Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons; and last, Hon. Mr. L'Esperance, president of the Harbour Commission in Quebec, now senator. All these gentlemen after the election of 1911 made a right-about-face; they voted against their promises to the electors, and now have received their rewards. I hope my friend from Shediac will be satisfied.

The honourable leader of this House has used strong language towards the people who are for a referendum calling them recreants, slackers and cowards. There is nothing to show our people deserve these names

Believing that this Bill cannot have a good result, I will support the amendment of our leader of the Opposition, being sure that the people at the general elections will vote en masse against this Tory Government which has refused to consult them on this question.

Hon. JOHN S. McLENNAN: I should like to dwell for a moment on one point which has not been touched on in this debate. If my recollection is not at fault, never in the history of the world has conscription come into force after a mandate from any people. France was at its last gasp when it came into force from above. In Germany it was enforced at a time when, as now, the wishes of the German people were not consulted. In the United States, in 1862 or 1863, it came into force two years after Lincoln had been elected, and it was Congress that gave or ratified his authority, though it had not been elected on that issue. Again, the other day, after the United States had learned from the experience of ourselves and of other people, conscription was passed under the presidency of a man who, many think, gained his seat by his appeal to the people based on their gratitude for the fact that he had kept them out of war. Those are the great instances. Again, in England it was a coalition government, with no special mandate from the people, that put conscription into force. It was a triumph for the intelligence of the British people, who realized the great emergency which faced them last year as it faces us now, and who went against all their traditions, all their feelings, and led them to give up their splendid pride in the glories of all the English armies that have ever fought, all of which had been volunteer armies. So much on that point.

But I think there is another point worthy of the attention of this House, and which I have not seen dealt with, namely, a remark made by the leader of the Opposition in another place, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when he referred to the fact that since the French Canadians were disarmed in 1761 they had had no military organization. On the question of organization that may be true; but, as I understand the fact from the reading of history, his statement does not give an entire and clear picture of the conditions. They were disarmed. The treaty which closed that war was a treaty which placed the French Canadians in such a position that when Canada was invaded, first, by proclamation of Benjamin Franklin, they turned a deaf ear to it. Then, when American armies came into Canada, practically its only inhabitants were a small garrison and the French Canadian inhabitants; and, as has been said here before, and I believe never denied by anyone of English birth, had it not been for the support of the French Canadians, the British flag would have ceased to fly over any part of the continent of North America.

Again, the Canadians received a constitution in 1791-2. An Imperial Act was passed dealing with the government of this country. It was as liberal as any government was giving to any colony at that time.

Again, there came war with the United States in 1812. The victory of Chateauguay, fought by French Canadians under a French Canadian leader, was as creditable to the French Canadian people as any battle which was fought in Upper Canada by colonists of British birth.

Again, that constitution of Canada became outworn. It corresponded inadequately to the needs of peoples with ever-increasing aspirations towards self-government. In 1837 the French Canadians rose in protest against that government. They rose with people of English birth and English speech, fighting alongside them in Lower Canada, and they fought the same battle that the English people in Upper Canada were fighting—for an increase of liberty and of self-government. They achieved it. That soul, of which the honourable senator from DeLorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) spoke yesterday, was born. It helped us in Confederation, I am positive; and I regret that it does not seem now to be beating with the same pulse as it did aforetime in 1837, when the Canadian colonist, both French and British, was the forerunner in that demand for liberty which only came to a head ten or eleven years later in Europe. The French Canadian colonists and the British colonists were ahead of their time in making that great step forward, one of the greatest advances in the last century and a half, in the extension of the rights of the individual and of the plain citizen in human government. Why is that pulse not beating now?

It has been suggested that the French Canadian then was fighting for his native land. If he is not fully in accord with us to-day, it seems to me that it may be the fault of those of his people who have wider knowledge and more imagination, who have not brought home to him, and clearly laid before him, the fact that his frontier is at the battle line, where not only the French Canadian, not only the British Canadian, but all the people who are on the side of freedom and self-government, are in battle against an enemy who would, if possible, make them all subject to autocratic domination.

What I would say at this moment is that this is one of the most epoch-making cataclysms that the world has ever seen; that we are all too much inclined to dwell on incidentals, and to lose our sense of perspective; to regard political affiliations and ties.

One thing more I would say, and it refers to the speech made yesterday by that one of our colleagues whose personal urbanity is in such marked contrast with the pessimism of his views on all economic questions, the Senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Edwards). He spoke of the scorn felt for the French Canadians. There are people who are ignorant, who express themselves ill; but where there is scorn I know also that there are thousands of people in Canada who know the French Canadians well, who have lived with them, as I have, who know their literature, who know what they have done, and who would welcome, with the gladdest heart and with pride equal to anything they could feel for the exploits of their own people, the response of the French Canadian people to the emergencies of the civilized world at this time. I have heard officers of English regiments express with pride their satisfaction at what their French Canadians had done—their splendid deeds, their bravery, and their lightheartedness as companions.

It is the heartfelt desire of all who love Canada that we should have the strength which comes to a nation from unity in action, in ideal, and from a steady looking on the things which unite, not on the things which divide. Never was this more needed than now.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Landry, the debate was adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Friday, August 3, 1917.

The Senate met at Two o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

SATURDAY SITTINGS.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and also sit on subsequent Saturdays during the remainder of the session until otherwise ordered.

He said: The adoption of this motion does not of course make it compulsory that we should sit on Saturdays, but simply gives us the right to do so if we think it is necessary. If it is not necessary to sit to-morrow, we will adjourn until Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON MOTION FOR SECOND READING.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, that Bill 75, an Act respecting Military Service, be now read a second time, and the motion of Hon. Mr. Bostock in amendment thereto:

That the following words be added after the word "time":

"With the understanding that this Bill will not come into force until after the general election."

Hon. PHILIPPE LANDRY: Honourable gentlemen, I want to preface the few remarks which I am going to make by reading the following resolution which has just been placed in my hands:

At a meeting of the ratepayers of the town of Alexandria and the surrounding country, held at Mr. Vachon's place in the county of Glengarry, on Wednesday, the first day of August, it was proposed and resolved unanimously.

Whereas Sir Robert L. Borden, Prime Minister of Canada, has caused to be adopted by the House of Commons the Bill establishing conscription in Canada;

Whereas the said Bill will come shortly before the Senate to be ratified;

Whereas Canada has done its duty in the present war in placing voluntarily under arms more than 400,000 and furnished munitions and food to the Allies;

Whereas the adoption of conscription in Canada would be prejudicial to agriculture and commerce in depriving them of the workmen required;

Whereas the British Government through the Prime Minister considers the production of food more important at this time than the sending of more soldiers.

Be it resolved:

That this meeting protests against the adoption of conscription law in Canada without referendum.

And that copies of the present resolution be transmitted to the President of the Senate and to the newspapers.

The Bill actually submitted to your deliberations bears the number 75—a most suggestive number in this time of war, and has for title, "The Military Service Act, 1917," a title which suggests nothing in particular. This shortcoming has been adequately supplemented in the dailies by titles and sub-titles of such a nature as to mislead the public, and by ministerial declarations having the effect of perpetuating the errors committed by those whose positions enable them to create and enlighten public opinion. In our dailies and in the House of Commons it has been asserted that this Bill No. 75 was merely a Bill amending the military law of this country in such a way as to mitigate its dire effects by the substitution of selective conscription, milder in its form, more effective in its results, for the blind, and more severe conscription already in our statutes, since the days of Cartier and the birth of Confederation. Is such a contention well founded in fact, and is the Bill now before us really a step in the right direction—better than the law which it purports to amend?

A comparative study of the present law and the Bill will show the difference between them and will throw light on the object aimed at by the Government in introducing this last measure. At the outset the simplest common sense points out to everybody that a most notable difference must necessarily exist between the law and the Bill. Otherwise what would be the raison d'être of the measure now proposed? Why bring in a measure which would be but a repetition of the law? Evidently the Bill must add to the law and remedy the effects of any deficiency. The differences between the law and the Bill are set forth in the text of both and explain why we are called to-day to adopt new legislation with respect to military service. The law as it stands says, in its 69th clause:

> The Governor in Council may place the militia or any part thereof on active service any where in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do, by reason of emergency.

With an ocean between the Germans on one side and the sons of Canada on the other, the whole fleet of Great Britain ruling the waves and keeping all the transportation vessels of Germany bottled up, with her fleet in the Kiel canal or the Baltic sea, it is childish to assert that the first line of defence for Canada is in France. Canada has nothing to fear from Germany so long as her navy is powerless and her transportation facilities entirely deficient. I was extremely amused when I read that argument of one of the ministers of the Crown, trying to impress the minds of the members of the Commons in picturing the arrival of a German fleet in the waters of the St. Lawrence, the landing of the troops, the invasion of our soil, and all the horrors that would follow the advance of the enemy into the very heart of our country. Looking around to see where our soldiers were, I found them in the firing line in Flanders, at Ypres, defending there the interests of the Empire and leaving without any defence whatever this Canada of ours. A cool-headed man would never interpret these words of the statute, "beyond Canada," as meaning beyond the Atlantic ocean, in France or Belgium, or beyond the Pacific ocean, in China or Japan. The whole continent of America, when Canada comprised only Upper and Lower Canada, was quite sufficient in length or in breadth to find some locality where Canada could be defended outside its own borders.

This was, at all events, the sole meaning attached to our Militia law when the present Government, at the beginning of the war, in August, 1914, directed His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught to send the following despatch to the Colonial Secretary:

> Ottawa, August 1, 1914.
> In view of the impending danger of war involving the Empire my Advisers are anxiously considering the most effective means of rendering every possible aid and they welcome any suggestions and advice which Imperial naval and military authorities may deem it expedient to offer. They are confident that a considerable force would be available for service abroad. A question has been mooted respecting the status of any Canadian force serving abroad as under section 69 of Canadian Militia Act the active militia can only be placed on actual service beyond Canada for the defence thereof.
> It has been suggested that regiments might enlist as Imperial troops for stated periods, Canadian Government undertaking to make all necessary financial provision for their equipment, pay and maintenance.

Then, the Governor General on 5th August sent another despatch in the following words:

> My Government being desirous of putting beyond doubt status of Canadian volunteers requests that His Majesty may be pleased to issue an order bringing these volunteers under section 175 and 176 of the Army Act.

On August 6 the following Order in Council was passed:

> The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 6th August, 1914, from the Minister of Militia and Defence, representing,—in view of the state of war now existing between the United Kingdom, and the Dominions, Colonies, and Dependencies of the British Empire on the one side, and Germany on the other side, creating a menace to the well-being and integrity of the Empire, and having regard to the duty of the Dominion of Canada as one of those Dominions to provide for its own defence and to assist in maintaining the integrity and honour of the Empire, that it is desirable to mobilize militia units of the various arms of the service of such effective strength as may from time to time be determined by Your Royal Highness in Council, such units to be composed of officers and men who are willing to volunteer for overseas service under the British Crown.

All these quotations confirm in an indubitable manner the interpretation given to the Militia Act by our own people, that is, by the Government themselves, and explain in so many words why, down to the present date voluntary enlistment, and not conscription, was resorted to for the purpose of raising the necessary forces in compliance with the desires of our public men and to fulfil the promises made by them, to the detriment of the country. We had no right to force our men to the front, either by voluntary enlistment or by conscription, and our soldiers have done more than their duty, their loyal duty, in leaving our shores to assist the Allies in their gigantic battle against the German invasion.

If, moreover, we consult the opinion of British statesmen we find that they hold the same views. In his introduction to the book of Sir Max Aitken, "Canada in Flanders," we notice the opinion given by the then Secretary of the Colonial Office, over the signature of A. Bonar Law, on the 6th of December, 1915. He says:

We have a right to feel very proud on the part which is being played in the terrible tragedy of this war by the great Dominions of the British Crown. We had no power to compel any one of them to contribute a single penny or to send a single man, but they have given of their best, not to help us—though I think they would have done that also—but to defend the Empire which is theirs as much as ours.

And lately, in this very building, that great man of whom Britain is so proud, the Right Hon. Mr. Balfour, had not the slightest objection to recognizing that no legal obligation of any kind could compel us to give our men or our money for the defence of the Empire, when he said:

While the fact that the sun never sets upon the British Empire may be proof of its magnitude, it is no evidence of its strength. Moreover, remember that the foreign speculators about the British Empire must have thought before the war began. They said to themselves: "This loosely-constructed State resembles nothing that has ever existed in history before: it is held together by no coercive power; the Government of the mother country cannot raise a corporal's guard in Canada, Australia, New Zealand or wherever you will; she cannot raise a shilling of taxation; she has no power. When unexpectedly, without giving an opportunity for preparation, or discussion, or propaganda, war burst upon the world, even those animated by such a feeling might well have doubted, whether this great Empire—each unit of which had it in its power to hold aloof had it so desired—might act as one organization animated by one soul. moved by one purpose and driving towards one end. It seems to me almost a political miracle, but the miracle has occurred.

Yes, honourable gentlemen, this miracle was publicly recognized in this House on the 28th day of May last, by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the Government of the United Kingdom.

Canada, up to date, has sent across the ocean to England and France 420,000 of her sons, perfectly equipped, and pays for their maintenance, from the first day of the mobilization of our troops to the date of their final demobilization, sums and sums of money, taxing in that respect, all the resources of the country. No one complains. All that was done by our free will. No compulsion was resorted to, and compulsion could not have been resorted to, because it was not within the law to send our soldiers across the ocean. They went over willingly; and now that they are there, unexpectedly, and contrary to the most solemn declarations made by certain politicians, a Bill is introduced in Parliament, and under the false pretense of mitigating and curing what might be too rigid or too unjust in the conscription provisions of our existing militia law, power is to be given by the Bill now before us to send 100,000 new conscripts to reinforce the four divisions now in the firing line. Here is the clause which settles that question without any possible doubt:

2. Every male British subject who comes within one of the classes described in section three of this Act and who (a) is ordinarily resident in Canada or (b) has been at any time since the fourth day of August, 1914, resident in Canada, shall be liable to be called out as hereinafter provided on active service in the Canadian Expeditionary Force for the defence of Canada, either in or beyond Canada, unless—

Here are mentioned the exceptions:

—such service shall be for the duration of the present war and of the demobilization after the conclusion of the war.

It is now very easy, by comparison of the text of the Militia law with the text of the present Bill, to find out why the Military Service Act, 1917, is submitted to the approval of this Parliament. This Government wants to be clothed with an authority which they have not had by law up to this date, that is, the power to send 100,000 new conscripts to the other side of the ocean. The pill is sugar-coated with the appellation of "selective conscription," and we are asked to swallow it, by the sentimental and fictitious appeal to relieve those who are now battling on the firing-line.

But where is the necessity of such legislation? We have been told time and again that 420,000 of our people have been voluntarily enlisted in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces and that four divisions are now facing the enemy in the trenches in France. Four divisions represent 80,000 soldiers. The supports and the reserves should then have 340,000 men to their credit. Substract from that number the casualties sustained since the beginning of the war, computed at nearly 100,000 men, of whom 68,630 are wounded, according to the information given to Parliament by the Prime Minister himself on the 11th of June last. We have, then, besides the 80,000 soldiers of the firing line, a balance of 240,000 men, which may be increased to 285,000 if, as asserted by General Hughes, 65 per cent of the wounded are able after a few months to return to the firing-line. The Prime Minister told us, when he came back to this country in June last, that we had in France at that date 135,000 men. If we substract those 135,000 men from the available number of 285,000 soldiers, the balance that remains amounts to 150,000. Where are those 150,000 men? In England, I presume, in the different military camps where they are thoroughly trained and made ready to reinforce at any moment the firing-line. In fact, we have in the trenches four divisions, numbering 80,000 men, behind the trenches 55,000 soldiers as supports, and 150,000 men as reserves in the training camps of England. With such a display, where is the pressing necessity of sending over immediately 100,000 conscripts, when they are not actually needed, and especially when the United States of America will be ready to ship ten times that number of their own soldiers, and have them in France before the expiration of this Parliament? And why, after all, this new departure in the working of our Militia law, when a new system altogether is substituted for the one that Confederation gave us, and under which we lived so happily, notwithstanding the numerous wars in which England has been involved during the last fifty or sixty years? At the present moment Parliament, as it is constituted, with all the vacant seats in the House of Commons and in this Chamber—for there are more seats to be filled.

Hon. Mr. POWER: One more.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: One more now; but, if the extension of Parliament had not taken place, there would be nine more to fill in this House.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: From the West.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: From the West. At the present moment Parliament, as it is now constituted, with all the vacant seats in the House of Commons and in this Chamber, does not represent the opinion of the people of Canada and has no right to put in the statutes of our country a law which might suit the few people who are reaping money by the millions and rolling up scandalous fortunes because of the war, but which will be cursed day by day by all those who are sacrificing their sons or spilling their blood to meet the views or fill the purses of the war-suckers of two continents. A Parliament whose actual life has been honoured by the temporary suspension of our Constitutional Act has no right to assume the power of placing such an impost on the life and on the blood of our people. Let the electorate be consulted, and by its decision regularly obtained we will certainly abide.

Much has been said and odious comparisons have been made on account of the part played in the present conflict by the province I represent. I feel it my bounden duty to repel such attacks, and to explain in a few words the real position taken by my province, and generally by the French people of this Dominion. We are accused, above all, of not having generously responded to the appeal to arms. and of having failed in our contribution of men to the Canadian Overseas Expeditionary Forces. I deny that gratuitous assertion, and I maintain that if there is fault, it was never ours. How have we been treated? In a speech which he delivered in Montreal in August, 1914, the Minister of Militia, then Colonel Hughes, said:

> No man who leaves these shores will go except of his own free will, purely voluntary, and no married man shall go except with the consent of his wife and family, and when they go to vanquish our enemies, as vanquish them they will, they will go as free men, subjects of the British Empire, soldiers of His Majesty.

The result of this Napoleonic proclamation telling the people of Canada that the enlistment was purely voluntary, and that no married man would go except with the consent of his wife and family, was that all our married people were prevented from enlisting, and as people marry young in our province, quite a number of them were kept at home by their wives and by that announcement of the Minister of Militia. To cure the disastrous effect of such a proclamation, recruiting agents covered the country, inducing all British subjects to become soldiers of the King. In this effort, apart from the cities of Montreal and Quebec, our province was systematically ignored, and even what was done in those two cities was done in such a manner as to keep the French people out of the field, and to kill the recruiting movement amongst them. I know what I say when I make this positive assertion.

Before the present Government came into power in September, 1911, I had obtained from Colonel Hughes's predecessor, Sir Frederick Borden, the issue of a French text-book for our French regiments, with the English words of command translated into French. When, in the days of De Salaberry, our French volunteers went to the front to repel the American invasion, they were commanded in French, and the use of that language did not prevent them from winning the battle of Chateauguay. They all understood their officers, and knew perfectly well how to carry out their orders. In our province, in the rural parts at all events, the farmers do not understand English, any more than the English-speaking farmers of the other provinces understand French. You will readily realize under what disadvantage your sons and your brothers would labour if they were commanded by French officers in the French language. The absurdity of such a course would at once be seen. This plan reversed put us in the same disadvantageous position. To remedy this evil, and put our French soldiers on a level with the English I obtained the change referred to after several years of continual effort. It did not last long. The appointment of Colonel Hughes as Minister of Militia put an immediate end to what I had arranged for my fellow-countrymen. The book was withdrawn from circulation and returned to Ottawa. It was entitled, "Reglement de manœuvres pour l'infanterie, 1911," and its first page contained the following advertisement—I translate:

Regulations for infantry training, 1911. This book is a translation of the Infantry Training, 1911, as published by the War Office in London. Translation permitted by the Imperial authorities. The plates are herein reproduced with the permission of the Controller of His Majesty's Stationery.

All those provisions did not meet with the approval of the Minister of Militia, Colonel Sam Hughes—now Sir Sam Hughes, ex-Minister of Militia—in a country where the French people number about three millions, and where by our constitutional Act the French language is said to be on a footing of equality with the English language. That is the way we are treated.

Notwithstanding such a disadvantage, some of our French people decided to go to the front, provided they could have units of their own and be placed together, as sons of one family, with their acquaintances and comrades from the same village, under the command of officers of their own blood. That was promised. The first regiments were so formed, but as soon as they arrived in England they were broken up and lost their identity and their commanding officers and became, as Colonel Hughes had said, subjects of the British Empire and soldiers of His Majesty. This sad news came back to the country and paralyzed in a remarkable degree the recruiting of additional French regiments. Then came the promise of the formation of a French Brigade. Recruiting started again, and quite a number of French regiments were formed.

Some weeks ago a man who has been in the Canadian militia from the beginning of the war wrote and published an open letter addressed to the Prime Minister, on the decline in enlistment of French Canadians for overseas service. With the permission of the House, I will give a few extracts of Colonel Arthur Mignault's letter, dated the 7th of July, 1917. "Facts and facts alone shall have my consideration," says the gallant colonel, who proceeds in the following terms:

First, as to French Canadian enlisting at the beginning of the war. As soon as the Valcartier Camp was opened, at least 1,500 French Canadians—2,500, said Sam Hughes—joined the colours, a fair response to the call at that time. You are aware, Mr. Premier, that towards the end of August, 1914, that is to say, only a few weeks after war was declared, an offer was made to the Government to raise and organize the 22nd French Canadian Battalion. There was the usual delay in obtaining the necessary authorization from Ottawa, but in about a month's time that authorization was obtained, and by the beginning of November, 1914, that is to say, within a comparatively short period, the battalion was organized and at full strength. . . . As there were 5,000 applications to join the ranks, and as only 1,000 were required for the 22nd, authorization was then asked to raise and organize another battalion, namely, the 41st French Canadian, as a support to the 22nd Battalion. Authorization having been obtained, the 41st was organized, and was at full strength in a few weeks. Another French Canadian battalion, the 69th, was organized in the early spring of 1915, and was filled up at once. Subsequently, as you are aware, with the Government's authorization and approval, what became known as No. 8 French Canadian Hospital was organized in a few days. The 22nd Battalion and the hospital unit were all overseas by May, 1915; the 41st and the 69th Battalions followed in due time. It will thus be seen that there was no lack of enthusiasm or devotedness on the part of the French Canadians at the beginning of the war, as the rapid organization and quick dispatch of the various units I have mentioned amply prove.

Colonel Mignault crossed over with No. 8 French Canadian Hospital unit, and while he was in France the recruiting business went on in the province of Quebec, and the following French battalions, one after the other, were authorized, recruited and entrained: the 57th, 130th, 132nd, 140th, 143rd, 163rd and 206th. All these regiments were intended to constitute the French Brigade, so long and so often promised, and temporarily organized at Valcartier in 1916 under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Leduc; but the famous brigade was never authorized, and all those French units went over to England to lose their commanding officers and to be broken to pieces and dispersed as reinforcements, some of them amongst the few French regiments on the firing line, and the remainder amongst the English regiments of the Canadian or the Imperial army.

This kind of treatment was made known to our people by those who were its victims, with what effect everybody can easily imagine. Colonel Mignault, in his letter to the Premier, does not treat of this aspect of the question, but he points out an additional reason which explains also the decline in the recruiting business. I give one quotation from the colonel's letter:

From May, 1915, to November, 1916, that is to say, for a period of eighteen months, I was absent at the front, and therefore entirely out of touch with what was being done in the way of recruiting. On my return to Canada, in December, 1916, I was asked by the Government to take charge of recruiting in the province of Quebec. I soon began to realize that there had been a marked change since the first campaign. It was soon apparent that material was not near so plentiful. What was the reason? The explanation is simple: No sooner had the campaign started when it was found that large advertisements had appeared for months previously in the leading French Canadian newspapers calling for munition workers, offering the most attractive inducements in the way of wages, etc., and emphasizing the important services that could be rendered in this way to the cause of the Allies, who at that time, you will recall, were in urgent need of munitions. As the result of that campaign, a most beneficial and patriotic one, let it be understood, thousands and thousands of French Canadians were drawn from all parts of the province of Quebec to the munition factories, where the greater number of them still continue to work.

The demand for munition workers was incessant, in fact, the time came when sufficient men could not be obtained. The province of Quebec was literally combed clean of available men. I recall one occasion when I visited a prominent munition manufacturer, an English-speaking Canadian, and asked him to let me have one hundred of his 1,400 French Canadians for overseas service. "It is impossible," was his reply; "I want one hundred more myself, to enable me to fill my contracts." And, knowing the needs of the Allies as I did, from what I had seen while in Europe, I was forced to agree with him that the work the men were doing in the munition factories was as vital as the need of men for overseas service. This aspect of the situation has been almost entirely lost sight of in the discussion over the part played by French Canadians in the war. I do not know whether you are aware of it, my dear Mr. Premier, but it is a fact that can be corroborated, if need be, that there are at the present time one hundred thousand French Canadians working in munition factories and war employments in Canada. My personal belief is that that is a very conservative estimate, but it makes, you will, I am sure admit, a very impressive showing. Now, my dear Mr. Premier, what I desire to emphasize is that these one hundred thousand or more French Canadians who are working in the munition factories were led to believe, and do believe, that they are rendering as important and vital a service to the cause of the Allies as the men who have enlisted for overseas service. In common fairness, therefore, they should be regarded as part of Quebec's contribution to the war, just as much as the men who are actually at the front. You must know that at a time when the need of munitions was most urgent, men were brought from the front to England and France and placed at making munitions, and that every man at work in a munition factory in England, as well as in the other Allied countries, is regarded as just as important a factor in the war as the soldier at the front. No one would dream of calling such a man a "slacker" or a "shirker," or of reproaching him with not having enlisted. In fact, the distinctive button which he wears to denote that he is a munition worker, is regarded as a badge of honour.

What I have stated in regard to the campaign for munition workers which began early in 1915, explains to a large extent the falling off in the number of men presenting themselves for enlistment under the voluntary system. If French Canadians now engaged in the making of munitions were available for overseas service, there would not be the least difficulty in raising and organizing units, as was done during the first year of the war, when the French Canadians, in large numbers, asked the privilege, of their own accord, of enlisting for overseas service, but would not do more than they did because the Government, as you know, only allowed a certain quota to Quebec.

I have drawn your attention to these few important facts, my dear Mr. Premier, in the hope that they will help to make clearer to you and to the Canadian public, the real situation in the province of Quebec. With the latter object in view, I am furnishing a copy of this letter to the press, my desire being that it should be recognized that the province of Quebec, in common with the other provinces of the Dominion, has done, and is doing, its share for the success of the cause we all have at heart.

I have the honour to remain, my dear Mr. Premier,

Yours very respectfully,

Arthur Mignault.

On the 16th of March last an Order in Council was passed authorizing the Minister of Militia:

To raise 50,000 men for home defence, excluding troops already called out under Order in Council dated August 6, 1914, and that it forms part of the force of 500,000 men to which reference is made in Order in Council dated January 12, 1916. It is understood that the conditions of enlistment applying to the abovementioned partial mobilization of the active militia apply only to service in Canada for home defence.

This Order in Council applied only to the mobilization of 50,000 men to serve in Canada for home defence, with the understanding that this additional force would form part of the 500,000 men to be recruited in Canada by voluntary enlistment. In other words, out of the 500,000 men promised by the Government, 50,000 would be called under the authority of the Militia Act, but solely for service in Canada for home defence.

The commanding officer of the 61st Regiment immediately offered his services to General Lessard. They were accepted, and M. Lavergne was invited to attend a conference of officers, which took place in Quebec on the 16th of April last. As soon as it was publicly known that Colonel Lavergne had been appointed director in charge of the organization of the home defence in the district of Quebec, a well-known voice was heard, and a strong opposition was organized to prevent the Government from confirming his appointment. Colonel Lavergne, aware of what was going on, sent to General Lessard the following letter, dated Quebec 30th April, 1917:

Sir,—I state with regret that my appointment to the position of director of the home defence for the province of Quebec is causing you much trouble. Believe me, it brings me sorrow.

I accepted that perilous honour because I felt convinced, that under your command, and with good work, we would have obtained the best results.

Notwithstanding the obstacles put in my way, I am now certain that we would have obtained a big success.

The numerous demands that have reached me give me the assurance that the youth of our province would have joined the column for Canada's defence.

It is a pity that the narrow mindedness of a certain group has paralysed such a movement.

What I want now to know from you is if I am to consider myself relieved of my military duties.

I will then return to my civil condition with the satisfaction of having done my duty, always as ready to respond to your call as I have done in the past, without any hesitation, whenever the military authorities need my presence in the ranks.

Thanking you once more for the flattering mark of confidence you gave me, and waiting for a definitive answer.

I remain, sir,

Your obedient servant,

A. Lavergne,

O.C., 61st Regt.

The following answer was received from Montreal, dated the 4th day of May, 1917:

My dear Colonel,

I am in receipt of your letter of the 30th April, and in writing I want to confirm the verbal answer I gave you the other day on the subject in question.

It is understood that you must consider yourself relieved of the military duties, as determined in the interview which took place a few weeks since.

The difficult situation in which we are, on account of certain events which you well know, the gravest of which have originated in your own city, makes me the better appreciate the disinterested and truly military loyalty of your letter.

Many sincere thanks for the same from the Honourable M. Blondin and from myself. I note with pleasure that you keep yourself always at the disposal of the military authorities. One should be grateful to you for the generous cooperation you have given to the work of union that we have inaugurated.

Believe me, my dear colonel,

Your devoted,

(Sgd.) F. L. Lessard,

Major General.

My object in bringing this correspondence to light is to give you the proof that even the home defence recruiting has been so treated as to be killed by the hands of the Government, at all events in our province. To get rid of Colonel Lavergne, who has a splendid record as a soldier, and who, though against the principle of our participation in the wars of the Empire, has always declared his willingness to stand by the Militia Act in the defence of Canada and to do active service, the Government abandoned altogether the idea of recruiting for home defence, and announced its determination to substitute conscription, selective conscription, for the voluntary enlistment of Canadian soldiers. our province felt the treatment meted out to her.

But what our province, and more especially the French people of our province and the other provinces of this Dominion have felt, and still feel, is the treatment they are receiving from the hands of the people of Ontario. Day after day, month after month, year after year, we are struggling with a powerful but ungenerous majority to keep for our children the natural right to speak the tongue of their mothers, to live by the traditions of their ancestors. Where is the harm? Enlightened people can not see it, civilized people would not think of it; but there is in Ontario a class of ignorant people whose delight is to insult the French people from the first of January down to the last of December, every year, attacking in the most slanderous way their religion, their creed, their priests, the head of their church. Their press is full of their denunciations, and their hatred against us goes so far as to compel a majority of their legislators to pass laws and regulations the effect of which is to choke in our children's throats the pure syllables of France. Everybody has heard of the now famous regulation No. 17; but very few know what it really is. I do not intend to make a study of that burning question, but what I say is this: I defy anybody in this House or out of it to establish that that infamous regulation was not concocted with the firm determination to kill the use of the French language in the education of our children. Regulation No. 17 applies only to bilingual schools. So says the regulation itself, and so the courts of Ontario have decided. But what are bilingual schools? Are they schools frequented by a mixed population, both French and English? Not at all. The regulation itself defines what a bilingual school is:

> The term English-French (bilingual) is applied to those schools of each class annually designated by the minister for inspection, as provided in 5 below, and in which French is a language of instruction and communication, as limited in 3 (1) below.

As you may see, two conditions are necessary for a school to become bilingual, one of which is entirely left to the good will of the Minister of Education, that is to say, that no school whatever can become bilingual unless it is annually designated by the minister for double inspection. Nothing more arbitrary was ever enacted. The minister decides himself, of his own free will, what schools he intends annually to become bilingual. Do you want an example of how this regulation works? In the town of Windsor there are three schools attended by a mixed population. In one of them 45 p.c. of pupils are French, in the second the percentage is 65, and in the third it goes up to 85. Now, as a matter of fact the only school of those three which has been designated bilingual by the minister is the one which has the smaller percentage of French pupils. The two others with their 65 and 85 per cent of French pupils were never declare bilingual and the right to teach the French language in those schools has always been refused.

Our people suffer and complain; but the regulation is there, and our people are the victims of that narrow-minded and vexatious regulation. And if, as happened in this city, the school board trustees try to have the children educated according to the principles of a sound pedagogy and common sense, laws are passed by the legislature to strike out of existence the trustees elected by the taxpayers and to substitute for them a few commissioners appointed by the Government with no regard to the racial complexion of the ratepayers.

We fought those battles from tribunal to tribunal up to the Privy Council. The highest court of the realm declared last year that the existence of the Government's commission was unconstitutional, so also the law that empowered the Government to act against the rights of the minority. But defying the judgment of the Privy Council, the Provincial Government has re-enacted the same law, and is pursuing the same course of mean persecution against our people in Ontario. But persecutions and hardships, fines and imprisonment will in no way prevent this suffering minority from standing by its natural rights and fighting to the end for its liberties. For a large portion of our people, the enemy we have to fight is in our midst, and we form part of those small nationalities whose liberty is threatened, and who are bound to defend even in Canada, the heritage we received from our ancestors, against the ignorance and the fanaticism of a detestable caste. And those very people who are persecuting our children and our institutions, and who are doing their very best to incarcerate our teachers, are the people who complain that we have not yet sacrificed our last man or our last dollar to aid the Montenegrins or the Serbians against the soldiers of Germany and Austria. We are persecuted and shamefully abandoned by all those whose duty it is to defend us, and we are now no less shamefully abused by those who think it good taste to join with our persecutors, and to ask us what we are doing for the Empire. What are we doing? We are fighting here for our own liberties; we are fighting here for our own existence; and as long as you are unable to give us peace and to maintain harmony between the two races in Canada, and to make Confederation a success, do not ask us to go to the front and to leave our children behind in the hands of people who are determined to do away with the French race in Canada.

Moreover, there is something that nobody should forget, and that is that, from the beginning of the war down to the date this Bill becomes the law of the land, no one has been nor is obliged to enlist. If the obligation to enlist does not yet exist—and it is because it does not exist that we are called to enact the present law—what right has any one to reproach any province with its failure to enlist? Where there is no obligation there is no duty, and where there is no duty it is mere nonsense to clothe a province or a single individual with the responsibility of a failure which cannot even exist. In no way is any particular province obliged to furnish recruits in a ratio comparative to its population with the rest of the Dominion. That answers for the past, and victoriously meets any remarks or accusations brought forward against any province of this Dominion, either by insidious articles written in the press of this country or by bold and mischievous assertions proferred by public men who, though not yet in the firing line, are most fittingly apt to lose their heads when speaking before an audience of their countrymen. The last illustration of such a maniacal demonstration is to be found in one of the Ottawa newspapers of the 26th of July, giving to its readers the following recital of what took place at the annual lawn social of Rosemount Loyal Orange Lodge, No. 126:

Quebec is scored for small reply to call for men.—Sir Sam Hughes, Dr. J. E. Edwards, H. B. Morphy and others at Rosemount L.O.L. Lawn Social.

Quebec province was scored for its meagre response to the call for men by members of Parliament and prominent local Orangemen at an open air meeting in the grove west of Rosemount Avenue Methodist church last evening, the occasion being the annual lawn social of Rosemount Loyal Orange Lodge, No. 126.

"Stand no nonsense from Quebec in this great crisis,"—"Don't tolerate the dictatorial tactics of the Roman Catholic church in that province" were the keynotes of addresses by Lieut.-Gen. Sir Sam Hughes, M.P., Dr. J. A. Edwards, M.P., H. B. Morphy, M.P., J. A. Sexsmith, M.P., Dr. Wilfrid Campbell, Bro. George Boyce, past grand master of the L. O. L. of Eastern Ontario, and others.

Hundreds of men and women, members and friends of the two Orange lodges of the Hintonburgh district, filled the cool grove and listened with the keenest of interest to the speeches, vociferously applauding the straight from the shoulder talks given them. The fife and drum band of the Orange Young Britons' Lodge, No. 556, was present and made the welkin ring with the strains of Orange tunes, much enthusiasm being aroused as they played the marches referred to by Sir Sam Hughes when he was speaking of the rally of the Orangemen in the rebellion of '37.

Bro. W. F. Garland, as chairman of the committee in charge of the social, introduced the speakers collectively to the gathering at the opening of the meeting and Bro. William Joynt, past county master of the County of Carleton L. O. L., acted as chairman and introduced them individually. Mr. Garland spoke of Sir Sam as a man who did things and didn't talk.

The Prime Minister found that he talked too much.

The ex-Minister of Militia, clad in white flannels and looking very immaculate with flowers in his buttonhole, sat on the improvised platform with the rest of the speakers, surrounded by lady "Orangemen." He gallantly assisted them to the seats vacated when the speakers left to return to the House.

Dr. Edwards, who spoke first, declared the Orange order was the only order which stood as the bulwark of the liberties of Canada in the past and there never was a time more than the present when organized effort on the part of Orangemen was more needed. He pointed to the impossibility of having unity in a family, community or nation, in which there was divided authority and said Canada was in such a position to-day. The Government acting as the representative of His Majesty the King was sending out the King's call for men, while another power was exercising its authority to tell its men not to answer the call.

So long as this exercise of authority was permitted there would never be unity in Canada, he said. The speaker referred to the Orange order as the only one capable of putting up a united front to the other religious order which was trying to dictate a policy for the people to follow. The Protestant churches were doing good work but they weren't strong enough to stand up and face the "foe."

H. B. Morphy, after eulogizing what Orangemen generally, and those of Carleton county particularly, had done for Canada in her present needful time, declared the men of the province of Quebec had no right to live unless they, too, did something. He said it was a time for straight talking and there would be plenty of it in the next few months. He painted a picture of Sir Wilfrid Laurier getting up in Parliament to ask for a referendum while the boys overseas were crying for help. He said the Government had to go through with the Bill quickly and he asked for the support of Orangemen, Protestants, all loyal Catholics, adding he believed there were some.

Sir Sam Hughes, before speaking, was introduced to Bro. Harry Langford, one of the oldest members of Rosemount lodge, and told him he was a man after his own heart. The ex-Minister of Militia declared Orange people did not need conscription and he referred to the way they rallied to the call in '37. To-day over 60,000 of them were at the front and he aroused applause by mentioning the contribution of the Hintonburgh district. But more men were needed at the front and he referred to the fact that two months had been wasted on the Conscription Bill at present. Results were wanted, pretty soon. While several hundred thousand were fighting for liberty at the front, the people of Quebec were not doing their duty, said Sir Sam, who then declared he believed in action and at the present time, action, with capital letters, in enforcing the Conscription Bill.

"Are we to be deterred by a few hot heads in putting into force a Bill dear to all our hearts?" he asked, amid a chorus of "noes." He said it was not fair that mothers, wives and sweethearts should give up their dear ones while the young men of the province of Quebec were staying at home earning good money. There would have to be equality, and the Orange order would do its bit in seeing that this was brought about.

Mr. J. A. Sexsmith, M.P., Dr. Wilfrid Campbell, Geo. Boyce and L. E. Stanley also spoke.

I have just quoted that extract from the Ottawa Citizen so that we may know the kind of work in which are indulging certain representatives of the people in the House of Commons.

Dr. Edwards is certainly ill-informed when he asserts that in answer to the King's call for men another power was exercising its authority to tell those men not to answer the call.

Mr. Morphy denied to the people of Quebec the right to live. The denials of so good a friend will in no way affect the determination of the people of Quebec to persist in living in the future as they did in the past.

As to Sir Sam's opinion that the people of Quebec are not doing their duty, we have only one thing to say, and that is that we do not attach any importance to his opinion, and that in doing so we are following the example given by his colleagues, who turned him out of the cabinet, and by all reasonable and sensible people, who decline to follow his advice, though it may come from a man clad in white flannels and looking very immaculate, with flowers in his buttonhole and surrounded by lady "Orangemen," as the Journal puts it.

All those assertions we simply deny. They are the products of wild imagination and of a well known fanaticism, and are, I believe, of the same caliber as those alluded to by Lord Shaughnessy, when this gentleman said in the London Times of the 18th November last:

I feel confident that the statements made by Sir Sam Hughes would not receive the support of 2 per cent of Canadian Officers and men on this side of the water.

Utterances of our public men, as well as insidious attacks made against our province by the press for the part she has taken in voluntary enlistment, cannot stand in face of the fact that no enlistment was obligatory and that consequently no province was subject to any duty in the matter; but what was not a duty up to today will now become an obligation as soon as Parliament passes the present Bill and makes it the law of the land. This consideration leads me to define the position I intend taking on the Bill now submitted to our deliberations.

Such a Bill is a mere consequence of the principle of our participation in the wars of Great Britain. The moment this country acquiesced to take part in the wars of Great Britain, under the laws of Canada, we had the power to levy, equip, and maintain troops for that end, but we had not the power to send them over to France without their consent, and so voluntary enlistment was adopted. Canada magnificently responded to the appeal, and under the voluntary system 420,000 of our men were sent to aid the Allies. The voluntary system has not been exhausted, but it was conducted in such a way that we may practically consider it as exhausted for the time. To-day, by the substitution of the conscription system for the voluntary one, we are asked to adopt this Bill, which enables the Government to send over to the trenches people who are not willing to go.

I stand against this Bill, and I will vote against its principles for three reasons: first, because I am against the participation of our country in all the wars of Great Britain; secondly, because I firmly believe that there is no need, and it is not the duty for Canada to sacrifice its last man and its last dollar in a war which is not fought on our soil and in defence of our homes. I may add, as a third reason, that the economic condition of our country is so threatened by the gigantic effort that we have already made that it is a criminal folly to continue such an effort, which will bring the complete exhaustion of all our resources, to be followed by the suicide of the nation.

I belong in politics to the old school of Cartier and Macdonald, and with those two great Canadians I firmly adhere to the principle that a growing country like ours should never be involved in any of the European wars, but that its energies should be devoted to its welfare and to the rapid development of all its resources. Canada First was their motto. It is also mine. It is the motto of the province I have the honour to represent in this House, and it should be the guiding star of all our public men, whose first and undeniable duty is to protect and safeguard the interests of their own country.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: May I ask the honourable gentleman a question?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: At the present time the honourable gentleman's own son is at the front fighting the battles of Canada and the Empire. I would like to ask him how he is going to meet that son when he returns to Canada?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: That is a question of sentiment, not one of reason. My son has his ideas and I have mine.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: He went under the voluntary system.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: He went under the voluntary system. He was two years in the trenches, was called back to England, and is returning to the trenches. Is that to affect my principles?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: He was promised help.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: By whom?

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: To the last man and to the last dollar.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I gave him the help he had. I may add that, like the honourable gentleman from the Gulf (Hon. Mr. L'Espérance), who spoke yesterday, I have a stepson who is leaving for the front. I have also a grandson who is leaving, but I never speak of these personal matters, and I am not complaining. Is that to prevent me from thinking that the interests of my country must come before my family affection? I put my country above all, and I think it is the duty of every public man to put his country before his family ties.

It has been said that when Great Britain is at war Canada is at war. I deny the truthfulness of such a statement. There is at all events a most important distinction to be borne in mind, which the people of this country will easily understand. No doubt, when England is engaged in a war her colonies may be attacked, and in that sense only Canada may be understood to be at war and obliged to defend her soil against the incursions of a common foe. But never outside of that possible emergency, has a British colony been considered or declared to be in a state of war. The history of England and of its colonies has not a single page to illustrate the doctrine that any British colony has considered itself in a state of active war because the Mother Country was engaged in any European, Asiatic or African war expeditions.

I am also against the adoption of this Bill because the 100,000 Canadian soldiers asked for and to be levied by conscription are not needed at this present juncture, either by the King or by England, or even by the Canadian soldiers actually engaged in the trenches—not even by my son.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Why?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: My son is a soldier, and he has only his duty to do.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: In the trenches.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: A subsidized press and the army of war-suckers may poison and have poisoned public opinion, and are constantly blowing in every direction an appeal to arms; but the facts are there and as given by our public men they establish the undeniable truth, already demonstrated, that we have actually in France 135,000 men, 80,000 of whom constituted the four divisions at the front and 55,000 are acting as support, with a reserve in England of 150,000 soldiers which is more than sufficient to meet the exigencies of the present war.

I am further against the adoption of this Bill because it not only establishes conscription but also imposes upon our own people the obligation to go and fight abroad. I am not against conscription as a consequence of our participation in a war. I think conscription in itself would perhaps be more just to the public than the voluntary system.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes; but if I am against the principle, I must be against the consequences, and I am against conscription in that way.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: In what way?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Because by this Bill it is proposed not merely to have conscription, but to impose the obligation to cross overseas and fight the battles of the Empire in any part of the world.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: On the first line.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Who will determine where the first line is?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Not the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I have as much right as any honourable gentleman to determine where the first line is, and I place it on our shores with just as much reason as you have for placing it on the shores of the Black Sea.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Are the battles of the Empire not our battles?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Not always. This is an obligation which is altogether a new departure from our well known defensive policy at home, and which a moribund parliament has no right to impose without having first obtained from the electorate a mandate to that effect. The constitutional life of this Parliament should have expired last year. It was prolonged by mutual consent for one year, without the approval of the electorate. A new prolongation was asked for lately, but this demand met such an opposition that the Government withdrew its measure. I heartily congratulate the Prime Minister on having withdrawn that resolution which he had asked the Commons to pass and which would in turn have come before this House. He was quite right in withdrawing it, and you will understand why. The consequences of passing such a resolution would have been that a simple majority of both Houses would have been sufficient to amend our constitution. Where would be the guarantee for our minorities if a parliamentary majority could to-morrow, if it so desired, request an amendment to the British North America Act and if Great Britain consented to grant the request from a divided parliament. The Privy Council has decided in the case of Manitoba that the British North America Act is a parliamentary pact. If it is a parlimentary pact —and the highest court of the realm has so declared—I say that that pact cannot be changed in one single word without the consent of the contracting parties. At all events, I congratulate the Prime Minister on the stand he has taken.

General elections are impending and the Government is forced to go to the country. The Government has certainly the right to ask from the people a new lease of office, but at the same time it has the imperative duty to submit to the approval of the electorate its new policy. Let the people be consulted in the proper way and give their answer.

This is a grave question and it must be well explained to the electorate. Who is to be called upon, not only to sustain, but also to pay the tremendous cost of our participation in the present war? Every day we remain in the precarious position we are now occupying, our debt increases at a fearful rate. But a few days ago the Minister of Finance gave to Parliament the official information that this war costs Canada over $850,000 a day and our war expenditure up to the 20th of July has reached the tremendous sum of $623,000,000. And the war is not over yet. More than that, we are asked to add 100,000 men to the expeditionary force, and the cost of such an addition will bring up our daily expenses to a million dollars. A million dollars every day! And where will we take those hundred thousand people, when Canada is just facing one of the worst crises of its history?

I share in their entirety the views expressed in the New York Evening Post by Mr. Henri Bourassa, one of our masters in political economy, in the following words:

To realize the extent of the labour crisis, one must know the conditions of the country. The scanty population of 7,000,000 is scattered over a territory as large as that of the United States. The present army of 420,000, to which must be added at least 20,000 to 30,000 foreign reservists, has been recruited without the slightest regard to local or special conditions, or the technical competency of the recruits. Certain industries, as the extraction of coal, for example, have been disorganized. For want of labour, land under cultivation is much less this year than last,—and this, at the very moment the supply of food is likely to be the main factor of the situation in Europe.

The conditions of agriculture appeared so serious as early as last year that, during the winter months, the Canadian Government made, through thousands of American publications, an urgent appeal to American labour. Seventy thousand farm labourers were needed. When the declaration of war by Congress brought that propaganda to a standstill, about 7,000 Americans had crossed the border. So that Canadian farming has remained and will remain short of more than 60,000 labourers, the help of whom was considered by our Government as absolutely necessary to ensure the required production of foodstuffs. How then can we accept, from the same Government, the suggestion of increasing the fatal gap by the further enlistment of 100,000 men for military operations in Europe?

It must not be forgotten that, in England and France, thousands of men are periodically recalled from the trenches and put at work on the farms, during seed and harvest times. This is impossible in Canada. Once in Europe, our soldiers are there to stay till the end of the war, and a good while after. The wounded and the crippled alone are brought back, to help in impoverishing the country.

If Canada persists in her run towards extreme militarism, in order to supply the armies of Europe with a number of men wholly insufficient to influence the fate of arms, she will soon find herself utterly unable to give to the Allied nations the real help which ought to be, and could be, her most valuable contribution to the common cause: nourishment.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I am not sure that I understood the honourable gentleman. How much does the honourable gentleman say 100,000 Canadian soldiers would cost daily for a year?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The average is from $1,500 to $2,000 a year. In England five or six months ago Mr. Asquith or Lloyd George said that the cost had risen from $800 to $1,000, to $1,200, and had reached $1,500, and was still going up, and that the average cost of each man enlisted would be between $1,500 and $2,000 a year.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: What I said was that we are actually paying $850,000 a day. That is the figure given by the Minister of Finance himself. If we send 100,000 more men, our daily expense will be $1,000,000.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: More than that.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Call it as much as you like.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The economic condition of our country to-day, after three years of its participation in this European war, is so precarious, and our country is so seriously threatened with bankruptcy, disaster, and ruin, that I feel my imperative duty to resist the invitation made to us to increase our effort in the gradual but rapid depopulation of our provinces, and for this additional reason I will record my vote against the adoption of a measure so detrimental to real Canadian interests. Great Britain's motto is: "What we have we hold." Canada's actual motto is: "What we have we give away." We are giving away our children, our money, our resources, the rails of our railways—in fact, all we have; and this wind of foolish dissipation is blowing all over the country with the fury of a hurricane, fomented by a subsidized press and by the boiling interests of the war-suckers of two continents. Words of moderation are of no use; they are construed as a call to treason. The liberty of the citizen is threatened by this Bill, the liberty of the press and free speech will be in a few days words of the past; and so strenuous is the effort to crush all that stands in the way of this legislation that the Government do not hesitate a moment to fill up the vacancies in this House with men who—some of them at least—are not free to exercise their own independent judgment in a matter for which they have already voted in the House of Commons, whilst others, having deserted their posts in the lower House to accept a remunerated position under the Crown, are now rewarded for such a desertion by being made honourable for their lifetime and sent here to nullify by their interested vote the vote of really independent members of this House. What would intelligent and honest people think of a judge who would consent to sit in a court of review to sustain by a new decision of his own the judgment already given by him in an inferior court? Is that fair?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It is done.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Is that decent? If it is done elsewhere, we in the province of Quebec have not been trained to see such things done.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: We have a judge in this House voting for it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I really regret that, since this Bill has come before our House, the Government has thought fit to apply in advance its principle in choosing by selective conscription those who arrive here to replace our departed colleagues with the well-understood determination to send to the firing-line 100,000 of their fellow citizens. Such tactics cannot be approved of by the people of this country. Nor will anybody admire the miserable attempt made by an ex-colleague of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in denouncing his chief to the leader of the Opposition in this House, asking him in the name and in the interest of the Empire to betray as he himself did years ago, the man who made him what he is, in giving him a place in his Cabinet and a standing before the country—a standing that he was unable to keep. This insult has already been properly appreciated by the leader of the Opposition in this House.

Before taking my seat I have the painful duty of protesting in the name of my province against certain utterances which I hope will not be taken as the real sentiments of those who made them. If our public men want to keep the consideration and the confidence of those who elect them, their first duty is to keep cool, to remain prudent, and to banish from their language any appeal to the passions of a crowd or any attack against the laws of the land. In the recent debate which took place in the House of Commons on the Bill now before us, a member representing a constituency of Ontario, Mr. Armstrong, speaking of our constitution, said, on the 21st of June last:

A great deal has been said by speakers who have preceded me as to whether or not Canada had the right to send her troops beyond her borders under the old Militia Act. I have listened to both sides of that argument, and while I am forced to say in all honesty that I am convinced the leader of the Government has made his case clear, and doubly so since I have listened to the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) this afternoon, I personally do not care two straws whether it is constitutional or not. Personally I would puncture the constitution a dozen times, if it was necessary, in order to stand by the boys at the front and to uphold Canada's arm in this struggle.

This is a fine specimen given to the people of this country of the respect that honourable gentleman has for the law, and especially for our own constitution, and of his willingness—he, a member of Parliament—to puncture even a dozen times the very law which gives us the power to assemble under this roof and to make the necessary enactments for the good, peace, harmony, and defence of our country.

Another member of the House of Commons, representing also one of the Ontario constituencies, a minister of the Crown, Sir George E. Foster, on the 18th of June last, advocated the following doctrine:
