My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, when we face such conditions as that, chops logic and talks of the Constitution. Might I not say that logic is good in its place and that constitutions are most excellent, but neither logic nor the Constitution is the people, and they cannot be allowed to be a bar to the people's ultimate defence and ultimate salvation. Constitutions are methods into which filter, and through which come, governments of the peoples by themselves, orderly and methodically. But the good of the people, the happiness of the people, the salvation of the people, are the basic things which are to be sought after, and just at this very moment it seems to me that in Canada, in the Empire, and throughout the world, we have a situation surrounded with conditions altogether unusual in the history of the world, and which demand action of the real strong red-blooded type for the support of the men we have sent to the front, and for the salvation of the country for which they have gone. My right hon. friend may talk about the Constitution and urge his points in a logical way, but that does not satisfy me. If the necessity is upon us, we must act.

Constitution and logic, says the honourable minister, cannot be allowed to be a bar to the people's ultimate defence. We know what that means.

But what is still more significant is the singular language found in the speech delivered by the Prime Minister himself in introducing this Bill on the 11th of June last as found in the House of Commons Debates, pages 2288 and 2289. Speaking of our soldiers in the trenches, he said:

They went forth splendid in their youth and confidence. They will come back silent, grim, determined men, who not once or twice but fifty times have gone over the parapet to seek their rendevous with death. If what are left of 400,000 such men come back to Canada with fierce resentment, and even rage in their hearts, conscious that they have been deserted and betrayed, how shall we meet them when they ask the reason? I am not so much concerned for the day when this Bill becomes law, as for the day when these men return if it is rejected. It is easy to sow the wind of clamour against the imposition of equal duty and obligation upon all Canadians for the preservation of their country; but those who make that sowing may reap such a whirlwind as they do not dream of to-day.

Who are here accused of sowing the wind of clamour and threatened to reap such a whirlwind as they do not dream of to-day? As long as this Bill is not the law of the land have we not an undoubted right to oppose it? Is freedom of speech and liberty of action denied to people who are of an opinion different to your own? And whence does the Premier of this Dominion or the leader of this House take the right to threaten us or to abuse us, as was done in the remarks of which fell from the lips of those two gentlemen?

I want to tell those who have the responsibility of governing this country that we all understand the difficulties of their position, and that we are all desirous of giving them a helping hand in smoothing the paths they have to follow; but, for God's sake, let them do their bit, let them be prudent and peaceful in their ways. They will have our good will as long as they know how to gain it, and they will not certainly gain it by threats of any kind or by calling us cowards, slackers, foes of Canada and freedom, passive traitors who shirk service for defence, and proclaim openly our disloyalty to Great Britain. It is my duty to ask the honourable the leader of this House to repudiate such epithets, specially addressed to our race, and to withdraw the accusations of which we were the victims. If that is not done, if an honourable apology is not offered to those who felt insulted in the present instance, those words will go down to the people of that race or of that section of country alluded to by my honourable friend, and what will he gain? He will gain this, that, having sown the wind of clamour against our race, he will reap such a whirlwind as he does not dream of to-day, to use the phrase of the Prime Minister of this Dominion.

Had I been appointed to this Senate on the sole condition and for the sole purpose of sustaining by my vote the motion made by my honourable friend the leader of this House, or were I still occupying the position of Speaker of this House, let me tell you, honourable gentlemen, that, in face of the threats and the insults which are so freely poured upon the people I represent here, I would consider it my duty to protest by my vote against those who forget the responsibilities of their high office, and I would give up immediately any position of honour to safeguard my own honour and fulfil my duty towards the people I represent and the country I love.

Brigadier General Hon. JAMES MASON: Amidst the discussion of this most engrossing subject of military service in newspapers, public meetings, and Parliament, it is somewhat difficult to say anything new. I wish, however, to produce some figures relating to enlistment which may be interesting; for, although most of them have been before the public in various ways, I thought it would be well to have them in concise form. When war was declared by England against Germany, Canada, like all other portions of the Empire, clearly saw its duty, which I think could not be better expressed than by my reading some extracts from the speech made by the right honourable the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons during that memorable session of Parliament called the War Parliament in August, 1914. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

This session has been called for the purpose of giving the authority of Parliament and the sanction of law to such measures as have already been taken by the Government, and any further measures that may be needed, to insure the defence of Canada and to give what aid may be in our power to the mother country in the stupendous struggle which now confronts her. Speaking for those who sit around me, speaking for the wide constituencies which we represent in this House, I hasten to say that to all these measures we are prepared to give immediate assent. If in what has been done or in what remains to be done there may be anything which in our judgment should not be done, or should be differently done, we raise no question, we take no exception, we offer no criticism, and we shall offer no criticism so long as there is danger at the front. It is our duty, more pressing upon us than all other duties, at once, on this first day of this extraordinary session of the Canadian Parliament, to let Great Britain know, and to let the friends and foes of Great Britain know, that there is in Canada but one mind and one heart, and that all Canadians stand behind the mother country, conscious and proud that she has engaged in this war, not from any selfish motive, for any purpose of aggrandisement, but to maintain untarnished the honour of her name, to fulfill her obligations to her allies, to maintain her treaty obligations and to save civilization from the unbridled lust of conquest and domination.

We are British subjects, and to-day we are face to face with the consequences which are involved in that proud fact. Long we have enjoyed the benefits of our British citizenship; to-day it is our duty to accept its responsibilities and its sacrifices. We have long said that when Great Britain is at war we are at war; to-day we realize that Great Britain is at war and that Canada is at war also.

Then he went on to say further:

Upon this occasion I owe it to the House and to myself to speak with absolute frankness and candour. This is a subject which has often been an occasion of debate in this House. I have always said, and I repeat it on this occasion, that there is but one mind and one heart in Canada. At other times we may have had different views as to the methods by which we are to serve our country and our Empire. More than once I have declared that if England were ever in danger—nay, not only in danger but if she were ever engaged in such a contest as would put her strength to the test—then it would be the duty of Canada to assist the motherland to the utmost of Canada's ability. England to-day is not engaged in an ordinary contest. The war in which she is engaged will in all probability—nay, in absolute certainty—stagger the world with its magnitude and its horror. But that war is for as noble a cause as ever impelled a nation to risk her all upon the arbitrament of the sword. That question is no longer at issue; the judgment of the world has already pronounced upon it. I speak not only of those nations which are engaged in this war, but of the neutral nations. The testimony of the ablest men of these nations, without dissenting voice, is that to-day the allied nations are fighting for freedom against oppression, for democracy against autocracy, for civilization against reversion to that state of barbarism in which the supreme law is the law of might.

Here is another extract:

If my words can be heard beyond the walls of this House in the province from which I come, among the men whose blood flows in my own veins, I should like them to remember that, in taking their place to-day in the ranks of the Canadian army to fight for the cause of the Allied nations, a double honour rests upon them. The very cause for which they are called upon to fight is to them doubly sacred.

When the declaration of war was made, and Canada decided to assist the mother country, of course the first duty was to raise troops to take part in the war. The voluntary system was at first adopted, and it was thought by most people that it would be successful. I must confess that at the time I was rather doubtful about it, and I took the liberty in October, 1914, to send a letter to the public press, from which I quote this paragraph:

Here, as in Great Britain, the voluntary system of defence is on its trial. If it fails, compulsory military service becomes necessary for public protection. Our Canadian and Imperial interests are too great, our whole British fabric too vast, to depend upon a patriotism for defence which fails in the supreme hour; such has not proved the case in England as yet, and if the hundred thousand volunteers reported in Canada by the Militia Department some time ago as available are rapidly prepared and sent to the front, it will not be the case here.

That voluntary system was continued until recently, when it was considered that it had broken down, as it could no longer keep a sufficient number of troops at the front to maintain Canada's place in the defence of the Empire. The results of that system are set forth in these figures. I have here six or seven sheets containing statistics relating to enlistment, the disposition of the forces, the casualties, etc. If it is the pleasure of the House I shall read them, or they may be taken as read and placed upon the records.

Some hon. SENATORS: Dispense.

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: I may say that these figures were compiled from official statistics, which I received from the Militia Department and Census Office and can therefore be relied upon. To show the necessity of getting further troops, either by voluntary enlistment or by compulsion, I will refer to one of these returns, showing the infantry enlisted during the twelve months ending on the 31st of May, 1917. Honourable gentlemen will know that the infantry are the fighting crowd in the army. The artillery prepare the way, and when all is ready the infantry go over the top and complete the attack. Of course, they suffer the most, as it is naturally the most dangerous arm of the service, and when recruiting falls off it is the infantry that gets the very small numbers. The number enlisted in the period referred to was 42,523. In that same year the casualties were 12,171 killed in action; died of wounds, 3,872; died of sickness, 421; prisoners of war, 1,115; presumed dead, 1,524; missing, 1,937; a total of 21,040. Adding the wounded, 45,996, makes the total casualties 67,036. Against that were the enlistments, 42,523, showing that we were short 24,513 during that year. Then there is a period of five months from January 1st, 1917, to May 31st, 1917, when we ran short 13,873, and for the months of April and May we ran short 18,362 men of infantry.

Note.—Dash thus — placed before figures indicates surplus enlistments; absence of dash indicates shortage.

The question then arose, what was to be done? How could the ranks be kept filled? It must be remembered that when an attack is made, if the numbers on the side attacking largely preponderate, the casualties are much less, whereas if the attacking force is small there are greater losses. I can assure honourable gentlemen that in the visit I paid to the front not long ago I found a very strong desire among the men there, who were expecting reinforcements from their own country, that there should be no failure in any way.

When the question arose as to what could be done in Canada, the Militia Act was first thought of. That Act provides that "all male inhabitants are liable for service"; and furthermore that "the Governor in Council may place the militia or any part thereof on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada for the defence thereof, whenever it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency." No person can dispute the emergency of the present moment, in view of what has occurred during the period of voluntary enlistment.

I might refer to two speeches I made during the last session of Parliament, one on the subject of recruiting and the other on registration. In preparing those speeches I obtained some information which is very convincing as to the undesirability of the voluntary system as affecting the industries of the country. I received numbers of letters from different industries, mostly manufacturing, through the agency of the Manufacturers' Association of Canada. The letter from the General Manager of the Dominion Steel Corporation stated:

> It may interest you to know that out of about 2,400 enlistments, from among the employees of the Dominion Coal Company, at least 2,200 have been from among the workmen employed underground.

The result was that the labour most necessary in the war was taken under the system of voluntary enlistment. The letter from the manager of the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company and letters from other industries showed that the situation mentioned was general throughout Canada. In view of that, and also the rapid dwindling of enlistment, it was considered that something in the way of compulsion should be done by the Government. While the Militia Act gave authority to compel enlistment, in view of what would occur to the industries of the country under enlistments made as the Act prescribes, it was thought better to introduce selective conscription, for which this Bill provides—a wise idea on the part of the Government. The reasons for this Bill are very clear. It gives authority to discriminate as to who should or should not be forced to go, thus the least possible harm will be done to the country.

The opposition, if I might so call it, to this Bill comes from a particular section of the Dominion, and why it should come I do not know. Its duties are the same as the duties of the other portions of the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does it not come from many sections of the Dominion?

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: From the meetings held in Montreal and other places in the province I should judge that the active opposition is in that quarter.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Perhaps Montreal is a freer place to live in than other parts of the country.

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: I have here an extract from a newspaper issued the other day which speaks of an organization raised in Montreal to oppose conscription by force. I hope that is a mistake.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think that is childish talk.

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: However, I think it must be admitted that compulsory service is necessary and is popular in most sections of the country. I have read this very morning in the Toronto news column of the Ottawa Citizen the report of a meeting held in Toronto at which 5,000 persons were present. It was called "The Win-the-War Rally." Among the speakers was the leader of the Opposition in the Ontario Legislature, the Hon. N. W. Rowell, who spoke as follows:

> I am here to-night, to support the principle of compulsory military service, and the formation of a national or war government.
> I believe that Sir Robert Borden's statement of the dire need of reinforcements was absolutely correct, and that it was useless to hope for results from voluntary recruiting. If the war lasted more than a year 100,000 men would not be sufficient, and they might as well face the situation.

Mr. Rowell also read this very significant letter from General Currie, who, as you know, commands the Canadian corps which forms part of the first army in France. General Currie in his letter said:

> We are anxiously looking to Canada to see what the results of Sir Robert Borden's conscription proposals will be.
> I pray that you will not relax your efforts in seeing that everything is done by Canada to furnish the necessary drafts of officers and men. The troops here expect it—let them not be disappointed.

That is the feeling which prevails among our troops in France and Flanders. One of the arguments advanced by those not in favour of this Bill is that the enforcement of the Act should be postponed until after the general election; but, as far as I have been able to learn, there is no guarantee that conscription would be enforced in the event of a general election. Let us suppose that a general election takes place, and that men are returned to power who do not believe in conscription. What will be the result? Recruiting in Canada will be at an end, and no more Canadian troops will go to the front. Our soldiers who are there now will be killed off, and that will be the end of Canada's contribution to the defence of the Empire. I think we would all feel very much disgraced.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That was not the result in Australia.

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: Australia has done its duty; Australia has sent proportionately more troops than we have.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the refusal to adopt conscription did not stop enlistments in Australia.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: How many have enlisted since?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Quite a number.

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: Enlistments have stopped here now.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: In Australia the question is going to be again submitted by a referendum.

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: The enlistment for the latter half of June amounted to less than 3,000.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Where?

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: All over Canada. Every district in Canada is included in that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Recruiting has been absolutely stopped. No effort has been made in Quebec since the announcement of conscription.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: We would not expect any after conscription.

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: The total enlistments in Quebec during the latter half of June were 199 men.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But General Lessard was charged—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will ask the honourable gentleman's permission to put to him a question.

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: What is the question?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Has not General Lessard, who was in charge of recruiting in the province of Quebec, stopped his work since the announcement of conscription?

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: I cannot say as to that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Why? Because he got no volunteers.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Hon. Mr. Blondin has said the contrary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) spoke for nearly two hours without the slightest interruption. I think it would be courtesy at least to allow the honourable gentleman who is addressing the House to give his figures; and, if there is any answer to be made to him, let it be made afterwards. Let us not have constant interruptions which are being made in every case when a member on this side of the House is speaking.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am ready to accept the advice of my honourable friend, but he knows very well that we can put a question to any honourable gentleman who has the floor if he so allows.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Quite correct; but the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) was discussing the question.

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: In the speech which I made on recruiting, on March 14th, 1916, I find this:

Brigadier General E. W. Wilson of the fourth division—

—that is the Montreal division—

—stated at Montreal on March 4, according to a despatch in the Toronto World, that "some form of compulsion will be necessary in Montreal if recruiting does not take a turn for the better soon.

Among the letters which I received from manufacturers there was one from Penman Company, which is a well known concern, which manufactures underclothing and advertises very largely. The manager of that company wrote to me as follows:

Out of Penman's male employees at Mill No. 1, Paris, Ontario, of 115 men, 70 enlisted. Out of their 347 male employees at St. Hyacinthe one enlisted.

As I have said, what guarantee have we that in the event of a general election conscription would be enforced? None.

I have referred to the glowing patriotic language used by the right honourable gentleman to whom I have referred at the first session of Parliament after the outbreak of war. I have here the report of the Debates in the House of Commons on Wednesday, August 1, when that right honourable gentleman spoke as follows:

Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The House is aware that I very seldom notice any attack made upon me outside of this House, in the press or otherwise, but I find a report of a speech by Sir Clifford Sifton, delivered two days ago, which I cannot allow to pass unnoticed. Sir Clifford Sifton is reported in the Globe of yesterday as having addressed the Canadian Club at Winnipeg, and as saying, among other things:

"Sir Clifford did not think that the people of Canada had any call to find fault with Laurier on the war until the day that the conscription policy was announced in Parliament. Sir Wilfrid now said that he was unable to endorse fully the policy of conscription. His attitude was taken because he believed that it was his duty to the province of Quebec. In other words, Laurier abrogated his title to leadership. The plain, unavoidable and inevitable fact was that if Sir Wilfrid Laurier were to win this election Canada would go out of the war."

I have to say in reference to this, Sir, that from anything which I have ever said in this House or out of it, Sir Clifford Sifton could not draw the inference that any attitude which I have ever taken was in deference to the province of Quebec. Neither on this occasion, nor any occasion in my public life, did I ever take an attitude in deference to one province alone. The policies which I have opposed were not opposed from the point of view of one province, but from the point of view of Liberal principles and with respect to all the provinces of Canada and irrespective of race or creed. This is my position to-day. I have stated before, and I repeat, that my attitude to-day, on the 1st of August, 1917, towards the war is the same as it was on the 19th August, 1914. I am in this war to the end, but I am in this war not upon compulsion, but upon the voluntary principle of enlistment.

That is pretty clear. My feeling is that we should hasten the enactment of this law because it takes some time—months and months—to train and equip men for the front. In the meantime, the forces there are daily diminishing, and, if there is heavy fighting, which we expect, our divisions will be depleted to such an extent that one or more of them will have to be broken up.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: Honourable gentlemen, I think I voice the unanimous opinion of this honourable House when I say that both sides of the House entertain an equal regard for the honourable leader of the Government in this House. Ever since he has been in this Chamber he has proved himself to be a most genial gentleman, an able and progressive man, and it was, I must confess, a great surprise to me, and I am sure to a number of other gentlemen not only in this honourable House but in the country at large, to hear some of the remarks which he addressed to this House in proposing the second reading of the Bill in question. I refer more especially to that part of his speech in which he said:

What, then, of Canada? Think you, would we be enjoying our freedom, independence, and security to-day had not Great Britain espoused the cause for which she is now fighting. Let me ask, what would be the result if every man in the State took the position which is being taken by the anti-conscriptionists to-day in refusing to subscribe to compulsory service in defence of the State? It is clear that treason could not effect any greater result in favour of the enemy than the non-resistance of the people who refuse to defend their State. To my mind it is difficult to draw any substantial distinction between treason and non-resistance. The same result is accomplished by both, and if one is odious, equally odious is the other. Better and more manly would it be for the anti-conscriptionists to say they are prepared to sacrifice Canada to Germany, prepared to sacrifice Canada's sons who are to-day fighting the battle of human rights in France and Belgium, than under their colours of anti-conscription to play into the hands of the enemy. Think of a race of people so indifferent to their country's interests as to depend upon those who are sufficiently loyal to jeopardize their lives to defend those who refuse to fight. Think of a race of people growing up oblivious to the grandeur of love of country, of patriotism, and of the self-denial and sacrifice by which men are prepared to place their lives on the altar of their country. When we think of men indifferent at such a time to all the best interests of civilization involved in this struggle, indifferent whether the enemy should crush out the freedom and liberty which they have enjoyed under their country's protection, it shakes our confidence in human nature. A thousand times better are those who fell in action and sleep beneath the daisies on the distant battlefields of France and Belgium than those who to-day in Canada are declaiming against conscription and are simply concerned about the paltry affairs of the particular party or race to which they belong.

In conclusion, let me ask, is Canada of all the Allies to be alone in refusing to defend herself and the Empire? No excuse, when analyzed can be made in opposition to this Bill except that of refusing assistance to the Empire or that of cowardice in facing the jeopardy of war.

The honourable gentleman was asked, immediately after he had pronounced these words, whether this qualification applied as well to Australia, where conscription had been voted down; and he answered that in Australia the difference was that they had largely contributed in voluntary enlistment. I call the attention of the honourable gentleman to the fact that the difference is from 5½ in Canada to 7 per cent in Australia, not a very wide difference; but if it be true that all persons who are opposing conscription are slackers and traitors, I submit that qualification would be equally true of the Australian people who by a large majority voted down conscription.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: The majority was two and a half per cent. That is not a very large majority.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: There was a majority.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: A very small one.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Strike out the word large.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It would be still quite a large number of traitors.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: But it should be stated also that since that vote was taken on a referendum, the Government went to the country and was returned by an overwhelming majority.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Not on the question of conscription.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Very largely.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The same as this one will be.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: It was on a question of policy.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am not speaking of any political question that may obtain in Australia; I am speaking of the referendum. The very principle which has been suggested to be applied here was submitted in Australia, where there were no French Canadians, where the honourable gentleman would not be prepared to say that they were traitors or slackers, and by a majority of the people voting on the referendum the principle of conscription was rejected.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend is not justified in saying that I said they were traitors. I shall have something to say on this before this debate is closed. The honourable gentleman should not put words into my mouth that I did not use.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: When the honourable member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) last night drew the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to his language, he commenced to say that when he spoke of the Government he meant to speak of the Parliament. The honourable gentleman will readily admit that there is quite a difference between the two.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend is entirely wrong there. I said the Government spoke for Parliament, and that under our constitutional machinery that is the only way Parliament has of giving its expression upon any attitude which it may take.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Well, the honourable gentleman is wrong.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It does not make it wrong because you say it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman is wrong. On questions of this kind the Government does not speak for Parliament; it has no right to speak for Parliament. If the Government speaks for Parliament it is only in cases of emergency, and the Government is bound to call Parliament together at once in order that the question may be determined by Parliament as to what steps shall be taken.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then will my honourable friend say who speaks for Parliament?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Parliament speaks for itself.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not know how it does.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I have only to refer to the Militia Act. What does it say? Sections 70 and 71 say:

70. The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere is Canada and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

71. Whenever the Governor in Council places the militia, or any part thereof, on active service, if Parliament is then separated by such adjournment or prorogation as will not expire within ten days, a proclamation shall be issued for the meeting of Parliament within fifteen days, and Parliament shall accordingly meet and sit upon the day appointed by such proclamation, and shall continue to sit and act in like manner as if it had stood adjourned or prorogued to the same day.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The Government speaks—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: For Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Let the honourable gentleman keep quiet. He will have his opportunity to reply to what we may say against the measure which he has presented, and we will always be glad to hear him, and give to any remarks he may offer to this House all the consideration they deserve; but the honourable gentleman cannot deny that it is only in cases of emergencies that the Government can act on a question of this kind, and that the Government, according to the very statute which I have read, is bound to call Parliament together at once; and why call Parliament at once? Because the Government is not justified, has not the proper authority, to pass definitely upon measures of that kind. It is Parliament that should pass on such measures. Of course, as was suggested, the Cabinet is merely a committee of the House. When we are in the war, as we are to-day, it is the duty of every citizen in this country to do his share towards helping the Allies on the other side. One of my sons enlisted, and when he told me that he had done so, I told him that if I had been in his place I would have done the same thing. I was always of that opinion, and I think that every Canadian, whether French or English-speaking, has felt that way. If there has been a change of feeling to a certain extent, I submit it is due in great measure to language such as the honourable gentleman has used in this House and to which I have referred. I do not refer to that portion of the remarks of the honourable gentleman for the purpose of being offensive to him, for I have too high an esteem for him to do so. I refer to that in order to illustrate one of the main points I desire to make on this question, namely: that at the outset every citizen in Canada, whether French or English, was in favour of participation in the war—in Montreal and Quebec as in Toronto. As the honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) stated the other day, the three days which elapsed from the first to the fourth of August, 1914, were days of the deepest anxiety for French Canadians, even more than for English-speaking Canadians. We realized perfectly that if England did not take part in the war France would be crushed; and we were afraid that England would commit the great error that was committed in 1870. As far as I could see, I think our feeling was shared by the English-speaking people, and I have no doubt that what took place in Quebec occurred also in other parts of the Dominion. I think even Mr. Bourassa was in favour of Canada's participation in the war; in fact, no sane man could be against it. We all realize that Germany's object was to establish Prussian militarism throughout Europe and obtain the control of Europe and other parts of the world; in fact, it was to be world domination. We also realize the methods employed by Germany in warfare, which were a violation of the most sacred rules of war and international laws and repugnant to all sense of justice and humanity. Surely there could not be a French Canadian, who saw that France was to be crushed if England did not come to her rescue, who would not favour the participation of Canada in the war. It was the unanimous opinion of French Canadians, as of English Canadians, that Canada should do all that could be done in that respect.

But we are not in 1914. Canada has now been in the war for three years, and has contributed a much larger number of men than it was anticipated at the beginning this country could contribute. Now we are in the position that the United States have joined in this war, and are ready to send one million soldiers to the other side. This will take over a year, and will tax the full capacity of all the vessels which may be at the disposal of the Allies.

Of course, I would not think of suggesting that if Canada had not already done its large part, that would be a reason for crossing our arms and waiting for the Americans to fill the ranks on the other side. We have contributed already between 418,000 and 425,000 men. We have hundreds of thousands of men who are on the other side, and who have been there for a year or more, waiting their turn to go to the front, and I think it is but fair for us to pause and see where we are, and consider whether it is advisable to go to the extent of enacting conscription.

The honourable gentleman stated that conscription was the natural and logical consequence of society. I quite agree with that, for the defence of the country and in the terms of the Militia Act, but conscription for war outside of the country is a very exceptional thing, and in principle should never be thought of. The conditions were so grave, the war was so important, it was such a moral duty on the part of the Canadian people to help in this war, that if they had refused to participate I think that, although the people are and should be supreme in all questions of that kind, we would have even been justified in submitting the question to the people and trying to induce the majority to decide in favour of conscription. But unless Parliament has a special mandate to enact a law of that kind it is a thing which should never be enforced on the people.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Supposing we were at war with the United States, and had a voluntary army, and we had advanced as far as Boston, and then found it necessary to reinforce our army, and we could not get the soldiers except by conscription, would the honourable gentleman allow it in that case?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Certainly; but that would not be the same case at all. It would be for the defence of our territory. Of course, we are apart on that question. I have all possible respect for those who differ with me. I am sure that a large number of them are sincere, but I honestly believe that they are carried away by questions of sentiment, and that their opinion is biased. They think there is danger that Canada may be invaded, as was suggested by the honourable member from Montarville the other day, and that this is really a case of emergency. For my part, I do not believe that at all. I must say that I agree entirely with the honourable member from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) when he called attention to the very important factor of density of population.

If countries which are densely populated can contribute 7 or 8 or 10 per cent of their population, it does not follow that a country as sparsely populated as Canada can contribute a like percentage of men. That is best evidenced by the fact that, although we have contributed only 5½ per cent of our population, or maybe 6 per cent, Canada is admittedly suffering enormously from the contribution which she has made. We have heard it from the Government, we have seen it in the newspapers this morning, that we are threatened with famine and that it will be necessary to close munition factories for the purpose of providing help to enable the farmers to take care of the crops. Are not these extraordinary conditions? Do they not induce honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House to think that it may be time to pause and consider whether we could not better serve the interest of the Empire and the Allies by producing food and munitions to as great an extent as possible, instead of trying to take the place of American soldiers who otherwise would be transferred to the other side?

I call attention also to our economic conditions. I have no intention of dwelling upon them, because they have been referred to several times by gentlemen who have preceded me. But we cannot close our eyes to the fact that the Minister of Finance went the other day to the United States, and for what purpose? Not to do as the Allies have done, to get the United States to lend part of the money which is required to carry on the war, but to get permission to knock at the doors of private bankers, at the door of J. P. Morgan, in order to negotiate a loan which will cost the people of Canada over 7 per cent. Is not this a serious condition for the country? Are you not preparing for the annexation of this country to the United States?

Some Hon. SENATORS: No, no.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Are you not afraid that you will create an opinion in favour of annexation at a time when the United States will be prosperous, and when we can get capital only from them? Are you not afraid of creating an opinion which may be very dangerous to this country? I appreciate British institutions too highly, I am too much of a Canadian, and I am too desirous of our present position being maintained, not to be afraid of the conditions to which I am calling your attention.

The honourable gentleman from Rideau (Hon Mr. Edwards) has advanced another opinion which I share entirely. I have noticed that some gentlemen on this side of the House do not agree with us in that regard. The honourable gentleman says that there is no danger of Canada being invaded, that it is a dream, and I quite agree with him. He has called attention to the fact that the United States has a population of 110,000,000. Inside of ten years that country will have a population of 150,000,000 or 175,000,000 and inside of twenty-five years there will be 250,000,000 people on the continent of North America. The continent of South America has common interests with the North American continent in that respect, and the idea that it will be possible for Germany or any other European country, or any combination of them, to cross the Atlantic and invade this continent is preposterous. Honourable gentlemen are carried away merely by sentiment.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: China was invaded.

Hon. M. BEIQUE: China is a country which is not organized. There is no comparison.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Does not the honourable gentleman consider, when the commerce and the citizens of a country are attacked on the high seas, the citizens murdered and commerce destroyed, that the country itself is being attacked? And is it not the duty of the citizen to offer his services?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Of course, I admit that Germany could do a great deal of injury to United States commerce; but I am speaking of the question which was dealt with by the honourable gentleman from Rideau, as to whether we are really threatened with invasion.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I do not wish to interrupt the honourable gentleman, but I should like to ask just one more question. If a fire started in Ontario and were coming very rapidly towards Quebec, and a company of firemen were asked to take steps to prevent the approaching danger, would it not be left to their judgment as to where they would attack that fire? Is it not the same principle to leave the control to the military authorities, who are strategists, to determine where a stand should be made, when the country is threatened with force from abroad?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: My answer is this: I would leave it to the firemen to determine the action that should be taken; but, if the fire were 3,000 miles away across the Atlantic, and they wanted me to prepare for the conflagration, I would not take much stock in their recommendations.

I quite understand that in matters of this kind we are influenced very much by incidents which in themselves are not very important, and particularly by sentiment. Honourable gentlemen are surprised that in the province of Quebec we do not seem to be as ready as some others to join in the sacrifices which it is suggested should be made. The honourable gentleman from de Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has given a very fine chapter on this question, to which, I have no doubt, you have given due consideration. He has shown what has been the natural condition of the mind of the people of the province of Quebec. If I might add one word to that chapter I would call attention to the state of mind of the people of the United States which existed until quite recently.

We are all shocked by the methods which have been adopted by the Germans in this war. For my part—and I am sure it was the universal impression of Canadians—I could hardly realize that the United States, great country as she is, could be a silent witness of such atrocities as were committed in Belgium and the northern part of France, and after the violation of international laws to which she had been a party. The Americans are of the Anglo-Saxon race. One would have thought that they would have been stirred and that they would have taken an interest not only on behalf of humanity, but also because of the fact that England was involved. In addition to that, the United States owed a debt of gratitude to France. Nevertheless, it took the United States two years and a half before the war awakened her, and when the war awakened her, why was it? It was not because they were afraid of their territory being invaded, but because their commerce was threatened. Now, what was the reason for that condition of affairs if not because the American people, although of Anglo-Saxon race, are a nation by themselves? They are disinterested so far as other countries are concerned. My youngest son is attending the Boston School of Technology, and he told me that until the United States declared war on Germany, amongst 3,000 pupils, he could not find a companion who took any interest whatever in the war. It was as if the war had not existed. The people of the United States are educated and very progressive; they read papers, which they have in abundance, and yet they remained apparently indifferent.

Honourable gentlemen are surprised that the inhabitants of Quebec, who are in the condition mentioned by the honourable member from de Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), are inclined to keep their sons with them, especially when there is such a great demand for them on the farms. It has been suggested that we should try to create a feeling of national unity in this country. I think we all agree on that; but do you not think it is by such remarks as those to which I have called attention, and by means of such writings as those to which the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) referred to this afternoon, that national unity of the country is being destroyed?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is what they are doing.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Quebec is a splendid province. I think every one will admit that it has one of the best Governments in the Dominion of Canada. I think that Government will compare favourably with the late Government of the province of New Brunswick, the late Government of the province of British Columbia, or the late Government of the province of Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Or of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Or with the Government of the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is superior.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The late Government.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is equal at least to any of them as far as finances are concerned and as far as anything that makes for progress is concerned. Take, for instance, good roads. The Government of Quebec has spent between ten and twelve million dollars within the last three or four years on good roads, and the province is in excellent financial condition, and we are proud of it. I think it is generally understood that the people get the kind of government they deserve, and the people of Quebec cannot be so bad when they manage to get a Government of that kind. If we are to have national unity, and it is what we in Quebec desire, you must make us feel that we have the right to live in this country, whereas by acts of the kind which I have mentioned you make us feel that we cannot do so. I think that I know enough of men and things at my age to be able to account for a great many exaggerations, but I must confess that I feel that conditions are becoming unbearable, and I have no apology to offer on the part of the province of Quebec for the change of feeling which has taken place. There is no doubt that a change of feeling has taken place, and is taking place every day, and I charge the Government with being responsible for it because they have given rise to suspicion. I do not know whether it is true or not, but there is a very strong suspicion that the object of the Government in enacting this conscription measure is to impose it more especially on the people of Quebec. This is something which should not take place. We are told every day that in the English provinces a large majority are against conscription, but that they are ready to swallow conscription for the purpose of imposing it on Quebec. I invite honourable gentlemen to reverse the situation. Suppose that you were in the minority, and that you heard of something of this kind being done for the purpose of imposing legislation of that kind upon you the minority. I know that you would not for an instant bear with anything of the kind. It would irritate you much more than the people of Quebec. If you want to create union and national sentiment, not only must you cease using language of that kind, but you must take the means to prevent those on whom you have any influence from doing the same thing. In Quebec we are really amazed at the position taken by those who are at the head of this movement. I refer particularly to a well-known society.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Don't be afraid of the name.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: A well-known society in the province of Ontario. That society is responsible for some 250,000 soldiers being now in Ireland instead of being sent to the front. If it had not been for that society, Home Rule would, without question, have been settled years ago.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yes, centuries ago.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Ireland would be as peaceable as England is and the British Government would have been able for the last year or so to send to the front 250,000 more soldiers than she has been able to send. It is that society which, just prior to the outbreak of the war, was importing guns from Germany for the purpose—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Of shooting the soldiers of the King.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: —of resisting the laws of the land and fighting the Government—and openly. It is a society which is perhaps responsible in a large measure for the present war, because if the German people had not counted upon the trouble in Ireland it is very doubtful if they would have dared to declare war when they would have reason to contemplate that England would join in it.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: It shows what bad judgment they had.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Well, honourable gentlemen, I refer to these things, not for the purpose of being offensive to any honourable gentleman in this House.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Certainly not.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: There are members of that society who are among my best friends; I have the greatest esteem for them; but I am drawing your attention to these facts in the hope that you will use your influence to try to put a stop to things of that kind. You know perfectly well, honourable genlemen, how sensitive minorities are—and rightly so. They feel that if any injustice is done to them there may be other injustice to follow. The last injustice done to them is always a great threat for the future; I had occasion to notice that in a great number of instances I have known in the eastern townships in the province of Quebec a time when the French Canadians and the English-speaking population were at arm's length in a number of municipalities. It was at the time when the French Canadians were in the minority. They were not treated with that liberality with which they thought they should be treated, and there was a state of great uneasiness. But by the time that the population had changed and the French Canadians were in the majority, they had become as friendly as if all were of the same nationality. I challenge you to find to-day any place in the Eastern Townships where there exists the least friction by reason of nationality. Why? It is because the majority, which has become a French Canadian majority, in the eastern townships is treating the minority as the majority in the province of Quebec is treating the minority in that province—in matters of education and in everything else. But when we think that you English-speaking people, or the people of the English-speaking provinces, or some of them, are not ready to reciprocate, do you not realize how deeply we feel it? And we ask ourselves whether we shall ever be able to live with the other people in this country? For my part, I do not despair of the future. I have confidence that Canada will grow and will become a nation as the United States have. I have confidence that we shall become Canadians; and it is only when we become true Canadians that we shall devote all our energies to the furtherance of the interests of our country.

Hon. RUFUS POPE: Honourable gentlemen, I quite agree with the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat, that Canada will continue to grow and will become one of the great and important nations of the world. But she is going to do so by being true to her history and traditions; by showing that manly spirit of sacrifice for liberty, when the cry comes, whether from across the sea or from elsewhere. I do not understand how the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat could close his remarks with the statement that we are going to be a powerful nation, for only half an hour before he said that in all probability, owing to our debts, our destiny would be annexation to the United States of America. But in those two statements he was practically as consistent as he was in anything he said of the province of Quebec. The honourable gentleman took occasion to refer to the section of the country from which I come, the Eastern Townships. He said that the people there had in the past great differences. He laid at the door of the nationality to which I belong the crime of having treated unfairly the French Canadians when they were a minority in that section of the country. I want to say to that honourable gentleman that his statement has not had the slightest foundation of truth during my lifetime. I want to say to him that in those Eastern townships, in every single county, we gave to the minority representation in our municipal councils, on all our public boards, and in every Parliament, local or federal, in accordance with arrangements made when the French Canadians were a minority of the constituents; and I defy any one, either inside or outside of this House, to contradict the statements which I have just made.

Now, what is the object of the speech of the honourable gentleman? He is recognized as one of the ablest attorneys of our province. He has had the advantage of education and of travel, of coming into touch with the best minds of Canada and other parts of the world. When that speech which he has just delivered is taken up, as it will be, to-night, or to-morrow night, by Tancrede Marcil, by Bourassa, by Lavergne, and by their agents in the province of Quebec, will it be any wonder if there is excitement and if the atmosphere of the province of Quebec is charged? They have told us that there is no menace, that there is no danger for this Empire, especially this part of the Empire—possibly other portions of the Empire may go down, but still we shall be safe. I ask this honourable House, would we be a portion of this Empire to-day if it had not been for the protection that has been extended to us during the centuries past by old England, her fleet and her army? Would we have occupied the splendid position that we occupy to-day if it had not been for the sacrifices that have been made for us? We have received warnings from that side of the House which carry me back to the year 1913, when it was proposed by the Government of the day to augment the fighting forces of the Empire by sending overseas three of the best ships that skill could build and money could buy. We were told that it was foolish. We were told that there was no menace. We were told that there was not even a possibility of menace—that there could not be war; that Kaiser William was to be, in the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, leader of the Liberal party in the other House, the peacemaker of the world.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: When did he say that?

Hon. Mr. POPE: He said that on the floor of the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I would like to have the statement quoted.

Hon. Mr. POPE: He would occupy in the world the same position that our late King Edward VII occupied. "Blessed be the peacemaker" is what we would be saying of the Kaiser in the future. So, honourable gentlemen, if we do not pay very much attention to the rump of the Liberal party that occupies the seats on the opposite side of this House, you will understand it is because we have had warnings from those gentlemen—we have had an exhibition of their wisdom and advice in reference to those matters. Therefore, honourable gentlemen, while I am perfectly prepared to say that every man should have the privilege of his own opinion, he cannot have such privilege without carrying responsibilities. We are, without doubt in a very serious condition in the Dominion of Canada to-day, and I propose later to deal with the issue as I see it from the province of Quebec.

Now, the honourable gentleman has said that we have done well; that at the beginning of the war it was not anticipated that we would ever be called upon to send more than 100,000 or 150,000 men. Honourable gentlemen of the Senate, no one wishes more than I do that that could have been true. Honourable gentlemen in this House fully realize the sacrifices that our boys have to make; we fully realize that they have gone to the fields of France and Flanders to fight for what? The liberty of Canada? The liberty of the Empire? No, honourable gentlemen; for the liberty of the world, wide as it is. Liberty must not be confined to this spot or to that; it should be as boundless as the universe. Under these circumstances, if the menace has become greater, if the fighting has become stronger, if the demands upon us have increased, is it not our duty to see that we furnish our quota, let that quota be what it may.

The honourable gentleman has said that this measure was aimed at the province of Quebec, and that statement has been made over and over again by nearly all the French Canadian members of this honourable House, as though that province had some special place in this Canada of ours.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: So it has.

Hon. Mr. POPE: They have tried to fit it into a niche all by itself; they have tried to estrange it entirely from the mentality of the rest of Canada and the rest of the world. They have tried to make us believe, as an honourable Senator said the other night, that in one hundred and fifty or two hundred years it had not advanced a single step in public affairs. I resent that as coming from the province of Quebec. I say that in that province we have men as true and of as keen intellect among the French Canadian population as you have in any of the provinces of Canada. We have men who are as truly Canadian as there are in any other part of Canada; but, honourable gentlemen, they are misled—they are being misdirected by such speeches as have been delivered by honourable gentlemen here to-day, upon which articles will be printed in their newspapers.

Some honourable gentlemen speak of being moved by the speech delivered by the honourable leader of this House. Why, do they not know that their own statements are being sent through the length and breadth of Canada—the statements of those honourable gentlemen opposite who are endorsing the position taken by the firebrands in the province of Quebec. The province of Quebec has no more chance of escaping from doing its duty in this war than any of the other provinces; and they have just the same chance. If I were going to move an amendment to this Bill it would be based upon the principle that all provinces or states which come into confederation or union come in for better or for worse; and the first condition of the contract is the question of defence, and each and every one of those units making up Confederation must contribute its proportion, per capita, in any struggle that occurs for the liberty and the maintenance of this Empire and this country of ours. I know that there is special pleading, and I do not think the French Canadians are being properly directed by the special pleaders in this instance. I think you are reflecting upon them, every one of you honourable gentlemen, and misrepresenting them; and I can only say that you are doing it because you are inspired by a political design. I say that, honourable gentlemen, because, in the province from which I come, our Conservative organization—and I have had something to do with it—has not moved a finger; yet every mail coming from this city, bag after bag, brings red-hot campaign literature to saturate the homes of the people in that section of the country. So little self-respect is left in the remnant of the Liberal party whose head-quarters have been established here in Ottawa, that during the very days when Sir Robert Borden was offering the fifty-fifty proposition to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that literature was still coming out of this House and being circulated throughout the length and breadth of Canada. They had not enough self-respect to desist for even a few days until their great leader could come back with his answer.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Does the honourable gentleman not think it would be better to substitute that literature for the Orange literature?

Hon. Mr. POPE: The Orange literature? The Orange order is an organization, just as is Tancrede Marcil's organization, as is the Nationalist party's organization.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Not so old.

Hon. Mr. POPE: It was Mercier who formed the first National Government we ever had in our province, which was supported by every one of those honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We are proud of them.

Hon. Mr. POPE: You are proud of them —still proud of them. Why, the very name "Nationalist" originated with them, just as the organization originated with them. For some reason, which I do not know, there are two leaders, Laurier and Bourassa. I do not know where their jealousies come in, but they have no differences—absolutely no differences. They think and speak and act alike. They are anti-British; they are anti-Imperialist; they are anti-war people. They are all alike. It is quite true, as the honourable senator has said, that when this war began there was great anxiety on the part of the province of Quebec. Great anxiety for what? Great anxiety that England should cross the channel to protect France.

That anxiety was voiced in the press and in the homes of the people of the province of Quebec, that England would not make the awful mistake of 1870, but would go. England went, and England saved France by going across the Channel. At the battle of the Marne that British army of only 100,000 men saved the situation.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But do you not think that France saved England?

Hon. Mr. POPE: When?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Now.

Hon. Mr. POPE: I understand. I will come to that point certainly. I want to tell you that little Belgium saved them both by giving them time to get their armies ready; and now, when her children are being murdered and her women outraged, and blood is trickling down her streets, you get up and try to make apologies for one of the most gallant races in the world, the French Canadians of the province of Quebec. That is what you do. But England did go; and now when should England stop? Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, "England at war, the Empire at war, we are at war." When should she stop? When Canada saw fit to enter the field, when should we stop?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: When England has not any more food.

Hon. Mr. POPE: The honourable gentleman says we should stop when we want to make more money out of the development of our resources at home, and let the war take care of itself. He says it should stop when we are willing to sacrifice our national honour, and when we are willing to let the Yankee go out and do the fighting for Canada, instead of us standing by our duty. I am delighted that the American is going; we had the strongest and absolutely the most positive evidence that we should send more men, when the United States was forced to enter this war. She has not gone there for the love of war, but for the love of liberty and to protect her own shores and her own commerce. Does not her commerce travel over the same water as our commerce? Is not her future in that respect our future? My honourable friend says she is a wise nation. I am not and never was so much in love with the United States as the honourable gentleman on the other side of the House; but taking the honourable gentleman's own words, if those great men of the United States see that it is their duty and obligation, in order to save their shores and their commerce, and to perpetuate the liberties under which this world has been progressing for the last century, to send men and money without limit, then I ask if it is not Canada's duty to continue sending men.

Honourable gentlemen say we have enough Canadians at the front, that France had to shorten her lines. Yes, but who took the vacant place? Good Britishers and good Canadians took the places, shoulder to shoulder with France. To you men of circumscribed vision, who make a nation of a province, it does not appeal, but I would regret exceedingly if we found it necessary under any circumstances to narrow our front line as Canadians. I would feel aggrieved and insulted if any alien people, whether friend or foe, had to take the place of our boys at the front. They have made more history and better history and have done more for Canada than all the records of Parliament that ever existed in this country. They have done more than all the legislatures and all the judges on the bench, because they have carried the flag of Canada to the front line in the greatest war ever fought in the world. They have shown the breadth of view of the people of Canada. They have done us justice and brought us full credit, and they have appealed to us to send more men.

That brings us up to this Bill. The honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) dwelt a few minutes on the personal courage he would show if he were a member of the Government, or still Speaker of this House. Well, without wishing to say harsh words, or to reflect too severely, it is a great pleasure to me to know that the honourable gentleman's courage is ripe, because I remember when he was Speaker of this House, when he used to be looking over the baize in the old chamber that was burned, he was not occupying the chair, but he was peeking over the top to see whether the chair had gone or not, and as long as he could keep his eye on the chair by peeking over the baize he was perfectly willing, temporarily at least, to resign his seat. But when he discovered that possibly if he did not return to this precious chair he would lose it altogether, the honourable gentleman decided he would return. Then, I presume, without knowing very much about it, that the hour having arrived when the clock was going to strike "one," and never strike again as far as he was concerned, he decided to retire from the chair to the body of this House. I say that, because it is only right to give an honourable member of this House what is due to him, and I think it is only right to congratulate him upon the wonderful development of courage which he evidently displayed in the essay that he read to us this afternoon.

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. POPE: The honourable member for De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), who spoke before me this afternoon, went far afield in order to find an opportunity to give expression to thoughts that I think possibly he might better have left unexpressed even in the interests of the province from which we both come. He spoke of Ireland, with the intention, of course, of bringing before the world its grievances at this time. I sympathize, as any honourable gentleman who is a member of the Imperial family sympathizes, with any of the grievances, real or imaginary, that Ireland may have. Some of them have been very real, and many of them, I believe, are imaginary. When the honourable gentleman said that owing to disaffection in Ireland there were 200,000 or 250,000 troops in that country, he was about as near the truth as he was in the rest of his statements. There are about 20,000 troops in Ireland instead of 250,000.

The honourable gentleman spoke of some organization. He did not name it; his speech was very subtle. There are two branches of the Irish family, both of them in my opinion very estimable. One branch belongs very largely to the Orange organization; and while it may have shortcomings, as most organizations have, because by organizing you eliminate the individual, —yet, if the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry looks over the lists, he will discover—whether that organization is right in time of peace or whether it is wrong to-day —that there are over 80,000 members of that same organization in Canada now fighting for the liberties of the world in the fields of Flanders. At this particular time we are not so particular about organization, or about creeds or dogmas, as we are about winning this war. That is the great issue at stake. We realize that the honourable gentleman occupies a very high and important position. If I am not mistaken, he has recently been elected on the directorate of that great transportation system, the Canadian Pacific railway. These facts lend great weight to the insinuating speech which he made this afternoon. It was not an absolutely courageous speech. He did not express himself absolutely, but from beginning to end, his speech was an insinuation, and will form the basis for unfortunate utterances in the province from which we both come.

We have heard a great deal from our province with reference to England not having done her duty. We read that there are so many millions of people in England who have not gone to the war. Perhaps it would be as well to take a cursory review of some of the things that England has done. In the first place, England equipped two and a half million French soldiers for France; she financed the reorganization of the Belgian army, and maintained it in the field, as she had a perfect right to do, because, if there ever was a body of men that should appeal to the sympathies of the Empire to which we belong and the liberty-loving people of this world, it is that little nation, Belgium. England sent $75,000,000 and eight brigades of artillery to aid heroic Serbia, that little nation that has suffered beyond description, and whose sufferings have touched the heart of our great Empire. England loaned $75,000,000 to Italy in order that Italy's finances might be strong, and Italy well equipped for the fray. She loaned $50,000,000 and much equipment to Roumania, that nation which came in at such an unfortunate moment. Perhaps she was too ambitious; but let that be as it may, she came in to aid the cause for which we are fighting. England sent thousands of pounds sterling to Russia; raised an army of nearly 7,000,000 men for overseas service and home defence; gave millions of pounds sterling to the Red Cross and Patriotic funds; and, notwithstanding all this, when the British Government called for a loan of £350,000,000 sterling it was subscribed within four hours.

In my humble opinion, now that we have begun to gather an army—and we have only begun to gather it—we will continue to gather it from the four corners of this Empire, and we will have such an army and such a fleet that when the terms of peace come to be signed we will be there. Let us be there to see that, when the terms of peace are signed, the little nations of Europe shall have their rights and their integrity of soil protected. We are just approaching the hour. Let that hour be soon or one year from to-day, we are approaching the time when the army of the Empire, the great arbiter of the world, should be strong. I am delighted to know that our American friends have joined us for this special purpose. The nations of Europe have to be reorganized. Their boundaries have to be reconstructed. There are old grudges and animosities existing between those nations that make each and every one of them selfish and not impartial judges of their rights. The Empire to which we belong and the nation to the south of us, want no territory in Europe, and I am delighted to believe that at the proper time the armies of the United States and of the Empire will be sufficiently strong to dictate terms of peace, and the small nations will receive their due.

Now I come to the Bill. There has been so much said about this Bill in this House and in the province of Quebec that I really anticipated seeing a most wonderful departure from history. I am sure that any impartial man coming to Canada, who has been reading the speeches delivered on platforms in our province, stimulated by gentlemen who to-day are not in that province, would have imagined that there was some great principle in the Bill for our consideration. One would have thought that there never was a time in which it was possible to conscribe the people of the province of Quebec. Instead of that, as you read the old measure, as it is here before me in the preamble of the Bill, you will know and realize that there has never been a time when it was not possible to conscribe the man power of the province of Quebec. The other day I read a measure along those lines, which was in force as far back as 1808, over a century ago, and at no time since Confederation or before has it been impossible to conscribe the man power for the defence of that province. Under these circumstances, what do we find in this measure? We find a more lenient application of the principle of conscription. We find selective conscription. We all form our opinions at different periods of our lifetime; we may change them or they may go down with us through life; but after I saw the gathering of men at Valcartier, the first 30,000 who went over in the name of Canada, as some one said that most of them were Englishmen, I said, "God bless them, so much the better." Is that a reflection upon the Anglo-Saxon race?

The honourable gentleman who spoke today said something about reflections on his race. I want to ask him if it is a reflection on my race that Anglo-Saxons sent more men to the front in the early stages of this war than any other race? When I saw those men going and realized that there were men among them with families of one, or two, or three, or four, or five, or six, or seven children—that they were going to stand for us, to stand for Canada, to stand for the British Empire, to stand for the world's liberties, and when I realized that they were leaving those children behind them, many of whom are now orphans, deprived of the advice and assistance of a father, I said "The system of voluntary enlistment is wrong". It is absolutely undemocratic. Selective conscription classified, as I put it in those days—under which every man has a fair chance, is not the conscription of the medieval era. It is a modern piece of legislation passed to-day by the free people of Canada, and it comes from the House of Commons endorsed by the largest majority that the representatives of a free people have given to any measure in that House during many years.

Do they propose to tell us that they are truer representatives of the sentiments of the Dominion of Canada than the men who owe their political existence to the people who voted for them and are behind them? I doubt very much, if the amendment which has been proposed, the mischievous amendment, would, if thoroughly investigated, be found to be in order. Let that be as it may. I am not versed in parliamentary procedure, and I do not propose to be, because I have learned since coming here that it is not an advantage to be versed in parliamentary procedure and spend the time in splitting hairs. But I say that in my humble opinion it is a mischievous amendment. It would have been a great credit to this honourable House if we had had a fair discussion and passed the Bill in the shortest possible time in order that it might be quickly put into force.

But some honourable gentlemen say, "Wait until after the election." After an election! When do we know that an election will be held? Who has figured it out? Who has spent the time in figuring out when a general election will be held, instead of being prepared to fight this war until the end? What party of this honourable House? Not to the right. Not here, honourable gentlemen. It may be there. Let honourable gentlemen opposite, then, take the responsibility of holding up this legislation. Let them take the responsibility of the men having to stay in the trenches for days at a time—men who have been there for two or three years, and who ought to be given a fair chance of coming home to breathe the free air of Canada instead of smelling powder and facing death every day and every hour. Do you think for one moment that the people of Canada will approve of your actions in that respect? Do you think you are building up for this honourable House to which we belong a reputation that will be worthy of a place in history?

I have not heard in this whole debate any reference to what those honourable gentlemen did in 1913 in sinking those three ships. I remember how they then gloated over it, when they said they were the real representatives, they were the real prophets of what was going to happen in this universe. I have heard from them nothing on that subject during this debate.

Honourable gentlemen, when this measure was prepared—openly prepared in the House of Commons—or in the other place, I believe it is called here—the Prime Minister invited full criticism; he invited every honourable gentleman in that House to offer suggestions. Many of the suggestions offered were accepted. It is not a party measure; is not confined to the wisdom of any single set of men or any cabinet, but is the result of the careful deliberations of the unprejudiced portions of the House of Commons of Canada. I use the words advisedly, the unprejudiced portions of the House of Commons of Canada. And I think it is our duty to pass this measure in this honourable House with very little, if any, amendment. If we can conceive, unitedly, not in caucus, any improvements, let us make them. Honourable gentlemen opposite have met in caucus. Let us not go behind closed doors to find a political stamping ground, but let us stand out in the open as independent members of the Senate of Canada. Let us stand for our people's rights and nothing else. Let us stand for the conclusion of this war at the earliest possible moment, by the most generous contribution that we as Canadians can possibly offer. Instead of that, we see honourable gentlemen going up and down and closeting themselves together for the preparation of an amendment; we see them devoting their entire time and energy, whatever it may be worth, to the political game, instead of lending patriotic support to this measure. It is their funeral, honourable gentlemen, not mine. It is for them to understand and to realize whether they are doing the right thing or the wrong thing. They know that they have nothing to do with the next election or with the time of the next election. They cannot say one word about it. And if they had anything to do with it, probably two-thirds of them would be licked out of their boots if they went before the people. In my opinion the important time for this Empire, the important hour for the Allies, is drawing nearer. We are drawing closer and closer to the hour of victory and of peace Honourable gentlemen may say, "Well, then, why send more men?" As I have already said, in my humble opinion the time for the Allied armies to be strong is at the hour of the declaration of peace.

Speaking of elections, you want them, you are anxious for them; you feel that you have a solid Quebec behind you; you feel that you have every alien enemy in Canada behind you; you feel that you have every slacker behind you; and you know that you have not a single loyal man behind you. You are figuring on that imported stuff that your Government scattered over this country of ours fifteen or twenty years ago. You are appealing to them. The good Canadian is to go down. The real fighting man is at war. Thirty odd thousand of them are in graves in Flanders and cannot vote. You have figured it all out. I can see the dark pencil. I can see you making the marks; I can see you scratching it on the paper; so many dead ones that cannot vote. But what a reputation you are making for the party that existed at one time and of which you were a member, the great Liberal party of Canada. Do honourable gentlemen opposite represent that party? I do not believe it. I do not believe that the opposite side of this House as it is constituted represents the absolutely loyal Liberal people of Canada, not five per cent of them. Honourable gentlemen may laugh and giggle. Fools laugh when they are in a fools' paradise. I went through my part of the country the week before last. I did not call upon any Conservatives; I called upon leading Liberals, to whom in the past a visit from me would have been like the red rag to the poor old bull we have all heard of. I called on those gentlemen to ascertain their views. They are leading men, qualified to occupy any position, social or political, in Canada. It was with no introduction that I called. I want to say in all sincerity that not a solitary one of those gentlemen is ready to back up the sentiments that have been expressed from the other side of this House, not one. If any honourable gentleman does not believe my statement, let us take the morning train, and let him come home with me; and we will go and see those persons and find out from them what are the sentiments of the English-speaking people of the province of Quebec. Those men have, so far as I know, always voted Liberal.

Under these circumstances what do you think you are doing? Why are you wasting time? Whom are you following? What are you after? You are after a solid Quebec. You are after the disloyal element of Canada; you are attempting to put into power the enemies of the British Empire, the enemies of the Allies who are fighting for our liberty.

Much has been said about the so-called Nationalist party of the province of Quebec, and an effort has been made by every speaker of French-Canadian origin to impose upon the Government of the day the responsibility of having associated with the Nationalist party of Quebec. Well, honourable gentlemen, I will not say that to a certain extent that was not true. We were fighting in 1911 for what? We were fighting a commercial fight, not a European war; but we were fighting for the integrity of Canada just the same. We discovered, so they say, and they must be right or they would not say it—that Mr. Bourassa was disposed to lend his inuflence for the destruction of Sir Wilfrd Laurier. In my humble opinion it was Bourassa's opportunity, as he saw it, to gratify his ambition to become a greater man inside the Liberal party, who have always gathered around the Nationalists in our province, than Sir Wilfrid Laurier. There has been a time—some one snickers over there. Let me say to that snickerer that history is behind my statement, absolutely behind my statement. As I said this afternoon, the first Nationalist Government we had was under the Hon. Mr. Mercier, who ran the province until he could run it no longer; he ran it into debt, and everywhere else, until he could not even borrow money—he could not get, on a mortgage of $4,000,000, 25 per cent. Then he went out and other people came in. Mercier won his election on what? On a war measure. He won it on the question of the Riel scaffold. The hanging of Riel is what put your Liberal party into power with Mercier as its leader.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Now, honourable gentlemen, they propose again on a war measure to use the bloody key with which they can unlock the door of Parliament. Could you find anything more consistent in this world? I want to compliment them. I have known them for years, and this an opportunity, a rare opportunity, for me to find myself able to compliment them upon their consistency, and I do so here and now, right on the floor of this House.

Now, honourable gentlemen, what is the thing called Nationalism?

Hon Mr. CLORAN: The honourable gentleman ought to know.

Hon. Mr.. POPE: Oh, know? No man knows better, because they are all branded; you can distinguish them. I will tell you why they are branded: because you dare not trust them in the open range without having a brand on them. They are all branded.

The first step towards Imperialism that was taken in Canada was Confederation. Thank God, Sir George Etienne Cartier, and not Sir Wilfrid Laurier, led the province of Quebec at that time and led them into Confederation. Confederation was the basis of Imperialism. The anti-Confederationists are to-day the anti-Imperialists, to-day they are frightened of a broader Imperialism because they believe themselves to belong to a separate nation under the same flag. Sir George Etienne Cartier had his trials, but he was not one of those suave leaders appealing to the delicate feelings of the people. He led the French-Canadian people. And you men, you founders of the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec, burned him in effigy all over the province. You had a bonfire every night. Let me read to you:

> When the ministers undertook their Confederation they had only in view the English colonies. The basis of all their calculation, of of all their hopes, of all their projects, was always the English colonies.

That is what gentlemen of your party said 50 years ago.

> Well, that is not the way we politicians of the Papineau school look at the matter.

You know who Papineau was?

> Look at the matter; when any change whatsoever is proposed in our political or social institutions, we do not look to see whether this change will be of use to the English colonies or to any other neighbour; we think only of Lower Canada and the French race.

That is all they think of to-day. Dandurand said so—said they had not moved for 150 years; said they were exactly where they were 150 years ago. That is a terrible reflection and criticism upon the French-Canadian race—upon their system of education. Intelligent people like the French Canadians should have progressed in this splendid march of Confederation. That is a terrible reflection, for a man to stand up and dare to insult the race to which he belongs by mentioning it. If it were true, he should blush at the very fact. I do not believe it is true.

> What have we in common with the English colonies? What interests? What interests, what relations bind us to them? Is it a matter of origin, religion, language, national aspirations? No, not at all. We have nothing in common with the English colonies except we are dependent upon the same metropolis.

We will stop the river St. Lawrence when it reaches Quebec; we won't allow railways to go through; we won't allow steamboats to go through; we will tax the whole business, and we will become the Chinamen of Canada.

> We have nothing in common with the English colonies except that we are dependent upon the same metropolis.

Later in the same article:

> We do not care a fig for the English colonies, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland. We have the same relations with them as with Australia. We are colonies of England, that's all. The only difference is the distance, greater or less, which separates us.

The article ends:

> You have succeeded, gentlemen—

He says when Confederation is completed—

> You have succeeded, gentlemen; you have obtained a temporary triumph, but you have killed nationality.

What nationality? We thought we were creating a broad Canadian nationality. We did not know and did not realize—and to-day, honourable gentlemen, we refuse to recognize—anything but the broadest application of the words "Canadian nationality." We recognize no special pleaders, be they political, social, civil, or religious. We stand here to-day, honourable gentlemen, as representing broad views, broad tolerations for all the people, and no other views whatever.

One word more as to this quotation:

> Will the people at last understand that the Canadian ministry are the valets and slaves of the Colonial Office?

Now, the only value of these quotations, the only application they have to-day, is that they are quotations from publications under the hand and seal of Sir Wilfrid Laurier when he was a lawyer in Arthabaskaville. The Papineau school. The Nationalist school. Do not try to fool people. If you French Canadians from Quebec desire to come into this Parliament and raise your voice and claim that you have a right to some supreme position away and beyond anything that the constitution or the treaties gave you, say so, but don't attempt for one moment to mislead us.

Something was said to-day by the honourable director of the Canadian Pacific Railroad to the effect that the French Canadians are sensitive; but they are not the only sensitive people. We may be a little bolder, but there is still a heart in the English-speaking man as well as in the Frenchman. As a minority in our province we are entitled to some respect as well as the majority.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You get it, too.

Hon. Mr. POPE: No, we get nothing. Now, you all laugh, but you must not laugh, because you are wrong, absolutely wrong.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We——

Hon. Mr. POPE: Wait a minute; you always want things so damn quick. Just wait a minute. I say that the French-speaking people of our province, so far as the part from which I come is concerned, have received every justice, so far as I know, and I know much about that part of the country, because I formerly took a leading interest in that section politically. But we gave to them everything that was due to them and more.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: So did we.

Hon. Mr. POPE: But don't make any mistake about that. Now the tide comes back, and we will give you an indication of it. In the city of Sherbrooke you will find that nine-tenths of the money in the industries comes from the English-speaking people, while nine-tenths of the people working there are French Canadians.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is better than money.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Better than money to the French Canadians. A large percentage of the taxes comes from the English-speaking people, who are in the minority, who came into the province after the independence of the United States, travelling hundreds of miles through the woods to plant there the little Union Jack that it might be permanent on the northern half of this continent. Therefore we have deep feelings and are sensitive on that question. Although the majority of the taxes are paid by the English, they are represented by only three English Protestants out of ten in the city council. A resolution was recently moved in the council opposing conscription, and it was passed over the heads of the three English members; the others had not even the common decency to respect the sympathies of those people. The honourable gentleman used the word sensitive; but do you think we have no nerves? Do you realize for one second that the British Empire owns this Canada of ours as part of it? Do you realize that this flag is floating over us because we kept it there, and not because they kept it there? Do you realize that in the old days, they settled the boundary lines under arbitrations, and if it had not been for the power of old England the Stars and Stripes would have been at Hudson's Bay instead of this flag, as it is now. You French Canadians have flourished under it, have had fair play under it, and special privileges that the French Catholic race enjoys nowhere in the world except in the province of Quebec. You are never trampled upon, never interfered with; you are treated as sacred as the Bible under the old Union Jack that floats over us. Do you realize that? And then you state, forsooth, "For all that, we will lead the way in this great fight—by staying at home; we will show our appreciation of old England for what she has done—by staying right at home." True, there are some loyal hearts; you cannot so inoculate a whole nation or a whole province that there will not be in it some stout hearts, and you find them to-day, in the 22nd Regiment at the front fighting in the name of Quebec—fighting alone in the name of Quebec, when they should have 40,000 or 80,000 fighting.

The war has not been a fortunate thing for the great leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He has not been comfortable in time of war. The first opportunity he had of telling us exactly how he felt in time of war was at the time of the Riel rebellion, when he said that if he had been on the banks of the Red river he would have shouldered his musket and joined the rebels in shooting down the redcoats of Canada. That was not a fortunate attitude, but it is consistent with everything else that has gone along. The beauty of Laurier is his consistency in his inconsistency; he never fails. At that time he said of dear brother Riel:

> What act of rebellion did he commit? Did he ever raise any other standard than the national flag? Did he ever proclaim any other authority than the sovereign authority of the Queen? No, never. His whole crime and the crime of his friends was that they wanted to be treated like British subjects.

Riel was openly in arms at this time against the Governor General of Canada. He was a rebel. He was caught. He was pardoned, and I do not think he should have been pardoned. However, there was a question of doubt as to the actual time the new Government was established and as to the knowledge of Riel; and we, as true men of the Empire, gave him the benefit of the doubt and pardoned him. But he came back again for the second Riel rebellion, and it was then that Sir Wilfrid Laurier said he would have shouldered his musket.

We next found ourselves face to face with the South African difficulty, when Sir Wilfrid was again called upon to take into consideration the Empire at war. A resolution was unanimously passed in the House of Commons on the 31st of July, 1899, as follows:

1. Resolved, that this House has viewed with regret the complications which have arisen in the Transvaal Republic, of which Her Majesty is suzerain, from the refusal to accord to Her Majesty's subjects now settled in that region any adequate participation in its government.

2. Resolved, that this House has learned with still greater regret that the condition of affairs there existing has resulted in intolerable oppression, and has produced great and dangerous excitement among several classes of Her Majesty's subjects in her South African possessions.

3. Resolved, that this House, representing a people which has largely succeeded by the adoption of the principle of conceding equal political rights to every portion of her population, in harmonizing estrangements and in producing general content with the existing system of government desires to express its sympathy with the efforts of Her Majesty's Imperial authorities to obtain for the subjects of Her Majesty who have taken up their abode in the Transvaal, such measure of justice and political recognition as many be found necessary to secure them in the full possession of equal rights and liberties.

Then the war took place. We wanted to go; We said we must go, but what did he do? He said :

As I understand the Militia Act—and I may say that I have given it some study of late—our volunteers are enrolled to be used in the defence of the Dominion. They are Canadian troops to be used to fight for Canada's defence. Perhaps the most widespread misapprehension is that they cannot be sent out of Canada. There is no menace to Canada, and although we may be willing to contribute troops, I do not see how we can do so. Then, again, how could we do so without Canada granting us the money? We simply could not do anything. In other words, we should have to summon Parliament.

What do we hear next? We next have this Order in Council:

The Prime Minister, in view of the well-known desire of a great many Canadians who are ready to take service under such conditions (as prescribed by the Imperial Government), is of opinion that the moderate expenditure which would be thus involved for the equipment and transportation of such volunteers may readily be undertaken by the Government of Canada without summoning Parliament, especially as such an expenditure under such circumstances cannot be regarded as a departure from the well-known principles of constitutional government and colonial practice, nor construed as a precedent for future action.

All that took place in a few weeks—why? Because after his first utterance, the people could not go to defend this Empire in South Africa, the people of Canada awakened—to what? Awakened to the miserable stamp of cowardice and ingratitude that the then Premier of Canada proposed to place upon the loyal people of this country—with what result? That an agitation sprang up, and within a shorter time than this question has been discussed in the House of Commons and this House he was compelled to let those men go forward; but he branded them, "No precedent." We are sending 400,000 men now, and not one of them has a brand on him. They are going forward as the true expression of the loyal sentiment of Canadians. You can follow this matter through from start to finish, and on every page of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's history you will find that he has stepped forward and then backward upon all the great issues, but has never in all his lifetime proved himself to be a true friend of the upbuilding and permanency of the Empire to which we belong.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Would the honourable senator allow me to ask a question? Does he ignore the fact that the candidates of that man Laurier, that rebel, were defeated in Drummond and Arthabaska, and afterwards in twenty contests in the election of 1911, by the Nationalists and the Conservative party? And does he not know that he was denounced as a traitor to Canada and as sold to England?

Hon. Mr. POPE: I am delighted with the speech the honourable gentleman has delivered; I thought he was going to ask a question. He is a great personal friend of the leader of the Opposition, and he has said that he was defeated on this and on that. What I said was that nowhere could you find a piece of Laurier's legislation that led this country and cemented it to the British Empire. Take his naval proposition: while the Parliament of Canada was going to control it, that Parliament, if he could manage it, was to be elected by every enemy of the British Empire. And thus he was going to hand over the defence of the Empire on the sea to our enemies; he refused to allow our fleet to be part and parcel of the great fleet that defends the Empire. He refused to allow the Admiralty to dictate how our ships should move or where they should go to assist the great Imperial fleet of this Empire. It seems strange, but all the time his plan was one of separation The whole object is to separate Canada, and the word separation has got to such a fever point in connection with this Bill that now he and his friends want to separate the province of Quebec from Canada. Separation is the whole proposition in every line you read. Let us read some more. Now I will give you some choice bits of Sir Wilfrid—something that nobody on the other side of the House will deny; and I expect to get tremendous applause:

> Is there a Canadian anywhere who would not hail with joy the day when we would be deprived of the services of British diplomacy?

Then he adds:

> I have again and again repeated that the goal of my aspiration is the independence of Canada.

Grand applause! He holds out to his fellow-countrymen the idea of independence. He is loyal now; it must come with the consent of both countries, and we must keep the good will and good feeling of other lands. He goes on:

> If we are true to our record, we will exhibit to the world the unique and unprecedented example of a nation achieving its independence by slow degrees, and as naturally as the severing of the ripe fruit from the parent tree.

Well, we are not gone yet; nobody has taken off the fruit, and if this Government has its way and we send a proper representation to the front no German will take off the fruit. Another bit:

> The only tie that binds Canada and the mother country is the sentiment of affection. A day will necessarily come when they will have to part.

How sad! But they have not got there yet. He continues:

> I am a subject of the British crown, but whenever it comes to pass that as a Canadian I have to choose between the interests of England and the interests of Canada, my whole heart is with my native land.

There is the great Canadian speaking. But listen:

> It is manifest to me that the interests of my country are identical with the interests of the United States.

Why don't you applaud?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is what they are now, isn't it?

Hon. Mr. POPE: That is what we have made them.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Answer that: are they not now with the United States? They are identical.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: He did not say that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If he did not say it, are not your interests identical with the United States at the present moment? Answer that.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Honourable gentlemen of the Senate,——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You got stung there.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Honourable gentlemen of the Senate, I want to pay the compliment to my friend there (Hon. Mr. Cloran) that he is alive and interesting; and when I am looking over my notes it is very amusing to me that he runs along with interjections of that sort. It is all right.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It brings light.

Hon. Mr. POPE: Yes, it brings light. I could say much more; I could quote by the yard.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Go on; the night is young.

Hon. Mr. POPE: It is not necessary. Honourable gentlemen of the Senate, we have not only got to win this war, it is not only necessary that we should have such an army at the conclusion of peace as can dictate terms of fair arbitration to Europe and the world, but it is essential that the man who represents this country be a man in whose judgment we have absolute confidence. We must have confidence that he will put us in our proper place, a place that has been earned at such great sacrifice by the boys who fill the graves in Flanders.

We have a perfect right to look over the history of the two men who are leading the two political parties in Canada to-day, Sir Wilfrid Laurier on one hand and the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden on the other. Without desiring to reflect upon or to eulogize either the one or the other, the point that I desire to make here is that we must judge these men as a business proposition —not as mountebanks, not as men who say one thing in one place and another thing in another place. We must have as our representative a man in whom we have unlimited confidence. This brings me to the life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Sir Wilfrid has got to be an old man, to begin with.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It is about time.

Hon. Mr. POPE: He is a man of seventy-five or thereabouts, and his age commands some sympathy and some respect. The other day when I was standing in the gallery of the other House and looking at the vote that was being taken, and saw his party leaving him—saw all Canada, with the exception of a stray sheep here and there and one province, leaving him—I said to myself, "What a misfortune it is that a man has so conducted himself upon this great issue that he cannot command a fair share of his own following from all the parts of Canada from which his party is formed." Sir Wilfred Laurier has spent a long time in politics. He has been connected directly or indirectly with all the great political questions from Confederation down to the present time. He has exercised his judgment, sometimes as a young man, sometimes possibly only as a follower, but very many times as a leader, and if he is a leader of men he should lead and not follow. On looking over the history of his life, what do I find? I find that he was opposed to Confederation; he was absolutely opposed to the fundamental principle, and fought Cartier on the question. He was a young man then. Time passed on and Confederation was accomplished in spite of him. At that time we in our province were told that we would be gobbled up by the Orangemen of Ontario, that we would never have a show as part and parcel of this Confederation, that we were a minority. It frightened our French Canadians, and we went in fear and trembling. But the answer to all that, and the answer to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his party, was and is that for fifteen years he was the Prime Minister of Canada and commanded a support from Ontario as worthy as most men ever get—from the Orangemen of Ontario.

What conclusion do we come to from all this? We can only conclude that he was wrong. The next question that arose was the acquisition of the Northwest Territories. He was opposed to that. To-day that territory is the promised granary of the Empire and of the world. We have all got our eyes and our prayers directed toward that country, hoping that the crops may be successful in order to relieve the food shortage of the Allies. If Sir Wilfrid Laurier had had his way that territory would have been part of the United States of America before now. Then the National Policy was initiated in order to upbuild the nation—to build industries, to build factories, to employ our people. Where do we find Sir Wilfrid Laurier on that question? He absolutely opposed that policy. He drove Blake from the party and sent him to Ireland, because he did not dare follow Sir Wilfrid, and because he said his policy led to annexation to the United States. Once again he was wrong, because if we ever had a vindication of the benefit of the National Policy we have had it in the last three years, when we have been able to establish industries in this country which could turn out munitions of war and contribute to the great victories that have been won on the other side of the Atlantic.

The next question was the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Sir Wilfrid Laurier fought it to the death, fought it on all sides. But in 1910, I think, I had the pleasure of listening to him in the beautiful city of Calgary, which had been built up in a country which he had described as barren and only fit for Indians and wild animals, and he said that Sir John Macdonald was right when he put the Canadian Pacific through. Therefore the other man's judgment was wrong.

When he came into power he adopted the principles of the National Policy—I think he put the tariff down one-one-hundredth part of one per cent, or something like that. He also adopted the principle of a transcontinental railroad, but the poor, unbusinesslike gentleman goes to work and builds two roads where he should only have had one, and to-day they are a financial millstone around the neck of the Dominion of Canada. They say these burdens will never be lifted; but I am such a strong believer in the natural resources of Canada, I am such a strong believer in the faith of the Allies, that I think the great debt will be made an international debt and will be carried over until we pay it. I also believe that our national resources are so diversified and so vast that we can pay off any debt. If I were making a political speech—which I am not—I would say that it is a mighty lucky thing that we have these resources, otherwise we could never afford to leave the Liberal party in power, because our resources would not be sufficient to get us out of the hole into which they would put us. Then the thought came to him that he must do something. He had said in the House of Commons that he had got done at Washington, that is when he offered us preferential trade in England. He said: "I have done; I have turned my back to Washington." He had been down there and had failed. It was not his fault.

The next thing we hear of is a reciprocity treaty with the country and with the people and with the capital that he said he would never return to. He entered into a treaty with the United States? No, not with the United States—with practically the whole outside world, if you please—with all the favoured nations of the universe. He brought on an election, and the sound thought of the Dominion of Canada said, "None of that," and he was beaten, and the present Government came to power. His judgment was wrong again. Always wrong, never right!

He is in opposition now. The Prime Minister said: "I am going to England to see what is the best thing we can do to contribute towards the defence of the Empire whose protection we have been enjoying for so long." He came back and laid on the table of the House his opinions, without giving away valuable information to the man who is attempting to strike death to our hearts to-day—the Kaiser. He gave the fullest possible information, and he impressed upon us the urgent necessity. What was Sir Wilfrid Laurier's statement? "It was not necessary." We shall say of the Kaiser in future: "Blessed be the peacemaker!" That was his judgment. The honourable gentlemen in this House who were in the majority at that time, sunk the three ships, and a year or so after that war came. A short session of Parliament was held. Up they rushed, in they went, and they were prepared to do anything. If I had been Prime Minister of this country—I never expect to be—there would not have been a short session; but the people of Canada would have told them what they thought of them.

Now, I have hurriedly reviewed Sir Wilfrid Laurier's qualifications to be our representative at the peace conference. I have given you a short history of his life as it is recorded in the public records and the statute books of this country, and if you can give me any good reason why you should trust him to deal with the terms of peace, by all means send him there; if not, then I have to say to the gentlemen on the other side—this political committee of the Liberal party—that they are once more hatching resolutions in their caucuses and appealing to the people of Canada only in order to cause delay. Let me point out to the leader of the Opposition, who should be a loyal man—he comes from the right kind of stock, and I want to believe and I do believe, that he is loyal—that, if he wins the election, he has behind him every disloyal element from Halifax to Vancouver, to help to select the representative whom we shall be called upon to trust in the greatest hour of our history.

I am afraid that I have taken rather too long. I apologize for doing so. But I felt that I should say what I had to say upon this great question, and I have no fear of the outcome. My confidence was never so great as it is to-day. I feel that the tripping up of Russia does not amount to anything. The fewer czars, the less one-man dictation in Russia when the time of peace comes, so much the better for the permanent peace of the world. I sincerely trust that that great country will come to her own, and that she will gradually formulate a stable form of Government that will make Russia one of the peace-loving nations of the world. I sincerely believe that we shall see no more kaisers in Germany, and that the German people, who are among the cleverest people of the world, who have led industry and development, and who have done perhaps more in fifty years than any other people in Europe to bring an old country into the condition of a new country, will have a Government worthy of the courage of that nation. Italy will have her power back; France, who has been the hero of them all, will have Alsace-Lorraine back to her heart, and those people will come home. Then we come to little Belgium, God bless her! Every house must be rebuilt, every dollar must be paid back; but you cannot pay back the lives, you cannot compensate the people, for the awful outrages that have been committed by a nation whose education should have taught them better. All that we can do will be in a financial way, and it shall be done; and we in Canada, and our boys—God bless them!—will stand there when the terms of peace are made; and they will have taken a hand in rendering justice to the small nations of Europe in order that they may enjoy those privileges of independence and birthright that make a man a real man.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN: Honourable gentlemen, it does not often fall to the lot of a representative in Parliament, whether in the Lower or the Upper House, to follow a Pope. It does not often happen outside of the Vatican or the walls of Rome. I followed one this afternoon, and I followed him again this evening; and the more closely I followed him the more it dawned upon me that he was not infallible, and consequently was not a real pope. Many of his declarations were most fallible, most uncharitable, and most unworthy of a citizen of Canada—I do not say a senator—in regard to the noblest "traitor" who has illumined the British Empire—Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Before going any further I wish to apologize to and beg the pardon of the honourable senator from Stanstead (Hon. Mr. Pope) for having mistaken him for a real, true infallible pope. In this discussion he has shown a spirit which it is hard to duplicate even in the province of Quebec, but which may be very easily duplicated in the sister province of Ontario.

It is very hard to find an echo of his sentiments in the province of Quebec, when he stands here on the floor of this honourable House and maligns the noblest and best portion of the Dominion of Canada. Why have we a Confederation to-day? Why is Canada a part of the British Empire? Why do we enjoy at the present moment self-government, not only as a federal union, but as provinces? Do we owe it to him and his like? No. They were not in existence when Canada was saved to the British Empire by the blood of the French-Canadians in the war of 1812-14, when there were slackers in Ontario and when Quebec alone drove the American armies back across the frontier in the battles of Chateauguay and all along the line. Canada remained a portion of the Empire because of the loyalty and bravery and courage of the French-Canadian race. That is why Canada is a portion of the British Empire to-day. If the French of Quebec had not taken up arms against the troops of the United States in the war of 1812-14 we would be to-day a part of the American republic—probably making some of the best states under the Stars and Stripes. Providence did not will that it should be so. Therefore, when I, as a student of history, hear these people from Ontario denounce the French, cast slurs on them, it turns my heart. I cannot understand their position unless it is due to ignorance, absolute ignorance. I venture to say that in the province of Ontario there is not one in a hundred of these people who know the first thing about the history of the province of Quebec. And how can you expect, in lodges or elsewhere, the ninety-nine ignorant out of every hundred to appreciate the valour and the courage and the determination of the French race in Canada who have shed their blood for the maintenance of this country as a portion of the British Empire? I will not charge these people with prejudice or anti-religious feelings; it is not necessary; I lay the blame simply upon their crass ignorance of the conditions in history.

I repeat, it was the French race in Canada which saved Canada for the Empire in that war. I challenge contradiction. Is there, on the other side of the House, any honourable gentleman from Ontario able to point out to me what they did in 1812-14 to maintain the integrity of the colonial possessions on the part of the continent? There are some learned men over there. I will not charge them with ignorance. I give them the opportunity now.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I will answer the question, if I may?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Go ahead.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I have four ancestors who are lying under the sod at Queenston Heights and have been for many years—since the battle of 1812.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I do not dispute that; I do not say that nobody from Ontario took up arms in defence of Canada in the wars of 1812-14, but I say it is due to the French race that Canada still remains a portion of the British Empire.

The next point is this: if we enjoy home rule to-day, to whom do we owe it? We owe it to the rebels of Ontario and the rebels of the province of Quebec—William Lyon Mackenzie and Papineau. Is not that a strange statement? We owe our home rule, our right of self-government, to the patriots and rebels of 1837, '38 and '39. Do the people of Ontario appreciate the fact? Do they even know it?

Hon. Mr. DAVID: And Lafontaine and Baldwin.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Lafontaine and Baldwin came afterwards; but under the Papineau regime, when the rebellion was started, the bulk of the rebels were Frenchmen. That was the time referred to in 1911 by the ministers now in the Government. In the famous by-election of Drummond and Arthabaska in which the Liberal candidate was defeated, these men, who are ministers to-day—the Postmaster General, the Minister of Inland Revenue, and the one who has resigned—three of them—and four others who since the Government has been in power have retired from the Cabinet to accept—what?—payment for their adhesion to and support of the Conservative party—these men, I say, in 1911, fighting Laurier because he was the friend of England and the friend of Canada, and telling the people of Quebec that when they wanted to get a breath of air, a breath of freedom, they had to shoot bullet holes through the Union Jack—these men are still on the ministerial benches, with the Conservative Government, maintaining it in power. Are you not ashamed of yourselves as followers of a party of that kind? Are you not ashamed of a Government maintained by such methods?

Honourable gentlemen, this Government has been run for the past six years on two elements, a disloyal element and the ultra-loyal element. You have the combination there of Orange loyalty and Nationalist disloyalty. Has any combination in the world ever before given to a country six years of a regime based on and fed by such elements? It is a disgrace to this country of Canada to have a Government holding the reins of power through these means and methods. Who can contradict these statements? Nobody. They are the facts. Why are you not ashamed of your Government, you who are preaching to us, as the honourable gentleman has done for the past two hours, the lesson of loyalty? If I were a Conservative I should certainly tell my leader: "I would rather stay at home than be a follower of yours under these conditions." But you are all quite content to follow a Government of that description and character.

You charge us with seeking office, you charge that our leader had said he would not open the door of office with a bloody key. He said it well and truly on the outbreak of war. The Government then, this present Government, was young and fresh; it had not time to commit acts of indiscretion; it had not time to develop grafting and profiteering; it had not time to develop scandals in the Militia Department; and Sir Wilfrid Laurier said: "No, I will not open the door of office with a bloody key." You were innocent then; but to-day what is the condition of the party, what is the condition of the Government? Is it as young, as fresh, and as innocent as it was three years ago? Everybody in the Dominion of Canada knows that it is not so young, nor so fresh, nor so innocent; the lock on the door of office needs no bloody key to open it; the lock is corroded; the lock has become mildewed and is rotten and is falling to pieces, and the door is wide open for the people to return Sir Wilfrid Laurier to power without the use of a bloody key.

Laurier a rebel?—Laurier, as the honourable senator (Hon. Mr. Pope) has said, a failure in all his life? A "rebel" recognized by Her Majesty of glorious memory, Queen Victoria, as her most able and most beloved Prime Minister in the Overseas Dominions —a "rebel" who took second place by her in all the social and official gatherings in London in 1897 and 1899;—a "rebel" who came after the Prime Minister of England; —a "rebel" who left Canada as the leader of the Liberal party, and who inside of six weeks in England became the most prominent figure—and not only in England, but also in France? He illumined the British Empire. He was the first statesman to open the eyes of the British statesmen to the real value and the real condition of Canada. And the honourable gentleman dubs him a rebel. It is pitiful to hear any honest, sensible, intelligent citizen of Canada speak in this wise of the plumed knight of Canadian Liberalism. It is discouraging for such a man, at the age of 77, with the grave opening before him, after having devoted his entire life to the service and welfare of his country—to be told by an irresponsible legislator in the Parliament of Canada that his entire life was a failure. That is bad enough; but to be told that he has been a rebel and a traitor to the cause of Canada and of the Empire—oh, what a shame! What ingratitude toward a man who has devoted his entire life for the past fifty years to consolidating Canada by urging union among all classes and creeds in this country! What a shame to denounce, in the terms which the honourable senator used, a man who has sacrificed his predilections of youth and of manhood, and even of maturer years, in order to bring about union among the people of this country! What did he do in the famous years 1895 and 1896, when the right honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) was Prime Minister of Canada? Did he not sacrifice much to weld this Dominion together? And he succeeded.

Allow me, now that I have mentioned the name of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, to pay him a tribute. He also has been one of the men who worked wholeheartedly and sincerely for the welfare of his dear old Canada. He was then the champion of the rights of the minority in Manitoba, and it was only through the operations of a nest of traitors that he was hurled from office. I pay that tribute to the honourable gentleman as he goes out the door. He will find no Liberal to stand on the brink of his grave and denounce him as the honourable gentleman from Stanstead has denounced our revered and venerable leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. There is the difference between a Tory and a Liberal.

I can tell you, right here and now, that no country can prosper well under Tory Administration. The Tories are descendants of the Prussian régime and Kaiserism. We had an instance of that in this honourable House only the other day, when honourable and venerable senators were howled down, told to sit down because they wanted to use the privilege of free speech. At that time I said: "The Prussian flag is being hoisted on the other side; they have a majority of two." Are the people of this country going to stand for that? We shall have to stand for it as long as we are here, but at the next general election the people will sweep away the Prussian flag by putting Toryism where it belongs. The sentiment of Canada is Liberal to the core. Everything Tory in sight has been swept away during the past year. The Tories have been swept away in Manitoba on account of their corruption, their grafting, and their abuses in the administration of public works, with which a minister's name has been so closely identified. The Tories were swept away, although before the elections the Liberals had only a few seats in the House. What happened in British Columbia, where the Tories were in power and where there were only two or three Liberals? The electors swept away the Tory party, leaving only two or three Tories, and elected the Liberals with a vast majority—why? On account of corruption, on account of graft, on account of maladministration. In Alberta there was a Liberal Government, and what happened there? The Liberal Government was not swept away—why? Because the people said: "The Government is doing well; there is no graft as far as we can see; there is no maladministration;" and the Liberal Government was retained by an increased majority. What happened the other day in Saskatchewan? A Liberal Government was in power; the Tories made a tremendous effort to oust them; but what happened? The Tories were simply pigeonholed; there are only half-a-dozen of them left. Those were Liberal Governments. In New Brunswick a few months ago there were only two Liberals in the House. Who are there now? Why, the Liberals are in power and administering the affairs of the province. Although they had only two members, now they have twenty-seven; they have got enough to run the Administration. That Tory Administration was swept away for the same reasons—corruption and maladministration; the people turned them out. Then there was an election in the province of Quebec. It was a Liberal Administration there for the past twenty years, and, dear knows, that is long enough to give the Government a chance to go wrong; but the people returned the Liberal Administration with an increased majority, leaving, out of about eighty seats only five or six Tories, just enough to keep the name alive. The same thing happened in Nova Scotia. That being the condition of things, I say that the people are only waiting for the day when they will get a chance to sweep the present Tory-Nationalist, loyal and disloyal, Government from power; and they will be swept away for what? Because many of the Government are incompetent, because the names of some of the ministers are discredited, because much maladministration has occurred in the different departments not only this year but for the past six years.

They talk about an extension of the term of Parliament. Parliament is the wrong word to use. Parliament is composed of the House of Commons and the Senate. We need no extension of time; we go on forever; but the extension of time for the House of Commons was demanded by Sir Robert Borden. The cry was, "We will win the war"—just as if a Liberal Administration could not win the war ten times better than the present Tory, disloyal, ultra-loyal combination. If Sir Wilfrid Laurier had the reins of power during this wartime you would want no conscription because there would be no need of it; and the people are waiting for the day to hand back to him the reins of power, in spite of the unholy denunciations on the floor of this House and in the lodges throughout Ontario and in other parts of the country.

The vast mass of the people do not belong to the lodges; they would not go into them, any more than the late King Edward VII would go into an Orange lodge when he was in Canada. He refused to walk under the Orange arch in Kingston in 1860. I was then a boy and I remember that. I was the boy who received the Prince of Wales on the Jacques Cartier wharf, and I attended the reception and ball given to the Prince. I knew the King long before many of you were born. The intelligent, sensible, unprejudiced people do not belong to the lodges; they refused to; but of course there are enough in the lodges to create trouble and dissention, just as they do in Ulster. Why, Ulster is half Nationalist; out of thirty-five counties, there are sixteen National and only fifteen Ulsterite, and if there is a rebellion at all going on, it is among the Ulsterites. They had one in 1914, two months before the declaration of war, under Sir Edward Carson, who was First Lord of the Admiralty and is now transferred to the War Council Board. He brought in his German guns and his German money to tear down the flag of England, to denounce the King for having signed the measure passed by the British House of Commons, and the House of Lords granting Home Rule to Ireland, and placing it on the statute book. If the French down in Quebec did that, wouldn't there be an awful row? These are historical facts. When Gladstone himself brought in his Church Disestablishment Bill in 1867 he did not mean to do away with theology, or do away with divinity students, as this Bill does, but he brought it in to put the thieves of the Roman Catholic property out of business in Ireland. They had stolen and robbed everything in sight. I have been there and seen the ruins of some of the properties. But because Gladstone passed that Bill what did the Orangemen in Ulster do at that time? Johnston of Ballykilbeg, one of the members, said at a public meeting of Orangemen, "If Her Majesty the Queen dares to sign that Act of Parliament, we will kick her crown into the waters of the Boyne." That is historic; I am giving you the facts, names and dates, and can be easily contradicted if I am wrong.

These are the people who are preaching loyalty to the French race in Canada. Our friends make a great mistake when they allude to Quebec. Why, there are more French in Ontario than there are English in Nova Scotia or in New Brunswick, and three times more than there are in poor little Prince Edward Island. There are more French in Ontario than there are English in British Columbia. There are thousands and hundreds of thousands in the Northwest Territories and Manitoba. You don't take that into consideration, do you? And when I hear my French friends of Quebec talk about that province I remind them that they have to-day outside of that province a larger territory under their inspiration and direction though not under their control, than the central province of Quebec. Right here in the province of Ontario the French race, by their vitality and—shall I say the word?—by their family morality, are beating the English out of some of the best parts of that province. Do they know that? Do they know that the county of Prescott, which was first occupied by United Empire loyalists is to-day four-fifths French? Prescott is one of the finest agricultural counties in Ontario, where I had the misfortune of being beaten three times in general elections because there were too many Orangemen in the townships at that time, twenty-seven years ago. I thank them for having voted against me, for, instead of being bothered with elections, I am in this House, doing nothing except bothering the House. Do they know that Glengarry was as Scottish as Scotland herself twenty-five years ago, with men of brawn and sinew, six feet two and six feet four, and lovely women, hale and hearty, sturdy and strong, tall and beautiful; but who are there now? The French are close on to the majority. Take Russell county.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: What about the Scotch in Hull?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: When I got there, they told me there was none left, as you had just departed. But now the French are making their way into Russell, and they are vastly in the majority there. The day is soon coming when right in the capital here the French will have the majority. In Stormont they are practically the majority. In Nipissing—

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: They will soon have Toronto.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It will be a good riddance of many there; there will be fewer hogs for Flavelle to gather in. Now, that is the condition of things, and why this outcry and this condemnation and this slurring of the French race in Canada is more than I can comprehend. But I am prepared every time to put my foot down. I have gone into meetings composed only of Orangemen, where they had determined not to allow me to speak, and I have held the platform for one, two and three hours right in their midst, right in Toronto, right in Orange centres.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: What became of them?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They all applaud well, but they vote straight Orange all the time. It is the same with Sir Wilfrid Laurier. he goes to Toronto, and three or four thousand people applaud him in Massey Hall; the roof is too low to allow the sounds to die away; but the next day they go and vote dead against him. There is the Tory enlightenment.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Disappointing, isn't it?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, not a bit; a missionary must not be disappointed; his work is to go at a job, and, if he is not able to complete it to-day, to go back to it. I have confidence that some fine day those people will have their eyes opened. I do not despair of them becoming rational and dropping their prejudices.

I ask this honourable House what the French have ever done to that section of the population which is such a disturbing factor? Have they gone to Ontario—to Toronto, Hamilton, London, or any other centre—to interfere with their rights? Have they gone into their churches to disturb their prayer-meetings? What have the French done to you, anyhow, that you should be all the time tumbling on their backs? That is what puzzles me—so much that I cannot understand it. They don't interfere with your rights; they don't try to take them away; and, when the honourable gentleman from Stanstead said that minority in Quebec got no respect, he uttered a statement that is absolutely against the facts. He denounced "that man Mercier" in vehement terms. What are the facts about Mercier? He settled that famous Jesuit question in 1887-8. Against that settlement thirteen Orangemen, headed by Dalton McCarthy, voted. Sir John Macdonald denounced them as "the devil's thirteen," just as his successor, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, when Prime Minister denounced six of his ministers as a "nest of traitors." What did Mercier do under that Bill? He gave the Protestants of Quebec their full share of the money that was paid. He never carried on his Government without having one or two representatives of the Protestants in his Cabinet. He made every effort in his power to have Protestants elected in French counties. It is not fitting that such denunciations should be uttered on the floor of this House against men who have rendered invaluable services to their country and their people. The honourable gentleman from Stanstead attacked not only those men, but also honoured senators in this House, his own colleagues whom he ought to know by heart; for instance, the honourable senator from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry), who had the honour of being Speaker of this House for five years. Did you not feel ashamed of the way in which he spoke of that honourable senator, who has to his credit forty or fifty years of service in behalf of this country of ours, in the army, in the House of Commons, in the Senate, and in all the organizations of his native town or city? I felt ashamed for the honourable senator from Stanstead for that, and for his unmerited attack upon one of the most esteemed and most able senators and public men in Canada, the honourable senator from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique).

There was no reason for taking the character of these men. Now, that is what the Tory party is going to vote on with regard to this conscription measure. Are these the arguments that are going to guide you in your vote? Truly the Government must expect work from you that no honest citizen expects from you. The Government brings men into this Chamber and packs it. I do not blame them for naming partisans of their own to replace dead Conservatives; but what a travesty on the political situation is the conduct of Sir Robert Borden and his friends and satellites, who have been asking for non-partisan conduct, when only he is tearing up the very foundations of non-partisanship by replacing old stalwart Liberals, who have died since the war and since the extension of Parliament, with young, healthy, reliable, fresh Conservatives. Do you imagine for one moment that the people of this country are not going to rebuke such conduct as that? The Prime Minister, in his last gasp of official life, is perpetrating these wrongs against the vast majority of the people of Canada, ignoring the rights and interests of the Liberal element. Truly the Government is gasping—yes, the Government is dead.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Let it rest in peace.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We will give you that with a vengeance in a few months. It is now before the coroner's inquest, a general election, and the verdict will be: "Dead from corruption and general debility;" and then we will all say the ultimate prayer: "Requiescat in pace."

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: You will be at the funeral.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I will be pallbearer, although you don't deserve a good funeral.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: We are at the wake anyway.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: For the past two months I have given a fair perusal of the speeches delivered in the House of Commons; I have listened most attentively to the speeches in the Senate; I have scrutinized the articles and statements made in the newspapers of Canada, especially statements coming from the pulpits; and, after a careful study of them all, I have been forced to the conclusion that this Conscription Bill is the most unfortunate measure that has been laid before Parliament since Confederation. It was unfortunate in its inception. Its conception was most maculate, and it was born a monster. It is unfortunate because of the difficulties there will be in its application; unfortunate because of the fearful results, disastrous results, that will follow. What is its origin? Do we find it in true patriotism? Do we find it in true statesmanship? Do we find it in true foresight? The true patriotism and statesmanship of Sir Robert Borden have been exercised for the past three years and up to the last moment he was against conscription. Then I asked myself, what changed him? Did he see the coming cyclone? Did he want support throughout the country? I believe, and I think the vast majority of the people throughout the country believe, that this Bill is not so much conscription of soldiers as conscription of electors to overcome the tide which is flowing against the Government at the present time. I believe that if conscription is necessary, it is due to the tangle between the Prime Minister and his ex-Minister of Militia. His ex-Minister of Militia was a soldier man; he had nothing in view, nothing in his heart, but soldiers, soldiers, soldiers all the time—the boys at the front. His chief, Sir Robert, was not a soldier man; he was a political man, more ready to aid the profiteers and more able to carry out the behests of other interests than to look after the welfare of the boys at the front. When the ex-minister wanted more men for the front, he was told to "let up on recruiting." Sir Robert Borden has made a kind of denial that he ever used the words. I will weigh the evidence as a juryman. Sir Robert Borden says one thing, Sir Sam Hughes comes back and says the opposite. As a jury might say: who is right? I would judge the value of the statements by the results. As soon as Sir Sam Hughes, as he states, was told by the Prime Minister to let up on recruiting, sure enough recruiting went down; therefore, based on results, Sir Sam Hughes's statement stands against that of the Prime Minister. Is not that a pretty condition of things? No wonder the Government is looking for union, or coalition. The very fact that they are asking for union or coalition is proof that they are not fit to run the affairs of the country.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Won't you come in with us?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No. Go in with a rotten Government, a decrepit Government, an incompetent Government? Go in with a Government that is working for the profiteers?

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Why do you not run the whole thing yourself?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If I did there would be more honesty and competency, and the main idea behind me would not be to give somebody the knife. It seems to me that the prime ministers in Tory Governments have had nothing to deal with but "the nest of traitors" and other traitors. It is a hardship for a Prime Minister to be in a nest of traitors. Sir Sam Hughes was the whole Government for three years and a half. When the Bill was originally presented by Sir Robert Borden, it contained one wise provision, the one regarding exemptions. Sir Robert Borden is not anti-Christian; he is not Orange; he is a fair, good, honest Christian. For that reason he had in the Bill exemption not only for the clergy of all denominations, but a clause providing for the exemption of theological students—called by some divinity students. That was a necessary clause. What happened? As soon as his Orange supporters saw the words "divinity students" they rose en masse and threatened him and stampeded him into withdrawing that clause from the Bill. Sir Robert Borden did not do that of his own free will, or from any of his convictions; he did it to please the so-called ultra loyal element in Ontario. Have we not a right to protest against that? What does that mean? If divinity students, or theological students, as we call them—seminarians—are not exempted from military service, what is going to happen? Why, if you take the divinity students or the theological students from their vocations, take them from their seminaries, their colleges, their homes of virtue, and put them into barracks—too often centres of vice—you deplete the ranks of the Church—not only the Catholic Church, but the churches of all denominations. You strike at the root of the Church, Anglican, Presbyterian, Catholic, or any other. If you cut off the divinity or theological students, the Church must inevitably crumble. If you have no recruits for the ministry, the ministry is going to fall, and if there is no ministry the Church cannot remain, and you will have no religion. It is as logical to say that as to say that B follows A. You should have the divinity students, the theological students, the seminarians, call them what you will, or there will be nobody to replace the old pastors, the old deans, the old canons who go to their reward. And it was for that reason that Sir Robert Borden, in his fairness and in his appreciation of the facts, had the clause exempting them inserted in the Bill.

Now, this element, this disturbing factor comes along and forces Sir Robert Borden—threatens him, throttles him, and he gives way. I cannot understand how any man, either in this House or outside of it, who has any respect for his church and the ministry of that church, can vote for the Bill as it is.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: Some churches do not want it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They are pretty close to the devil.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: I refer to the Anglican Church.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The churches that want it are in the vast majority.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: The Anglican Church does not want it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They do not want any ministers? Where do they get them? Under a cabbage leaf, like they get babies? Don't tell me that.

I cannot understand how any man belonging to any church can support this Bill, especially a member of the Catholic Church, which, through its highest representative in the Dominion of Canada, Cardinal Begin, has denounced it on account of that clause. What surprised me was that the honourable member from Antigonish (Hon. Mr. Girroir), who made such a brilliant effort on behalf of the Bill, said that his bishop and another bishop in New Brunswick were in favour of this Bill. I say to him, and I do not know the facts, that if he can get a declaration from either or both of those bishops that they are in favour of the clause as it stands, I will vote for the Bill. The honourable gentleman is not here, but his friends can tell him that the challenge is open. If he can get a letter from his bishop and the other bishop that he mentioned, saying that they want conscription of theological students, then I vote for the Bill with the two bishops. But I know that what he said is not true; it is against the Catholic doctrine; it is against the laws of authority. So I cannot understand how any Catholic can vote for the Bill under the present conditions.

Now, the results. The Bill is most unfortunate in its results. Sir Robert Borden threw this Bill into the political arena like a gaseous bomb. When it split it divided everything; it disrupted the parties in the House of Commons; it has set race against race; it has aroused religious prejudice; it has enabled certain public men, as noted by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry), to go to a large public meeting here in Rosemount in the county of Carleton, and denounce the Church, and say that if there is no recruiting done in Quebec it is due to the Catholic Church. What can any sensible man say to a charge of that kind? So the Bill has not only disrupted the parties, but it has disrupted the nation—and what is worse than all, it has disrupted the army. Why, gentlemen, I have seen letters from the boys at the front protesting against it; and I think I have a right to say that I know something of the boys at the front and that I have full authority to speak. The Cloran blood of three continents is flowing to-day on behalf of liberty, as they call it, and justice. Clorans of Ireland are officers in the Imperial artillery; there are Clorans in the English constabulary; and I have relatives in the American army; and I will not vote for conscription. No, I am too liberal-minded a man to use force or compulsion of any kind, and I want no conscript to take the place of my son, who went voluntarily, and left his eye and his blood and his limbs on the field of battle. I would count myself demeaned and dishonoured if I took my neighbour by the throat and forced him to send his son to replace mine. That is the way I feel; that is the way the vast majority of the people feel; but the ultra-loyalists shout, "Conscription! we want conscription!" Why in the name of Heaven don't they go? They have meetings in Toronto, where five, six, eight, and ten thousand people all yell for conscription. If those howlers would go there would be no need for conscription. They get up at those meetings and yell, "Win the war, win the war! Conscription!" The thing is absurd.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: They have done pretty well.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Now, what is going to happen? As I say, letters from the army tell us: "Do not send any conscripts over here; we will not associate with them; they will be looked upon as an army of slackers, of yellow-jacks; they are not to be compared with the men who volunteered, who went of their own accord." So you divide the army; you will have an army of volunteers and an army of conscripts.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Still you want the slackers to vote on this Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Certainly. Why not? I am a slacker.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: And I am going to vote on the Bill. Where is your logic?

An hon. SENATOR: Never had any.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: "Never had any," the honourable gentleman says. I think he is right.

There are the results of that Bill. So, after all, I think we do not deserve the slurs, the contemptuous slurs, thrown at us by the leader of this honourable House on behalf of the Government. Because a man does not vote for this Bill is no reason for calling him a recreant, a traitor, a poltroon, a craven. No, no; that is not the way to cultivate national union and solidarity—to cast these denunciations and contemptuous remarks at people who hold different opinions from lip-loyalists and loud-mouthed shouters for conscription.

I have a great deal more to say. I have not yet opened my notes. If I did I should be here until to-morrow. I am not going to detain you as long as that, for I am tired enough myself without tiring you more. Now, I have finished where the honourable gentleman from Stanstead finished.

If the Tories imagine that by raising this howl over conscription they are going to check the career of the leader of the Liberal Opposition, they will find their mistake—and I will pray mighty hard that they may, and will do all in my power from now until the last ballot is cast to see that the name of Laurier shall flourish once more at the head of the administration of the affairs of this country. He has been a glory to the Empire; he has been an honour to the Confederation of Canada. His name responds well to that of a Bright and a Gladstone; his name responds well to that of a Mirabeau, the chief orator and defender of the French revolution; and to that of a Thiers, the saviour of France after the war of 1871 against Germany. Laurier's name responds to that of O'Connell, responds to that of Parnell, and, I am proud to say, responds to that of a man still living, John Redmond. It responds to that of a Baldwin, a Papineau, and a Lafontaine. The aims and ambitions of all these men have been his study and his guiding star during the past fifty years of his public career, and I allow no man, senator or otherwise, to tarnish his name in language unbecoming and ungenerous. Laurier has given all the years of his life to building up this country on a foundation of union, peace, and harmony among all the creeds, classes, and nationalities; and that any honourable gentleman should attempt to make political capital by means of this Bill against a man of that stamp should not be encouraged in public life. I was compelled, during the delivery of the honourable gentleman's (Hon. Mr. Pope's) speech to make interjections and denegations of what he was saying, and finally I had him blocked.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Is he convinced?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I stuffed the cannon. The honourable gentleman stated that after Laurier went to the United States he said he would have no truck with the Americans any longer—that he turned his back on Washington, and yet afterwards declared that the interests of Canada were identical with those of the United States. The honourable senator denounced that in the most vehement terms. The idea of the interests of Canada being identical with those of the United States—and he stamped the floor. I asked him: "Are not the interests of Canada and the United States to-day identical?" You all saw him flounder, you all saw him look for some of his documents to see if he could find an answer; he had no ready answer, and he did not answer the question. Now, that is not fair to a public man of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's standing and service. The Tory party are making a mistake in raising this race cry, for it is they who are raising it. The Tory party are making a mistake in raising this religious cry. They are raising it in their public meetings, in lodges, in their pulpits, unfortunately. That is why I said, in reply to an honourable gentleman, that some of the churches did not need exemption because they are pretty near the devil, and some of them are. There are pulpit orators to-day who are worse than demagogues—worse than any Billy Sunday who ever addressed a mob in New York or Buffalo.

These being the conditions, I appeal to my fellow-countrymen throughout the Dominion of Canada, of all nationalities—I appeal to my friends, to the people whom I directly represent, the Irish people of Canada, to stand by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who stood by Parnell and still stands by Redmond on behalf of free government for Ireland. Let that appeal go forth, and every honest Englishman and Scotchman will say: "Cloran is right. Stand by Laurier because he stands for freedom; stand by Laurier because he stands for the development of the country on honest lines; stand by Laurier because, even on this measure, he is a democrat to the hilt." On the measure he says: "I am prepared to support it when the people shall have been consulted." If the people decide in favour of conscription, just as when they decide in favour of prohibition or pronounce on the question of the tariff, we all bow—although the honourable gentleman does not bow; he goes over to Hull to get Scotch. We bow to the vote on prohibition, on woman suffrage, on tariff questions, and so on. So will the people of all the provinces of the Dominion bow to conscription if the people have been consulted and have decided in favour of it. Where is the disloyalty in that? Where is the cowardice in that? Where is the slacking in that? Where is the treachery in that attitude of a statesman who is true to the very principles of democracy for which our 460,000 boys are fighting—for which my son and many of my relatives, as I say, are fighting? Are we going to turn those principles aside with scorn and tell the people that they have no right to be consulted on a matter of this kind? That is Tory rule, and that is one of the reasons why I say the Tories are not fit to be at the head of an intelligent, democratic people.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Were the people consulted in England?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Consulted in England? Yes, a dozen times.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Were the people consulted in the United States?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, there was not a general election in the United States.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, if you are looking to the United States for an example, why don't you give us reciprocity?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: The honourable gentleman was talking about democracy.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am talking for Canada. There was a kind of referendum in the United States. They had what they called a registration day, and there were over ten millions who registered within twenty-four hours. There was a referendum for you; they went and declared themselves. That was the consent of the people. Honourable gentlemen, there is no use in trying to split hairs over this question. The Liberal party is more loyal, more to be trusted for the sake of Canada and the Empire, than the Tory party, and I have every confidence that the people will say so on the day of election when it comes—and that cannot come too soon.

Hon. N. A. BELCOURT: Honourable gentlemen, a year ago almost to the day, fifty or sixty delegates of the Empire Parliamentary Association, coming from the House of Lords, the British House of Commons and the Parliaments of all the self-governing British dominions, including, among others, three of our colleagues in this House, the honourable senator from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry), the honourable the junior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Dennis), the honourable gentleman from Moose Jaw (Hon. Mr. Ross), and myself, were officially received by the President of the Republic of France, at the Elysée Palace. I had on that occasion the honour of being selected to reply to M. Poincaré and to acknowledge on behalf of the delegates the eloquent and kindly words which he had addressed to us. Among other things I said this: "The countries from which we come are pacifist countries, and most of us, in fact all of us, are pacifists; but on the day when the German hordes brutally set foot, almost simultaneously, on the soil of Belgium and France, there was a cry of supreme indignation throughout the British Empire; there was one firm and irrevocable resolve—that Great Britain and the Dominions under her sovereignity owed it to themselves, to Belgium, and to France, to the cause of justice, honour, freedom and democracy, to take the largest possible part in repelling the colossal attack so elaborately and so long prepared by Germany." If I now recall the statement which I made on that solemn occasion, it is in order that there may be no misapprehension on the part of the honourable gentlemen who are now listening to me, or of those who may read my words, as to where I have stood and now stand regarding Canada's participation in this war. I said at the Elysée Palace simply what I had said on many previous occasions, and what I have since frequently repeated, in many parts of Ontario and Quebec. The first time that I had the opportunity to declare my attitude with regard to Canada's participation in the war was at Sohmer Park, in the month of September, 1914. I recall the occasion because I think it adds another to the many proofs which have been given by honourable gentlemen on this side who have preceded me, that the Government have been most slack and most derelict in not taking advantage of the unquestioned enthusiasm which was manifested in the province of Quebec at the opening of the war. At the meeting at Sohmer Park there were 15,000 French Canadians. They were addressed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, my friend the late lamented Thomas Chase Casgrain, the Honourable Rodolphe Lemieux, Mr. Maréchal (now Mr. Justice Maréchal), our colleague the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), Colonel Gaudet, myself, and others; and at no other recruiting meeting I have attended has an appeal been as well received as the appeal, so plain and so definite, made on that occasion by all these French orators—for not a single word of English was spoken.

How is it that the Government has taken as little advantage of that magnificent enthusiasm, demonstrated in the large city of Montreal so early in the war? As the hour is late and I know honourable gentlemen are anxious to vote, I am not going to take as much time as I had intended in giving the facts and arguments to show why the province of Quebec has not done perhaps as much as was expected of her, as much as she would have done if she had received one-tenth of the encouragement she should have received, if her manifest determination to take her full share in this war had been duly recognized and properly encouraged and assisted; if she had been differently treated by the Federal Government and the government as well as the press of some of the English-speaking provinces. I shall mention only a few points, because I do not wish to take up time unnecessarily.

If you will look over the names of members of commissions, committees and various bodies and persons appointed by this Government to take some share or other in the conduct of this war you will find that out of the hundreds of gentlemen who have been asked to serve on these bodies there are but very few Liberals, and fewer French Canadians. May I be allowed to mention one of the most recent instance? The Advisory Council which was appointed yesterday, I think, or the day before, in connection with the control of food. In a list of over fifty names of persons appointed on that council, how many Liberals do you suppose there are? I could count only two. How many French Canadians? One. I mention these facts merely to show that in all these instances the Government of Canada from the outset decided that the conduct of the war should be monopolized by it and that Liberals were not to be allowed to take any share or responsibility therein. What is the reason? I can imagine no other reason than that at first, and for many months after the war began, it seemed to the Government of the day that there would not be enough glory to go around; it was expected that the war would not last very long, and they wanted to monopolize all the patronage and all the glory. I can find no other explanation; I have heard of no other; but there is one fact that is certain, and that is, that at no time have the Liberals of this country received anything like the recognition which they should have received. If they had received that recognition, conscription would have been absolutely unnecessary.

May I mention my own case in connection with two matters with regard to the war? I was one of the very first who took upon himself to write to His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, the very day after the establishment of the Patriotic Fund, sending my subscription, which I believe was the first to go in. It was not large, as my means are limited, but it was as generous as I could possibly make it. No recognition was made of it in any way, and no position on the committee was assigned to me; I heard no more about it, except, of course, the letter of acknowledgment from His Royal Highness. I thought nothing of it, but later on a local committee of the Fund was formed, and a large number of my good Tory friends were put on that committee, all the offices being assigned to Conservatives of Ottawa; and in this city, where one-third of the population are French Canadians, not a single French Canadian was put on that committee. Would you believe that I had to apply three times, first personally, and finally in writing, requesting that my name be added to the committee, because I was anxious to serve; and when I was put on I was the first and only French Canadian. True, after that a few other French Canadians were put on. We are told: "Why, you French Canadians don't do anything; you don't subscribe to the Patriotic Fund, you don't take part in Red Cross work, you won't serve, you won't do your bit." As regards recruiting, what occurred in my own case was this: In September, shortly after my return from Europe with our colleagues whom I have mentioned, I offered my services to Colonel Mignault, who had been asked to form a general French Canadian recruiting committee throughout Canada. I said to him: "We French Canadians in Ottawa and vicinity are ready to continue to do our best." I might mention here that there is no district in Canada where the people of any nationality have enlisted in such large numbers in proportion to the population, and have gone over and fought, as the French Canadians in the district of Ottawa. I do not care what the Government returns show; I know that myself, because I know the people. Colonel Mignault told me that he was very glad of my offer, and asked me if I would take charge of things in Ottawa and do something, and I said I would—that I would get our friends on this local committee and see what we could do. The committee was formed, and I was appointed chairman. There were Conservatives and Liberals on it, all French Canadians, and we begged and begged the Department of Militia to give us the necessary recognition and the forms to use and send out. We subscribed a considerable sum of money, but never could we get the slightest kind of satisfaction from the Department of Militia. Yet we are told that the French Canadians won't enlist, that they are slackers and poltroons and cowards. I could give many more similar instances, but the time is too short.

My position in regard to this war has been clear, definite, and unhesitating from the very start. To my conception, and it was a very early conception, the struggle is one of democracy against autocracy in Europe, and against militarism all over the world. Whatever may have been the origin, the cause or the object of the war, it appeared very clear to me from the outset that, if Germany did win in this war it would mean the absolute rule of militarism over the world; and I at once realized that of all the countries in the world a young and growing democracy such as Canada would be hampered, would be strangled, and would suffer more than possibly any other nation in the world, with the establishment of militarism. How could Canada live by practising militarism? The only way in which Canada can develop and progress, the only way by which we Canadians of both races can make this country prosperous, is by having nothing whatever to do with militarism. Pacifist as I am, and have been all my life, and intend to be, and not ashamed to proclaim it, I am in this war to the end, and I believe Canada should do everything it can towards participating therein just because I am a pacifist, and because to me this war is war against war, war against armament, war for peace. No country on the face of the earth is more interested than ours in having the reign of peace established, and to no country is there more danger from having anything to do with militarism. The stake involved in this titanic contest transcends the British Empire, transcends France, and all the Allies. There can be no doubt that the issue is whether this world hereafter is to be ruled by brute force. Our participation in the war does not depend on any constitutional provision, whether of Great Britain or Canada, nor upon tradition, or precedent. Indeed, I go further and say that if all those things stood against Canadian participation, it would still be demanded and justified. To me it is not that we are in this war so much because Great Britain is in it, with all her strength and determination, or because France is in it, with all her soul and incomparable valour and genius, as because of the issue involved, as I have just described it. It is not so much the Union Jack or the Tricolor, or even both, that are our inspiration and our guide, as the ideal for which they stand with the flags of Belgium and the other Allies. The "sacred union," as it has been properly called, may and probably will not last forever, but the cause for the triumph of which it labours is one in which all the world, Canada included, has a supreme and permanent interest. If Germany should win, militarism would become and remain the absolute master of the world. There is no considerable difference of opinion between Ontario and Quebec, or in this country generally in that regard. My French Canadian friends of the province of Quebec, like those of Ontario, have the same conception of this war as you and I have. They are willing to do their share; they have been willing all along, and would have done it; only, in the light of what you have heard from honourable gentlemen on this side, it cannot be denied that they have not been given the opportunity, or allowed or encouraged or assisted to serve the country in the way in which they should have been.

it should have done. Some think Canada has done all it could or can do—and on that score there is a good deal to be said. I am not called upon, and it is not necessary for me, in the view I take of this Bill, to discuss whether Canada has done all it can do, or whether it should and can go on and do anything further. I take the view that the way in which the Government proposes that any future possible contribution of Canada should be made is not the proper or best way.

I admit that if we could do more we should do it, but I do not admit that conscription affords the means of accomplishing that end. I believe that not only is it not going to accomplish the end, but it is going to retard, hamper, and hinder it. Not only is this measure going to prove abortive, but it is going to prove very mischievous and very dangerous. I ask you, in all sincerity, in all earnestness, what chance is there of a law of this kind, being applied efficaciously unless it has the sanction of the people, unless they approve of it.

It is not necessary to imagine all sorts of things which have no ground except in certain wild imaginations. It is not necessary to imagine that there is going to be open rebellion, in order to show that this law is not going to be effective. There are many ways of resisting a law other than by open resistance. I do not for one moment think that it has entered the mind of anybody, however strongly he may feel against this law, to be a party to openly breaking it. But look at the time, the energy, the money that will be frittered away in endeavouring to enforce a law which everybody, from the Prime Minister down, admits is very unpopular; and would not receive the approval of the people if it were submitted to-morrow—a law which is brought in and sought to be enforced, when the opinion is universal that the law does not meet the approval of the people. Look at the time we are going to spend, to say nothing of the class, racial and other difficulties you are going to raise. Remember how long it took and the difficulties experienced in England before conscription could be resorted to and enforced. And in the United States it took three years to prepare public opinion before active participation in the war could be thought of. The failure of conscription in Australia has caused that country to revert to the voluntary system. The question is not whether conscription is logically sound, constitutionally or morally right or just, but whether it is opportune and practical and practicable.

It is a mistake to assume—and it is not true—that only the people of Quebec are opposed to conscription. I dare say that in this province of Ontario the farming community is probably as much opposed to conscription as the farming community of Quebec; I do not know; I can only conjecture. I offer my judgment only for what it is worth; but the honourable gentleman agrees with me, and the Prime Minister agrees with me, that if the law were submitted to-morrow it would not receive the approval of the people. Then why insist on a law of that kind? Why reject and put to one side a system which has produced the magnificent result of 425,000 soldiers in this country? Why discard a voluntary system by which Canada has done her duty well and promptly?

I do not agree with the statement that voluntary enlistment has broken down and is no good. Of course, it is not as fruitful just now as it might be, and we know why it is so: because the Government has stopped it; the Government has practically ordered enlistment to stop. Is it any wonder that it is not working satisfactorily now? But if you go to the people, even in the province of Quebec, and treat them properly, give them every opportunity of enlistment, give them the opportunity of being commanded by men of their own race, give them every opportunity of promotion and of recognition—which they have not now, and have never received during this war—and certain things which the province of Quebec expects from the majority in this country, and you will soon see that the voluntary system will not be the failure it is said to be. My honourable friend from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. David) reminds me that the minister of the Crown who was appointed for the purpose of going to Quebec to organize voluntary enlistment, Colonel the Honourable Mr. Blondin, after spending a few weeks there, and after this Bill was introduced by the Premier, gave his verdict that, if the province of Quebec were properly treated and if her men were properly recognized there would be enlistment en masse. Is not that sufficient evidence for any one, coming, as it does, from a colleague of the Prime Minister? Should not that be conclusive for every one? But Colonel Blondin was stopped. There has been no recruiting going on, and yet figures have been submitted to this House and in another place for the purpose of showing that in the last few months enlistment has broken down. I do not believe that it really has broken down notwithstanding the recent action of the government.

Instead of introducing conscription in the way in which he did, why did not the Prime Minister seek to devise a plan of co-operation with the leader of the Opposition? He had and has every reason to believe that the leader of the Opposition was and is prepared to assist him. Would he have approached him at all if he did not so believe? From the very day that war was declared until the present day, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal leaders have pronounced themselves squarely in favour of Canada's participation in the war. I defy honourable gentlemen in this House or anyone else to mention the name of a prominent Liberal, either in Quebec or anywhere else, who has not declared that Canada should take the largest possible part in this war. I do not know of one, and I would be very much surprised to hear the name of a single Liberal who spoke to the contrary. Was that not sufficient reason for the Prime Minister to go to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and ask him to assist him? Why did he not ask his co-operation? Why did he not offer him a share, not in the glory, but in the satisfaction of having accomplished his duty, while giving him a share in the responsibilities? Is there any one in this House who can doubt for one moment that, if that had been put to Sir Wilfrid, he would have expressed his desire and intention to go on and do everything he could possibly do to help the Government in completing our share in this war.

There was no necessity for offering Sir Wilfrid or his friends positions in the Cabinet. There was and is no necessity for a union or coalition Government. Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not and does not need office in order to do his duty. He did not hold office in the early days of the war or since; he has not done anything officially in connection with the war; and yet he has done everything within his power to help in the war; and I think it would be an insult to him to assume that he was prepared to continue to take an active share in the war only if he were offered a position in the Government. I repeat that if the Government had sought the co-operation and assistance of others outside of its own immediate supporters the necessity of even selective conscription would not have arisen.

The failure of the Government to avert the national crisis which is now threatening the very existence of Confederation is largely owing to the fact that the Government have been egotistically anxious to monopolize the conduct of the war, and to exclude therefrom the leaders of one-half of the Canadian people. I suppose that is in keeping with the Tory conception, which in some respects is not altogether unlike the Kaiser's conception of authority—that they alone are capable of governing, that they alone have the gift of government, that they are somewhat like the Kaiser himself annointed by the Almighty for the purpose of governing the people. If it is not that, what is the reason Liberals were not asked to take a part in the conduct and administration of this war? Is it that, or is it the other reason, of gaining for the Conservative party all the kudos and all the profit and all the glory that is to be got out of the conduct of the war? Let the Prime Minister abandon his Bill, and go to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, without the offer of a coalition or anything of that kind, and let him seek the assistance and counsels and co-operation of the Liberals; let him put a stop to this villification of the French Canadians, this constant vituperation and slander of two-thirds of the population of Canada, and put Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his friends in the position of going to the people of the province of Quebec and saying, "Your wrongs will be righted," and I am sure that enlistment will become just as fruitful in that province as anywhere else in the country. The results accomplished will be very much better than those produced by means of conscription, which nobody wants except this Government. What will be accomplished by passing this Bill? You will simply aggravate the class and racial difficulties which we have and which are very alarming. If what I suggest is carried out, you will preserve that modicum of national unity without which this country is headed for the breakers and will very soon be wrecked.

One is driven to conjecture why this measure is so insistently pressed in the face of the growing opposition to it and of the grave consequences involved necessarily in putting it into operation. Is it because of the fact that the Government thinks it necessary for its own fate, which is soon to be decided by the electors? It may be a mistake to think that. I do not know; I am simply asking the question; but that is a conjecture which is forced upon one's mind, and which one cannot escape.

I would advocate that, if necessary, the compensation to the soldiers be increased. I cannot quite understand why a man who is asked to go into the trenches in France and Flanders to fight for you and for me should be paid less than the man who is engaged by you or by me to gather hay and put it in the barn. I do not see why the soldier should not get just as much— certainly not less. I believe considerably more than—than the common labourer in the country. If you want to make voluntary enlistment in this country even a greater success than it has been, why not increase the soldier's pay? Why not make the wealthy men of Canada pay the difference between what the soldier now receives and that which he ought to get? The men of wealth in this country have done very little so far. Why not make the profiteers disgorge some of the scandalous profits that they have made and apply them on the compensation to be paid to the soldiers and to their wives and children and the soldiers who have come home maimed? Honourable gentlemen are mistaken if they think that throughout the length and breadth of this country there has not been a shock such as has rarely been experienced in Canada over the disclosures which have recently been made. Is there any one in Canada who has not been scandalized beyond measure to hear that one firm alone made a profit of $5,000,000 on bacon supplied by it for the British army in one year?

Organize recruiting intelligently and systematically, without favoritism and with equal chance for promotion and recognition, and you will, I feel confident, obtain better results than with this Bill.

There is one thing that I want to emphasize to-night, and I say it after full and mature consideration, and with all the deliberation of which I am capable. Over and above, beyond and paramount to, the question of conscription or voluntary enlistment is the question of national unity in this country. To my mind the establishment and permanence of national unity is far more important than the getting for the war of a few thousand men either by conscription or voluntary enlistment, in addition to those we have already raised. This war will come to an end some day, we all hope very soon, and we all believe—in fact we know—that it will end in the triumph of justice and freedom. When this war is over Canada will stand more than ever in need of that which she has hardly ever had—national unity. I am one of those who think that the efforts of the Fathers of Confederation towards creating a Canadian national sentiment have had but very little success so far, and within the last few years what there was of national unity in Canada, I regret to say, has just about been swept away. There is a chasm to-day between the two races in Canada, the depth and width of which few men realize. Warning has been given and often by many repeated but not heeded and we have a condition arising out of that situation for which the province of Quebec is blamed and unjustly blamed.

There has been a confusion of cause and effect in that connection. I desire to say without fear of contradiction, that all the opposition to this measure there is in Quebec to-day—and it is pretty general, I admit —is not so much opposition to conscription per se, as it is a manifestation of the deep, longstanding and recently much aggravated resentment on the part of the French Canadian people at the insults and attacks so constantly directed against them and especially the attacks on their mother tongue.

Conscription has merely provided the occasion or opportunity for voicing this same deep sense of irritation which was bound to explode soon or late in the province of Quebec. This bill is merely the occasion, the opportunity for giving vent to the resentment which has existed for years past and which has been growing daily in that province. The manifestation against conscription is in reality a manifestation against the vilification of the province of Quebec. It is a protest against the persecution of the language of the French Canadians, who constitute two-thirds of the population of this country, the descendants of the heroic founders and colonizers of Canada. I say that if this question had been settled, as it should have been settled years ago, if this Government had taken the responsibility which it should have taken, you would have heard very little opposition to conscription in the province of Quebec.

An Hon. SENATOR: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I would ask the honourable gentleman to go to Quebec and inform himself as to that. The trouble with my honourable friends from Ontario is that there is not much use in speaking to them about these things. There is no use in uttering the warnings which I have been uttering for years in this House and in other places. They are not heeded, they are not listened to. I invite my honourable friend to go to Quebec, where he will soon discover that the opposition is due very largely to the animosities and the irritation caused by the persistent persecution to which the French language has been subjected.

Is it not remarkable, and is it not regrettable, that, while we have discussed in this House transportation, shipping, trade after the war, employment of capital and labour, returned soldiers, and many other questions affecting after-war policy, the very question which is most important, which is most vital to the existence and permanence of the Canadian Confederation, has been shunned by everybody? We have discussed matters of dollars and cents; but when it comes to discussing the Canadian soul and making an examination of the national conscience, nobody does anything, nobody dares say anything or if he does he runs the chance of being called an agitator and a demagogue. Are we going to continue to live in this fool's paradise? Are we going to do the ostrich trick every day, in the hope that the storm will blow over unnoticed or unfelt? Are we going to allow the two races to get farther apart every day until the situation gets absolutely beyond solution? Do you want conditions similar to those which have prevailed in Ireland for three or four centuries to prevail in Canada? I know what I am talking about, and nobody knows better than I do that we are not at this very moment far removed from those very conditions. Yet nobody thinks about it, no one dares speak about it, and if one does, and it does not matter how judiciously, he is called a demagogue and agitator.

To-morrow I shall be attacked in the Toronto papers for having dared to discuss this question on the consideration of this Bill; but I owe it to my people, I owe it to my English-speaking friends, and to Canada and its future peace and unity to speak on this subject. This is a time for clear thinking, it is time for plain speaking, and, so far as I can command the English language, I intend to speak my mind plainly. My intention is not to find fault or to reproach any one, but simply to accomplish my duty as a loyal Canadian and a lover of British institutions, as one who has spent practically all his life in this province doing his best to support British political ideals and institutions.

May I again make a personal reference? For more than 30 years I have associated with English-speaking friends; I have taken a large part in all that interests them in their social life, their clubs, their sports in every way that I could. I have helped to the best of my ability their philanthropic, charitable and scientific institutions, and in every place where I thought I could be of assistance. I have subscribed my money towards these objects, to as great an extent as my means allowed; and, if there is a man who has a right to speak on this subject, if there is a man who has a right to stand up and say that so far as he knows he has never uttered a harsh or cruel word against his English friends, it is I. I have tried to understand the point of view of the English speaking Canadian and I have openly sympathized with it, whenever I could do so and when I could not I have remained silent: I hope I shall not be considered fatuous in saying that I think that I am as near an approach as exists in Canada to that type of Canadian which the fathers of Confederation hoped for.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Will my honourable friend permit a question?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Will the honourable gentleman state what complaints he has against the province of Ontario?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I will name some of them, I could not name them all. One of them is the pernicious and abominable practice so long in vogue in Canada of promoting party welfare by appeals to prejudice and passion, another is the attempt to proscribe the French language.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: By whom?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: By the Conservative party in Ontario. My honourable friend knows as well as I do that for thirty years there has not been one provincial or federal election in the province of Ontario that has not been fought by the Conservative party by means of appeals more or less disguised to prejudice and passion. I have in my possession pamphlets, dating as far back as 1886 or 1887, in which the Catholic clergy of Ontario and the French Canadian population are depicted in the most insulting way. "No popery! no French!" that was the cry in the first election in which I took part in this province, and the same thing has been going on more or less ever since. It is not even necessary that there should be an election for these outbursts as all of us know that on the 12th of July every year, here in Ottawa and in the surrounding country, and in the province generally, the same theme of discussion at every meeting is: "No popery! No French!" My honourable friend knows it as well as I do. He knows of the agitation for the abolition of the separate schools; he knows of the P. P. Association; he knows of the attitude of Mr. Craig and of Dalton McCarthy and others in the past and in the present towards the language of my people. He knows that it is a permanent establishment of the Conservative party in Ontario to get power by means of appeals of that kind to the people.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: It is rather more than an Ontario man can stand to hear this agitation going on in Parliament every day. I want to say—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If my honourable friend is going to make a speech I will sit down.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: I will give an instance of it if my honourable friend wants it.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Never more impudently, never more flagrantly and more recklessly has that been done than during the last few years. It is going on every day all through the press of this province; and yet my honourable friend is surprised; he does not know about this; he has never heard of such a thing. He never reads the Orange Sentinel; he never reads the Toronto News, which for months and years has published this national programme. What is the first item? "One language for Canada." I suppose my honourable friend never reads the papers which I have mentioned, or the Toronto Telegram, the Kingston Standard, or the Hamilton papers, and many others. I could keep him in reading for months by supplying him with extracts from these papers along the lines which I have mentioned.

Hon, Mr. BLAIN: It cannot have any other purpose than agitation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not know what my honourable friend means by agitation. If he means what I have described, if he means raising and promoting passion and prejudice, then I agree with him. We are accustomed to it. We have never seen anything else in Ontario. We had it before Confederation; we have it to-day worse than ever. We hear it on the street. I was a member of the House of Commons for twelve years, and time and time again it has been said to me—not by men living in the back streets, but by prominent citizens, merchants on Sparks street—"Vote for you? Not much; I would not vote for a Frenchman." Do you suppose that a highly-strung, proud race like mine is going to stand these things forever? Do you think they are not going to show their resentment? A Frenchman may suffer, he may do things that he will regret, and you may do things that you will regret; but he will probably suffer more than you. Is it not time to stop that kind of thing and deal with the French Canadians as equals and not as pariahs?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: May I ask my honourable friend a question? Did I understand the honourable gentleman to say that not an election has taken place within the last forty years—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Thirty years.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I have taken part in every local and federal election for the last thirty-eight years, and during that time I have never from any platform heard this question discussed.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: During the next ten days I will give my honourable friend the pamphlets.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I understood him to say that it was discussion.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does my honourable friend want to make another speech? If so, I object.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I do not want to make a speech.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Now, with regard to this Bill itself, is it any wonder that it has met with opposition? Is it any wonder that the province of Quebec is not disposed to accept it, in view of the language in which it was introduced in the other House and the language in which my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) introduced it here and the language resorted by the press towards Quebec? I regret to have to say what I am about to say, because there is no man who has a higher esteem and respect for the honourable leader of the Government in this House than I have. Ever since I have been a member of this House, I have, I think, always shown him the greatest respect and deference. I confess, honourable gentlemen, that I have not yet recovered from the surprise with which I listened to his words in introducing this Bill. May I be permitted to quote his words? I am doing this, not in anger, not for the purpose of being offensive or disagreeable, not for the purpose even of making a reproach, but simply for the purpose of accounting for a condition of affairs existing in one part of this country at the present time and some of the difficulties with which this Bill is meeting. In introducing the Bill my honourable friend said among other things:

> To talk of a referendum at such a time does violence to every instinct of defence. To say that the Government should ask every craven to his country, every pacifist, every slacker, every recreant to public defence, every coward who fears to face the enemy, every Socialist who preaches disloyalty, every alien who asks the protection of our country at the expense of the lives of the men who fight for it to say that the Government shall ask a verdict from the thousands who proclaim their disloyalty from the house-tops, would constitute a farce out of the greatest tragedy that the world has ever seen enacted.

The other statement, which caused me equal surprise and pain, is this:

> Think of a race of people growing up oblivious to the grandeur of love of country, of patriotism, and of the self-denial and sacrifice by which men are prepared to place their lives on the altar of their country. When we think of men indifferent at such a time to all the best interests of civilization involved in this struggle, indifferent whether the enemy should crush out the freedom and liberty which they have enjoyed under their country's protection, it shakes our confidence in human nature.

Well, honourable gentlemen, who are the people who are asking for this referendum? Largely the people of the province of Quebec. Which race did my honourable friend refer to as the race of slackers, poltroons, cowards, disloyal men? Did my honourable friend, before penning these words, reflect that it was men of that race who fought and bled and died at Courcelette? I want to mention to my honourable friend that at Courcelette, out of 21 officers of the 22nd Regiment who took part, 16 died on the battlefield or afterwards from the wounds they received in that battle. Did it not occur to my honourable friend when uttering those words that the race which he is now describing in this opprobrious way is the race to which those men belonged? What will the mothers and fathers of those boys think when they read, if they do read, the remarks of my honourable friend? What will the whole race think of the appreciation which my honourable friend entertains and expresses so plainly in face of the sacrifices made by these men and many others of their race? Does my honourable friend think his language is going to help the task of those who, like myself, have been frankly, clearly and openly from the outset for participation in the war? Does he think it will help honourable gentlemen who sit on his side of the House, like his neighbour the honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. M. Beaubien) as well as those who may vote for this amendment? Does he think it is going to help them to convince the people of the province of Quebec that they should accept this measure, and continue to contribute in this war? Is that the kind of argument with which you convince or convert people? It has been repeatedly said in this House during the debate that this was a punitive measure. I do not want to say it is; I don't believe that it is; but if there were anything to make me believe it, it is the words of the Prime Minister in the other House and the words of my honourable friend here. If it is not a punitive measure, why use such words with regard to the province of Quebec? I am not arguing that it is; but those who are going to argue that it is will have no stronger argument than these very words of my honourable friend and the Premier. I know my honourable friend too well, I know his goodness of heart and his calm, judicious and fair mind too well to have the slightest doubt that when he reflects upon the construction which is bound to be put upon his words, and the use that will be made of them, he will regret having used them. Unfortunately, like many other things which are said, while they are sometimes forgotten, they are often not forgiven. The mischief is done. How suggestive are these words of such high-minded and thoughtful, and usually calm and considerate men as the Premier and my honourable friend, of the troubled mind and soul of Canada, and how suggestive of the necessity for immediate and thoughtful consideration and action!

In this way, and in many other ways, yesterday, last month, last year, and in previous years, you have estranged the people of the province of Quebec. You have made them feel that so long as they remain in their own province, where they are in the majority, they may do as they like, with regard to their education and the use of their language, but immediately they cross the Ottawa river, for instance, they cannot continue to speak, or to have taught to their children, the French language; they may do so on the north side of the river, but if they cross over to the south side they run the risk of having to pay a fine of $500 or go to jail. These are the things honourable gentlemen which are reaching the people in Quebec and have been reaching them from Ontario for many years past and especially during recent years and the effects of which are manifesting themselves to-day; these are the things which I say in all earnestness must be remedied if we are to create a united and prosperous Canada.

Am I wrong in this? May I trespass further on the time of this honourable House to give the proof, not in my own words, not in the words of a French-Canadian, but in the words of an Englishman, British-born, who knows the French-Canadian people, who has followed this question, and has written a letter which I find in the Montreal Daily Herald of July 3 of this year. It is signed by Mr. E. Harper Wade. Mr. Wade is a man of substance and of intelligence, a graduate of one of the English universities, who has lived in Canada for a number of years. This is what he says:

To the Editor of the Herald:

Sir,—My repeated assertion, accompanied by confirmatory evidence, that it is the Ontario bilingual trouble that has prevented the French Canadians of Quebec from sending as many volunteers as other provinces, is now receiving confirmation from many sources, notably from Lieut.-Col. Arthurs in the House on Thursday. It is neither a question of passion nor reason, but of sentiment, which in every human being outweighs either, and has done so since man was first man. Probably the strongest sentiment of the French Canadian race is in connection with their language. If you persistently try to deprive a man of what he holds dearest, then appeal to him to assist you against a common enemy, on the insultingly low ground that it is better for him to join you before being himself attacked, and when his response seems to you inadequate, call him a slacker and a coward—

The very words used by my honourable friend.

—and finally tell him you will make him fight whether he likes it or not, you must be sanguine indeed to expect good results.

Why, these are the very words which I have been using. My honourable friend from Peel (Hon. Mr. Blain) may cogitate over these words:

Yet this is precisely what Ontario has done. All friends of the English-speaking people, of which I am certainly and with good reason one, must keenly regret the fact that the Government of that province has seen fit to put the restriction of the French language in the separate Roman Catholic schools of Ontario before the national issue of encouraging, or at least not impeding, French Canadian recruiting. To rightly apply the words of "Justice to all":—The lives of the wives and children of the men fighting to give protection against an infernal foe are not of so great consequence in the eyes of the Ontario Government as having the French language restricted, hampered and if possible repressed in Ontario as Erse was in Ireland, but as neither Welsh nor Gaelic have been in Great Britain, for England learns by experience, and found Irish results discouraging.

General Smuts in a speech that rang through Europe and reached throughout the entire civilized world, said in effect, "Even those nations that have fought against you must feel that their language is as safe and secure under the British flag as that of the children of your own household and your own blood."

The New Witness, published in London, England, and edited by the well-known writer, G. K. Chesterton, says, under date of May 24: "In Ontario it is now a crime to teach French to little French Canadian boys and girls in French Canadian schools. The penalty is a fine of $500, or six months' imprisonment." If it were possible to contradict this, in the interest of Canada I would gladly do so. But can I truthfully? I am assured one school teacher was fined $500 for some infringement of the school laws, and only saved from six months' imprisonment by the fine being paid by others.

Why not be British? The United Kingdom regards the languages of all peoples that come into the Empire as a sacred trust. If it had not been so, and if England had treated the Boers as Ontario treated her quarter of a million French Canadians, there would have been no British South Africa to-day, yet it was what some Big-Englanders wanted to do.

If in South Africa the Dutch language were treated as the French language is treated in this country, how long, I ask you, would there be peace and unity in South Africa? How long would the South African union exist if an attempt were made to proscribe the Dutch language there?

Why Americanize our institutions? This idea of a common language comes from the States, not from England. It is a good one to apply to European continental immigrants, but we Canadians must never forget that while Great Britain has always been ready to protect us to the utmost of her power, it was French Canadians that saved Canada for England at the time of the War of Independence, and that Quebec would never have come into Confederation if such action as Ontario and Manitoba have been guilty of had been anticipated or thought possible.

Bourassa and Lavergne could have no following—

I would ask my honourable friends to weigh these words, coming from an Englishman, British-born, a man who knows the province of Quebec and knows French-Canadians.

Bourassa and Lavergne could have no following if there had been no school language question.

May I say this further with regard to the French-Canadian? He thinks that the size of his churches, his reverence for his priest, his so-called backwardness, his alleged ignorance of the art of money-making—and we were reminded of this repeatedly this afternoon—his habits of life so long as he is law-abiding—and he is law-abiding —are matters which concern himself alone and which ought to be sacred from sneers and insults. He is bound to resent such statements for instance, as were made not long ago in Parliament, that his priests are merely parasites and should be deported; that it is dangerous to allow the Arsenal to remain at Quebec, because the loyalty of the French Canadians cannot be trusted. He resents the calumnies and lies invented and circulated constantly and systematically through the press, in speeches and in private conversations, concerning him, his race and his creed. I want to be perfectly frank. The French Canadian is not willing to subscribe, and will never subscribe, to the doctrine that he must renounce his language; he is not prepared to adopt the first article of the political faith which is so strenuously advocated in Ontario and elsewhere, that there must be but one language for all Canada and all Canadians. He is not prepared, either, complacently to accept the statement that there are a superior race and an inferior race; that he is a sort of pariah and is to be treated somewhat after the fashion of the Indian and kept confined on the reserve where he constitutes the majority—in the province of Quebec; that if he chooses to settle anywhere else in Canada, which his forefathers discovered and colonized, he must give up his mentality, his language, his traditions—things which he holds dearer than life itself. He resents being placed on the same footing as the refuse of Sicily, Austria, and continental Europe—strongly resents that these immigrants should be preferred to him anywhere outside of Quebec. He is not willing to be denationalized. He is unwilling to renounce his origin and his speech and what they stand for, especially at this very time. While he freely recognizes and admires the virtues of the Anglo-Saxon, he knows he is possessed of virtues which are proper to himself and no less valuable and admirable. He thinks he is just as good, as law-abiding, as intelligent, as well educated, as well behaved, as patriotic, and as loyal as his Anglo-Saxon neighbour—though he is not quite so boastful about it. At all times and in all places he is willing to recognize that the Anglo-Saxon is a much better money-getter than himself; but he insists upon keeping his notion that the correct proportion of money in this life's happiness and purposes is more in accordance with his measure than with that of most of his English-speaking fellow-citizens. He is proud of being a British subject, but prouder still of being a Canadian; and if ever he has to choose between the two he will not hesitate. He is proud of the French blood in his veins, but he would not for one moment think of exchanging British citizenship to become a citizen of the French Republic. He loves and admires France, but he loves and admires still more the language which France gave him, and with which France has so constantly disseminated throughout the world enlightenment, progress, science, art, and honour, and in which France has ever eloquently and consistently upheld the cause of human progress and human liberty. His love of French speech is not so much because—or not even because—it is the language of France as because of the incomparable things which French thought and French speech have accomplished throughout the whole world. The attempt to banish his language from any part of this country, discovered and colonized by his ancestors, to punish with large fines or imprisonment the teaching of school matters or even of religious subjects in French to his children, is, he thinks, not much better than many things which the now world-hated German has been doing in this cruel war.

The French Canadian has had ample time and opportunity to appraise the methods, thoughts, and habits of life of his English-speaking brother and to compare them with his own, and he still prefers his own. He may be, and no doubt is, obtuse and blind: yet he is not willing to be disturbed in his blissful ignorance. He persists in believing that his frugality, his thrift, his respect for law and order, his contentment with a modicum of the world's riches and honours, his easy, happy ways of life, his numerous children, and finally his preference for Canadian to any other soil, are quite consistent with his loyalty to our common flag, his duty to his fellow-citizens of another speech or of another faith. And he is content to rely on these virtues in the struggle for life, either as an individual or for the community of which he is a unit. If these habits and virtues do not count sufficiently in the struggle for the survival of the fittest, he accepts in advance the result with stoicism; but he shrewdly believes that they will count in the ultimate result. If he is treated fairly, as an equal, as a co-partner, not merely tolerated as an inferior, he will be second to none in his love of and devotion to Canada, in his loyalty and willing sacrifice to British institutions and Canadian needs. You cannot make an Anglo-Saxon of a French Canadian, and if you could the product would be worthless. The fruitless and irritating attempt to denationalize him should be given up forever.

The time has come when this situation must be faced frankly and squarely. To allow it to drag along will only make matters worse. It is more fitting to think about it and more necessary to endeavour to settle it now than it is to deal with those after-war measures to which I have referred.

French Canadians are sometimes charged with provincialism, with Chauvinism. It is charged that their vision does not extend much beyond the limits of their province. When they are told that they may not elsewhere speak their language or exercise the rights and privileges which they exercise when they live in the province of Quebes, is it any wonder that they are attracted to the soil of their own province more than to the rest of Canada? Treat them with equal liberality and their provincialism will disappear at once.

Why not frankly recognize that both races have qualities and have defects? Why not admire and endeavour to imitate our respective virtues, and be tolerant with regard to our respective faults or defects? Would you have a better understanding and a more thorough conception of the irritation which is to be found all over French Canada if I mentioned to you the fact that to-day in the province of Ontario the world-hated German enjoys privileges which are denied the French-Canadian people in this province?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Nothing of the kind.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is so, and I will prove it to you. I expected my honourable friend to say no, and I have the proof right here. I know my honourable friend would be shocked at hearing such a thing; who would not be? But this is a fact. One of the regulations which govern education in this province is Regulation 15.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: We have heard that often.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Well, you have forgotten it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: No, I have not. The honourable gentleman makes a total misrepresentation of the facts in connection with it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Misrepresentation? I give that as a fact, and I am going to prove it to my honourable friend, and I invite him to listen to me; this is an important matter. Regulation 15, one of the regulations governing education in this province, is as follows:

> In school sections where the French or German language prevails, the trustees may, in addition to the Course of Study prescribed for public schools, require instruction to be given in reading, grammar and composition to such pupils as are directed by their parents or guardians to study either of these languages, and in all such cases the authorized text books in French or German shall be used.

This regulation 15 has been in force and acted on ever since and even before Confederation, up to the time when Regulation 17 was enacted in 1912. Regulation 17 has repealed that provision in regard to French, and left intact the provision in regard to German, and I defy my honourable friend to prove the contrary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: No.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is all very well for my honourable friend to say no, but I defy him to prove the contrary. I know what I am talking about. The people of the province of Quebec know that, and are you surprised at their irritation, at their deep resentment, when they know that the Germans in this province of Ontario get and enjoy rights and privileges which are denied to them? I wish to emphasize the fact that they have to pay a fine of $500 or go to jail if regulation 17 is violated. That is the position. We have stood that for five years in this province. Nobody listens to us except it is my honourable and venerable friend, who says that we are liars. Nobody will listen to us; the whole answer to our statements and arguments is invariably "No." There is no use in talking to people of this kind, for they think that we are not capable of telling the truth.

I regret that I have taken so much time. I did not intend to do it; but, as I have gone into this subject most thoroughly and carefully, and as I know what I am talking about, and as I am making those statements deliberately, knowing that I stand absolutely on uncontradictable ground, I think it is better that we should have this question out, and see if some impression can be made. My sole purpose and object is to try to waken the people of this province to the reality of the conditions which exist. I do not want any more laughing things away in this fashion; the time is past for that. You of the English-speaking provinces have got to deal with this question, honourable gentlemen, and the sooner the better. I am uttering a solemn warning and a solemn appeal, not a threat. I do not doubt that you are just as anxious in your desire to have a united Canada as I am. I know that we stand on common ground. I know that we are all loyal and patriotic to Canada, and it is because I know that the division between the races is deeper and wider than it ever has been that I appeal to you, the majority of this country, to see that this matter is righted. To my mind it is far more important, far more vital, far more urgent, than those after-the-war questions of trade, shipping, industries, transportation, employment of capital and labour, etc. What is the good of better shipping or transportation facilities and so on, if you are going to have constant and permanent bitter estrangement between the races and a war of races in this country—if you are going to have this festering sore constantly opened? What is the good of anything else? Is it not possible to get in this country some English-speaking people who are willing to go into this question, to study it, and not meet our assertions with mere denials? Is it not possible that an appeal in this House or elsewhere will induce some of them to go into this question and see whether we are telling the truth or not? When this question was up before, I abstained from speaking on it, but matters have come to such a pass that it would be criminal for any one who knows what I know not to express his mind clearly and frankly about it and not to utter a solemn warning.

With reference to the Bill, I am going to vote for the amendment, not because I am not in this war to the end, not because I believe Canada has done everything it can do, for Canada may do more yet; but because I think the method of continuing Canada's contribution to the war is not that proposed by the Government. If the people of Canada had approved of it, or if they approve of it when it is submitted to them, then I will do my level best, as I have done in the past, to get my French-Canadian friends to submit to the law and obey it and let it be put in force. I think the law is ill-conceived, ill-timed. I have not gone into a discussion on conscription, which would be purely academic. I do not know of any logical or constitutional ground against conscription, but I say that conscription at this hour and in this way and because what has already been done and said in this House and elsewhere on public platforms and in the Press is not the best means at our disposal. If I may repeat it without any offense to my honourable friend, for whom, as he knows, I have the greatest respect, his manner of introducing this Bill and the words that we have heard in this House, and which have come to us from elsewhere are not going to make it very much more acceptable to Quebec than it is in itself. On the contrary, I think the things that have been said are going to make it impracticable, even if the situation were not as I have described it. These things make it impossible for my honourable friends from Stadacona, Montarville and De Salabery and others to go down to Quebec and ask the people to accept this Bill. How can we go and ask them to approve and accept the bill when we have such evidence as I have described directed against them? The only patriotic thing, the only truly loyal thing, the only efficacious thing to do would be for Sir Robert Borden to approach the leader of the Opposition with a view to making enlistment what it ought to be, and what it can be if it is dealt with in the proper fashion.

Let us stop at once and forever this constant daily misrepresentation, this vilification of a whole race, two-thirds of the population of Canada, the descendants of the heroic founders and colonizers of Canada, the cousins of the heroes of the Marne and Verdun; the heroic participants in the valorous and heroic deeds of Courcelette. Let us stop the cruel and senseless persecution to which they are subjected in the education of their children. Stop that useless and cruel attempt to proscribe their beautiful and immortal French speech. Remember that after this war and for all time French and English must live here side by side, and together work out a common destiny, for better or for worse. Let us remember that it is by no blind hazard nor fortuitous circumstances that the descendants of the two greatest and proudest races have been thrown together in this part of the New World, to live together and prosper, not to ostracise one another. Let us remember that it is in our combined power to establish and perpetuate, on this northern half of the North American Continent, probably the most perfect, as human things can be perfect—the most perfect christian democratic Commonwealth. Let us remember that we can make or forever mar such a glorious future. And inevitably we shall mar it, and irrevocably, if we do not at once put an end to our religious and racial strifes. Let us fully realise that in this Canada of ours, God's country, we, you of British origin and we of French birth, are offered the very best, probably the last, chance of making a success, and a brillant one, if we only will try of democratic ideals and purposes; and that if we fail it will be only because we will have allowed our vision to be obscured by old-time feuds which have no place and should have no refuge in this free land, by wretched and miserable intolerance, by an insane and puerile wish to make each and every one of us eat, sleep, live and die, dress, walk, talk, and act, with deadly uniformity. If we fail, it will be because we shall be so blind as to not see that each race has qualities, virtues and aptitudes peculiar to itself and that if you destroy them you are destroying as many elements of progress and happiness. If we fail it will be because we shall fail to realize that it is union, not fusion, of the races which alone is possible and necessary in Canada. Let us, for the sake of preserving and utilizing our respective virtues and qualities, be tolerant of our respective faults or shortcomings.

This measure will probably become law. It may be enforced soon or late, or never, as I hope. The war itself, the great calamity which has overcome the world, will come to an end some time. Things will right themselves with more or less celerity and completeness. But we in Canada, English and French, will be here forever; and that is to my mind the most important, the most vital thing to always remember and never to lose sight of. Shall we forever continue or shall we now put an end to fratricidal strife?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: It is not my intention to make a speech, nor to discuss the school question of the province of Ontario, nor the law as it stands upon the statute book. I rise merely for the purpose of entering my protest in the most solemn manner against the allegations which the honourable gentleman has made against the Conservative party of the province of Ontario. I have been contesting and taking part in elections for sixty or seventy years, and from my long knowledge and extended experience I say that the charges the honourable gentleman has made against the Conservative party in reference to the use of the French language or the condemnation of the French people or their religion are totally incorrect. Whenever that question has arisen—and I have fought it over and over again myself—it has been raised by the party with which the honourable gentleman himself is connected. If he wants any proof of that I have a scrapbook containing extracts from the speeches of the leading men whom he has followed all his life, which prove the statements I have made. Perhaps the honourable gentleman has forgotten that in the election which took place in South Ontario between a member of the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald and a representative of his own party, the motto that was circulated through the country was: "Vote for Mowat and the Bible, or for Morrison and the Pope." I myself was denounced over and over again as a "French mouton," and a "fleeced mouton," because I refused to join in the condemnation of the Roman Catholic Church and of the French Canadians in conducting my own election, and I lost one election for that very reason, when I took sides with the minority against condemnation, on the ground that, as two-thirds of the population of this country consisted of a different race with a different religion from the other third, the country could not be governed on the principles agitated and advocated—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I did not attack you.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE BOWELL: I do not care what you say, I assert that your whole statement is a total misrepresentation of the position of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario. You instanced Dalton McCarthy. What was the result of Dalton McCarthy's agitation?

Hon Mr. BELCOURT: The P.P.A.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Let me continue.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Didn't you interrupt me three times?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: You mention the name of Dalton McCarthy, but Dalton McCarthy was not justified or supported by the Conservative party as a whole. There were but thirteen members of the House of Commons who supported him, and when he went to election he was kicked higher than Gilderoy's kite by the Conservative party, as the honourable gentleman knows well, and he has no right to get up and charge the whole party with the conduct of two or three newspapers which may have taken strong grounds. It is just such gentlemen as he is, and those who have spoken before him on this question, who have kept up the agitation in this country.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes, and we are going to keep it up until we get justice.

Hon. GEORGE LYNCH-STAUNTON: The question before us to-night arises out of a Bill to increase the available forces of Canada in this war. It has come before the House of Commons and is now in its final stage before this House. This Bill involves the most serious action that this Senate has ever been called upon to discuss or take; and senators should approach it as judges, trying to raise themselves high above passion, try to raise themselves to a height from which they can discharge their duty to their people and their country, and to decide, not as race hatred, religious animosities and prejudices may lead them, but by the light which the Almighty has given them to decide questions of this vital importance. I have listened with a great deal of pain and sorrow to the discussion on this Bill. I had thought that in the Senate, where we are supposed to have men chosen for their rectitude, for their clear-headedness, for their character, we would have this question discussed as becomes gentlemen, Canadians and patriots. I cannot say, if I speak truthfully, that I have had that hope realized. The question is whether or not we, with the delegated authority which the nation has given us, shall order 100,000 men to the trenches of Europe, and, no matter what religious animosities, what race hatreds, what wrongs we have suffered at the hands of each other, we must discuss the question without considering them at all; else we do not perform our duty to our country and our people. I will at least try to discuss this question on a plane above party turmoil, above race hatreds, above religious animosities, in the clear atmosphere of public duty.

We are called upon to decide whether or not we shall say to our fellow-citizens: "You, sir, shall come out and put on the King's uniform and go to defend us and yours who remain at home." Yesterday the question in effect was asked: "What right have we, sitting in this Senate or in the House of Commons, to say to a fellow-citizen that he shall go forward to face the belching gun, to meet the fire-hissing message of death?" I say we have no right—neither here nor in the polling booth, nor in the streets, nor anywhere; but we have the duty. We have a duty to perform if the occasion arises, just as a judge sitting on the bench has a duty to perform when he takes away the life of a convicted fellow-citizen. He has no right to take that life, but he has the duty. So, if the occasion arises, we have the duty, but no right. The question of right does not arise in this case. It seems to me that morally and legally that duty arises only on one occasion, and that occasion is when the state is in danger.

Is the state in danger? The honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) has proved it, and honourable members who have spoken before me have brought witness after witness, and all men agree that the state is in danger. By the state I do not mean the British Empire alone. I mean Canada, the land of our birth. Sir Wilfrid Laurier is a witness for whom our friends on the other side will have some regard. He said this:

> The fate of Canada will depend upon the happy or unhappy issue of the terrible conflict which has set almost all the European nations at each others throats, the cause of liberty and civilisation for which we are fighting dominates from very high our miserable party strife.

These are the words uttered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, one of the leaders of thought in Canada, one of the big men in Canada, one of the men from whom the people receive their inspiration, and by whom the people expect to be led. If the fate of Canada is in the balance, then it is our bounden duty to see that that fate is not unfortunate, and to resist with all the power of the state, even as France has done, to the last man and the last dollar. If Canada were not in danger, but if Great Britain were in jeopardy, that rock "set in a silver sea," the only dam against the onrush of Hun barbarism which threatens to inundate the world, then I would say it was our bounden duty, not as British subjects alone, but as part of the human race, to do all that in us lay to stem the tide of German brutality.

I have very fixed convictions upon the question of conscription. I believe that our voluntary system is the bastard offspring of modern democracy. I believe that it is vicious, that it is wrong, that it is unfair, and that it brings disease into the state. I believe that it weakens our forces. I believe that it is unmanly. Using the word voluntary in its generic and proper sense, I believe that there is no such thing as a voluntary system. It is a nickname given to moral coercion. The voluntary system was never heard of in the history of the world until the civil war in the United States brought it forth and destroyed it. To say that it is a tradition of England is in my humble judgment to misread her history. Until 1914 the greatest army that ever crossed the channel was a conscript army. It was the army sent in the reign of Henry VIII by England's first great war minister, Cardinal Wolsey. In England's history, down to the time of Charles I, there never was an army of anything but conscripts. In those days every lord had to bring his quota of men to the standard of the King, and England never required to ask her people to volunteer for her defence. From the days of the Stuarts down to 1914, England had a professional army whose ranks were filled by men who thought their vocation was the profession of arms, and by those who were driven into it by starvation. Those are the classes which composed her army—the model, the glorious, the splendid British army. England never required a conscripted army; she never had more than a police force in the Napoleonic wars as compared with the force engaged in the present conflict. From twenty-five to fifty thousand men was her greatest contribution to the greatest battle of all time until this war commenced. So a modern army is a citizen army, and a citizen army was never required in England until now. The French introduced conscription, as we understand it, although that gentleman who has been called the blackguard of Europe, Frederick the Great, had a conscript army many years before. His army was not composed of selected conscripts; they were slaves driven in to fight his nefarious battles. The United States first experimented with what is called a voluntary army. The other night Sir Wilfrid Laurier quoted Abraham Lincoln, of whom he is a great admirer, that champion of government of the people, by the people, and for the people; but he forgot that Abraham Lincoln was the first modern democrat who saw, realized and believed that the only proper way for the people to defend themselves was by selective conscription.

In my opinion no people in the world will vote for conscription. No people in the world, except in Australia, have ever been asked to vote for conscription, and no Government in the world should ever resort to the voluntary system.

Now, let us see what the voluntary system is. It is the most brutal form of coercion ever practised. My honourable friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) says that the English-speaking people of this country are calling his French compatriots slackers and cowards. I may say that what education I have I received among the French in Montreal. For years I lived among the French people, and no man can convince me that the men in whose veins runs the blood of the companions of Dollard and the followers of Champlain and La Salle are cowards and slackers. I believe that no part of this country is inhabited by a traitorous people. God made us all, and I believe, as Mr. Balfour has said in one of his inimitable essays, that from the beginning until now man has been ever the same. He speaks in different tongues, but the same heart pulsates within his breast, the same soul God put into his body. All races are alike, and have amongst them, as we have, the brave, the chivalrous, the great, the small, the cowardly, and the average is about the same.

Day after day and month after month, in the city in which I live, men have been hounded through the streets and called slackers. That condition is not peculiar to Quebec. Every man who has a tongue seems to call other men who do not go slackers and cowards. Do not go away with the idea that the bouquets are all thrown at your race. Every man who has withstood the call to volunteer and has refused to go has been spat upon because he would not go. It is the common evil result of an iniquitous system.

Honourable gentlemen say that we should not conscript the people until we have a referendum, until we have the voice of the people at large. Is there any justice in that? I have said here, as I have said outside, that I have never heard a moral or a legal argument, a fair or a just argument, advanced in favour of the voluntary system. I defy any man to put up any argument in favour of it that is not fallacious. Of course, men may use smooth words which, running along with nice sentences, catch the ear, just as music does, but honourable gentlemen know that there is no "plea so tainted and corrupt but being seasoned with a gracious voice obscures the show of evil."

The question of a referendum has been raised by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who represents the anti-conscriptionists. I may say that never until now have I thought of Sir Wilfrid Laurier except as a great and patriotic Canadian. Never in my life have I spoken of him with disrespect. I have always regarded him as second only to one other Canadian, Sir John Macdonald. Although I differ with Sir Wilfrid in politics, I see no reason why I should not admire any of my fellow-Canadians who are great. But I have been woefully disappointed by his action in this case. I do not know what to attribute it to, because I believe that he is a wise, clear-headed man. A few years ago, when he was asked to submit to the people a question which affected the people's rights, Sir Wilfrid Laurier condemned the referendum. To-day he commends it when there is no right of the people to be submitted to them. What are we going to do if we follow him? We are to ask the millions of voters in Canada whether or not 100,000 men shall go to the front. If we were going to levy a local improvement tax in Ottawa, we would not submit the by-law to the citizens of Ottawa. We would submit it to the taxpayers, and why? Because the men who do not pay have no right to a say. Now we want 100,000 men between the ages of 20 and 30, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier proposes to ask men between the ages of 30 and 40 who are eligible whether other men shall go. He proposes to ask men who have no children, and who are beyond the age limit, whether the eligibles shall go. Will anybody tell me what right any man who has not a chance of going himself has to say that his neighbour shall go? The proposal is a palpable travesty. It is wrong and fundamentally vicious to submit the fate of one man to the vote of another.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Have you any more right to do so?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I say that we have no right at all, but we have a duty. Honourable gentlemen sitting in this chamber are the delegates of the people; the members of the House of Commons are the accredited agents of the people. Under the British North America Act the people of Canada asked England to give them a Parliament to protect their rights in the state and to enforce their duties to the state.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Is the honourable gentleman aware that the mandate from the people has expired?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: I know all about it. I will refer to that in a moment. I say that no man has any natural or legal right to take his neighbour by the shoulder and place himself behind that man in order to save is own life or his family. I have no right over my honourable friend; I have no right to take him by the collar and throw him out of this room; but an occasion may arise—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: This is not intended as a joke. An occasion may arise when it would be the duty of an officer to do so. Now, the people of Canada have chosen their representatives, who swear when they enter Parliament or this Senate that they will enforce the duties and protect the rights of the people. So I voted for a member of Parliament; you voted for a member of Parliament; I consented to the constitution; you consented to it; and therefore we gave authority to the Parliament to enforce our duties to the state. That is the reason we have the right. No man has any right, unless it is given to him, over another man's liberty. Parliament has been given that right, and I declare to the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) that Parliament is the only place in which is deposited the privilege of enforcing the performance of duties by the people.

Now, the referendum would be plausible enough if, for instance, we were contemplating the taking over of the railroads. A government might well say, "We will submit that question to the people, because it is a question of right;" but a question of duty, never. It is most unfair to give to a lot of men who have no chance of going themselves the right to vote whether I shall go or not, or to give to men over 30 and under 40 the right to send their neighbours in order to save their own skins. Therefore I say that if Sir Wilfrid Laurier spoke sincerely he would condemn the referendum instead of commending it to the people of this country.

"Oh, well," they say—and this amendment to the motion says: "We want conscription, but we will put it off till after the elections." "Put it off," says By-and-by. Why put it off till after the elections? Honourable gentlemen say that more soldiers are required, and these gentlemen say that the people are not in favour of it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Did not the Prime Minister himself first suggest it?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: To put it off until after the elections?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: If he did, he was wrong, in my opinion; and I am speaking my opinion and not the Prime Minister's. I do not care what position the Prime Minister or the Government takes; I am exercising my own judgment in this case, and I will not exercise Sir Wilfrid Laurier's or Sir Robert Borden's. Put it off till after the elections? I believe that Sir Robert Borden—and I am not saying this to defend him—said to Sir Wilfrid Laurier: "Come in with me and I will give you half the portfolios. Come in with me and help me to enact a law for enforcing conscription in this country. I have in my mind the knowledge which makes me go back on all my former intentions. I never wanted to see conscription in this country, but I feel now that I must swallow my words." And Sir Wilfrid Laurier, having taken the proposal into his serious consideration, declined. Then, as a concession and for the purpose of inducing him to come in, Sir Robert Borden proposed that they form a coalition Government, pass the Military Service Bill, and go to the country after the Bill became law and before its enforcement. He did not offer to go to the country in the first place, and he offered to go to the country only as an additional inducement to obtain Sir Wilfrid Laurier's concurrence. Now, that is the truth, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier admits in his letter that that is the fact.

All the honourable gentlemen on the other side who have spoken have said that the people are against conscription. They are against it. Some honourable gentlemen who have been frank have said that we need soldiers. Some of the honourable gentlemen have said that the country is in danger, that the emergency has arisen; and yet they say, "Put the question to a general election." Why? We need the soldiers. The necessity has arisen. Put it to a general election so that you will have it killed?—is that a right or proper way to perform one's duty? It is only the men whose hearts are of water, whose characters are unstable, that are afraid to perform their duty for fear of losing popularity. No man is worthy of a public position, or worthy of the esteem of his fellow-citizens, who will not in a grave national emergency, an emergency much less than this, in which the whole world is involved, stand, even if he is the only man in his province to stand, against public opinion if it is wrong. It is his duty to stand, as stood the greatest patriot whom we have ever had in English history, Lord Chatham, whose effigy or monument in Westminster is so splendidly described by Macaulay:

> High over those venerable graves towers the stately monument of Chatham, and, from above, his effigy, graven by a cunning hand, seems still, with eagle face and outstretched arm, to bid England be of good cheer and hurl defiance at her foes."

That is the position which every man should take—stand up for the right; stand against all public opinion; and do not allow your feet to be enmeshed in your wrongs; do not allow your sight to be blinded by your grievances, real or imagined.

Let me say another word and I shall have done. The honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt)—and I cannot follow his argument at all—began with a speech which I thought was most sincere, most self-detached. He was, I thought, trying to put before us, as the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) did the other night, the conditions in Quebec. But I am surprised that he should make two absolutely contradictory statements. He said that the cause of the shortage of recruiting in Quebec was that the Government had not inaugurated an active crusade, had not treated the people properly, had not stirred up the feelings of the people sufficiently. I may tell him in passing that the Government did nothing with us. We in Hamilton made our own recruiting league; we in Hamilton stirred up our own people; and I am proud to say that no other city in Canada of our size has sent as many men. We had no assistance from the Government, and I take serious objection to his reflection upon the Government, because, so far as my experience goes, in Hamilton the plums were given to Liberals and not to Conservatives. We know who General Logie is; we know who Major Chisholm is; we know who General Mewburn is; we know who Colonel Robertson is; we know who Colonel McLaren is. I do not know a leading Conservative in Hamilton who got anything. Now, it may be that in his part of the country, or the part of the country that he has in his mind, Conservatives may have received appointments from the Government, but I assure him in all sincerity that one thing for which I admired Sir Sam Hughes, so far as my experience goes, was the absence of politics. The honourable gentleman first said that these were the reasons why they were not recruiting—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Some of them.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The honourable gentleman said, the reasons—pardon me.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I know what I said.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Then he burst forth like a torrent and declared that the reason was the racial hatred of the rest of Canada.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, no.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: It all came out of the school question. I know that there is nothing more tender in a man than his race and perhaps his religion. Let the honourable gentleman remember that I too am a Catholic, that I too have had my humiliations, that I have had my grievances; and all English-speaking Catholics, like you of the French race, have had what we think were very serious complaints to make, not of our fellow-citizens generally, but of those whom I have on other occasions described as the undesirable citizens of our country. The minority is always sensitive. When any man does anything against my religion or my country, I am very sensitive. When I hear a man say things against the Roman Catholic Church, I resent them with all my soul. But I will not sink my duty to my country or allow anybody to destroy my country because there are evil men in this community.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend permit me to say that that is my position. I have not allowed these things to prevent me from performing my duty. I was describing a condition; I was not justifying it.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: But, if my honourable friend will allow me to say so—and I have a deep sympathy with him and his French compatriots—this is not the time nor the place for that. I tell him, and I trust my honourable friend will believe in my sincerity, that in a national emergency, at a time when his life and liberty and my life and liberty are at stake, these things should not be discussed. He may feel so intensely—I know he does—that he cannot see it as I see it; but I ask him in all sincerity to rise above his wrongs, if wrongs he has, and not to go and tell his people to inject a consideration of their wrongs into this discussion.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I have not done that.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: He has done it to-night. And I tell you this, that such speeches as these do not do any good. There are just as many prejudices on the French side as there are on the English side; there are just as many hatreds, just as many narrow-minded people, just as many bigots; but the leaders on our side are endeavouring to drag the people out of those shadows, and the leaders on that side should try to drag the people out into the clear day. That is my point. Let nobody imagine for one moment that I am casting reflections.

Now, let me say one other word. Conscription is necessary if the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) is correct. He made the strongest speech for conscription. Mind you, I say conscription is the only way. My own private belief is that the voluntary system should never be resorted to. But conscription is necessary, according to the unimpassioned speech made in this House a few nights ago by that honourable gentleman. He said that the people of Canada had enlisted in inverse ratio to the time during which they had lived in this country. He said that the French people who had lived here 250 years were less inclined to enlist than the English people; that the English-speaking people who had lived here perhaps 100 years were less inclined to enlist than the English, Irish, and Scotch who had recently come to this country. That is a fair interpretation of the honourable gentleman's statement. And he said, therefore you cannot expect from the people of Canada a whole-hearted response to a call for voluntary enlistment. I took down the proportions which he gave. I think he said that there were among the French people enlistments of about five per cent, and among the English-speaking about seven per cent of the old-timers in the country. Then, if these are the conditions, what is the use of resorting to the voluntary system? Are you going to send men out over the country to call everybody a slacker, a coward, a scandalous loafer, if he does not go to the front? That is the gospel of the voluntary system, and that is what will produce the disunion.

I pray to God that we shall never have—and yet sometimes I fear we shall have—a condition in Canada similar to that prevailing in Ireland; and I pray for our children coming after us that they may never have such a condition; but I tell him that I would rather live in disunion under the beaver than in union under the German vulture, if I had to choose. But I do not believe a word of the talk of disunion. In the United States there was a civil war; the country was cleft in two; the hatreds and the animosities were terrible. When the war was over, the blood of 500,000 Americans had been shed and their bones were bleached on their soil before their time. But what of the United States to-day? They are a united nation. And we can be a united nation. Why should men become disunited on this subject? The question of conscription is to-night the plank to the saw. Why should conscription disunite us? The honourable gentleman says there now yawns a great chasm between the English and the French-speaking people. God grant it may soon be bridged. But I do not see why conscription should make that chasm wider.

Surely it was ungenerous for the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) to say yesterday that the Government had aimed this Act at Quebec. I have absolute confidence that Sir Robert Borden is an honourable, patriotic gentleman. I believe that Sir Robert Borden is as sincere and honest a man as lives in Canada; I believe that Sir Robert Borden would not turn a single inch out of his direct path to do any portion of this community a wrong; and I believe that, when he introduced that Bill, he introduced it because he thought it was necessary for the people of Canada. What earthly political advantage could he get by it? Everybody admits that the majority of the people is against it. Then he cannot gather any political profit from it. What can he win by it? Everybody on the Liberal side tells us that he has committed political suicide—that he has destroyed his political future by it. Then why should he introduce such a measure just to get square with Quebec? Is not that a politician's rather than a statesman's argument? I am surprised at it. I would never dream of hurling a charge at the leader of either party in this country that he wished to shed the blood of the people of Quebec because he resented something—to say that he would do a mortal wrong, would commit legal murder.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Who said that?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The honourable gentleman said that he aimed it at Quebec.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I beg the honourable gentleman's pardon.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: The honourable gentleman charged that the Government of Canada had brought in this Bill for the purpose of getting at Quebec, and the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) repeated and re-echoed that statement.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman is mistaken. The only thing I said was that the Government was suspected of doing so.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Well, no gentleman will insinuate anything that he does not believe, and I give the honourable member credit that as he is a gentleman he believes that, or he would not have said it. Surely he would not take away a man's character by innuendo. Surely he would not do it by whisperings.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I have a right to say what statement I have made when it is referred to in an incorrect way. I said that he was suspected of that by the people in Quebec, and that that was one of the reasons why this measure should not be pressed—because it tended to disunion.

Hon Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Will the honourable gentlemen answer my question?

Hon Mr. BEIQUE: I think I did so. I do not say that it is true. I do not say that I believe it.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Will the honourable gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Of course.

Hon Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Will the honourable gentlemen say, on his honour, that he believes that, or that he disbelieves it?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I do not know.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: Then, if you do not know, you should disbelieve it, because I shall imagine evil of no man, and woe unto the slanderer. I say that it shatters my belief in the sincerity of any gentlemen who will try to disseminate a foul slander against a man when he admits that he does not know whether it is true or not; and I am surprised, for, as has been said in this House to-night, the honourable member for De Salaberry stands high in this country as a gentleman, as a professional man, as an educated man, and I would not have noticed that had it not come from such a high authority.

I have endeavoured to put this case before you as I believe it. I have said that we should not let any political consideration influence us. We cannot be expected, by any man who possesses common sense, to do anything which we do not believe; but we are expected to discharge our duty and to allow the scales of prejudice to fall from our eyes. If any man votes against this Bill for political reasons, he is guilty of a wrong to the state. If any man votes for it against his conscience, he is guilty of a wrong to himself. Every man must govern himself in this case by what he believes is the requirement of the case and is the remedy for the condition. We need the men, and we should have them.

But it is said, if the law is passed it will not be obeyed. Whenever I hear men talking like that I am reminded of the speech of Marc Antony: "They are all honourable men, but if I were you I would rise and destroy them." That kind of a speech should not be uttered. You should say whether or not you believe in this condition: "The people will respect the law." You should never say to the people: "The people will not respect the law." Once it is made a law, all just men respect it.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that the workingmen of Canada are against this Bill. Well, I come from a city made up essentially of workingmen, a city of one hundred thousand people who have sent ten thousand men to this war. I say that there is not a factory in Hamilton that has not sent hundreds or thousands of its workingmen to this war; and I say that the man who states that the workingmen of this country are against this proposition speaks either ignorantly or falsely. Let me read a short extract from a letter which appeared in the Ottawa Journal yesterday:

> This is no class war, so far as Canada's part is concerned. The only question of class in it is the class of the world's free men against all the elements of oppression, barbarism, and brutality, and the supreme question is: Are we going to continue in the war? Are we going to give our men the support they urgently require, or are we going to lie down like cowards, and quit?

You see, he is not talking to the French; he is talking to Canadians generally.

> Are we going to send our boys at the front reinforcements, or are we going to abandon them to their fate? They are patiently and determinedly holding the line, anxiously waiting for our decision without even complaining. Their ranks, however, are constantly being decimated by the wastage of war. Our reserves are fast becoming exhausted. What are we going to do about it? To abandon our task at this critical moment or subject our men to unnecessary hardship and trial while we hang back in comfort would be an act of infamy so gross that the name of those responsible for it would stink in the nostrils of decent men so long as time continues.

This is signed by George B. Nicholson, of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, of whom there are ten thousand in Canada. I know, and we all know, that those men in their lodges have kept alive the insurance of their men; and I speak from what I know when I say that in the city of Hamilton no man can stand up for political or any other honours who is not for this Bill—and it is a city of workingmen. So, if you believe that behind you gentlemen who oppose this Bill there will be an army of workingmen, you will find when you examine it that it is a mirage—the workingmen will not be there.

I am told that this law will not be observed. I am told that by men who, I suspect, by their speeches, will encourage it not to be observed. Every good citizen obeys the laws. No man loyal to the state will by word or act incite the people to disobey the law. Let me repeat to those who by their speeches encourage lawbreaking what was said twenty-four hundred years ago by the wisest of the Greeks personifying the laws:

> Socrates: "And because we think right to destroy you, you think you have any right to destroy us in return, and your country so far as in you lies? And will you, O professor of true virtue, say that you are justified in this? Has a philosopher like you failed to discover that our country is more to be valued and higher and holier far than mother or father or any ancestor, and more to be regarded in the eyes of the gods and of men of understanding? Also to be soothed and gently and reverently entreated when angry, even more than a father, and if not persuaded obeyed? And when we are punished by her, whether with imprisonment or stripes, the punishment is to be endured in silence; and if she leads us to wounds or death in battle thither we follow as is right; neither make anyone yield or retreat or leave his ranks, but whether in battle or in the court of law, or in any other place, he must do what his city and his country order him; or he must change their view to what is just; and if he may do no violence to his father or mother, much less may he do violence to his country."
> What answer shall we have to this, Crito? Do the laws speak truly or do they not?
> Crito: "I think that they do."

I prophesy that, when this Bill becomes law, every man who appreciates his duty will say to the people, "Obey the law;" and I believe that there is no part of Canada where the law will be better obeyed than in the province of Quebec.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Notwithstanding the very many differences which have found expression on both sides of the House during the discussion of this subject, I think we shall agree that I should not occupy very much time at this very early hour of the morning, and I do not propose to do so. In fact, I almost hesitate to say anything.

My honourable friends on the opposite side, particularly my French Canadian colleagues, have so criticised me for the alleged emphatic language in which I indulged, that I approach the further discussion of this subject with very great diffidence. However, I should like to say to my honourable friends, from whom I have always received the best of good-will and the most gentlemanly courtesy, that I certainly had not those honourable gentlemen in view, nor specially the French Canadians as a people, in speaking upon this subject. In no way during the course of my remarks did I refer to Quebec, nor did I refer to the French Canadian people by name. What I had reference to was disloyalty wherever it had been uttered throughout the Dominion. I am unaware that we have arrived at that very delicate state of society, and particularly in the carrying on of parliamentary discussion, when we find it undesirable to rebuke disloyalty wherever it may be expressed. I believe that when disloyalty raises its head, no matter whether in Quebec or Ontario, we should strike it. From the Atlantic to the Pacific, during this war, in all the large centres of Canada, disloyalty at times has been indulged in openly. It has appeared in the press. It has been expressed by speakers not only in the province of Quebec, but in the western provinces; and it is the duty of my French Canadian friends, as well as the English-speaking members on this side of the House, to rebuke it whenever and wherever it finds expression. Let it not be overlooked that we have in the Dominion of Canada over a million aliens from Europe—aliens who have come here and avail themselves of all the advantages of our institutions, of all the assistance given them by our Government, of all the advantages of our civilization; and, notwithstanding all that, those aliens bring to this country their prejudices, and they make no hesitation in expressing utterances subversive of good government and national unity. I have in view certain western cities where utterances have found expression of such character that in continental Europe those who expressed them would at once pay the penalty of the traitor. Therefore, if I have expressed myself strongly in regard to the public indifference which has been shown not only in response to recruiting, but in many circles in the denunciation by such people of the Government in the carrying on of the war, I hope honourable gentlemen will understand my feelings in regard to this subject.

Hon. Mr. POWER: For one, I accept the honourable gentleman's apology.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is no apology about it, and I may say again that if similar conditions come under my observation I shall feel myself at liberty to express myself quite as strongly as I did in introducing this Bill.

Now, permit me to say that, this Bill having been introduced, it is right to presume that the Government had a reason for what they have done. It was not introduced until the Prime Minister returned on the last occasion from England. He was made acquainted with such facts as not only suggested but rendered it necessary that the Government should introduce conscription. As reflecting the opinion of the Imperial House upon this subject, let me read some remarks made by the Right Hon. Mr. Balfour on the introduction of the Conscription Bill in the British House of Commons. He said:

> The credit of the Government and the credit of the House of Commons—these are great things. But there is something even greater, and that is the safety and success of the country. Let me say with the utmost emphasis that on this point those who have looked into the matter entertain no doubts whatever. We on this bench who have looked into the matter are of opinion that this Bill is a necessity. I have learnt from the authorized sources of public opinion that there are divisions in the Cabinet. I have learnt from the daily press a great deal about my own opinions and about the opinions of my colleagues. But this I can inform everybody, for what it is worth: There is not one member of the Government who does not hold that this Bill is a Bill essential for the proper carrying on of the war. If the House refuses this Bill to the Government they are refusing to the Government what the Government are clearly of opinion is a military necessity.

He was followed by Mr. Asquith and Mr. Bonar Law, who also insisted strongly on the military necessity, and on the advice given by the Government experts. I need not say that that opinion was strongly impressed upon the Prime Minister of this Dominion, and in the exercise of the very important duties which fell upon his shoulders he assumed the responsibility of advising his Government that this Bill must be introduced into Parliament. Accordingly Parliament has been asked to adopt it.

Now, my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock) has moved an amendment that this Bill should not come into operation until after the general election. Since Tuesday last we have been regaled by honourable gentlemen on the opposite side of the House who have spoken on the subject, condemning this Bill in the strongest language which they could use. They not only condemned the principle of the Bill, but they cast aspersions on the good faith of the Government as to the manner in which the Bill would be carried out if passed, and they furthermore informed us that even if passed it could not be enforced. Notwithstanding this disapproval of the Bill, particularly of the principle of the Bill, we have the peculiar situation presented to us by my honourable friend introducing an amendment approving of the principle of the Bill and yet asking for its delay. In view of their denunciation of the Bill, when the division is taken will my honourable friends be prepared to support the principle of the Bill? I shall look forward with a very great deal of interest and curiosity to see how my honourable friends will vote.

Various reasons have been advanced as to why this Bill should not be made effective. My honourable friend who introduced the amendment made the suggestion that in his judgment the opinion of the electorate should be obtained before determining whether further support should be given to our forces in the field.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Will my honourable friend excuse me? The argument that I tried to make was that the Government could make a further effort in the way of voluntary enlistment, and could defer putting the Bill into force until after the election.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Notwithstanding that, my honourable friend made the statement that the opinion of the electorate should be taken as to whether further support should be given to our forces. I made a note of it at the time. His remark may have been made unwittingly; if so, I gladly withdraw my statement. However, the attitude taken by my honourable friend, and by the honourable gentlemen who have supported him, is one, it seems to me, of very deep humiliation. At the beginning of the war Canada committed itself to the policy of carrying this war to a conclusive issue. We have pledged our honour, we have pledged everything we possess as a people in order to carry this war to a successful end; and to think that at this crucial moment, a moment more crucial than any which has yet arisen during this war, it is suggested that this Bill, which must necessarily furnish the reinforcements which we shall send to the front, and by which alone we can do it, should be left, like Mahomet's coffin, suspended between heaven and earth! It seems to me that the people of Canada should realize the discredit that must issue from such a course.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yet Sir Robert Borden suggested that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend knows very well that if the proposals made by the Prime Minister to the leader of the Opposition had been accepted, this Bill would have been passed and put into operation at a very early date.

Now, in what way would the honourable gentleman put this Bill into operation if it is passed? My honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) entered into a very learned and interesting disquisition on the ethnology of the French race, and advanced that as a reason why the Bill should not be put into operation. My honourable friend seriously advanced this as a reason why his countrymen in Quebec should not be called upon to fight the battles of the Empire.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am sorry that my honourable friend does not exactly reproduce my idea. That is not the reason that the appeals which were made to them —by myself and others—should not be answered. I was simply expressing an opinion as to the state of mind and the comparative slowness with which they were answering, and I showed that as between the British-born and the Canadian-born there was the same difference.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does not my honourable friend think that their minds should be quickened?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have been doing what I could to accomplish that, and I am still ready to go on.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I hope my honourable friend will join us.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Not with conscription.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards) has advanced another reason why conscription should not be put into operation. He seemed to have a pessimistic moment, and concluded that we could not afford to carry on the war. He advanced that as a reason why we should practically abandon the policy which we have pursued up to the present time. For the purpose of encouraging him and leading him to revise his opinion, and to show him that the country is not going to the dogs, I would point out the great increase in the volume of trade during the past year, which is a very fair criterion of the prosperity of the country. I might say that the figures for the fiscal year 1915-16 show an increase of 130 per cent.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: How much of it was bacon?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not necessarily bacon nor munitions—and an advance over 1916 of 69 per cent. My honourable friend also pointed out the fact—and I hope that he did not give serious thought to it—that he did not approve of the well-established constitutional doctrine that when the Empire is at war Canada must necessarily be at war. My honourable friend was of the opinion that we could pick and choose what wars we should enter. Does he not know that we are regarded by Britain's enemies as belligerents, no matter whether we remain passive or become active.

I was very much interested in the ideas of some of my honourable friends opposite as to the service which we should render the Empire in carrying on this war. My honourable friends seemed to be of the opinion that our people should become engaged and entirely absorbed in producing food products at war prices, and munitions at wage rates 100 per cent above normal. That appeals to me as a rather extraordinary conception of the service which Canada should render to the Empire, particularly when a paucity of our men are fighting in the trenches for liberty and human rights. If that is the ideal seriously entertained by our friends in Quebec—and they have laid it down in all seriousness on this occasion—then I must say that I am not hopeful of that province taking a more patriotic view of the situation than it is doing to-day. What would be thought of the people of Great Britain, or the people of France, or the people of Belgium, or of the people of any of our Allies, if they were to say: "We are not going into the field, we are not going to enter upon active service, we are not going to face the enemy and pay the supreme sacrifice," which millions of men are doing; "but we are going to produce food, we are going to manufacture munitions at a profit of 100 per cent beyond what we have been receiving in the past." I hope that honourable gentlemen do not seriously entertain such opinions. In the face of the pledges made, and particularly in view of the advocacy of the voluntary system, what hope have we from the voluntary system if my honourable friends will not give it any more assistance than they have done in the past? Do the sentiments expressed by them give us an earnest that it would be worth while trying, particularly in Quebec, to depend on the voluntary system and for this reason to reject this Conscription Bill, which we have been forced to introduce, and upon which we must necessarily rely?

Notwithstanding the surprise manifested by my honourable friends in this matter, they seem to have entirely overlooked the fact that in 1904, during the régime of the Laurier Government, a Conscription Bill was placed on the statute book, a Bill more drastic than the Bill which we are now considering. And, to make it more drastic than ever, after the South African war, the Prime Minister, then Sir Wilfrid Laurier, introduced an amendment into the Bill, which honourable gentlemen will find in the recital now before us, making it operative beyond Canada, and adopting all the drastic clauses which had been in the previous Bill. Yet we hear not a word in regard to this being the law of the land since 1904.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Oh, it was long before that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It dates back to 1868; but I am speaking of the period when it was so amended as to place beyond peradventure the object of the Bill, namely, to give the power to send forces beyond the seas.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The text on that point was the same. "The King" was changed to "Governor General," that is all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I need not elaborate upon any distinction between the Bills, except to say that the Bill which we are now considering provides for the selective system, and is admittedly superior in every respect, and very much more moderate than the Act of 1904.

At this point I wish to say, if my honourable friends are intent upon moving this amendment, and if this Bill were to be defeated, that, inasmuch as the Government has absolutely committed itself to maintaining 500,000 men in the field and sending reinforcements to them from time to time, they might feel it incumbent upon them to put into force the Militia Act. This amendment is moved for the purpose not only of delaying but of defeating the Bill. It has already been pointed out and elaborated upon that the bill provides for selective conscription. The advantages of this system have already been dwelt upon at great length.

In 1904 Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as I have said, placed upon the statute book a system of conscription by ballot, under section 70 of the Militia Act, and re-enacted by section 69, chapter 41, of the Revised Statutes of 1906, as set forth in the preamble of the Bill now under consideration. That section is as follows:

> The Governor in Council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada, and also beyond Canada, for the defence thereof, at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

Enrolment under that Act is by ballot. As a conscriptive system, the Laurier Act is more drastic in its compulsory features than the Bill now under consideration. I have authority for saying that if this amendment is carried and the Bill is thus practically defeated, the Government will be compelled to give their serious consideration to giving effect to the Laurier Conscription Act, for the purpose of furnishing reinforcements necessary to support our men in the field.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: We are willing to let you do that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend could not prevent it.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: What is the position?

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If, therefore, the Laurier Conscription Act should press more heavily upon Canada in the raising of the necessary forces, the responsibility will rest upon those responsible for the defeat of the present Bill.

I have nothing further to say, except to appeal to your sense of patriotism, to your sense of honour, to support the men already in the field. In the name of the thousands of Canada's sons who have shed their blood in France and Belgium, let us break away from these racial and political differences, and in a patriotic spirit show ourselves sufficiently unanimous and sufficiently patriotic to support a Bill which is necessary for the carrying on of this war.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: May I ask a question?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: In view of the position in which my honourable friend places me and several others who are opposed to the Conscription Bill, what would he say of the many who opposed the Conscription Bill in Great Britain, where there are no racial differences?

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: They are slackers.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Then, with regard to the Boer war, what would my honourable friend say of the great opposition that there was in England, led by the gentleman who is now Lord Bryce? In what position do you place him?

Some Hon. SENATORS: A slacker.

Other Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Then, when war was declared and the Honourable John Burns and the now Lord Morley resigned from the Government, in what position would you put those honourable gentlemen? Where would you place the minister of the Crown who retired, Sir John Simons, I think it was, when the Conscription Bill went into effect?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would come to the conclusion tnat they were not serving their country as they should. I would say they were slackers. I do not care how distinguished as ministers of the Crown they may have been, they were cowardly in not facing their responsibilities.

Before the question of the amendment was put:

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I would like to say that I do not intend to vote on the amendment, but I propose to vote for the second reading of the Bill.

The Senate divided on the proposed amendment of Hon. Mr. Bostock:

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE.

On the Order:

Consideration of the amendments made in Committee of the Whole House to Bill 66, an Act to amend the Judges Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, if there is a disposition on the part of the House to give a third reading to this Bill as it has been amended in committee, I desire to say that some of the amendments do not meet the view of the Government as to what should be incorporated in the Bill. For instance, the amendment respecting the superannuation of judges should be so qualified that judges who have been appointed since the passage of the superannuation clause should be permitted to take advantage of the rights to which, under the statute as it is at present, they are manifestly entitled. Undoubtedly many of those judges, if not all of them, in accepting office, would necessarily have those particular advantages in view. Inasmuch as an Act of Parliament constitutes practically a contract between the governing power and the appointee, the proposed amendment would manifestly deprive them of rights which are of substantial advantage to them.

There is this other phase of the question, that many of those judges who were appointed even before the passage of the Act have gone beyond their fifteen years at the end of which they could have been superannuated, and have been awaiting the effluxion of the time provided for in the Act so that they may take advantage of its provisions. That class of judge would thus be excluded from the provisions of the statute.

The question as to the relation of judges to commissions is a matter of policy. I am not prepared to pronounce on that question except to say that, owing to the very great pressure of work on the Government, it has not been able to give proper consideration to it; so that I am unable to say that the Government is favourable to it. The matter still remains in abeyance. In fact, I observe from the Order Paper that notices have been given by, I think, two different honourable gentlemen as to further proposed amendments. Should the House consider it desirable to adopt the amendments which have already been made, and to give consideration to those which will be moved upon the third reading, I can only say that the Bill will doubtless have to be considered in the House of Commons; and the probability is that further amendments will be made there, looking to remedying the difficulty which I have pointed out, particularly in the clause regarding the advantages to which judges are entitled by reason of full superannuation. I leave it entirely with the House whether or not we should give the third reading to the Bill as it is.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman has stated a case which, I think, goes to show that, on the whole, the wiser course would be to refer the Bill back to the Committee of the Whole, so that we may discuss the proposed amendments and the amendments which have already been made. I may say for my own part that one or two of the amendments which have been made do not meet with my humble approval. I think that to discuss these various clauses in the House is not as convenient as it would be to discuss them in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think we can discuss them better there, and then report progress, and let the Bill stand till Wednesday.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Perhaps in a day or two the movers of the amendments will be in a position to agree.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Why not refer the Bill back to the Committee of the Whole House now, and have the amendments made to-day? I would move that.

Hon. Mr. POWER: One of the reasons is that there is a very slim attendance, and, further, I think that these amendments require consultation and consideration before being dealt with.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We might make some progress with the amendments, so that we may have an appreciation of the particular parts of the Bill to which they are directed; the committee could then rise and report progress. If that is the view of the House, I am quite willing that we should go into committee and deal with the other proposed amendments.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I should like to ask the leader of the Government if I understood him to say that he thought there was an objection to these amendments because they were in the nature of retroactive legislation, and whether that consideration has governed him in making the suggestion that the Bill should be referred back.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot say to my honourable friend that the amendment is retroactive in form, but it certainly has that effect. It seriously affects the rights of those judges appointed since the passage of the Act, and likewise the rights of those appointed before the passage of the Act whose services have continued since.

Hon. Mr. POWER: They have been paid.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: The honourable the leader of the House has alluded to other amendments which were to be moved. I gave notice that when the Bill came up for a third reading I would propose the following amendment:

> Provided that nothing in this law will preclude judges acting or being appointed under provincial laws to investigate municipal matters.

I move my amendment because the effect of the amendments adopted is to abrogate provincial laws under which investigations into municipal matters take place. If the amendments are not made, my amendment will naturally drop.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There are two distinct things, perhaps three, before the House in connection with this Bill. The amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) might perhaps very well stand till Wednesday. Then there is the amendment moved by the honourable member for Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) to section 33 of the Act, which is similar to one that I suggested. Now, I want to move to restore my original amendment, in which case the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman would not be requisite. I moved an amendment to the effect that when judges are appointed by any lawful authority to act on a commission they may so act, but that they shall not be paid any salary—nothing but travelling fees and expenses. That would probably meet the honourable gentleman's views. The honourable gentleman from Ottawa moved that judges should not act as commissioners at all. I think that the amendment which I proposed would meet the situation. Then, I have given notice of a motion to add two new sections to the Judges Act, as sections 34 and 35. If honourable gentlemen will excuse me for a moment I will explain why I propose these sections. Section 96 of the British North America Act provides:

> The Governor General shall appoint the judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts in each province.

Section 100 provides that the Parliament shall pay the judges. Then, when we go back to section 92, subsection 14, we find this:

> The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance, and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts.

These are provincial matters. There is an argument that section 33 of the Judges Act is ultra vires of this Parliament; that is to say, that the working out of section 33 may involve some interference with the maintenance and organization of the provincial courts. Therefore I propose sections 34 and 35, and have kept myself entirely within sections 96 and 100 of the British North America Act, which give us the exclusive right to fix the salaries of the judges. I will read the sections which I propose:

> 34. No judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or any Superior, District or County Court shall receive or be paid any salary or allowance except as provided by the Parliament of Canada.

35. On proof being made to the Minister of Justice of the payment or receipt of any such salary or allowance, he shall forthwith order it to be deducted from the salary provided by the Parliament of Canada.

The Senate then went into Committee on the Bill, Hon. Mr. Girroir in the Chair.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I need not repeat what I have already stated. I now move that sections 34 and 35 be added to the Act.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: After looking over the Bill carefully, it seems to me that the method proposed by the honourable gentleman (Hon. W. B. Ross) for accomplishing what he aims at is not the best method that can be devised. In the first place, the more one looks into this question and sees the increasing work which has been put upon the judges from year to year by provincial governments and federal governments, the more easily one will understand the difficulty of preventing the judges from doing what is regarded by the provincial governments and other bodies in the country as a very important and useful work, and one which the Provincial Government has provided shall be paid for when done by the judges. I have always been in favour of the judges being paid full compensation for their services, but nothing beyond that, and of their whole time being given to the work naturally belonging to their office; but after a while we found that their remuneration was being increased all the time, especially by the Provincial Government. There was work assigned to them which up to that time they had never been accustomed to do, and which they never did. Under the Mowat régime in Ontario it was provided that, if a dispute arose between school sections, a county court judge should be the arbitrator to settle the dispute, and that he should be paid $20 or $25 a day for the time that he was engaged in that work. That is the first I remember of these innovations by the Provincial Government. Afterwards work was given to them in the surrogate courts, for which I think they received remuneration. Following that there was work in connection with drains and watercourses assigned to the judges. I think provision was made that they should be paid for this work. They seemed to be the natural and only available men likely to do it satisfactorily. About that time, or shortly after, we enacted here, at the instance of Mackenzie King, the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. That Act was discussed at great length in the other chamber, of which I was a member at the time, and the judges were selected as the most suitable men to deal with it, for the reason that they would command the confidence of the labour element of the country more fully than laymen. I contended that the Act should go further and be a compulsory arbitration act, but it was decided otherwise. I have been told, and I believe correctly, that the judges have done a great deal of work along that line, and generally speaking their decisions have been respected by the labour element of the country. If that be the fact, as I believe it to be, it seems to me that it would hardly be wise to prevent them doing this kind of work. From year to year, we find the provincial and federal governments constantly loading more work on the judges. At another time the duty was imposed upon them of revising the provincial voters' list. The federal Parliament had assigned to them a duty in connection with the administration of the Franchise Act. A revising officer was to be appointed, either a judge of the county court or some man who was not a judge. Generally speaking, it was a judge of the county court, and for performing that duty he was allowed $200 for each constituency dealt with. That was a valuable work, and it was generally believed that no one else could do it and still command the same respect as a judge. Of course, the Franchise Act was later repealed, and that work was removed from the shoulders of the judges; but they are still revising the provincial lists. The judges are continually having more and more work to do, work that no one else seems as capable of doing, while still commanding the respect of the people. That being the case, it seems to me that it would be hardly wise to bind the judges down to take so much salary and no more, while at the same time loading them up with more work. Its seems to me that if that were done, the only course that would be proper and legitimate, and that would do no injustice to the judges, would be to strike their salaries in very much the same way as the provincial governments fix the salaries of registrars. For some years they were paid by fees, but it was found that while some registry offices received entirely too much in the aggregate the receipts of others were so low that the remuneration was not fair. Hence the provincial legislature enacted that where the fees amounted to more than a fair compensation for the registrar, he should be paid what was regarded as a fair compensation, and the surplus should revert to the consolidated revenue fund of the province, whereas if the fees did not make up the amount to which he was entitled the balance would be paid out of that fund. As a layman, I make the suggestion, which may be very crude and improper, that the remuneration of the judges might be worked out in the same way. I quite agree with the honourable senator (Hon. W. B. Ross) that there is no question as to the right of the federal Government to strike the judges' salaries and pay them; but when we strike those salaries we should make provision that, when we load more work on the judges, they may receive further remuneration from other sources until the sum reaches what Parliament regards as their whole compensation for the year, and that if they receive more than that, the balance should go into the consolidated revenue fund of the country to be used for other purposes. This would permit of the judges' services being available, in cases in which other men could not take their places and command the same respect and confidence of the people of the country. By that plan their salaries could not be too small, because we would fix them at a fair rate, and they would in any event be ensured a full compensation for their whole year's services. If these amendments are adopted, we shall find ourselves in much greater difficulties than we have had in the past. They would require careful consideration by the House of Commons as well as by the Senate, and I think also there would need to be consultation with the various provincial governments before we could reach a satisfactory basis that would do no injustice to any one.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The honourable gentleman has evidently forgotten altogether the Act that was passed in 1906, known as the Judges Act, which increased the salaries of the judges fifty per cent or more. Through that statute a bargain was made with the judges that, in consideration of that increase, which in Nova Scotia was from $4,000 to $6,000 in the case of the Superior Court judges, and proportionately large in the case of the County Court judges, they were to give their whole time to the duties of their office. Now, as they are to give their whole time for the salaries fixed by the Parliament of Canada, if a County Court judge leaves his court, to which he owes all his duties, and goes out to revise a list or goes out as a commissioner, there is no reason why he should be paid anything for such work, because he cannot be in two places at once, and is none the worse off. Every one who knows anything about the judiciary in this country knows that many Superior Court judges are not worked half their time, and that many County Court judges are not occupied for one-fifth of their time. Further than that, the honourable gentleman should bear in mind the great danger to the independence of the judiciary through not having their salaries fixed at a certain sum, and allowing a set of circumstances to be created under which judges will be out canvassing for commissions in order to add to their salaries. I do not think the judges of this country have anything at all to complain of; they are generously treated as to amount of salary, and also as to retiring allowance as it stood in 1906. In the proposal I made to amend section 33 I had this clause:

> No judge of any of the courts mentioned in section 33 of said Act who may be appointed by any competent authority a member of any commission, or to any duty outside his usual judicial duties shall receive any pay for such services, but may receive necessary travelling and living expenses.

The honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) brought in another amendment, which I think was agreed to in Committee of the Whole, prohibiting the judges from acting as commissioners at all. I think perhaps that would be going too far, and that the original amendment I had would better meet the circumstances. If the Dominion or a province chooses to appoint a Superior or County Court judge on a commission, he may act, and may receive his travelling and living expenses; but if he is drawing a salary of $20 or $30 a day as a judge, and leaves his court house to go somewhere else, I do not see why he should continue to draw that salary as a judge and also receive another $25 a day as a commissioner. That is one of the things that is sapping the independence of the judiciary of this country.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: The honourable senator intimated that I was unacquainted with the Judges Act of 1906. On the contrary, I took a lively interest in it at that time, and it was I who raised the question in regard to their salaries, and who induced the Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick to amend the Act, making it imperative that the judges should obey it. I claimed that it would not be respected because the judges would say that it had never been brought to their attention. Therefore at my suggestion the Minister of Justice sent a circular to all judges individually so that they would be familiar with the Act and not violate it. But what did we find afterwards? Although it was brought specially to their attention in that way, we found a persistent violation of the law; judges went on doing commission work as previously, acting in other capacities. Thus the Act, though sufficiently specific and binding, was not respected by the judges. From that experience, and from the fact that the people wanted the judges to act in certain matters, I thought we should adopt some other method than the one we had provided for up to that time.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I favour to a very large extent the amendments that are offered with the exception that I do not like retroactive legislation; I think it is not seemly, expecially in the case of judges, as personal matters are involved. I know that if this legislation became law it would cause a very considerable disability on the part of some judges with whom I am personally acquainted, who, though quite competent for their duties, might have resigned years ago. In their case this legislation would be entirely inequitable. I believe I voted for that amendment, but, after thinking the matter over, it does not seem to me quite equitable to pass it as it is written. Why make an exception with regard to the pension of any judge who has been retired, if you do not apply the exception to all of those who are eligible to retire? I would suggest an addition like this to section 5 of the Bill :

> But this section shall not apply to any judge appointed before the passing of this Act.

I would then be very glad to vote for it. That would relieve all who are appointees at the present time, and would not alter the conditions under which they assumed office.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understood that the honourable senator from Middleton was discussing the clauses in the order in which he proposed to add them to the Bill. My honourable friend from St John is now discussing another of the clauses in the Bill. I suggest that we discuss one cause at a time.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: What I was discussing was an amendment suggested by my honourable friend from Halifax.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But that is an amendment that passed. I think we had better get down to some order.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The motion before the Committee is to add sections 34 and 35.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: In my opinion sections 34 and 35 as proposed ought not to be adopted, for reasons which were pointed out a few minutes ago. So far as the labour interests are concerned, I believe that the success of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act in its application has been due very largely to the fact that our judges have served as chairmen of the boards of conciliation, either agreed upon by the other representatives, or appointed by the Minister of Labour. The Industrial Disputes Investigation Act was passed, I think, in 1907, though opposed by every labour man in Canada. But we profess to be law-abiding men, and we worked under it. I happened to be one of a committee that made application for the first board that sat after the law was passed. Since that time, I have prosecuted many cases for the employees, and have sat on some five or six boards as representing employees.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENY: Has it worked satisfactorily?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Generally, yes.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENY: It is the so-called Lemieux Act you have reference to?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: Yes. I desire to point out that workingmen have a natural suspicion—perhaps that is not the right term, but I will use it—that all arbitrations are apt to be one-sided in the sense that the employing interests usually have more opportunity to use influence with members of the board than have the employees. That may be a mistaken idea; nevertheless it prevails. Now, since our judges are being largely used as chairmen of boards of conciliation, the labouring men feel that they are, or at least should be, entirely free from any outside influence, or interest. I will mention, as one illustration of this, that some years ago the engineers and firemen of ninety-one different railroads west of Chicago had a big arbitration case under the Newlands Act, and one of the ostensibly neutral arbitrators on that board owned largely the stock of one of the railroads in dispute, and was trustee for some twelve million dollars more owned by other people. The result was that when that was found out the employees asked that that gentleman be removed from the board. Their request was declined, and they said: "Never again will this organization agree to arbitrate any dispute." And what happened? Only last year, when the eight-hour movement came up, strong pressure was brought upon those organizations to arbitrate. They said: "No, we have had our experience; no more of that." The workingmen have greater confidence in the integrity and fairness of our judges than they have in any other class of men in this country. They believe that the judge is disinterested and ought to be fair to both sides. Moreover we believe that the judges are particularly well schooled and have practical ability in sifting evidence, which a layman has not, and are able to distinguish between reasons and excuses which may be offered by either party to a dispute. Then, again, the respect that labouring men and, we believe, employers, have for judges, and their confidence in them, tend to make the parties accept the opinions expressed in the awards more readily than they would if the awards were made by a layman. Furthermore, we believe that the public at large have more confidence in the judgment of members of the judiciary than they would have in that of laymen. The consequence is that both employers and the representatives of employees are more careful about refusing to accept the award of a board of conciliation when a judge has been the chairman of it than is the case where the chairman is a layman. I may say that, in my own experience as a representative of the Order of Railroad Telegraphers, we have not once declined to accept the award of a board of which a judge was chairman, though a number of cases were decided against us. The same has not been true when gentlemen other than judges were chairmen of boards. I do not want to delay you unnecessarily, honourable gentlemen, but I feel that sections 34 and 35 as introduced by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) are not desirable and are not in the best interest of the public welfare; because we believe that they would seriously interfere with whatever efficiency of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act has shown in the past, and would perhaps to a great extent lessen its usefulness in the future; for I do not believe that judges will consent to serve on boards unless they are paid the statutory allowance provided for in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: With the honourable gentleman's permission, I would like to ask him who settled that dispute in the United States, in which 91 railroads were involved? Was it not the President and the Senate of the United States?

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: No. What I wanted to convey to this honourable House was that the Chicago case to which I referred was settled by arbitration, but that the results were so unsatisfactory that the employees declined to again agree to submit a case to arbitration. There is no saving to the country, honourable gentlemen, in depriving the judges of this work, because somebody else will be paid the amount the judges now receive, for rendering similar service. My humble opinion is that judges dispose more expeditiously of disputes than do laymen; and that has been our experience on boards of conciliation. The judges know the procedure and can dispose of the case and report the evidence within a few days; whereas, if a layman is acting as chairman of the board, he very often permits both parties to run wild, and much more time is consumed and much more expense is entailed. So, while I am not contending that judges are the only men competent to sit on boards of conciliation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, I do respectfully affirm that they are, as a class, the most satisfactory men. My opinion is—and I feel sure that there are very many persons connected with the labour movement in Canada who feel as I do—that it would be a serious detriment to the welfare of the working people—indeed, to the industrial peace of the country—were we prevented from having judges available to serve on these boards.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson) has, I think, made it clear that it is most desirable that the Government should not be precluded from employing judges in these inquiries under the Lemieux Act; but it occurs to me that the proposed clause 34 suggested by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross), does not really hinder or prevent the employment of judges in such cases. The Government of Canada is charged with the administration of the Lemieux Act, and I think that the difficulty can be overcome by having an amount placed in the estimates, to be paid of course out of the Consolidated Fund, to meet the expenses of these Lemieux Act investigations. I am disposed to think now that the best way is for us to discuss this matter a little further, and then draft a Bill which will harmonize all views. I think the honourable gentleman from Middleton will recognize the fact that under the wording of his amendment Parliament could appropriate a sum of money to be used for defraying the amounts paid to the judges under these inquiries.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I wish to say that I am entirely in accord with the remarks made by the honourable gentleman from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson). I have tried to meet his views. I tried to explain earlier in the day that the amendment made by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), which precludes the judges from acting as commissioners, was really destructive of an amendment which I had proposed, and that I wanted to go back to my original amendment, which would allow any competent authority—that is, the Parliament of Canada or the legislatures of the provinces—to appoint a judge as a commissioner or an arbitrator. But, inasmuch as the salaries of judges are, under the British North America Act, entirely assigned to the Parliament of Canada and not under a divided jurisdiction, if the judges are to be paid for other work I want to have that provided for by the Parliament of Canada. I quite understand that there are many cases, where the disputing parties would prefer to have a judge as chairman of a board. When the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from Halifax is rescinded, if the House so decides, I shall move for the restoration of the amendment which I proposed at first. It contains nothing which would prevent what the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Robertson) asks for. The thing will work out quite easily.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER: I should like to ask the honourable gentleman from Middleton if he would mind having added to the proposed section 34 the following words:

Provided that nothing herein contained shall be held to prevent a judge from receiving the allowance provided for a member of a board of conciliation and investigation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No; nor from receiving anything provided for by the Parliament of Canada. You may add as many provisions as you like.

[Hon. W. B. ROSS.]

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER: That means that under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act the judge would be entitled to $20 a day.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Well, the Parliament of Canada can provide for that.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER: The honourable gentleman is perfectly willing to have that added to section 34? If so, that would cover ground.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: You cannot prevent judges from acting on boards of conciliation if they so desire.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER: The honourable gentleman from Welland spoke from the labour point of view; and, as a shareholder in one of the coal companies at Lethbridge, I should not like to see anything arise which would prevent judges from sitting upon those arbitration boards. Both sides in a labour dispute would feel satisfied that they were receiving justice from a judge. The owners on their part hold the same opinion in this respect as the labour men; both sides are sure that a judge from his experience in court, is able to bring out evidence clearly and to decide whether certain evidence submitted is pertinent and good. Both sides are better pleased to have a judge to preside at investigations into industrial disputes than a layman, and, to my mind, it lessens the possibility of a strike.

Hon. Mr. ROBERTSON: I would be perfectly in favour of the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Lethbridge (Hon. Mr. De Veber). With respect to the point raised by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) my understanding of the application of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act is that it is optional with a judge to accept or refuse an appointment on a board. The law provides that the employer shall nominate one representative and the employees another, and the two so appointed may agree upon a third. It is optional with the third so chosen, who in many cases has been a judge, to act or not. In my experience as a board member representing the employees, I have agreed with the employer's representative upon the nomination of a judge as chairman of the board. I have in mind three such cases. The judge was in no way compelled to act if he did not so choose. Likewise, if a judge is appointed by the Minister of Labour in the event of the two disputing parties not agreeing upon a chairman, I do not understand that under the Act the judge is compelled to serve; and, if he is not paid the allowance stipulated in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, I fear he will not be inclined to serve. That is my objection to the amendment as proposed by the honourable gentleman from Middleton. The amendment which the honourable gentleman from Lethbridge (Hon. Mr. De Veber) suggests is perfectly agreeable to me.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: What I desire to point out to the honourable gentleman is that the judges are officers of the Dominion Government, and that they should take up and discharge any duty which the Government may choose to assign to them; and I do not see why a judge acting under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act should get $50 a day, while a brother judge otherwise engaged gets $20. But there should be no difficulty in working out the matter. I do not want to do anything which would have the effect of preventing judges from being ordered by the Dominion Parliament to go outside of their judicial duties.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER: I would move in amendment to the proposed section 34 that the words I have read be added hereto.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I want to point out to the honourable gentleman that my section provides that the judge shall get whatever the Parliament of Canada provides for. The amendment moved by the honourable gentleman does not strengthen it a bit.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me, honourable gentlemen, that section 34, as it stands, would permit of a judge receiving, in addition to his salary, such allowance as may be fixed by any other Act. It seems to me also that it would be unnecessary to amend it in the way in which my honourable friend from Lethbridge has proposed. My attention has just been directed to that word "allowance."

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER: The honourable gentleman thinks the amendment would not be needed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should think not. That is to say, the judge is not only entitled to his salary, but also to any allowances provided by the Parliament of Canada. If the Parliament of Canada pass a statute making provision for fees and charges, he clearly would be entitled to those in addition to his salary.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER: The Parliament of Canada under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act provides for the payment of $20 a day to the chairman of a board of conciliation and investigation. It does not say whether as a judge he would receive it or not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would make no difference.

Hon. Mr. POWER: That is all right.

Hon. Mr. DE VEBER: I am perfectly willing to withdraw my amendment.

The proposed section 34 was agreed to.

On the proposed section 35:

On proof being made to the Minister of Justice of the payment or receipt of any such salary or allowance he shall forthwith order it to be deducted from the salary provided by the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Sections 34 and 35 are drafted strictly in accordance with the British North America Act, which makes the judges officers of the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would suggest inserting the words "by any other authority" after the words "such salary or allowance."

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: In that case what is desired by my honourable friend from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. David) could not be allowed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. It will be germane for the honourable gentleman to move his amendment.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I intend to move this amendment as an addition to section 6 of the Bill as reprinted:

Provided that nothing in this law will preclude judges acting or being appointed under provincial laws to investigate municipal matters.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think this proviso would come in better under section 35.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think the honourable gentleman should have a full opportunity of discussing the amendment, but I think it would be better in connection with section 33.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not wish to say anything against the motion of the honourable gentleman from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. David), but it seems to me that if this motion is passed, the amendment proposed by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) will disappear. We have just made provision for investigations under the Industrial Disputes Act, and now we are providing for the appointment of judges under provincial laws to investigate municipal matters. I do not think there will be much of the honourable gentleman's amendment left.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Perhaps I should give the reasons why I have moved this amendment. We have two or three provincial laws in the province of Quebec, and especially one of which reads as follows:

Whenever the Lieutenant Governor in Council deems it expedient to cause inquiry to be made into and concerning any matter connected with the good government of the province, the conduct of any part of the public business, the administration of justice, any matter of importance relating to public health, or any matter connected with the good government of any municipality of the province, he may, by a commission issued to that effect, appoint one or more commissioners by whom such inquiry shall be conducted.

Those laws were asked for by a great number of the ratepayers in the province of Quebec, especially in Montreal, and if this proposed amendment is passed those provincial laws will be abrogated and all the municipalities in the province will be left without any law giving them the means of making investigations. I think we should hesitate before interfering with provincial legislation.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: While I agree with the principle of this amendment, I think that, so far as the county judges are concerned, it would be a great injustice. If I remember rightly, the salaries of the county judges range from $2,500 to $3,500. These salaries were fixed many years ago when the cost of living was a great deal less than it is now, and, unless the salaries of the county judges are increased to meet the present high cost of living, I would be opposed to the amendment.

The proposed section 35 was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DAVID then moved his amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Section 6 of the Bill, as reprinted, was not considered carefully by the Committee of the Whole after it was submitted to them. Honourable gentlemen will remember that the amendment was made hurriedly at the Table, without sufficient consideration being given to it, and it conflicts with two or three amendments that have already been made. Section 33 of the Act is amended by inserting after the word "Canada" in the third line:

shall act as a member of any commission or perform any duties outside of his judicial duties.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

That does not allow a judge to act as a member of any commission whatever, or to perform any duties outside of his judicial duties. My idea in suggesting that this Bill should remain in committee was that we might revise it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I propose that we now take a division upon the amendment moved by the honourable member for Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. David), and, that being disposed of, that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again. In the meantime further consideration can be given to those amendments.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The friends of the honourable gentleman from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. David) are not here to-day. Perhaps they should be, and—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let the amendments stand.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable the leader of the Government pointed out one or two, as he considered, serious objections to the amendment which I proposed, and which was adopted by the committee, with respect giving full pay to the judges during the whole of their lives. I may say that there is no injustice done to any judge who was appointed before the Act of 1904, because he continues under the same terms under which he accepted office. At that time there was no provision for full pay during his lifetime, and he is going to get two-thirds of his pay, as was then provided by the Act. It may be said that he has remained doing the work expecting that he would get more; but I say that he can remain as long as he pleases. The same is true with respect to a judge appointed since 1904. He can remain on the Bench as long as he is able to discharge his duties as a judge. He will receive full pay, and I do not think any hardship will result. I think this system of paying a number of gentlemen full pay for years after they have ceased giving any return to the public is a gross abuse and has no precedent anywhere.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 92, an Act respecting a certain Convention between His Majesty and the United States of America for the protection of migratory birds in Canada and the United States, Hon. Mr. Thompson in the Chair.

On section 1—short title:

Hon. Mr. BOYER: As one who was a representative of Canada at the International Institute of Agriculture, may I say a few words on the merits of this Bill?

It has taken the European nations over sixty years to realize the great utility of birds. In 1846 our bitter enemy of to-day, Germany, sought, in the interests of agriculture, to interest the other European nations in the depredation caused by insects in the fields, and in fact recognized that birds were the only possible remedy, although the opinion had prevailed in the time of Frederick the Great that birds were extracting too much for the good that they did. When the famous garden of Sans Souci was established plants were brought from all over Europe. Frederick thought that the birds were a nuisance, and ordered them to be slaughtered right and left. The people of Germany, following his example, slaughtered the birds, and with what result? In less than two years their gardens were wildernesses. The peasants of Germany, realizing the usefulness of the birds, interested in the matter the different scientific bodies of Europe, asking that an international treaty should be passed between all the nations of Europe for the protection of all birds useful to agriculture. It took them over sixty years to realize the great benefit. Let me say en passant that the representatives of the world at the International Institute in 1910 represented fifty-four nations. They were selected for the purpose of establishing laws that would be useful to agriculture the world over. What was the consequence? Little by little, through the influence of the delegates, the different European nations who, up to that time, had opposed the protection of birds, gradually fell into line and all agreed to a treaty for the protection of migratory birds, wherever found. Canada and the United States were asked to join in the treaty. The representative of the United States at the International Institute was the Hon. David Lubin, and the representative of Canada was your humble servant. We consulted together. Mr. Lubin consulted the American ambassador and I consulted the English ambassador, but we did not see how we could join with the European nations in protecting the birds. However, we said we would try to induce the Parliament of Canada and the Congress of the United States to pass a similar law, and it is my pleasant duty to-day to offer my congratulations to our new Allies to the South and to the Parliament of Canada on having reached such a conclusion.

Let me give you a few figures to show the enormous destruction of birds that has been going on in Europe. In 1887 there were over 500,000 quails slaughtered in Egypt. These figures are official, as nothing could leave Egypt without being recorded at the custom house and at the bureau of statistics. In 1888 there were 1,235,000; in 1889 there were 900,000. The total number of quails slaughtered in Egypt alone in the three years was 2,685,000. Those quails were sent either to Paris or London, which were the chief consumers of them. I have other official figures. In one year 114,000 larks were slaughtered in Egypt, where they had gone to protect themselves against the rigours of the northern climate, and they were sent back either to Paris or London to feed the gourmets of the two capitals. Count Salvadori, a great bird lover in Italy, has given very detailed statistics, in which he has indicated that in one trap alone, which the Italians call "il raccollo," in twenty years' time there were actually slaughtered 135,485 small birds, or an equivalent of about 60,000 a year. Another very useful law which has been passed is that prohibiting the use of feathers or wings of birds of any kind to ornament the hats of our beloved wives. Let me give you one figure. One house in Paris alone used over 400,000 wings of larks in ornamenting bonnets, which caused the remark of a certain divine one day, that whenever he got up in the pulpit it was like dominating a zoo, and he only wished he could say that all the ladies who wore feathers were birds of paradise. In giving these figures, I only want to establish the statistics furnished in Europe. Unfortunately we have none for Canada; but if you will allow me I will read some extracts as to the usefulness of bird life to Canada and to our neighbours to the south, which I think are worth reading Mr. Chester A. Reed, author of "Birds of North America, their Eggs and Nests," says this:

> The native birds are one of our nation's most valuable assets. Destroy them, and in a comparatively few years the insects will have multiplied to such an extent that trees will be denuded of their foliage, plants will cease to thrive and crops cannot be raised. This is not fancy but plain facts. Look at the little chickadee on the side of this page. She was photographed while entering a bird box, with about twenty-five plant lice to feed her seven young; about two hundred times a day, either she or her mate made trips with similar loads to fed the growing youngsters.

It has been found, by observation and dissection, that a Cuckoo consumes daily from 50 to 400 caterpillars or their equivalent, while a Chickadee will eat from 200 to 500 insects, or up to 4,000 insect or worm eggs. One hundred insects a day is a conservative estimate of the quantity consumed by each individual insectivorous bird. By carefully estimating the birds in several areas, I find that, in Massachusetts, there are not less than five insect-eating birds per acre. Thus this state with its 8,000 square miles has a useful bird population of not less than 25,600,000, which for each day's fare requires the enormous total of 2,560,000,000 insects. That such figures can be expressed in terms better understood, it has been computed that about 120,000 average insects fill a bushel measure. This means that the daily consumption, of chiefly obnoxious insects, in Massachusetts, is 21,000 bushels. This estimate is good for about five months in the year, May to September, inclusive; during the remainder of the year the insects, eggs and larvae destroyed by our winter, late fall and early spring migrants will be equivalent to nearly half this quantity.

It is the duty, and should be the pleasure, of every citizen, to do all in his or her power to protect these valuable creatures and to encourage them to remain about our homes. The author believes that the best means of protection is the disseminating of knowledge concerning them, and the creating of an interest in their habits and modes of life. With that object in view, this little book is prepared. May it serve its purpose and help those already interested in the subject, and may it be the medium for starting many others on the road to knowledge of our wild, feathered friends.

It is an undisputed fact that a great many of our birds are becoming more scarce each year, while a few are, even now, on the verge of extinction. The decrease in numbers of a few species may be attributed chiefly to the elements, such as a long continued period of cold weather or ice storms in the winter and rainy weather during the nesting season, however, in one way or another, and often unwittingly, man is chiefly responsible for the diminution in numbers. If I were to name the forces that work against the increase of bird life, in order of their importance, I should give them as: Man; the elements; accidents; cats; other animals; birds of prey, and snakes. I do not take into consideration the death of birds from natural causes, such as old age and disease, for these should be counterbalanced by the natural increase.

There are parts that each one of us can play in lessening the unnatural dangers that lurk along a bird's path in life. Individually, our efforts may amount to but little, perhaps the saving of the lives of two or three, or more, birds during the year, but collectively, our efforts will soon be felt in the bird world.

How can we protect the birds? Nearly all states have fairly good game laws, which if they could be enforced, would properly protect our birds from man, but they can not be; if our boys and girls are educated to realize the economic value of the birds and are encouraged to study their habits, the desire to shoot them or to rob them of their eggs will be very materially lessened. It is a common practice for some farmers to burn their land over in the spring, usually about nesting time. Three years ago, and as far back of that as I can remember, a small ravine or valley was teeming with bird life; it was the most favoured spot that I know of, for the variety and numbers of its bird tenants. Last year, towards the end of May, this place was deliberately burned over by the owner. Twenty-seven nests that I know of, some with young, others with eggs, and still others in the process of construction, were destroyed, besides hundreds of others that I had never seen. This year the same thing was done earlier in the season, and not a bird nested here, and, late in summer, only a few clumps of ferns have found courage to appear above the blackened ground. Farmers also cut off a great many patches of underbrush that might just as well have been left, thus, for lack of suitable places for their homes, driving away some of their most valuable assistants. The cutting off of woods and forests is an important factor in the decrease of bird life, as well as upon the climate of the country.

Our winter birds have their hardships when snow covers the weed tops, and a coating of ice covers the trees, so that they can neither get seeds nor grubs. During the nesting season we often have long-continued rains which sometimes cause an enormous loss of life to insect-eating birds and their young. In 1903, after a few weeks' steady rain and damp weather, not a Purple Martin could be found in Worcester county, nor, so far as I know, in New England; they were wholly unable to get food for either themselves or their young, and the majority of them left this region. The Martin houses, when cleaned out, were found to contain young, eggs and some adults that had starved rather than desert their family. The Martins did not return in 1904 and 1905.

Birds are subject to a great many accidents, chiefly caused by flying into objects at night. Telephone and telegraph wires maim or kill thousands, while lighthouses and steeples often cause the ground to be strewn with bodies during migrations. Other accidents are caused by storms, fatigue while crossing large bodies of water, nests falling from trees because of an insecure support, and ground nests being trod upon by man, horses and cattle.

In the vicinity of cities, towns, villages or farms, one of the most fertile sources of danger to bird life is from cats. Even the most gentle household pet, if allowed its liberty out of doors, will get its full quota of birds during the year, while houseless cats, and many that are not, will average several hundred birds apiece during the season. After years of careful observation, Mr. E. H. Forbush, Massachusetts state ornithologist, has estimated that the average number of birds killed, per cat population, is about fifty. If a dog kills sheep or deer, he is shot, and the owner has to pay damages; if a man is caught killing a bird, he pays a fine; but cats are allowed to roam about, without restriction, leaving death and destruction in their wake. All homeless cats should be summarily dealt with, and all pets should be housed, at least from May until August, when the young birds are able to fly.

I consider this very valuable information. We have in the birds not only protectors of our crops, but friends. I am sure there is not one in this House whose heart is not gladdened in the spring by the first note of our dear friend the robin, or of our dearest friend the nightingale. For myself, ever since I was a boy, I have always watched in the month of April for the first song of the robin and that first little chirp of the nightingale.

In opening my remarks I said that this was a wise measure, and I sincerely trust that its good effects will be felt all over the country for many years. It has taken Nature thousands of years to establish the equilibrium necessary for our earth to go round; and Nature has created birds for a purpose—to maintain the equilibrum between insect life and plant life. With the acute and intense culture that has been going on the world over, it has been noticed by all those who take a deep interest in and make a study of agriculture, that the more intense the culture the more numerous is the insect life. Therefore let us try by every means to increase and protect our bird life, and I am sure that before many years the value of bird life will be manifest all through the country. I sincerely trust that means will be taken to put this measure into operation, because no nation could benefit more than Canada by this enactment and its enforcement. You know how severe our climate is in winter. All our birds go south to the United States; and if we can induce our neighbours to protect our summer birds when they migrate in winter, they will return in the spring, and they should be a great help to our farmers and contribute largely to the saving of our crops. The Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture of the United States estimates that the damage caused to plants and crops by mice, rats and lice is over $500,000,000 a year, and they recognize that the birds which are looked upon as birds of prey have their place in nature as destroyers of those insect and animal pests.

For instance, the blackbird, which is considered a nuisance in certain parts of Canada, is one of the most useful birds in grazing countries. It follows a flock and picks out whatever lice may affect either sheep or cattle. It feeds on all the insects that are produced from the droppings of the cattle that graze. It is strictly protected in the Argentine, in Brazil, and wherever there is grazing to any extent In the interests of our neighbours to the south we should protect these birds, because they migrate in the winter, and if we protect them the people of the south will protect ours. Take, for example, our robin, which in the spring comes to us dressed up, as you might say, for Canada, with a red breast and a clean, bran-new suit of clothes. When that bird migrates to the south, it changes its plumage altogether; it is known in the southern states as the corn bird. It lives on whatever is left in the cornfield. It will be protected and taken care of by this law, as well as all our little birds, such as the chickadee, which cannot stand our climate.

I say that this is one of the most useful measures that have been brought to the notice of the Senate. I for one endorse it from beginning to end, and I see in it one of the great sources of the future prosperity of this country.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, I quite agree with the honourable gentleman from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Boyer), and I am just as much in sympathy with the prosposal as he is; but I think I should read a letter that I have just received from Mr. H. S. Osler, K. C., of Toronto, in regard to this matter, and I think that we should consider whether the point he raises is well taken or not, so that the law, when passed, will be in proper form. He writes:

Bill No. 92 Migratory Birds Convention Act. —It appears to me that this Act, as drawn, is open to question. I doubt whether the Dominion Government has any power to authorize the Governor in Council to make regulations for the protection of Migratory Game as provided by section 4.

I doubt also the desirability of the appointment of game officers by the Dominion Government as provided in section 5. The result would be a double set of petty officials with no proper provision for their remuneration and the result would certainly be an antagonism between the Dominion and provincial officials and a failure to enforce either law.

It appears to me that Dominion legislation on this subject should be confined to confirmation of the convention referred to and to such provisions as may be necessary to prevent provincial legislation on the subject, from atttack as interfering with Trade and Commerce or other powers of the Dominion.

Mr. H. S. Osler was, I believe, a member of the Ontario Game Commission. He is just as enthusiastic as the honourable gentleman from Rigaud in seeing that such an Act is enforced, but he draws attention to the duplication and it seems to me that that point should have consideration.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say in answer to that, so that there may be no doubt upon the point, that in the first place it is manifest that the only way in which a treaty of this kind can be carried out will be by an agreement between the states of the Union, in the United States, and the provinces of Canada, which exercise jurisdiction or authority in matters of game. Now, the treaty is one that has been entered into by the states of the Union and all the provinces of Canada—at least, I am taking the statement of the Minister of the Interior for that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: All the provinces have been consulted?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, and they are all parties to the agreement. It is quite obvious that, under such divergent conditions as would confront the authorities in enforcing the law, it would be utterly impossible to have machinery by which every state of the Union and every province of the Dominion of Canada could appoint officers; consequently they must come together in some central way, with a view to enforcing the Act. Then, again, it will be observed that the treaty is one between His Majesty the King and the United States—two absolutely sovereign powers—and it would appear to me, although I have not looked carefully into the matter, that those two sovereign powers, entirely irrespective of the powers which might be allocated to the provinces of Canada or even to the Dominion of Canada, would have authority to enter into a convention of this character. However, there is no dispute about it; the understanding is perfectly clear; and, as I have said, it is obviously the only way in which the arrangement can be carried out.

I am glad that my honourable friend from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Boyer) was associated with this very important work, in view of the results which it will have. In its enforcement I am satisfied that it will be of very great assistance to agriculture, a subject in which my honourable friend has always taken a very deep interest, and in which he is one of the leading authorities in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: I consider that this law can be put on the statute book only by an arrangement between the King of England and the United States. It is not possible to negotiate a treaty with all the different states of the Union and another with all the provinces of the Dominion; it must be negotiated between the sovereigns of both nations, the King of England as represented by the House of Lords and the House of Commons, and the President of the United States, with the approval of the Senate of the United States. It is entirely an international law, and the provinces would have no right to interfere in it. How the machinery will be put into operation to protect our birds remains to be seen; but, in any case, having the law on the statute book is always helpful towards educating the people of the different countries to the value of the birds and the protection which they deserve.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I am sure we all agree that this is most proper legislation and appreciate the value of the birds to the country. The points that were raised by the honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) occurred to me in this connection. I would point out to the honourable leader of the Government that in article 3 of the convention, in the schedule to the Act, there seems to have been some special provision made with regard to British Columbia. I do not know why that particular provision was made, or whether this Bill will have any effect upon the laws at the present time in force in the provinces. I suppose that the Dominion Government, in making the regulations to carry out this convention, will ask the provinces to bring their present legislation regarding the protection of birds into line with it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I fancy that article 3, as far as it relates to British Columbia, reflects the opinion of that province, in reserving to itself the particular right which is set out in the article.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Yes.

SUPREME COURT AND EXCHEQUER COURT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 98, an Act to amend the Supreme Court Act and the Exchequer Court Act; Hon. Mr. Crosby in the chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: On the second reading of this Bill, I explained that there are two objects in it: one is to permit of the Crown being entitled to costs notwithstanding that the solicitor or counsel is a salaried officer of the Crown; and the other is practically to enlarge the jurisdiction of the court in reference to damages occurring in connection with a public work.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I beg to draw the attention of the House to the fact that there are only six or seven members present.

On section 2—exclusive original jurisdiction:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This, I understand, extends somewhat the liability of the Government, does it not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman means as to cost?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Section 2, dealing with the Exchequer Court Act regarding injuries to persons working on Government work, makes the Government liable for damages to a man who is rather off the work, but who gets injured from some operation connected with the work.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: When the Act was passed the manifest intention was that if an injury happened on a public work, the person injured, provided he came within the statute, would be entitled to recover from the Crown; but the court has held that he had at the moment to be on the public work. For instance, if the cause of the accident injured a man while he was, say, two feet away from the public work, he could not recover damages, though the accident may have resulted from negligence of an officer or servant of the Crown. So it is to overcome the judgment to which I have referred that this provision is being enlarged so as to give the public more latitude in asserting its right to recover in the case of an injury sustained in connection with a public work.

The section was agreed to.

The Bill was reported.

BOARDS OF TRADE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 115, an Act to amend the Boards of Trade Act.

He said: The object of this Bill is to give larger powers to boards of trade than they at present enjoy under the statute, so as to permit of an amalgamation of a group of boards of trade that may be near any particular centre, thus saving considerable expense and making them a very much more influential body than a number of scattered boards of trade acting independently of each other. That is to say, if there are a number of small boards of trade around a city, and there is a board of trade in that city, they may all unite and become practically one board of trade.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Then, do I understand that they have just one set of officers?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I consider that this may be a very important and far-reaching Act; and, as a member of this House, I would protest against these Bills going through when there are very few members here to discuss their provisions. Members of this House who are supposed to understand trade questions are absent this afternoon. While I am not going to raise any vexatious opposition myself, I intend to withdraw from the House now rather than agree to seeing Bills like this put through without proper consideration.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But my honourable friend has the opportunity of giving every consideration to the Bill himself. I should think that my honourable friend could probably be of greater assistance to us in discussing a clause like this than could anybody else. It would not be necessary for my hounourable friend to be surrounded by a number of members in order to discuss this intelligently. Let us have the advantage of his judgment upon it.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: "In a multitude of counsellors there is wisdom." I imagine that if the Government of the day thought that one or two of us could deal with these questions individually, instead of dealing with them collectively as members of this honourable House, the Senate would be cut down accordingly. I am simply taking this means of bringing to the attention of the House the undesirability of dealing with important Bills like this when there is a very small attendance. So far as this particular Bill is concerned, I have no objection to make; I think the provisions will be beneficial; but at the same time we know that when there is a large attendance very important points are very often brought up unexpectedly. I cannot see through the minds of others, and they are not here in person to present their own views.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SCIENTIFIC AND INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH COUNCIL BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 83, an Act relating to the Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research.

He said: The object of this Bill is to furnish the Government with authority to constitute a council consisting of not more than eleven members, who shall be appointed by Order in Council to give their attention to the promotion of industrial and scientific research. I need not say that this is a branch of the public service which has received unusual attention of late years, particularly in continental countries. I suppose Germany has made more progress in this direction than any other nation. The progress of Germany in almost every branch of national effort has been largely due to the attention which it has given to the organization of scientific and industrial research. This question has been taken up by the British Government and latterly by the United States Government. The nations on this continent are giving very considerable attention to it to-day. I need not point out the absolute necessity of Canada giving particular attention to this question. Our natural resources are so varied and so extremely important, and the development of this Dominion depends to such a large extent upon those resources, that we have the greatest need of attention of this kind being given to their development. This will be true to an even greater extent after the cessation of the war. We shall be called upon to concentrate all our resources to the utmost limit of our ability in order to meet the competition of other countries.

I may say that, in anticipation of this Act, the council, consisting of ten representative men, has already been organized. The men represent all the important scientific institutions in Canada. It is the intention of the council to give their best attention to these matters, to report them to the Government of Canada, and to advise as to the best means to be adopted for the development of our natural resources where science is applied to industrial development.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understand that the chairman is to be the only paid member of the council?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: On looking at the Bill I notice that the council is to meet four times a year. The general idea may be good, but if any real serious work is to be done, it seems to me that the council should be a paid body and not a voluntary one. I do not know the gentlemen who are to compose the council, but I presume they will be men who have a large amount of work in other directions, and if it becomes necessary for them to give a great deal of time or attention to the work of this council, it is a question whether they will do the work of the council without remuneration or whether they will carry on their own regular work. At the present time we have a Conservation Commission, the members of which, I understand, are paid. It seems to me that by adding one or two scientific men to that commission, or by appointing them in connection with it, the work would probably be better accomplished than under the voluntary system. It is a new system, and it is questionable whether it will work satisfactorily. I recognize the necessity of carrying on all the research work we possibly can for the purpose of getting more scientific and industrial information to aid us in carrying on work after the war is over.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I heartily concur in all that has been said by the honourable the leader of this House with regard to the importance of this measure and of the council which is proposed. While we have been endowed by nature with wonderful resources of different kinds, for many years it has seemed to me that we have been using them extravagantly and without getting the returns that we would have got had we dealt with them properly. Take any department—our mines, our water-powers, or our agricultural pursuits—we get only the very smallest fraction in return that we might get, if some such commission—a live commission—were on the job, investigating and inquiring and finding out by scientific research how much more of the product than is now utilized could be turned to useful account. Going into the forests during the last forty or fifty years, we have seen the finest timber cut down and only a small fraction of it used. The refuse might be used successfully, and would bring a profit three times as large as we are at present getting. It has been the practice in the past to cut down a fine pine tree and take seven or eight sawlogs out of it, each 10 or 12 feet long. In this way only about half of the tree has been used, and the balance has been allowed to lie for a few years and has finally been burned or wasted. If that waste were used millions of matches could be made. There has been a fearful waste of material, which by proper attention could be turned to useful account. Because of the great quantity of our natural products we do not seem to value them until they are destroyed and gone. It seems to me that we cannot commence a day too soon to conserve what we have. This Bill is on the right line. The people of Canada will be more than repaid if the researches are continued from year to year, not only with regard to the natural products of our country, but also in industrial pursuits, where our labour might be turned to some more useful account than it previously has been. I think that this kind of work should be promoted as far as possible, because in promoting it we are doing the greatest good that we can do to our country and people.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

THE SOLDIERS SETTLEMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 116, an Act to assist Returned Soldiers in settling upon the Land and to increase Agricultural Production.

He said: This Bill has in view the assistance of returned soldiers who desire to settle upon the public lands of the Dominion. It makes provision for the appointment of a Board to be know as the Soldiers Settlement Board, constituted of three Commissioners who shall be appointed for a period of years. It also provides that Dominion lands may be reserved for this particular class of settlement, and gives to the Commission fairly wide powers so that they may provide agricultured education for these men and help them to settle upon the land. The policy of the Government as embodied in this Bill is that loans up to $2,500 may be made to individual settlers who come within the categories provided for in the Act. The loans of course would be a first charge upon the lands, and no patent for these lands would issue until the loan was paid. It is not necessary to point out the desirability of meeting the wishes of the returned soldiers, especially those qualified to settle upon the land, with the view of getting our lands cultivated to the very utmost. The increase of agricultural production is very desirable indeed.

It is difficult to say to what extent returned soldiers may desire to take up land, and wide discretion is given to the Commissioners to determine whether men who seek to go on the land are qualified to do so or not. We know that many of the difficulties which have confronted the Government of Canada in the past have been owing to thousands of settlers going upon the land who did not possess the necessary qualifications either in the matter of knowledge or of money. Consequently to-day we find that very large sections of what were Dominion lands have been abandoned by settlers who had gone upon them and who did not succeed. This has impressed upon the Government the necessity of discriminating in some way and making a proper selection of those who will give some earnest of success in carrying out the undertaking upon which they have entered.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I have no doubt that the aim of this Bill is a most commendable and desirable one, but I am a little sceptical as to the beneficial results to the country where this settlement takes place. I speak from a remembrance of sections of Ontario that were settled by the old pensioners of 1812-1813, having lived in some of those localities. They got the land for nothing; but whether from the habits that they had acquired while roaming around the world, or from some other cause, they rarely cleared or cultivated much of the land. The experience of most people was that the land was wasted, like the land given to the Indians. That land could not be sold for a long time, possibly it might be rented and the country was dotted all over with farms that were neither cultivated nor used in any beneficial way. I fear that it is possible, even probable, that we shall have a somewhat similar experience in connection with these lands. There is no doubt that something should be done with these lands, but the question is, will they be cultivated? Will they be put under cultivation at an early date, and will buildings be put upon them, and will individuals who have been accustomed to industrial life become good residents of our forest or prairie lands? While I am somewhat sceptical in regard to this measure, I feel that it is our duty to provide, as far as possible, the necessary facilities for those of our soldiers who feel like taking up the problems of life on agricultural lands, for they have amply earned, by their service to the country, any reward they would get from the value of the lands. The great question, however, is whether this plan will inure to the benefit of the country and the various localities in which they settle. I have some doubt whether it would be the best that could be done with the lands that we have to give away.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This is a somewhat important Bill, and, as we have a very thin House to-day, I would suggest to the leader of the Government that we defer further discussion till the committee stage.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is quite satisfactory.

The motion was agreed to and the Bill was read the second time.

RAILWAY ACT CONSOLIDATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 13, an Act to amend and consolidate the Railway Act.

He said: This Bill, it is needless to say, is a very lengthy one. It has commanded the attention of the House of Commons for some months. Some two sessions ago Parliament selected two committees, one from the Senate and one from the House of Commons, which sat jointly; but, owing to the early prorogation of that session, that joint committee was unable to complete its labours. The requirements of the Consolidated Railway Act are many, owing chiefly to the fact that the Act of 1906, which is at present on the statute book, has been amended by some fourteen statutes enacted since that time, hence the desire that there should be a consolidation of the Act. This is one of the most important Acts that we have upon the statute book. It affects almost unlimited capital invested in the various railway undertakings of the Dominion, and relates not only to railways, but to other public utilities. The committee of the Commons, during the present session, began consideration of this Act on April 24, 1917, and so close was that consideration given to it that only to-day has it come up in this House for the second reading; so that, if we give the Commons credit for having given very careful consideration to it it is obvious that it will be unnecessary for us to give the same attention to it as has been given by that House. Before the committee of the Commons there appeared from time to time representatives of the different railway companies, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, the Order of Railway Conductors, the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, different boards of trade, telephone companies, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Union of Canadian Municipalities, the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario, and, in fact, all persons or corporations or associations that one could naturally conclude would be interested in the consolidation of the Act. This has resulted in some 678 pages of evidence being taken, which evidence is now in print and accessible to the members of the Senate in our consideration of the Bill.

I need scarcely discuss the many features of the Railway Act, for we have dealt with it so frequently that honourable gentlemen are very familar with it. I may say, however, that the jurisdiction or powers vested in the Board of Railway Commissioners have been somewhat enlarged. That commission has been very largely an evolution in response to the public requirements of the people of Canada in relation to railways, and from session to session we have found it desirable to add to their duties or powers. Under this Act we have given additional powers to the Railway Commission. A number of changes have been introduced in the Act with reference to expropriation proceedings. We have enlarged the rights of municipalities in reference to the exercise of their authority or discretion in the matter of railway and other companies carrying on their undertakings within the limits of the municipality. We have also enlarged the powers of the Railway Board in regard to telephone companies, giving the Board additional powers to permit of connections being made by local companies with long distance companies, while at the same time giving further authority to the board in the matter of fixing rates. The very vexed question of cattle getting on the railway lines has also been dealt with. This has always been a fertile field for litigation between the railway companies and the agricultural communities. My honourable friend from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson) brought into this House some time ago an amendment to the Railway Act, providing for the payment of railway employees semi-monthly instead of monthly. This is embodied in the Act. It is unnecessary for me at this hour to enlarge upon the many other features of the Act, except to say that those which I have briefly mentioned are probably the essential features of the new legislation. Of course the Bill is a consolidation of all the railway legislation that has been passed from 1906 down to the present time.

It occurred to me that probabaly a more advantageous way of dealing with this Bill would be to call the Railway Committee together, because, when it receives its second reading, I intend to move that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs, and Harbours; and that committee, at its first meeting, should not deal with the Bill itself, but rather discuss the best method of procedure, so that from day to day, providing we sit as frequently as that, we may be able to bring systematically before that committee all the parties representing the various interests dealt with in the Bill. For instance, the railway companies of the Dominion will doubtless wish to appear before the committee; probably also the telephone companies, the municipalities, the power companies, and all the other interests that may be affected thereby. It is very undesirable that they should be brought here without our systematically dealing with those interests in which they are concerned, and it seems to me this can be best brought about by the standing committee on railways outlining a course of procedure by which we could bring those interests here at such time as we may be able to consider the questions with which each particular interest is concerned. I therefore move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I would like to ask the honourable leader of the Government whether he has any idea when the House is likely to prorogue. I have this Bill before me, and it is a tremendous document; and, if we are likely to prorogue in a reasonably short time, I can hardly conceive that this House or any Committee of this House is going to be able to consider this Bill with the amount of intelligence they generally give to matters of this kind.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say to my honourable friend that we are always hopeful of getting prorogation by an early date. At the same time, there has been an extension of this Parliament, and we seem to be fondly adhering to the idea of making use of all the time that has been given to us, so that we may possibly be here until some time late in the autumn. I hope that announcement will not have a depressing effect on my honourable friend. On the other hand, I may say that I have spoken to some honourable gentlemen in the Commons, and they are hopeful of proroguing in two or three weeks.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This Bill is a very important one, as has been said by the leader of the Government, and it is also a very heavy piece of work to get through. We are apparently reaching the period toward the end of the session, and if we are to go through the whole of these 475 clauses in this Bill and give them proper consideration, we certainly have an exceedingly heavy job before us between now and the end of the session. My honourable friend has stated that this Bill was before the joint committee of both Houses two sessions ago. I do not exactly understand why that procedure was not adopted in regard to this Bill at the beginning of this session, when we had very little work to do, and when the members of the Senate would have been able to give their time and attention to the heavy work of a Bill of this kind. We could have got through it then, when the weather was more conducive to hard work, and when we had not so many things to attend to. As my honourable friend has said it will be referred to the Railway Committee, we can further discuss the matter there, but I doubt very much whether we shall be able to get through this Bill this session.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time and referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs, and Harbours.

PRIVATE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Bill 39, an Act respecting the Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company.—Hon. Mr. Milne.

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 75, an Act respecting Military Service, Hon. Mr. Blain in the chair.

On section 1, subsection 2—definitions:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I should like the word " clergy " to be defined so that it will have the meaning given to it by the laws of the different denominations and religions.

The section stands.

On section 2—persons liable for service:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I should like to inquire as to the length of time for which the men now under service have enlisted. Is it for a given number of years or for the duration of the war?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is for the duration of the war and six months afterwards.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Paragraph (b) puzzles me. It says that any one who has been at any time since the fourth day of August, 1914, resident in Canada shall be liable. That means that any one who has spent a week, or a month if you will, in Canada since the fourth day of August is liable, even though he has since gone out of Canada.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He must be resident in Canada since the 4th day of August, 1914. The term " residence" has a very well-defined legal meaning. A man coming into Canada for a week and going out again is not a resident of Canada. This must be his residence or domicile.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Are we keeping faith with those who have already enlisted, if they have enlisted for the duration of the war and six months thereafter? The clause here says that such service shall be for the duration of the present war and of demobilization. Demobilization may take a year or two years, therefore you are extending the term of the engagement of those who have enlisted.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This section will apply only to those who are conscripted.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It applies to every man.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Every man who comes within one of the classes mentioned in section 3 of this Act is liable to be called out.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Those who have enlisted are liable to be called out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, they are already in service. They cannot be called out because they are under the voluntary system. There is nothing to prevent any man volunteering so long as voluntary enlistment is authorized.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I call attention to the fact that it is general. This applies to every one who comes within the conditions mentioned in section 2 and within the classes mentioned in section 3. I have read the Bill very carefully, and I am sure it applies to those who have enlisted.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Those who have enlisted are under an entirely different contract, a voluntary contract. They are now serving.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Suppose they had enlisted for only one year; they would be covered by the Bill and would be liable to be called again. Supose they enlisted for two or three years; if the third year were to expire to-morrow, they would be called upon to enlist.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They have all enlisted for the duration of the war, and six months afterwards; consequently there is no possibility of their being called up. The term used here is "demobilization."

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would suggest substituting the words "six months after the war" for "demobilization."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The word "demobilization" is used in the first place because demobilization cannot take place within six months after the war. It is desirable that those who are called out should serve until demobilization. The class referred to will be found in section 4 of the schedule on the last page of the Bill:

> Men serving in the Royal Navy or the Royal Marines, or in the Naval Service of Canada, and members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Those men are exempted from the application of this Bill.

May I ask the indulgence of the House to permit Colonel McInnes to come on the floor of this House to give the necessary information?

Some Hon. SENATORS: Certainly.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to know what is the use of these words in the second subsection of section 2:

> —so long as voluntary enlistment in such force is authorized.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is simply a declaration of what may be done to-day, or hereafter. If any man chooses to enlist voluntarily, the Act does not apply to him. He enlists for the duration of the war and six months afterwards.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Why is it necessary to say so?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is a distinction drawn between those serving in the Expeditionary Force and those who will be called out. This is to make that distinction clear.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: There is no intention of preventing men from enlisting voluntarily?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. We would very much prefer that voluntary enlistment continue.

Section 2 was agreed to.

On section 3—division into classes:

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Subsection 2 of this section says:

For the purposes of this section, any man married after the sixth day of July, 1917, shall be deemed to be unmarried.

Would it not be better to say that this man shall be deemed to be liable for service? If he is married we cannot unmarry him.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is simply for the purpose of the Act. He is regarded as unmarried. It does not divorce him.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Have we any right to change his civil condition?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It means that he will be treated as if he was unmarried.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: We are changing his condition.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Only for the purposes of the Act.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is there any particular clause in the Bill in regard to exemptions? I would like to propose, in relation to that clause, that a father of six living children should be exempted.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The exemptions are in a schedule on the last page of the Bill, and also in section 11.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Has the Government considered the propriety of putting class 5 ahead of class 4, in order that the unmarried be first called? Class 5 is: Those who were born in the years 1872 to 1875, both inclusive, and are unmarried, or are widowers who have no child. The principle seems to be that the unmarried shall be called first; and yet I see that married men in class 4 come ahead of unmarried men born between 1872 and 1875.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But if my honourable friend will look more closely he will find that we are dealing with those born between two fixed periods. The first class liable to be called out are the unmarried; then the married will follow the unmarried in that particular period. Class 5 and class 6 are those born during the same period—1872 to 1875. First, the unmarried man is subject to being called, then the married man. That is the explanation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But that is the question I put: Is it advisable to call class 4 ahead of class 5, when you take the father of a family and increase the charge on the country by taking one who may leave behind a wife and children?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think the answer to that would be, that the efficiency of men depends very largely upon their youth. The older they get the more inefficient they are for the purposes of the Bill. Still, we have to divide in that way

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Is there much difference between a man at 41 and one at 42?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have to draw the line somewhere.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: What is the age of those in class 3?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: 35 to 41.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Do you really think that a man of 36 years who is a widower or unmarried should not be called before those in class 2, for instance, who may have six or eight children?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, they should not have that number at that age; that is unreasonable.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But I ask that in all seriousness. I draw the attention of the leader of the Government to that; for I think there may be an oversight there. We on both sides of the House should try to arrange this matter equitably.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The difficulty is in fixing the line. We have to fix it somewhere.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I appreciate that the line may be fixed at an age beyond which a man is not supposed to have the same capacity as formerly; but so far we are dealing with men between the ages of 20 and 45. It seems to me that single men of that age should be called before married men who have children.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would point out to my honourable friend that while we make that classification there is not the slightest probability of that class being called.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: The 4th class?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. It is expected that we shall not have to go beyond classes 1 and 2. I have in my hand the census returns of 1911, and I am informed that, as the population of Canada stands to-day, notwithstanding that say 400,000 men have gone overseas, yet these figures can be taken as approximately correct, and they show that we have in Canada 319,610 single men between the ages of 20 and 24; or in round figures, we have 320,000 in class 1.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: That does not include those who have enlisted?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. I am told by the officials of the Government that notwithstanding the men we have sent over, this statement is approximately correct.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Are they all physcially qualified?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Then you haven't got them.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But, taking the average as determined by our past experience, classes 1 and 2 could be secured from those set out in this statement, which shows that we have single men aged from 20 to 24 to the number of 300,000, and 66,247 married.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, the department knows the exact number of men who have enlisted from that class, and I understand from the honourable leader that that total is deducted from that number?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; this statement is not affected, generally speaking, by the men who have gone over.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But if 100,000 men of that class have already enlisted, they are no longer available.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But my honourable friend will see that a man who is 20 years of age to-day was only 14 in 1911; so that, from the competition made by those who have gone into the matter very carefully, we do not anticipate the classes outside of 1 and 2 being called up.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then the honourable gentleman says, "We are confident that we shall draw from those two first classes all that are required?"

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have to draw upon these classes first.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But the question asked by the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) which I think applies to class 2, is why class 2 is called before class 3, which comprises men born between 1876 and 1882 who are unmarried or widowers without children. Is not the State interested in calling single men if they are as healthy and strong? The Bill seems to deviate from the propriety of following that line of action, by taking in class 2—married men who were born not earlier than the year 1883— and having them called ahead of unmarried men or widowers of the class from between 1876 and 1882.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The probabilities are entirely in favour of the total 100,000 being secured from class 1 without touching the married class. Then, when we go into class 3, we get a class of men aged from 35 to 41 that are not comparable as soldiers to those of the 20-year class. The experience of the war has established beyond all question that the men who are in the twenties are decidedly superior to those who are beyond the twenties, in endurance and adaptability and in applying themselves with enthusiasm to the duties which they have to face.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I am told that there are a very large number of Canadian soldiers in England. Are they classified to go to the front, and are they going to the front, or are they there at the country's expense for nothing? Would this conscription deal with all those men in England who have not been to the front?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Those men are in training, and are there as reserves to be called up as reinforcements from time to time.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: What are they doing there now if they are there as reinforcements?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are to go the front as required.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Then, why are we asked for reinforcements?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To take their place as they are moved to the front.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: There are a lot of men doing nothing. We have a lot of men around St. John with their belts on.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, there always will be.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: How many officers are there in England, lying around, not going to the front, who have been there two or three years? Perhaps you have the statistics as to that. What are they doing there?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot tell that to my honourable friend, I am sorry to say.

On subsection 2 of section 3:

For the purposes of this section, any man married after the 6th day of July, 1917, shall be deemed to be unmarried.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think that is an immoral clause. Why should you put a finality on persons who want to marry? That clause should be the same for everybody. I think the Senate will not adopt such a clause as that. I am serious in my remark. That clause should go out. Why should you prevent a man from marrying if he wants to marry?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: We do not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes, you do, because he will not marry and leave a wife. You are preventing people from marrying. If you make a clause that married people will fall in such and such a class, let them fall in that class.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The object of that clause is this: When it was proposed in the United States to pass conscription there was an overwhelming rush to get married before the Act went into operation, so as to escape its responsibilities. Now we go back to the 6th of July, 1917, when this Bill was introduced, and we say: "Notwithstanding the fact that you have married after you noticed that conscription was to be put in force, we shall not regard you as a married man." That is all. The presumption for the purposes of this Bill is that that man married to escape his responsibility.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: But you have no right to impute motives. Suppose I am twenty years old and I want to marry after the 6th of July. Well, I would prefer not marrying if I had to leave a wife behind me. I might go and be killed; then, in what situation would she be?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is a very fine situation.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: It is a very fine situation if I leave a wife behind. I really think the clause is immoral.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think the phrase is an unhappy one. It seems to me that the person who framed this subsection 2 could have found some other phrase to express the same idea.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We follow pretty closely the English legislation regarding this matter. In their Act they say: "who on the second day of November, 1915, was unmarried or was a widower without any child dependent on him." If he was married after that he would still be deemed to be unmarried under the Act.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Could not that be classed under this heading? When the first Highland regiment arrived in France, as they were going through a French village with their kilts on the whole population came to look on, but could not make out what they were; so one old French gentleman who had lived in England and thought he could speak English went up and inquired, and came back with the answer: "Ils disent qu'ils sont middlesex"—"they say they are middlesex."

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: This subsection is a most immoral expression to put into any civilized legislation—that a man who is married shall be deemed unmarried. Where in the name of common sense did the Government get such an expression?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: For the purposes of the Act.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, if they knew anything at all, they would put it this way: that any person married since the 6th of July, 1917, shall be enlisted or liable to enlistment in spite of his marriage.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: That would be the same thing.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: But do not make this country immoral on account of the Confederation Act. Do not make tens of thousands of young men believe that they are unmarried when they go to the front, and take up with English girls, French girls or Belgian girls. I say this is a most immoral proposition, most immoral, and it shows the incompetence of the Government, against which I have been protesting during the past two weeks. Any man who drafted this is not a divinity student, I will tell you that, and does not know his religion; he does not know his moral code. The idea of putting on the statute book of a civilized, Christian country a law stating to a man, "You are married, it is true, but you shall be deemed unmarried for war purposes."

Lucifer himself could not invent a worse thing. So I would suggest to the Government to put in some language that will not offend the morals or the religious aspirations of the country. Let this be changed to read that all married men since the 6th of July, 1917, shall be liable to enlistment in spite of their marriage.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: As if unmarried.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I think the Government, for the sake of the country's morality, for the sake of the people who are well-thinking, should adopt this proposition. Now, another thing. If this carries, what will it mean? One honourable gentleman said it meant "unmarried for the purposes of this Act," but it does not say so. Then a young man—or an old man, like some of us in this House—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN:—gets married after the 6th of July, and his marriage is to be deemed no marriage. What I want to get at is this: that any man, having married after the 6th of July, and being enlisted by the Government, should be deemed married for the purposes of the allowances to the bride he leaves behind him; that she should get the allowances and her share of the Patriotic Fund or whatever else is going. With things like that in the statute, you do not want opposition to enlistment. Some of you are going crazy. You tell a man to enlist and you say to him, "You must go; you are not married, and your wife, if she has a baby in nine months, will get no allowance."

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Why not?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: According to this law.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Because they are "unmarried."

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Because they are "unmarried." I hope the Government will take this matter into consideration. I know my honourable friend who represents the Government here (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) cannot do anything. He must take representations from this House with seriousness and not try to scorn them or laugh them down, or say, "I have no information." That will not go very long. I for one will not stand it. I am just as good a man—not any better, but just as good as he is, as representing the people. When I stand up, it is for their rights. This law is not going to affect me personally. It is going to affect some of my boys who are getting married, and if they are enlisted I want them to have the same treatment as other persons. So I submit to the Government—to Sir Robert Borden if the honourable leader here will not listen to us, and to the Minister of Militia—that this clause should be changed so as to make it more moral and make sure that the bride of a soldier married since the 6th of July, and any progeny that comes afterwards, shall be entitled to the allowances and to fair treatment from the Patriotic Fund. How many among you there—I ask the men in khaki—object to that proposition? Is there one of you? Silence gives consent. Then tell your leader and tell your party in the other House that the law ought to be changed to protect the moral interests of the country and the justifiable needs of men fighting at the front, if they have young wives and babies left at home.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I do not see that the honourable member's objection would come in here at all. I do not think this Act has anything to do with allotting the separation allowances, or with pension matters, or anything of that kind whatsoever. All that this section does is to say that a man who marries after a certain date shall, for the purposes of this section, be considered as if he had not been married at all.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Then the bride gets nothing.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Wait a moment. That is, it puts him in a certain class.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Why does it not say so?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Whereas, if he were married before, he would go into another class. But this does not say he shall not receive any separation allowance. This has nothing to do with allowances or with pensions. This Act is a compulsory service Act and these sections are simply—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If you split hairs like that you will get mighty few soldiers.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: The Bill calling men out for military service has nothing whatever to do with separation allowances or anything of that kind. That comes under an entirely different Act.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Carried, carried.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: We will not go on with this section. We will go on when that is attended to. I have a right to speak here, and will speak as long as I desire.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I am prepared to sit here as long as the honourable gentleman likes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Very well. I will keep the honourable gentleman here.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Go ahead.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The honourable the leader of the Government said a moment ago that that clause was intended to meet certain objections——

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Abuses.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Abuses that cropped up in the United States. Why should we pay for them?

Hon. Mr. FOWLER: We are not.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes, we are. Take the case of an honest man who wants to marry; if he marries after the 6th of July, he is punished. Why do you not put him in the class to which he belongs? You are going to punish him, because certain abuses have existed in the United States.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There is another point. How many young soldiers have married here and have afterwards gone to the front. How many have married across the ocean and have remained in the trenches. Young men have got married since the 6th of July. They have not got married with the intention of avoiding service. Not at all. But this clause makes every one of those who have married since the 6th of July last liable to be counted as unmarried—immoral men.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yes, it does. Well, now, if we are not going to agree here in making the law, how in the name of Heaven are the courts, composed, I supposed, of more competent men than we are, going to agree? You have no conception of how to draft a law in plain English so that the people will be able to understand it. "For the purposes of this section, any man married after the 6th day of July, 1917"—any man! That means everybody.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Does it?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, if we cannot agree, how are the members of the tribunals going to agree? I hold it means everybody —any man married since the 6th of July comes under this provision—"shall be deemed to be unmarried." I say it is the duty of the Government to change the clause. I want the law to be made so clear and plain that there will be no need of interpretation in the thousands of tribunals that will have to be established all over the country, and so that it will not be necessary to appeal from them. I will venture to say that any man who wants to do so could appeal from the ordinary small court in a village to a superior court, and so on, to the Privy Council, and the Privy Council would say, "those legislators over in Canada do not know much."

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: If I understand this clause rightly, its purpose is to prevent people from marrying to avoid the law. That is right, is it not?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Yes, but why don't you say so?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: How could you prove that?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: If my honourable friends would just wait until the end of my argument, I think they would perhaps agree with me. I contend that this clause was inserted for the purpose of preventing any man from going to the altar and getting married simply to avoid having to go to the trenches. If that is the purpose of the clause, I say that since the 6th of July the whole country has known of it; everybody has known that there was no use in trying to evade the law by marriage. Is that right or not?

Some hon. SENATORS: That is right.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Therefore, since the 6th of July, every man who has got married has done so knowing that he was going to the trenches, just as if he were single. Is that right? Now, if that is the case, we must come to the conclusion that every man who has married since the 6th of July has done so without the slightest intention of escaping the law; therefore, that man is not the man at whom this section is aimed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It strikes him all the same.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: My contention is that every man who has married knowing in his conscience that he was going to the trenches, like a single man, has been honest in his intention. I am pleading for that honest man; he is not the man against whom this section has been drafted. That man should be respected. Why not change the date and make it to-day? The date has already been changed, Mr. Chairman; I do not know for what reason, but I know it has been changed. I really and sincerely believe that the reason I am giving now is a good, honest reason. The man who, knowing that he could not evade the law by marrying, has got married notwithstanding, must not have married to avoid the law and is not a slacker.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: As I understand it, the man who married after the 6th of July and who was included in the first class could, without this provision, by getting married, put himself into the next class and thus change the conditions from what they were on July 6th. This provision is intended to apply to the condition existing in the country at the time the Bill was passed in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Will you answer this? Suppose I decide on the 2nd day of May to marry in the month of October. Suppose the law comes into force and says, "If you marry after the 6th of July, you are deemed to be unmarried," I will not marry at all, because I do not want to put my wife into such a position. If I had to leave her she might perhaps not have the means of livelihood. How would you meet such a case?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: You should have married before the 6th of July.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: What if the parties have fixed the date, say, for the 3rd or 4th of October—in any case a date subsequent to that fixed by the Compulsory Service Bill, and the law is passed after they have fixed the date of the marriage?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Could the honourable leader of the Government tell me why the date was altered from June 11 to July 6?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: July 6 is the date when all the provisions of the Bill were brought before Parliament and it became public property.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I would say in reply to my honourable friend that his answer is no answer to my question. The reason is not the change of class. The change of class is quite legitimate. The law provides for the change of class, and when a man presents himself his obligations and responsibilities are weighed, and if he is married within the time fixed by the law he is supposed to be legitimately married and his objections are considered good. For instance, I am married; I married within the time prescribed by the law, and you have to consider me as a man who did not marry for the purpose of shirking his duty.

My obligations are weighed, and the law declares that I shall be in the second class and not in the first. What is this clause intended to meet? The case of the man who gets married only for the purpose of shirking his duty. If that is so, the intention of the man should be considered. If the man did not marry to avoid his duty, he ought to be treated as a perfectly honourable man, not as a man who did shirk his duty. And I say that since the date of July 6 has been put into the Bill as the limit after which a man could not be exempted from Class 1 on account of marriage, he married knowing perfectly well that he must go just the same. Is that true or not?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Quite true.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: It seems to me there is but one answer to that: It is quite true. If a man has got married since the 6th of July with perfectly honourable motives, I think those motives should be considered now.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: How?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I would simply fix the date as from to-day, or to-morrow if you like. All that is necessary is that people shall not be given notice beforehand that they have until a certain day to marry in order to avoid the law. If the date were fixed as from to-day, that would, it seems to me, meet all the requirements of the law.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: If, according to the honourable gentleman's own argument, the motive is to be judged, and you fix the date as to-day, you abandon that motive and you give the man who had a bad motive—

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: How could he have?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: —all the advantages that the man gets who did it from a good motive.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I put a question to my honourable friend? When a man had this Act before his eyes, and knew that after July 6 it was impossible for him to escape going to the trenches by marrying, how could he do so with a bad motive? Will my honourable friend give me an answer? I am not discussing this just for the pleasure of talking, but because I am convinced I am right.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I would believe that he did it from an improper motive.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Notwithstanding that the law says it is useless?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I agree with the honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien). We are getting on common ground. Ninety-nine men out of every hundred who married after the 6th of July, 1917, did it not for the purpose of shirking service to the country, but out of love for the girls they wanted to make their own. Do you believe that Canadians are going to take the first girl that offers simply in order to get out of enlisting? That is a slur on the men and women of Canada. My proposition is the fairest one. You may set any date that you please, make it the 1st of May, make it when Sir Robert Borden got converted—somewhere about two months ago; make it date from the time some spirit worked on him and he became converted and never told his colleagues that he had been converted. How can I say that? Because ministers in the Cabinet resigned because they did not know the Bill was to be introduced. Date it from the time of Sir Robert's conversion from anti-conscription to conscription, and make it so plain that there will be no wrangling over it in the courts; make it so that there will be no reflection on the men; make it so that marriage after the 1st of May shall not be deemed to be an obstacle in the way of a man's enlistment. That makes it plain.

What are you going to do with the wives of the men who have married since the 6th day of July? They are declared by statute to be unmarried—divorced by Act of Parliament. Parliament is an immense divorce court, declaring divorce between two honest people, one a soldier and the other the bride of a soldier. What do you mean by that? Is the Canadian Parliament to be a high divorce court declaring that every marriage since the 6th of July is illegal? That is what it means. Why, gentlemen, cannot you weigh circumstances? Cannot you weigh the declaration in the statute as it reads? We are going to tell the country that every man, young or old, who got married after the 6th day of July is nothing but an entertainer of immoral women—he is deemed to be unmarried. Are you going to have that remain in a statute which is devised for the safeguarding, for the honour, for the protection of human life, when you wont protect it at home? You will not protect your own honour, the honour of your women, the honour of your soldiers. For the honour of the soldier, for the welfare of the bride, for the safety of society, I ask in all seriousness that a majority in Parliament, under the present Administration, should not declare these marriages to be practically null and void. It is a shame to present this legislation to an honest, moral Parliament. We are not moribund, as is the lower House, where they have no rights on questions of this kind. I hold that the Government ought to take this question into serious consideration. Mr. Chairman, you are lawyer enough to know that I am right. When you tell a man he is under the obligation of considering his bride as a woman to be cast aside and not to be looked after, you cannot expect to enlist men. I am speaking in the interests of the recruiting that has got to take place. I am not opposing the clause; I am pointing the way of light, truth and honour.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Would the leader of the Government accept this amendment:

For the purposes of this legislation any man marrying after the 6th day of July shall be deemed to be unmarried unless he establishes that his marriage was decided upon previous to that time.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Should those who were engaged to be married break their engagement after the 6th of July if they could prove before any of the tribunals that they were really engaged? Is a man going to break faith with a girl?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The tribunals will have a good deal of discretion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The tribunals will have only the discretion given to them by the clause in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I move an amendment, seconded by Colonel Domville, as follows:

For the purposes of this section, any man married after the 6th day of July, 1917, shall not have the right to invoke such marriage as an obstacle to his enlistment.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I think the Government would alter it without a resolution.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No. You can never depend on the present Government. I would not trust them two yards.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will deal with subsection 3.

Subsection 2 of section 3 stands.

On subsection 3 of section 3:

Any class, except class 1, shall include men who are transferred thereto from another class as hereinafter provided, and men who have come within class 1 since the previous class was called out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: What is the meaning of that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To continue that class as the men get older. If they are not called out they may get out of their class, and younger men will come into the class.

Subsection 3 of section 3 was agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 1—calling out by classes:

Hon. Mr. DAVID: Has the honourable the leader of the House any doubt about the constitutionality of this clause? Many eminent lawyers have expressed the opinion that under the Confederation Act Parliament has not the right to pass a law obliging citizens of this country to go and fight beyond Canada.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Lawyers differ, and they will differ. My information is that the Chief Justice of my honourable friend's province holds a contrary opinion.

Subsection 1 of section 4 was agreed to.

On subsection 2 of section 3:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The amendment which I have to offer is a very simple one and should command the support of the Government. It is as follows:

For the purposes of this section any man married after the 6th day of July, 1917, shall not have the right to invoke marriage as a bar or obstacle to his enlistment.

What objection can any one have to that? It covers identically the same ground covered by this clause and does not offend any one's sentiments. It relieves the widows—for they are practically widows when their men go to the front—from the stigma cast upon them under the old clause. I think the Government ought to accept that. We leave a man's marriage entire and complete, and do not send him to the front dishonoured.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I would add the words: "unless he proves that such marriage has been arranged beforehand."

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Make it the 6th of August.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I do not want to antagonize the whole Conservative element.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All I can say is that the language of the section as it stands is preferable to the amendment. If my honourable friend wants a division, we will take it and decide it at once.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We may decide it at once, but we will have a vote on it. I want to line up the honest men who are for the soldiers against those who pretend to be honest for them but who are not.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I prefer the wording as printed.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: My object in moving this amendment is to see that there will be no question as to the women left behind. I am not going to take any risk with a law that is not clear. I want the law as clear as it can be made, and I want no court to interpret my will and the will of the legislators of this country. That policy has been followed in this Senate and this Parliament as long as I can remember. The legislators here ought to be able to put their opinions in clear Anglo-Saxon, and especially in French, and we have enough French here to do so—probably better able to put it in French than in English. That is my intention right along; it is not to be obstructive or to oppose the measure. I want that there should be no trouble, and that properly married woman, living in her home while her husband is on the seas, shall not have her enemies or neighbours point the finger of scorn and say, "You are unmarried; the law says so; the Conscription Act says you are unmarried, and if you have any children they will not be legitimate according to the statute." That would be the effect under the section as proposed. Is that a fair proposition to put up to an honest woman? I ask that of you men who have any consideration for right, morality and honesty. As I say, the clause is clear enough for me; if I were a commissioner of the Patriotic Fund or any other fund I would say to such a woman: "The law says you are unmarried, and unmarried people cannot get allowances; you cannot get contributions from the Patriotic Fund, for the law says you are unmarried." Some lawyers in the House cannot see that; they want to leave it in doubt so that the courts will interpret it. I am against that policy. The learned senator for De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) says it is the same as my amendment. I say it is not. I am saving the honour of the soldier and the honour of the women of the country by my amendment; I do not want them put down as unmarried when their young husbands are fighting and dying in the trenches. What does the Government mean by imposing such an anomalous state of affairs on this country?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: The clause in the Bill is much clearer than this amendment.

I fail to understand very clearly how a marriage can be a bar or obstacle to enlistment. It does not say what sort of obstacle it is. I have seen obstacles overcome. In my view the amendment is somewhat obscure and ambiguous. While the clause as it stands before us in the Bill might be more forcible—nay, brutal—there is no misunderstanding it as in the matter of obstacle.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Do you understand the English language well enough to know what a bar is, and what an obstacle is?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: I do; I understand it to the extent that an obstacle may stop me absolutely from going over an object, or it may not. Now, you are an obstacle to some extent, I suppose, in this House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am; I don't deny it; and you need an obstacle sometimes.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: But an obstacle can be overcome; it is not anything definite; but we want this section to be worded in such a way as to be absolutely clear and distinct and not subject to two interpretations. I understand perfectly well the object of my honourable friend's amendment, and to some extent I sympathize with it; but—perhaps owing to my lack of understanding the English language—I fail to realize that his amendment is as clear and distinct as the wording of the Bill before us.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I take issue with my honourable friend. I state here now that he does not understand the value of the phrase from the English point of view. What I say is that such a person shall not have the right to invoke such a marriage as a bar or obstacle to enlistment, or an excuse. He will come up before the tribunal and say: "Your honour, I am married, and that is a barrier against my enlistment." That is the way it will be argued. The point I am at is that my amendment does not leave your Canadian women under a slur, while the original section in the Act does so, if they were married since the 6th of July. Now, that should not be tolerated by this Parliament.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Question, question.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: The amendment is clear.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Bill as it is is very much clearer. I would say to my honourable friend that we do not propose to make any amendment to it unless it is really necessary. If the House decides that an amendment is necessary we will make it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN (translation): I do not expect my amendment to carry. The Senate has been packed during the last few days with new senators, who have come here for the purpose of putting through the conscription Bill in spite of all discussion. But if we have not a majority in this chamber, my leader and my party, we shall have one in the next election, which is coming soon—the sooner the better.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE (translation): I approve entirely of the amendment of the honourable senator for Victoria Division. This section of the bill is immoral and ought to be amended. In this country there are many people, in both nationalities, who do not know what is in this bill, and it should be clearly explained to them. The bill is bad enough; why make it incomprehensible? I urge that the amendment be adopted, and I hope the majority will consent to it. The honourable senator from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) must think as I do. The bill should be made clear and comprehensible to everybody.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have stated that the form of this section is somewhat brutal in its terms, but I confess that I cannot see any improvement in the amendment which is proposed. The honourable gentleman wants to improve this section by saying that a man shall not have the right to invoke such marriage as a bar or obstacle to his enlistment. Well, he is bound to be enlisted as a married man or a single man, but this formula will not settle the question as to his ability or inability to pass from class 1 to class 2, and for that reason I will vote against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN (translation): This clause is immoral. it is opposed to the morality of the country. It proposes to divide what God has united—to separate a man from his wife. The men who would be struck by this clause are not slackers, but those who have been pronounced by the medical corps to be fit to bear arms.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I rise to a point of order. I would like to know what the honourable gentleman is thinking and saying, because I have a certain amount of respect for the honourable gentleman, and I do not know what he is talking about.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I know right well that you don't.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I admit it; but talk in a language that I know. If you talk in that language, then I will probably be able to appreciate you and have a better opinion of you to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: (translation): I am not responsible for the ignorance of the honourable senator. So much the worse for him if he cannot follow the debate. I have done. I hope that the amendment which I have proposed will be adopted for the good reputation of the soldier and the honour of his wife.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE (translation): I repeat, Mr. Chairman, that this clause is immoral, and I insist that the amendment be adopted.

The amendment was negatived, and subsection 2 of section 3 was agreed to.

On section 5—tribunals:

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: How are those tribunals to be formed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will see that section 6 provides for the constitution of local tribunals.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: By the Central Appeal Judge, I suppose you mean the judge of the Supreme Court here?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The question of making the regulations uniform throughout the country will be a somewhat difficult one, as far as I can understand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The difficulty should not be very great, because it is done on the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge, and he will practically lay down recommendations as to what the regulations should be on all the questions involved in the Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: He will issue instructions to the local tribunals and guide them in the matter?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But those instructions do not bear on the interpretation of the Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He cannot depart from the principles of the Act.

On subsection 6 of section 5:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I suppose this clause is constitutional.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If it is unconstitutional we cannot make it constitutional.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: Under this section a man will have no right to take out an injunction or a writ of habeas corpus. I would like this section to stand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We had better pass it. I am always willing to go back to a clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We may test the opinion of the House on the suspension of habeas corpus. I will move that the words "habeas corpus" be struck out of subsection 6.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The words "or other process" would then cover the "habeas corpus."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Strike out the words "habeas corpus or other process."

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask whether a similar provision exists in the English Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot answer that question now. I will look into it.

Subsection 6 of section 5 stands.

PURCHASE OF OLIVER EQUIPMENT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired of the Government:

1. How many sets of Oliver equipment have been purchased by the Government, and at what price each?
2. How much was paid to Hugh Carson Co. Ltd., harness makers, of Ottawa, to alter the Oliver equipment and for his good-will and patent?
3. What is the total amount paid by the Government to July 1, 1917, in connection with the Oliver equipment?
4. What proportion, if any, of the above amount was used at the front or in France?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Since the opening of the war 97,000 sets of Oliver equipment have been purchased at an average price of $8.98 per set.

2. (a) $7,328.48. (b) Nothing was paid to any individual whatever for good-will or patent.

3, $901,805.44.

4. This information has already been furnished in a memorandum laid on the Table of the House by the right honourable the Prime Minister on February 6 last, which reads as follows:

Memo for the Information of the Minister.

Re "Oliver" equipment.—The pattern of dismounted equipment authorized for use by the Canadian Militia up to the commencement of the war was known as the "Oliver" which was issued to all dismounted soldiers, and at the commencement of hostilities such of this equipment as was available was collected, issued to the 1st Division, C.E.F., and taken by it to France: it however was replaced subsequently (in 1915) by British "web" and without expense to Canada when it was returned here to be converted and was taken into further use. This was the same equipment as was issued to the Canadian troops who served in South Africa.

The mobilization of the 2nd Division and reinforcements for both the 1st and 2nd Divisions, up to a maximum of 108,000 men followed rapidly and for this number (108,000) ninety-seven thousand sets of "Oliver" equipment had been provided for in the fall of 1914, as follows:

Aug.....	30,000	sets for 1st Division C.E.F.
Sept.....	2,000	" " additional units for 1st Division.
Sept.....	35,000	" " reinforcements.
Oct.....	30,000	" " 2nd Division, C.E.F.
Total....	97,000

But as in January, 1915, the G.O.C. Canadians, England, reported that "Oliver" equipment was not as satisfactory as the War Office web equipment, steps were taken immediately to provide for the conversion of the "Oliver" equipment to a "valise" equipment, approximating as closely as possible the War Office pattern. At this time it was not possible to obtain the War Office Web equipment either in Canada or elsewhere, as the War Office was unable to meet its own necessities.

Some time in February, 1915, the honourable the minister (Sir Sam Hughes) conducted a demonstration for Militia Council, of four patterns of dismounted equipment, via.:

(1) "Oliver" equipment.
(2) "Oliver" equipment converted (as referred to above).
(3) War Office "Web."
(4) War Office leather.

at which it was decided to proceed with the conversion of such "Oliver" equipment as was possible.

Subsequently it was ascertained that the 2nd Division had had its converted "Oliver" equipment replaced by "web" when going to the front, and as more equipment was required for the C.E.F. on increase of establishment, a pattern of equipment, which it was considered would be acceptable to the War Office as suitable for service in the field and producible in Canada was given consideration.

A pattern known as "1916 dismounted equipment" was adopted late in the year 1915 and was issued to all C.E.F. in Canada; very many battalions trained with it in Canada and on the whole it proved satisfactory. When the 4th Division, C.E.F., left England for the front it was in possession of this equipment, but later War Office "Web" was issued to replace it, without expense to the Canadian public, the reason of the G.O.C. in Chief B.E.F., being as below:

"That though the Canadian equipment was made of excellent material it did not give the same measure of comfort on the march as the "web" and was less suitable for carrying ammunition in charger clips.

"That the "gas helmet" could not be tucked away under the soldier's jacket collar properly or rapidly owing to the wide strap which fits close on the shoulders."

In conclusion, it might be said that when the war commenced the department had no other equipment to issue the men and that as War Office could not meet its own necessities then, or during the following 18 months for the continually expanding British army, "web" could not be obtained for the C.E.F., as it has never been made in Canada. Further, that though the Canadian equipment has not had much use in the field for war purposes, the whole that has been purchased has had hard and constant use for training purposes, and at this moment is continued in use in England and Canada until the men are placed under orders as reinforcements for the front, when it is replaced by "web" to accustom the men to its use. That the Canadian equipment issued to the overseas units when leaving Canada had on their arrival in England been scrapped or otherwise destroyed is without foundation in fact.

(Sgd.) D. A. Macdonald,
Major-General, Quartermaster-General.

Then I asked Sir George Perley for a statement, and he has given me the following statement in a cable message under date of the 31st of January, 1917:

London, Jan. 31, 1917.

Your 29th. Statements that Canadian leather equipment has been burned on arrival in England are absurd and untrue. Oliver equipment with which First Division proceeded to France was subsequently replaced here without expense to Canadian public and it was returned to Canada early in 1915 for use there. Converted Oliver equipment with which Second Division was equipped was replaced before going to France and later returned to Canada for further service. 1916 Canadian leather equipment with which Fourth Division proceeded to France was eventually replaced by web equipment without expense to Canadian public. Large number of troops in training in England use Canadian leather equipment. Sufficient web equipment is now being supplied troops in training in England to enable reinforcements to proceed overseas with acceptable equipment properly adjusted.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE.

AUTHORITY OF THE SPEAKER.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN rose to move:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate of Canada it is advisable that the Speaker of the Senate, who is an appointee of the Government of the day, shall not have the right, power or authority to censor, suppress or prevent the entry on the Minutes and Proceedings of the Senate of any question or motion addressed to the Government on public matters, political issues or the administration of the affairs of the country, without the consent and approval of the Senate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand that my honourable friend puts this in the form of a motion. It must be quite apparent to the honourable gentleman that he will have to conform to the rules of the Senate if he wishes to change a standing rule of the Senate. The Senate will have to be summoned in the usual way to deal with the subject.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: This is not a motion. It is a resolution asking this honourable House to express an opinion on a matter concerning the rules and regulations of the Senate; therefore it is perfectly in order, and is absolutely necessary under the circumstances.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I raise the point of order that my honourable friend cannot change a standing rule by this method. This resolution is entirely ineffective. It simply asks that the rule be changed without stating what is to be done in that direction.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: This is the beginning of an agitation. A committee could not take on itself the responsibility of changing the rules without the instigation of this body. This is not a motion to change the rules; it is a resolution asking the Senate to express the opinion that it is time for a change in the rules, that is all. If we in the Senate, as a deliberative body, are getting far away from the British tradition of free speech and the right of self-government. That is all I have to say. I am not going to tell the honourable the leader of the Government that he is planting the flag of Prussianism——

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I take exception to that, I call my honourable friend to order. In the first place, he has no right to ascribe motives to me; and, in the second place—and I ask the Speaker to rule upon the question—a reflection is cast upon the presiding officer of the Senate, which is something the honourable gentleman has not any right to do.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I totally disagree with the honourable gentleman from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran). Rule 16 of the Senate is as follows:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

The Speaker preserves order and decorum, and decides questions of order, subject to an appeal to the Senate. In explaining a point of order or practice he states the rule or authority applicable to the case.

When the rules of this House were revised in the session of 1906 the Speaker was given the power to preserve order and decorum. Up to that time the Speaker could not interfere and tell a member when he was out of order. That was a duty which rested upon the Senate, and it was not very well discharged. Then, at the close of our rules there is the provision that in matters not expressly provided for by the rules we shall be governed by the rules of the House of Lords. In the House of Lords, if a motion is presented or a notice given which he deems to be objectionable, the Speaker has the right to say that that motion shall not appear in the order of business; and I think it would be a very unfortunate thing of we were to undertake to strip the Speaker of all authority. Our Speaker, as every honourable gentleman must admit, is not given to interfering unduly with the business of the House; on the contrary, I think that he is rather disposed to be too lenient, and I cannot understand why the honourable gentleman from Victoria should have moved such a resolution as this.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The motion made by the honourable member for Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran), I think, comes in conflict with one of the rules of this House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I am very pleased to hear that we are of the same opinion. As the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) has just said, by the rules of this House and the rules of Parliament the Speaker has practically to intervene to prevent the insertion in our Journals or on the Order Paper of any motion that he finds improper.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: But what I want to point out is this: In such a case as the present, when it is brought to the attention of the Speaker, if he has a right he has also a duty to perform, and that duty is to communicate with the member who has given the notice so as to put him in a position to correct his notice. That is a matter of courtesy.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I understand the Speaker to say that he had done that.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: No; I understand him to say that he could not do it, because the member was absent.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I was not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We are discussing a past case. Are we not discussing the question of principle irrespective of concrete cases?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I understand that perfectly well. Our rule 26 says:

> Any notice containing unbecoming expressions, or which offends against any rule or order of the Senate, if not amended by the senator giving the same, is not allowed by the speaker to appear on the notice paper.

Consequently the member who gave the notice ought to be communicated with. Coming now to the proposition made by my honourable friend from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran), who wants to have the opinion of the Senate expressed, I suppose he wants an academic opinion. Does he intend moving for an alteration of our rules?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No; not till after I get an expression of opinion from this honourable House. Then I will make a motion, but not now. I am asking simply for an expression of opinion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I should not take more than five minutes to look up whether this procedure is in order or not.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, I will not take one minute.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I rise to a question of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am entitled to my say on this after the adverse criticism. My object in putting this resolution on the order paper for consideration by this honourable body was not to disobey the rules, not to dispute the actual authority of the Speaker at all. My object was to reinstate the conditions which prevailed in the Senate in its good old days of democratic rule, when there was no interference with public debate either by the representatives of the government of the day or by their appointee in the Chair, except on special demand by one of the members of the House pointing out to the Speaker that the discussion was not in order, or that the honourable gentleman who was speaking was out of order. That was the privilege which existed in the good old days, up to about ten years ago. The Speaker could not intervene in any respect.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I again rise to a question of order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Am I not to be allowed to speak? Do not raise the Prussian flag every time I talk.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I take this position. This honourable House has reached the point where it is best to determine whether the honourable gentleman from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran) is going to dominate this House by his irregularities in discussion, or whether this Senate is going to be conducted in an orderly way.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Where is the point of order? I do not want to be dominated by anybody.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I propose hereafter, whenever the honourable gentleman is out of order, to raise the question of order if nobody else does.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Then do not make a speech on it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I raise the question of order, and I ask the Speaker to pass upon it at once, under rule 16, which provides:

> The Speaker preserves order and decorum and decides questions of order, subject to an appeal to the Senate. In explaining a point of order or practice he states the rule or authority applicable to the case.

I therefore find that the honourable gentleman has moved:

> That in the opinion of the Senate of Canada it is advisable that the Speaker of the Senate, who is an appointee of the government of the day, shall not have the right—to exercise the rules of the Senate—that is what it means—

> —shall not have the right, power or authority—

—to enforce rule 16. Now, if any honourable gentleman wants to have these rules repealed or changed, there is a proper method laid down in the rules for doing so; and, if the proper method is not taken, I propose to take exception to any other course being pursued. I would now ask the ruling of the Chair upon that resolution.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Well, I withdraw the motion in compliance with the dogmatic utterance of the leader of the Government.

The motion was withdrawn.

THE SENATE AND HON. THOMAS CHAPAIS.

MOTION DROPPED.

On the order:

Motion by the Hon. Mr. Cloran:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for the production of all correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister or any member of the Government and Hon. Mr. Chapais, concerning an offer to the latter of a seat in the Senate.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I hope there will not be any dogmatism about this. It is simply a motion asking for public correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister of this country and a very distinguished Conservative leader in the province of Quebec regarding a Senate appointment. I feel that the Government is in difficulty enough at the present without putting it into the embarrassment of producing this correspondence. The party of the second part has furnished all the information we require; so we do not need any information from the Government. We have the true side of the question from the Hon. Thomas Chapais himself. So I ask that the motion be allowed to drop.

The motion was dropped.

THE FRENCH PRESS.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I would draw the attention of this honourable House to an article that was published yesterday in the Montreal Gazette, but which escaped my notice yesterday because I was on board a train and arrived here too late to take the matter up. It is dated Monday, August 6, 1917, and is entitled, "The French Press":

A good many French Canadians who were seen on Saturday and Sunday were satisfied that the Conscription Bill was surely to become law, that the majority in the Senate was so decisive, and that the adhesion of so many Liberals of mark went to show that the voice of Parliament is certainly the voice of the country. A few hours before the vote the well informed correspondent of Le Devoir sent the following mischievous despatch to his paper; "If a few more senators follow the example of Senator Beaubien the Government majority might be in danger, and this is what will probably happen. It is said in fact, that Catholic ministers and members have received a letter from the highest ecclesiastical authority tracing their duty regarding the sending of clerics to the barracks, and that none of these gentlemen will consent to have religion take a second place to politics."

This despatch—

You see it was a rumour, but with the Gazette it is no longer a rumour.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: That is not true.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY (reading):

This despatch created a great deal of interest in political and religious circles for the reason that people supposed the "highest ecclesiastical authority" was no other than Mgr. Stagni, the personal representative of the Holy Father at the capital. The readers of Le Devoir may have remembered that the first prelates in Rome and throughout Italy were appealing even to their priests to go to the front, consequently they could not understand why one of their confreres temporarily located on British soil would interfere in any way possible with a Canadian minister or senator in the discharge of his sacred duty to the state, and empire, the true champion of religious liberty throughout the world.

I may say, en passant, that there is not a word of truth in all that. Never has any senator received from the authorities of the Church any despatch telling him how to vote on the question. As a matter of fact, the delegate in Ottawa of His Holiness the Pope is not over the bishops at all. He is the representative of the Pope here and reports to His Holiness what is going on; that is all he can do. He cannot intervene in any diocese in this country. The Bishops are superior to him:

This uneasiness was however soon dissipated when it became known that the author of the extraordinary letter to the Catholic ministers and senators was not the Pope's representative in the Dominion, but Mgr. Begin, Cardinal Archbishop of Quebec, who had already placed the faithful in a very embarrassing position by heading the episcopal request to Sir Robert Borden to disallow the Ontario school law, although the three ablest bishops of the province squarely declined to follow the good Cardinal's lead. It was learned yesterday from a very high religious authority that no other prelate had joined His Eminence in the latest attempt to impose his will upon a British Parliament, and that Cardinal Begin had been absolutely alone in his action.

It is a pity that a journal like the Gazette should spread such news. There is not a word of truth in that or any foundation for it.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not wish to interrupt the honourable gentleman, but we saw also in the press that the present Minister of Justice had been in conference with Cardinal Bégin in Quebec. Perhaps that is what gave rise to the story.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY (reading):

When the unfortunate demand was made by Senator Landry upon the bishops to sign the request for disallowance—

I ask you to remark the words:

—when the unfortunate demand was made by Senator Landry upon the bishops to sign the request for disallowance, the senatorial agitator simply told them that the Cardinal had signed and that they should do likewise, although he was brought up all standing when the Archbishop of Montreal, Mgr. Gauthier, and the Bishop of Valleyfield declined to be stampeded, and it became known soon after that several of the suffregans at once wrote their archbishop expressing regret that, in an unguarded moment, their good faith had been surprised, and that they had been induced to co-operate in a movement destined to do more harm than good to the cause they had at heart. The same thing happened on Friday evening at Ottawa, for it is an open secret that when several senators heard of the Cardinal's letter telling British parliamentarians how they should vote, they at once decided to support the ministerial measure, thus increasing the majority for conscription and accepting the Bill without modification.

Well, that goes to prove that we are not governed by our Church in political matters, and, that is an answer to all the cries that have been heard against us in the past.

In connection with these episcopal incidents—

I deny that statement also:

In connection with these episcopal incidents, it may be related that although His Lordship of Three Rivers, Mgr. Cloutier, affixed his name to the Landry disallowance document, he regretted his action so bitterly that after the vote had been taken in the House of Commons, His Lordship wrote to the Hon. Col. Blondin—

That is where the cat comes out.

—commending the minister's attitude in voting against the Lapointe motion, and adding that the minister from the Three Rivers district could not very well have done otherwise.

You see, the Gazette is confusing entirely the demand for disallowance with the motion of Mr. Lapointe. The man who wrote that did not go into the question.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: What paper is that quoted from?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: From the Gazette of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: It is copied from some other paper.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Not at all. When quotation is made from another paper the name of the paper is given. I regret this, because I consider the Gazette one of the best papers in the country.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It is.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: It is one of the best papers, and I regret that it has opened its columns to such a piece of—I do not know what to call it. At all events, I deny the statements made in the article, and I protest against the attack upon the Cardinal at Quebec, Cardinal Begin, and against comparing his conduct with that of others in order to glorify the others in such a way as to condemn the head of the Church in Canada. That is my protest, and I wanted to make it here.

MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

FURTHER CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On the order :

House again in Committee of the Whole on Bill 75, an Act respecting Military Service.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Before His Honour leaves the Chair I wish to ask a question of the honourable leader of the Government and to make the necessary preliminary explanation. I find this language in the preamble of Bill 75 :

And whereas to maintain and support the Canadian Expeditionary Force now engaged in active service overseas for the defence and security of Canada, the preservation of the Empire and of human liberty, it is necessary to provide reinforcements for such Expeditionary Force;

And whereas enough men do not volunteer to provide such reinforcements;—

That is the statement upon which the whole Bill is based; and I had the honour the other day of showing, I think, that the Bill was not necessary for that purpose, because the number of recruits coming in was decidedly greater than the number of casualties. My attention has been called to the fact that in another place yesterday a question was asked about this matter, and the Minister of Militia made the statement that in the month of July there were 4,257 recruits and 3,637 casualties. It was stated further, in the course of the day, that there were in England 124,399 Canadian troops. So it is quite clear that there is no necessity for passing this measure in order to furnish necessary reinforcements, and the question that I wish to ask the honourable leader of the Government is, whether in view of these circumstances he does not think it wise to drop this Bill.

The Senate then again went into Committee on the Bill.

On section 5—tribunals:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would like to ask the leader of the Government before what tribunal a man will be brought who has failed to report as provided in subsection 4 of section 4. Who will issue the warrant, and before what tribunal?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The criminal machinery of the Dominion will be invoked for the prosecution of such an offence.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Do I understand then that the man will be brought before the ordinary courts of the country—magistrates and justices of the peace?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then I see throughout the Bill provisions for other penalties—fine and imprisonment for parties who violate the provisions of this Act. For instance, in section 11, subsection 4, there is a penalty for false representation; in subsection 5 there is a penalty for applying to more than one local tribunal for a certificate; in subsection 6 there is a penalty for altering or a tampering with certificates, or false representation. Do I understand that, when a man shall be prosecuted for infringing the Act, and the penalty shall be applied, it will be through one of our ordinary criminal tribunals?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would refer my honourable friend to sections 6 and 7, in which the jurisdiction of the local tribunals and the appeal tribunals is defined. The fundamental duty of these tribunals will be to determine to what class the party called out belongs.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And the exemptions?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And the exemptions.

Hon. Mr. POWER.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But all other infringements of the Act will be dealt with by the ordinary tribunals of each province?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURARD: Then does my honourable friend hold that subsection 6 of section 5, which refers to the decision of any tribunal, applies only to the tribunals described in section 5?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, it has relation to the tribunals to be established by this Act, and must necessarily apply to the exercise of the jurisdiction of those tribunals. We are anticipating what the jurisdiction is; we have not approached that yet. The authority of these tribunals is defined by sections 6, 7 and 8. The suspension of habeas corpus, certiorari, prohibition, mandamus, etc., applies only to the acts of these tribunals.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is the honourable gentleman able to point out a single case under those sections wherein the liberty of the subject is affected?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the liberty of the subject is not affected, my honourable friend has no ground of complaint.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But if the decisions of those tribunals may be reviewed, or be sought to be reviewed —for example, as to the class in which a man who has been called will stand, or whether his demand for exemption shall be accepted or rejected—how can a demand for a writ of habeas corpus be made, since the liberty of the subject will not be affected by the decisions of that first tribunal or the tribunal deciding an appeal?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The wisdom of this provision lies in the desirability of declaring what the law is and what the law shall be pertaining to these tribunals. In the first place, it is very undesirable that the authority of these tribunals should be obstructed or blocked unnecessarily. Machinery of the most elaborate kind is provided to give redress to anyone who may be called, and who may think that a wrong has been done him. In the first place, the case is decided by the local tribunal; then the party has an appeal under section 7 to the appeal tribunal; and from that he can go to the final tribunal. Now let us assume for a moment that habeas corpus would be applicable in such case—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But how would it be? Will my learned friend show me how the writ of habeas corpus can be sought for when there is no restriction of the liberty of the subject?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What I am trying to impress upon my honourable friend is that it is desirable that the law relating to these tribunals should be declared in the Act, and that is what is being done. Yet, in face of a clear provision against habeas corpus, some one, placing an entirely different interpretation upon the Act, might invoke the aid of a party in the issue of a habeas corpus.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But no habeas corpus can be issued till the party's liberty has been restricted.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is that not what we have said?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, but I asked my hon. friend what is the object of speaking in subsection 6 of section 5 of a writ of habeas corpus and of suspending it when there is no action of those tribunals that can call for the use of the writ of habeas corpus?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let me illustrate. Suppose a difference arose as to whether the man called out was exempt or not. The local tribunal said no. The case went from the local tribunal to the appeal tribunal. But suppose the man so called out should say, "I shall not invoke the appeal tribunal, nor the final tribunal, but I will seek my remedy in the courts, and I will apply for a writ of habeas corpus?"

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He has not been arrested; he is not at that moment under arrest?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We do not know that; we do not know what may be done.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, he cannot be.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We had better discuss those clauses first, and then my honourable friend will know what they mean.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If I understand the honourable gentleman, he says that subsection 6 is intended to apply only to the tribunals mentioned in the first portion of section 5.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is as stated.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Then I suppose the honourable gentleman would have no objection to amending subsection 6 to read:

> No proceeding authorized or pending before any tribunal created in virtue of this Act and no decision of any such tribunal, shall, etc.

and leave the rest as it is.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend allow me to ask him a question, which seems to be the touchstone as to whether his amendment is at all necessary. The first line of subsection 6 reads:

> No proceeding authorized or pending before any tribunal, and no decision of any tribunal, shall, etc.

Now, I would ask my honourable friend what other tribunal can be invoked or set in motion for the purposes of this Bill other than the tribunals mentioned?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman himself gave the answer a few moments ago to my honourable friend for De Lorimier—that all infractions of the Act would come under the ordinary tribunals in the different provinces.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The other tribunals.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Therefore he has acknowledged that these tribunals referred to here will comprise not only the tribunals mentioned in the third, fourth and fifth lines of section 5, but also the ordinary tribunals of the provinces.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my hon. friend point out what other tribunals can be set in motion in connection with the carrying out of this Act?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: All the criminal courts in the several provinces will have to deal with any arrest which is made of any persons who neglect to report.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Why, no.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Surely it is important. The honourable gentleman ackowledged a moment ago that subsection 6 is intended to apply only to the tribunals mentioned in paragraphs a, b, and c, in section 5. If so, there should be no objection to saying it, and if we do not say it the subsection would then apply to the criminal courts in every province.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Although I am not in favour of the Bill, my desire is that when it passes it shall be as nearly perfect as possible, and I would suggest to the honourable leader of the Government that in the definition clause, as the Bill says "Minister" means the Minister of Justice, so if I were in the honourable leader's place I should insert after that the words, "'tribunal' means a tribunal constituted under this Act." As a magistrate's court is a tribunal, the Act should define the name "tribunal" as not applying to anything except the tribunal provided by this Act. It is a very simple amendment, but it would remove any possible doubt. The honourable gentleman may think it is not necessary, but when gentlemen with the acute legal minds of my honourable friends from De Lorimier and De Salaberry think it is susceptible of a different meaning, I should think that the people who will have to administer this Act will be liable to make mistakes. I therefore respectfully urge that suggestion on the attention of the honourable leader.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would correct my honourable friend as to the double meaning which this section is susceptible of. It seems to me quite clear that subsection 6 of section 5 would apply and be held to apply to the tribunals mentioned in section 5; but I say that if none of those tribunals has anything to do with restricting the liberty of the subject, the words should not be inserted in reference to the suspending of a habeas corpus.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think the difficulty arises from the fact that subsection 6 uses a very general term—"any tribunal." As I understand the scheme of this Act, there are two sets of jurisdictions created by it or provided for, which will be resorted to under this Act. One set of jurisdictions is constituted by the three tribunals—local tribunals, appeal tribunals, and the central appeal judge. What is the jurisdiction of this set—the local tribunal, the appeal tribunal and the central appeal judge? It is to decide questions of exemption throughout the country, that of the Act itself. What is the other jurisdiction to which the Act may be applied? The other jurisdiction is the ordinary jurisdiction throughout the country, that of the criminal courts. A resort may be had to those criminal courts for the imposition of fines and penalties provided by this Act. The first set of jurisdictions I mentioned are given one specific power to decide exemptions and the other questions which will arise in the operation of the Act. The other set of jurisdiction is that of the criminal courts, to which resort will be had if imprisonment is demanded or a fine is sought to be imposed.

Now, when you come to subsection 6 you make no distinction. You say that neither shall there be any proceeding ordered by habeas corpus, and so on. Therefore the general power of the ordinary criminal courts to entertain a writ of habeas corpus is taken away. You are taking it away not only from the three tribunals established under the Act, but from all the other jurisdictions as well. That is what my honourable friends object to. Why not define the word "tribunal" and remove the difficulty?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Allow me to illustrate how the habeas corpus might be invoked in order to obstruct the carrying out of the Act, and also why this applies and must apply only to the local tribunals. I shall point out how the courts might be invoked for the issuance of habeas corpus.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman has used the expression, "local tribunals."

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will use the word "tribunal."

Hon Mr. DANDURAND: Under this Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Created by this Act?

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In the first place, when a man is called, if he does not get an exemption he is called upon to report to the military authorities and is placed upon active service. In the next place, he is held as a soldier, and then, if my honourable friend likes to use the expression, he is "deprived of his liberty" because he is held as a soldier under the Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does my honourable friend consider that a ground for not applying the habeas corpus?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; he is held as a soldier. Now, I think my honourable friends will see the application of the section to the entire Bill. If a man is held as a soldier, he may get it into his head, or some legal adviser may counsel him, that he cannot be held, that he is entitled to habeas corpus, and he at once proceeds to invoke the courts.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: When my honourable friend speaks of a man being held, does he mean physically held?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Physically held.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is to say, that he is enrolled and in barracks.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He is held, yes. There is a very well-known case in Quebec—the Fournier case—which came before the Chief Justice of the Superior Court on October 10, 1916. With the permission of honourable gentlemen I shall read a short extract from the judgment. The honourable the Chief Justice said:

As a matter of fact, is the soldier deprived of his liberty owing to the circumstance that he is submitted to military discipline? In other words, is discipline a restraint upon the liberty of the soldier?

It would, forsooth, sound anomalous to be told that the soldier, officer or private, over or under 18 years of age, who secures peace and security to his country, is not a free man because, by virtue of his enlistment and of military regulations, he is bound to a certain discipline which the very interest of efficient military service demands.

Without a doubt, the soldier's goings and comings, whether in time of war or of peace, in military camps or elsewhere are, to some extent, curtailed for motives of public and moral order, and to the great advantage of the Army, either through the necessities of discipline or through formalities of a technical nature; but such formalities or discipline do not amount to what in law is termed a detention or restraint upon liberty. These are mere consequences of a contract entered into for the public good. Such is the case for the diverse callings of life, purporting, all of them, duties and obligations which may be likened to so many hindrances to individual liberty. Any one who hires his services surrenders more or less of his liberty; he is, while the contract lasts, the liegeman of his employer.

Though liberty be of supreme importance, however, many are the circumstances when it must make way to public interest. For instance, it is generally considered an imposition to be subpœnaed as a witness and detained before the courts or to be called upon to sit on a jury for days, but such responsibilities cannot be evaded for the reason that they are prescribed in furtherance of public weal.

Without further comment, we are inclined to believe that Private Fournier is not illegally detained or deprived of his liberty because he must comply with military discipline.

Let us deal with the first question: What is the object of the writ of habeas corpus?

Enlistment is a contract of the subject with his King for the defence of the country. The said contract is not void for the simple reason that it is entered into by a minor; at the most, would it be, according to our code, as hereinafter established, annullable through the ordinary course.

It is a well settled canon of law that the writ of habeas corpus is not granted to try the validity of contracts. The object of the habeas corpus is to see that no person is deprived of his liberty illegally or against his will, and not to determine the respective rights of parties one over another.

Now, the only question to be determined is the right respectively of the State and of the man who is called out. A habeas corpus case does not lie, but that does not prevent legal gentlemen from advising their clients that habeas corpus would lie, and the probability is that the courts of the Dominion would be blocked by being invoked for injunction prohibitions and writs of mandamus, certiorari, habeas corpus, or whatever might be sought. We have furnished most ample appellate machinery and every man can get redress by going to the Supreme Court. None of the other courts can give greater redress than these courts.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman should have no objection to accepting the amendment of the honourable member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power). We ask the honourable gentleman to state clearly what he admits to be the intention of the Act. We ask him to have it clearly stated that it applies only to the tribunals constituted by the Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend show me where the word "tribunal" is used in any of our statutes? If it is used, I am unaware of it. I think the word used is "court."

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman has just demonstrated most clearly that what he is afraid of—as in the very case which he has cited—is the action of the ordinary tribunal. It was not a tribunal created under this Act. It was the court of the King's Bench, to which the application had been made; and which was acting under the local jurisdiction, in carrying out the laws of the province and administering justice in the province. It seems to me that it is perfectly clear that if subsection 6 were to remain as it is, and "tribunal," as was very properly said by the honourable member for Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt), were not defined. "any tribunal" would cover not only the tribunals mentioned in subsections a, b and c of this Act, but all that the words could cover.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I attach great value to the expressions of opinion of my honourable friend on subjects like these. If my honourable friends, before we finally pass the Bill, think it necessary to make some declaration of this character, I am quite willing that we should further consider the matter. Honourable gentlemen might look into this question.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I may say that I have already looked into it very carefully, and I do not see how there can be two opinions.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes, there can be.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Subsection 6 itself shows the meaning of the word "tribunal", because the distinction is drawn between the tribunals and the courts. It begins in this way:

No proceeding authorized or pending before any tribunal—and so forth. Then, at line 4, it says:

—whether of the like kind or otherwise issuing out of any court.

This word "tribunal" is new, and peculiar only to this Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman holds to the view that subsection 6 applies exclusively to tribunals defined or mentioned in the other part of section 5?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Defined in this Act —the three tribunals. They are distinct from the other courts in the provinces.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then, what objection is there, since the word "tribunal" is peculiar to this Act, to saying "tribunal means a tribunal constituted under this Act"?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Why do you want to paint the rose?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It seems to me that if you insert a definition we shall all be satisfied, as we are agreed as to what the word "tribunal" means. It is very easy to add the definition.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Will my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), who seldom makes factious opposition, say whether it would do any good to the Act?

Hon. Mr. POWER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Certainly it will. We are making an Act which will come into operation in every nook and corner of the country and which is liable to be tested by all the jurisdictions and all the judges. It will go before the humblest justice of the peace, and when we say that this last subsection of clause 5 is very wide in its construction and ask, does it clearly mean the tribunals under this Act, the Government says, "Yes." I see around me gentlemen of the legal fraternity who are afraid that judges or courts may think otherwise,—that they may think this provision applies to all tribunals of the land, all those tribunals that will be charged with applying a sanction to an infringement of this Act. We are simply losing time, when by a simple stroke of the pen we could declare what it means.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend lay his amendment on the Table so that I may take it up with the Minister of Justice?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is it possible that we are not at one? I am going to give a concrete case. Let us say that the three tribunals constituted by the Act have all pronounced against a case of exemption, and a final decision has been given: a man is held recalcitrant. Proceedings are taken before the Court of King's Bench, say in Montreal, for imprisonment because the man is not willing to abide by the decision given by the last tribunal constituted under the Act. Is it intended, when such proceedings are taken and the man is in jail, that habeas corpus or certiorari shall not be available?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As to the findings of these tribunals.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is just it. We have been working on the supposition that that was not the intention of the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: These tribunals simply set the law in motion. It is not they who try a man and fine him or punish him.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I understand that. I believe that we are not at one. We are discussing this question on the supposition that the Bill meant a certain thing, because my honourable friend said that subsection 6 did not apply to any tribunal except the tribunals constituted under this Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Subclause 6 refers only to the tribunals mentioned in this Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friends and myself have supposed that it was not intended that a writ of habeas corpus should be refused in the courts of ordinary jurisdiction throughout the land. We have been led astray unwittingly, by the explanation of the honourable the leader of the Government. I understand that my honourable friend wants to leave that section as it is.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Question.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I must confess that I am getting confused, and I want to be set right by the leader of the Government. The honourable gentleman declares that subsection 6 of clause 5 applies only to an attempt to stop an action in process, or the action of the tribunals mentioned in clause 5.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is what it says.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: After one of these tribunals has, on a question of exemption, rejected the claims of a person and in consequence that person falls under the law, and must answer the call, if he refuses to answer the call, is he not summoned before another tribunal than those mentioned in clause 5? Is he not summoned before a police magistrate or a justice of the peace?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is not a tribunal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He is summoned before a police magistrate or a justice of the peace. For the first time his liberty is restrained; for the first time he is arrested. Now, is the Habeas Corpus Act suspended in that case?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend allow me to make a suggestion to him? We are anticipating certain sections without having considered them. Honourable gentlemen perhaps have not the accurate knowledge they should have as to what jurisdiction is of the three tribunals which we are establishing.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The honourable gentleman has given us the clauses.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And it is entirely improper for honourable gentlemen to anticipate those clauses. My idea is that we should pass this section and then go on to sections 6, 7 and 8, and we shall give every consideration to my honourable friend's amendment.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is it the intention of the Bill that, when the appeal court has dealt with the matter that precludes any other court from going into the question on any point?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is what it means?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is what it is for. That is a final tribunal.

Hon. Mr BELCOURT: Then the result would be that after these three courts, including the final appeal court, have pronounced, if the Crown should institute proceedings of some kind or other before a court of ordinary jurisdiction, there is no defence to be made on any ground whatever.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not as to the proceedings of the tribunal. There may be something wrong in the conviction by the magistrate. The habeas corpus would apply in that case.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No matter what my honourable friend says, the Act says no.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The only matter at issue is the decision of the tribunal

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes, I know. Will my honourable friend permit me? I hope he does not think I am talking for the sake of talking.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Certainly not. I did not say anything to infer that, I hope.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Then, let us look at the wording of this section I must read the whole of it:

> No proceedings authorized or pending before any tribunal and no decision of any tribunal shall by means of an injunction, prohibition, mandamus, certiorari, habeas corpus, or any other process, whether of the like kind or otherwise issuing out of any court—

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Out of any court whatever.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is a writ issuing out of any court.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT (reading):

> —be enjoined, restrained, stayed, removed or subjected to review or consideration, upon any ground whether arising out of alleged absence of jurisdiction in the tribunal, nullity, defect or irregularity of the proceedings or any other cause whatsoever nor shall any such proceeding or decision be questioned, reviewed or considered collaterally in any action or proceeding civil or criminal.

If that does not prevent any kind of defence whatever before the ordinary criminal courts of the land, I should like to know what kind of language would do it. So that we must understand one another. If that is the intention of the Bill, that, once the final appeal court has decided upon the question, there can be no review, then, perhaps the language is all right.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: So long as it is the proceedings of the tribunal that are involved.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No. Take the case I have put. The local courts have finished their work and pronounced finally upon, say, a case of exemption, of a man refusing to obey. He is taken to jail. The Crown institutes proceedings itself before some criminal court to impose a penalty. That man has no defence, his mouth is closed, he cannot say anything before this court. That is according to the wording of this section. If not, I do not know what it does mean. It allows no defence of any kind, either as to the facts, or the irregularity of the proceedings, or in law. The man is absolutely without defence.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I presume that what would be before the court would be the record of the tribunal as to that particular individual, and that would speak for itself.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes, the section says that the judge cannot review it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Certainly, he can, before it goes before the final court of appeal. It goes before the Supreme Court of Canada, and that is final.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: For the moment I am not arguing one way or the other; I am trying to get at what the meaning of this section is. I want to know, in two words, whether the section does not intend that, when once the final appeal court created under this Act has pronounced, no other court in the land can have one word to say about the matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I can answer that question in one word: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Honourable gentlemen, I think it is about time for me to say a word.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have listened to the very able discussion with regard to the habeas corpus, the most valuable adjunct in the Magna Charta of Great Britain.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Magna Charta was the adjunct.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The habeas corpus is the brightest flower in that document. It overrides the will of the King of England. The King himself cannot keep a man in jail until after habeas corpus proceedings are determined. Neither the King himself nor all Parliament can, on any consideration, military or otherwise, deny any British subject the right of a writ of habeas corpus, and here in Canada, this petty people of 7,000,000 undertake to uproot and override this great privilege which was fought for some nine hundred years ago, and has been maintained as the palladium of liberty for the British people, and here in this Parliament, under a decrepit dying Government, this Act is forced upon us. The Government is not content with suppressing the rights of marriage, as they have done in a previous section of the Bill, they now attempt to suppress the liberties of the subject. What more could the Kaiser do if he were to be head of the Government here in Canada? I ask that in all solemnity of purpose. What more could the Kaiser do here in Canada than is being done now under a so-called British, free Government? I hold that this Act is not in conformity with the traditions of British liberty. It is not in conformity with the desires or the needs of the Canadian people. I hold, and have felt throughout all this debate, that the sweep will be semi-continental. The great Liberal party of the West have declared last night, and are declaring today, that this kind of legislation must not be tolerated, and that if passed, it must be set aside. I fail to see why the Government insists on this odious measure. The honourable leader of the Government says, "There can be no appeal because it is a military matter." I beg to differ with him. It is very strange that my friends on this side of the House do not see the difference. He quoted military law and decisions of judges that in military matters civil authority had no right to interfere. That is the sum and substance of his statement. Well, now, we have a British subject who is called before the first tribunal and the third, and there is a final decision by the appeal court against his demand for exemption. That man is not a military man; that man is still a civilian. He does not come under military law; he is before that court as a plain British subject in civilian clothes, subject to no military authority, command, or control. And we tell that man, a civilian, a plain British subject, that he has no more right, before he has taken the oath of allegiance, before he is attested, before he is enlisted. That is absurd. Once the appeal court has decided that his demand for exemption is not well founded, what is going to happen? The appeal court judge says, "Your request for exemption is refused." Well, is there any provision in this Act to say who is going to order his arrest? I admit that the three courts would be justified in refusing his demand for exemption—the first tribunal and the second and the appeal court. But, when they have rendered the decision, what judge of any tribunal or court undertakes the task of the high constable, of the high executioner, or the warden of the penitentiary? All the judge on the bench does is to render his decision. When the appeal court has rendered its final decision in regard to the claim of a man to be exempted, is there any provision in this Act which can take away his liberty? I fail to see that there is. Therefore, if he is arrested after the final decision of the appeal court, why take away from him his right to demand a writ of habeas corpus? He has a right to question the authority of any officer or other person who may put him in prison or restrain his liberty—or treat him as a criminal. The arguments which I am presenting are arguments of common sense, arguments based on traditional British liberty, as protected by laws which have stood for the nine hundred or a thousand years on the statute books of England, and which are going to be ignored by a majority vote in this House and in the other House. It is discreditable to this country to have such things perpetrated in the name of conscription. I hold with the honourable gentlemen who, very ably and profoundly, spoke on this subject from another point of view; I agree with them in principle, and I hold that the views I am putting forth now are those based on common sense, good judgment, and the common right of the British subject. I hope that my honourable friends on this side will insist on their demand that this Bill be amended to safeguard the rights of the British subject to a writ of habeas corpus, which the King himself cannot trespass upon.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I would ask the honourable the leader of the Government in this House this question. I am cited before the courts according to clause 11, subsection 4, and condemned—

> Any person who makes any false statement or representation shall be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to imprisonment for any term not exceeding twelve months with or without hard labour.

In case I am condemned to twelve months' imprisonment, under this clause, have I any right of appeal?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say yes, because that does not involve the proceedings of the tribunal. If a habeas corpus lay in that case, you would be entitled to it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Do I understand that subsection 6 of section 5 is to stand?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. My honourable friend will not, apparently, accept what I have said. What I did say to my honourable friend was that if he wants to amend 2, I want to carry 6, and that I would discuss his amendment with the Minister of Justice and go back to the clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will press my amendment, or I will not, according to the stand which my honourable friend takes. That is why I want to know what my honourable friend has decided.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman said he would consent to suspending subsection 6.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) has an amendment. I am willing that the section should stand, but I want only the one amendment, that moved by the honourable gentleman from Halifax. I am not allowing this to stand in order that several other amendments may be moved. My honourable friend will have to withdraw his amendment.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) can easily dispose of my amendment.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If it occurs to us to make other amendments, we should be free to do so. At first sight I thought the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from Halifax would fully cover the case; but there may be some doubt, and I should like to look into the matter more closely.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may tell my honourable friend that I had not examined very closely the last phrase of subsection 6 of section 5 and its effect upon any further proceedings. My honourable friend from Ottawa has drawn my attention to the wording: "nor shall any such proceeding or decision be question, reviewed or considered collaterally in any action or proceeding, civil or criminal." This is very broad, and, since my honourable friend will allow subsection 6 to stand, I am sure he will allow the members of the Senate to apply their faculties to what they understand to be the proper interpretation of this subsection, and consider it until it comes up this evening.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend goes far beyond the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Halifax. The doubt that arose in my honourable friend's mind was whether these tribunals should not be specifically defined as relating to the tribunals mentioned in section 5; but my honourable friend now proceeds to attack the suspension of the habeas corpus entirely—the very fundamental principle which runs through this clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes, but my honourable friend will admit that there was cause for me to ask that the habeas corpus Act suspension, which is sought or established by this Act, be not decreed. It applied to all tribunals, whether of criminal jurisdiction or not. If it applied to all tribunals then I intended to maintain my demand that the word "habeas corpus" be struck out. If it applied only to these tribunals, inasmuch as they do not restrict the liberty of the subject, I intended to ask as well that the words be struck out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will make this proposal to my honourable friend, that we go on and consider the clauses relating to local tribunals. Then, having knowledge as to what their constitution is, we can go back to subsection 6 of section 5 and dispose of it.

Subsection 6 of section 5 stands.

On subsection 2 of section 6—removal of local tribunal:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What would be the object of the removal of the seat of a local tribunal?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To make it peripatetic, so to speak; to suit the convenience of the classes that may be called in different places

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But it is proposed to establish several local tribunals in each province.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The local tribunal would not be established just in one place.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is it by judicial districts that the Government intends to proceed, or by county?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It rather contemplates making use of each judicial district as a territory for the work of a tribunal.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The local tribunal is called upon merely to hear and decide applications for exemptions, and that is the extent of its jurisdiction?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, that is right.

Subsection 2 of section 6 was agreed to.

On subsection 3 of section 6—membership of local tribunal:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY (reading): "One member shall be appointed by a Board of Selection to be established by joint resolution of the Senate and House of Commons." What is that Board of Selection?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Parliament will select this committee before prorogation.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Out of its members?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Or outside? Not necessarily members only?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not necessarily of its members, and yet there is nothing to preclude members being appointed. I should think that the Board of Selection would in all probability be from outside the House.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I suppose the deputy judge would act only in the absence of the county court judge?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The deputy judge is performing at the time the duties of the county court judge, as will be seen from the language of the section, and therefore to all intents and purposes he is acting as the judge of the county.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I do not take objection to the principle. I think it is quite proper to say that the deputy judge may act, but I would call the attention of the honourable gentleman to this, that I am afraid the Bill is creating two different functionaries who will have equal status if you do not provide that the deputy judge shall act in the absence of the judge.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He acts in his capacity as judge. It is clear that he can only act while he is authorized by law to act for the county judge for the time being.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Those two different persons, the county court judge and the deputy judge, are persona designata; therefore, as you are designating the persons who may act, you should state that one shall act only in the absence of the other.

Subsection 3 of section 6 was agreed to.

On subsection 6 of section 6—penalty for not acting:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: What about the habeas corpus in that case?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He might be entitled to it, because that is not the final tribunal.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The summary conviction is not made and the penalty for not acting is not inflicted by the tribunal itself?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, the tribunal would not act in such a case.

Subsection 6 of section 6 was agreed to.

On subsection 7 of section 6—local tribunal to decide on exemptions:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would draw attention to an omission. Under the subsections which we have just adopted, it might fall to a judge, as a member of the tribunal, to decide in the case of a son, a brother or other near relative. I do not think it fair to impose that duty, yet it is compulsory under this Act. I would suggest that the honourable gentleman should insert a provision for cases of that kind, so that the case might be dealt with by the acting judge or some one else. The honourable gentleman would appreciate the position in which it would put the judge, who, because of the relationship, might be suspected of undue favour to the applicant.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should be very glad to take that up before we conclude our consideration of the Bill.

Subsection 7 of section 6 was agreed to.

On section 7—appeal tribunal established:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I wish to amend that by a subsection reading as follows:

The judge of the Territorial Court, or the person appointed in the place of the said judge, under the provisions of the Yukon Act, shall constitute the Appeal Tribunal for the Yukon Territory.

That is to meet the peculiar local conditions in the Yukon Territory.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Do I understand this section 7 as constituting an appeal court composed of only one judge?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: So that you have an appeal court constituted with one judge to decide questions that have been passed upon by two judges?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, by two judges of an inferior court, or two members of it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Speaking for my province, you may have a judge of the Superior Court and another legal gentleman of such standing as to be equal in legal ability and acumen to his brother judge on that tribunal, and you have their decision reviewed by only one judge.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but a judge of the higher court.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In Montreal, for instance, the judges of the Superior Court do not deem themselves inferior to the judges sitting in appeal, but they recognize the superiority of the judgment of five judges in appeal over their individual judgment; and very often the judges of the Superior Court, in turn, sit in the Court of Appeal to complete the quota of the Bench on account of illness or absence of a judge. These Superior Court judges feel that they are equal in standing in all senses to the judges in appeal. Here you are having two parties to give judgment, subject to be reviewed by a single judge.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But does my honourable friend think that there will be many appeals in these cases, where regulations are laid down with uniformity and are applied by, say, two county court judges, simply on the question of exemption? The question to be decided is simply whether the man who is called out comes within the exemption. It is not a complicated case, and the question involved, does not require a great deal of legal talent to elucidate or solve it, and so long has the appellate judge occupies a higher position than that of the judges from whom the appeal comes, it seems to me there should be every confidence in his judgment. Furthermore, one judge would be as good as if not better than two, because two judges might disagree. If we provided for two judges, we would have to have three.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Why don't you have two below and three above?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: May I ask how the Board of Selection will be established?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: A resolution will be brought down to Parliament.

Section 7 as amended was agreed to.

On sections 8 and 10—Central Appeal Judge:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: One local tribunal will decide one way and another one will decide another way, and the question will be settled by the final tribunal. I should like to have two judges on the final tribunal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I was going to make the same suggestion. Why not make the Supreme Court the final tribunal? There will be decisions coming in from all over the country, and they will have to be dealt with by one judge.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Section 8 deals with the central appeal judge. My honourable friends will observe that subsection 4 of section 10 says:

> The Central Appeal Judge shall be the tribunal of last resort, and the Governor in Council may, on his recommendation, appoint one or more other judges of any superior court to assist the said Central Appeal Judge in the discharge of his duties, and define their powers.

In answer to what my honourable friend has suggested about the Supreme Court, I may say that it would possibly tie up the Supreme Court completely.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If two judges are appointed, I want our constitution respected by the appointment of one who understands both languages.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend tell me just exactly what is meant by subsection 1:

> Any person aggrieved by the decision of a local tribunal, and any person authorized by the Minister of Militia and Defence, may appeal against any such decision .

Can the two things occur?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This subsection provides that the person called out may appeal; on the other hand, the Department of Militia may consider it in the public interest to prosecute an appeal where there would not otherwise be an appeal. For instance, a manifest injustice might be done which would involve either the appeal tribunal or the central tribunal being put in motion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: "Any person aggrieved"—that is the person interested. Would "person authorized by the Minister of Militia and Defence" be the representative of the Minister of Militia?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They would be representing the Crown.

Sections 8 and 10 were agreed to.

On section 1—definitions:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say that we are prepared to accept the suggestion of the honourable member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), or subsection 6 of section 5 can be amended to read as follows:

> No proceeding authorised or pending before any tribunal constituted by this Act—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Why not say, "any of the tribunals mentioned in this section"?

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think the proper place for a definition is in the definition clause?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I suggest that the word "created" should be used instead of the word "constituted."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think "constituted" is the better term to use.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: Will the leader of the Government tell me if a man in jail will have the right to go out?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This does not take away the right of habeas corpus outside of the findings of these particular tribunals.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I move that section 1 be amended by adding a further definition, as follows:

> "Tribunal" means a tribunal constituted under this Act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I want another definition in that section. Yesterday, with the consent of the House, clause 1 was allowed to stand over for a definition of the word "clergy." I am willing to hold my amendment until the third reading, if it is not accepted now.

Section 1 as amended was agreed to.

On subsection 1 of section 11—application for and grounds of exemption:

Paragraph a was agreed to.

On paragraph b:

Hon. Mr. POWER: Will not that open the door to a good deal of abuse?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: A man might be a very experienced mechanic on munitions, or something of that kind.

Paragraph b was agreed to.

Paragraphs c, d, and e were agreed to.

On paragraph f:

Hon. Mr. POWER: I have an amendment to be inserted at the end of paragraph f, after the word "belongs" in line 7. My amendment is as follows:

That a brother of such man is a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force—or, "on active service" if you prefer it——

—or has been killed, or has died while a member of such force.

It will be remembered that I brought this question up at an earlier stage of the session, but my resolution was ruled out of order. I think it is manifestly unfair that, if one or two sons in a family have volunteered and have gone to the other side, are still at the front, or have been killed in action or died from wounds, another member of the family should be taken away by compulsion. I think we should treat fairly people who have shown a patriotic and soldierly spirit. It is really a postponement to other men who have been designated by the honourable the leader of the Government as shirkers and slackers. I do not propose to argue this question, because it seems to me that it is a thing which must be perfectly obvious to every honourable gentleman. I have received a number of communications in regard to this matter, and there is one which I should like to read to the House. It is a letter I received from a lady in Montreal, and I ask the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to it, as it illustrates the case that I am trying to make. The letter is dated Montreal, June 13, and is as follows:

In the Montreal Gazette, May 22, I read that Senator Power gave notice of a resolution declaring, "that in any measure intended to introduce conscription into Canada provision should be made that no man whose father, brother or son has gone to the seat of war as a member of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, or is being trained in England preparatory to going to the front, shall be selected for compulsory service."

As I have watched the papers ever since the above article appeared, to see if there would be some assurance of the above; not having seen anything so far, I take the liberty of writing you personally, in hope of getting some relief that your humane suggestion would be acted upon.

My heart is filled with grief and anguish over the loss of a dear, brave son killed in action on April 9th. He was but 23 when he made the supreme sacrifice. Another son, my eldest, not yet 25, is fighting in France. I have another boy with me, 20 years old. Can you do anything to relieve my overburdened heart by sending me some assurance that he shall not be forced from me?

You have already shown by your utterances that you have a kind heart for those bereaved heartbroken mothers who have already given so much.

The suspense is almost unbearable. Will you write me some words of assurance that the above terrible injustice shall not be put into force?

I read the Conscription Bill, but no mention has been made with regard to those who have already given. I know you will give me your attention in this matter.

My health is broken and my heart wrung with sorrow. I know not whom to appeal to, so trust that you will be able to do something for me in this sad hour.

I do not say anything more on it, honourable gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I should like to ask the honourable member what his amendment means. Suppose there are six members in a family: if one has served, would the five others be exempt?

Hon. Mr. POWER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: What would you do, then, in the case of a father who has five or six or ten children? Perhaps there may be two, or three, or four, or five conscripted, and there may be two or three who will be killed. What would you do in that case?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I point out to my honourable friend paragraph d in the same section, giving authority to local tribunals to grant exemption in certain cases:

That serious hardship would ensue, if the man were placed on active service, owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position.

It seems to me that you cannot lay down a hard-and-fast rule saying that because one member of a family may belong to the Expeditionary Force, therefore that family will be exempt in regard to all its other sons. There may be some families with many sons, who would not even care about invoking the exemption, and this makes it entirely discretionary with the local tribunal, and if the local tribunal should find adversely, there are the other two tribunals to whom an appeal can be made. It would seriously embarrass the Act it seems to me, if an arbitrary provision of the kind proposed were to be embodied in the Bill and thus make it more difficult in being carried out.

The amendment moved by Hon. Mr. Power was negatived.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I move:

That section eleven be amended by adding: "those who are married or are widowers, or are fathers of six living children, are exempt from military service.

I do not suppose that I shall meet with very much encouragement. However, I have promised that I would propose this amendment. It refers to fathers of six or more living children. I may remind the committee that even in France, where conscription is more intensive than in any other country, where, as we have been told, 17 per cent, or one out of six of the population, including the old men, women and children, are on active service—in that country it has been found advisable to exempt from military service the man who has six or more living children.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: How old are the children?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If the children were old, the father himself would be exempted by age. It does not prevent the children from going if they are old enough. Surely our Conscription Bill is not intended to go further than such legislation has gone in that country of conscription par excellence. If the father is not too old to go to war and is included in one of these classes, surely his six children ought not to be abandoned, or deprived of protection. There were in France in 1870, as you know, 38,000,000 people; but, owing to the fact that they did not have large families, the population after 44 years, when the war broke out, was only 40,000,000. There had been in France an increase of only 2,000,000 in the 44 years, whereas Germany, which had 40,000,000 in 1870, had 66,000,000 when this war broke out, an increase of 26,000,000, living in the Fatherland besides all who had emigrated. That shows that the most essential thing, after all, is to have children to make soldiers for the King, to defend the Empire. I do not see that this would be an unfair exception, but it would leave those tribunals that are being formed free to exempt, or the law would itself exempt, those who are married or who are widowers or who are fathers of six or more living children. I understand that the Government is very anxious to pass this Bill without amendment—

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Amendments have been accepted.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not need to take up any further time. I think I have made myself clear. The cases to which I refer would be rather rare, but there may be men of military age who are fathers of six children or more, and to whom it would be a hardship to be compelled to leave his wife and children.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is not the slightest probability of that class of men being drawn upon. In the first place, those of 20 years and upwards will be called upon, the unmarried; next, those who are married and between 20 and 35 years of age. Then there may be subclasses. If the classes are more numerous than may be required, subclasses are formed, and men shall be called out in order of age, beginning with the youngest. Then, again, under paragraph d, if serious hardship would ensue if a man were placed on active service owing to his exceptional financial or business obligations or domestic position, he is to be exempted. It seems to me that that class of men is protected by the special provisions.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What objection would there be to having the statement go out from the Parliament of Canada to our population?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then the man with five children might say, "Why not exempt me?"

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It would show the consideration we have for fathers of families of six children or more. The question is being asked to-day, "How shall we solve the problem of an increase of population after the war, the problem of re-establishing the country in a strong position through an increased birth-rate?" Why should not my honourable friend, after consulting the Prime Minister, agree to the principle that a father with six children shall not be called out? I may say that last week I received in Montreal a visit from a man who had been two years in the trenches, and who was going back, leaving seven or eight children behind. He was only thirty-four or thirty-five years of age. I thought it a very great hardship, and I was under the impression that that man should have been refused, because those children had been to a considerable extent dependent upon the Patriotic Fund and public charities.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This amendment, it seems to me, might be considered by the honourable the leader of the Government. Of course, as he has pointed out, the case is not liable to occur frequently, but it seems to me it would be well that the Government should state that it is prepared to consider a situation of that kind. It certainly would be a great hardship on a man who has a family of six children to leave them, especially if they are small, and they are almost certain to be young children unable to protect themselves, and would be all practically dependent on their mother.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, there is no probability of a case of that kind occurring.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Casgrain was negatived.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Has the Government thought of exempting a class that is most necessary for the welfare of the country—the teachers? Since we are giving different classes of people exemption, should it not be stated in the Act that the teachers will not be disturbed? There are numbers of men engaged by contract to teach in different grades, and their contracts close at the end of every school year, which runs from September to June. Would not the normal and healthy conditions in the country be disturbed if these men were called and the school boards were obliged to search for people to replace them?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If such a case as is mentioned by my honourable friend were made out, it would come under paragraph a. We can only generalize in making exemptions. Immediately we begin to specify particular classes who may be engaged in a particular occupation, we get entirely beyond our ability to administer the Act. My honourable friend must not overlook the fact that we are at war. My honourable friend cannot expect everything to go on properly and systematically at a time when the world is plunged into the greatest war it has ever seen. I need not repeat what Sherman so well said in his day, that war is hell. And my honourable friend must expect some disorganization. It seems to me that the exemptions which we have made here should be ample to meet the national situation, whatever it may be and, as we are relying on our judges to administer this Act impartially and in the national interest, I think we can very well rely upon them to see that justice is done in the premises.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable leader of the Government knows this Bill very well. I do not see in it any provision to the effect that any one exempted should be obliged to report every few months. If that is in the Bill, well and good. If not, I would suggest that it should be, because a man may be entitled to exemption for a certain period but afterwards fit for military duty.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I move that the following be inserted after subsection 4:

All professors in schools, colleges, universities, and other educational establishments duly incorporated or recognized by the Department of Education in any province.

I had intended moving this amendment on the third reading, but perhaps I may as will submit it now. I should like to call the attention of the honourable leader of the House to a fact which cannot be denied, namely, that if the professors or teachers in our schools, colleges, and universities are not exempted, all our systems of education will be dislocated and disorganized. There are a great number of schools where the professors are not priests. There are even a number of schools where the teachers are laymen. If you take away those professors from our educational institutions, what will become of all the children, and at a time when it is necessary to improve their condition? I think that there is a great danger in leaving the law as it stands and not exempting those professors to whom I have just referred. I know there are thousands of children attending schools where the teachers are Christian Brothers. If they are conscripted, what will become of those schools? There are colleges and other education institutions where all the teachers are not priests—not until after two or three years of teaching. Those teachers also would be taken away. I think the honourable leader of the House ought to exempt such men.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am very sorry to say to my honourable friend that I cannot accept that amendment. If such a condition exists as that which he has pointed out, and if it is in the national interest at such a time, the case comes within paragraph b of subsection 1, and the tribunals can consider it under that subsection.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE (translation): The Government should realize that many of our schools in the province of Quebec are directed by Christian brothers. If these brothers are sent to the front our system of education will be disorganized. All those employed in the education of children should be exempt. It seems to me that the honourable the leader of the Government should accept the amendment proposed by the honourable senator from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David). I believe it is the duty of the Government to do something for education, not only in the province of Quebec but in all the other provinces. I am absolutely opposed to this provision of the Bill for conscripting our educators for military service. We need them all for the education of our children.

Hon. Mr. L'ESPERANCE (translation): If my honourable friend will read the schedule of exemptions he will see that clause 6 reads as follows:

Clergy, including members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character, and ministers of all religious denominations existing in Canada at the date of the passing of this Act.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY (translation): That exemption is of no value unless the word "including" is omitted.

Hon. Mr. L'ESPERANCE (translation): In the French version of the Bill that clause is translated "y compris," not "comprenant." The Minister of Justice in the other Chamber explained this clause clearly and satisfactorily, and his explanation was accepted by all the Catholic members.

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I did not intend that my amendement should apply only to members of the clergy. There are some who are entitled to consideration besides the clergy. My amendment applies to laymen teaching in educational institutions, and it does not apply only to the province of Quebec.

The amendment of Hon Mr. David was negatived.

On subsection 5 of section 11, paragraph b—proceedings without leave of minister null and void:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: It would take me two or three days to understand this subclause. Am I to understand that an applicant cannot change the tribunal without leave of the minister—that a man who has applied to one tribunal cannot go to another without leave?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If he wants to go outside his own district he will have to get leave of the minister to do so; otherwise we could not properly administer the Act.

Subsection 5 of section 11 was agreed to.

On subsection 6 of section 11—altering or tampering with certificates, or false representation:

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would like to ask the honourable minister how the prosecution of offending parties is to be carried on?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In the ordinary courts.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Who will prosecute? Is it left to any individual citizen?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, the Minister of Justice will prosecute. I am introducing an amendment, which we will come to later.

On subsection 2 of section 12—publication of proclamations and regulations:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: What is the "other manner" which the Governor in Council may think necessary to ensure knowledge of proclamations and regulations?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That means additional notices.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, we might have to put up posters. We have, in addition to publication in the Canada Gazette, provided for publication "in such other manner, if any, as the Governor in Council may think necessary."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: It is as broad as you can make it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We cannot exclude the Gazette, because proclamations and regulations are to appear in the Gazette, and—not or—in such other manner as may be thought necessary.

Subsection 2 of section 12 was agreed to.

On subsection 2 of section 12—construction of regulations:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: In how many days after publication in the Canada Gazette would those regulations come into effect? I would provide for a delay. If a regulation were made on Friday, published in the Gazette on Sunday, and came into force on Monday no body would have seen it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are not going to antagonize the whole community in that way.

Subsection 3 of section 12 was agreed to.

On subsection 1 of section 13—application of Militia and Army Acts:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Will the Militia and Army Acts and the King's Regulations and Orders be published with this Bill?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are in force now under the Militia Act.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes, but who knows about them?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You and I know about them, since we have discussed them.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: How do you know about any Act or statute that is published? There is not a copy sent to every individual.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I know, but the first man caught violating the Army Act would be punishable under this section.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: The Army Act and the King's Regulations are part and parcel of the Militia Act to-day. This clause makes an amendment to the conscription part, but where are those things to come in? Men who have been as long at the bellows as I have been know about these things, but where are the Tycoon and the Mikado to come in?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Here are two of the most esteemed colonels in this Chamber, who indicate to us the very great danger of incorporating into this Act three formidable documents called the Militia Act, the Army Act, and the King's Regulations and Orders, to form part and parcel of this Act. Well, we have been going it blind. There are a number of clauses which may land the members of this body in jail for violation of this Act, and yet we are incorporating into it and bringing under the stringent provisions of this Act all those three bulky documents without knowing exactly where they will lead us. What is the purpose of incorporating those documents into this Act? If I knew that I might be satisfied.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say to my honourable friend, for the purpose of giving him some degree of comfort, that for a generation we have been going merrily on in Canada with the King's Regulations and the Army Act and all those other laws in force without suffering any disadvantage or even inconvenience.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But my honourable friend must not forget that we have not, up to this date, suspended the habeas corpus process.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Also, all who were under that Act were under it voluntarily, but now you are forcing them to act.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: As I understand it, it is only enforced as to getting the men out—a new way of getting them out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: My friend Colonel Bowell can tell you that the Army Act and the King's Regulations are part and parcel of the Militia Act to-day. I am not as good a lawyer as some of my friends, and I was wondering how this habeas corpus proceeding was going to come in unless the rights and privileges under the Militia Act and the Army Act were brought in also.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would suggest that the honourable leader of the Government should lay on the Table the Militia Act, the Army Act, and the King's Regulations.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have done so. My honourable friend the leader of the Opposition asked for them days ago, and they are on the Table, and any honourable gentleman who feels inclined to indulge in some popular reading will find it in those three books.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I venture the assertion that they will not spend ten minutes in looking at them.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On subsection 2 of section 13—exceptions:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What are these?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Have we come to any decision on the first clause?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I be permitted to make a further explanation? Honourable gentlemen will observe that in section 4 of the Bill it is provided:

> —any class or subclass of men described in section 3 and all men within the class or subclass so called out shall, from the date of such proclamation, be deemed to be soldiers enlisted in the military forces of Canada and subject to military law for the duration of the present war.

Military law has a well defined meaning. Under the Militia Act the military law is made up not only of the Militia Act but of "the Army Act for the time being in force in the United Kingdom, the King's regulations, and all other laws applicable to His Majesty's troops in Canada, and not inconsistent with this Act or the regulations made thereunder." Honourable gentlemen will readily perceive that we have to incorporate the Militia Act into this Act. That is to say, under this Act, without the Militia Act being incorporated into it we would have no machinery for the carrying out or for the establishment of military organization, and, as men called out by proclamation are under military law, we have to incorporate into this Bill the military law of the Dominion, which is made up as I have stated.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: But we have all the work to do—we must find out all the things that are consistent or inconsistent with this Act. If it were said that such and such a paragraph were to apply to this Act, I would understand it.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: You are perfectly right. Of course, I have not had the honour of being made a general—I do not think they made a general of a man who knew anything, except Sam Hughes. How is a commanding officer who is going into camp going to handle his men? There are always a lot of sea lawyers in a volunteer regiment. The Army and Navy Act says that you cannot do this, you cannot do that, you cannot do the other thing, but there is a small paragraph which says that you can do anything if you will take the responsibility. If you come all right, you are right; if you do not, you are wrong. You take your chance.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: What is consistent and what is inconsistent?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is what the courts are for to decide.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I have a copy of the Militia Act of 1904 and it does not seem to apply to this section.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is chapter 41 of 1906, and section 12 reads as follows:

> Half-pay and retired officers of the regular forces shall not be required to serve in the militia in a lower grade than that of their rank in such forces.
> No persons shall be entitled to exemption unless he has, at least one month before he claims such exemption, filed with the commanding officer within the limits whereof he resides, his affidavit, made before some justice of the peace, of the facts on which he rests his claim.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: That means that up to to-day an officer could retain his rank; now he cannot.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: In the House of Commons I took the ground that a Canadian should not be barred from command in Canada. It was my view that we should educate a class that would be fit to command—not the class of dead beats that are seen around. In that Bill, if I remember rightly, are the words: "that they may be given the rank of Major General on retiring."

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The highest rank is now Lieutenant Colonel.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I want to know where they get their Brigadier Generals. Where is the law authorising that? Here is a man who commands three regiments, and has the rank of a Brigadier General. Will my honourable friend take a note of that, and let me know with regard to it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That is not what troubles me so much as to find out that they may have to serve as captains.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: They would not be much good anyway. They are too old. But what I want to know is, who had the power to give them their rank?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I shall look into that. May I read subsection 2 of section 40 of the Militia Act?

> No officer shall be bound to serve in the militia in a lower grade than that of the rank with which he has been retired.

That is done away with.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: That is part of the King's Regulations.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The proviso of section 45 reads as follows:

> Provided that command shall not be given to any person over a person superior in rank to himself.

These amendments are really of a democratic character.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: If he is retired, how can you promote any one over him? He is out of everything except walking around in uniform.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I understand that this section will conflict with the Militia Act, because the Militia Act is an Act of our own, but the Army Act is a British law.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: There is a question of honours and rewards in the King's Regulations. How far is that to be interfered with?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If we are compelled to call out men under this Bill, then we give no recognition to the Militia Act.

Hon. Mr DOMVILLE: Can you call them out at all if they have been retired?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, if they are in the class called.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: If these officers have been retired, how do they stand, if, as you say, there is an emergency?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If they are called we give no recognition to their rank.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Then you degrade the whole service. It is pretty hard on these people

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Why not degrade the service as well as married life and the liberty of the subject?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I think that requires some explanation.

Subsection 2 of section 13 was agreed to.

On subsection 3 of section 13—transfer to Naval Service:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Why should men be transferred to the Naval Service?

Hon. Mr CLORAN: We want to make horse marines out of them.

Hon Mr. LANDRY: If a man is liable to be seasick all the time, why put him there?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I gave you the reason.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, this is a matter which is discretionary with the Minister of Militia; but we must assume that he is going to exercise reasonable discretion in transferring men to the Naval Service. He would hardly transfer a man who was not qualified or had no knowledge of that particular branch of the service

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Would a man be transferred whether he were willing or not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We have to assume that the Minister of Militia will under such circumstances exercise common sense.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: There might be cases where artillery men might be transferred from land service to do the same kind of work on board ship—to act as gunners, and that sort of thing.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Marines.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Yes, marine infantry and marine artillery.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: That has nothing at all to do with the navy. The marines are trained on board men-of-war, and if any trouble comes they stand between the men and the officers; they are kept there as a guard. Some of them are marine artillery and some infantry, who may land and take the guns and other pieces on shore.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: Will the honourable leader of the Government answer this question. This clause provides that the Minister of Militia and Defence may transfer any man to the Naval Service. Perhaps the minister may have friends who would prefer to go to the Naval Service rather than into the trenches. I am afraid there would be some trouble in that connection, because more men than necessary might be sent to the Naval Service and not enough kept for the trenches. An injustice might be done there.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: The honourable gentleman is too suspicious.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: I do not see that there is any reciprocity in this amendment at all. Parliament is going to give to one man in the Dominion, the Minister of Militia, the power of transferring men from land to sea service. Of course, I do not believe in this at all, but I would simply put the question, why does not this Parliament give the Minister of Marine the right to transfer men from the Naval Service to the Land Service? Reciprocity is fair play. You are giving the Minister of Militia the absolute power to transfer any man whom he designates, or pleases to designate.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes, but this Government is against reciprocity.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It is pretty well accepted to-day that the Government were wrong when they refused reciprocity. Now they are on their knees to the United States. When anything has come before this Parliament since this debate began, we are told, "Oh, the United States is doing it." Several times that remark has dropped from the lips of the leader of the Government. We are putting this clause and that clause in the Bill because the United States have done it. Notwithstanding that, the honourable gentleman from Bedford (Hon. Mr. Pope) the other night, in his superbly eloquent speech, denounced the leader of the Liberal Opposition in this country for having stated that the interests of Canada and of the United States were identical. When I asked the honourable gentleman if the interests of Canada and those of the United States were not identical to-day, what did he answer? He answered nothing. He was paralyzed.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Naturally. What could he answer? If he answered, "No, they are not identical," he would be giving the lie direct to his own leader in this House, because the leader of the Government in this House is appealing to Parliament to pass this clause and that clause because the United States have done likewise. That is the situation. The country will know all about it. We cannot hide our light under a bushel here in the Senate. Our light must spread, and the true light. We are going to have an open Bible all through the Dominion of Canada, not only in Ontario. Now, I think that this clause gives an autocratic power to one man in authorizing him to send a man from the land force to the sea force. It is autocratic in every way. We have in this Canada of ours men who have gone to fight the common enemy on the battlefields in Europe, in Asia, in Africa and on the sea. Is the man who believes it to be his duty to go and fight the Huns in the trenches to be deprived of his liberty of judgment and his rights and forced to go on a battleship? I think the thing is absurd. A man may be prepared to fight on land and not want to go to sea. His constitution may be fit for a land fight, but his constitution, his imagination, his mind, his education, are opposed to his going on sea and getting seasick. On land he would not be sick, and would be able to down the enemy. I hold that this clause is not a proper one, and I do not know why the Government is sustained by such a lot of intelligent men on the other side in matters of this kind. We are not fighting this Conscription Bill now; we are trying to improve it, and the slightest suggestion of improvement is voted down as if there were no sense in any suggestion coming from this side of the House. That is a travesty of the parliamentary right of free discussion and voting power, and the honourable gentlemen have been doing that now for the past three days. No matter what suggestion is made from His Majesty's loyal Opposition, in whose care the interests of Canada and the Empire are vested, just as much as they are in His Majesty's Government, honourable gentlemen on the other side will not condescend for one moment to take it into consideration. What will the country think of this state of affairs in the Parliament of Canada, and especially in this Senate, which is supposed to represent the people —a supposition that is as well grounded as a star in the earth. But honourable gentlemen are all stars, and cannot come down to the common earth.

An Hon. SENATOR: Question.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: There is one. He is a star. He is a polar star, probably Mars.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: He is a senator, anyway.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Being a senator is not like charity; it does not cover a multitude of sins. When this clause comes before the country the people will recognize it as one which should not be included in this Bill, because it gives the minister absolute power and authority to send a man, without his consent, probably without his knowledge, from the land force to the sea force. Any man can be sent. I think that is not fair play to the soldier in the trenches. I think it is not fair play to the father of that soldier. It is unfair to the whole army of men in the trenches fighting to-day for our protection, for the safety of the Empire, and for the liberty of the peoples of Europe. It is not a proper position in which to place any man in the army, to subject him to removal from where he belongs to a place which he does not desire, or is not fit to fill. I hold that this Government is putting so many immoral and oppressive clauses in the Bill that they ought to withdraw it and allow the people of Canada to decide on the whole question. And I cannot understand how a man, especially a representative of the people, having voted that this Bill should be submitted to the people before enforcement, or before being passed, could in the next breath vote for the measure to be forced down the throats of the people without consultation with them or reference to their desires, their wants, or their needs. That has been done on the Conservative, and, I regret to say, on our side. That course is one of self-stultification, it is one of flagrant contradiction.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Mr. Chairman, have we to stay here all night listening to the discussion of a question that is not before us?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable gentleman may stay here until the 7th of October.

Hon Mr. CROSBY: I ask you, Mr. Chairman, if the honourable gentleman is in order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have a right to speak here without interruptions by the honourable gentleman. Anyhow I notify him that his interruptions will be taken for what they are worth.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I am asking for the ruling of the Chair.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I was just finishing. Mr. Chairman, I have every respect for your judgment and for your sincerity as a Canadian.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman should not flatter the Chairman.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am not flattering the Chairman. I know he will rule against me if I am wrong. My proposition as I have put it before the House will, I know, meet the approval of the population in this country. What I would like, Mr. Chairman, is to meet with your own approval. It is not fair to the man in the trenches to give the minister or any other man the right to take him from the trenches and put him where he does not want to fight.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The clause under review is subsection 3, which gives the Minister of Militia the right to transfer a man who has offered for service to the Naval Service. I see that subsection 4 limits the reinforcements under this Act to 100,000. I suppose that the inference is quite clear, that whatever number is taken from the reinforcements for the navy will count in that total of 100,000?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Could the honourable gentleman tell us what are the present or prospective requirements of the Canadian Naval Service? We have not heard very much of this branch of the service lately, and, since the Act speaks of the necessity of raising a certain number of men for the navy, I think the honourable leader of the Government might give us some details as to that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot give my honourable friend such details as those for which he asks, but this makes provision so that in a case of emergency there may be a transfer of men from the land to the naval forces. We know very well that in every continental army and in the British army there are provisions of that kind—

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: No, no.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: —by which the artillery and marine infantry, in connection with the naval forces, may be transferred. It can very readily be understood that an emergency might arise at some of our ports, and it would become necessary to make a transfer, either temporary or permanent.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: My honourable friend must see that the enlistment system is all wrong. A man is enlisted to do something, and he can be taken from that and transferred to anything else, just as was done in the old days of the press gang. I should like to know, if I may ask with propriety, who drew up this Bill? The Hon. Mr. Kemp did not draft it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is the product of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Certainly, but who drew it up for the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: The Solicitor General.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: We have a right to know. We are here representing the people.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot tell my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: To arrive at it in another way, on what lines was this Bill constructed, and what technical military experience or knowledge was brought to bear in the preparation of it? I do not think the Minister of Militia prepared it, or that he can be blamed for anything wrong in it, but I should like to know what the counsel who drafted it had in view in this clause respecting the transfer of men from one service to the other. It is not sound. It will not work out.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: "Naval Service" means Canadian service?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: How many men have we in the Naval Service?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think we have four or five thousand.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: How many ships?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I could not tell you; we have quite a fleet.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: You have the Naval ships of the old Government, and you have seized some from alien Governments. I would like to know how many ships we have in the Naval Service. The honourable leader ought to know. Will you transfer those men to the Naval Service? That is a question you do not want to answer.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: There is no provision in this Bill for admirals. We make colonels and generals, but where are our admirals? We should add a clause for them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Borrow one.

Subsection 3 of section 13 was agreed to on division.

On subsection 1 of section 15—production of certificate, and penalty for failing to comply:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Who gives authority to the peace officer or other person to demand the production of a certificate by men who are required to report for active service?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That authority is provided under Section 12. By regulations the Governor in Council can authorize officers, or they can make use of the officers under the criminal law machinery.

Subsection 1 of section 15 was agreed to.

On subsection 2 of section 15—penalty on summary conviction for refusal to produce certificate:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Will that summary conviction be before a special tribunal or an ordinary court?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Any ordinary court of the province. These tribunals are not courts for adjudicating upon any infraction of the law.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: In that case he escapes the military law?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He is not tried by military law for this offence.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Suppose a man has violated one of the military regulations under this Act, and is not before the criminal court, but in the meantime he steals or burglarizes or kills, will the military authority have precedence before the criminal court?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The law as it stands to-day would be in effect.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Suppose he has offended a military regulation which carries a penalty of imprisonment, but meantime he commits an offence against the civil criminal code, which authority would have precedence?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All that I can say is that once he enters on active service under this Act he becomes subject to military law.

Subsection 2 of section 15 was agreed to.

On subsection 1 of section 16—contraventions of Act:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The penalty provided under this section has too wide a range—from $10 up to $500. That would embarrass the judge who has to try the offence. Judges much prefer legislation which definitely fixes the amount of the penalty. I know that my remarks will not have any effect on the Government, for they are going to pass every clause, but from this side of the House we want to throw some light on the subject, so that people may be able to weigh this measure, and even men who are in favour of conscription will see that we were justified in making the amendments and suggestions which were voted down, as the papers say, by a packed House. I do not withdraw that word; this House was packed for the purpose of putting through this legislation.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Really, Mr. Chairman——

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am done.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It is certainly a great relief to the House.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE (translation): I protest against the refusal to give explanations asked for by Opposition senators. The Government avoids giving explanations because it knows that this Bill is unpopular and that the more it is explained the more evident its unpopularity becomes.

Subsection 1 of section 16 was agreed to.

On subsection 2 of section 16—written or oral advice to contravene the Act or regulations:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: This subsection seems to me altogether unnecessary, especially subclause c, which makes it an offence to induce any man called out to refrain from making application for a certificate of exemption or submitting evidence in respect thereof. If men do not ask for exemption, so much the better; they are enlisted and enter the service.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let us assume for a moment that a journalist should incite his readers not to give recognition to the law; it is proposed that he be brought under this section.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But that is not subclause c to which I refer.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But my honourable friend must read that subclause in connection with subsection 2: any person is guilty and liable to imprisonment who, by means of any written or printed or oral communication, publication, or article, impedes the operation of the Act.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But he cannot impede the operation of the Act by advising a man to apply for a certificate of exemption.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He might incite the whole of a class that may be called out by a proclamation not to give any recognition to it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Persons called out will either serve or apply for certificates of exemption. If they do not so apply, they admit the validity of the call. Suppose I have been called, and somebody induces me not to apply for an exemption, that person is doing a very good thing to help to carry out the law.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But there may be an abuse of service by inciting men not to make use of their rejection. If, after men are forced into a class, it is found that they should have come within the exemption, a public wrong has been done, for those men, though entitled to exemption, may have become a very serious charge upon the public service. They might incite public opinion, either by sympathy or otherwise, by reason of the wrong that is being done them if they do not invoke the exemption to which they would be entitled. In order to successfully carry out the Act, all those who come within the class owe it to the state to perform the duties cast upon them; that is to say, if they come within the exemptions they should claim their exemption of course, if they do not, they should not raise the question.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I must say that I do not feel quite clear, even after the lucid explanation made by the honourable leader of the Government. For instance, a man may not know at first whether he is entitled to claim exemption or not, and even if he is entitled to claim exemption he may refrain from doing so. He may feel that he would rather go to the front than be exempted, and, as I take it, under paragraph c, any friend would be liable to punishment who said to him: "Now, look here, Jim, you may be exempt, but if you feel like going and fighting you can go and not claim the exemption." Why should there be such a severe penalty imposed on a man who did that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The penalty is directed against those who, for the purpose of resisting or impeding the enforcement and operation of this Act, do something to persuade men to refrain from making application for certificates of exemption. For instance, a man may be tuberculous. It is his duty to give the local tribunal a knowledge of his condition, otherwise he becomes a charge upon the state for the balance of his life. That is one of the heaviest charges that we have on our hands to-day in connection with the voluntary system. There are thousands of men who will have to be supported by pensions and otherwise as long as they live.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It does not strike me that the offence is a very serious one, and the person who is guilty of the offence is not to be fined, but is to be imprisoned for not less than one year and not more than five years. It seems to me that the punishment is out of proportion to the offence.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not if it is done for the purpose of impeding the operation of the Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER: If the honourable gentleman will turn to a previous clause he will find that the presumption is against the man who is accused, and that he has to establish his innocence.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, that is a different regulation. That is under section 14.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Is there any machinery whereby the Government will be enabled to protect the country against any person coming within the section with regard to illness or infirmity?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will doubtless recall the fact that this afternoon we discussed a clause with regard to a representative of the Minister of Militia setting in motion certain proceedings for the purpose of guarding the interests of the state.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Is not that section only for purposes of appeal?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would be remedied on appeal. It would not come into operation until the local tribunal judged of the matter.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think it is very important that the Government should be able to prevent a person of that kind from enlisting at the outset. If a man does not object, there will be no appeal.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I presume that, even without any specific authority, there is nothing to prevent a representative of the Crown being present at any of those tribunals, but it has been thought desirable to make provision as already referred to in section 10.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE (translation): I ask the honourable senator from Montarville if in an election the conscriptionist candidate praises this Bill, while his opponent, being anti-conscriptionist, opposes and speaks against it, would the anti-conscriptionist candidate be liable to imprisonment for from one year to five years, according to subsection 2 of section 16? This would be a very arbitrary proceeding, as the anti-conscriptionist candidate might find himself in prison and perhaps lose his election.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN (translation): The object of the section is to prevent anyone advocating disobedience to this law. Those only are guilty who advise others not to claim exemption, with the object of resisting the law. Those who in good faith, with the object of helping the war, recommend anyone not to claim exemption, are not guilty. Consequently, the essential condition of guilt is the intention to provoke a violation of the law.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND (translation): My honourable friend from Kennebec (Hon. Mr. Lavergne) asked a question which the honourable senator from Montarville has not answered. He asked: If in the coming election a conscriptionist candidate could defend the principle of conscription, could not an anti-conscriptionist candidate condemn that principle and this law? I will answer the question, and I believe the honourable member for Montarville will share my opinion. A conscriptionist candidate may freely defend this law and an anti-conscriptionist candidate may freely attack it and denounce the principle of conscription, and call on the electors to condemn the law. He may discuss every provision of this Act; but there is a distinction between condemning the law or attacking its provisions and counselling disobedience to the law.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN (translation): That is hair-splitting.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: This provision would cover the case of a man who was unfit for service.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would be one of the results.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend has mentioned the case of a man who has tuberculosis. A man who is in an advanced stage knows it, though perhaps others do not. He might choose to say nothing about it, in that way to draw pay for one or two or three months, or even six months. This section is framed to get at that kind of a man?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is one of the cases.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Are there any cases other than those of men who know themselves to be unfit but who remain in the service and draw pay? If not, why not provide that an application for exemption will have to be made within a certain time? Why not provide that those who are called and who feel that they are fit for service shall be obliged to make application for a certificate of exemption within a certain time? The question may not be decided for months, but the man will not be to blame; he will have done the right thing in applying for a certificate of exemption. He will not be drawing pay when he knows he is unfit for service. We might be saved the expenditure of a large sum of money. It seems to me that the object sought would be attained by a provision of that sort.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Even after his class is called, if a man does not avail himself of the exemption to which he is entitled, he must undergo a rigorous medical examination; but in the meantime he may have given a passive resistance to the provisions of the Act. I know some journals have deliberately advocated passive resistance to the Act which would create such a storm of public indignation against the enforcement of the Act, by reason of men having been impressed into duty who should have been exempted, that it would eventually defeat the Act. What harm will it do to place such a provision upon the statute-book?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am not finding fault with that at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, many conditions will arise that we cannot foresee at the present moment. I cannot fully develop the possibilities of the abuses which may arise under the Act; but I think my honourable friend will readily grant that in a general way a channel may be opened for the defeat of the Act, through the acts provided against in subsection c.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am not so sure of that. I only ventured the suggestion in the hope of improving the section.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think the case referred to by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) is provided for by the first subsection of clause 11.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am not the official translator of this honourable body, but under the voluntary system I am acting in that capacity. The honourable senator from Kennebec (Hon. Mr. Lavergne) asked if the clause under consideration covered the action and addresses of candidates in elections. He asked the honourable senator from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) —and I am glad that that honourable gentleman had the courage to speak in his own language—I wish all the French Canadians in the House would have the courage to do the same—if this clause would prevent a candidate of the people from denouncing the law as we are denouncing it now. In an election there would be a Conservative candidate demanding conscription without reference to the people; on the other hand, there would be a Liberal candidate demanding that this Conscription Bill should not be enforced until the people had been consulted. Now, the Tory candidates in all the provinces would have the right, the power, and the privilege of boosting this Bill for all they were worth, and under this clause their opponents would have to remain dumb. Does the Government propose to throttle free speech in the coming election? That is what the effect of this clause will be. If any Liberal candidate in the Dominion of Canada gets on a platform and discusses this Bill adversely as to its principle, its application, its undemocratic basis, the Tory Government will jump on him, disqualify him, and put him in prison for a term of from one to five years. That is going to be the result of the Bill, there is no doubt about it. Now, Mr. Chairman, if you were the Conservative candidiate and I were the candidate against you, and you grew eloquent over this conscription Bill, under the Tory law of this country I would have to remain dumb or go to jail. We shall not be able to criticise the Bill in an adverse sense as we are doing it now. Why do you not put us in jail to-day? The people will have no right to talk, as we are doing at the present time. The thing is a farce. If it were only a farce we could afford to laugh at it; but it is an outrage on the rights of the people. I am in touch with the pulse of the country, and know how it is beating. A man who advises a friend of his not to look for a certificate of exemption is liable to anything from one to five years' imprisonment. Who condemns him? Suppose it is the criminal court, will he have a right to a writ of habeas corpus under this Bill? There is no provision for that. If an honest Canadian, knowing his friend to be physically or mentally disabled or unfit to go to the front, advises him to seek for a certificate of exemption, he is liable for that simple advise to imprisonment for from one to five years without option. If that is not Kaiserism, Prussianism, I would like to know. Once in jail he will have no right to demand a writ of habeas corpus. The reign of the Kaiser could not produce worse legislation than that. Notwithstanding that Parliament passes this law, all Liberal candidates on the hustings at the general election throughout Canada shall have the same rights as the people in Parliament to discuss it, criticise it, denounce it in every form possible. I am against the law. That is an advice to the people of the country, but I am advising four-fifths of the people of Canada to-day who are not in favour of this law. Yet we are going to put it in the hands of a small minority in the country, and a discredited majority in Parliament, to throttle the people of this country at the general election. What are we thinking of? This is an odious, unfair, unpopular law, and you cannot get three-fifths of the population to endorse your attitude in passing it.

Subsection 2 of section 16 was agreed to.

On section 17—expenses:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Before we deal with section 17, I desire to amend section 16 by adding subsection 4 as follows:

No conviction in a court of criminal jurisdiction for an offence against this Act or the regulations made thereunder shall be had unless the prosecution has been consented to or approved by the Attorney General of Canada.

That gives a fair assurance that no needless prosecution will be carried on.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That shows that I have obtained something.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: Would not the Attorney General of a province be better than the Attorney General of Canada?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, the administration of the Act must necessarily rest with the federal Government.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Under our constitution there is no Attorney General of Canada to-day, and has not been since the old Union. We have the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General. If that subsection passes, it will avail nothing. Who is the Attorney General of Canada?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Look in the statute book.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Regular parliamentary words should be used, so that everybody would know what is meant. The Minister of Justice is the proper term to use, and I do not see why we should cloud his authority under a name that he does not assume .

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Why does the honourable leader of the Government use the word "conviction" first and not "prosecution"?

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The reason is that a prosecution might be taken and a conviction made without the knowledge of the Attorney General but they would be useless unless the prosecution had been consented to or approved by him .

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That implies that the magistrate before whom a party would be summoned for infringement of this Act would have to communicate with the Attorney General and obtain his consent in writing so that it might go on record?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, before the conviction could be had.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Under the criminal law there can be no conviction without a trial. The leader of the Government is taking the question by the tail instead of by the head. He should say: "No prosecution shall be started against any individual without the consent or approval of the Minister of Justice".

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen will understand that the Minister of Justice is charged with the administration of this Act, and as he is responsible for setting in motion the Criminal Code, the proceeding should receive his approval.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Will the consent of the Attorney General be necessary in order to proceed against a peace officer who neglects his duty, as provided for in Section 12, 1 g?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Inasmuch as the Minister of Justice is charged with the administration of the Act, of course he must give his consent to any proceedings that are taken.

The new subsection of section 16 was agreed to.

Section 16 as amended was agreed to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Before dealing with the schedule of exceptions I would like to go back to subsection 6 of section 5. At the request of my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon Mr. Dandurand) we have left that open. I move the adoption of that subsection.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I cannot allow this section to pass without again calling attention to the fact that it suspends the Habeas Corpus Act, and suspends it uselessly. It has been admitted, as we have gone through this Bill, that the tribunals being organized under this Act will have the sole mandate to receive demands for exemptions, and will pass upon those demands. When they have done so their jurisdiction is at an end, and I cannot understand why we should go the length of suspending the Habeas Corpus Act when there is so little need for doing so. If there is one privilege held sacred by the Britisher and every one who has enjoyed the advantages and protection of the Habeas Corpus Act, it is that guaranted by that Act, which preceded the Magna Charta. It is a common-law right. It ensures the freedom of the citizen. It absolutely controls the action of our inferior tribunals. The writ issues as of right; one must simply show probable cause under oath. It has been held to be such a safeguard for people who have enjoyed the privilege of citing before the courts the party who restrained their liberty, that I have found only two instances in the last one hundred and fifty years in which England has adjudged it proper to suspend that Act. It suspended the Act between 1794 and 1801, and again in 1817.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Is the Habeas Corpus Act not always suspended under martial law?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is suspended when martial law is proclaimed, but when such law was not proclaimed Great Britain suspended the Habeas Corpus Act, but, by annual enactments, never to run more than twelve months and from 1794 to 1801 the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended every year. In 1817, it was suspended for a given time, from the month of March to the first of July. It was again suspended, not for Great Britain, but for Ireland, in 1866. It seems to me that there is no absolute necessity, for the safety of the State, to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, and that we should be very slow to do so. Somebody on the other side of the House asked the honourable leader of the Government if Great Britain, during the war, had judged it proper to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act. I understood that the answer was in the negative. Why should the Habeas Corpus Act be suspended by this Act when, I repeat, it is declared to be inoperative simply against proceedings and decisions of the tribunals created by this Act? The decisions of those tribunals will simply state that the person who applies for exemption is entitled to it or otherwise, and then their jurisdiction ends. There may be an appeal, but it will always be on the question of whether a person is entitled to exemption or not, whether that person applies for exemption or not, and if the exemption is refused in either case that person can be summoned before a magistrate if he does not report. A writ can be sued for because it is not attacking the action of tribunals created by this Act. It seems to me that we should hold the Act sacred, and when it is apparent that there is no necessity for applying it we should not lightly suspend it. For these reasons I move that the words "habeas corpus or other process" be struck from line 28.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I ask the honourable the leader of the Government if there is any doubt as to whether the habeas corpus will apply.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will my honourable friend state his proposition?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I think it is quite clear that there are new tribunals created outside of the common law tribunals. Now, as I read the section, it seems to me that the habeas corpus will apply to no tribunals, either common law tribunals or other. I may be mistaken.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will only affect the application of injunction, prohibition, mandamus, certiorari, habeas corpus or other processes. The only application of those writs would be to the findings of the tribunals constituted by this Act. It will in no way affect the application of those writs to the courts as are applied to-day, and consequently does not disturb the law in any way. Under this Bill for specific purpose, the Government of Canada have called into existence three tribunals with a clearly defined and limited jurisdiction, not of a criminal character, but simply for the purpose of determining whether the men who will come within the classes called out by proclamation are entitled to the exemptions enumerated in the Act. Why should habeas corpus or prohibition or injunction or any other writ of common law apply to these tribunals, which were constituted for a particular purpose In England the appeal lies to the Treasury Board, and the decision of the Treasury Board is final for all the purposes of the Act. In the United States the decision of the district boards shall be final so long as they are in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. He may confirm, modify or reverse any such decision He is the court of last resort. It is provided that all laws and parts of laws that conflict with this Act are hereby suspended during the existence of this emergency, so the powers which we have embodied in paragraph 6 are analogous to the law as it is in England and the United States. Why we should attempt to obstruct or block or impede the carrying out of this Act by permitting the exercise of rights which the subject has under common law in respect of setting the courts in motion, I cannot understand.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What use can be made of the Habeas Corpus Act to impede the action of these tribunals? If the honourable gentleman will answer that question to my satisfaction—and I have an open mind—he will have begun to make a case in favour of suspending the habeas corpus. These tribunals are created for a specific purpose. There is nothing, from the beginning until judgment is rendered by those courts, which has anything to do with the subject. It will not be affected.

The liberty of the subject will not be restrained.

He has made a demand for exemption; it has been denied. He has appealed; the appeal has been decided against him; the action of the court is over. During that process how could a man think of asking for a writ of habeas corpus? He is simply asking for an exemption; and when judgment has been given against him, if some one lays his hand on him, it is by virtue of a process of another court and then he can appeal for redress. Why ask that the writ of habeas corpus be suspended by this Act when it does not benefit the State?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Simply because the Government considers it in the interest of the administration of the Act that there should be a plain declaration upon the statute as to what the result will be if the courts have been invoked to issue a writ of habeas corpus. It is so that they shall not have jurisdiction to interfere with the findings of these tribunals. I read this afternoon the judgment of the Chief Justice of the province of my humble friend showing that the legal profession of Quebec—and I have no doubt this is true of the other provinces of Canada—would be quite willing to cast the die upon the question as to whether habeas corpus would lie in the case of a matter of discipline of one who had enlisted in the military forces of Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That would not arise from the decision of one of these tribunals.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The decision was that habeas corpus would not lie, and it is proposed to say plainly that so far as the tribunals are concerned it shall not lie.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I quite agree with the honourable member for De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) that it is useless, especially with the amendment which was assented to by the Government that "tribunals" means the tribunals created by this Act. Apart from the fact that it is useless I desire to draw the attention of this House to a more important fact, that it is outside of the jurisdiction of this Parliament. The Habeas Corpus Act is an Imperial Act which extends its effect over the whole of the British Empire, and it is not within the power of this Parliament to suspend it. I refer now to Blackstone's Commentaries, 3rd volume, page 127, dealing with the character of the Habeas Corpus Act, which is well known by all legal men. It says:

> The oppression of an obscure individual gave birth to the famous Habeas Corpus Act, 31 Car. II, c. 2, which is frequently considered as another Magna Charta of the kingdom; and by consequence and analogy has also in subsequent times reduced the general method of proceeding on these writs, though not within the reach of that statute, but issuing merely at the common law, to the true standard of law and liberty.

What is that Act? I shall only refer to the first section of the Act, because the other sections merely have reference to procedure. Chapter 2 of Charles II says:

> That on complaint and request in writing by or on behalf of any person committed and charged with any crime, unless committed for treason or felony expressed in the warrant; or as accessory, or on suspicion of being accessory, before the fact, to any petit-treason or felony, or upon suspicion of such petit-treason or felony, plainly expressed in the warrant; or unless he is convicted or charged in execution by legal process, the lord chancellor or any of the judges, in vacation, upon viewing a copy of the warrant, or affidavit that a copy is denied, shall, unless the party has neglected for two terms to apply to any court for his enlargement, award a habeas corpus for such prisoner returnable immediately before himself or any other of the judges; and upon the return made shall discharge the party, if bailable, upon giving security to appear and answer to the accusation in the proper court of judicature.

This Act, so to speak, is part of the Constitution of the British people. Now, I will refer honourable gentlemen to a very important Imperial statute, 28 and 29 Victoria, which was passed in 1865. It is entitled, "An Act to remove Doubts as to the Validity of Colonial Laws." It provides:

> An Act of Parliament, or any provision thereof, shall, in construing this Act, be said to extend to any colony when it is made applicable to such colony by the express words or necessary intendment of any Act of Parliament.

That is the first definition.

> Any colonial law which is or shall be in any respect repugnant to the provisions of any Act of Parliament extending to the colony to which such law may relate, or repugnant to any order or regulation made under authority of such Act of Parliament, or having in the colony the force and effect of such Act, shall be read subject to such Act, order or regulation, and shall, to the extent of such repugnancy, but not otherwise, be and remain absolutely void and inoperative.

And section 5 reads:

> Every colonial legislature shall have, and be deemed at all times to have had, full power within its jurisdiction to establish courts of judicature, and to abolish and reconstitute the same, and to alter the constitution thereof, and to make provision for the administration of justice therein; and every representative—

And so on. These two sections, 28 and 29 Victoria, cap. 63, declare that any colonial law, and therefore this Act that we are passing, which is a colonial Act, will remain absolutely null and void and inoperative if it is in any way repugnant to any Imperial Act which extends over the whole Empire. For that reason I claim, and respectfully submit, that it is not within the power of this Parliament to enact such a law as this, suspending the Habeas Corpus Act. Honourable gentlemen will remember that in 1837, at the time of the rebellion in Canada, the Habeas Corpus Act was not suspended by the Legislature of Canada, but was suspended by the Imperial Parliament, or rather the Canadian constitution was suspended. It was perfectly well known that the Legislature of Canada had no right to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act. That is the first point to which I would direct the attention of this honourable House.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would not that statute apply to the Crown colonies only? Would it apply to a Dominion like Canada?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It applies to all the British Empire.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: To all the Dominions. That is not denied, but is recognized. It has been applied in several instances. It is well established in fact that the Act to which I have referred, 28 and 29 Victoria, Cap. 63, applies to Canada as well as to all other British possessions. Now I desire to call attention to another point. For another reason this Parliament has no right to enact any law of this kind, any law which would tend to deprive any Canadian citizen of the right to apply by habeas corpus for the protection of his rights: because it would be in violation of the Quebec Act of 1774. I am referring now to Clement's Canadian Constitution, second edition, page 286:

It is to be observed that the same words 'civil rights' are employed in the Act of 14 Geo. III. c. 83,—

That is the Quebec Act of 1774—

—which made provision for the government of the province of Quebec. Section 8 of that Act enacted 'that His Majesty's Canadian subjects within the province of Quebec should enjoy their property, usages, and other civil rights as they had before done, and that in all matters of controversy relative to property and civil rights resort should be had to the laws of Canada, and be determined agreeably to the said laws.' In this statute, the words 'property and civil rights' are plainly used in their largest sense; and there is no reason for holding that in the statute under discussion they are used in a different or narrower one.

Now, it will not be contended that the principle safeguarded by the Quebec Act of 1774 was repealed or in any way abridged by the British North America Act. It was in no way interfered with. On the contrary, under the B.N.A. Act, when the division of power was made by sections 91 and 92, while it is true that by paragraph 7 of section 91 all subjects pertaining to militia, military and naval service and defence were assigned to the federal Parliament, yet, under paragraph 13 of section 92 "property and civil rights in the province," and under paragraph 14 "the administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance and organization of provincial courts both of civil and criminal jurisdiction and including procedure in civil matters in those courts," were left exclusively to the provinces, and from that fact alone—from the British North America Act of 1867, alone, it follows, I claim, that this Parliament would have no right to deny any Canadian prosecuted in any of the courts, whether in Ontario or in Quebec, from seeking, by way of habeas corpus, certiorari, or any other process of that kind, the protection of his most sacred civil rights, with which this Parliament has no right to interfere. Therefore, I submit that subsection 6 of section 5 is unnecessary, because there is no occasion to exercise the power which is sought to be given, and not only is it unnecessary, but, moreover, this Parliament has no right to grant any power of that kind.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Before my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) replies to the honourable gentleman who has just sat down (Hon. Mr. Béique) I desire to add a word in support of the honourable gentleman's argument, with which I thoroughly agree. I think it has been clearly and conclusively demonstrated that under the British North America Act this Parliament cannot in any way pass legislation which would repeal or affect the Habeas Corpus Act. It is well known—every lawyer and student of constitutional law knows—that habeas corpus, which is now in force in Canada, was one of the Imperial Acts introduced into Canada and never repealed by the Imperial Government. The habeas corpus to-day is dependent upon Imperial statute. Now let us see what section 129 of the British North America Act of 1867 says on the subject:

Continuance of existing laws.

That is the marginal note.

Except as otherwise provided by this Act, all laws in force in Canada, Nova Scotia or New Brunswick at the Union, and all legal commissions, powers and authorities, and all officers, judicial, administrative, and ministerial, existing therein at the Union, shall continue in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick respectively, as if the Union had not been made,—

This is the part of the section to which I want to draw my honourable friend's particular attention:

—subject nevertheless (except with respect to such as are enacted by or exist under Acts of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland), to be repealed, abolished or altered by the Parliament of Canada, or by the Legislature of the respective province, according to the authority of the Parliament or of the Legislature under this Act.

Subject, nevertheless, to be repealed, but always excepting Acts of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. If it is correct, and I submit it cannot be denied, that the habeas corpus exists in Canada by virtue of an Imperial Act, section 129 makes it absolutely impossible for us to pass any legislation which would repeal or even in any way affect this Imperial legislation. If there is habeas corpus in Canada—and we know that there is—it exists not by virtue of Canadian law, either Federal or provincial, but by virtue of an Imperial statute. Section 129 of the British North America Act makes it absolutely clear to me, and to any lawyer, that this Parliament cannot pass any legislation which would in any way affect that right.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does my honourable friend place certiorari in the same position?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I said habeas corpus; I did not say certiorari. The other argument, as to certiorari, was advanced by the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique). He based that on other provisions altogether, on sections 91 and 92, which distribute the powers between the provincial legislatures and the Dominion Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: And under the Quebec Act.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Under the Quebec Act, he says, you cannot affect certiorari because you are affecting the civil rights of the people in the provinces. But for the moment I am not addressing myself to certiorari, I am speaking of habeas corpus. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) reminds that his amendment is purely and exclusively on habeas corpus. I may be wrong, but I am quite clear in my own mind that any legislation of this Parliament which is going to affect the right of habeas corpus is absolutely no good—is an utter waste of time.

The amendment moved by the Hon. Mr. Dandurand was negatived.

Subsection 6 of section 5 was agreed to.

On the schedule, paragraph 5—exemption of men discharged from Military or Naval Forces of Great Britain and her Allies:

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: May I draw my honourable friend's attention to this clause? Would that include, for instance, the Naval Air Service and the Royal Flying Corps?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, it would.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It can hardly be said that the Royal Flying Corps is part of Naval Forces of Great Britain.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, there are two arms of the flying corps, one belonging to the military forces of Great Britain and the other to the naval forces.

Paragraph 5 of the schedule was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Do I understand that the discussion on the divinity students clause is not to take place now?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand my honourable friend from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry), whom I do not see present, is going to move that on the third reading.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: And all the discussion will take place then?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

The Bill was reported with amendments.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the amendments were concurred in.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

THE OLIVER AND WEBB EQUIPMENTS.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to have laid on the Table of the Senate all the correspondence between the Department of Militia and Defence and Clarence J. McCuaig; also, between the same and the first Purchasing Committee appointed by Sir Robert Borden, of which the Honourable Robert Rogers was Chairman, and between the said Clarence J. McCuaig and the Committee of which the Honourable Sir Edward Kemp is or was Chairman, or with any of the members of the said Committee.

He said: I was agreeably disappointed, when I received the answers given yesterday, at finding that this matter of the Oliver equipment is not so serious, and that the Government has not been remiss in its duty, as I had been led to believe. For instance, I asked: "How many sets of Oliver equipment have been purchased by the Government, and at what price each?" The answer was that since the opening of the war 97,000 sets of Oliver equipment have been purchased at an average price of $8.98 per set. Well, I should have thought, and I had been informed, that a set had been purchased for every soldier. I find, on the contrary, that there has been about only one set purchased for every four soldiers. So the situation is not nearly so bad as I thought it was. If useless equipment had been supplied to every soldier, the situation would have been four times as bad. The equipment has not been absolutely useless if it has been used for training purposes. I am asking for the papers in order to see whether they agree exactly with the answers which have been given. I find from the answers that the total cost of the equipment has been $901,805.94. This was a great deal of money to spend for the Oliver equipment, which happens to be of no use at the front. I have been informed by a man from the front, who, I may say, is very close to myself, that some of the soldiers went to the front with this Oliver equipment. It consists, as I have already explained, of two small pouches tied to the belt. The pouches are stiff, and when in action, the men naturally cannot open and close these boxes every time they want to get a set of cartridges; the consequence is that the boxes are left open, and when the soldiers move about, as they are bound to do in action, the cartridges drop out of the belt. Some of our men equipped with the Oliver equipment had got pretty well in front and were under the fire of the enemy and, when they looked for cartridges in the pouches, they found that they had all dropped out. Thus the men were very near the front line without ammunition and exposed to fire. The faulty equipment may have cost the lives of some of our men. On the other hand, the Webb equipment is made of a sort of cotton. The other day I said that it had been substituted for the Oliver equipment, and I find corroboration of that statement in the answer brought down by the leader of the House. The Oliver equipment was taken to France. I will read a portion of the answer:

It, however, was replaced subsequently (in 1915) by "British Webb" and without expense to Canada, when it was returned here to be converted and was taken into further use.

Further down, the answer goes on to say:

At this time it was not possible to obtain the War Office Webb equipment either in Canada or elsewhere, as the War Office was unable to meet its own necessities.

It is in reference to this point that I should like to see the papers, because I have been informed that representatives of the Webb Company were from day to day interviewing the ministers and writing letters soliciting orders for Webb equipment. I refer again to the answer to my inquiries:

Subsequently it was ascertained that the second division had had its Oliver equipment replaced by Webb when going to the front.

Further down the document says:

When the 4th Division, C.E.F., left England for the front it was in possession of this equipment, but later War Office Webb was issued to replace it, without expense to the Canadian public.

The words "without expense to the Canadian public," are repeated in other instances, and the Government seems to take a lot of satisfaction out of them. This must have been at the expense of somebody, and those loyal people who talk about the overburdened British taxpayer did not hesitate to make somebody pay for the equipment. If we did not pay for it, nobody else but the British taxpayer had to pay for it—that is evident. I understand—and I stand to be corrected if I am wrong—that the Government of Canada has to pay for the ammunition and everything else used by our men, and, I ask, if we are going to pay for everything, why should we not pay for the Webb equipment? There is no reason for taking the Webb equipment as a gift and at the same time saying that we will pay for ammunition, wagons, harness, boots, and everything else. That is the answer I received—that we would not have to pay for it, which is corroborated further down:

—until the men are placed under orders as reinforcements for the front, when it is replaced by Webb to accustom the men to its use.

Later on there is a cablegram from a gentleman who was talked about a great deal yesterday. He says this was all without expense to Canada. Even the converted Oliver equipment was replaced by the Webb equipment. The converted Oliver equipment dated from 1916, and it is there that I think the Government was at fault. If the Oliver equipment was no good, even in 1916, the Government kept changing it and sending the leather pouches which are said to be no good. It seems to me very strange that the Webb equipment should be given to us. Why did not the Government supply our soldiers with the Webb equipment as well as everything else?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I do not see anything on the Order Paper relating to Oliver belts. The Oliver equipment was no good thirty years ago. When I was in the House of Commons it was condemned. A relative of a certain minister of the Crown wanted us to buy it, and he was very angry when I opposed doing so. This gentleman was a half pay officer. The Oliver equipment has cropped up in a new way. It may be thought that this is a new thing, but it was condemned thirty years ago.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

THIRD READING.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the amendments made in Committee of the Whole House to Bill 75, An Act respecting Military Service, were concurred in.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Honourable gentlemen, I move that this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to amend clause 1 by adding after the word "tribunal":

"Clergy" means clergy as defined by the laws of each denomination.

I think this amendment will do justice to everybody. What is the proper authority to define the meaning of the word "clergy?" From reading the debate that took place in the other House, I find that members brought dictionaries into the House to arrive at a definition of the word. I think there is a better authority than a dictionary; I think that each church may define the word as the church understands it. I am not asking a favour for any particular denomination; I am simply asking justice for everybody. I think that the churches should decide such questions. The meaning of the word should not be defined in the last days of the session by parties who know nothing about it. It was defined centuries ago, and if we accept this amendment we shall get the best definition that can be obtained and apply it to this Bill.

I have heard it said that our friends of one particular religion have been met by a great authority on theology—one of the ministers of this Government—and have been asked to oppose my motion. That may be the case. I did not hear the explanation, but I was told that one of the reasons given for opposing the motion was this: "If you touch that question the Bill will go back to the House of Commons and they will strike out the exceptions altogether." I am not proposing to amend the schedule. I am proposing to amend section 1. All that the House of Commons will need to do will be to accept my amendment or refuse it. What I am asking is that the honourable gentlemen of this House will vote for the reference of the Bill to the Committee of the Whole, with instructions to perfect it by inserting this definition.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I do not understand this amendment. Perhaps my honourable friend will explain it more fully. I do not know what a denomination is. I know what a religious sect is. They cannot make any laws for me.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I mean the different churches.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: There is only one church in the world.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The honourable gentleman may have his own church.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I have no church. I do not own the church, and the church does not own me; but I know we all belong to the Christian religion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Does the honourable gentleman know that there is a body called "clergy?"

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: No. They are clerks in holy orders.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The House will decide whether the amendment is proper or not. If the honourable gentleman wants to perfect it, he may suggest his own definition when we go into committee.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I do not like to sit here as if I were a numbskull and knew nothing about religion. I have not raised any objection, but I think the clergy should get out and fight like anybody else, especially those in the church that I belong to, where they raise families and get fat.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: We are asking the House to define the word.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I have said all that I am going to say on the matter. I object to the clergy of any church being exempted in any way. Not that I care more about one church than another, because I think there is a good deal of objection to one and a great deal of objection to another, and there is a good deal of good in one and a great deal of good in another.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: I desire to have some enlightenment upon this question. I should like to know if each denomination in the Dominion has laws defining the word "clergy." If they have, it may be all right, but if they have not, this amendment would simply lead to confusion. I am told that some religious denominations —and I respect them all—have no such thing as clergy. I wish all religions to be treated equally; and if this amendment, which is no doubt bona fide, is likely to create unnecessary complications and throw the whole thing into chaos, it may not be desirable in the interest of any clergy, either Catholic or Protestant, if I may use the word with all due respect. I speak with an open mind. I am asking a question, and I am going to listen to the explanations which will be given. But if this amendment is likely to make things worse than they are, and raise irritating questions which I think we should all strive to avoid, even in private discussion, if no principle is involved, I may vote against it. On the other hand, if it is shown to me that the amendment is going to improve the law and promote harmony between the different religious communities, then I may vote for it.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: It seems to me that the amendment is very plain. We all know that in the other House two ministers of the Crown differed as to the meaning of the word "clergy." If I remember correctly, the Minister of Justice said that the word meant so and so, while the Minister of Inland Revenue said that it meant something different. It seems to me that there will be no difficulty if the amendment is accepted, because it leaves the definition to the clergy, and it will be easy for the judges administering the law to declare who belongs to the clergy and who does not. If there are some religious institutions which have no laws this amendment will not apply to them. All that the amendment means is that religious denominations have their rules and regulations and laws. I am sorry that the honourable member for Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Poirier) is to vote against this amendment, but he will no doubt in his old age be very glad to find the church.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: I will support the amendment moved by the honourable member from Stadacona. There is no harm in it. It defines absolutely the clergy of every denomination, and this will make it more easy for the judges to decide.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: The amendment affords a mode of obtaining the interpretation that any judge must follow. It seems quite clear that in order to ascertain what is a priest in the Roman Catholic church, the laws of that church must be consulted, so as to know when a layman ceases to be a layman and becomes a clergyman. In the same way, to know when a rabbi ceases to be a layman and becomes a rabbi, his religious laws must be consulted. In other words a definition as to each denomination must be derived from the rules of that denomination; and the proposed amendment will be a clear direction to the judge to find that definition only where it can surely be found. For that reason I will vote for the amendment.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have only one regret in regard to this section, and that is that the Right Hon. Robert Borden did not have the courage and backbone to stick to his convictions, but allowed himself in this most important matter to be dictated to by an adverse influence, and struck out the clause exempting divinity students. I believe the Prime Minister to be as honest as some who have gone before, though probably not as capable, and it is with profound regret that I observe that he abandoned his position. I will vote for this amendment, or any other that will enable us to bring back the original clause governing the exemptions of clergy, for the protection of religion in Canada. Sir Robert Borden did not seek by that so-called "divinity student clause" to perpetuate the Methodist, Episcopal, Catholic, or any church as against another; he covered all churches with the supreme authority of the law, and did not attempt to strike at the foundations of those churches. No church can exist without specially-called ministers of religion to maintain it, any more than an army can exist without officers to command. If you are going to stop recruiting or enlistment for the church you will do the very same thing for which you blame us—stopping recruiting and enlistment for the army. You refuse to allow the church to fill up the gaps caused by death, old age, and other causes, by the recruiting and enlistment of divinity students, or, as we call them, theological students. What does this Parliament and the Government mean by taking away the right of all churches to enlist and recruit men to fill up gaps in their ministry? Nine-tenths of the people of this country have a religious sentiment expressed in one way or another, and when such religious sentiment is dictated by conscience, one sentiment is just as good as any other. I appeal to Sir Robert Borden, through his representative in this House, to return to his former determination and put a clause in this Act containing the words "divinity student" or "theological student." We all know what divinity students are—that they are absolutely necessary for the maintenance of the church, which means the maintenance of religion. Surely this Government and Parliament are not going to introduce into Canada a system of atheism. Surely they are not going to deny to Christ the right to have disciples; they are not going to have the work of the Saviour fail for the want of recruits—and it will fail in this country if He gets no recruits. Let me give you a historical fact. When I was a student in Paris in 1875 and 1877 the French Chamber of Deputies came under the influence of what were called the oriental lodges, or black lodges, whose members believed in no Divinity, no God. Those lodges started their agitation against all churches. They became powerful under Gambetta, the greatest orator since the days of Mirabeau or Lacordaire, who controlled the French Chamber with his eloquence, and who for ten or fifteen years refused to accept any office in the Government of France. Gambetta was an anti-Christian. I remember, as if I were there now how he made the celebrated declaration on the floor of the Chamber of Deputies in Paris in 1876, "Le Cléricalisme, voilà l'ennemi," and when he ordered Marshal McMahon, an Irishman, who was President of the French Republic, to sign the measure and support it, giving him the alternative, "Il faut se soumettre ou démettre"—"You must submit or resign." Gambetta's word was so powerful that Marshal McMahon was obliged to resign, because he would not submit. The Chamber of Deputies dissolved, but 355 of its members came back and voted for that anti-religious measure of Gambetta's, which was passed, conscripting the seminarians—which is the name used in France, not divinity students, for very few can attain the degree of Doctor of Divinity. This measure is aimed at seminarians, that is, the recruits of Christ's religion on earth. Gambetta drove his axe into the roots of the church and of religion. That is why there had been, up to three years ago, the most intense conflict between the Roman Catholic Church and atheistic Freemasons—not the ordinary Free Masons. King Edward, as Grand Master of the Free Mason Order in Great Britain, cut off relations with the Oriental Masons; for the Free Masons in England and other civilized countries recognize a Supreme Being, One who deals out justice to all, and who demands service in His name. The French Masons believe in no Divinity, no Supreme Ruler, and the result was a conflict which existed up to the time of this war. I was on the benches in the University of Paris for three years, and know the facts. The law passed by the Deputies took the seminarians, theological students, and put them into barracks. We all know that a barrack is not a holy of holies, nor does it contain the ark of the covenant; there are a good many things in a barrack that are loose, and which cannot be helped; but it is not a proper school for a disciple or recruit of Christ to maintain his doctrines in. The result was that the "clericalisme," as Gambetta called it, began to go down, and the Free Masons and atheists of France got the upper hand and held it. I often wonder if the present war is the work of man alone. I often ask myself whether Providence, the Supreme Power and overruling Master of human destinies, has not had a word to say during the progress of this war. France fell into such a condition that religion was not only ignored but despised. The moral law of the Old and New Testaments was set aside and trampled on. I am speaking not of the French people, but of their leaders of thought, their romanticists, their magazine writers, their picture shows. Everything was an abomination, a violation of the most fundamental rules of morality, and that condition has existed for forty years. But what do we find to-day? We find that the French soldier, who probably never went to church, either while he was in barracks or before, has had a change of heart. I base my statement on a most eloquent speech delivered in this honourable House by the Hon. Senator Girroir, probably the most eloquent declaration in favour of this Bill, during which he quoted the letter of a French soldier, who wrote to a friend: "Take care of my mother; for I may not be alive to-morrow; tell her that her son attended Holy Communion this morning, and that he is prepared to die for his country and to meet his Maker." There is an evidence of the change of heart in France; and Providence has brought that about by this war. I have seen churches in Paris and throughout France empty during divine service on Sunday; at any time you would not find three people in beautiful basilicas; but to-day the churches in France are filled morning, noon, and night; and those that are empty are so because of Hun bombs and cannon shot. Every other religious institution is flourishing. The heart of France has gone back to the mother church, and to-day France is the eldest daughter of Christ on earth. Those are the results already from this war. I hold that Providence is working His way through this conflict, and that this war is a scourge on people who have been backward in obeying divine law. Now, let us not disobey divine law in this measure; let us not tell Christ that he cannot get any recruits because of the war.

Honourable gentlemen, I appeal to you, from the inmost recesses of my heart, from the deepest convictions of my conscience and mind, not to place Canada in 1917 in the position in which the French Free Masons placed France in 1875 and 1877. France has now, by the blood of her gallant sons, by the work and the sweat of her women in the fields and the factories, redeemed its name and its love for religion, which had been suppressed for some forty years. Let us not do anything which would cause our children twenty or thirty or forty years from now to come before Parliament and bemoan the action which the Canadian Government and Parliament of 1917 had taken in striking at the root of religion and the maintenance of all churches. Let them not have the occasion to say, "Our fathers did wrong to our country in striking at religion, in striking at the law of the divine Saviour who came here to save us all."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, I have been requested to point out to the House what the provisions of the Act are in regard to the clergy. I would draw the attention of honourable gentlemen to paragraph 6 of the schedule, under the head of "exceptions" reading as follows:

> Clergy, including members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character, and ministers of all religious denominations existing in Canada at the date of the passing of this Act.

Very much more elaborate in its explanation than the amendment of my honourable friend from Stadacona.

Now, without entering upon a discussion as to what the word "clergy" means, may I read to the House what was said upon that subject by the Minister of Justice—and there is probably no more distinguished Roman Catholic in the Dominion of Canada:

> Furthermore, as has already been said, and as the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has pointed out, the word "clergy" has a perfectly clear and perfectly defined meaning, and I have no hesitation in saying, after satisfying myself on the subject, that the word "clergy" covers anybody who has holy orders of any kind, including the minor orders, as the hon. member for Bonaventure says. The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will recognize that the theological student, from the moment he gets his tonsure, or minor orders, which he does at the end of his first year—or, at all events, that is the general practice—enters and forms part of the clergy. . . I am not making that statement without having verified it on the very best authority. I have satisfied myself beyond peradventure on that subject.

Furthermore, the Minister of Justice has informed me that, in relation to theological students, a bishop has the right and power to tonsure a student at any time. He need not wait until the expiration of the first year. This is the opinion of the Attorney General of Canada, the chief law adviser of the Crown, and, as I have said, a distinguished Roman Catholic; and, much as I defer to the opinion of my honourable friend from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) I am bound to take in preference the opinion of the Attorney General of Canada.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I know better, because I have gone through the mill. I know that the Minister of Justice is wrong, absolutely wrong.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I rise not for the purpose of following the argument of the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran)—because I think he has spoken altogether outside of the question—but merely to call the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to the fact that the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Stadacona does not deal with the Catholic church any more than with other denominations, but applies to all denominations. I agree entirely with the reasons which he has given in support of his amendment, and I am in favour of it for this additional reason: It would tend to close the door to different interpretations being given to the Act. If we do not leave it to one body to show the rule which should determine what is the meaning of the word "clergy," then the question will be left to the different tribunals, and there may be as many conflicting decisions as there are members of tribunals. It may be that one decision will be adopted in one place, or in one part of a province, and another definition in another part of the same province, or in another province. It seems to me that for all denominations it would be much wiser to declare at once that it shall be the duty of the tribunal to follow such a rule, and then we shall be sure that the same rule will be followed by every tribunal.

Hon. J. M. DOUGLAS: Honourable gentlemen, perhaps I am the only clergyman within the House, and I want to speak for myself, having passed through all the orders and education of the Presbyterian Church of Canada. I should regret very much if anything were done by the House to indicate that a theological student was turned loose upon the world and had no standing under the circumstances. Different Protestant churches have their different orders and laws and constitutions, that they believe to be more or less in accordance with the Divine Word. On that account they cling to the history of the past. I regret very much that this question has come into this House in the way of controversy. My standing here is peculiar. I come as a minister of the Presbyterian Church of Canada, fully equipped with all the rights and privileges of that Church to-day, and if I do not exercise the gifts and the authority vested in me, it is recorded against my name. I stand fully equipped for any duty which the Church may ask me to perform. I want to say, also, that, whilst I did my work in Canada, I took the privilege of extending my religious studies, and went to the seminary of the Presbyterian Church of the United States. I have the honour to-day of holding papers and authority similar to those of the honoured president of the United States, he having gone through the same lines of study and being clothed with the same authority from the Presbyterian Church of the United States.

Anything that comes into conflict with the definition of clergy will necessarily breed confusion. It would be better to leave the whole matter as it has stood in the past. I think we have had no difficulties among the churches. We understand what "clergy" means. We understand the phraseology used in the different Protestant churches. There are some who have no authority—who have, in special language, no clothed authority, but who have rights and who claim their rights. So that we, as a House, cannot touch or interfere with those rights without coming into collision with the large body of Christian people throughout the length and breadth of this country.

I regret very much that the question has been brought up. I do not see why it is necessary for us to make any further definition in this respect, and, as far as I am concerned as a member of this House, I am quite willing that the matter be left as it is. Every branch of the Protestant Church has students for the ministry. They are all of use in the Church in promoting every good sentiment that we cherish, and they are doing excellent work on the battlefield for our country. Both the clergy and the students have done noble service, and their names will go down to history for the work they have done and the record they have made. Why shut the door against the men who have honoured themselves and their parents and Canada by going into the front rank and out into the battlefield and doing such noble service for the whole country? I hope sincerely that this House will make no change. I do not know who suggested the change, and, therefore, cannot speak definitely about it; but it is for us to remember that what is good in a law is good for the people. Let the people have it, and let us go forward unitedly, with a strong front against the great enemy that we have to face to-day. I am sure it will be a great encouragement to the young men from our various universities in Canada, and of whom we are so proud. We are proud of the service they have rendered; we are proud of this fact, that they are willing to continue still to render service and to stand by every good principle and every manifestation of the truth that will help the courage and strength of our soldiers in the field. When the question comes to a vote, if it does, I shall be pleased to sustain the old phraseology; and let the liberty that we have enjoyed in the past be given to the people for all time to come.

Hon. R. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, in the schedule to the Act the clergy are included among those who are excluded from its operations. When a person claims exemption under this head, the tribunals will have to declare whether he does or does not come within that category. How will the judges throughout the land decide the question? I suppose they will go about it as the honourable leader of the Government has done. Where will that carry the judges? I think it will carry them in the direction of the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona. What explanation have we had from the honourable leader as to the meaning of the word "clergy"? The explanation which he has given is one that was given by the Minister of Justice in the other House. He is the authority upon which my honourable friend bases his judgment as to what "clergy" means.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is, only of course as to the Catholic clergy.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I am not mistaken in making that statement. My honourable friend has based his judgment as to the meaning of the word "clergy," so far as Catholics are concerned, upon the opinion given by the Minister of Justice in the other House.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I agree with him.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Well, then, upon what authority has the honourable the Minister of Justice fallen back in giving that explanation of what the word "clergy" means? The authority of the church, beyond peradventure. That is very clearly expressed by the minister. I need not repeat the remarks which my honourable friend the leader of the Government in this House has quoted. The honourable the Minister of Justice has said:

> There can be no question as to what the word "clergy" means. I have consulted the best authorities and know whereof I speak.

Then, will not the judges throughout the land, who will have to find out if a man claiming exemption comes within that category, have to do as my honourable friend the leader of the Government in this Chamber has done, and as the honourable the Minister of Justice has done—go to the source and find out from the best authority —in other words, the regulations or laws of those various churches, what the word "clergy" means and whom it includes? If that is so—and I suppose the judges will have no better guidance than the expression of opinion of my honourable friend the leader of the Government and of the Minister of Justice—they will themselves go, or they should go, to the best source of information, the authorities of the various denominations. Therefore, is it not logical to accept the definition proposed by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona, which will inevitably be that of the judges if they accept the definition given by the Minister of Justice and endorsed by the honourable gentleman who leads this House.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Before the vote is taken, I want to say only one word in reply to the arguments made by the honourable leader of this House. He based his declaration on what was said in the House of Commons by the Minister of Justice; but what the Minister of Justice says in the House of Commons is not law.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Or what he says outside of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: And he is wrong, too.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: And this is confirmed by the declaration of the Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, who said:

> As far as the word "clergy" is concerned, I wish to correct a misstatement that I made. I said that the word "clergy" was used in the British Act, but that is not so.

He goes on to say, further:

In reply to my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) I think the words "members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character" are perfectly plain.

Now, mark what he says:

I do not care to express any opinion in advance as to what the tribunals will determine.

That has always been the rule. Explanations or expressions of opinion given in the House of Commons, even by the Minister of Justice, will not guide a tribunal.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: They cannot even be cited.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If they are cited—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: No, they cannot be used in court.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I wanted to say that, if they are cited, it will only be by a man who does not know the rules of court. It would be immediately put aside. I remember, Mr. Speaker, when the Electoral Bill was before the House of Commons, you quoted what was said in the House of Commons to impress one of the judges; but the court decided that expressions of opinion in the House of Commons were not law at all. A judge will take his definition where he can find it, and by this amendment we indicate that he will find it in the laws of the different churches—in all the churches except perhaps the Acadian church. If there is any difference of opinion amongst our people, it will be due to the honourable member for Shediac (Hon. Mr. Poirier). This is what the Minister of Justice said:

I am not making that statement without having verified it on the very best authority.

Where is his authority? I defy him to name the authority. The only thing he did was to try to frighten the members of this House by saying that if this Bill were amended it would go back to the Commons anyway, and we would lose what we have already. Let them dare to do that.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I defy them to do that. Have they the right to attack a clause which we have not amended ourselves? The only thing they could do, if this House adopted the amendment, would be to accept it or reject it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Or withdraw the Bill.

Hon. Mr. MACDONELL: I rise to a point of order. I should like to know what authority the honourable gentleman has for saying that the Minister of Justice has made the statement which he has just attributed to him.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: That is not a point of order. I am not attacking the exemption clause at all. My amendment does not touch the exemption clause. I am simply asking to define clearly the meaning of the word "clergy."

The Senate divided on the amendment moved by Hon. Mr. Landry:

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw attention to the fact that the honourable gentleman from Charlottetown (Hon. Mr. Prowse) has not voted.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: I am not voting, for the simple reason that the question does not cencern me in any way, shape, or form.

The amendment was negatived.

Hon. Mr. DAVID moved that the Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House, with instructions to amend subsection 2 of section 3 by adding thereto the following words:

Unless he establishes that he had engaged to marry previous to that day and that the question of conscription had nothing to do with his decision.

He said: This question was discussed yesterday. It affects every man who has married since the 6th day of July. Under the provisions of the Bill he is considered as being unmarried, even though he may have contracted an engagement six months before. It seems to me that this would be doing an injustice. It is in order to overcome that injustice that I move the present amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Hon. Mr. DAVID moved that the Bill be not now read the third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend section 6 of the schedule by adding thereto the following words:

(g) And all professors in schools, colleges, universities, and other educational establishments duly incorporated or recognized by the Department of Education of any province.

He said: Section 6 of the schedule says:

Clergy, including members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character, and ministers of all religious denominations existing in Canada at the date of the passing of this Act.

I say that in virtue of this clause a great many professors in our schools, colleges, and universities would go to the war, and what would be the consequences? Thousands of students in all parts of this country would be deprived of an education. We see very strange things in our time. We see those Liberals who have suffered so much from the clergy now defending the clergy, and trying to protect them against a law passed by their friends. So I hope that Conservatives and Liberals will join in voting for this amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Hon. C. P. BEAUBIEN: I move that the Bill be not now read a third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of amending section 6 of the schedule by adding the words "divinity students and" after the word "including" in the first line of such section. I feel, honourable gentlemen, that it is a difficult task to plead this case before this House at the present time, but I will do so to the best of my ability and test the opinion of this House. I will put before you rapidly my reasons, not from the point of religion, but from that of the unity of the nation. I think I have at the outset a good excuse for moving this amendment in the fact, of which you are all aware, that it was proposed by the honourable the Prime Minister in the House of Commons. As we all know, pressure was brought subsequently, and the honourable the Prime Minister withdrew the amendment, and gave his reasons for doing so. What were those reasons?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: By whom was the pressure brought; will the honourable gentleman tell the country that?

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: This is what the Prime Minister said:

On further consideration, it has been found that the words "divinity students" covered a wider class than was contemplated.

That is the first reason.

As pointed out by the honourable member for Bonaventure it would include a great many who would also be included in the word "clergy" which is also used in this section. Moreover, it has been represented that it covers a class a very considerable portion of whose members would not desire to be included in the exception. The question arose as to whether or not this particular class of students ought to be included within the terms of the exception or left with other students to take advantage of the exemption clauses. There is reason to believe that those who are not included in the term "clergy" would be so situated as to entitle them to favourable consideration for exemption by one of the tribunals. In the circumstances it is thought best that the clause should be restored to its original form, and I therefore move that the words "divinity students and" be struck out.

There are the two grounds for the withdrawal. One is the fear that it might cover a class larger than was expected. I am even told that this class appeared to be so large as to number some 25,000 for the whole country.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Quite a religious people.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: But what is the position? The exemption extended to every denomination, I admit, but the result would be that, as applied to Roman Catholic divinity students, it would cover only 250 people at the maximum. I beg to draw attention to that fact, upon which I base largely my argument. I have here a letter from the Archbishop of Montreal, establishing the number of Roman Catholics who every year could be exempted under this clause. It is quite clear that the term "clergy" exempts everybody who has received orders, and leaves out everybody who has not; I think the Minister of Justice expressed his opinion quite clearly as to that. But what does the exemption mean in practice, as applied to divinity students? It means that divinity students who enter a seminary are for one year liable to conscription. At the expiration of one year, however, they receive minor orders and enter the clergy; then they pass outside the laity and outside of conscription. I ask permission of the House to read the letter, which is in French:

(Translation.)

Montreal, August 6, 1917.

Hon. C. Beaubien,
Senator, Ottawa.

Mr. Senator:

You have asked me for the number of young men who, in our various dioceses, enter each year as students in theology. To give you statistics which would be absolutely exact it would be necessary for me to inquire of almost every titular bishop in Canada. But I can state to you at once that the total number should not exceed 200, and this number is perhaps even too high. In any case 250 would certainly be the maximum. This will no doubt surprise those who have claimed that the number of young men who each year enter the ecclesiastic state and commence the study of theology must be from 20,000 to 25,000. The diocese of Montreal is one of the largest in the Dominion and the one which, with the diocese of Quebec, furnishes most of the subjects for the priesthood. Now, I have never more than twenty or twenty-five new aspirants per year. Quebec cannot have more. Judge then of the number of theological students in the other dioceses. The fact is easy of proof, because everywhere the need of priests is felt. I am continually in need of from twenty to thirty more in view of the importance of our work and the multiplicity of our parishes.

The harvest is great and the labourers are few. May I impress upon you the necessary conclusion: a law which would take away from us our young beginners in the priestly career, our students in theology who have not yet received holy orders, would be fatal to the recruiting of the Catholic clergy in our country. Are we to have this law imposed upon us?

Your very truly,

Paul, Archbishop of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Now please read that in English.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I will not translate it; I will simply state in a few words the gist of that letter.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, read it in English.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: The Archbishop of Montreal says that at the very utmost 250 students apply every year as students of divinity. That is the maximum in the whole of Canada.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: But that applies exclusively to the Church over which he presides.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Certainly. I thought I had made myself quite clear to the honourable gentleman. That is what I meant, certainly; but then the Archbishop goes on and says that while that is the maximum, it would be very much nearer the truth to say 200, or probably less. The archbishop adds that he is badly in need of priests, and that he only gets twenty or twenty-five a year, though in his own diocese he requires from twenty-five to thirty more.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: More.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Put the letter on record in English, so that the people of the country will know what it contains.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I desire to place before you this fact, that the army may be deprived every year from now on till the end of the war of only about 250 men.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: For only one year.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: No, for every year while the war will last the army may be deprived of about 250 men.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: But this Bill only calls for 100,000 men, and the enlistment of that number will not take more than a year, so that it will not have effect in the second and third years.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: My honourable friend is quite right; I understand the 100,000 men will be enrolled and obtained within a year. Therefore, what I am pleading for now is to know whether or not those 200 men will come under the law; that is the immediate question.

Now, what was the second reason given by the Prime Minister? It was the probability that those whom I want to exempt were already exempted. I will cite the Prime Minister's remarks from page 3706 of the Commons Hansard:

With regard to theological students, it was largely the view expressed by my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), for whom I have great respect, that led me to reconsider the matter as I did. He is my guide in this respect, and I am content to place his authority against that of my hon. friend from Rouville.

That meant very clearly that the Prime Minister, having heard this Bill discussed by Mr. Marcil, a well-informed Roman Catholic, giving his impression as to the effect of the Bill, the Prime Minister thought it well to withdraw the amendment.

Now, what does Mr. Marcil say? After he heard the Prime Minister speak in those terms, he said:

I wish to thank the Prime Minister for the kind allusion he has made to me. The remarks I made on this matter were after the right hon. gentleman had introduced his amendment, and they were practically in support of that amendment. I was a member of this House in 1904 when the Militia Act was passed, and amongst other exemptions we had these two: Clergymen and ministers of all religious denominations, and professors in colleges and universities and teachers belonging to religious orders. I supported the amendment the right hon. gentleman suggested because in the Roman Catholic faith a young man has to go through a course spread over four or five years before becoming an ordained priest; and I wanted to make sure that this class were included in the clause of the section now amended by the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Marcil wanted to be sure that divinity students would be included in the exemption, and what does the Prime Minister say? "I think they are." Therefore, honourable gentlemen, my second argument for the amendment is that there is at least a doubt in the Prime Minister's mind whether the divinity students would be exempt under the other provisions of the Bill. What we have read of the opinion of the Minister of Justice has, I think, dispelled that doubt altogether. For the first year there are no clergymen in the seminaries; there are students of divinity, but the doors of the Church are not open to them until they get their minor orders. There is no doubt as to that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Hear, hear; now you are talking theology.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Now it has been said that the bishops had in their hands means of preventing those young men, when entering the seminary, from being made subject to this law, if they required them. How, may I ask? By imposing on them the tonsure—by giving them minor orders when they present themselves for the first time.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Before they are qualified.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: I appeal to you, honourable gentlemen. Do you want to force any church, whether mine or yours, to choose men as ministers to attend to the consciences of their people without any probation at all? The Church keeps those young men under supervision for a certain time to learn whether or not they are fit to become ministers of Christ—to find out whether their intelligence, their heart, and their character justify their selection. Is it possible to entertain the idea that the authorities of the Church would waive that protection for their clergy and for those committed to their care? I do not think so.

Now, honourable gentlemen, I have told you what my demand really means. I have told you, briefly, of the need for priests. May I now make this request? I make it altogether apart from my connection with my Church; I address you not as members of your Churches, but as representing your country. Forget your denomination, as I forget mine. You have before you the high authorities of the Catholic Church, which represents 45 per cent of the population of this country. They have come to you and have asked, not because they want to have these young men escape the effect of the law—I hope you will not believe that to be their intention—but because they want to have ministers of their religion—because they feel the need of more priests, as the Archbishop of Montreal and others have openly declared. They stand before the nation and they say, "We request you to allow us 200 of the young men of this country, no more, for the work of God." Are you going to refuse that request?

Let me place the case differently before you. Supposing that all the members of the judiciary of this country should one day gather together and come before this honourable House and say: "Gentlemen of the Senate, to administer the laws of the land as they should be, we ask you to exempt 200 men." What would you say? The answer is obvious: you would say: "Yes, two hundred men to aid in the administration of justice in this country?—why, that is nothing." But what is the Church if not the best and surest and—if I am speaking of practical men—the cheapest way of administering the law? The Church comes to you and says: "For a mission that is as important in this world as the administration of justice, and very much more important in the next, we ask you to exempt 200 men." What are you going to do? Are you going to refuse this request? It may be refused; but I tell you frankly that if that question were put to all the electors of this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, there would be but one answer, and it would be a favourable one.

Circumstances are such that my demand may not be granted. Oh, I am not blaming anybody. But why, may I ask you? Search your own hearts and learn the reason. Because we have been subjected for more than a year past to a frightful campaign among both races in this country. To what end? Where is it going to lead us? You people from Ontario are carried on by a swift current, and, because you float with it, you do not know how rapid it is. And my own people in the province of Quebec are also being carried more swiftly than they know towards the abyss. They do not know it because they are carried with the crowd. But those who have to face that current, they know its strength, they know whither it leads, they know what to expect to-morrow.

Honourable gentlemen, I am pleading with you for the unity of this country. Let no honourable gentleman smile. Those who are well acquainted with their history will not laugh. Much has been said, on both sides of this House, that has been hard to bear; but the voices of some of my old and dear friends have come to us as a consolation, reminding the country of a service which has been rendered in the past by my people. I must say that I am deeply grateful to those honourable gentlemen for reminding this country that, after all, if this is a British colony it is to the credit of my people. Now, I want you to open your ears and, if you can, your hearts. Turn to the history of Canada and you will learn what happened at the critical time when Lafayette and his men came across the Atlantic and asked my countrymen not to join with the United States, but to severe their connection with England and be independent. At that time you appealed to the clergy of my province.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They forget that.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Sir George Prévost went to Mgr. Plessis and asked him to keep his people faithful, and he did so. As a result Canada is a British colony today. What has happened in this war? History is written fast and is forgotten still faster. I think that I should read a small extract from an address by the Archbishop of Montreal at the beginning of the war. What he said then he has since continued to repeat eloquently all over his province:

> Canada being a part of the British Empire, it is the sacred duty of the Canadian people to assist Great Britain in her heroic defence of liberty. This was the position taken by the episcopacy of French Canada at the outbreak of the war, and this is the attitude our bishops will maintain, and will continue to maintain to the very end. The obligations we owe the British Crown are sacred obligations. England did not want this war, and was not prepared for the contest, but when sacred rights were violated by Germany and when treaties were scraps of paper, then the power of England was brought into play, and it is the solemn duty of every Canadian citizen to the utmost limit of his force to stand side by side with the Motherland in her heroic effort to crush the tyrant who wishes to trample upon small nations and nations and states.

Could any one of you, from any province or any race or any creed, utter better or more beautiful language? There is not only the debt of gratitude that all this country owes to the Roman Catholic clergy of my race for the past and for what they have done in this war. Tell me quite sincerely how much will you depend in these troubled times upon the clergy of my province to have this law respected and obeyed when it is passed? I do not need your answer, for I have had it scores of times since I have been in the corridors of this House. I have been told: "Senator, your Church will never allow its people to disobey a law properly passed." Look down into your hearts and tell me, fairly and squarely, if you do not share that opinion now.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We take our politics from home and our religion from Rome.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: Just one word more, and I have done. Forget your religion, as I will forget mine. This question concerns those who are directing the consciences of 45 per cent of the population of this country. They are, as everybody knows, big men, and they would not make a paltry demand. They are making it for reasons of conscience. You have exempted conscientious objectors. How many are there in this country? They are conscientious men, and you have respected their consciences. Are you or are you not going to respect the consciences of those who direct 45 per cent of the population of this country? That is what I ask you now.

What are the present conditions in this country? Will anybody deny that, unhappily, and to the great sorrow of those who love their country, a race cry has been raised? There is no use denying it. The news of it has crossed the sea. Do you want to make that condition worse? Do you want to add to that a religious cry? Do you think it is wise? Or do you not think it is wiser to exempt 200 men? I leave that question with you. You will answer it; but I would ask you that in doing so you will forget everything but that you are Canadians and love your country, and that you will not give way to your prejudices whether of love or hate. Think first of your country and then give your answer.

But, honourable gentlemen, there is another reason, and it is the last one. These are trying times, as I have said. Do you not hear the rumblings of the storm that is coming? Let me address myself to the business men—the capitalists and the manufacturers of Ontario—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: They are all on your own side.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: —men of ability and of vision. Let me ask you this: What is the meaning of this noise coming from the West? What does it mean that people are gathering together and saying, "At last we have found common ground." When a public man gets upon the platform and says, "Gentlemen, at last the tail is going to wag the dog," what does that mean? Is it true or not that farmers from the West, proud and determined, are coming with their scythes to cut down the chimneys of the East? Free trade is what they want. They are coming to tear down the wall that has guarded the prosperity of Canada. I say that because I am a protectionist myself. What are you going to do? Do you want to appeal to people who are calm and can decide a question upon its merits, or do you want to have the public mind inflamed so that men will listen to nothing but appeals to hatred? What I am telling you has been put in a very crisp phrase by a friend of mine who is a broker. He said to me: "Sell on bulges your Canadian industrials, and you have six months in which to do it."

After the next election we shall need in the service of this country the best of our intelligence. We shall need clear-minded men. I think that even political parties, which sometimes prosper in trouble, will come back to the old creeds of those who made Confederation. Those were wise and skilful hands which reared the fabric of our national life. They knew how to yield a little so that threads would not break. Who is thinking of national unity to-day? Do we hear any one preaching for the country at large? We hear men preaching for a certain section only, and no one preaching for the country itself. I am appealing on behalf of the consciences of 45 per cent of the population of this country, and am merely making a request for the exemption of 200 men. You would grant that to ten magistrates if they asked you. If you will not respect their consciences, comply with their demand on practical grounds. Those men have been useful, if you like—it is almost sacrilegious to speak in that way. They are useful to-day; they will be more so to-morrow. But forget that. Think of one thing only, that we must all live together in this country. Very soon the people will discard those who are nothing but politicians, those who have forgotten the lessons of unity. Many a man who now feels assured of election will receive the cold shoulder from his electors, because they must realize that the country is face to face with grave danger. Such a man might very well be told by the people: "The representatives we want are not the firebrands." As a Liberal who has left his party to help in the war has said, "We want less dynamite and more cement." I am appealing for cement. It costs little and may save the country.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman who has just sat down (Hon. Mr Beaubien) made some reference, I think, to dynamite. It occurs to me that the speech made by the honourable gentleman is very much like dynamite. I think that at this time we should try to preserve, and if possible, where it does not exist, to create the utmost harmony amongst the different sections of our population, and in my opinion a speech such as he has made is exceedingly injudicious. Speaking for myself, I think that it is to be regretted that the First Minister withdrew the provision in this Bill with respect to divinity students. I am sorry for that; but, after all, I do not think it is a very serious matter. If we look at the provisions of the Bill, we find in the schedule that "clergy, including members of any recognized order of an exclusively religious character, and ministers of all religious denominations existing in Canada at the date of the passing of this Act," are exempt. I find that the exemption clause in force in England is in almost the same words. It exempts, "men in holy orders or regular ministers of any religious denomination." As was pointed out by the honourable leader of the Government, who quoted the words of the Minister of Justice in another place, and also by my honourable friend from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien)—I am now speaking of my own church and not of other churches—all young men who have received minor orders will come under the exemption clause. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) very properly put the matter before the Archbishop of Montreal, who informed him, as I understand, that as a practical matter this enactment would not affect more than two hundred young men in the whole of Canada. That is not a very large number and we have to bear in mind that this Act does not provide that the whole of that two hundred shall be taken, but simply that these young men will have to take their chances with other members of the populace in that regard. The presumption is that probably not one-fifth of the two hundred will be taken, and I venture to think that is not a very serious matter.

I wish to direct the honourable gentleman's attention to the fact that in section 11 of the Bill, paragraph c, it is stated that one ground for exempting a man is: "that it is expedient in the national interest that, instead of being employed in military service, he should continue to be educated or trained for any work for which he is then being educated or trained." It is to be presumed that the members of the tribunals in the province of Quebec, as a rule, will be members of the Roman Catholic faith. Does not the honourable gentleman feel that under paragraph c of section 11, the tribunal would hold that young men who were being prepared for the priesthood would be exempt?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Not if you were on it.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Well, I never started in as a priest.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You were never fit.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Does the honourable gentleman think that the decisions of the tribunals would be the same all over the country?

Hon. Mr. POWER: Not at all. The members of the tribunals will be local men. If a young man could come up and show under paragraph c of section 11 that he was being educated for the priesthood, and if it were shown that we are short of clergy, I cannot imagine that the tribunal would hold that he was liable to be conscripted. I do not think there is anything very wrong about this particular portion of the measure. Honourable gentlemen will bear in mind that in France and Italy there is no exemption at all for the clergy. That is a permanent condition in those countries; but here it is a condition which terminates with the war—and let us hope the war will be over in a year. It may not be very orthodox, but I have an honest impression that perhaps a year spent out of doors fighting for his country would not hurt even an ecclesiastical student. I daresay some of my honourable friends have been a little surprised at the way in which I have voted. I have done so with a good deal of hesitation, but I have voted according to my conscience, and that is what we really have to look to in matters of this kind.

There is just one other circumstance. The amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) has already been rejected in the House of Commons. What practical wisdom is there in sending back to that House an amendment which has already been dropped there? The Bill will come back to us and our amendment will not have been agreed to, and possibly they will disagree with other amendments which would be of more value.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I do not think the honourable gentleman has always followed the rule that, because the House of Commons has adopted a certain point of view before sending a Bill to this honourable House, that was a reason for not challenging it. I rise especially for the purpose of drawing the attention of the honourable the leader of the Government to a very important statement which he made in this House the day before yesterday. I refer to page 575 of this report of the debates. He said:

> It is expected that we shall not have to go beyond classes 1 and 2. I have in my hand the census returns of 1911, and I am informed that, as the population of Canada stands today, notwithstanding that say 400,000 men have gone overseas, yet these figures can be taken as approximately correct, and they show that we have in Canada 319,610 single men between the ages of 20 and 24; or in round figures, we have 320,000 in class 1.

If we have such a large number of men that it will not be necessary to exhaust class 1 of section 3 of this Bill, I fail to see why we should haggle over the question of exempting 200, or even 400 or 500, young men who are necessary for the recruiting of the different churches of the country. If we send these men to the front we shall be creating a situation, not only in the Catholic Church, but in all the churches of this land, which it is not necessary to create. I appeal to the honourable gentleman, as, from the figures that he has given us, it appears plainly that it would be a matter of small consequence to exempt a few hundred young men.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I cannot let the speech of the honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) pass without saying a word, and for these reasons. First he made a fighting and fiery speech in defence of a class of men who are generally very peaceful, and I could not see why he became so fiery on an occasion like this. Secondly, I was amused to see the slashing that he gave to his friends on the other side, especially those coming from Ontario, who are being carried on the crest of the wave of fanaticism. I am going to ask my honourable friend a question. When the Prime Minister brought in this Bill, there was a provision in it for the exemption of divinity students. Later on that provision was removed, and now my honourable friend is asking to have it put back. Naturally, the idea occurs to every one of us that the honourable gentleman, who is a partisan and a great friend of the Prime Minister, both personally and politically, must have spoken to the Prime Minister with regard to his intention of raising this question before the Senate. He must have asked the Prime Minister why this clause exempting divinity students was taken out of the Bill. Now, I ask my honourable friend if he learned from the Prime Minister why that was done. Was he given the answer that we in this House would put it back? I suppose he discussed the matter with the Prime Minister and in doing so used the same strong expression that he has used here this afternoon in order to compel him to restore that provision to the Bill. I ask my honourable friend if the answer of the Prime Minister was satisfactory and if it is for this reason that he has moved his amendment?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I want to congratulate the new blood in the Senate. I want to congratulate the senator from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien). I am glad that he has buckled on the right sort of armour. Honourable gentlemen may call his speech fiery, but so long as the fire is bright, a holy fire, so much the better. One honourable gentleman likened his speech to dynamite. If it was dynamite to blow up rotten institutions or to put down persecution, so much the better for the dynamite, and it would be better still if he had more of it. I find no fault with his expressions—why? Because, through those expressions came forth truth and a demand for justice, a demand for the protection of 45 per cent of the population of this country. Fiery expressions do not destroy the value of patriotism or statesmanship. I feel my shoulders unburdened to a very large extent. For some time I alone have been fighting the same fight in this House. The speeches may have been fiery at times; I may have used a little dynamite once in a while—and sometimes it is needed—but now I have a colleague who stands for the same principles which I have enunciated during this debate. I want to disavow the attitude assumed by the honourable the senior senator from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power). He has no right and no power to express an opinion, as he did, on behalf of the Catholic Church.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I did not undertake to speak on behalf of the Catholic Church.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable gentleman said that he was from the Roman Catholic Church.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I did not. I appeal to the House. I said that speaking for my own conscience—

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable gentleman mentioned the Catholic Church.

Hon. Mr. POWER: In speaking of the clergy of the Church.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I thought I was right. The honourable gentleman does not know any theology at all. A man may be a clergyman before he receives Holy Orders. I am sorry that the honourable senator from Montarville did not read the archbishop's letter in English so that honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House could understand it. I was a classmate of the archbishop's for nearly ten years, in Montreal, Paris and Rome. I know something about theology. I have learned it down to the ground and know what I am talking about. In his letter the archbishop said that this Bill was a fatal blow at the Church. Why, honourable gentlemen, I have said that before. You are not cutting down the tree by taking off one branch after another; you are going at the very vital roots of the tree. It is a most ingenious way of taking down a tree or causing it to crumble. That is what this law is doing. It is cutting out the divinity student when he begins. He enters a seminary to study theology. There are only twenty of those seminaries in the vast diocese of Montreal, which contains a million and a quarter of people. The archbishop cannot get young men as you can get them for the army. The archbishop cannot get young men to recruit for him in the same way that you can get them to recruit for the army. These young men make the supreme sacrifice; they forego all family ties, all worldly ambitions, all sensual pleasures; that is the supreme sacrifice on behalf of Christ, and each year, out of a population of over a million, the archbishop can get only twenty young men to enter the seminary. And now you want to take them from him. Are you not ashamed of yourselves? Is not the Government afraid to go before the country with a Bill of that kind? Throughout the Dominion of Canada, with a population of 7,000,000, there are only two hundred young men prepared to make this supreme sacrifice—to quit home and family, and give up everything but the service of their Saviour and their God, and then you come along with this infamous law to destroy it. I use the words deliberately—the law as it stands is infamous. You come along with this law and take away from the archbishops the few recruits that they can get for the ministry of the church. I am not going to speak any more for the churches. Let others take care of their own.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: There is only one church.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN : That is right—there is only one Church, and I speak for it. This law is a direct blow, not only at its usefulness but at its existence, and I call upon the Prime Minister of this country to withdraw this Bill or to amend it so as to protect the young men who are willing to make the supreme sacrifice for the love of their fellow countrymen and for service to Christ the Saviour. I make this appeal to him; it is useless to make it to you, honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House, for your conscience is made up as well as your vote; but, through the medium of the press and of our public records, I appeal to the Prime Minister before it is too late; and if it is too late I appeal to the population of the Dominion of Canada to repudiate this Bill. Though it is useless to offer amendments on the floor of this House, I appeal to Sir Robert Borden to withdraw this Bill or to amend it in the sense of the amendment offered by the honourable senator from Montarville. He took a fair position, and I was pleased that he had the courage to say what he did and to say it in strong terms.

The amendment of Hon. Mr. Beaubien was negatived.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE moved that the Bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend section 3 by changing the word "twenty" to "twenty-one" in class 1. He said: that means that a man must not be enlisted unless he is of age. A man under twenty-one has no right to vote, or to make contracts, or to marry; in fact, he has no legal standing now, and strictly speaking, has no right to make this contract with the Government. Yet the members of this House, who are old men, and who cannot go to war themselves, are voting to send those young men to the front. I do not think that is fair. I think we ought to make the law as it is in the United States, where the age limit is twenty-one.

The amendment was negatived.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I have an amendment to section 8, to replace the word "one" in the first line of the section by the word "two."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would draw my honourable friend's attention to subsection 4 of section 10, where provision is made for an additional judge, if necessary.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I know that, and it is very satisfactory, but I wish to add another judge to the final tribunal; and also to add to section 8 the following subsection:

(a) One of those two judges so appointed must be conversant with the two official languages of the country.

That is in order that one may speak French.

The amendment was negatived.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yesterday I gave notice of an amendment in committee, and the vote on it was not recorded. I now wish to have the vote recorded, and would move in amendment to add to the schedule of exemptions the following:

Those who are married or are widowers and are fathers of six or more living children shall be exempt from military service.

The amendment was negatived.

Hon. Mr. DAVID moved to re-commit the Bill for the purpose of adding the following section as section 18:

18. This Bill will become in force by Royal Proclamation after it has been submitted to the people in general elections by means of a separate ballot.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED: In my judgment this amendment is out of order, as we have already dealt with that point on the second reading. It is practically the same question as that on which the honourable leader of the Opposition divided the House by his amendment that the Bill should not come into force until after the general election.

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: May I be allowed to correct an answer which I gave yesterday to the honourable gentleman from Kamloops (Hon. Mr. Bostock), who asked me, when I referred to chapter 28 and 29 Victoria Cap. 63, whether that Act applied to Canada or not. I said it applied to the whole British Empire. I should have referred to the term "colony" as defined by the Act itself, which says:

The term "Colony" shall in this Act include all of Her Majesty's possessions abroad in which there shall exist a Legislature, as hereinafter defined, except the Channel Islands, the Isle of Man, and such territories as may for the time being be vested in Her Majesty under or by virtue of any Act of Parliament for the Government of India.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I suppose the honourable gentleman will admit that the British North America Act, which was passed in 1867, in so far as it conflicts with that Act, would override it?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But it does not conflict with that Act at all.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: It does, because it gives jurisdiction to this Parliament in certain subjects, and in the Criminal Code both Habeas Corpus and certiorari are provided for.

Hon. L. O. DAVID: Honourable gentlemen, owing to the condition of my health, which is not good, and in order not to weary you, which I am always afraid of doing, particularly when I speak English, I will give only a synopsis of the speech which I had intended to make on the second reading of this Bill, but which I was not ready to make. I do not think that I will weary you even this time if I may be allowed to insert the whole of it in the official report. I presume there will be no objection to that proposal. I will submit in the form of propositions all my objections to the present Bill—the reasons why I am opposing it and why I consider that, in any event, it should be submitted to the electors of this country.

1. Conscription is contray to the spirit of the constitution and to the proper and reasonable interpretation of the Federal Act of 1867 and of the Militia Act of 1904, and the Canadian people have been told and given the assurance by all our eminent legal authorities are of the opinion that the Bill might be contested with success before our courts of justice.

2. The voluntary system has not been given a thorough and effective test and has nevertheless secured for the Allies more than 400,000 Canadian soldiers, and our assistance in men and money has been deemed both in England and in France a generous and adequate contribution to the war.

3. We have been told by the statesmen of England and France and even of Canada that what is now and will be hereafter most needed is the manufacture of munitions and the production of foodstuffs, in the interest of the world and of our own country.

4. With the exception of a few thousand young men who might be enlisted in our principal cities and towns, the balance of the 100,000 Canadian soldiers required could not be sent to the front without seriously jeopardizing our industrial and agricultural production.

5. At this stage of the war, there exists marked uncertainty as to the effect which 100,000 more Canadian soldiers might have on the issue of the conflict, while there is no reasonable doubt as regards the danger of depriving our industry and agriculture of so many hands and of thereby limiting our production of food.

6. Inasmuch as it is alleged that conscription is necessary in order to obtain the men needed to fill the gaps in the Canadian regiments, fighting at the front, the enlistment of 100,000 additional men will not be sufficient if the war lasts one or two years more, but two or three hundred thousand men will likely be required, and the country cannot afford to make such a sacrifice, while Great Britain could easily supply the men asked for out of the 3,500,000 men who, as alleged by the Hon. Arthur Henderson, Minister of Labour in England, are engaged in useless work.

7. Between a doubtful good and a certain evil, wisdom and common sense command us to take the safer course.

8. The best and most practical means of serving our country and the Empire is to employ these 100,000 Canadians in producing food and munitions and to use for the same purpose the millions of money they will cost.

9. Conscription will render ineffective the efforts made and the expenditure incurred to promote immigration and will keep away from our shores thousands of people who would otherwise be eager to come and settle in a country free from militarism, and where they could establish peaceful and prosperous homes.

10. Conscription will be a source of racial animosity, of national dissensions and discord, detrimental to the peace and prosperity of our country and to our good relations with the Empire, and, to a large extent, will weaken the colonial ties.

11. It is to be considered as an admission that the Canadians have not furnished their full quota of combatants in the great conflict which is going on, while it is quite easy to establish that, in men and money, they have done as much as any other part of the Empire.

12. England and the United States could readily without interfering with their industrial and agricultural production, supply the 100,000 men whom Canada cannot enlist and pay for without jeopardizing its most vital interests.

13. Conscription, without the approval of our people, would create the deplorable impression that the promises and declarations of our public men are no better than valueless scraps of paper.

14. The Government is not constituted as it should be at such a time, inasmuch as the ministers representing the province of Quebec have all been elected through false representations, by leading their electors to believe that participation in the wars of the Empire was almost a crime.

15. It cannot be said that the Government enjoys the confidence of the House of Commons, in view of the fact that there are about 40 counties which are not represented and that if there were 40 members more in the House, the majority might be changed, and, moreover, if there ever was a time when the House should be complete, it is at present, when so many all-important questions are before Parliament. Consequently neither the Government nor the House of Commons are constituted in accordance with the principles and the spirit of our constitution and it cannot be said they represent the views and opinions of the Canadian people.

16. Conscription is a new question and a departure from a well established policy, upon which the people have a right to be consulted before the measure is voted by Parliament.

17. The mandate of the Government and of the Parliament has expired and that even if such a mandate were still in force, it would not give them the right and power to pass such a Bill, inasmuch as there is reason to believe that the vote at the last election would have been different had the electors known that conscription would be established, and that they cannot therefore adopt such legislation without violating the spirit of the constitution and the rights of the people.

Hon. Mr. DAVID.

These are some of the reasons for which I will vote against the third reading of the Bill.

Now will you allow me to say a few words about the province of Quebec and submit to your kind consideration certain facts and observations that may induce you to be less severe towards the French Canadians than several English writers and speakers have been.

It is true that the province of Quebec has been defended with a great deal of eloquence by some of my colleagues who have preceded me, especially by the honourable gentleman from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards), who, I think, has passed his life among my compatriots and knows them and is in a position to appreciate them and speak of them as they deserve to be spoken of. I ask myself whether it would not be practicable for some of our English-speaking fellow-citizens who seem to be unfavourably disposed towards us to come and spend some time in the province of Quebec, in some of our parishes. I am sure that if they did so they would come back with a better feeling towards their fellow-citizens, and would be determined to defend them under all circumstances, because, if they have faults in some respects, if they are less progressive perhaps than others in this country, they have at the same time qualities which deserve to be considered. The time has come, or will come—and perhaps it is not far off—when it will become apparent that French Canadian people will oppose certain fallacies, theories, and dangerous political movements, and at that time you will appreciate the French Canadians.

Now, is it true that the French Canadians have not done as much as the other provinces in connection with the war? Figures have been published to show that if we compare the enlistment of the Canadian-born soldiers, especially in the rural population of Ontario and Quebec and if we take into consideration the fact that there are many more young married people in Quebec than in Ontario, we must come to the conclusion that the difference is very small and may be explained for several reasons, the principal being the following:

1. Since the cession of Canada to England, the French Canadians have been taught by all their political leaders that they would never be forced to go and fight outside of Canada and would be called to arms only in case of an invasion and they are convinced more than ever of the remoteness of any danger of invasion.

2. Elections have been held in the province of Quebec and it was stated by the candidates and their friends that the safest means of avoiding conscription was to vote for the Government.

3. There are three members in the Cabinet—only two now—and at least twenty in the House who were elected in the province of Quebec by declaring and promising that they would be opposed to any participation of Canada in the wars of the Empire.

4. After having been convinced by these men that participation in the war was almost a crime and that the Laurier Government and their friends were traitors to Canada and to the best interests of Canada, how can they believe them when they come back and proclaim that participation in the war is a duty, a sacred duty, and when they see the same men entrusted with portfolios and called to the Government of the country after having made such declarations, how can they think that they are wrong and that they will be condemned for holding such views, since those who hold such views have been so well rewarded.

5. While the recruiting was taking place they were told that the best mode of serving the country and the Allies was to supply them with munitions and food and they were offered high wages to work in the manufacture of munitions.

6. How could they believe that men were not more required in Canada than at the front when they heard that the Government were spending large sums of money to induce Americans to come and work for us and that the number of the hands required was estimated at 70,000.

7. The recruiting was not organized and worked so as to induce our people to enlist and the fact that some of their regiments were disbanded and scattered amongst English regiments, that they were separated from their friends and countrymen and obliged to serve under officers who often spoke a language that they could not understand, had naturally a cooling effect on their zeal.

8. They could not well understand how they were called to fight to secure the triumph of justice and liberty when their own countrymen in the province of Ontario were oppressed and refused their rights by the very men making such appeals.

9. Having organized in every town and village committees and clubs to collect subscriptions and secure money and articles of all kinds such as they could; having lost several members of their families and seen some of them come back wounded and crippled for the rest of their lives, they were put under the impression that anything they would do would be useless and would not stop the wave of invectives and accusations of which they were the victims.

10. The honourable members of this House will please take into consideration the fact that the French Canadians are perhaps the most peaceful people in the world and they have had almost no military training since the conquest, that they have very few voluntary regiments, and that they have lived outside of the military atmosphere, and that very few have received military training.

11. Now they are truly and deeply Canadians, the loving and faithful sons of Canada; they love Canada and above and before all they are inclined to concentrate all their affections upon the land: where their ancestors had their cradles and have their graves, where their bones are lying; where every stone, every tree, every lake and mountain recall their glorious names and their heroical achievements; they know what their fathers have done and suffered to open this country to Christianity and civilization, to transmit them happy homes in Canada.

12. Add to that the impressions, the convictions under which they have been put by articles published in English papers, that this measure of coercion is directed against them. I do not say that there is serious ground for this impression, but nevertheless it exists. Then, too, there were certain newspaper articles and certain speeches made by very prominent men which naturally confirmed their views.

There would be much more to say on this subject, but I think it is enough to show that their motives are not mean and selfish, and that they must be excused for entertaining views and sentiments which the Government and their friends and newspapers contributed so much to create in their minds by helping the Nationalists in the election of Drummond and Arthabaska and afterwards in the general election of 1911. I think it is enough also to repel the accusations of disloyalty hurled at them from so many quarters.

It is true that certain exaggerated and violent public utterances may have caused some people to think that the French-Canadians are hostile to England and to the English people. But you cannot judge of the feelings and views of the majority of our population by the exaggerations of a noisy minority any more than we can judge the feeling and sentiment of the English population toward us by the utterances of some of your writers or speakers, or by the invective which has been hurled at us by some of the people in the province of Ontario.

Honourable gentlemen, almost two centuries of loyalty to England ought to be sufficient to repel accusations and suspicions which we don't deserve. The French-Canadians were loyal to France under the French régime; they fought, suffered and died to preserve her possessions in America. After the conquest they were loyal to England and never refused to fight to keep Canada under her flag. They were loyal in 1776 when they refused to listen to the eloquent appeals of Lafayette and Rochambeau and defended her flag, while a great number of English people were indifferent. And let me recall a very interesting incident that is not well known.

When the military authorities of Montreal wanted the services of a safe, intelligent and brave man to carry an important message to Governor Carleton in Quebec, do you know whom they chose? Joseph Papineau, the father of the great agitator—M. Papineau, accompanied by a friend of the name of Lamothe, undertook to fulfil that dangerous mission. They both walked to Quebec, often through the woods, avoiding as much as possible public roads. They crossed from Quebec on the ice, exposed to the balls of the Americans who were surrounding Quebec, and remitted to the governor their message.

And in 1812, when the French Canadians were fighting for their natural right, for their language, they listened to the voice of their clergy and went to the frontier to repel the invasion. Do you know who was captain of one of the French Canadians that took arms? Louis Joseph Papineau himself, who was denouncing with so much eloquence the bureaucracy of the time.

It is now admitted by all just and reasonable people that on these two occasions Canada was saved to England by the loyalty of the French Canadians, and in 1849, when a petition in favour of annexation was signed by all the principal merchants of Montreal, very few French Canadians signed it.

In all times and circumstances they were happy to show that they were true to England, faithful to her flag. Even in 1837 the great majority of our people did not move, although they had reason of being dissatisfied, and do not forget that the two chiefs of both insurrections of '37 and '38 were two Englishmen, viz., Wilfrid and Robert Nelson, and it may be said even that without their advices and solicitations there would have been probably no armed insurrection.

And even now they are convinced that they are doing more than their accusers for the true interest of Canada, and that they know better how to serve the cause of the Empire and of the Dominion of Canada.

Even when they were persecuted the French Canadians were loyal. What is happening now? They are accused of being disloyal, of being traitors and slackers, while hundreds and thousands of their countrymen are dying under the British flag on the battlefields of France.

Now, let me say that I thought the Government would not persist in having that law passed and put into execution. If it were certain at least that the proposed measure would give to the Empire and to the Allies a practical, substantial and necessary help, I would understand the position taken by the supporters of the Bill. But who can affirm without hesitation that our soldiers will cross the ocean, that they will not arrive too late on the battlefields, and that their help will have a practical and substantial effect upon the results of the war? One thing is certain, namely, that our men and our money would be usefully employed, at this stage of the war, in supplying to the Allies munitions and food, that it would be the best means of doing our duty towards the Allies and our country, of reconciling what we owe to the Empire with what we owe to Canada. We cannot forget that we are Canadians, that Canada is our country, where we have our homes and children, the country that is most entitled to our cares and protection. Unfortunately we are living in a time where exaggeration carries away too many of the best minds, where calm judgment and reasoning seem out of place.

But we ought to find in the Senate that calm judgment and mature consideration that absence of passion and prejudice and of exaggeration that prevail elsewhere.

Let us not forget the object which the fathers of Confederation had in view when they established the Senate and declared that our House would be a safeguard to the new constitution, to its proper working, and would have the authority and the independence required to correct, raise and check even hasty and dangerous legislation.

What more dangerous than a measure that threatens to raise province against province, race against race, and throw in our national life a seed of discord so detrimental to the best interests of Canada and of the Empire, especially when there are so many reasons to think that it will have no practical effect, and that the millions it will cost will be lost?

New senators have been appointed. I have nothing to say against their qualifications, but it is regrettable that in view of the circumstances and because of the declarations made by some of the organs of the Government their appointment is considered as an act of partisanship derogatory to the prestige and independence of the Senate and to the declarations and views of the fathers of Confederation. Let them allow me to recall what took place in France years ago. An eminent lawyer had been appointed judge by the king; he went to offer his thanks to the king, who told him that he hoped he could rely upon his services. The new judge answered with dignity: I thank your majesty, but I am sure that I was appointed to render justice and not services.

I hope that our honourable colleagues will follow that example, and I am convinced that by doing so they render a great service, not only to the country, but also to the Government.

It will not be long before it is recognized that those who voted against conscription were the best and most far-seeing friends of the country.

The honourable the leader of this House does not share my views at this time, but I am sure that before long every one in the country will be of the opinion that we have done what was right and in the interest of the country.

Honourable gentlemen, the Senate will never have a better occasion of showing its usefulness, of fulfilling its noble mission of peace and harmony, of protection to the constitution and to the rights of the people, of affirming its independence.

Let us not give reason to those who predicted that Confederation would not give us the peace and harmony which were the aim of the fathers of the new constitution. I was one of those who did not share the hope of the fathers of the new constitution and contended that it contained elements of national and religious friction, and that a time would come when the English provinces would be on one side and the province of Quebec on the other side. I regret that our predictions are s near being realized. Let us have peace. Is there not enough trouble, discord and suffering in our poor world? Let us keep for the unfortunate peoples of Europe a place, a country free from militarism, a country where, after that horrible war, they will find a peaceful refuge, and happy homes. The insertion in our statutes of that drastic measure will be, I am sure, a serious check to the development and prosperity of Canada, and will have the mischievous and regrettable effect of breaking the unity of our nation, which is the patriotic aim of all those who have at heart the progress and happiness of our beloved country.

One of the most eminent men of the United States said lately in my presence, speaking about this Conscription Bill: "A nation must be prepared to adopt a drastic measure, and, anyhow, the worst thing a government can do in a time of crisis is to break the unity of the nation."

Now let me close by quoting the word of Sir Robert Walpole in 1774 in reference to a Bill to impose an obnoxious tax. When it was said that the taxes would even cause riots, he remarked that he would resign rather than impose such a Bill by force.

There will be no bloodshed in connection with this Bill, I hope, because the people will be told by their leaders that they must submit to this law, and do what they have always done. But the law will destroy the work of fifty years of conciliation, of efforts made by some of our political leaders to have racial peace. These are times when those admonitions and warnings have no effect.

I was reading lately the great speeches made by Lord Chatham in the British Parliament to induce the Government to adopt measures of conciliation, in order to prevent the insurrection of the American colony. His predictions and warnings were of no avail, and America's independence was the outcome of the obstinacy of the Government. Such obstinacy, and refusal of concessions, have always been the cause of the downfall of governments, and of other calamities.

If the amendment now before this House were adopted it would have the effect of pacifying public opinion, and would remove a cause of anxiety not only in the province of Quebec but everywhere in Canada. Does not the fact that Sir Robert Borden agreed that if a coalition government were established the operation of the Bill would be suspended till after a general election, remove the objections made to the delay?

What objection remains to the amendment? Why reject all the petitions asking that this Bill be submitted to the people before being put into force? After having promised that there would be no conscription, does not the Government think that they are bound in honour to respect such a reasonable demand? Is not the promotion of peace, harmony and unity of the nation a large compensation for the inconvenience which may be caused by the consultation of the people?

I respect the motives of those who favour conscription, although I differ with them in opinion; but I cannot understand why they would be opposed to this amendment which will do much good and no harm. When I think of the future of Canada, of its brilliant destiny, I am inclined to say that any law that might hamper that glorious destiny would be a deplorable error.

The amendment was negatived.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I rise on behalf of free speech in Canada, especially through the coming campaign. This Bill contains provisions whereby the criticism or denouncing already of the Bill in public or in private shall be treated as practically an act of treason.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: You cannot even speak to your wife about it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, and cannot denounce it even in my own home. I rise on behalf of a vast number in this country to protest against such drastic legislation. The general election is coming, when the people will have to be told what happened in Parliament, and how the votes stood. Of course, the Conservative candidate will have an easy job.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: Why?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Because he can do as his representatives in this House and in the Commons do—eulogize the Bill and endorse it, notwithstanding its manifest errors and injustices. The poor Liberal candidate, however, will have no chance to answer his opponent, for as soon as he denounces the Bill some officer will be at his elbow to arrest him under section 16.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Do you mean a militia officer?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: A militia officer. But I think they would take any old fool at all if they wanted to arrest a man. Only one or two things besides this Bill will be discussed in the coming campaign —the Canadian Northern steal and the maladministration of the Government—and the Conservative candidate will have the platform to himself. The Nationalist candidate will have no show at all. Mr. Blondin and Mr. Sevigny will have no show if they are going to announce the doctrine they preached in 1911, when they were trying to bring the Conservative party into power; they would be collared on the spot; they are all liable under this Act to imprisonment from one year to five. What I want to publish all over this country is that the Liberal candidates are going to be gagged—that there is to be suppression of free speech. I dare not say on a platform to the electors what I have the right and privilege to speak on the floor of this honourable House. Now, where does Kaiserism come in? Where does Prussianism come in? The thing is simply ridiculous, if not outrageous. My honourable friend from Mille Isles (Hon. Mr. David) made a beautiful appeal to the fair-play of the honourable gentlemen on the other side of the House; but they have no sense of fair play, and they have voted down everything. That honourable gentleman appealed to them not to foster any further the ill-feelings that now exist between the two great races of Canada, but he was voted down. If such conduct cannot be prevented it must be denounced, and must be brought to the attention of the people who will have the power of denouncing this tyranny and stamping it out once for all. When I speak in this honourable House it is not so much that I hope to convince or convert my opponents on the opposite side, but rather that the echo of my voice may reach the common people from the Atlantic to the Pacific. When the people, who are our masters and upholders, analyze what has been said during this debate, they will find that the men who were voted down were voicing the real loyal sentiments and the real needs of the country, and the best ideas of the Canadian race as a whole. Therefore I propose this amendment:

That this Bill be not now read a third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole to amend it by adding the following subsection to section 16:

The said section shall not apply to any candidate, his agent or supporters, in a Federal election.

Honourable gentlemen on the opposite side who object to that can say so by their votes, and I will guarantee that one vote here will be met by ten thousand against them when the election comes on.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I had occasion yesterday to make a statement in French in answer to a question put by the honourable gentleman from Kennebec (Hon. Mr.

Lavergne), who asked if one of the clauses of the Bill would apply to the parties in the coming elections who might be discussing the principle of this Bill and its various clauses. My answer was that at the forthcoming elections the conscriptionists would naturally be able to defend conscription, and the clauses of the Bill; but that anti-conscriptionists likewise could appeal for votes for a candidate who would stand against conscription, and could denounce every clause of this Bill from the first to the last. This is the answer which I gave, but I added that no one, from the moment this Bill is sanctioned and becomes law, either during or out of election times, will be allowed to preach to the public of Canada disobedience to this law, and that it was all that the law was intended to protect. That is, some clauses of the Bill were inserted to insure its enforcement. So the amendment of my honourable friend is absolutely unnecessary; the object which he wishes to attain can be attained without any amendment. No citizen will be prevented at the next election from taking a stand on the principle of conscription, and from discussing any clause of the Bill, and for this reason I, with many honourable gentlemen sitting around me, will vote against that amendment.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE (translation): May I make one remark to the honourable senator from De Lorimier? Had I not good reason for opposing this clause with all my power? Because the anti-conscriptionist candidate would have been liable to be put in prison on the complaint of anyone. The Government has now consented to amend this law, and there will be no prosecution. without the authority of the Attorney General of Canada. I had good reason for warning the members of the Senate against this clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND (translation): Any member of the Senate has the right to ask for explanations of this Bill. The honourable senator from Kennebec had certainly the right to demand all the explanations he desired on the clauses which appeared obscure.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE (translation): Not only the right to demand explanations, but good reason for opposing this clause.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: The amendment is no doubt extraordinary, but the Bill is also extraordinary. I did not happen to be here yesterday, but I have read the debate, and I am not quite satisfied with the definition given of the rights of candidates and others to attack conscription. Section 16 of the Bill provides:

> Any person who by means of any written or printed communication, publication or article, or by any oral communication, or by any public speech or utterance . . . persuades or induces or attempts to persuade or induce any person or class of persons to refrain from making applications for certificates of exemption or submitting evidence in respect thereof, shall be guilty of an offence and shall be liable upon indictment or upon summary conviction to imprisonment for a term not less than one year or more than five years.

Now, let me put to the honourable leader of the Government the following question: Suppose I have a friend who is a candidate at an election. I am a lawyer, and I go to help him. I go before a public meeting, and, to use the words of the Bill, I advise the electors by "oral communication" that this Bill is unconstitutional. The preamble contains the words: "And whereas to maintain and support the Canadian Expeditionary Force now engaged in active service overseas for the defence and security of Canada;" and I say to the electors that that is false; that we are not defending Canada in Europe; that Canada is not attacked, is not obliged to defend herself, and is not in danger; that there is therefore no need for this Bill; that from first to last it is unconstitutional, and they need not obey. I go further and say, wilfully and deliberately: "I advise you not to answer the call for your class. If you are arrested and condemned to a penalty and prison, I will defend you; I will take out a writ of habeas corpus". I see a clause providing that no proceedings before any of the tribunals created by this Bill shall be restrained by habeas corpus. I say to my friend, wilfully, deliberately, "I will defend you if any proceeding is so taken against you." I say that publicly, and I tell the electors not to obey this Act, because it is unconstitutional, and that I will attack it before the tribunal. After all these declarations, am I to be prosecuted, arrested, and sent to jail?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman takes his chance.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I should like to know, because it is stated in black and white in the Bill that any person who by oral advice urges resistance to the Bill—it does not make exceptions of legal advice—is liable to a penalty of from one to five years in jail. I am putting the question fairly. I know that this amendment is extraordinary, but it is a most extraordinary Bill and this is a most extraordinary clause. Should I, in the case which I have stated, be prosecuted?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I hope so.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Then the amendment ought to carry; though I do not admit that.

The amendment moved by Hon. Mr. Cloran was negatived.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I should like to have one parting shot at this Bill. I think a good many things have been said in connection with the Bill which really had very little relevance to the Bill itself. What I propose to say bears on the Bill. I find in the preamble:

Whereas to maintain and support the Canadian Expeditionary Force now engaged in active service overseas for the defence and security of Canada, the preservation of the Empire and of human liberty, it is necessary to provide reinforcements for such Expeditionary Force.

We all agree about that; but this is the point:

And whereas enough men do not volunteer to provide such reinforcements;

Now, honourable gentlemen, that statement is not correct, and, that not being correct, the reason for the Bill fails. We have discussed the matter before, and it was shown that up to May 30 there was a very large force in England—over 124,000 men, I think—who had not gone across the channel, and that the number of recruits for each month, beginning with the month of February, exceeded the number of casualties. I find that on the 6th of this month the Minister of Militia brought down in the other Chamber a return which sets out these facts, that there were on the 30th of June 142,799 Canadian troops in France; 756 elsewhere than in France; 124,399 in England (of whom 23,265 in hospitals and convalescent camps, etc.); 3,944 en route from Canada. The wastage is only about 5,000 a month, I think; but, putting it at 8,000, there remain enough men on the other side to reinforce the Expeditionary Force for 15 months. The honourable Minister of Militia said further that during the month of July there had been 4,257 recruits and 3,637 casualties. So, honourable gentlemen, I think it is perfectly clear that this measure is quite unnecessary, and that if we had gone on with an energetic recruiting campaign, there would be a great many more men enlisted than there is any necessity for.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE.

DIVORCE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill T2, an Act for the relief of Albert Edward Gordon—Hon. Mr. Taylor.

BOARDS OF TRADE BILL.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 115, an Act to amend the Boards of Trade Act, Hon. Mr. McSweeney in the Chair.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

SCIENTIFIC AND INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH COUNCIL BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 83, an Act relating to The Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research, Hon. Mr. Daniel in the Chair.

On section 3—appointment of Council:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Can the honourable leader of the Government give us any information as to who are going to be appointed to this Council?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say to my honourable friend that the council was appointed some time ago. The members are gentlemen who represent nearly all the universities and scientific institutions in Canada. The administrative chairman is Professor R. B. Macallum, Ph.D., Sc.D., LL.D., F.R.S., Ottawa. The other members of the council are: F. D. Adams, Ph.D., Sc.D., LL.D., F.R.S. Dean Faculty of Applied Science, McGill University, Montreal; T. Bienvenu, Esq., Vice-President and General Manager La Banque Provinciale du Canada, Montreal; R. Hobson, Esq., President Steel Company of Canada, Hamilton; S. F. Kirkpatrick, M.Sc., Professor of Metallurgy, Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario; J. C. McLennan, Ph.D., F.R.S., Professor of Physics and Director of the Physics Laboratory, University of Toronto, Toronto; A. S. Mackenzie, Ph.D., D.C.L., President Dalhousie University, Halifax, N.S.; W. C. Murray, M.A., LL.D., President University of Saskatchewan, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; R. A. Ross, Esq., E.E. (Tor.), M. Can. Soc. S.E., Consulting Engineer, Montreal; R. F. Ruttan, M.A., M.D., Sc.D., Professor of Chemistry and Director of the Chemical Laboratories, McGill University, Montreal; Arthur Surveyer,

B.A. Sc., M. Can. Soc., C.E., Consulting Engineer, Montreal.

The section was agreed to.

On section 4—administrative chairman:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I do not know whether I quite understand this section. Is the " sub-committee " mentioned in this section the sub-committee of the Privy Council or of the Council of Scientific and Industrial Research?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I presume there will be a sub-committee of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Why not say, " shall be appointed by the Governor in Council?"

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would be the sub-committee of this council for which provision is made in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If my honourable friend looks at section 3, he will see that " sub-committee " is defined.

The section was agreed to.

On section 7—by-laws:

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The administration and the duties of this Council seem to be very similar to those of an ordinary department of the Crown. They have to report to the subcommittee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is purely an advisory council. Its constitution is almost precisely similar to that of the Council of Scientific and Industrial Research appointed by the Imperial Government, and it is at the request of the Imperial Government that the Canadian Government is organizing a similar council with a view to co-ordinating as far as possible.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I understand that they have already done considerable work. I understand that Dr. Macallum has been in England for some time in connection with the work of this Council. Is my information correct?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I know that he has been constantly and continuously engaged in the work of this Council. Where the doctor is at the present moment I cannot say.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: He is now in the West. He left here some two or three weeks ago in connection with the work of the Council. It is some considerable time since he returned from England. Professor McLennan of Toronto was also in England. As I understand, they are now at work on the following problems: the obtaining of nitrogen as a fertilizer; the obtaining of potash; the development of experimental work, looking towards the utilization of the lignites of the West—and I understand that they have made, or are about to make a recommendation to the Government that our experimental plant be established.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: In connection with what?

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: To utilize the lignites of the Northwest in some truly economical form. They are also making a careful study of the tarsands of the West from which they believe valuable tar products can be developed. In addition to this work, they are making a study of the forest growth of Canada.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Water-powers?

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: I had not heard that they had taken up the question of water-powers.

The section was agreed to.

On section 11—reports:

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It is provided that at the close of each fiscal year the council shall make a report of the work done. Are we to have a report for the year ending March, 1918?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should think so, because the Council, including the Chairman, will have been employed practically continuously during that period. It seems to me that it would be highly desirable that a report of the first year's work of the Council should be laid on the Table.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It would cover more than a year.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: They started work last November.

The section was agreed to.

The Bill was reported, read the third time, and passed.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The Senate again went into committee on Bill 66, an Act to amend the Judges Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed. Hon. Mr. Crosby in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Would the honourable leader of the Government have any objection to letting this Bill stand until tomorrow? The honourable member for Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) is absent, and he intends to move an amend to the Bill.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: We had a discussion the other day, and I told him that his amendment would be provided for. When the Bill was last before the House sections 34 and 35 were added to it. There was an amendment made to section 33, the effect of which was to preclude a judge acting as a commissioner. The honourable gentleman from Mille Iles (Hon. Mr. David) wished to add an amendment to the effect that a judge be allowed to act as a commissioner in disputes in connection with municipal matters. That amendment was necessitated by the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: In the opinion of the honourable member for Mille Iles.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If the honourable gentleman from Ottawa will withdraw his amendment there will be no necessity for the amendment of the honourable member for Mille Iles.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not admit that the amendment of the honouable gentleman for Mille Iles is a commendable one. I do not see why judges should be allowed to act in the way that he suggests.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That question would not come up at all. Representatives of labour organizations say that there is great difficulty in getting chairmen for arbitrations. They say that one or two men, not judges—who have acted as chairmen have not been satisfactory. On the other hand, a large number of judges have acted as chairman on arbitrations and in every case the labour men have accepted the decision of the Board. In these circumstances, perhaps it is unwise at the present time to press the amendment precluding judges from acting as commissioners. Sections 34 and 35, that were added to the Act the other day, provide that the salaries and allowances of judges are to be fixed by the Parliament of Canada and that other allowances or salaries paid to them shall be deducted from the salary paid by the Parliament of Canada. Sections 96 and 100 of the British North America Act provide that the Parliament of Canada shall appoint the judges and pay them, and it pays them not only salaries but allowances. If that is so, no provincial legislature can reduce those salaries or allowances, and if they cannot reduce them they cannot increase them. The entire jurisdiction with regard to salaries is vested in the Dominion Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does my honourable friend think that clause 34 does anything to prevent the provincial legislatures voting allowances to Commissioners?

Hon. Wê B. ROSS: Under section 35 any allowances would be deducted from the salaries.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is hardly satisfactory.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: In my opinion our Constitution, with the exception of that of the United States, is the worst on earth. There is not a day or a minute when we are not fighting over the question of jurisdiction, and no one knows where we are. We are not quite sure that the Privy Council knows what our Constitution means. All we can do is to spell our way along as best we can. I think the principle of jurisprudence is very clear, that if the law says that the Parliament of Canada shall fix the salaries and allowances and pay them, no provincial Parliament can reduce them or increase them.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does the honourable gentleman mean that this Parliament has not jurisdiction to pass section 6?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No, I mean to say that that is arguable under subsection 14 of section 92 of the British North America Act, which says that the provincial Parliaments shall define the functions of the court. It was argued by some of the judges, and I believe by some of the legal officers here, that it is very doubtful whether this Parliament had jurisdiction to pass section 33; but I have left that to one side and kept entirely within sections 96 and 100 of the British North America Act, which deal with salaries.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE. But sections 34 and 35, which were adopted the other day, would not cover any remuneration which would be voted by provincial legislatures, because section 34 says that no judge of the Supreme Court of Canada or any Superior, District or County Court shall receive any salary or allowance except as provided by the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: But that does not fix the judge's salary.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Are not the county judges of Ontario paid a certain amount by that province?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There are all kinds of arrangements with the judges.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Section 35 would prevent judges receiving anything from a province, and they would have to act without the extra pay they now receive from the province.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes, or else get this Parliament to vote them an allowance for any extra duty.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does not my honourable friend see that that would not do?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I am not asking them to do it. The question is, what the honourable gentleman will do as regards his amendment to section 33. If he would withdraw that, I think we might let this one go to the other House, and we would not be in any worse position than we are now in; but we might add the proviso that if the judges act on commissions for a province they cannot be paid on those commissions without legislation from the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: And if they are so paid, the amount would be deducted?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Deducted from the salary.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: When I tell my honourable friend the facts, he will see that these amendments will not do. The judges in the Supreme Court of Ontario receive annually from the Ontario Government $1,000 in addition to what they get from this Parliament. Now you provide in sections 34 and 35 that they shall not receive that, and if they do it will be deducted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: That allowance from Ontario has been paid to the judges for some years.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes, and not only would Supreme Court judges lose that $1,000, but some county judges would lose large allowances by these amendments. No honourable gentleman belonging to Ontario could accept legislation which would cut out those allowances.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Was that sum of $1,000 not paid by the Ontario Government to cover extra duties performed by the judges, in order to equalize the salaries they ought to receive?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes, for acting as judges, not for acting on commissions. The county court judges get allowances for probate fees and surrogate fees.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I pointed out to my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) a few days ago that a similar allowance is made to the district judges in the western provinces. In Alberta the senior judge of each district gets a $1,000, I think, in lieu of probate fees, which he would otherwise receive. If we exclude the judges from securing provincial allowances which they have been receiving for years it will be impossible to pass this legislation. I suggest to my honourable friend to recast his amendment so as to include the allowances given by the provinces to district judges as well as Supreme Court judges. My recollection is that some years ago, in Ontario, $1,000 was paid to certain of their Superior Court judges in lieu of certain services which they would perform for the province.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: All the Supreme Courts are supposed to sit in the cities. In order to facilitate the business, one weekly court was created, and a judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario goes to London, and one comes to Ottawa every week for the purpose of holding court, hearing chamber applications, etc., and this $1,000 is paid them by the Ontario Government for those services and others which it is not necessary to mention. The payment is not a travelling allowance; it is a fixed sum of $1,000 added to the salaries paid them by the Dominion for the administration of justice in the province. In some cases, as in the county of York, the probate fees have been commuted for $1,000 or more, and I know that the senior judge for that county gets a large sum in that way. You would cut that all out.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: We should cut it out.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: You will not get a corporal's guard to support such a proposition.

Hon W. B. ROSS: I do not care if there is no one but myself. The British North America Act says that we are to fix the salaries and allowances of the judges. What have the different provinces to do about that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend is now attacking the whole system which has existed in Ontario for the last twenty or twenty-five years, to my knowledge.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not care if it was there for a thousand years. The British North America Act says the Parliament of Canada has the power to fix the salaries and allowances of the Superior, district and county court judges.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have heard many discussions in the House of Commons on the increase of judges' salaries; and the Minister of Justice, when making a calculation of what each province cost for the administration of justice, and what it cost the Federal Treasury, always took into account the amounts which the various provinces were adding for the maintenance of judges. I do not know under what agreement between the Minister of Justice and the Provincial Attorney General this system was made, but I know it was recognized.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The other day we agreed that some means should be devised to prevent judges from sitting as commissioners, and the House adopted section 6, and my honourable friend gave his support.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would suggest to my honourable friend (Hon. W. B. Ross) to add to his amendment a proviso that this should not operate to exclude either Superior, district or county court judges from receiving any bulk allowance which might be given them by a province.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not want to get into all those complications. Why not simply provide that no judge shall act as a commissioner or perform any duties outside of his judicial duties? If my honourable friend insists upon having the disposition with regard to conciliation boards, and if my honourable friend from Mille Iles insists upon his idea that the judges should continue to act on provincial commissions on municipal matters, I see no objection to adding those; but I think the House would make a very serious mistake if it attempted to deal with these questions of salary in the way my honourable friend proposes. We are agreed that those judges should not act on commissions which are political commissions, or if we might so call them, party commissions. Let us add the two exceptions, conciliation boards and municipal matters. We will then accomplish the purpose on which we are all agreed.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The judges are not carrying out the arrangement that was made with them in 1906 when their salaries were increased about fifty per cent, that they should give their whole time to the duties of their office. What I have wanted from the first was to have that section carried out.

Hon. W. B. ROSS.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But when we passed that legislation in 1906 the Parliament of Canada knew the conditions obtaining in Ontario, and did not intend to alter them by that legislation.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Or in the West, either.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There is no sense or equity in allowing a judge to leave his duties on the Bench, for which he draws a salary equal perhaps to $25 a day, and draw an additional $20 per day for performing duties such as revising lists or settling disputes between municipalities, or disputes about drains. That is an abuse that stinks in the nostrils of the people of this country, and the extra payment is illegal. The British North America Act gives us the power to fix the salary. Let us tell all others to keep their hands off the salaries, and if anything is wrong let them come to this Parliament, which will increase or decrease the salary as the facts may justify.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again, in order that we may try to come to some understanding about the matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me that if we have reached an impasse of this kind, it can be settled only by the honourable gentlemen who are interested in amending this Bill getting together and discussing the matter among themselves and arriving at some intelligent conclusion. It is very unfortunate that we should encounter any differences which would prevent our giving effect to the Bill. I think my honourable friend will have to consider introducing into the Bill some provision whereby those judges who are in receipt of a fixed amount from a province shall continue to enjoy that allowance, no matter what it may be. I am satisfied that it would be utterly impossible to pass an amendment to the Judges' Act excluding those judges who for years have been in receipt of a very substantial amount from the provinces from participating in all the advantages of that allowance. My honourable friend will appreciate the fact that the amendment would at once meet with such opposition as would prevent it from passing.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Does my honourable friend think that depriving the judges of any salary for acting as commissioners would be a sufficient deterrent to prevent them from so acting? I have no doubt in my mind that some judges would be inclined to act as commissioners even though they received no pay for it. If I am voicing the sentiments of this House, what we desire is that judges shall not act as commissioners with or without pay. So the amendment proposed by my honourable friend would not meet the object which I know he has, in common with myself and many members in this House, that is, to prevent judges from sitting as commissioners.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I will admit to the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) that if I had the power I would require that a judge should stick to his judicial duties; that, in accordance with section 33, he should take the salary which Parliament provides for him, give his whole time to the discharge of the duties assigned to him, and not act as commissioner at all, nor undertake any other outside business. Now, I know that I cannot succeed in that. If I cannot get the whole loaf, I am content to take half, or do the best thing that I can do. I know such a proposal would not carry because I know that the labour men would be able to get Parliament to allow the judges to act as arbitrators.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Let us accept that and make an exception of that case.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: That is one way.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Then the honourable gentleman will have the labour men with him.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: That is one way of doing it, but I thought that on account of the dispute about jurisdiction with respect to section 33, it would be better to deal with another phase of the matter, that of salary, which is assigned exclusively to this Parliament.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Does the honourable gentleman stick to the idea and determination of preventing the judges from Ontario, for instance, from receiving anything from the Ontario Legislature? Is he still of that opinion and desire?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Yes, I am.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Then, why should we not test the feeling of the Senate on this point, so as to clear the way for an understanding among the gentlemen who have been working upon these amendments?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In order that my honourable friend may turn over this question in his mind, the only thing to do to-night is to permit further consideration being given to it. I therefore move that the committee rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress was reported.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

THE SENATE.

Thursday, August 9, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

FRENCH CANADIANS RECRUITING IN THE UNITED STATES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOYER inquired of the Government:

How many French Canadian Officers, Non-Commissioned Officers and men are at present recruiting in the United States, under P.C. Order 1505, and what are their names?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Captain C. V. Doyon, and Lieut. P. Chevalier. Two French officers sent out by the French Government will also be so employed; one of them has already gone to the U.S.A. Non-commissioned officers will be sent as recommended and required from time to time.

PURCHASE OF BONNIE BEL AIR.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying His Excellency to have laid on the Table of the Senate all the documents relating to the purchase by the Militia Department of Bonnie Bel Air from W. T. Rodden, Esq., a part of number nine (9) on the official plan and book of reference of the Parish of Lachine and especially the report of the lawyers who examined the titles.

He said: It is with some regret that I bring before the House a matter which may be considered rather contentious. The war cannot be given as an excuse for this purchase, because it occurred two years before the war commenced. If it is a scandal, it is an ante-bellum scandal. I bring the matter before the House with some diffidence, because of the fact that for many years I have been on terms of friendship with the principal actors in this transaction. I may as well mention their names at once: Major William T. Rodden, a very well-known man in Montreal, and a commission composed of Col. Wilson, Col. Labelle, Col. Cantlie, and, lastly, the late Minister of Militia, Sir Sam Hughes. I may say that I have always had a soft spot in my heart for Sir Sam Hughes. He may be guilty of having done a great many things that people did not like, but I have never had any complaints to make, for many of my own people have been at the front. In the words of the song, I stand between friendship and duty. Although we may hurt our personal friends in doing so, I believe that I would be remiss in my duty if I did not give the House the benefit of the information which I have gathered in this matter, so that the honourable members and the people of the country may know how the Government has failed in its duty in regard to this particular transaction. Another reason for my regret at having to call attention to this matter is on account of the genial leader of this House, whom we all admire, although we do not always agree with him. We admire especially his great tact and politeness in his management of the affairs of this Senate for the last six years. Although in the minority, he has managed to carry practically all of the Government measures through this House. I hope that the same suaviter in modo will prevail now that he has a majority in this House.

This is not the first time that I have brought up scandals of this sort. Many years ago I brought up one with regard to the Curran bridge, and I have never had occasion to regret having done so. This scandal is, I think, even worse than that of the Curran bridge. The Curran bridge scandal related to a bridge over the Lachine canal in Montreal. That bridge was 220 feet in length and was built of iron and stone, yet the Government paid for 3,600,000 feet of lumber in connection with the work. As my honourable friend to my right (Hon. Mr. Edwards) knows, it would require a train two and a quarter miles in length, apart from the locomotives, to carry that quantity of lumber. My honourable friend will also bear me out when I say that if that lumber had been piled up in the canal, there would have been no space left for the water at the site of the bridge. However, bad as that may appear, the Government of the country got something for their outlay—they got the Curran bridge; we now have the bridge and we can walk over it; whereas, out of what I am now going to tell you about, the Government has never got a cent, and I doubt if the Government ever will get a cent out of it or if the public will ever benefit by it.

There is another reason why this matter should be brought up. If rumours are true, the country will in a short time have to pass judgment upon the acts of the present Administration, and it is only right that we should let the country know the facts. I want to say at the outset that I am not charging the Government with dishonesty or graft, but with extravagance, incompetence, and maladministration. That is what I charge, and nothing else.

The present Government has always been a warlike Government, even before the war, and immediately on coming into power they decided that there should be a cavalry school in or near Montreal, regardless of the fact that one already existed in the town of St. Johns, P.Q., a journey of an hour or an hour and a half from Montreal, which was not doing half of what it could do. At that time there were in Montreal many persons who had farm properties for sale. By a strange coincidence, the great real estate boom that had existed in Montreal for several years burst with the advent of the present Administration. There were some good friends of mine who believed so much in "Laurier and prosperity" that they came to me and said: "Now that Laurier is out, I am going to sell all my property; I think this country is going to the dogs; I am going to convert my property into cash, and if Laurier comes back I will buy it again." I am only sorry that I did not follow that example, because those men got better prices than they could get for their properties to-day, and have been receiving interest on their money for six years, whereas I have received no principal or interest on my property, but have to pay taxes.

This being a warlike Government, there is of course a great deal of strategy amongst its members. These strategists decided that the cavalry school must be established. That showed that they did not know very much about modern warfare, because it is well known that cavalry has played very little part in this war—in fact, less than a little part, for the cavalrymen have actually been dismounted and are fighting as infantry. A site had to be chosen for the cavalry school, and the real estate agents were all active. Every time the late Hon. Mr. Monk, Minister of Public Works, came to Montreal his office was besieged by persons offering property for sale. It so happened that the whole winter passed without any purchase having been made, and time was flying. At last it was decided to have not only a cavalry school, but also a school of military training. The real estate agents were giving the Government no peace; each one said he had the very best property for the purpose; so a commission was appointed, composed of three colonels, Colonel Wilson, Colonel Labelle, and Colonel Cantlie, to select a site as near Montreal as possible, regardless altogether of the fact that the Government already owned ordnance land at Longueuil within two miles of the Montreal post office. I have the plan here, but I will not weary the House by taking up too much time. That ordnance land was high and dry and clear. That would not suit, however, and a purchase had to be made—money had to be expended. The time dragged on until the month of June, 1912, when the Government had been in power seven or eight months, and then the unexpected happened: it was decided to buy a farm known as "Bonnie Bel Air," situated in the parish of Lachine, in a village called Dorval, which is between 13 and 14 miles from the Montreal post office. This farm, like ancient Gaul, is divided into three parts. The first part is the front of the farm. I think the honourable leader of the Government must have been there very often. I see opposite the honourable gentleman from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Boyer), who has also been there. The front of the farm is occupied by a club known as the Forest and Stream Club, and I must say that the site has been well selected. It is certainly one of the finest country clubs in Canada. The honourable leader of the Government smiles. I think he must have pleasant recollections of it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What about the Scotch?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The site of the Forest and Stream Club, between the public road and lake St. Louis, is certainly a beautiful spot. Then, between the public road and the railway, there was a piece of property 300 yards wide by 1,100 yards in depth, comprising in all about sixty-eight acres, and that is the property to which I would draw the special attention of this House. That was the property intended to be sold to the Government. Mind you, I am not questioning the price of that particular piece of land. It has been subdivided into town lots, and the owner might have realized some money on it if he had sold the lots; but, as a matter of fact, notwithstanding plenty of advertising and a very catchy sign, which any one passing could see, the property was still unsold. The sign had a picture of a little Scotch boy, saying, "I love Montreal, but O you Bonnie Bel Air!" But the real estate proposition proved to be a frost; so Mr. Rodden and some of his friends thought it would be a good idea to unload that farm on the Government, and, in spite of the fact that it was 14 miles from the Montreal post office, they proceeded to negotiate with this commission. I may say that the departmental officers reported against this property, and for the very good reason that it was too low, and that, if any barracks were erected there—mark this, because it is very important—all the sewage would have to be pumped out, in order to bring it to the level of lake St. Louis. In the spring part of the farm was under water for several weeks at a time, and, besides, the elevation of the ground above the normal level of lake St. Louis is only two or three feet. But this property might have had some value for persons who were looking for town lots. After all, 14 miles is not so very far from Montreal, and there is a train service. That parcel of land between the public road and the railway is the second part of the property, the first part being, as I have said, the site of the Forest and Stream Club. Then there was a third part—and this is the worst feature. The third part is crossed by the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific railway tracks and is only partly cleared land, and I will show you presently that that property was sold at the same price as the front. I will show you how a man, before he had a deed, managed to secure $90,000 for property which he did not really own and which was to cost him only $36,496. I say the Government was remiss in taking that property, and I do not believe that the honourable leader of this House or any other member will attempt to defend that transaction, which took place more than five years ago, and from which the Government has never got one cent of return. On the other hand, they have perhaps had to pay municipal taxes on it. There is nothing on the farm to-day. Not a sod has been turned on that property, for which the Government has paid $180,000 in hard cash. The interest on that money has been accumulating ever since, and no good has resulted to the people of Canada from the transaction. I shall admire the ability of the honourable leader of the Government in this House all the more if he can defend that transaction before this honourable body. I have copies of all the deeds, taken from the registry office, and if the honourable gentleman wants them I can give them to him, and he may inspect them and verify what I have said.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Put them on record.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Oh, it would take too long. The proposition was apparently turned down by the Government, but, in spite of that fact, the transaction had to be put through. Mr. Rodden, as I have said, owned what I have called part two, but he did not own part three at all. Part three belonged to the late Duncan McIntyre's estate. While the commission might have gone direct to the McIntyre estate, Mr. Rodden went to them and said. "I want that piece of land," and he bought it for $36,496; that is, he promised to pay that amount, though, mark you, he did not actually pay out one cent, for he had already sold the property to the Government. That is why I should like to have the opinion of the lawyers on this matter. How could the lawyers have said that he had a good and sufficient title to the property when he did not own it at all? But it would never have done to let the public, or any one know that this particular piece of property was bought for $36,000, and on the same day was transferred to the Government at the price of $90,000. A deed was drawn up by Mr. Alexander Cameron, a well-known notary of Montreal. I have here a copy of the deed, certified by the registrar, and in which it is stated that the property was sold for one dollar and "other good and valuable considerations" —the usual formula. It appears that according to our laws the registrar has no right to accept a deed in which the price of the property is not correctly stated; so he insisted upon the price being mentioned. Thereupon Mr. Cameron drew up an affidavit, and it was signed by Mr. W. T. Rodden, stating that the price was the figure which I have mentioned, $36,496.

The transaction looked somewhat suspicious. I may say that the matter would never have been ventilated and the public might never have known of it if Mr. Rodden had been satisfied with outdoing the Government, but he attempted at the same time to get the better of the real estate agents. They were a well known firm in Montreal, Findlay & Howard, who were handling a great deal of business, and they had as one of their outside partners a Mr. Ed. Parker, a brother of Lady Drummond. Mr. Parker afterwards went overseas in connection with the Red Cross, and died over there, after doing good service for this country on the other side. He had been interested in the transaction, having been very persistent in approaching the Government and trying to sell them the farm. As he was in the real estate business, it was perfectly legitimate for him, as for all the others, to try to sell to the Government. One morning Mr. W. T. Rodden walked into the office of Findlay & Howard and said to them, "I want you to sell my farm for such and such a price to Alexander Cameron, notary." They said, "But you were asking much more than that for the property, Mr. Rodden." "Never mind," he said, "I am going to take that amount for the farm." You understand that real estate agents get 5 per cent of the amount involved in a real estate transaction, no matter what the amount may be, if the property is sold during the life of their contract. They get the 5 per cent even if the owner himself makes the sale, because they have been advertising and doing other work, and are entitled to their commission. By turning over the property to Notary Cameron at a minimum price, the real estate agents, Findley & Howard were deprived—I will not use the word "robbed," though the transaction looked very much like robbery—were deprived of their full commission and got only 5 per cent of the smaller amount. The real estate agents, seeing that they were being outdone, immediately made public what was going on and exposed Rodden, as he deserved to be exposed—because this was only a fake sale for the purpose of keeping the real estate agents in the dark and doing them out of their money, for they also had been trying to sell the property to the Government, and if they had succeeded they would have got their whole commission. The news of this matter, after having been ventilated among the real estate agents of Montreal, became public, and the Montreal Herald for weeks made a regular campaign against the transaction. I have in my possession a scrap-book containing clippings from the newspaper, but I will not burden this House with the reading of them.

But here is where the plot thickens. Immediately after Mr. Cameron had taken the farm he went—well, I might just as well speak out at once. Mr. W. T. Rodden some time later failed; and, although the purchase price, which he had paid, or rather promised to pay, amounted to about $84,000 and he had got a cheque from the Government for $180,000, there was no trace of that check in his assets, and the inspectors could not find any trace of it. That sum of money seemed to have completely vanished. When Mr. Rodden was called before the Public Accounts Committee and asked, "When you got this $180,000 cheque what did you do with it?" he answered, "I do not know; I do not remember." "Did you deposit it in the bank?" "I think I did." "What bank was it?" "I do not remember." That was the sworn evidence—he did not remember. However, everybody knew, as the municipal record showed, who owned this additional land, and it would have been very easy for the commission to have gone direct to the McIntyre estate and purchased the property for about $36,000. The Government had some very good experts valuing the land, and naturally they put a high price. about $1,200 an acre, upon the front part, which I have described as part two, but they did not put that value on part three. As will be seen when the papers are brought down, the part between the rear of the farm and the railway was only partially cleared, was half a mile or more from the public road, was crossed by two railways, was without public means of communication, could be of no possible use for a subdivision, and had no speculative value.

There is another point, honourable gentlemen. Whilst this Government are urging that all vacant lands, even little town lots, should be sown with potatoes or other vegetables, there are 145 acres of good land, partly cleared, on which nothing but weeds is growing to-day. Why does not the Government practise what it preaches? The Government is asking the workingman, after his day's work, to engage in gardening on any little vacant lot that may be available, although it is doubtful if he will be able to get any return from it, because somebody else may get there ahead of him and take it away; yet the Government allows this property to run wild, and to-day it is covered with weeds, which are infesting all the neighbouring farms, and it is a public nuisance.

This land is costing the Government not only the $180,000 paid in cash on June 24, 1912, but also the interest, which, reckoned at six per cent, the rate our great Finance Minister is now paying in New York for money, amounts to $10,800 a year. I said this transaction was worse than that of the Curran bridge, because we have the bridge, while in this case we have absolutely nothing for our good money.

The celerity with which the transaction was put through is another feature of it. On the 8th June, 1912, Mr. Rodden was not even the proprietor of that land that he bought from the McIntyre estate, and sixteen days afterwards a beautiful cheque for $180,000 was handed to him. Now, all who are familiar with such transactions know full well that it takes a longer time than that to arrange a sale. The title must be examined by the lawyers; then the area involved must be verified; then there are all the proceedings through the Militia Department; there had to be an Order in Council passed authorizing the Militia Department to buy this land—or there should have been one; then there would be the signature of the Governor in Council before authority could be given; then the cheque had to go through the Auditor General's office, and any one who has had experience there will know that cheques do not go through as quickly as did this one. But in this case everything went very smoothly and nicely, and sixteen days after Mr. Rodden bought the property he went on rejoicing with his money, and had loaded on the country that farm of 145 acres—at what price? I took the trouble of counting it up, and, reckoning at simple interest since the purchase five years ago, it has cost $244,800, nearly a quarter of a million, for absolutely nothing. The farm is not even rented; there is not even a farmer on it. If it had been rented and produced potatoes they would have been pretty expensive ones, but as it is we have absolutely nothing.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Not even raising grain?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Not even pasture; it is used for nothing. Why was it bought? I do not know. What are they doing with it? I do not know. Perhaps the leader of the Government will tell us in a few moments. What it will be used for is a question. It was bought, although the ordnance land across the river, only two miles from the post office, has belonged to the Government ever since Confederation, and was available. Yet they go between thirteen and fourteen miles from the post office, to a place called Dorval. If barracks were erected on this farm they would not be near the rifle range, for the rifle range is ten or twelve miles east of Montreal, making the walking distance twenty-four miles, and, no matter how good our soldiers are, they cannot walk forty-eight miles a day, going for shooting practice and coming back the same day; they would have to sleep on the road.

I do not charge that there has been any wrongdoing in this purchase, but I just put the facts before this honourable House. I believe, however, that the Government should be blamed for reckless extravagance in this matter. In justice to Colonel Cantlie, who has been in command of the 42nd Highland Regiment and has been for two years at the front, a credit to himself, his regiment, and the nation, and who is still only a colonel, I would say that he would never recommend this purchase, or have anything to do with it, and I defy any one to show me his sanction on any of these papers. The other two gentlemen concerned in the purchase are no longer colonels, but generals.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is no objection to bringing down the papers for which my honourable friend has asked. I regret, however, that he was moved by such deep feeling in pointing out the iniquitous character of this transaction. It happened five or six years ago, and, as my honourable friend is a very distinguished resident of Montreal, and a very active participant in all the work of his party in that district, I am rather surprised that he was not moved to protest earlier.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The truce during the war.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend was very careful to point out that this transaction took place two years before the war. I would ask, why his pacific attitude during those two years?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They were saying they were making plans to do something with it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would not justify the purchase of land at the very excessive figure which my honourable friend alleges was paid for this; so there must be something really wrong in my honourable friend's silence during those two years. However I was deeply touched by his expression of regret that he had to criticise the Government for this particular transaction. He prefaced his remarks, however, by saying that he had confidence in General Hughes, and was one of that honourable gentleman's greatest admirers; and he certainly led us to conclude that he had not only the greatest admiration for him in his military capacity, but the greatest confidence in his judgment.

Now, it would appear that this purchase of Bonnie Bel Air was made entirely on the responsibility of General Hughes. The matter is not new, and therefore is not of a startling nature, for it was thoroughly threshed out in the House of Commons in 1914 and, if my honourable friend will look at the Commons Hansard of February 23, 1914, at page 1030, and following pages, he will find a complete vindication of this purchase by General Hughes. I would commend to my honourable friend the perusal of General Hughes's speech. The General there shows that never was there a more advantageous purchase made in the Dominion of Canada; yet, in the face of my honourable friend's eulogy of General Hughes, he seems to doubt very seriously whether the General exercised very great wisdom in making this particular purchase. The advantages of this particular property could not be more advantageously set out in any prospectus, even if it were divided into town lots, than was done on that occasion by General Hughes, most elaborately and with the greatest particularity. I am sure that if my honourable friend had read the Hansard of the date mentioned, he would not have made his attack upon the Government and upon the wisdom and judgment of General Hughes in acquiring that property. It was pointed out in the discussion in the Commons that, although the property may be the distance mentioned from the centre of Montreal, yet the convenience of reaching that point 14 miles distant, is decidedly greater than that of reaching other points two or three miles distant from the centre of the city. The property is reached by some four railways and also by an automobile road.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: But the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific pass the adjoining properties before getting to Bel Air.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would readily concede that in going from Montreal to this property they would pass other properties; but my honourable friend will find on a closer examination that there are two additional roads which apparently reach this property. Furthermore, it is on a boulevard, giving a cosmopolitan appearance to the property, which will be very greatly to its advantage when it comes to be laid out in town lots. There is also a street railway, I understand.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Within four miles of it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No doubt it will reach it at a very early day, if it has not already got there.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It only runs to Lachine.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend says the configuration of the land entirely unfits it for military purposes. I am sure he will not set up his judgment against so distinguished a military authority as General Hughes, who states emphatically in his speech in the Commons that of all the properties in the vicinity of Montreal this one certainly has the preference for that particular purpose. Yet my honourable friend would try to convince us that General Hughes was wrong in that particular.

Another fact which is not to be overlooked is that this Government, with that caution which it always exercises in the purchase of property, particularly of this kind, secured the services of two of the most competent valuators of the city of Montreal. One was Mr. Baillie and the other was Mr. Robertson, and I understand from a close perusal of the discussion which took place in the House of Commons that there are not two more reliable valuators in the city of Montreal than those gentlemen. One of them valued this property at $205,500 and the other at $235,500, whereas the Government of Canada got it for $180,000. Honourable gentlemen will thus see that we obtained it at some $55,000 less than the value placed upon the property by Mr. Robertson.

Upon these facts, I appeal to my honourable friend, who apparently was not aware of them until I pointed them out, and to you honourable gentlemen, whether the Government has not done everything it possibly could do under the circumstances to secure one of the choicest properties in the city of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I have here an interview with General Sam Hughes, which was published in a newspaper, and has never been contradicted, in which he says: "I know nothing of the property myself." He is too good a military man to have a camp below the level of the water, yet he says that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: From what are you reading?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: From an interview with Sir Sam Hughes in La Patrie, a good Conservative paper.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You can not rely on interviews.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The parties who chose the property were Colonel Labelle and Colonel Wilson, and they said that the Minister of Militia gave them a free hand, simply fixing the limitation that he did not want to pay more than a dollar a foot.

The motion was agreed to.

THE RULES IN DIVORCE CASES.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That the following members of the Senate be appointed a Special Committee to consider and report on the desirability of rivising the rules and regulations governing the granting of divorce, and if in the opinion of the Committee a revision is advisable to submit to the Senate such amendments as are deemed necessary, and that the Committee be empowered to meet in joint sittings with a like Committee of the House of Commons: Honourable Messieurs Bostock, Daniel, Ross (Middleton), Tanner and Watson.

He said: Several discussions have taken place in the House of Commons involving to some extent the attitude of the Senate on the question of reducing the cost of divorce by a revision of the Senate rules, and of facilitating the proceedings in divorce cases. In view of the expressions in the House of Commons, it was suggested by the Prime Minister that a committee of each House should come together to see if public opinion could not be met in this matter. If the committees cannot accomplish their purpose, no harm will be done.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: How could the Senate cheapen the expense of divorce? All that the Senate asks is the usual fee of $200, the cost of printing and translation. Where does the other expense come in, so far as the Senate is concerned? If those who want divorce retain expensive lawyers, they would have to pay the same for counsel and witnesses whether they went to a civil court or came to the Senate. I have never been able to understand why the Senate could be accused of charging too much for divorce.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It has been suggested that in cases where personal service is made on the parties we might dispense with the three months' advertising, which represents considerable expense; also that in some cases we might dispense with the payment of $200 to the Clerk of the Senate as a condition precedent to starting proceedings, unless the circumstances of the case warranted the imposition of that charge. There is the further question as to the committee regulating the costs of the legal gentlemen who appear before the committee, as is done in England, I understand. Thus there are many features that might well come under review of this committee, and that possibly might be improved to a very considerable extent, and thus the criticisms made in the Commons might be met.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: If the committee should decide to do away with the $200 fee, they should insert a proviso that the lawyers who attend the divorce committee should lower their fees by $200; then applicants could get divorce for nothing.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I think the union of committees from the two Houses might possibly assist in reducing expense in connection with the attendance of witnesses and lawyers, who may sometimes be kept here for quite a long time before being called to appear before the committee of the Senate or of the House of Commons. It has been suggested that a joint committee of the two Houses might hear the evidence, and make a report to each House; this would do away with the necessity of having witnesses and others connected with a case appear before separate committees, which to my knowledge has added very materially to the expense in the past.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Honourable gentlemen, I suppose that, as I do not have anything to do with the proceedings in divorce, I should hesitate to say anything on the subject. But I think the general principle should be followed that if things are working satisfactorily it is a mistake to make a change. Things are going satisfactorily, we will say, and some one comes along who thinks conditions might be improved, and as a consequence the last condition is generally worse than the first. It is the old story of the epitaph: "I was well, I would be better, here I am." As I have said, I have nothing to do with the Divorce Committee, I have nothing to do with divorce, and I have no prejudices in its favour; but I think the Senate Divorce Committee is as good a court as there is in the Dominion of Canada. On that committee there are expert lawyers; there are, as a rule, at least one or two gentlemen of the medical profession; and there are a couple of clear-headed business men. The result has been that for some years now the business of that committee has gone through with the utmost expedition and smoothness, and with very little unnecessary expenditure. The honourable the leader of the Government knows that in some cases where a person petitions in forma pauperis, he may be relieved of the payment of the fees. I cannot see any object whatever in undertaking to deal further with the constitution of our divorce court. Every honourable gentleman who has been here for any length of time knows that as a rule joint committees are expensive and unsatisfactory. Under present conditions the Divorce Committee hears the evidence, the evidence is printed, and all the work is done, and done promptly, and the result of their labours is sent to the other House, and it is the duty of the other House to see that the report and the evidence justify the recommendation made. Why should we, at this stage of the session, when there is so much business before the House, undertake to deal with this question in this way.

The motion was agreed to.

BOARDS OF TRADE AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill 115, an Act to amend the Boards of Trade Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

The Senate again went into committee on Bill 66, an Act to amend the Judges Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed. Hon. Mr. Tanner in the Chair.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: When the committee was sitting last night there was some difference of opinion about sections 34 and 35, which were added to this Act on my motion. I have had a consultation with the honourable senator from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) and the honourable senator from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique). The honourable senator from Ottawa was to have moved an amendment to section 35, but as he had to leave he asked me to move it. It is as follows:

> Provided that nothing contained in this section or in the last preceding section shall be construed to affect any payment to any of the Superior, District or County Court judges provided for by any provincial Government in connection with the judicial duties of any judge of such courts.

The honourable gentleman informed me that they were satisfied with that, and authorized me to make this statement. If this amendment is satisfactory to the House—

Hon. Mr. DAVID: I have an amendment to the amendment. The honourable senator from Ottawa has agreed to my sub-amendment, which is as follows:

Provided also, that nothing in this Act shall prevent any judge from acting as Commissioner for the purpose of investigating municipal matters in virtue of provincial laws, and receiving his travelling and living expenses.

The proposed amendments were agreed to, and the section as amended was agreed to.

The Bill was reported, read the third time, and passed.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 116, an Act to assist returned soldiers in settling upon the land and to increase agricultural production, Hon. Mr. Thompson in the Chair.

Hon. A. BOYER: This Bill is certainly of great importance, as it concerns the future welfare of those who have been brave enough to go overseas to defend their country and contribute to the honour of Canada, and it is worthy, I think, of the Senate's very best attention. It has for its object not only the increase of our agricultural resources, but also the placing upon the land of those who return from abroad. One of the lessons which this war has taught Europe is that all advantages disappear the very day the food supply gives out. Everybody must recognize the hard fact that food is absolutely necessary for existence, and the best way to obtain it is to turn to mother earth, who is always willing to produce if treated properly. France, in 1913, imported 29,000,000 quintals of grain and flour, at a cost of $565,000,000, and in 1916 she imported 47,000,000 quintals of cereals, costing $1,550,000,000. Canada has been fortunate in being a producing country. We have been fortunate enough not to feel the hunger that has been felt throughout Europe, but if we have so far not felt hungry it is simply because we could afford to pay the increased prices of foodstuffs in the last few years.

What is the best way to recompense those who will return after the war? The point I wish to make particularly is this, that special attention and care should be given to those who return home after having lain for months in the hospital. A new term which has become familiar all over Europe is "the re-education of the wounded." It is a question which has been of the greatest interest in Europe in the last two or three years. As far back as 1870 the municipality of Paris had become alarmed at the number of accidents—persons run over or falling from buildings, and so on—that occurred every day in the streets of Paris, with its population of 2,000,000. The authorities wondered if something could not be done for those who were maimed through accidents. It was at that time that a young Parisian doctor named Amar conceived the happy idea of taking charge of a hospital founded by the municipality of Paris for the treatment of the wounded or injured, for the purpose of ascertaining if there was not some means or other by which a man who had lost an arm or a leg, or was blinded, could be re-educated so as not to be a burden to his friends, or to the municipality, or to the public at large. After the question had been studied for over 40 years a system was devised, which is now in use in all European countries, and is called the re-education of wounded soldiers. It has met with so much success that as far back as 1905, after the Russo-Japanese war, Russia sent to Paris for the loan of men skilled in the use of instruments invented by this Dr. Amar, so that Russia could take care of its soldiers who had been wounded in the war with Japan. Japan had long before known of those instruments and had installed them in all the large hospitals of that country, and Russia was following suit. Germany has actually followed suit. Germany before the war knew about the Amar system, but would not use it because it was French. The German doctors thought they could improve it by giving it a German name and passing it off as German goods, as they have done in other cases. The authorities recently have intercepted letters from German hospital centres to persons in France whom German doctors had known before the war, asking for pamphlets explaining the system used in France, which has been so successful in the re-education of soldiers wounded in this war. Of course the Government took scant notice of these letters, and simply threw them in the wastepaper basket, and the system has continued to flourish notwithstanding the fact that Germany is not adopting it.

I have in my possession a pamphlet written by a very eminent Englishman, Sir Henry Norman. If you look up the book "Who's Who," you will find that Sir Henry Norman is a gentleman who has travelled the world over, that he has studied financial, physical, and material conditions throughout the world, and has written many books. The day the war broke out Sir Henry Norman entered the service of his country, and shortly afterwards Lloyd George picked him up and sent him to Paris as a liaison officer to the Ministry of Inventions in France. Sir Henry Norman was commissioned by the British Government to study the system followed in France for the treatment of disabled and discharged soldiers, and has made a report upon this subject, which I should like to see printed in our official report. It reads like poetry. It is full of facts that cannot fail to interest each and every one of us. It shows what can be done for the welfare, the re-education and the re-building of the man who has given of his best in the service of his country.

There is another point that I wish to touch upon. Let me say, en passant, that the system of treating wounded soldiers has been found to be of great importance in France. It should be remembered that 92 per cent of the men fighting to-day for France have come from the land; that is to say, they were either farmers or farm-hands. The figures which I gave you at the beginning of my remarks, showing the enormous increase in the cost of living in France, are explained chiefly by the great mobilization of the rural population in the armies of France. It was discovered that the best way to bring these men back to usefulness for their country was to interest them in their former work. Ninety-two per cent, as I have said, were called from the farms to serve their country. They have, as we know, served their country in a manner which is above reproach. But it has been found that a great many of them are loth to go back on the land. They say: "Eight per cent of the population, people from the cities, villages, and towns, have been working comfortably in munition factories and earning big salaries, whilst we have been in the mud or in water up to our waist, fighting for our country, and, should another war be declared in the future, we wish to have our sons spared what we have suffered because we came from the land." The French Government has assiduously applied itself to counteracting that movement by making it as easy and agreeable as possible for the rural population to return to their old occupations, and in that the Government has been successful.

We, all know, honourable gentlemen, how lasting are the effects of wounds. We all know that a poor fellow, whose shoulder has been shattered comes out of the hospital partly cured, but that though the wound may be healed up his system has been so affected that his lungs, or his heart or kidneys, or liver, are out of order. The only way to make a new man of him and fit him for an occupation so that he may be self-supporting is to restore as far as possible the use of his disabled limbs. It has been done in the past by mechanical processes, by what is known in Europe as the Zander system, which is purely mechanical. If you walk into one of the large hospitals in Paris, for instance, you will find machinery that will take a man's arm and work it up for five or ten minutes so as to restore to it a certain power of motion; you will find other machinery that will work the knee; others that will work the hips; others for the neck and so on. But a French doctor by the name of Bergonie, one of the shining lights of the University of Bordeaux, a gentleman who has discovered an electrical instrument that will locate the smallest splinter of a shell in any part of a wound, conceived the idea that instead of healing wounded men mechanically it might be done by returning them to the farms. He established in the town of Martillac, in the Département de la Gironde, a small hospital consisting of 125 beds. The hospital is located out in the country. Dr. Bergonie has been conducting that hospital for the past three years. He has been experimenting to see whether wounded men could not be healed without mechanical treatment, but simply by employing them at work which they were fit to do on the land. After experimenting for two years he has come to the conclusion that the system is a success. His report to the Institute of Sciences in Paris regarding this new system has revealed the fact that great progress had been made in the treatment of wounds or injuries, and the system is to-day being utilized by the French Government not only at Martillac, but in every canton of France, because the Minister of Agriculture for France, who visited Dr. Bergonie's hospital, found the system so rational and so efficient that he decided it should be adopted throughout the country.

What is the system followed? There is only one doctor attached to the institution at Martillac. One hundred and twenty-five men arrive there from a big hospital where they have been convalescing—men suffering from collapse of the nervous system, or men with bones shrunken or diminished or unable to move the arms or the hips. or legs, or feet. The various disabilities are all noted down on a card. These men are given different kinds of agricultural work to do, so that each limb which requires exercise will get it in the useful work which is done on the land, instead of getting it by mechanical treatment as formerly. A scientific commission, hearing of this hospital at Martillac, decided to visit the hospital without giving notice of their coming. When they got to the hospital what did they find? It was empty. All the wounded men were out working in the fields. Some were digging; others using wheelbarrows because they required exercise of the wrist, or the shoulders, or the arms; others chopping wood; others milking cows; others sowing, or picking potatoes. Their different movements were similar to those which they would have had to perform mechanically, but in performing them on the land they were doing useful work, and were doing it out in the pure air, and, as they say in France, "dans un milieu qui leur était familier"—in the midst of things familiar to them; that is to say, close to nature. These men were gradually recovering their health and becoming once more useful citizens of France.

Honourable gentlemen, we shall soon have in Canada an enormous number of returned soldiers. We possess many experimental farms in Canada. Why should not every one of these experimental farms be used as is that station at Martillac? Last Friday the members of this honourable House were invited to go to the Central Experimental Farm to witness a demonstration of mechanical ploughing. I noticed there a dozen men who were weeding. Why should disabled soldiers, who would otherwise require mechanical treatment, not be put at exercise of that kind? That farm is certainly one of the loveliest spots within fifty miles of Ottawa; the air is of the purest; the surroundings are magnificent, and I, for one, am sure that it would be a great help to any man to be stationed at the Experimental Farm. Not only would the man recuperate by living out in the open air, but what would be the cost to the Government of putting up a few sheds to house these men? What would be the cost of feeding those poor fellows? You will have to feed them anyway, and then you would be doing something which would help towards their recovery, and at the same time be doing good for the country. As Dr. Bergonie has remarked, the work that the wounded soldier on one of these farms may do must be considered as a by-product. It may be practically nothing, but in a very short time it contributes to the remaking of that man, contributes towards making that man feel that in future he will not be a burden to his country, much less to his relatives.

I would again request all my honourable colleagues in this House to read Sir Henry Norman's report and learn what the system of treatment which I have mentioned has saved to the French Government. It amounts to hundreds of millions saved, not only by way of pensions; but also by the work that these men have been able to take up again, though they had been so severely wounded that they were thought to be absolutely useless for the rest of their lives. These men have been remade and re-educated, and to-day are some of the most useful citizens of France, owing to the Bourrillon and Amar systems, so that after having served in the war they are as able as they were before the war to earn their own living.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The committee is indebted to my honourable friend from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Boyer) for directing our attention not only to the duty which falls upon the Government of Canada in the way of re-educating our returned soldiers, but to the economic reasons why public opinion should be directed to this very important subject. The Military Hospitals Commission is charged with this very important duty, and has already established some sixty institutions throughout Canada, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It has also dealt with approximately 20,000 men who have passed through its hands, and is to-day housing approximately ten thousand returned soldiers who are either convalescent, wounded, or invalided. The commission has not overlooked the very important information which has been conveyed to the House by my honourable friend from Rigaud, particularly touching the equipment which has been adopted in Paris and on the continent in the re-education of the more seriously wounded. The commission is indebted to Colonel Mignault, of Montreal, a well-known physician, for specially directing their attention to the Amar equipment. It was known to the commission before, but Colonel Mignault has taken particular interest in that equipment, and I may say that the commission is at present investigating the latest and most scientific equipment which is being applied in Europe in the re-education of wounded soldiers, through certain experts whom they have sent there. The men who have been returned to Canada from the front have, of course, recovered to a measurable extent from the severity of their wounds, and while yet under the charge of the commission may not have taken up the question of re-education as seriously as is done in Europe. However, all the commission's institutions are furnished with the most elaborate equipment, which is being applied by the very best experts who could be secured in Canada, and very satisfactory results are being obtained, so that most if not all the wounded men who have returned to this country, will be dealt with in such a way as to bring about a recovery from the wounds from which they have suffered, either through loss of limbs or otherwise, as far as science can possibly do so. The Government is, regardless of expense, doing the best that can be done in behalf of the invalided men who have returned from the front. I hope we may have an opportunity, before the session closes, to go more extensively into this matter, and I am very glad that my honourable friend from Rigaud has directed the attention of the Senat to the very important work done in Europe, which we are in duty bound to carry on in Canada, and which will be conducted on a very large and extended scale here.

The Bill before us is, in a sense, germane to this subject. The Government is endeavouring as far as possible to induce returned soldiers to settle upon our vacant lands, and the object of this Bill is to assist in every conceivable way, not only by furnishing land to the soldier, but by giving him that financial assistance which is so desirable to his making a proper start, and likewise by placing within his reach facilities to secure that measure of agricultural training which is indispensable to success in farming. A perusal of the Bill as we proceed clause by clause will doubtless impress upon honourable gentlemen the fact that we are doing all that we possibly can to meet this national situation which we have to face.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: I am very glad to hear what my honourable friend has said, but I have a request to make, which is this: Do not investigate too much. Other nations have done all the investigating, and we cannot afford to investigate; we must go to work right away. I do not wish to make any political issue of this matter, but some men who have been returned have been so shamefully treated that it is no wonder that recruiting has fallen off. I could give you half a dozen cases, but I will be content to mention two. A young glass-blower by trade, 20 years of age, who had been earning not less than from $18 to $24 a week, went to the war, got a bullet clean through his skull, and was sent back paralysed. He went through the hospital in Montreal, and, though he could not speak a word of English, never had a French-Canadian doctor near him who could understand him, and he was discharged. He was picked up by Colonel Mignault while begging in the streets of Montreal. He had been put out of the hospital in Montreal as cured, with both legs paralysed, on the magnificent pension of $8 a month. Another case was that of a steeplejack who had never made less than $80 or $100 a week. His last job before he went to the war was the tuck-pointing of the big chimney in the Windsor Street station, for which he was paid $80, the job having occupied four days. He went to the war; his left elbow was broken; they patched it up, and in doing so shortened it by about two inches, so that his occupation was gone. He tried to get employment as a chauffeur, being furnished with a sort of tool that would enable him to handle an automobile, having gone to a school established, I am told, by the Hospitals Commission. He could not speak a word of English, and there was not a single teacher in the school who spoke a word of French. This man was retired on the magnificent pension of $8 a month, and was found begging in the streets of Montreal. Those men were actually picked up in Montreal in a starving condition. A very stiff letter was addressed by this identical Colonel Mignault to the Hospitals Board, who felt so much ashamed of the work they had done that those two men were picked up again, put on their old salaries, and everything possible is being done for them. If they had not been by accident met by Colonel Mignault, God knows what would have become of them.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would like to say to my honourable friend that he fails to draw a distinction between the Hospital Board and the Hospitals Commission. I understand from him that the Hospital Board did assist those men when their condition was discovered. The medical work of the Hospitals Commission is looked after by the Army Medical Corps attached to the Militia Department. If my honourable friend will give me the particulars of those two cases, I shall be very glad, not only to ask, but to require and insist upon the Minister of Militia investigating the treatment of those cases by members of the Army Medical Corps. The Hospitals Commission is not charged with the medical work of the commission.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: I shall furnish my honourable friend with the names and all the particulars of those cases. I did not mention them in order to criticise, but simply to see that such treatment shall not be repeated. We want to do the very best we can for those who have given the best of their services to their country.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I have listened with great interest to the speech of my honourable friend and to the reply given by the minister; but from the latter I did not gather that very much had been done towards enabling the men who are returning to Canada, and are convalescent, to go on the land. I understand that most of the convalescent homes throughout Canada are in towns, so that the men who go to them have not much opportunity of getting on land and doing work there, even if they want to. I do not mean to say that all those men desire to go into agricultural work; but, from the little information I have on the matter, I have wondered whether they are getting much opportunity to work on land and become efficient in that kind of work if they want to follow it up. From what the honourable gentleman has said, the best method does not seem to be employed in treating practically all those men who have been wounded, and who have to go through a course of treatment to have their natural faculties restored or to regain the use of their limbs or muscles. The very best way of doing this would be to give them opportunities of working in the open air and on the land itself; but they have not such opportunities at the convalescent homes in towns.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, it is difficult, if not impossible, to secure in rural parts the very large buildings which are required for the accommodation of those men; consequently, they have to be placed near large centres. Up to the present time, so far as I know, no serious demand has been made on the part of returned soldiers to go upon the land; but the legislation now before us is intended to meet any demand that may be made in that direction. Legislation is not only desirable, but necessary to meet the requirements of those men who may wish to settle upon our public lands. The different provinces have also given consideration to this question. In only three western provinces—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—does the Dominion Government own the public lands; in the other provinces they are owned by the provinces themselves, and I think I am correct in saying that all those provinces have legislated with a view to settling returned soldiers on their lands. Many provinces have passed legislation of a very attractive character, giving to soldiers not only land, but also financial assistance and agricultural training. It is to be hoped that in due time full advantage will be taken of the legislation now before us. At present I do not think it can be said that any returned soldiers in Canada have been unable to find employment. All the provinces have recognized their obligation to look after the employment of these men, and at a conference between the Federal Government and the different provinces of Canada, an arrangement was entered into by which the latter assumed that responsibility. Accordingly, provincial commissions were appointed by the respective provinces to look after the employment of returned soldiers within the provinces where they lived. Those commissions have been in operation for the last year and a half or more, and I know of my own personal knowledge that they have been doing very satisfactory work. It is needless to add that there will be a percentage of the men who return from the front with whom it will be difficult to carry out any satisfactory arrangement touching employment. The conditions under which they have been living at the front, the conditions of war generally, contribute, in a way, to disabling the mind from applying itself with that close and prosaic attention which is involved more or less in all employment, and it will be some time I presume before our returned soldiers settle down to normal conditions of life. In the very nature of things they have become seriously disturbed by the most abnormal conditions under which they have lived during the last two or three years; therefore honourable gentlemen who may find some of these men either not getting employment or not staying in it will have to consider the conditions which must naturally be applied to the peculiar situation which we are facing.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: As chairman of the Hospitals Commission, would not my honourable friend consider favourably the suggestion of Dr. Mignault? Money has been voted to get all the Amar instruments. A further credit of $1,500 was asked in order to demonstrate to our own doctors how these instruments should be used. Could not the Hospitals Board grant that? If we have the instruments and no one knows how to use them, they will be of very little use. It appears that these instruments are so very delicate that a man who has never used them, however clever he may be, will hardly be in a position to produce results. If, by granting this $1,500, the board helped only a half a dozen men, it would be money well spent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not only has the attention of the commission been directed to the Amar equipment, but they have given very close attention to following up its results. While my honourable friend very properly refers to the wonderful work which has been accomplished by that equipment, yet, as in the case of all scientific apparatus, there is some disagreement as to the degree of satisfaction given by the results. Consequently, the commission has adopted this plan, which I think will be approved of by most men of common sense. They have sent to Europe a couple of their own experts, attached to Toronto University, who have given very close attention to the application of scientific equipment of this kind to wounded men. They are making an investigation, not only of the Amar equipment, but of other apparatus of a similar kind. When they return they will be acquainted not only with the equipment used in Paris and elsewhere, but with the working of that apparatus, and they will be in a position to teach the use of it in Canada and practically to establish a staff that will be familiar with that class of work. I can assure my honourable friend that the very best judgment that can be exercised is being exercised towards promoting the application of scientific equipment.

On section 4—Dominion lands to be reserved:

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: It appears to me that this Bill relates almost solely to the settlement of lands in the West. I should like to call the attention of the Government, or the commission whose duty it will be altogether lost sight of. In the East, especially in New Brunswick, we have lands that should be settled. I desire to inform the honourable leader of the Government that in New Brunswick we have already organized a company to help the Government, or a commission whose duty it will be to find lands for returned soldiers. We are preparing ourselves to help the soldiers as best we can—more particularly the French Acadians, although there is no closed door—and we have pledged ourselves to do the work gratis. Many of the returned soldiers know very little about farming, especially with regard to the selection of good land. Our committee is composed of people who have been brought up on farms and who understand these questions, and it is ready to join hands with the commission in order to give some substantial help to the soldiers and to see that the establishment of returned soldiers upon the land is not wholly confined to the West.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: May I ask the honourable leader of the Government whether the grants of land are confined to Canadian soldiers? It has been reported that promises have been made to British soldiers.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Paragraph c of section 2 says:

> "Settler" means any person who has served in the naval or military expeditionary forces of Canada during the present war, or who was engaged in active service during the present war in the naval or military forces of the United Kingdom or of any of the self-governing British dominions or colonies, or who, being a British subject resident in Canada before the war, has been engaged in active service at one of the seats of war in either the naval or military forces of His Majesty's Allies in the present war.

I may say to my honourable friend from Shediac (Hon. Mr. Poirier) that some months ago the Government had a conference with the representatives of all the provinces with reference to the question of the settlement of returned soldiers in the provinces where the Dominion Government does not own land. The matter was discussed at great length, but no conclusion was arrived at pending further negotiations. This Bill deals only with land owned by the Dominion Government.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It occurs to me that in the West the great majority of the Dominion lands are far removed from the railways and the centres of settlement. It seems to me that it is not an attractive prospect to place before a returned soldier, that he has to go miles away to the northern part of the country in order to get free land. I speak only from what little knowledge I have; honourable gentlemen from the West may know more about this matter; but it seems to me that most of the land within a reasonable distance of the railways has passed out of the hands of the Government. A great deal of this land has been taken up and cultivated, and a great deal of it has been left vacant. I understand that some of the settlers, after they got their Crown grant, borrowed money from private individuals or companies, and as a result the land has gone to those individuals or companies and is not now being worked. It may be said that this is a very ambitious scheme and there may be many difficulties in putting it into effect. I think the question should be considered whether it is not possible to get control of some of the lands nearer to centres of settlement, so that the men who want to take up land will not have to go too far from what I might call civilization—a town or some place where others live, where there would be ordinary facilities.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Minister of the Interior states that in Saskatchewan there are 917,952 acres—practically a million acres of land; in Alberta, 4,100,736 acres. He says:

> These lands are reported by our department as the approximate areas of undisposed and available Dominion lands, suitable for agricultural purposes within ten miles of railway lines. Then we have within fifteen miles, in Manitoba, 2,144,256 acres; in Saskatchewan, 1,407,728 acres; in Alberta, 5,696,512 acres. The acreage within twenty miles in Manitoba is 2,552,736 acres; in Saskatchewan, 1,802,416 acres; in Alberta, 6,891,008 acres. The acreage over twenty miles in Manitoba is 492,864; in Saskatchewan, 1,627,584; in Alberta, 5,580,992.

Of course, as the minister has stated in the House of Commons, this land is not necessarily all agricultural land. He says:

> Much of it is heavily timbered, some of it is scrub, other portions are open prairie.

In that enormous area, so far as the demand up to the present time has indicated, I think there will be sufficient land to meet the demand.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: There is plenty of land, but will the Government take steps to put the soldiers on the land? Will they actually go on the land and work it and help to maintain themselves? Undoubtedly, when they have obtained the lands, they will fall into the hands of land-sharks. They will sell out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is provided for. A land commission, consisting of three capable men, is being appointed to administer the provisions of this Act. This land will be given to a soldier, and a loan of $2,500 will be made, if necessary. A man will have facilities for agricultural training, and will not be permitted to alienate the land until the loan is paid off.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Under this Bill a returned soldier can buy land in any province in Canada. For example, he decides to buy a piece of land in New Brunswick. He can purchase that land, and the board will grant him a loan of $2,500 on it, just as it does in the case of land given in the West. The Bill also provides that, if a soldier has not the money to travel to his farm the board may loan him the money necessary to pay his railway fare and to take his family to locate on the farm. This was all threshed out in the other Chamber—which I suppose I should not refer to here. Subsection f of section 5 was placed in this Bill for the express purpose of allowing the board to advance money to a soldier so that he could take his family to his farm, no matter where it was located. Section 5 of the Bill says:

> The Board may loan to a settler an amount not exceeding $2,500 for any of the following purposes:

Then it goes on to name the purposes, and paragraph f says:

> Such other purpose or purposes as the Board may approve.

These words were added for the express purpose of giving power to the Government to take a soldier and his family to any part of the country to which they wished to go.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: It seems to me that there is a weakness or defect in the Act. There is nothing to indicate when the soldier may become possessed of the land. He may borrow money from the Government or he may not. When he acquires the land it is under the control of the commissioners, and in the event of his borrowing money there is nothing to indicate how long he must hold the land.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Subsection 8 of section 6 governs that.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: He must pay off the loan before he can become possessed of the land; but if the land happens to be in a locality where, because of settlement or the inroads of railways, it becomes very valuable, all he has to do, if I properly interpret the Bill, is to negotiate with some land shark who will advance him the money to pay off the loan, and then he becomes possessed of the land and can sell out the whole thing. By that means the land gets into the hands of speculators. It is something like the principle that obtained with reference to the grants made in the Northwest—the script lands, Fenian raid lands, and other lands of a similar nature. All these seemed to be handled by the speculator. I am afraid that unless very stringent regulations are made and control is kept over these lands for a long time, we should find in the future, as we have found in the past, that the great bulk of them soon come into the hands of the speculator, and the real locatee of the land receives very little value from it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to ask one further question. The honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Blain) has said that some of this money is to be used in allowing the soldier to pay his fare and help his family. Is that to be in addition to this $2,500, or is that to be taken out of the $2,500?

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: It must be included in the $2,500.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is $2,500 all that one man can get?

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Yes, and it is to be repaid within twenty years and bears the rate of 5 per cent.

The section was agreed to.

The Bill was reported.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The Hon. Mr. Domville has given notice of an amendment to be moved on the third reading.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman should be present. Notwithstanding that notice of motion, I think we had better have the third reading now.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE SENATE.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: In the absence of the honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette), I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 14th instant, at eight o'clock in the evening.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED: There is nothing on the Order Paper for to-morrow, I very much regret to say. I should like to keep this House continuously engaged if at all possible, but I think that if we adjourn until next week we should return on Tuesday afternoon at three o'clock.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: What about the Railway Committee?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: There are two or three committees to meet. When we adjourned before over Friday and Saturday, the committees dropped their work and the consequence was that the business of the House could not go on The Railway Committee and the Economic Committee are called for to-morrow. If the House adjourns we shall not be able to have meetings of those committees. Then, there is the Railway Bill to consider, with three or four hundred clauses, and the Companies Bill. Why not occupy the time to-morrow, and even Saturday if that were necessary, in completing the consideration of those Bills, so that we may send them to the House of Commons—unless honourable gentlemen want to stay here until Christmas.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will adjourn until to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: We might add to the motion that the committees be allowed to meet to-morrow as usual.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: But the members of the committees will want to go home just as well as other honourable gentlemen.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I think many of the members of these committees have gone home anticipating that the committees would not meet, and we should have much difficulty in getting a quorum, I am afraid.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Is the whole business of the country to stop because certain members take it into their heads that the House is going to adjourn? We have been adjourning so much that we have neglected the business of the country, and it is about time we attended to it. I am one of those who want to get through.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes, but honourable gentlemen have gone probably because there was nothing at all on the Order Paper for to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: These committees are called.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I am simply trying to explain why honourable gentlemen have left. I trust the honourable gentleman from Belleville will not press his objection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Yes, I will.

Hon. Mr. TAYLOR: The session, I presume, will continue well into September. Many members have already gone home in the expectation that this House would adjourn to-night. There is nothing on the Order Paper for to-morrow, and why should the House be held in session when there is nothing to do? We shall be here next week with nothing on the Order Paper, and there will be plenty of time for the committees to meet and get the Bills ready for presentation to the House.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I should like to remind honourable gentlemen that the business of the Senate is not confined to what is done in this chamber. The committee work is absolutely as necessary as what is done here. Two or three committees have been named. There is the Railway Committee, with a long and important Bill before them, which will take some time to consider. That committee cannot meet if this House adjourns until Tuesday. There is also the Joint Committee of this House and the House of Commons to consider the subject of reducing the cost of the sessions of Parliament. That committee has already been interfered with by adjournments of this House. I do not see how we are going to do the work of the session unless we stay here and attend to our business. That is what we came for; that is what I came for, and I do not think that we ought to give way time after time to the convenience of very few members. I should like to accommodate them as well as any one else, but I think there should be a limit to that sort of thing. We ought to stay here and attend to our business until we complete it. The Railway Committee has enough work to keep them occupied every day for three weeks if they are to finish with the consolidation of the Railway Act, and I do not see how they are going to get through with it unless we stay here. I for one am opposed to adjournment till Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think that in the absence of our best committee men the Bills will not be advanced a single line to-morrow. The work might go on, but it would have to be done over again.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: But their business is to be here. If they cannot, let them resign and let others be put in their places.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I am not asking adjournment for myself as a personal favour; I am here and am ready to remain, but I am asking it for other members.

Hon. Mr. MACDONELL: As a member of the Railway Committee, I was particularly anxious to proceed with the Bill this morning, and I am still, and I shall be here to-morrow, but it is only fair to those who are not here and will not be here to-morrow to say that, although a resolution was carried this morning that we should meet to-morrow, it was stated, I think, by the Chairman, or somebody else, and was agreed to by all, that if the House adjourned to-night there should be no meeting of the Railway Committee to-morrow. I think many of the members who were present to-day acted upon the assumption that the House would adjourn till next week.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I think the statement I made to the committee was that we must have the leave of the House for the committee to meet to-morrow if in the meantime the House adjourned. My honourable friend from St. John (Hon. Mr. Daniel) has stated that committees are to meet to-morrow. Some of the committees could not meet to-morrow, because there are three committees called for to-morrow, all occupying the same room.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would remind the honourable gentleman that there are more rooms than one in this building.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: But some honourable gentlemen are members of more than one of the committees.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I do not think anybody can accuse me of lack of industry; but, while I am quite willing to stay here and do my share of the work of any committee, I cannot agree altogether with the honourable gentleman from Belleville that the committee should meet anyway, and that if members have left it is their own fault. The committee has very important public business to consider, and it is quite possible that the public interest might not be fully and favourably considered were so many members of the committee absent. I think that a very important Bill like the Railway Bill requires a full attendance in committee. There has evidently been a misunderstanding with regard to this matter. There was a notice of motion for adjournment on the Order Paper, and a good many honourable gentlemen who have already left told me it was understood that the House was to adjourn until Tuesday.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: After the discussion to which we have listened, would my honourable friend from Belleville withdraw his objections and allow us on this occasion to adjourn until Tuesday? The discussion will be a notice for the future to the honourable members of the Senate that they should not go away and leave the business to take care of itself. After the discussion we have had, honourable gentlemen who have gone away will know what to expect in the future.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I would say to the honourable the leader of the Opposition that I do not control the House; I am only giving my individual opinion, and if the majority desires to adjourn until Tuesday or Wednesday, I will, as I have always done, submit to the will of the majority—not being an autocrat, but a democrat.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My own opinion is that we should meet to-morrow if any honourable gentlemen feel that we ought to do so. Either we should be unanimous for adjournment and there should be no recriminations that we are evading our responsibilities, or we should simply continue to sit from day to day. My own opinion, from what has been expressed, is that we should have no adjournment—although there will be nothing to do.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I would ask for the yeas and nays. The motion is that this House adjourn until eight o'clock on Tuesday evening, but, as the honourable leader of the Government has asked, I would be willing to change that to three o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: If we are going to adjourn for several days for the purpose of accommodating honourable gentlemen who are leaving the city and will be coming back, let us have until eight o'clock on Tuesday evening.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I have no objection to leaving the motion unchanged.

The motion was agreed to by a standing vote: yeas, 17; nays, 9.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, August 14, at eight o'clock in the evening.

PRIVATE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill 39, an Act respecting The Toronto, Hamilton and Buffalo Railway Company. —Hon. Mr. Milne.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 73, an Act to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act, Hon. Mr. McSweeney in the Chair.

On section 1—definitions added:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Can the honourable leader of the Government give us an explanation as to why these alterations are being made in the definitions?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is to make the Act on the Statute Book more intelligible. These additional interpretations are given simply to do away with any misinterpretation that may be placed upon the phraseology of the existing Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But in this case it simply says:

"Fish" does not include shellfish and crustaceans.

It does not seem to be very clear under that definition what fish is. It seems rather a curious way of putting it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The definition simply excludes those particular kinds of fish. If the Act originally was not intended to include shellfish and crustaceans, and if sometimes they are known as fish, or referred to as shellfish, it is desirable so to state. That is the only reason I can give.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But I do not find in the Act that there is any reference to fish in the previous definitions.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The term "fish" is used all through the Act.

The section was agreed to.

On section 2—fish, etc., canneries to be subject to inspection; cans, etc., to be marked:

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: In common with the leader of the Opposition I think that this Bill, all through, is more or less inconsidered. What its genesis is I am at a loss to know. With regard to its effect on salmon and other fish not coming under the head of crustaceans, I am not going to quarrel, because I am not in a position to know how it will affect them; but when we come to section 2, which affects and specifically means the lobster industry, an industry in the Maritime Provinces whose output amounts to three and a half million dollars a year, the regulations are altogether out of keeping with the conditions as at present prevailing, and are very mischievous for the industry, and would, if adopted, work very great hardship. Paragraph a of subsection 12A of section 2 provides that the cans shall be marked with:

The initials of the Christian names, the full surname and the address, or, in the case of a firm or corporation, the firm or corporation name and address or the name and address of the packer or of the fish dealer obtaining it direct from the packer.

Now, honourable gentlemen, let me tell you that the European market, which to-day is two-thirds of our whole market, will not have a lobster can marked with or having a label bearing the name or the surname or any other mark of the fisherman in this Dominion; and, if you insist upon such a mark being placed on the can, the European importer will not accept it. To explain why that is, I would say that those men are large distributors. Before the war they distributed fish to Germany, to Scandanavia, and to the smaller countries of Europe. As you know, lobsters are a delicacy, and the large dealers at Havre and at Nantes, and the large dealers of Britain, imported them, held them in storage for a time, and then distributed them to the various centres of Europe. Those men had established a reputation for their product, because their label was placed on the can, and that mark went, and not the mark of the smaller individual packers in the different places from which the lobsters came. In this connection I may say that the Maritime Provinces, Newfoundland, and the Gaspé coast of Quebec are the chief centres from which canned lobsters are obtained at the present time. To use a label and get it established on the European market would entail, as you can readily understand, a great deal of trouble and a great deal of advertising; therefore, a man in a small way of business, or even in what we would consider a large way, in this country, would be unable to fulfil the conditions necessary to put his product on the market. So under existing conditions, the large dealers, the men who import hundreds of thousands of cases of these goods, require the packer on this side to send the cans burnished and with no other mark than his initials on the box. If this section of the Bill were put into effect it would exclude altogether such shipments at the present time.

It is proposed, further, that the cans shall be marked with:

A true and correct description of the contents of the can, including the vernacular name and the minimum net weight of the fish or shellfish in the can plainly printed in a conspicuous manner, and the name of the place where the same was packed.

Now, to put all that on a label would entail a great deal of expense. The labelling would cost the producer 40 cents a case, which is very often the net profit, and sometimes more, to the man who produces these goods—and why? Under the conditions as they are to-day understood, a man in Nantes, for instance, telegraphs to the packer or producer here and asks, "Quote me so and so, clear, polished cans, of a certain weight." They are known on the European market as pounds, half-pounds and quarters, and that market usually wants quarters or halves. The importer who cables asks for the cans clear, but the Bill proposes that stickers shall be placed on them. That is what it means. I do not see what else could be done. It would be necessary for the packer to place on his tins his name and address, and a description of the contents. This requirement would exclude his pack altogether; the importer would simply not buy it. It takes years and years to develop an industry of this kind; and the men who have been engaged in this business for thirty of forty years know full well that it would be absolutely impossible at the present time to sell to European buyers under these conditions.

There is in this Bill another objectionable clause—paragraph 4 of 12A:

Provided, however, that if it is established to the satisfaction of the Governor in Council that the labelling of the cans of fish or shellfish as prescribed by this section hinders the sale of the same in foreign markets or in the markets of the United Kingdom, he may exempt such cans of fish or shellfish as are exported to such markets from the provisions, or any one or more of the provisions, of this section.

Now, just imagine a man who had made a sale of 500 cases of lobsters to be shipped direct to France, having to go to the Governor in Council to get an order to exempt those cans for shipment. The thing, to my mind, is an absurdity, and I think it will be regarded as an absurdity by all of you honourable gentlemen who know anything about business matters.

Then we come to subclause 12D, regarding weights—and this is probably the provision which would affect the industry more than any other. Let us turn to the draft Bill, which was supposed to have been drafted by the experts of the department. I cannot agree even with the experts of the department. This subclause 12D provides:

Cans of lobster shall contain the following minimum amounts of dry lobster meat:

"Dry lobster meat" is defined in section 1 of the Bill. I quote now from the draft Bill, sent over by the experts of the Department of Marine and Fisheries to be dealt with in the House of Commons, for what reason I do not know:

A one-pound can, 13 ounces, avoirdupois.

It will at once strike you as strange that 13 ounces should make up a pound can of meat, but in the packing of lobster, unlike the packing of meat, or salmon, or fruit, it is necessary to have a certain amount of pickle-gravy or juice, and that is essential to the proper preservation of the lobster, and just as essential as the meat is itself. especially when you make a salad from it. Thirteen ounces is too little. The standard the world over for a pound can of lobsters is 14 ounces of meat and 2 ounces of pickle. The pickle, with its delicate qualities, is just as essential as the meat. This is not the only objection that I have to the Bill. If the full quantity of meat is put into the can there is no room for the brine. I suppose there are to-day probably a million standard cans which have not been used, and if this legislation were passed they could not be used, and would have to be destroyed. There is another difficulty. A man is used to buying the standard can containing 14 ounces of meat and 2 ounces of pickle. Suppose a man in England or France wired for 1,000 cases of lobster. By reason of having to put two extra ounces of lobster in a can the packer would have to quote a higher price, because the lobster meat costs more than the brine, and if he quoted a figure 15 or 20 per cent higher than usual the buyer would naturally come to the conclusion that something was wrong. When he came to re-sell the goods there would be the same difficulty. As I said before, I think the Bill is ill-advised and would work untold injury to the lobster industry throughout the Maritime Provinces. According to the Year Book of 1914 the lobster industry of the Maritime Provinces amounted to three and a half millions of canned lobsters, of which quantity Prince Edward Island packed eight or nine hundred thousand. Honourable gentlemen can imagine the furore in the constituency which I represent if this legislation were passed.

In considering this Bill I have had the advice of a member of this House who is a pioneer in the lobster industry, a gentleman appointed by the Government on the Shellfish Commission that laid down the present regulations governing this industry; and he, like myself, is diametrically and absolutely opposed to this Bill.

There is another matter that I should like to mention. The last clause of the Bill says:

> Any can of fish or shellfish not labelled or marked in accordance with the provisions of this Act or of the regulations before being offered or exposed for sale by retail shall be forfeited to His Majesty, and may be seized by any inspector, or by any customs, excise or police officer, or by any constable.

Labelling costs 40 cents a case, which is very often the average profit on 2,000 cases. If the Bill is proceeded with—which I do not think it will be—I will move that the regulations respecting the lobster industry be stricken out. After advisement with the honourable leader of the Government, and understanding that the Bill will stand over until he has further consulted with the Fisheries Department, I shall say nothing further on this occasion.

Hon. JOHN McLEAN: I scarcely know why the Department of Marine and Fsheries has sent up this Bill. During the last thirty-five years lobsters have been sold with the understanding that a pound can contained 14 ounces of meat, and this standard has come to be recognized on the other side of the Atlantic. If these regulations were followed, and the same standard of can were used, after three or four months the lobsters would become very dry and very unsuitable for the market. The present standard is recognized all over the world. I understand that there have been one or two lawsuits based on the claim that the half-pound can did not contain a half-a-pound of lobster. For that reason I can understand why there should be some regulation as to weight, and why the department, after having investigated this matter, proposed the provision that a pound can should contain 13 ounces of lobster.

It is absolutely impossible for one of our dealers to sell lobsters in Europe under his own label. A dealer in France, England, Norway and Sweden—or a few years ago in Germany—simply wants an identification letter and his own name on the cases, he puts his own label on the cases, sells them and guarantees them, and looks to the shipper to make good any leaks that may take place. The cases are all identified in this way. For instance, a thousand cases are shipped to a man in Havre, and the letter D is put on them, or the letter E or F, and they are guaranteed against leaks. If there is any leakage, it is claimed that there are so many leaks in letter D, E, or F, as the case may be.

I cannot understand why the House of Commons changed this Bill after it came to them. I think the Fisheries Department was right with respect to lobsters, except as to weight. At the present time, if lobsters are shipped from Canada to the United States they have to be labelled or they will not be accepted; in addition, a sticker has to be put on saying, "This package contains 6½ ounces of meat." I have been in this business for thirty-five years, and the orders come in this way: "Quote lowest price on 1,000 cases half-pound, 500 quarter-pound, so many three-quarter pound, bright, unlabelled lobsters." If we put our labels on the cans, the people on the other side would have to put their own labels over them, or else take ours off and then put their own on. The man on the other side who receives the lobsters guarantees them to the people to whom he sells, and we have to stand behind him and guarantee them to him. Instead of putting our name on we put his name on to identify him as the receiver of these goods. It would be very unreasonable to expect those people to understand a change of this kind.

which would necessitate quoting a price next spring, which would probably be 20 per cent higher than the present quotation. I think if the regulation were allowed to remain as it came from the Department of Marine and Fisheries it would be all right so far as lobsters are concerned.

Another clause which I would like to refer to says:

Any can of fish or shellfish not labelled or marked in accordance with the provisions of this Act or of the regulations before being offered or exposed for sale by retail, shall be forfeited to His Majesty.

That regulation has never been recognized by the lobster industry in the Maritime Provinces. It cost almost a cent a can to put labels on. If a man wants to advertise his goods he puts a label on; if not, he puts them in a bright unlabelled can. In the manufacture of cans we use tin cut in sheets 14 inches by 20, and 12 by 12. If the size of the can is changed even a quarter of an inch it would necessitate using a different size sheet of tin and different machinery would be required to manufacture the cans. In Prince Edward Island we have established a can-making industry. The machinery in that plant cost about $30,000. In the American Can Company it cost probably $1,000,000. Because of the small production of lobsters this year there are millions of these cans on hand to-day, and, if this regulation went into force they would all be useless.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I should like to say just a word or two with respect to this Bill. Clause 2 looks reasonable enough. It says:

All fish and shellfish canneries shall be inspected as provided by the regulations. All fish and shellfish packed in cans shall be subject to inspection during the whole course of preparation and packing and all such cans shall be marked with the initials of the Christian names, the full surname and the address, or, in the case of a firm or corporation, the firm or corporation name and address or the name and address of the packer or of the fish dealer obtaining it direct from the packer.

It seems reasonable and proper that the name and address of the person who puts up the fish should be on the package so that the purchaser will know whose fish he is buying, but I happen to know of one case which completely bears out what has been said by the honourable gentleman from Souris (Hon. Mr. McLean) and the honourable gentleman from Tignish (Hon. Mr. Murphy). Looking at it from the point of view of the actual business done in lobsters, this clause, if passed and enforced, would cause very serious loss and inconvenience. I happen to have been very well acquainted with a packer on the coast of Nova Scotia, some distance from Halifax. He has ceased to pack now. He put up the best fish that were put up in the Maritime Provinces.

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: Better than those put up in Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Mr. POWER: They were even better than those put up in Prince Edward Island. They had an exceptional reputation, so much so that they brought 10 cents a can more than the fish packed by the ordinary run of packers. This man had a brand of his own, the "Kingfisher" brand. He sold to a merchant in Halifax, who in turn sold to a merchant in Liverpool; yet, notwithstanding the high reputation of his goods and the fact that he had a well-known brand, the merchant in Liverpool insisted on putting his own brand on the goods. Although we may try to do what seems to be fair and reasonable, if that apparently reasonable act is going to seriously prejudice the business of lobster-packing, which is a very important one in the lower provinces, I trust that the Government will see that the amendments suggested by the two honourable gentlemen from Prince Edward Island are carried out. I do not find any fault with the department, but evidently the officer who drew this clause was not familiar with the way in which the business is transacted.

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: I believe that this clause requiring the name of the packer, as well as that of the man who received the goods, was put in expressly to catch those men who were packing lobsters after the season had expired, but I do not think it is right to spoil the whole of the business in order to accomplish that object. There are officers appointed for that purpose, and they should see to it that the law is observed.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I might broaden my condemnation of the Bill as it affects the lobster industry; I mean that I condemn the new clauses of the Bill in toto. The clause of the Bill that provides for inspection and the sanitary packing of the lobsters is perfectly proper, and that provision is incorporated in the Act as it now stands. But I take exception to the new clauses, in which an attempt is made, as I say, to bedevil the whole thing.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This question has been discussed from the point of view of the fisheries on the Atlantic coast, but I think it concerns also the fisheries of the Pacific. I cannot understand why it is proposed to put into effect this regulation making the cannery man mark his cans. All the objections that have been raised with regard to lobster fishing apply, I think, with regard to the salmon canneries on the Pacific coast. Heretofore, a large majority of the salmon packed on the Pacific coast has been sold to buyers outside of Canada, who insist on placing their own labels on the goods and will not take the labels of the Pacific Coast canneries. Up to the present time there has been no regulation about the marking of the cans, and there is no mark on the cans to show where they come from. As the honourable gentleman from Prince Edward Island has said, the man selling the fish guarantees that they are sound and good, and the dealer buys from canners whose reputation he knows, and upon whom he depends. I do not understand why it has been deemed necessaray to insist that these canners should stamp all their cans. I think that would interfere very largely with the business that is being carried on in the foreign market. It may be quite right with regard to Canada itself that those regulations should be enforced, as in that way a notice is given to the general public in Canada, who possibly do not buy through recognized dealers to the same extent; but, with regard to the export market, this proposal would affect the salmon canneries on the Pacific coast very materially. I do not know whether or not this point has been brought to the attention of the minister, but I hope he will consider it when considering the other matters.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one suggestion for the consideration of the committee and the honourable the leader of the Government. I do not find in the Bill anything requiring the packer to place upon the can the date when the fish is put into it, which, I think, would be a very important provision. For instance, when you go into a store and buy a can of salmon, you cannot tell by the can in what year the goods were packed. It may have been two or three years ago. Once in a while, in the province of Ontario, a case occurs of poisoning due to the consumption of canned salmon. I am not an expert and do not know, but it may be that the cause of the poisoning is that the salmon has been too long in the can. I am inclined to think that it would be in the interest of the public and also perhaps promote greater consumption if the date when the salmon were put up were placed upon the can. I may say that some years ago, in another place, the question of putting a date on small packages of seeds was discussed. Formerly, when you went into a store to buy a package of seeds, you found no date to show when they were put into the package; but for many years past the law has required that every package of seeds shall have stamped upon it the date when the seeds were put into it, so that an intending purchaser can find out. simply by picking up the package, just when they were put up. I think it would be in the interest of the canning industry if a similar provision were made in this Bill, that the date when the salmon is put into the can should be stamped upon it—perhaps not the exact day.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: The year.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Yes, I think that would be sufficient, or possibly the month would be better. In any case, I think that every can should have stamped upon it the year when it was packed. I believe that would be in the interest of the trade generally.

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: I may say, so far as the lobster industry is concerned, that the Government send inspectors to the Maritime Provinces and the goods must bear the Government labels, which are dated. Not every can, but every case must have a label upon it before it can be shipped. That is the identification mark. In that way the man buying lobsters knows when they were packed, whether in 1916 or in 1917. Of course, you cannot protect the public against a man taking the lobsters out of a case that was packed in 1915 or 1916 and putting them into a case marked 1917.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: Permit me to say that I do not think the stamping of the case would be sufficient. I speak subject to correction by my honourable friend, who knows very much more about the matter than I do; but my remarks were directed more particularly to the salmon industry, and I do not think it would be sufficient to have the stamp placed simply on the case. The case disappears, but the article itself goes upon the merchant's shelf and may stay there for six months. I think the date ought to be placed upon the can itself.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I agree with my honourable friend in so far as concerns the salmon industry; but I may tell him that in connection with the lobster industry there is very little danger, because the demand for lobsters is so much in excess of the supply at the present time that one year's production of lobsters never lasts until the next year's supply becomes available. Before the war the demand was much more in excess of the supply; but, even with the German market eliminated to-day, the demand for lobsters cannot be supplied.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It appears to me that the clauses of this Bill relating to lobsters are not very popular clauses. I would infer from what my honourable friends from Prince Edward Island have said that they almost disappove of these provisions. There happens to be in the House of Commons a standing committee on foods, and those honourable gentlemen very naturally incline to protect the consumer rather than the producer, and they have taken certain liberties with this Bill. I find that they have provided that in each can of lobsters there should be sixteen ounces instead of thirteen. That, I may say to my honourable friends, is the explanation, so far as I can ascertain, of the difference between the Bill that was introduced into the House of Commons and the Bill which is now before us. It is, I suppose, the most natural thing in the world for a consumer who goes into a store to buy a can of lobsters represented to contain a pound, to expect to receive sixteen ounces. It may be a little critical of him, but still there is the disposition on the part of the consumer to require that amount. I quite appreciate what my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Murphy) has said with regard to the pickle in the can. However, that is a matter which we shall have to take up with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

I have never seen any legislation introduced dealing with regulations and inspection that has met the entire approval of the producer. Parliament sometimes, as I have said, inclines to protect the consumer. Consequently when legislation of this kind is placed upon the statute-book it invariably is in the interest of the consumer. If honourable gentlemen will consider for a moment, they can very well understand a number of parliamentarians being desirous of protecting the interests of the consumer when they have to depend upon his vote.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Has there been any demand on the part of the consumers for this legislation?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, the consumer has to be protected by Parliament. I fancy that it is for the purpose of protecting the consumer that Parliament is in existence, and that members are elected in each constituency.

Hon. Mr. POWER: As I understand, the present sizes of cans have been in use for over thirty years, and the consumer, when he buys a pound can, knows that he is getting only fourteen ounces; so there is no deception.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He may know. However, I am not condemning the present practice.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: I should like to ask the honourable gentleman just one question; is this Bill formulated by a consumer?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should not think so.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE. It certainly never was formulated by a consumer.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say, so far as the label is concerned—and the criticism of the Bill seems to be very largely directed to the requirements regarding the label—there is a provision in the Bill, paragraph 4 of section 2, to the effect that by an Order in Council the labelling of the cans may be dispensed with. That exemption might possibly be enlarged to cover the export trade. And yet it is necessary to remember that it is in the interest of the consumer to label on the can the necessary information. All our fish is not exported; a very large proportion of it is not. And this Bill is not confined to lobsters; it deals with all classes of fish. Furthermore, is there any good reason why the product of Canada going into the foreign market should not be stamped to indicate to the consumers in that market that the goods are the product of Canada? Is it owing to our modesty that we dispense with that marking? Is it not valuable information to circulate in foreign countries?

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: Every case of lobsters must be marked with the name "Canada" written upon the side.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would say to my honourable friend that it is very seldom that a consumer takes a whole case of lobsters—unless he is very fond of them. I think, therefor, that it is defensible to ask that this information be placed upon the labels of our canned fish. It is being done in all other countries, so far as I know. It is being particularly enforced in the United States. Under their Pure Food law the United States require the most minute information to be placed upon the labels and packages of all food products. I understand that under our own laws this requirement is not confined to fish; my recollection is that it applies to fruit and many other products. It seems to me that cans containing food should, above all other classes of packages, bear the fullest information as to the contents and when they were packed. It seems to me, further, that we might possibly draw a distinction as between the export and the domestic trade. If this requirement should press very heavily upon the export, probably latitude might be allowed under paragraph 4 of section 2 to prevent any abuses.

As to the canning itself, honourable gentlemen will observe that under section 4 of the Bill it is not proposed to bring the Act into operation until the 15th day of December, 1918. That gives very nearly a year and a half for the exhaustion of the supply of cans which may be in stock. That would appear to me to be a very reasonable time allowance to prevent any wrong being done or any loss or damage being sustained by those who may have a very large stock of cans.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Would you suggest that 16 ounces of dry lobster meat and two ounces of pickle be put in the can, and that the packers should then use an 18-ounce can?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am within the judgment of the House as to whether we should exceed the 14 ounces. My honourable friends have said they approve of 14 ounces of dry lobster meat and two ounces of pickle.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Making a pound can?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. If it is the desire of the House that this point should be further considered, I shall take great pleasure in conveying the expressions of opinion, particularly by the honourable gentlemen from Prince Edward Island, to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and I would therefore move that this committee rise and report progress.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: The honourable the leader of the Government states that the Act would not come into effect until 1918, and that by that time all the cans now in stock would be used up; but may I tell the honourable gentleman and the House that the tin comes mostly from Great Britain and some from the United States, and that it is cut a certain size for a quarter-pound and another size for a half-pound can, so that there is no wastage. These are standard sizes. To make a can which would contain a pound of dry lobster meat and the necessary two ounces of pickle would simply demoralize the whole system; it would be necessary to make new standard sizes of tins, which would be a very difficult matter, because tin-makers have their own sizes.

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: Not only that, honourable gentlemen, but to make a can of a certain size it is necessary to use a sheet of tin of a certain size. Every particle of machinery that is used to make a pound can or a half-pound can or a three-quarter pound can would have to be changed. Instead of having 12 by 12 tin to make a three-quarter pound can, or a 14 by 20 to make the other sizes of cans, it would be necessary to get tin of entirely different sizes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I desire to point out to my honourable friend (Hon.Sir James Lougheed) that, in addressing the House, he did not deal with the question of the stamping of the tins; he dealt with the question of the label. Paragraph 4 of section 2 leaves it in the hands of the Governor in Council to allow the salmon or the lobster to be shipped without being labelled. That may be proper and that would overcome the difficulty as to the labelling, but not as to the stamping of the can.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Section 2 states that all cans shall be marked, but I should not take that to mean stamped.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does it mean simply the labelling?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me a label would suit that requirement.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I thought there was a new regulation requiring that the cans be stamped.

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: Take this season, for instance. The lobster production in the Maritime Provinces amounts to only about 60 per cent of the average, and the packers have cases and cans in stock for an ordinary season's pack. Therefore, 40 per cent of the cans will be left over. If the cans were stamped "1917," for instance, they could not be used at all next season.

It would not be a great hardship to require that a stamp be placed on every case stating, "This case has been packed in 1917," or that a little round sticker be placed on the can, "This package contains 6½ ounces of lobster packed in 1917." That should meet the needs; but to require that all the cans be stamped would mean that none of those left over from 1917 could be used in 1918.

Progress was reported.

A NEWSPAPER ARTICLE.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I should like to call the attention of this House to an article published in the Toronto World of the 12th of this month. It reads as follows:

Orangemen Meet For Celebration—Rev. Canon Walsh Gives a Heated Address in Dundurn Park — Against Profiteers — Mayor Booker Would Brand Them as Traitors and Shoot Them.

By a Staff Reporter.

Hamilton, Ont., Aug. 11.—That England and her allies were not fighting Germany but Romanism and that there was a possibility that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had always been and was an ordained priest were only two of the amazing statements uttered by Rev. Canon Walsh, P.G.M., Ontario, West Brampton, before thousands of Orangemen who were celebrating the Relief of Derry in Dundurn Park Saturday afternoon.

Cries of "Traitor"—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I rise to a point of order. I should be very sorry to interfere with my honourable friend, but I should like to know what this has to do with the business of the House. I cannot deprecate in too strong terms any references to expressions of animosity in journals over which Parliament has no control. I hope my honourable friends will not indulge in calling the attention of the House to inflammatory newspaper articles which are published from time to time.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I bow to the wishes of my honourable friend and will not read the article. I know that everybody will see it, so it is all the same. I intend to bring this matter up in a regular way so that a point of order will not be raised. The matter is only postponed.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 67, an Act to amend the Customs Act, Hon. Mr. Landry in the Chair.

On section 1—duties payable on Crown's goods:

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I think it would be hardly fair to adopt this section without amendment. This Act is retroactive, and I do not think it should be. The province of Manitoba has made a complaint against the Government collecting duties on goods imported by the Crown. Considerable correspondence on the subject has taken place between the Attorney General of Manitoba and the Minister of Customs. The last communication received by the Attorney General from the Minister of Customs said that the matter would not be dealt with until the Prime Minister was consulted. The only further notice the Attorney General of Manitoba received was the introduction of this Bill. There has been a doubt as to whether provinces had the right to import goods free of duty. Apparently this has been done up to date. When they supposed that they had that right it seems unfair to pass retroactive legislation to put them out of court. If it is the intention of Parliament that in future the provinces shall pay duty, very well, but this legislation should not be retroactive.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As I pointed out when this Bill was read a second time, if the contention be well founded that clause 125 of the British North America Act is effective, then of course this legislation would not in any way influence the subject-matter under dispute. That is to say, if the provinces under that section have the right to exemption from taxation, this could not possibly be disturbed by any legislation of this Parliament. Nothing except legislation by the Imperial Parliament could withdraw that right from them. Consequently there is nothing to interfere with the rights of the provinces according to their contention under the British North America Act. The object of this Bill is simply to declare what the Federal Government has always considered to be the law with regard to the imposition of duty upon goods brought into Canada by the provinces or by any government in Canada, and why there should be any objection to the Bill in face of the fact that the provinces have sought to invoke section 125 of the British North America Act, I cannot very well understand. Section 125 of the British North America Act reads as follows:

> No lands or property belonging to Canada or any province shall be liable to taxation.

The contention of the provinces being that a duty is a tax upon property, I may say that I can scarcely conceive of its being so held by a court. This clause must be interpreted ejusdem generis, namely, as referring to a tax placed upon lands or property of a tangible nature. If my honourable friends will look into other sections of the British North America Act, they will find the term " duty " used, not "tax." Consequently, I do not think it can be seriously contended that section 125 applies. However, as I have said, if the provinces have a right to exemption under clause 125, this Bill will not affect that right.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I cannot give my support to this Bill on the statement of my honourable friend. This is purely a declaratory Act. It can have no binding effect at all if it is in contravention of the British North America Act, which is an Imperial Act, and which can only be affected by another Imperial Act. Manifestly this Bill is brought in for the purpose of having put on record, in litigation pending between the Dominion Government and the provincial governments, what the contention of this Government is with regard to the right to collect duties on goods imported by the provincial governments. If that is so, it seems to me to be unfair. If it is for the purpose of prejudicing litigation now pending before the courts, it is, in my opinion, very bad legislation. Legislation of this kind could only be justified if it could change the law, and my honourable friend's statement shows that it cannot affect the law. If we could amend the British North America Act with regard to duties, we could amend it with regard to all the other provisions. It seems to me from my honourable friend's statement that the legislation is merely for the purpose of affecting matters now before the courts. It will not help the courts in arriving at a conclusion. The courts will not look at this Act to determine what is the meaning of the British North America Act. I am not expressing any opinion as to whether the Government of Canada has the right to collect duties on goods imported by the provinces for their own use; I am only expressing an opinion as to whether it is good legislation, and I cannot see that it is. I do not think my honourable friend has given any good reason why we should accept this Bill. It covers a period back to the time of Confederation. It says:

> The rates and duties of Customs imposed by this Act or the Customs Tariff or any other law relating to the Customs, as well as the rates and duties of Customs heretofore imposed by any Customs Act or Customs Tariff or any law relating to the Customs enacted and in force at any time since the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

Of course, if my honourable friend insists, he can carry the Bill, but I cannot give it my support.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The objections raised to this Act are that it is bad to pass legislation of this kind, which is retroactive and which puts the Government in the position of making a statement that has not so far been in the Customs Act. Heretofore, unless His Majesty is mentioned particularly in a statute, the statute is not supposed to apply to His Majesty; and this Bill is introduced for the special purpose of making the Customs Act apply to the Crown. The provisions of the Customs Act as it stands to-day do not make it possible for the Government to collect money from the Crown in the right of the provinces, and this legislation is introduced in order to enable the Dominion Government to collect money from the Crown in the right of the provinces. The other feature, the retroactive feature, is, I think, a very objectionable one, and one to which this House should not give its sanction. It would have a great effect on the situation throughout the country, because I presume, if the Act goes into force, the Dominion Government will be demanding from the provinces that they shall pay duty.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They have always done so, and we have collected duty.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Up to the present time?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: By what right has that been done?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: By the right that we have, as would appear under the Customs Act. The only difficulty is that the provinces have made their protest against payment; but this Government insists upon payment and has done so since Confederation.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I think that in at least one case the Government has admitted that the province was right, and after an exchange of correspondence, copies of which were laid on the table of this House a few days ago, the Minister of Customs repaid to the province of Manitoba the sum of $450.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but those were not dutiable goods.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Yes, they were dutiable. It was a gas-producer plant.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It was a remission of duty that could not and should not have been collected under the Customs Act.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Evidently the Government thought immediately afterwards that they had better introduce this legislation. The Government of the province of Manitoba has at the present time a claim against the Dominion Government for duties paid. It has paid in the last seven or eight years over one million dollars in duty on telephone appliances. This question was not so important to the provinces until a few years ago, because only in recent years have the provinces been taking over and conducting public utilities. The question is now one in which the people of the different provinces are vastly interested, and if a province has sufficient enterprise to undertake the operation of a public utility for the benefit of the people, why should it have to pay taxes? It seems to me unfair. It seems to me that the words "or have been heretofore" should be struck out. If the Government intend to announce a policy that shall be followed for the future, that is all right; but they certainly should not pass retroactive legislation. The province of Manitoba has asked for a suit against the Dominion Government for the recovery of the duties paid on goods imported into Manitoba for the Crown, and I do not think its case should be prejudiced by the passing of legislation of this kind.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think it is worth while looking again at section 125 of the British North America Act, to ascertain what the meaning of the word "property" is as used in the Act, and whether a tax imposed upon goods brought in by a province can be construed as being a tax on its property. The word "property" occurs in section 91, which defines the powers of the Parliament of Canada. The first thing assigned to the Parliament of Canada is "the public debt and property;" then, in paragraph 2, "the regulation of trade and commerce;" in paragraph 3, "the raising of money by any mode or system or taxation." Again, in the third schedule at the end of the Act, you will find an enumeration of "provincial public works and property to be the property of Canada." Then, again, in the 4th schedule you will find "assets to be the property of Ontario and Quebec conjointly." So it is quite clear, I think, if you take the Act as a whole, that the word "property" used in section 125 in connection with the public lands—"no lands or property"—refers to the "property" mentioned in subsection 1 of section 91 and to the "property" mentioned in those two schedules. For that reason I am very strongly of opinion that in no sense can the imposition of a customs duty upon property that is being brought into any one of the provinces be deemed to be a violation of the terms of section 125 of the British North America Act.

With regard to the argument of the honourable leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock), that where the Crown is not mentioned it must be assumed that the Crown is exempted, I think that is perfectly true so far as legislation within the jurisdiction of this Parliament is concerned; but it must be remembered that the provincial legislatures are organizations entirely distinct from the Federal Parliament; and I would submit that while the rule referred to by my honourable friend is quite sound with regard to the legislation of this Parliament, it has no application at all to the Crown as it is represented in the different provinces.

That that must necessarily be so is made very clear when we endeavour to find out what would happen if the contrary construction were put upon the rule; and if what my honourable friend from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) says is a correct opinion of the matter, if the property brought into the provinces for the Crown were not susceptible of taxation, or were exempted in any way, it is conceivable that the customs might cease altogether to be a source of revenue, because it is possible that, if not absolutely, yet to a very great extent, all the provincial governments might go into public business, or make public business of what is now private business. Suppose a province went into agriculture: it would bring in all agricultural implements. The provincial government could engage in any kind of business; and, according to the argument set up by either the honourable leader of the Opposition or the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie, there would be nothing left upon which the customs law could operate. So, after all, what we have to do is to treat the Act as being a working constitution; and, in order to work it out, it is absolutely necessary that this word "property" should be given the meaning that it gets in other sections of the British North America Act, and that the rule with regard to the naming of the Crown should be confined to our own constitution and to Federal legislation, and should not apply at all to the provinces.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am not disposed to quarrel with the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) as to the meaning of section 125 of the British North America Act. I have not examined the question, but my first impression would be that taxes on "property" would not refer to customs duty. But the honourable gentleman goes further. He admits that, although the provinces might not be exempt from paying customs duties under section 125, they might be exempt from having to pay duty on property imported by them, for the reason mentioned by the honourable leader of the Opposition, namely, because the Crown is represented by the provinces as well as by the Dominion. He disposes of that argument by stating that it would be true if we were dealing with an Act of this Parliament, but that, as we are dealing with an Act passed by the Imperial Parliament, the doctrine does not apply. I could understand that the doctrine would not apply if the Imperial Act had stated in express terms that duties could be levied on property of the Crown as represented by the provinces; but, in the absence of any legislation on that point, I submit that the presumption which is admitted by the honourable gentleman from Middleton applies in the present case, and therefore, that any property belonging to the Crown as represented by a province would not be subject to duty. That, I think, would dispose of the argument of the honourable gentleman.

But there is more than that. The honourable leader of the Government has stated the reason why this Bill should be passed: it is merely for the purpose of declaring what is the interpretation given by this Parliament to the law as it stands. I doubt if the honourable gentleman will maintain that reason as one to be stated in the courts. However, the question is raised. Surely we are not going to enact a law merely for the purpose of saying what is the interpretation of Parliament of its own legislation. Laws are passed by Parliament and the interpretation of them is left to the courts, and it is for the Attorney General or the Minister of Justice to urge before the courts what is the interpretation placed by the Federal Parliament on the law as passed. There must be some other reason for this extraordinary law. We should hesitate, as on every occasion we have hesitated, to enact any retroactive legislation. Either the property imported is subject to duty or it is not. If it is subject to duty, we cannot affect it. The honourable leader of the Government admits that. If it is not, any declaration which we might make, in one direction or the other, would have no effect. If the property imported can be taxed, then why attempt to make a declaration which would be illegal? But we go further: we do not merely make a declaration for the future, but we declare that from the time of Confederation the imports of the provinces are subject to duty. That is clearly retroactive, and it is retroactive, as I understand, in the face of claims made by two different provinces. But even if there had been no claims made, I would for my part object to that kind of legislation.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) seemed to think that under section 108 of the British North America Act this Bill was legitimized, so to say. Now, section 108 says:

The public works and property of each province, enumerated in the Third Schedule to this Act, shall be the property of Canada.

We look at the third schedule, and we find certain provincial public works and property to be the property of Canada. Those were canals, public harbours, and so on. Now, those were all works which had belonged to the separate provinces before Confederation, and the object of section 108 was to declare that the works which had belonged to the provinces before the Union were after the Union to be the property of Canada. They were, then, from the 1st of July, 1867, the property of Canada. Consequently, section 125, which says:

No lands or property belonging to Canada or any province shall be liable to taxation—could not refer to the property mentioned in section 108, because that property after the Union did not belong to the provinces. So I do not think there is very much weight in that particular argument.

I quite agree with the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) in the view that ex post facto legislation as such is most objectionable and should be refrained from. As I think I said at the second reading of this Bill, such an Act as this could not be passed by the Congress of the United States, because it is forbidden by the United States constitution, and I think it is to be regretted that it is not forbidden by our constitution.

There is also the point referred to by the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), that it is proposed that this Bill shall be effective from the year 1867—that its effect shall extend back 50 years, so that the provinces shall be liable to pay duty on everything which has been imported during those 50 years duty free. I think that is a most extraordinary thing. It is practically putting it in the power of the Parliament of Canada or the Government of Canada to trump up heavy charges against the various provinces. Now, if the honourable gentleman wished to do what was reasonable, even according to his own theory, the reasonable thing would be to recognize the statute of limitations, and say that as to goods which had been imported since the 1st of July, 1911, the duty should be payable; but to go back 50 years seems to me a most extraordinary and indefensible thing.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: While I should be sorry to advocate in a general way retroactive legislation where recognized vested rights were being interfered with or extinguished, I think this is an entirely different case. It may be called retroactive legislation; but here is a condition of affairs that has lasted since Confederation. A few years ago the province of Nova Scotia did raise the point whether or not it was liable for the payment of duty upon goods brought in by that province. It did not assert its claim in more than an academic way. Shortly afterwards the province of Quebec raised the same point. But, notwithstanding the fact that the courts have been open to the different provinces of Canada to assert their claims to exemption, if they had tenable grounds upon which to urge it, they have not done so; they have continued to acquiesce in the payment of duties to the Government of Canada notwithstanding their right to redress in the courts.

It is not desirable that there should exist a condition of things, extending back to Confederation, by which claims may be revived which were never thought of by the provinces during that period of time. This legislation is placed before Parliament on the advice of the Department of Justice, contemplating possibly that the question will be tried in the courts, particularly as to the interpretation of the British North America Act. I cannot very well appreciate permitting, if we can avoid it, an unsatisfactory condition of that kind to continue as between the Federal Government and the different provinces of Canada, in view of the fact that they have acquiesced in it since Confederation. It seems to me that it is not sufficient to justify the position taken by the provinces, to say that they have controverted the right of the Federal Government respecting the question when, as I have already stated, redress was open to them through the Exchequer Court to have a proper interpretation placed upon the Act, and they have not availed themselves of it. It is therefore, in view of that fact, that this, as I might call it, quieting legislation is being placed upon the statute book, and I should be very sorry to see it construed or tortured to mean retroactive legislation. It is simply for the purpose of quieting this question, which has arisen from year to year, which has never been determined by the courts, and which the provinces apparently have no intention of testing in the courts; and it is in the interest of the Federal exchequer that the provinces should pay duty on the goods which they import, the same as individuals and corporations.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend says that this is quieting legislation. It cannot quiet anything. Whatever be the object of this legislation, it is being brought to the wrong door. The right to levy customs duties is created by the British North America Act. We cannot change that, no matter how often we pass an Act similar to this; so the proposed legislation is useless in that regard, not only as affecting past claims or present litigation, but also for the future.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will, I think, concede that this legislation will not influence that contention.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I argue that it cannot. It cannot affect the question one way or the other; it cannot affect the British North America Act or the claims before the courts; so the Bill is utterly and absolutely useless. If it is intendet as a declaration for the future—to use my honourable friend's own words, to quiet claims in the future—it is absolutely useless. We cannot make any declaratory statement in regard to an Act over which we have no control. We cannot by legislation interpret any Imperial Act. This is absolutely useless legislation, notwithstanding any view that my honourable friend wishes to take. It is not worth the paper on which it is written, it does not matter what the object is. Consider the position in which this Parliament would be placed if this question were litigated and went before the courts. They would not look at this Act, and, if they did, it would be simply to say that Parliament had dealt with something that it had no right to deal with.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: It might be interesting to put on record some of the correspondence in connection with this matter. I find that on February 6, 1917, the Attorney General of Manitoba addressed the Minister of Customs as follows:

Winnipeg, Man., Feb. 6, 1917.

Re Pay Stations and Customs Duty.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 31st ulto., addressed to Mr. Allen, my deputy.

I take it you will have no objection to having the point in dispute decided by the courts.

On the 26th ulto., Mr. Allen wrote your Commissioner of Customs asking that the matter be referred to the courts by yourself under the provisions of the "Exchequer Court Act." I enclose you a copy of said letter of the 26th ulto. to the commissioner, which explains itself.

On page 643 of Clement's Canadian Constitution published in 1915 there is the following paragraph:

"Taxation of Crown Property:—The constitutional restriction imposed by section 125 applies to both Federal and provincial Governments; but the only cases in which it has been invoked are cases in which provincial taxation, either general or municipal, has been questioned. The section, it is conceived, was unnecessary. It was not intended to affect the general rule as to the exemption of Crown property from taxation as that rule is applied, for example, in England or in a colony under one legislature only. It was inserted by way of abundant caution to prevent the Dominion from levying taxes for federal purposes upon property held by the Crown for provincial purposes and vice versa. It would operate no doubt to exempt from customs duties goods purchased abroad by a provincial government, though there is no reported case on this point."

The Government of this province submits that the property of the province cannot be taxed by way of customs duties and that the pay stations in question here should be admitted free of duty.

I note that you have been advised that the view of this province is not correct. Hence I am sure you will agree with me that the question is one which merits a reference to the courts at once so as to set the point at rest.

Will you kindly advise me as early as possible as to whether or not you will refer the matter to the courts under the above mentioned "Exchequer Court Act?"

If you do not care to refer the matter to the courts will you approve of a flat being granted to enable this province to proceed in the matter by petition of right?

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) A. B. Hudson,
Attorney General.

On January 23, 1917, the following letter was sent to the Deputy Attorney General:

Ottawa, January, 23, 1917.

Re Pay Stations and Customs Duty.

Sir,—I am in receipt of your letter of the 20th instant re the above, and note the Government of Manitoba is importing 25 No. 102 Gray pay stations from Messrs. Kellogg Switchboard & Supply Co., of Chicago.

I note you claim these pay stations should be admitted free of customs duty by virtue of section 125 of the British North America Act.

In reply I beg leave to say that I do not interpret section 125 of the British North America Act in this way, and therefore I cannot permit the articles mentioned to be imported without payment of customs duty as prescribed by the tariff passed by Parliament.

I may say that customs duties have been collected on all importations made by provincial governments since Confederation. A similar claim was made by a provincial government in 1909, under the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the view of the Prime Minister of that day was the same as expressed in this letter.

Yours faithfully,

(Sgd.) J. D. Reid.

On February 12, 1917, the Minister of Customs sent this letter to the Attorney General:

Ottawa, February 12, 1917.

Re Pay Stations and Customs Duty.

Dear Sir:

I am in receipt of your letter of the 6th instant, with reference to the above. I am sorry to say that on account of absence from this city I did not receive your reply until after the Prime Minister had left Ottawa for overseas.

I would not care to have any action taken on this matter until after the Prime Minister's return, as of course the matter is a very important one. I would ask, therefore, that under the circumstances you let the whole matter stand until his return. I will then submit all the correspondence in connection with it to him, and have an immediate reply sent to you.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) J. D. Reid.

The only reply to the Attorney General of Manitoba is the Bill which is now before this House. I do not think it is fair, and I do not think that we should attempt to settle this matter in this way. It is claimed by legal gentlemen here that this would have no effect on the British North America Act; but it seems to me that if Parliament expressed an opinion on what should have been done, it might have weight and might prejudice the claims of the province of Manitoba. I mention Manitoba because I am particularly interested there; but other provinces, namely, Nova Scotia and Quebec, have taken the same view. If the Government wanted to make the provinces pay duty on all goods imported in the future, that would be all right; but I think it would be unfair to make this legislation retroactive.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I may draw the attention of this honourable House to the fact that this legislation—as I stated the other day—is not only retroactive, but is retroactive in the face of the protest made by one of the provinces. That aggravates the position.

Hon. Mr. Watson moved to strike out section 1.

The motion was negatived.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I appeal to the honourable the leader of the House to make an amendment in the 12th and 13th lines of the Bill so as to remove the retroactive effect of the measure by substituting the words "one thousand nine hundred and seventeen" for the words "one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven."

Hon. Mr. WATSON.

The Bill was reported without amendment.

CONSERVATION OF CANADIAN TRADE.

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS moved that the third report of the special committee appointed to inquire into and report upon the best method or methods of conserving and increasing our domestic and overseas trade, etc., be concurred in.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the report, which has been published in the Proceedings of the Senate, speaks for itself. It is quite full and specific in its recommendations, and I venture to hope that the subject matter dealt with will receive full consideration at the hands of this House, and will be discussed by those gentlemen most competent to give their opinions on the various subjects. The recommendations are:

1. That the Government should, without delay, endeavour to encourage the breaking of a large acreage of wild lands in order that such new soil may be ready for cultivation next year and our productive capacity thereby increased;

2. That if it is found necessary, in order to encourage farmers to bring additional acreage under cultivation, that a bounty of a certain sum per acre be paid for each and every acre of wild land put under cultivation and off which a crop is raised during the next ensuing two years;

3. That consideration be given by the Government to the advisability of requesting the co-operation of the several provinces, so that any amount paid out in bounties would be shared by the Dominion Government and the provincial governments respectively.

It has been thought by some members of the committee who listened to certain representations that the breaking of wild land and placing it under cultivation would add largely to the wealth of the country. It would also be a boon to the Allies, and in my judgment would go very largely towards preventing the balance of trade receding, which has been in our favour during the last few years. I have no doubt that honourable gentlemen of this House are aware that the balance of trade for the twelve months ending June 30, 1917, receded to the extent of $25,000,000 below that of the preceding twelve months. We must realize that the prosperity which we are at present enjoying is largely due to the manufacture of munitions and other war supplies, and the exportation of a very large tonnage of grain at very high prices, all of which cannot continue. Therefore it has been suggested, more particularly by the honourable gentleman from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Richardson), that the Government should favourably consider the paying of a bounty on all new wild lands brought under cultivation.

Another fact which is dealt with in the report is that it is almost impossible to secure labour for farming purposes; and it is felt that the proposed bounty would largely absorb the difference that the farmers would have to pay in the way of higher wages in order to secure the necessary help. Probably two weeks ago I, in common with other manufacturers, received a letter from Sir William Hearst, Premier of Ontario, urging all manufacturers, if at all possible, to allow as many of the members of their staffs, both office and operative staffs, to go to work on the farms in order that the crops might be saved and that a great deal of our produce should not be wasted. Unfortunately, I have not that particular letter with me, as I mislaid it. I will read an item from the Montreal Star, in reference to the number of hands that are required in the Northwest:

Harvesting to start on August 20.

James Morrison, assistant general passenger agent, to-day received the following advice from Winnipeg, following a meeting held there this morning between representatives of the Dominion, Provincial Governments of the West and the railways:

"The harvest will commence throughout all the Provinces on August 20. The meeting to-day decided 36,000 harvesters are required from Eastern Canada to arrive in Winnipeg, August 20; 20,000 for Saskatchewan, 9,000 for Manitoba, 7,000 for Alberta. Wages will be from $3 per day up with board."

Another item, which is from a Toronto newspaper, reads as follows:

A significant statement was made by Hon. W. J Hanna, Dominion Food Controller, yesterday at a meeting of manufacturers from all parts of the province, called by the Organization of Resources Committee of Ontario for the purpose of placing before the manufacturing interests the seriousness of the farm help problem, and the immediate necessity of securing men to save a large part of the 1917 crop from destruction, which is feared if volunteer workers are not forthcoming within the next week or so.

Mr. Hanna said:

"We don't want to say 'must' if you will get the men to the farms. It is imperative that every ounce of the crops shall be saved. In order to accomplish this I am appealing to every employer of labour to release all the men possible without detracting from the immediate work of war. The Government desires to avoid compulsion, if it is possible to obtain the services of ten thousand men voluntarily."

In response to that appeal a meeting was held, which was largely attended, and one of the first questions that came up for discussion was as to who should pay the difference between what the farmer felt himself able to pay and the amount of the volunteer's ordinary wages. The volunteer would have to sacrifice the difference or would have to receive it from some other source if the farmers were unable to pay it. It was suggested that the Ontario Government should pay the difference, but I believe that finally the manufacturers agreed to absorb the difference, notwithstanding that they are rather heavily taxed in the way of special taxation at the present time.

Now, we are dealing with a very big question, honourable gentlemen, and it seems to me that this method by which we expect to reap our crop, by getting clerks not accustomed to farm labour and every other class of the community to volunteer to go out and reap the crop, will provide us at the best with labour that will be inefficient. I think it should be the duty of some central authorities, either the Federal Government or the Provincial Governments, to deal with such an important question and to deal with it promptly and in a decisive way. After all, agriculture is the foundation of our prosperity. We are reading about our crops, and expect a great harvest that will add materially to the wealth of the country; and yet we are delaying until within two or three weeks of the time that these crops must be gathered before making any provision for harvesting them, and then our method is to hold a few meetings of manufacturers and others and ask that their clerks and other employees shall rush out to the farm lands and do work to which they are entirely unaccustomed, otherwise the crops cannot be saved and there will be a tremendous wastage. In that connection your committee went further and suggested some alternatives. We say:

As alternatives to the payment of a bounty, your Committee advise that the possibility of adopting either or both of the following methods of coping with the shortage of farm labour be considered by the Dominion and Provincial Governments:

1. That where an owner or tenant of wild lands is willing to cultivate the whole or a portion thereof, but is debarred from so doing by reason of lack of capacity to pay for breaking the same or his inability to secure the necessary labour, that the Governments break the land with traction engines, charging a moderate price therefor and extending the payment for such breaking over a term of several years;

2. That as a war measure only and for a period to be limited to the duration of war, Asiatic labour be imported under Government control and supervision, that is to say, that during the period from seeding to harvesting farmers shall be furnished by a central authority at a fixed charge, with such imported labour as they may require.

The report of the committee further says:

Your Committee realize the objections that may be raised and with which under normal conditions they would be in accord. Present war conditions, however, call for heroic remedies. The shortage of farm labour must be met and the method of meeting it must be prompt and decisive, if our present production of wheat and other cereals is to be maintained, let alone increased. It would be found that such imported labour by aiding increased production would greatly assist the Allies in the prosecution of the war to a successful conclusion and would be a vital factor in obviating the threatened food shortage in Great Britain and would by reason of a great increase in the area of agricultural lands brought under cultivation, add greatly to our national wealth and become a prime factor in absorbing the national debt—largely increased by reason of the war. Proper provisions could be made that imported labour would be restricted to such localities and be availed of only at such times as would not interfere with the employment of white labour whenever and wherever such was available.

This is not the only country which has experienced a similar condition. South Africa, after the war, experienced the necessity of importing labour, and I have before me a volume, which I will not read, but to which I will simply refer. It is a publication by the Imperial Government, volume 14 of Accounts and Papers, dealing with "Colonies and British Possessions." It contains a document entitled, "Convention between the United Kingdom and China respecting the Employment of Chinese Labour in British Colonies and Protectorates." The information can be gathered by any honourable gentleman who is interested; but the fact remains that the question was very fully debated by various authorities—the Transvaal Government, the Cape Colony Government, and other governments in South Africa; and finally the principle of employing Chinese labour was adopted, under, however, special restrictions, which provided that every Chinaman must be registered, and track should be kept of him, that he should be brought over for a specific purpose, and that after his special contract had been completed he should be returned to the same port of entry in China from which he had started.

I know there is a great deal of objection to contract labour or Chinese labour; but I know also that these are special times, when all precedents fail, and I think that the most important matter that this Government can possibly have before it at the present time is not only to save the harvesting of the crop from the area cultivated, but to increase the acreage under cultivation to the greatest extent that labour can be procured to cultivate it. To-day there is a shortage of labour. Next year, with conscription in force, or some other method of adding to the number of our men to be withdrawn, and rightly withdrawn, for the defence of the Empire, the importance of the consideration of such a question as this will be even more obvious.

I may point out that France is at present importing tens of thousands of Chinese labourers, under a special contract, as was done in the Transvaal, and as it is suggested should be done here. I may tell this honourable House also, if honourable gentlemen are not aware, that not only have many tens of thousands of Chinese labourers already passed through the country, but I am given to understand that thousands of them are at present in camp in this country waiting to be sent over to France, and are detained here simply owing to lack of transportation, and that they will be forwarded as quickly as they can be.

Here we have this state of affairs. We have thousands of willing and energetic labourers being housed and fed here, when they could do the necessary work—when 36,000 harvesters will be required in the Northwest within the next few weeks. The possibility occurs to me that the services of these Chinamen, who are now being housed and fed at great expense and until such time as they can be forwarded across the Atlantic, might be utilized in this country.

In closing, I may say, so far as the bounty is concerned, that the principle has been recognized in Bill No. 116, which was passed in this House last week, entitled "An Act to assist returned soldiers in settling upon the land and to increase agricultural production." I notice that section 5 of that Bill says:

The Board may loan to a settler an amount not exceeding two thousand five hundred dollars for any of the following purposes:

(a) The acquiring of land for agricultural purposes;

(b) The payment of incumbrances on lands used for agricultural purposes;

(c) The improvement of agricultural land;

(d) The erection of farm buildings;

(e) The purchase of stock machinery and equipment; and

(f) Such other purpose or purposes as the Board may approve.

(2) The money loaned shall be expended under the supervision of the Board.

It is true that this Act applies only to returned soldiers, but so far as it goes it will aid in increasing production while aiding the returned soldiers. But the report of the committee, honourable gentlemen, is brought forward for the purpose of inviting discussion, and in the belief on my part, as chairman of the committee, and, I think, on the part of other members of the committee, that we can give attention to the present needs of the country in no better way than by considering what are the best methods, not only of taking care of our present areas under cultivation—by intensive cultivation—but also of doing what can be done to increase that area, so that we may increase our national wealth, that we may keep our bounds of trade more stable, and that we may be of assistance to the Allies in increasing our supply of the food products which they need so much.

I may also use another argument, although I prefer to allow most of the arguments to be advanced by other honourable gentlemen in this debate. We shall shortly have in this House a Bill for the acquisition of the Canadian Northern Railway. That means that this Government will own and control between nine thousand and ten thousand miles of operating railroad, for which the country is to be responsible. Nothing would better help the railway, and to the same extent the country, than that it should have ample traffic at the earliest date possible. That is a new railway, running through a new district. There are on either side of it hundreds of thousands, if not billions, of acres of wild lands. Now, if those lands can be brought under cultivation under some system as that of granting a bounty for the breaking of new land, or of providing imported labour for the period of the war, it will not only add directly to the wealth of Canada, which is the production that comes from the soil, but it will lessen any losses or add to any profits made by the Government railway to be, that will serve very largely the new districts in which these wild lands are situated.

Honourable gentlemen, "on our own head, in our own hands, the sin or saving lies." I am making that quotation because it is the quotation made by the Lieutenant Governor of Cape Colony when introducing the Bill for the utilization of imported labour.

Hon. H. W. RICHARDSON: Honourable gentlemen, we can all foresee that when this war is over we shall be confronted with great difficulties. When the war will end none of us can foresee. It may be years hence. Anyhow, it will be, I fear, some time later than is generally anticipated. To-day Europe is dependent on North America alone for its grain supply. It is not depending upon South America, or upon Australia or India, because the freight charges from those countries are prohibitive. Europe's dependence upon North America will last, not for one year only, but for many years to come—until the ocean vessels that have been lost are replaced; and every one can foresee that this will be years hence. So within the next few years North America will have to stand a greater strain in providing food for the European nations than ever before. How are we going to do it? Are we going to do it with profit to ourselves? We all know that agriculture is the source of our great wealth in this country. If we can improve the fertility of our soils by cultivation, so that they will become more profitable, it is our duty to do so. Not only is it to our interest to increase the productivity of our lands, but it is our duty to the Allies to do so. I know of no better way than to agitate, and to keep on agitating, that our waste lands should be cultivated. Our farmers in the west can do only a certain amount of work, with what help they have and what means they have to plough and cultivate. If we can by any mechanical means increase the acreage under cultivation, I think we ought to do so. The granting of a bonus in connection with agricultural production may be new to every one; but bounties on products considered to be necessary in this country have been well known in the past, and at the present time particularly, a bounty or assistance in some form to agriculture would be very advisable, and in the interest not only of this country but of our Allies.

We have in Canada vast tracks of land which have never been ploughed, and some of which will not be ploughed for years to come unless some special means is devised. I proposed two means whereby we might promote this object. Encouragement should be given the farmer to cultivate his lands during the summer months—what is called summer fallowing; because we have learned by experience that a summer fallow rarely, if ever, is followed by a bad crop of wheat. Further than that, I have suggested that our Government should give to the farmers in the Northwest a bounty of a certain amount per acre for every acre of new land that they break up. We cannot, of course, get that land cultivated this year, and sown next year, but we can prepare to canvass the farmers and find out how much more land they can cultivate, and encourage them to cultivate as much new land as possible by granting them a bounty or assistance in some other form. If this question is taken up in the right way and with the eenergy which it deserves, we can within three or four years double the production of wheat in our Northwest. The price of wheat is going to be maintained at a high level for the next three or four years. That is so for many reasons. The principal reason is that our stocks are practically exhausted. The world always had a large surplus of wheat for the coming year. We never went into a new year without supplies for four or five months ahead. But it is not so to-day. Our supplies to-day are practically consumed. I shall surprise you, honourable gentlemen, when I tell you that I could not find enough good milling wheat in Fort William this week to load one small steamer of 127,000 bushels capacity. That shows how closely the supply of wheat has been shipped out. Similar conditions prevail all over the world except in the Argentine Republic and Australia; but the stocks will remain in those countries unless the neutrals send boats for them, because the Allied Governments cannot afford to send the tonnage down to the Argentine Republic or to Australia for those supplies.

The honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) has stated that we are to-day owners and operators of railroads, and we expect soon to have another large system in our hands. The Canadian Northern railway will shortly be owned by the Government. In connection with that railway there is a fixed overhead expense which has to be met. The bonds have to be paid, the road has to be kept up, the officers and agents have to be paid. Is there any better way of doing this than by doubling the quantity of grain which will be handled by that road? To do this it will be necessary to put more land under cultivation. This is only one point in favour of cultivating wild lands. I do not know that I could mention anything that would have more influence than to say that we are going to help to feed Europe—and Europe absolutely needs our help—and that we are going to enrich this country, for we certainly will, and the bounty which will be paid to the farmers will be very small compared with the benefit which will result. Suppose it cost $5.50 to cultivate an acre of land; if you give the farmer a bounty of $2.50 that would bring the cost down to $3 an acre. In the first year, if there were an ordinary crop, there would be a yield of 20 or 25 bushels to the acre, and grain to-day is worth $2.30 a bushel in Fort William. Perhaps next year it will be worth $2, and the following year it may be $1.75; but I do not know of any better plan of building up this country than breaking up those wild lands.

There is another point to be considered in connection with this matter. If the West becomes settled the people there are going to require products which are manufactured in the East. No matter what we do to improve export conditions, we shall have to compete to a large extent with other countries, and we shall be under the disadvantage of paying a higher price for labour. Therefore I think we should look at home for our source of wealth. We have to-day a tremendous war debt; we are mortgaging this country for the money that we are borrowing, and every acre of land that is broken will be worth twice what is was worth before. With the exception of one or two years, Australia has exported from 25 to 50 million bushels of grain per year. To-day Australia has in her granaries wheat that is deteriorating, and why? Because it is not possible to maintain the rate of freight from Australia to England; it is prohibitive. We pay $2.40 for wheat at Fort William and take it to Europe; but freight rates are so high from Australia that it is not profitable to buy wheat there at $1 a bushel. Every business man tries to build up his business in times of prosperity so that he may meet adverse conditions which are sure to come. There has never been such a prosperous period for our agricultural population; there has never been a time which was so advantageous for tilling every acre of land in Canada; and for that reason I agree with the honourable gentleman from Toronto that Asiatic labour should be brought into the country. The investment of $1 or $1.50 a day will bring a farmer $10 in return. This would increase manufacture in the East, and the labourers of the East would obtain better wages than they otherwise could.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I give every credit to the honourable senator from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) for the trouble, time, and energy which he has given to the work of this committee, and for the way in which he has dealt with this matter; but the recommendations made by the committee do not, in my opinion, accord with the resolution passed by this House authorizing the establishment of this committee. In the Minutes of Proceedings of the 11th July, you will find this:

Pursuant to the order of the day the Senate resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of the Hon. Mr. Nicholls:

"That, in the opinion of this honourable House, it is expedient to appoint a Committee to inquire into and report upon the best method or methods of conserving and increasing our domestic and overseas trade, to the end that our present prosperity may not unduly suffer when the stimulus resulting from orders for munitions and other war supplies is removed."

The report that has been brought in by this committee deals with the question of increased production from the land. I fail to see how that comes within the four corners of this resolution as a matter of overseas or domestic trade.

The first clause of this report deals with the question of the Government taking hold of these vacant lands—I presume in the Northwest, as that is the only part of the country where the Government owns land. The idea of the Government starting to break up a large tract of land not at present under cultivation is a very difficult one to carry out, in view of the fact—which the honourable gentleman himself admits—that at the present time there is a great shortage of labour and great difficulty in getting men to go on the farms to deal with the crops, not only in the Northwest, but throughout the country at large. I cannot see how this problem is to be dealt with when the shortage of labour is so great that at the present time the farmers from one end of the country to the other are calling out for help. We should have had some other intimation from the Government with regard to this matter. Personally I have never heard any request or any statment made that would lead me to think that at the present time it was necessary for the Government to break up these lands for the purpose of raising crops. At the present time, if there is an average crop throughout Canada, and if we can get sufficient labour to harvest that crop properly, we shall be in as good a position as can be expected.

The second clause of this report deals with the question of giving a bounty to farmers to increase production. I think that every farmer to-day, at the present prices of farm products, is quite ready to increase the production of his land as far as it is possible for him to do so. I presume that every farmer is in business for the purpose of getting as much profit out of it as he can, and will increase his production to as large an extent as he is able. The suggestion of paying a bounty to farmers is not one that appeals to me, and I do not think it will appeal to the farmers of the Northwest. I am not prepared to say whether this suggestion would appeal to farmers in other parts of the country or not. The farmers of the Northwest would much prefer that the Government should deal with the question of the customs duties on agricultural implements and other supplies that they use, and bring about a material reduction in those duties. This would be a much greater encouragement to them, and would help them more largely in the greater production and further development of their farms, than what is proposed in this report. I think I am right in stating that the duty on farm implements, such as tractors, coming into the country at the present time amounts to something like 40 per cent. That is a great drawback to the purchase of this class of machinery. We have seen statements made by the farmers of the Northwest at meetings, in which they have asked the Government, as they have done for years, to reduce the duty on farm implements and give them opportunities to buy them at a lower price. Only the other day a resolution was passed by a convention in Winnipeg which reads as follows:

Resolved, that as the present high cost of farm machinery is one of the great factors in the increasing cost of producing foodstuffs, the Canadian farmer is paying more for such machinery than does the farmer of most other countries. We believe that the Dominion Government should immediately provide for an inquiry into the different factors which constitute the price to the farmer; such an inquiry to embrace the cost of manufacture, cost of transportation, distribution, collection, and any other factors. with a view to such action as may be possible to bring about reduction when the facts are ascertained.

A large number of the men present at that meeting were practical farmers, and we must presume that they knew what they were talking about in dealing with this question.

With regard to the question of tractors, I may say that a great many of the farmers throughout the western provinces have not found them to be as great a success as they thought they would be. To-day they are looking for a light tractor that will do the work required at a reasonable expense. They have found that the cost of running the tractors has been very considerable, and, in view of the increased cost of gasolene and coal oil, which are used for fuel, this question has become one of great importance. I cannot agree with the recommendation embodied in this report that farmers should be given a bounty at any rate until other steps have been taken to remove the burden placed upon the farmers by the duties on machinery and other supplies which they are using.

The question of bringing in Asiatic labour is one that I think we should not deal with at the present time. I do not think that the necessity for this radical step, in order to carry on agricultural cultivation and production in this country has yet been shown. As honourable gentlemen know, in the West especially, this question has for many years been a very serious and contentious one; and, until it is absolutely proven that we cannot get the products of the mine and of the land that are required in order to carry on properly the affairs of the country, I do not think that we should sanction the bringing in to this country of Asiatic labour. This is a very difficult question, and the experience which we have had in the West has not been such that we want to see more of those people brought into this country until it has been definitely shown that we cannot get along without their assistance. I think that a great deal could be done at the present time by proper organization. The whole of the country should be properly organized, so that the labour required in the mines, in the fisheries, in the lumber camps, and in agriculture would be made available at the most convenient points. I think there is a great deal of labour that is not in the place where it is most available. I am not prepared to give any sanction to this idea of bringing in Asiatic labourers at the present time.

Hon. J. J. DONNELLY: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened rather carefully to the speeches delivered by honourable gentlemen in support of this report. I have also read the report, and I must say that I do not altogether agree with the conclusions arrived at in it. Apparently the main object of the report is to devise some means which will increase production. I think we all agree with that; but the proposal apparently is to break wild lands. There are two methods advocated by which we might increase production—one, by the granting of bounties, and the other by the Government breaking the lands and charging the cost to the land owners. But to me it seems that the great difficulty is the scarcity of labour, and I do not think that the breaking of a large area of wild lands at the present time will at all improve the labour situation. I have had some experience with breaking wild lands in the West, and I think it is very necessary that when lands are broken they should be properly cultivated; otherwise, they become a place from which weed-seeds are spread over the surrounding country.

I am disposed to think that the better method would be to encourage a larger percentage of our people to become engaged in agricultural pursuits, and, instead of breaking an increased area of wild lands, that we should give more attention to the cultivation of the lands now under cultivation. I sometimes hear people in the city complaining about the high cost of living. I know that there are many, not only in the city of Ottawa, but in other cities, paying a rental of over $25 a month for a very ordinary house. That means $300 a year. If the same people will come to western Ontario, I can assure them they will get a better house to live in, with 100 acres of arable land and good outbuildings, for $300 a year. What really is wanted is that many of the people now in our cities should go back upon the land. They might not be able to attend picture shows and things of that kind very often, but the elevating influence which would come to them by the close contact with nature would more than make up for any disadvantages in that respect. I think a campaign along that line would perhaps be the most beneficial. The men who are on the land do not require any particular encouragement to produce; they are quite willing to produce as much as they are able, and the present prices will induce them to produce to the limit of their ability. What we really need is that a greater percentage of our people should become engaged in agricultural pursuits, and I think a campaign along that line would produce good results.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Honourable gentlemen, the honourable leader of the Opposition sought to put a very technical meaning on the words "domestic trade;" but I have always thought that the shipping of butter and cheese and wheat to foreign countries, as well as supplying our own market, was a distinct part of our domestic and overseas trade. I think that if a fair interpretation is given to those words, the honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) is quite in order with regard to this report, and that it does not go in any way beyond the terms of the reference. This is not the first report we have had on the subject of agriculture, and I do not think it will be the last. We had a report on this subject, I think, last session. My experience is that after a report is made it is simply filed away, and I do not see that we get any definite, practical results. I do not know that if we adopt this report anything will be done with regard to it. What we want at the present time is not writing or talking; what we want is some specific thing done, and in that way we shall get ahead.

Now, I do not intend to say anything with regard to this report so far as it affects the West. There is a great difference between production on the farms in the West and production on the farms in the Maritime Provinces. In the first place, the western fields are larger, and, in the next place, the question of fertilizer in the Maritime Provinces is all-essential, while it is not yet a live question in the West. So honourable gentlemen will understand that any remarks that I have to make with regard to this report are made from the point of view of the Maritime Provinces.

There is one way of ascertaining the troubles of the farmer, and that is by going to a farmer and asking him whether he is cultivating as much land this year as he cultivated last year, and, if not, to give you the reason why. I find almost without exception that there are two reasons given by the farmers in the Maritime Provinces why they do not produce as much or more than they did in past years. The first reason is the question of power, which includes both machinery and man-power. The other question is the question of fertilizer. The question of fertilizer is, of course, all-essential in the Maritime Provinces. The price of fertilizers has advanced at least 50 per cent. Potash has gone out of sight altogether. Now, the difficulties that we have to deal with in the Maritime Provinces are in respect to two questions, and perhaps we may couple with them a third, that is, the question of instruction. You may give a man machinery and may give him fertilizer, but if you are not careful they are simply thrown away. I think the province of Ontario probably leads all the provinces in respect to the provision of farming instructors, and I hear that they have had good results.

Now I wish to refer, perhaps at some length, to the question of power on the farm. Our farms as a rule are small, and the farmer has only one pair of horses. All a farmer can do is to work those horses every day that is fit for work, and you will find that he is doing that. It is of no use to tell that man to cultivate more acreage or to cultivate his present acreage more intensely, because he is at his maximum. If you suggest to him that he should get another pair of horses, there would be the difficulty about man-power; he would require another man, that is, if he is single-handed. Of course, if he has boys he may use them. But horses are used on our farms for only a couple of months in the spring of the year, and then again in the autumn, and more than one pair of horses is not wanted on the farm during the winter. If the farmer had a second pair of horses, they would in the winter time eat away all the profit that he could make out of them by using them in the summer.

That brings us up against the question whether or not it is possible to use tractors, and whether there is a tractor yet found that can be worked successfully on the fields in the Maritime Provinces. They are smaller than the fields in the West, and a machine which might be very successful in the West would be a total failure in the Maritime Provinces; that is to say, if it were a machine that is hard to turn, while it might do very well on the very large fields of the West, it would be a financial failure on our small fields. What I should like to see in connection with this question would be an investigation by some one man, a young, active man with some knowledge of mechanics, to whom would be assigned this question of tractors, and who would examine all the tractors now in the market, see them work, and be able to give first hand, honest, intelligent information to the farmers as to what tractor, if any, they should buy. He would advise them, first, whether or not a tractor has been found that would take the place of horses—any machinery that could be worked in the spring of the year, put away in a shed during midsummer, brought out again in the autumn and used, and then put away in a shed during the winter; machinery that would not be expensive for the time during which it was used and that would take the place of horses, which eat their heads off during our long winter.

There has been formed recently an association which includes in its membership a large number of leading men all over the United States, for the study of advanced agriculture, and for the publication of information connected with it. I happen to be a humble member of that society. One of its publications is known as The Field, illustrated. In the July number I find this statement with reference to tractors, which is not very long, and which I shall read to the House:

In response to a questionnaire sent out by the Bureau of Crop Estimates of the Department of Agriculture to 32,000 selected correspondents as to the number of gasolene and kerosene tractors to be used this year, a total of 34,371 was reported.

That is a pretty large number—the number that was used last year in the United States.

As this questionnaire was sent out early in the year and the total did not include tractors not delivered, the number in use probably exceeds the above figure. Naturally the corn belt and prairie states showed by far the greater number of machines in use, but the other states are increasing their count rapidly. A tractor analysis recently published by the Capper publications states estimates of the total number that will be in use in ten years vary from 500,000 to 2,000,000. Any estimate is only a guess, but these do not seem extreme in view of the strides the automobile industry has taken. The present manufacturing equipment of the country is capable of producing under governmental aid 75,000 tractors a year. Seventy-five thousand additional tractors would cultivate sufficient land to produce one billion bushels of small grains, giving a 50 per cent increase over the present crop. Last year 35,000 tractors were manufactured and it was hoped 70,000 would be produced this year, but shortage of men and material have cut down this figure. State and county tractors have been purchased this year in considerable numbers in order that the crop acreage might be greatly increased, and co-operative and night ploughing has been reported. Companies were organized for contract ploughing where such a thing was undreamed of a year ago.

Another writer in the same paper says this:

The tractor presents another possibility of placing a large amount of power under the control of one man. No one will deny the fact that it is here to stay and it is destined to be used in ever-increasing numbers, as time goes on, on farms at all adapted to its use. Not all farmers will find the tractor a profitable investment, but many will not only be able to decrease considerably the amount of expensive labour formerly required in the operation of their farms, but will, through its use, be enabled to get their crops in in better season.

Now, the little I have seen of the tractor would lead me to believe that, assuming that you get a tractor that will plough eight acres a day and at a cost of not more than about one dollar per acre, it would be possible, in the first place, to increase the acreage under cultivation, and, in the second place, to give more cultivation than we do give to the number of acres we now cultivate. Instead of ploughing the field once, we might be able to plough it twice, to harrow it more, and get a better seed-bed. I find from other papers that I have that in England the Government has a very large number of tractors. They travel along the country and take orders for ploughing from farmers, charging the farmers only the actual cost. That is one of the means taken in England. Now, I should like to see this question of the tractor taken up in earnest, in order that we may come to either a favourable or unfavourable conclusion upon it, because the next best thing to having a tractor doing your business successfully is to know that the tractor will not do it at all, because you then stop fooling over the thing and direct your energies into some other channel.

I agree with what may be called the general intent of the report of the honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls), that is, for increased production on our farms; but at the present moment I do not quite see my way clear to accept his suggestion with regard to bonusing farmers. As a matter of fact, owing to the present labour situation, your bonus would be eaten up. If bonuses were given to-night, they would be all gone by to-morrow morning; they would disappear like a mist before the wind. The greatest gain would come from putting it within the power of the farmer himself to work out the problem. He has a good market now, and if you give him more power and enable him single-handed to do as much work as two men could do without machinery, you will have made a decided gain.

I think that it is only fair to the farmer that we should not expect him to lose perhaps his farm in speculating as to what is the best form of tractor to buy. A huge sum of money is voted by the Parliament of Canada to the Department of Agriculture, and I should think that the farmer would be justified in saying: "You have no right to say to me, 'Do this thing yourself; you are getting good prices.'" I submit that he could fairly say: "Why should I buy a machine that would cost me anywhere from one thousand dollars to fifteen hundred dollars and that may not work?" It is, in my view, the duty of the Department of Agriculture to solve this question and to give some practical advice to the farmer with regard to what tractor, if any, he would be justified in buying. How that tractor should be got, whether by reduction of duty, or by giving a bonus to the manufacturers, is another question that might well be looked into; also whether for, say, five years they should not be put entirely on the free list. Of course, I do not know that that would be of very much practical relief, for our information on the subject is that the manufacturers of tractors in the United States cannot supply their present demand. It is quite within the bounds of reasonable business that some of our manufacturers might be induced to take up the manufacture of tractors in our own country, and I do not know that it would be bad business, even for a short period of time, to grant a bonus on tractors, with a view to inducing manufacturers to go into the business.

Some few years ago there was a great propaganda in the United States carried on through the columns of agricultural papers, for the use of lime on the farm. Some of the railways carried lime free for a number of years, and the president of one company, which operated in Illinois—I do not remember the name of it—said that for every dollar they lost in carrying lime free they made three dollars on the increased freight carried by that road. I should like to see the Department of Agriculture take this matter up with the railway companies, to see if the cost of fertilizers could not be reduced to something like the prices which existed before the war. I am not putting forward any proposition to give the farmer something for nothing. So far as my experience goes, it is not asked; but the difference between a farmer getting fertilizer for nothing and paying two prices for it is very great. I do not think the farmers would complain at all if they could get fertilizer to-day at a price something like 25 per cent more than they paid prior to the war. When prices are advanced 50 per cent, the farmer does not get an adequate return for his money, unless the fertilizer is purchased by the Department of Agriculture in large quantities and distributed direct to the farmers thus cutting out the profit of the middleman, which, in the Maritime Provinces amounts to something like ten or fifteen dollars a ton.

Then, there is the question of instruction. I do not think I need dwell on that, as probably most of the members of this House know as much about it as I do. However, I wish to say that I admire the work that is being done by the province of Ontario along this line. We all know the value of a man who knows his business going on to a farm and telling the farmer what is wrong —that the soil is short in phosphate, or potash, or nitrogen, as the case may be. A man of that kind can do more good in half a day on the farm than all the agricultural institutions do in ten years, because he gets at the farmer. I do not want to find fault with the agricultural stations. They have done a great deal of good work. In the province of Nova Scotia there are two Dominion stations and a provincial institution. The provincial institution, which is largely a teaching institution, is spreading knowledge every year.

There is a station at Nappan and one at Kentville, and there is a horticultural substation in the Annapolis valley to guard and protect agriculturalists against different troubles. This work is doing incalculable good. I believe, however, that knowledge along these lines is confined too much to the colleges. What we want now is the men who will take the knowledge that they have gained and go on to the farms and impart that knowledge first-hand to the farmers of the country.

The only other matter to which I will refer, is foreign labour. I do not know that any honourable gentleman in this House, or perhaps any one else, is qualified to give an offhand opinion as to whether we should or should not bring in Asiatic labour to work on the farms. I have seen Indians working in the tropics. I think that they come in under a five-year indenture bond, and that at the end of that time they are entitled to go home. Some of them take up land. There is a large colony of them in Demarara, where they have introduced rice-growing. In my opinion, if, after a proper investigation has been made, it is found that we are short of labour, there is no insuperable obstacle in the way of bringing in Asiatic labour on a one, two, or three-year contract. Of course, we would have to be very careful that these men would work on the land, and that at the end of their contract time they would be taken back to the country from which they came.

I want to protest against committees making investigations and reports, and not getting anything done. What are we going to do? I think something might be gained by going to the Department of Agriculture and asking them to appoint a man and to give him power to do something; but if something definite is not done the recommendation of the committee is only a pious wish.

Hon. ROBERT WATSON: As a member of the committee, I must apologize for not being able to attend all the meetings. I cannot concur in all parts of the report.

The honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) and the honourable gentleman from South Bruce (Hon. Mr. Donnelly) have pretty well expressed my sentiments. The farmer of the West has no desire to be spoon-fed. All he wants is a fair field and no favour, and he will make a success. We had before the committee of which my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) is chairman, a gentleman well versed in these matters, Mr. Crerar, president of the Grain Growers' Grain Company. He was asked what might be done to assist the farmer. He said that two things had to be done: first, the farmer must have a market which would guarantee to him the best possible price; and, next, he must get his farming implements free of duty. He said that if those two things were accomplished the farmer would want nothing else to help him to increase production.

My honourable friend (Hon. W. B. Ross) has suggested the gas-tractor. It is in common use in the West to-day. The only objection to it is that it costs too much money. I think he is wrong when he suggests going to the Agricultural Department to get some information about this question. He should go to the Customs Department and get them to take off the duty, and then the farmer will buy the best gas-tractor on the market. For a number of years the tractor used in the west was too heavy, injuring the soil. Some of the tractors weighed as much as 10 tons. The farmers now realize that the best tractor is one which weighs about 5,000 pounds, and which pulls three ploughs. It ploughs about 8 or 9 acres a day at a cost of about 40 cents an acre for fuel, including lubricating oil.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Is that at present prices?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: That is with kerosene oil at 17 cents a gallon. I think it is now about 19 cents a gallon. It is a very cheap oil. Gasolene costs about 40 cents a gallon. In a gas tractor gasolene is only used for starting the machine, and then kerosene oil is used. The gas tractor, I may say, can only be used on fairly level land. It requires all the power that it can develop to climb a hill without pulling anything behind it, but I have no hesitation in saying that under fair conditions the gas tractor is almost a necessity on the western plains. If the tractor which now costs $1,100 or $1,200 could be purchased for $700 or $800, I venture to say that almost every farmer who owns a half-section would have one. When it is not in use it costs nothing, whereas horses are eating their heads off, and with fair usage it ought to last about as long as a pair of horses. One of these small gas tractors will do the work of eight horses quite easily. In addition to ploughing it is used very often for threshing, and instead of waiting for the big machine to come along and do his threshing in the fall—and probably losing valuable time and neglecting his ploughing—a farmer can start threshing immediately and is able to do much more work than he does under other conditions.

I have no sympathy with the idea of bonusing the farmers. As the honourable gentleman from South Bruce has very well said, it is not a question of breaking land, but of keeping under good cultivation the land that is already broken. Within the last week I have seen thousands of acres that were once cultivated and which are now covered with noxious weeds, the seeds of which are being blown all over the surrounding country, and the land is in worse condition than if it had never been cultivated.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Why is that?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Because the man could not afford to buy seeds and pay wages. The land was owned by a man living in town, and the cost of labour was so great that he could not make a profit. If any recommendations can be made by this House or by any committee, whereby a free market can be given and the duties taken off implements, these things will increase production in the West as nothing else will. Under the system of bonusing you may get men to take up land who will not be able to cultivate it afterwards, and it would be simply a nuisance.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I do not wish to close the debate at the present time; but, with the permission of the House, I should like to ask the honourable gentleman a question. The honourable gentleman claims that wild land might be broken and then not cultivated. If he had read clause 2 of the report he would see that is covered. Clause 2 says:

> That if it is found necessary, in order to encourage farmers to bring additional acreage under cultivation, that a bounty of a certain sum per acre be paid for each and every acre of wild land put under cultivation and off which a crop is raised during the next ensuing two years.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: At the present time the farmer is working to the limit, and is paying as high as $50 a month for a man for the whole season. Even with that labour employed, he is not able to keep under cultivation the land that he has broken at the present time. So, until there is more labour available, there is no use in breaking the land.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Does the honourable gentleman know of any authoritative report upon the use of the gasolene plough in the West? Have any of the provincial governments made any report as to the work which is being done, and as to what is the best type of tractor to get. A plough might work very well in the large fields of the western plains, but in our small fields in the East a plough that would be difficult to turn might break down in that respect. The plough that I have seen in the fields here has a wheel in front, and is constructed apparently so that it can be turned quickly. My honourable friend suggests going to the farmers in the West instead of to the Department of Agriculture; but my idea is that there ought to be some place here where I could get authentic information.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: There are probably eight or ten different makes of tractors on the market in the West at the present time, and they are all giving fairly good satisfaction.

The tractor is now getting to be almost like the binder: it does not matter what make you buy, because all kinds work fairly well; it is simply a question of the style of engine. So far as the turning is concerned, they are all about the same. It does not matter whether they have one wheel or two wheels at the front; the machine works just as well with two wheels as with one, and all the machines are made about the same size. I may say, for the information of honourable gentlemen, that a few weeks ago a provincial ploughing match was held in Manitoba, and it happened to be in the vicinity of my town, on Portage la Prairie plains. One day was devoted to horse-ploughing and the next day to the gas-tractors. I think there were about fifteen gas-tractors competing in the match, and they did the work just as well as the horses. The farmer there had the opportunity of choosing his machine. The Manitoba Agricultural College has a class in which boys are taught during the winter months how to run gas-tractors, and as a result the young boys are becoming very expert. A good means of encouraging the boy to stay on the farm is to give him a gas-tractor, or some machinery in which he can take an interest. The training given to the young fellows at the Manitoba Agricultural College makes them very efficient. Of course, they do much more work with the gas-tractor than could be done with a pair of horses, and they prefer the gas-tractor to the horses, because it does not require any grooming at night.

Hon. W. C. EDWARDS: If my honourable friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) had accomplished nothing more by his committee, he certainly has done a great deal in bringing about this afternoon one of the most interesting debates that has ever taken place in this House on the most important question affecting the whole Dominion of Canada, namely, that of agriculture. When my honourable friend from Kamloops (Hon. Mr. Bostock) referred to the question of domestic trade, it occurred to me that there is no greater means by which the domestic and foreiegn trade of Canada can be encouraged and developed than by the development of the agricultural resources of this country. So I am not at all surprised that my honourable friend from Toronto, after looking around to see what he might suggest, suggested, after all, that which is most important and always will be most important to Canada.

My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock) referred also to Asiatic labour. Well, he lives in British Columbia, and I am a little surprised that he does not realize that there would be no British Columbia but for the Asiatic labour they have had there. If by contracting, say for three years or more, for a number of Asiatics, a large number of men in Canada could be liberated for the various undertakings which Canada has in project, I think it would be a great thing for the country.

This question of agriculture is one of the questions which interests me most. I have all my life taken a great interest in agriculture, and have attended a great many farmers' institute meetings and other agricultural gatherings; I have also for a long time had much to do with agriculture, having a number of farms; and my observation is that over the entire area of Canada there are a certain number of farmers who make a great success of agriculture, and a very large number who do not. Just as in all other lines of industry, there are a certain number of men who get ahead of their fellows because of their application and ability. In my humble opinion, the best means of developing the agricultural interests of Canada is illustration. Illustration farms distributed throughout the country would do more than anything else for the promotion of agriculture. There are many men who cannot learn by their own initiative, but who can imitate what they see other men do. May I give an instance of that, which a speaker at one of our institute meetings in Ontario years ago used to cite? There was in a certain part of Scotland a group of about two dozen farmers who made it a practice to meet once a month at each other's farm and give their experiences, and the result was that those farmers went ahead of all the other farmers in the community. As to the methods which my honourable friend the Chairman of the committee (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) has suggested, and which he may suggest, I think that if he can do anything which will help to promote agriculture, he will do one of the greatest things that can possibly be done for Canada.

Hon. F. L. BEIQUE: I do not know if it is because I am, like the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross), a lawyer-farmer, but I must say that I agree entirely with everything that he has said. The honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) speaks more for the West than for the East. He says that so far as the West is concerned, they are now certain they have the proper kinds of tractors; but he acknowledges that great mistakes were made at the outset and a great deal of money was wasted for want of proper information. The farmers bought large tractors at great expense, and those tactors had to be thrown into the scrap-heap. Well, if the idea which has been suggested by the honourable gentleman from Middleton had been applied, a great deal of that money would not have been wasted, and much of the energy and time spent would have been saved. I understand that the suggestion is that the Government, whether the Federal Government only or the Fed ral Government in conjunction with the Provincial Governments, should arrange to determine whether there is on the market tractors suitable for the farms in the East as well as those in the West. The tractors used in the West may not suit the eastern farms. But, although agreeing with the honourable gentleman in the valuable suggestions he has made regarding the appointment of an expert by the Department of Agriculture, I would suggest further that the Government, through same or another expert should go a step further after the idea has been matured, and buy a certain number of tractors, at least one for each province, one for each of the different localities, and have the tractor tested by the expert, not only for the purpose of better ascertaining that it is the proper thing, but also as a means of educating the farmers of the province. If the Government proceeds in that way the mistake which was made by the western people will be avoided, and a great deal of expense and energy will be saved that would otherwise be lost.

I entirely agree with the other suggestion of the honourable gentleman from Middleton, that what we want is education for the farmers. For my part, I have an ordinary intelligence. I have given a great deal of attention to farming; I was brought up on a farm, and when I was young did all the work on the farm; in late years I have farmed quite extensively and have made it a practice to spend my evenings and Sundays in reading literature on farming.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: What? Does the honourable gentleman mean to say that he reads farming literature on Sunday?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: After mass.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: After mass; and I must confess that there are many problems which I have been unable to solve. I agree with the honourable gentleman that the farmers would be greatly helped if experts were sent into different parts of the country for the purpose of ascertaining what kinds of fertilizers should be bought, because it depends largely upon the nature of the soil, and an ordinary farmer has not sufficient knowledge to enable him to make the proper choice, and much money and time are wasted because he has not used the proper kind of fertilizer for his soil. I believe that the experimental farms are doing good and valuable work, but mainly in experimenting. I think that what we now require is a demonstration farm in each locality, similar to those which were established in Belgium and Holland, and which in the course of twenty-five or thirty years, revolutionized agriculture in both those countries. A demonstration farm may comprise ten or twenty acres, and may be conducted at very little expense. A farmer in each parish or locality may be chosen—and progressive farmers will be found everywhere, who will be ready to undertake the work, and may be induced to culitvate ten or fifteen acres of land under the control of an expert. That expert could control a dozen, or perhaps two dozen, small farms of that kind in different localities and see that the ten or fifteen acres are cultivated under his instructions. Each of those farms will serve as a demonstration, not only for the farmer who owns it, but also for all his neighbours.

I agree with the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Ross) also in his suggestion that the Government should, as far as lies in its power, help the farmer in procuring the proper kind of fertilizer. It is suggested that fertilizer should be admitted free of duty. I think the Government should go a long way—should not only free it from duty, but also try to devise a means whereby the production of fertilizer may be encouraged. I read the other day that in England the problem had been solved; that England is now able to produce all the fertilizing material required in that country, and will not have to depend upon Germany for a supply. If that progress has been made in England, the Government of Canada should learn all about it and take steps to encourage the manufacture of fertilizers in this country.

Coming back to the question of tractors, it is a matter of the utmost importance in the eastern provinces as well as in the west. In the eastern provinces a great part of the country is growing wild with weeds, and the only practical way to eradicate them would be cultivation by means of tractors.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Summer fallowing.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes; summer fallowing could be practised. By ploughing five or ten acres several times during the summer you would destroy the weeds and also prepare the land to give double the crop the following year; but that cannot be done with horses, because it must be done when the weather is very hot, and also because the ground is too hard; it can be done only with tractors.

I have only one word to add, as regards the report which is now before this honourable House. As the honourable gentleman from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) stated, the honourable member from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nichólls) is to be congratulated upon having brought to the attention of this House the very important question of agriculture. I am sorry, however, that I cannot concur in some of the suggestions which are made in the report.

I agree with the criticism which has been made as regards the proposed bonus. I do not believe in the efficacy of bonuses. I think it has been stated that there is under cultivation more acreage than can be properly tilled under the present labour conditions, and if the suggested bonus were granted it would encourage the opening up of wild lands for the purpose of getting the bonus, and the land already under cultivation would be left to run wild. I do not believe that that is a good remedy.

As far as the importation of labour is concerned, I am altogether in accord with the suggestion that, in view of the present shortage of labour, and of the greater shortage which will exist if another 100,000 men are sent to the front, it would be very important to procure Chinese or Oriental labour; but it should be procured, not, as stated, only for the season between seeding and harvest time. A contract would have to be made for a period of two or three years, as is done in France. France has arranged to import at least 20,000 Chinamen on a three-year basis, and the United States, I understand, is doing or is about to do the same thing. I do not think that Chinese labour should be brought into the country for part of the season only.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: May I ask the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie what is the life of a tractor working under ordinary conditions?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I think a gas tractor ought to last for eight or ten years, with some slight repairs.

Hon. A. E. PLANTA: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion which has taken place on this report, and I am sure that even if no definite conclusions are arrived at the discussion has at least been of very great interest. It has occurred to me that if the provisions of the Act to assist returned soldiers in settling upon the land could be applied in assisting the farmers we have heard of who are to-day living in the cities, something could perhaps be accomplished towards obtaining increased production. I do not think it is necessary to assist the farmers, already well-to-do, who are engaged in farming pursuits. What we should do is to encourage others to go onto the land. I am sure there are many who have drifted to the cities simply for the lack of funds with which to properly equip a farm and make their work less arduous.

What I wished to refer to particularly was the most remarkable statement which fell from the lips of the honourable member from Ottawa (Hon. Mr.Edwards) when he said that if it had not been for the Asiatics there would be no British Columbia. Having lived in British Columbia nearly all of my life, I can assure all honourable gentlemen present that if ever a curse fell upon a fair province of this Dominion of ours it was when the gates were thrown open to the hordes of Chinese which overrun our province. Instead of having to-day a happy, prosperous community of working people as we should have, we have hordes of these Asiatics who are in keen competition with our own race. The result has been that the workingmen of our province have not had a fair show, except in cases where Asiatics have been excluded, as, for instance, in coal-mining operations. The milling industry is entirely in the hands of Asiatics.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Could the mills be operated without them?

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: I was just coming to that point. It has been argued by gentlemen engaged in milling operations that they could not carry on that industry without Asiatic labour. The answer to that is that in the State of Washington, as I understand, the mills are entirely operated by white labourers. So the contention, I think, is not well founded. I could not sit still and allow the statement made by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Edwards) to go unchallenged, and I can assure honourable gentlemen that I know what I am talking about.

Hon. G. G. KING: Honourable gentlemen, it was not my intention to take part in this debate. I have listened to the remarks of honourable gentlemen who have spoken, and it occurs to me that there is something much more important than any of the questions touched upon during the debate this afternoon. If I remember rightly, Canada has been served with notice by Lord Rhondda that Great Britain is looking to Canada for her supply of bread. We have 300,000 or 400,000 men across the water now, and 100,000 to go, and this country is under the responsibility of producing bread to take care of our Allies and our men on the other side. It is all very well to talk about the farmer, but this is a much more important view of the question. I am not in favour of subsidizing the farmer. So far as removing duties is concerned, that is all right as far as it goes. What have we to-day? We have a Food Controller. What is he telling the people? He is telling them to eat whole-wheat bread. Why? To save wheat. For what? To have a surplus to send across the seas. Am I right or am I wrong? Personally, I do not believe in whole-wheat bread, but if the Food Controller thinks it is right, I have no objection to it. Although I am not a farmer, I have an idea that if the people of this country are compelled to use whole-wheat bread, the price of butter and cheese will advance very quickly. There will be nothing to support the dairy interests of this country. I come from the Maritime Provinces which, year after year, make use of a million barrels of flour. It used to be that Ontario supplied us with bread; now we subsist largely upon flour made from Manitoba wheat. We are interested in seeing flour cheaper than $14 or $17 a barrel, and if the Government can do anything to keep up the supply and to send a supply across the water, I think the money will be well spent. I hear my honourable friend say it only costs a dollar to break an acre of land, but I think the Government ought to be willing to give some encouragement to those farmers who have not enough money to take the risk of breaking up lands. If it was to be done, it should have been done early in the spring. It has not been done. Something could be done yet, but I fear not very much. There is one thing about breaking up virgin prairie—and when I say this I speak with some knowledge, because I have been across this continent forty-six times in seventeen years. I say that it is the duty of the Government, and it is our duty to advise the Government so far as this matter goes, to take the best means possible to increase the production of wheat in Canada, so that the people on the other side of the water will not suffer. Some provision should be made with regard to next year's crop, so that the people on the other side of the water shall not suffer, and so that we shall have something at home. If the war were to stop to-morrow and wheat went down below $2.50 a bushel, it would not hurt the people of this country. I think we owe something to the consumer as well as to the farmer of the West, and the only way to reduce the price of wheat is to increase production. England is not looking to Australia, New Zealand, nor South America for bread; she is looking to Canada and the United States. The Government can afford to risk something by way of bonuses. I should say that $5 an acre would not be amiss. It would put the farmer in a position to employ high-costing labour, and he has to have labour no matter what it costs. We have to have food in this country and we have to supply the Allies and our Mother Country.

I have not spoken in this House for ten years, simply because my hearing is not very good. Perhaps I am doing an injustice to some honourable gentlemen in saying that this matter has not been referred to before. If so, I am very sorry. I could not let this opportunity pass without calling the attention of the leader of the Government to what I think is the duty of the Government, in which they should not lose a day. This matter is as important as conscription. To my mind it is important that Canada should do her share towards providing food for the Allies and for her own people in Canada.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Robertson, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Acting Speaker (Hon. T. S. Sproule) in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

MILITARY DECORATIONS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I rise to a very high question of military privilege. Of course. I am addressing the Government of the day in its absence. The Government of the day is represented here by one of the most brilliant men in the Cabinet; but, after all, brilliancy cannot fill the place of seventeen or nineteen departments. While addressing the leader of the Government, I wish him to understand that no reflection is to be cast on him personally. I have every admiration for the honourable gentleman who leads this House on behalf of the Government. I want to know from the Government, through him, by what right does the Minister of Militia or any of his subordinates, on the public streets in the capital of the Dominion, tear colours off the arms of returned soldiers who have fought the battles of the Empire in France and Flanders? I have absolute proof that within the past week colours have been torn from the arm of a Canadian officer who has gone through battles in France and Flanders, on the ground that these colours should not be worn in Canada. This officer returned from the front maimed and blinded. On Sparks street, in this city, a superior officer tapped him on the shoulder, and he came to a standstill and saluted. "You cannot wear these colours in Canada"——

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What colours?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The colours of the Somme battle, the battle of Ypres and the Vimy Ridge battle. These colours were torn off his arm. I have evidence of that fact.

The Hon. the ACTING SPEAKER (Hon. Mr. Sproule): Order. The whole question is as to whether these inquiries are appropriate just now. I am not aware of any rule which justifies putting questions across the floor of the House and debating them at this stage of business.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will give me the particulars of the case to which he has referred, I shall be very glad to make inquiries and give him an answer.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am going to accept the decision of His Honour the Speaker that a matter of national importance cannot be discussed.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I move the adjournment of the House, seconded by the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson). It is a shame that in this honourable House a member cannot present to the people what they desire to know. We are compelled to move the adjournment of the House. It is a limitation of free speech. It is not the closure, but it is next to it.

The Hon. the ACTING SPEAKER: Order. Is it your pleasure, honourable gentlemen, that the motion be carried? Those in favour of the motion will please rise.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: On that motion I desire to say——

The Hon. the ACTING SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The honourable gentleman has the right to speak on this motion.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: You are forgetting your own rules. I have a right to speak to this motion and I speak with a heart—

The Hon. the ACTING SPEAKER: Order. I am not familiar with the rules of the Senate, but the rule laid down in the House of Commons is that the question is put to the House, and, if a certain number stand, it is admissible.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Rule 25 says:

No notice is required for any of the following motions:

For the adjournment of the Senate for the purpose of bringing up a question of urgent public importance (which the mover shall state on rising to speak) before the House proceeds to the Orders of the Day.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I should like to say a word on this question of order. The paragraph which the honourable gentleman has just read covers the ground, and the honourable gentleman from Victoria would have the right to move this motion if it comes under that rule, "for the purpose of bringing up a question of urgent public importance." Now, what is the question which the honourable gentleman from Victoria proposes to bring up? He draws attention to the fact that an officer spoke to another officer on Sparks street and asked him something about a decoration. Is that a matter of urgent public importance? If the honourable gentleman wishes to bring that matter up, I think he should do it in the regular way by giving proper notice. It is simply abusing one's position as a member of this House to undertake to precipitate a debate under the circumstances.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: Honourable gentlemen, I do not want to cast any reflections upon any honourable member of this House; but I really think that there is too much time wasted in arguing points of order instead of using a little common sense. I happen to be familiar with the case mentioned by the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran), and every honourable gentleman in this House. whether Liberal or Conservative, should be familiar with it. I think it is a duty which we owe to ourselves to listen to the honourable gentleman from Victoria.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: This is a matter of high military importance, in the face of the Conscription Act and the voluntary system that will come into force if the Conscription Act fails. This matter of high military importance is whether a returned officer should be insulted in the public streets of Canada.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Who was the officer?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Please do not ask. He is an officer who has come back from France.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The point of order has been raised whether this is a question of urgent public importance, and the honourable gentleman having stated his object, it is for the Speaker to decide whether it is a matter of urgent public importance. If the ruling is not satisfactory, the honourable gentleman can then appeal to the House. I ask the ruling of the Speaker, whether this comes within paragraph g of rule 25.

The Hon. the ACTING SPEAKER: No senator has a right to address the House unless there is a question before the Chair, or on certain motions that may be made under certain rules. So far as I am familiar with the rules, it would at least require the assent of the majority of the Senate before the adjournment motion could be gone on with. I put the question for the purpose of determining whether in the judgment of the majority of this House it was a question of urgent public importance or not, when an honourable senator raised the point of order, and I desisted. I still hold to the opinion that it would not be permissible for the honourable gentleman to take advantage of the privilege of addressing the House without being in order. In my opinion the question is not a matter of urgent public importance at the present time, or one of such a nature that the usual notice should not be given.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE: This matter is absolutely urgent. When a returned soldier, as I know for a positive fact, can produce the proof that he has been actually insulted on Sparks street, and the stripes showing the different battles through which he has been have been torn off his arm and a public exhibition has been made—

The Hon. the ACTING SPEAKER: Order. The honourable gentleman, having spoken on the point of order, is not permitted to speak again.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: In cases of this kind I think the easiest way is the best. This is an unfortunate incident, which would not have occurred if the officer who committed the insult had known what he was doing. The honourable the leader of the House has asked the honourable gentleman who raised this question to give him the facts and allow the matter to stand over until to-morrow. I would advise my honourable friend to accept the offer. I feel just as keenly on this matter as anyone could, but under the circumstances I would advise my honourable friend, as it comes so near to himself, to accept the advice of the honourable the leader of the House and let the matter stand until tomorrow.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am not going to say any more about it. I give notice of motion to that effect. I will call the attention of the Government to this incident and ask whether, on the authority of the Minister of Militia or any of his subordinates, a man has the right to tear the French colours off the arm of a British soldier—colours won in France and Flanders—on the ground that they should not be worn in Canada. Secondly, I will ask, is that blind-eyed soldier who wore a soft cap obliged to wear a stiff one on the order of that officer?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Can my honourable friend give the name of the officer?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I was not present, but I know the victim of the insult. Here was an officer on Sparks street, and it is put up to me to find out who he was.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The best way to get the information the honourable gentleman wants is to allow the minister to inquire into the facts.

Hon. Mr. Cloran, by leave of the House, withdrew his motion for adjournment and gave notice of his inquiry.

TREATMENT OF DISABLED SOLDIERS.

SIR HENRY NORMAN'S REPORT.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. BOYER: On Thursday last there was a discussion in this honourable House on the Returned Soldiers Bill. I had the honour of addressing the House, and I called attention to a report of Sir Henry Norman on the treatment of disabled soldiers in France. I wanted that report printed in Hansard, and with that end in view I handed it to one of the reporters. Later it was returned to me. I said in my speech that this report read like poetry, that the information it contained was most valuable, and I am sure that every honourable gentleman here would read it with the greatest pleasure. Is there any possible means of my getting this report printed, in Hansard or otherwise, so that it may be circulated amongst us and amongst the public?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would suggest to my honourable friend the undesirability of a pamphlet so large as the report which he holds in his hand being placed on the Hansard. It would establish a very bad precedent. Interesting as the report is, I should not like to see it placed on Hansard; but I would suggest to my honourable friend that the Joint Committee of both Houses on Printing might sanction the printing of it, and if he will be good enough to lay it upon the Table I shall be very glad to take the matter up with the Chairman of the Senate section of the Joint Committee on Printing, and shall strongly urge upon him the desirability of having the report printed.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

CORRECTION OF NEWSPAPER STATEMENT.

Hon. T. J. BOURQUE: I rise to a question of privilege. I have seen in the Ottawa Evening Journal of August 15 the following article:

> Senator Bourque is in receipt of the news that one of his nephews has been awarded the Military Cross. Dr. Bourque has three sons and one daughter on active service, a good example of the way in which Acadians have come to the colours.

I desire to explain this matter so that there may be no misunderstanding, and so that credit may be given to the person who is entitled to it. In New Brunswick there are two Dr. Bourques; I am one of them and the other is Dr. L. N. Bourque of Moncton, who is my cousin. I am sorry that I have no sons. My family is composed of three daughters. Dr. Bourque of Moncton is the Dr. Bourque who has three sons and a daughter at the front.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT (JURORS) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 97, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (respecting jurors).

He said: This legislation is introduced in pursuance of the authority of Parliament to deal with procedure in criminal matters. There has been more or less diversity of legislation on this subject among the different provinces of Canada—not as to the number of stand-bys, but rather as to the size of the juries which are empanelled from time to time. It would seem that in some of the provinces the jury panels have been limited to a certain number; in other provinces legislation has been introduced by which the jury panel for the trial of criminal cases is practically unlimited. The consequence is that, in the absence of a limitation upon the number of jurors who may be called to stand by, the Crown is permitted to ask practically all the jurors who may be empanelled to stand by, which is manifestly unfair. It is therefore proposed that the Criminal Code should be amended to provide, in the language of the Bill, that "the Crown may not direct any number of jurors to stand by in excess of forty-eight, unless the judge presiding at the trial, upon special cause shown, so orders." That will give uniformity to our criminal procedure throughout the Dominion, and at the same time will not interfere with the action of those provinces that may choose not to place a limitation upon their jury panels.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: May I ask the honourable leader of the Government if under that a certain number of jurors challenged by the prisoner or defendant could be brought in again?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Bill does not in any way deal with the right of challenge. The challenge of jurors remains the same as it is to-day in the Criminal Code. This amendment will certainly be an advantage to the accused, inasmuch as it places a limitation upon the Crown in asking jurors to stand by. It seems to me manifestly unfair and not in the interest of the accused that the Crown prosecutor should have the right to call up an unlimited panel of jurors, and ask the whole of that panel to stand by until he can practically procure a jury which he himself may know will be adverse to the prisoner. It is manifestly in the interest of fair play that this legislation should be passed.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I am inclined to think that this Bill is a move in the right direction; but I do not quite see why the matter has been allowed to stand as long as it has. The old clause in the Criminal Code which deals with this question says:

> The Crown shall have power to challenge all juries peremptorily and may direct any number of jurors not peremptorily challenged by the accused to stand by until all the jurors have been called who are available for the purpose of trying that indictment.

Now, it seems to me that we are curtailing the power of the Crown in that matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: My honourable friend has referred to the legislation of the provinces. I understand that the provinces have the power of passing legislation for the purpose of constituting the courts, and they pass laws regulating the number of jurors on the panel. This Bill has, I understand, been introduced at the present time because of legislation enacted by some of the provinces increasing the panel of jurors to a considerable number.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: One hundred.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: An honourable gentleman says one hundred. I have not seen the Act myself, and do not know exactly what the number is. The honourable leader of the Government has not given any particular reason why it is necessary to bring this legislation down now.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman has just stated the reasons.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But we have had section 933 in the Criminal Code for a good many years.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The honourable gentleman did not mention any actual hardship that had occurred as a result of the Crown having this unlimited power. The legislation under which we have been working for a great many years has also, I understand, been the law in England, I think for more than a century. Therefore it seems to me rather curious that, unless some particular case of hardship has arisen, this legislation should be introduced at the present time.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I come from a province which is a storm-centre in matters of legislation. We had before us yesterday a Bill which was introduced because of the action of the province of Manitoba in claiming that goods imported for the Crown should be free of duty. This legislation also is no doubt introduced for the purpose of interfering with the action of the province of Manitoba. The Legislature of Manitoba at its last session decided on a panel of, I think, 100 jurors. The Bill now before us, as the honourable leader of the House states, is for the purpose of favouring the accused. We have had a good many accused in Manitoba. The defence for the accused ex-ministers asked for and received a list of jurors, and it is well known in the province that counsel betrayed the trust reposed in them and actually canvassed the whole of the fifty jurors empanelled; so it appeared to the legal department of the province of Manitoba that it was not possible to get a fair jury to try those ex-ministers. Consequently the number of jurors was increased, and it seems to me that the province was fully justified in making that increase in order to obtain a fair jury to try those ex-ministers. That was the occasion of the increase. I may say that since that time those ex-ministers have been excused from going to trial again on account of having doctors' certificates, though I do not know that they are very sick. So there is to be no trial for the present, and probably there will be no trial in the future. At the trial they did have, when the jury disagreed, there was a verdict of nine to three against the accused; a new trial was ordered, and the Attorney General of the province, acting on the knowledge he had of what was being done, increased the jurors to 100. I have no doubt at all that this Bill is now introduced particularly for the purpose of giving an advantage to the accused—the accused in Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I have had considerable experience in the matter of juries, having been for thirty years Crown prosecutor, and being Crown prosecutor still. I may say at the outset that for the past thirty years I have always felt that it was unfair for the Crown to have the right, especially in murder cases, to challenge the entire jury panel, leaving the accused, whether for murder, arson, or other crimes, the right to challenge twelve. I have always felt as a Crown prosecutor that I was not dealing fairly by the accused, because under British law every man is held to be innocent until the Crown proves him guilty, and I have always felt that it was mean, to say the least, that the Crown should take advantage of the accused. I may tell this honourable House, and it is well known, that while acting as Crown prosecutor I very seldom put a juror aside —probably not one out of ten whose names were called; but I have seen some prosecutors put aside ten, fifteen, or nineteen out of twenty so as to secure a certain juror to find that the prisoner was guilty. I have denounced the practice in open court. But I never availed myself, as Crown prosecutor, of the privilege of setting an entire panel aside; there was in my heart too much justice, too much fellow-feeling. But I tell the Government that, in introducing this Bill, and attempting to have it passed by Parliament, they are doing so, not for the welfare or the comfort or solace of the accused; they are attempting to put this Bill through Parliament for party and political purposes and those alone, and those party and political purposes exist, fortunately, only in one province—the province of Manitoba. If that dispute had not arisen in Manitoba, this measure, which the honourable the leader of the Government has stated is for the relief of the accused, would never have been introduced; therefore, it is a party and political measure. On the merits of the Bill, I am prepared to vote for it, so that the Crown may have no more rights of challenge than the attorney for the defence. Still this Bill would give the Crown four times more opportunity to pack a jury than the defendant or the accused would have. Now, while I am in favour of the relief of the accused, I am not in favour of the Government's object in having this Bill passed for the relief of accused men in Manitoba at the present moment; and, if the Government were wise and heeded public opinion, they would hold this Bill over until after the Manitoba case is tried and adjudged. That would mean the six months hoist, and, of course, the Government will not accept that because it would look like a vote of want of confidence. I am throwing out to the Government the Christian suggestion to keep this Bill in mind, but not to pass it at present. Is not that a fair proposition? What is the need of hurry in putting it on the statute book? To prevent justice being done according to the laws of Manitoba. I ask that this bill be postponed to another parliament, because it is presented now only for political and party purposes.

The Hon. the ACTING SPEAKER: May I remind the honourable gentleman that it is not permissible under the rules of the Senate to impute motives for what has been done.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If a member of Parliament cannot challenge the conduct of the Government on public questions, then I, as a Canadian, want to know where I stand in public discussions? I charge the Government here to-day with introducing this Bill for party and political purposes.

The Hon. the ACTING SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Then I charge that this Government has introduced this Bill for non-party and non-political purposes. Which is true? I leave it to the general public to decide. I cannot leave it to this honourable House, because I know how they would decide it. If it were not for that fact, I would vote with my whole heart and soul for the principle of this Bill; but under the existing conditions I am opposed to it, and I ask the Government to withdraw it. If they do this, it will not make many people suffer. During the next three or four months this Government will cease to live; but the Bill can be brought again before Parliament and can be enacted, and the honourable the leader of the Government will not need to look for a seconder on his side of the House, for I will second the motion.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie has stated that the number of jurors is 100; but I understand that it is 250. That statement was made over and over again by the Minister of Justice and it was not contradicted. Formerly the number of possible stand-bys was 48; now the Crown can stand by 250.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I think the number of jurors who may be summoned is 250, but that is for three different courts to be held at one time in Winnipeg.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That would not be possible unless there were 250 on the panel. There is a long history attached to this custom. It was not originally part of the jury system of England; it was an abuse that grew up under the Tudors. It was one of the things that were changed after the revolution of 1688. In the province of Nova Scotia the number is down to 48, because there they had two panels of 24 each. When one was exhausted they would go on with the other. I think this is very good legislation, because it makes the number of stand-asides 48 in all the provinces, and I think it is essential in many cases to protect the prisoner from getting an unfair trial at the instance of the Attorney General if he chooses to stand aside the whole panel.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I have not any strong feeling with respect to this matter. I think that perhaps on the whole the Bill goes in the right direction; but I wish to call the attention of the honourable the leader of the Government to the question of its constitutionality. Amongst the matters that are left to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces by the British North America Act, section 92, I find this in paragraph 14:

> The administration of justice in the province, including the constitution, maintenance, and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and including procedure in civil matters in those courts.

Is not the question of deciding upon the number of jurors one that deals with the constitution of the court?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, it is procedure.

Hon. Mr. POWER: In criminal matters the court is not constituted until there is a jury. The jury is as essential—in fact, almost more essential, than the judge; and until the court is constituted it cannot proceed. Paragraph 14 of section 92 of the British North America Act says that the constitution and organization of provincial courts, both of civil and criminal jurisdiction, is a matter within provincial powers.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will look at paragraph 27 of section 91 he will find: "The criminal law, except the constitution of courts of criminal jurisdiction, but including the procedure in criminal matters" appertains to the Parliament of Canada. This is purely a matter of procedure. We do not assume to fix the number of the panel. It may be contended that the panel forms part of the constitution of the court, but the number of stand-bys does not. That is purely a matter of procedure.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 118, an Act to amend the Government Railways Act.

He said: The object of this Bill is to put the Government railways under the Railway Commission in the same way as the other railways of Canada. Exceptions are made as to claims against the railway, as to expropriation clauses of the Railway Act, and as to the imposition of fines as against the Crown. The question was raised in another place as to why the penalties which are imposed under the Railway Act should not be imposed against the Government railways. That, of course, would be a departure that is entirely uncalled for. I think it is unnecessary for me to enlarge upon the policy of placing the Government railways under the authority of the Railway Board. I think public opinion throughout the Dominion has been expressed very strongly in that direction for some years, particularly since the organization of the Railway Board. I know that on several occasions this House has expressed itself very strongly on this matter. We have now reached the point when we think we can bow to public opinion in that regard, and that idea is crystallized in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The object of this Bill may possibly be a good one, but I do not understand exactly how far the board is going to have control over the Government railways. The Government railways at the present time are being administered under the department—directly under the charge of the Minister of Railways. I presume that up to the present time there has been no authority to deal with the question of rates charged by Government railways. If my impression is right, I suppose that now it is going to be possible for the public to appeal to the Board of Railway Commissioners to deal with questions regarding traffic which now arise between them and the Minister of Railways. I presume that it is not intended that the administration of the Government railways should in any way be taken out of the hands of the minister.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CONSERVATION OF CANADIAN TRADE.

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE REFERRED BACK.

The Senate resumed from yesterday the consideration of the third report of the special committee appointed to inquire into and report upon the method or methods of conserving and increasing our domestic and overseas trade.

Hon. GIDEON ROBERTSON: Honourable gentlemen, the object of the report of the committee being, I believe, to promote a discussion as to the methods which ought to be pursued with a view to increasing the production of wheat and foodstuffs in Canada, I take it that it is the opinion of probably all concerned that this is desirable, not only in the interests of our own people, but in the interests of the people inhabiting the countries with whom we are allied in the prosecution of the war, and who are looking to Canada to assist in feeding them. It is desirable from the standpoint of the welfare of all the people that the wheat production should be increased. The recommendations of the committee referred to certain things which might be done to assist toward this end.

Without entering into a debate or discussion of the various sections of the recommendations, I should like to call the attention of this honourable House to two of the main suggestions contained in the report, and to offer some suggestions of my own as to what, in my humble opinion, would perhaps meet the need.

I think that every Government in this country since Confederation has to a greater or less extent assisted in the protection of industries which it was desired to encourage. We seem to be all in accord in the view that agriculture at the present time ought to be encouraged, fostered and protected; and to that end it seems to me that anything which would tend to increase the number of acres ploughed, and the number of bushels raised, ought to be done. A farmer with a team of horses in Eastern Canada can do a certain amount of work in the course of a season. If by means of machinery he can greatly increase the production resulting from his labour, it is, I think, the duty of the Government to assist in bringing it to him and placing it at his disposal. I would therefore respectfully suggest to the House that, as a matter of expediency, as a war measure, for the purpose of bringing about the end which we all desire to be accomplished, the restrictions or duties upon agricultural implements ought to be at least temporarily abandoned. In that way more would be done, in my humble opinion, to encourage farmers to increase production than by any bonus system which could be devised. The farming problems of eastern and western Canada are not at all similar. In Eastern Canada most of the land that it is possible to cultivate is now being cultivated, and it is not profitable or proper for the farmer to devote all of his attention to one particular line of agriculture. In Western Canada, however, where there are millions of acres of arable and untilled land, there is room for tremendous development; and it seems to me that if it is imperative that more wheat should be produced in order that our own people and the allied countries should be fed, the matter ought to be undertaken on a large scale rather than by encouraging the individual. I think that the individual farmer would be very materially encouraged if the suggestion which I have just mentioned were adopted. But if that is not sufficient to meet the requirements, so far as production is concerned, surely the Government is able to farm as well as the individual. It would seem to me to be practicable in our Northwest Provinces, where we have millions of acres of uncultivated land, for the Government itself to undertake the work of farming. The Government might employ a thousand men, with machinery, if you like, as an experiment. At the present time there is probably not more than one farmer to each 100 acres in the West; that, to my mind, is about the average. A thousand men could cultivate 100,000 acres, with the use of modern machinery. At an average yield, that would mean in the neighbourhood of 2,500,000 bushels of grain. It seems to me that a plan of that sort would do more to increase the quantity of wheat raised than the system of paying a bounty for the breaking of a few additional acres of wild land which may be adjacent to a section that a farmer is now cultivating. Then, when the war is over we shall have hundreds of thousands of men coming back to this country, whom this Government is proposing to assist as far as possible in taking up land. Would it not be a golden opportunity to say to them: "Here is the machinery; the land is broken and tilled; we have prepared it for you and made it productive during your absence, and have raised food to feed you while you were away." It seems to me that some competent gentleman or some committee of competent gentlemen could sit down and work out a scheme on a basis of that sort, on an even larger scale than has been proposed by the Committee, and that it would more nearly meet the requirements than anything else that could be done.

I desire to touch briefly on one other point which was referred to in the Committee's recommendation, namely, the importing of Asiatic labour. I have no objection whatever to all the labour that is necessary being brought into this country; but I must respectfully dissent from the view, which is implied in the recommendation, that there is at the present time a dearth of necessary labour. In the month of October of last year I was in the city of Winnipeg for a considerable period. It was at a time when the farmers of the Northwest urgently required help; they were very short of help; and yet there were walking the streets of Winnipeg at that time hundreds of men who would not go on the farms. Now, honourable gentlemen, before importing Asiatic or Oriental labour into Canada, which would create additional unrest amongst the working classes in this country —for it would meet with their disapproval and even resentment—we ought to take steps to force into active and productive employment the alien enemies of our country, who are now within our borders and are being fed, and decline to work on the farms. During the pre-war days, when railway construction was at its height and thousands of men were engaged in that occupation, many men from foreign lands came to us and were employed at that kind of work. They have the idea that that is the only kind of work which they desire. Therefore, I say that before importing, or even considering the question of importing, any Oriental labour into Canada, everything possible ought to be done to employ profitably all the available labour that we have in this country, whether willing or not, to work on the farms.

The chairman of the committee, the honourable gentleman who introduced this resolution (Hon. Mr. Nicholls), stated yesterday that Oriental labour had been introduced with apparent success into South Africa. I desire to point out to this honourable House that there were unpleasant and even disastrous results from that experiment. It is true that Asiatic labour was taken to South Africa. It is also true that after the close of the South African war there were many thousands of soldiers who decided that they would remain in South Africa and attempt to grow up with that new country, but they were unable even to obtain employment, and subsequently many of them trekked back to England. The matter became the subject of consideration in the British Parliament, and it was only upon the urgent demands made upon the floor of the British Parliament that those Orientals were finally shipped back to their homeland. We cannot afford, in these days of stress and industrial unrest in this country, to take the risk of further aggravating the situation by even suggesting the importation of Asiatic labour into Canada at the present time. All honourable gentlemen know that prior to the outbreak of the war a shipload of British subjects, if you please, were detained in Vancouver harbour and were not permitted to land. They would never have been permitted to land by the people of British Columbia. I feel sure that our people in the provinces east of British Columbia are not fairly familiar with all the disadvantages and undesirable features of having an Oriental population in this country. But I feel that I am within the bounds of truth when I say that in all probability, if Asiatics were scattered over this country in farm service, they would in a short time be driven off the farms by the owners, because they are not a desirable people; their moral standard is not high enough to justify us in permitting them to mingle with our people—our wives and daughters. Because of many things which I have seen in British Columbia and know of, and because of the inferior standard of living which they invariably follow, I think it is not desirable that we should consider for one moment the importation of Asiatic labour until the need of it becomes very much more acute than it is at the present time.

Hon. JOHN MILNE: I listened with interest to the report presented by the honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls), and I think the honourable gentleman and the committee have done a god service in suggesting to us what ought to be done. To my mind it is at the present time almost impossible to get farm labourers to go to the West. I know that for the last ten years, when the western crops were ready, both the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian Northern railways have had harvesting excursions to carry the farmers' sons to the West to help in gathering the harvest. So the shortage of labour is not exactly new. The fact of the matter is that we are short of labour all over this country, in the factories as well as in the farming communities, and the farmers are not worse off than we are.

One thing I have observed is that the farmers of Ontario, and probably those in the West do not encourage their sons to stay on the farms as they should. I know for a fact that a great many farmers' sons have left the farms and gone in to the cities to work in factories simply because they did not get proper encouragement at home and because they could make more money in the city and get a better start for themselves. I do not think the farmer has much more to complain of than we have. There is no doubt that the farmers in the West are doing all they can to raise the crops. They have a better crop this year than they had in 1916. Formerly a good many young men came over from the United States to help in gathering the harvest; but that will not continue, because the United States has entered the war and will want all the labour it can obtain to take care of its own affairs.

There is another matter, one which was referred to by the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) and by the honourable gentleman from Welland (Hon Mr. Roberston). I do not think it would be in the interest of this country to do anything in the way of giving free agricultural machinery to the people in the West. I know, and I think most of you honourable gentleman are aware, that millions of money has been sent to this country by United States capitalists for the erection in Canada of factories for the manufacture of agricultural implements. There are the Deering Company, the Oliver Plow Company, the Sawyer-Massey, and many more companies all making goods for the West. Do you suppose that those people from the United States who have invested their money in Canadian factories will sell goods direct to the West and thus lose the capital which they have invested in Eastern Canada? I say it would ruin the whole of that industry and would mean the loss of all that money which has been invested here; and I cannot see why the Government, at this particular time, should remit the duties when they are so badly in need of money as they are to-day. Therefore I think the proposal ought to be considered very carefully. It is the thin edge of the wedge. The farmers are not treated any worse than, or even as badly as, the manufacturers are. Honourable gentleman are aware that Sir Thomas White, the Minister of Finance, has not been satisfied merely with taking so much from business profits, but is also proposing to tax the manufacturers' incomes. In fact, the manufacturers are bearing the biggest burdens in this country, and the farmers have practically nothing to pay; but I believe that some day or other the farmers will have to pay their proper share. As I understand, the Government has no money for the purpose of bonuses or bounties on anything at the present time; they need all the money they can get; and therefore they have need of customs duties to help them to meet their enormous expenditures. All classes must share equally in bearing the burdens of this country. The manufacturers and merchants have at the present time the heaviest load to carry, and the farmers are left practically free. If the farmer is to-day getting $2.30 a bushel for his wheat, he is making more money than he ever made before. It must be remembered, as I stated the other day, that iron is worth at least $55 a ton. Probably it was worth $60 at that time. Hon. ourable gentleman are aware that agricultural implements are for the most part made of iron and steel. The cost of labour also is higher than has ever been known before in this country. How, then, can the farmers in the West expect to buy their machinery at the prices which they paid for it in 1915? It cannot be done. The cost of raw materials has advanced so much that the price must be increased in proportion. The farmers who are judiciously looking after their farms are making more money, in proportion to the capital invested, than any firm I know of.

I feel that the honourable gentleman from from Toronto and his committee are doing all they can; but we must look at the facts as they exist to-day, and not go beyond them. There is no doubt that the farmers in the West want free machinery, but it is impossible for them to get that, and they cannot buy machinery at the price for which they bought it in 1915. Honourable gentlemen, I will not take up any more of the time of this honourable House. but I am speaking from experience, as I myself have a branch in the West and know the conditions existing there.

Hon. E. D. SMITH: Honourable gentlemen, the question under consideration is a very important one. The committee which was appointed for the purpose of considering the matter have brought in a report with which not every one can agree entirely; but it has started a discussion which ought to be productive of good results. The report referred particularly to the means of bringing about greater production, and I submit that that is exactly in accordance with the reference which was made to them—that it is something which would improve our domestic and foreign trade.

Surely there is nothing that will do that to a greater extent than increased production. There are two methods suggested in the report. The first is that the Government should assist in the breaking up of new land. One honourable gentleman has urged that the Government should do this on its own account, while an other thinks that the farmers should be bonused in order to induce them to do so. I would agree with that on one condition, namely, that a farmer should prove that he had already cultivated all the land previously broken up on his farm before receiving any bonus. Otherwise he might say: "This is an opportunity to get the Government to pay for breaking up new land for me; I will leave the old land this year." The second method suggested for getting greater production is the importation of oriental labour.

There is no doubt in my mind that there is just one thing which will cause greater production on the farm, and that is to make the business more profitable to the farmer. We have high prices at the present time, but this condition is only temporary. The farmer may say: "This profit will last for only a year; probably the war will end in another year, and then prices will go down, and I cannot afford to enter into any expensive experiments, or to invest in new and expensive apparatus to bring about greater production on my farm." If the Government could see its way to offering the farmers a minimum price for their products for three years to come, as has been done in Great Britain, I think it would give a permanency to the profit of the farmers, and they would feel justified in going to expense in order about greater production.

Of course, the great difficulty is the question of labour. How can we increase the labour to assist the farmer? There is no doubt that at the present time every farmer is straining every nerve, and doing everything he possibly can with the labour that he has at his disposal, to produce the greatest quantity of foodstuffs that can possibly be produced on his farm. He is impelled by two motives patriotism and profit. He can do no more than he is doing unless he has the labour. How can we supply him with labour? The report brought in by the Committee suggests bringing Oriental labour into Canada. I have no objection to Oriental labour being brought in temporarily. I would be quite prepared to cast aside all personal feelings in order to help to win the war, and in order to do that it is necessary to feed our troops at the front. The great objection to bringing in Oriental labour is the fact that contracts would have to be made for a term of years, and in the winter months we have nothing for the labourers to do on the farm. It has occurred to me that it might be possible for the Government to make some arrangement with France, if she imports through Canada a large number of Orientals, whereby they could stop off for a couple of months during harvest time and help us out? I have no doubt that some arrangement of this kind might be made to assist the farmers in the West. Of course, these Orientals would not be engaged singly and scattered all over the country, but would be divided into groups on the large farms of the West. I am sure the question of skill would not enter very largely into the matter. If one-quarter of the farmer's staff is trained, he can easily make use of the other three-quarters who are untrained men. My own suggestion, in order to increase production, is to get tractors at work. Tractors have been common in the West for a great many years. They are not common in the East. The honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) asked if it would not be the proper thing for some of the provincial Governments to undertake to test out tractors and inform the farmers as to the best kind, and so on. I may say that Ontario has been doing this very thing during last year. The province of Ontario bought seventy-five tractors and scattered them through the province, where they are being used to plough the land. I have no doubt that if the honourable gentleman would write to the Ontario Governement, he would get a report on this work, which would be very useful to him. If it is not yet in print I am sure that it will be this fall. Tractors cost a good deal of money.

The remedy proposed by the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson), which was seconded by the honourable gentleman from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson), is to allow tractors to come in duty-free. That is the panacea which my honourable friend from Portage la Prairie has for all the ills which flesh is heir to. I would not have any hesitation, at a time like this, in admitting agricultural implements free if that were the only remedy; but it strikes me that there is a much better and fairer remedy, one which will not injure business in this country, but which will effect the same result. If implements were brought in free, it would mean that manufacturers in this country would be handicapped, because they have to pay duty on their raw materials.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Take it off.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: There is no end to that; you go on and on. To my mind the remedy is to give a bonus to farmers who buy a tractor and who will break a certain quantity of land within twelve months. I suggest that the bonus might be as much as $250 to a farmer who breaks up 250 acres of land.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Who pays the bonus?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: The Dominion Government. A great deal of this money would come from the duty paid on the tractors coming into the country. The honourable gentleman spoke of 40 per cent duty on tractors. I find that previous to the war the duty was only 20 per cent, if my honourable friend will only stop to reckon it.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Add 7½ per cent war tax.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: Yes, add 7½ per cent on everything but fertilizer. A tractor ought to plough from 250 to 300 acres in a year; perhaps it could be made to plough three times that much; and it will last ten years. On that basis it will plough 3,000 acres. The duty on the tractor and the plough and the whole outfit would be about $300, or 10 cents an acre, and I do not think my honourable friend would suggest that any enterprising and energetic farmer in the West would be deterred from buying a tractor because of a tax of 10 cents an acre.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Spread over the next ten years.

Hon. Mr. SMITH: As I was saying, I would suggest a bonus to the farmer who buys a tractor and who ploughs up a given quantity of land within a year. That would be one means of helping the farmer out with his labour. It takes only one man to operate a tractor. If we got even 10,000 tractors into operation, it would require 10,000 men to operate them, whereas to do the work with horses would require 40,000 men. This would effect a saving of 30,000 men.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Does the honourable gentleman think the Government should pay the duty on the tractors?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: I suggested a bonus.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Why not give the farmers enough money to pay the duty?

Hon. Mr. SMITH: It is approximately that. This is a time when we must do things that we would not do in times of peace. My suggestion, if carried out, would solve the difficulty to some extent. It seems to me that either we must import labour or by means of machinery enable the farmers to do more with the labour that they have at the present time.

Hon. H. W. LAIRD: Honourable gentlemen, I wish to commend the energy of the committee which prepared the report now before the House for consideration. I have some comment to make upon certain features of the report, some of which I as a Western man feel that I can approve of, while others strike me as being objectionable. In clause 1 and clause 2 reference is made to operations which it is thought desirable to start this year and mention is made of the large acreage of land that would be necessary for increased production next year. In another place reference is made to the crops to be raised within the next ensuing two years. Whatever action the House may take on this report, it is quite certain to my mind that it is impossible to carry out the suggestions made so that they will be effective this year. The recognized rules of agriculture in Western Canada do not provide for breaking land and raising a crop on it in the same year; so that anything that might be done by way of preparation during the coming year would be of no use until the following year.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: The report is simply agitating so that something may be done.

Hon. Mr. LAIRD: It says that the Government of Canada should, without delay, endeavour to encourage the breaking of a large acreage of wild lands in order that such new soil may be ready for cultivation next year. I read that as meaning that grain would be grown next year.

Clause 2 of the report suggests the payment of bounties for the cultivation of wild lands. That is a principle with which I cannot agree, because the western farmer does not approve of the payment of bounties to bolster up other industries, and I do not think he could be expected to permit of the same principle being applied to himself. Farming is on a paying basis to-day, and the larger acreage a farmer has under cultivation the greater is his profit. The farmer is able to earn his own bounty without any artificial assistance.

It seems to me that the clause providing that tractors should be furnished for the purpose of breaking up wild lands might be considered favourably by this House. This involves an entirely different principle from that of paying bounties. The transaction would be between the Government and the farmer. The farmer would pay for the service furnished, and that would close the transaction. There has been some question raised as to the practicability of tractors, and their ability to perform this work. I remember when the large tractors were first introduced into Western Canada. They cost a great deal of money, $4,000 each, and very often they were put into the hands of incompetent operators. At that time the tractor business was in somewhat the same position as the automobile business; it had not been reduced to a science, and the result was that with imperfect machines and incompetent operators difficulties were bound to be met. I have seen as many as one hundred of these large tractors being scrapped and sold as junk in the yards at Regina. Since that time, like the automobile business, the tractor business has been reduced to a science. As the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) said yesterday, anyone could see hundreds of these machines in use throughout Western Canada. I may say that there are ten or a dozen different kinds of these machines giving perfect satisfaction in the hands of competent operators. The class of operators has been inproved by reason of the schools of instruction which are held during the winter months.

If tractors are satisfactory implements, the question then arises whether the farmers would be disposed to take advantage of what is suggested in this report. In my opinion, they would be. There would be hundreds, if not thousands, who would be only too glad to have the Government break land for them in addition to that which they already had under cultivation, and they would willingly pay for the service. It may be asked, why does not the farmer do it himself? The reason is that the season is so short. From the opening of spring until frost comes in the fall, the farmer's whole plant—horses and machinery—is kept busy every moment of the day in carrying on the ordinary operations of the farm; therefore he cannot break additional land unless he provides himself with extra men, teams, and machinery. For this reason he would welcome the opportunity of utilising the service of Government tractors if they were placed at his disposal on reasonable terms.

I recall the time when the breaking and back-setting of new land could be done in Western Canada for the sum of $4.50 per acre. That service now costs at least $7 an acre, and it is very difficult to get it done even at that figure. So that if this work could be undertaken under a government system of tractors, and the farmers were charged, say, the actual cost, which would probably be in the neighbourhood of $3 per acre, I am quite sure there would be a very large number of farmers, in Western Canada particularly, who would be glad to avail themselves of the privilege.

It seems almost a paradox to suggest increasing the area of production while there is admittedly a shortage of labour. The present shortage is probably more acute now that it ever has been. No one realizes it more than I do myself; but during the long period in which I have lived in Western Canada there has never been a single season when the question of shortage of labour has not been raised, and there has never been a single year in which the crop has not been successfully gathered, whether the supply of labour was great or small; and I believe that if the production were increased by means of an increased acreage, the question of harvesting the crop, even under conditions such as exist at present, would solve itself in some satisfactory way.

This brings up the question of the importation of Asiatics to assist in that work. The importation of Asiatic labour has always been in such disfavour in this country that we hardly dared to consider it for a moment; but these are times when we do things which we consider to be expedient but which we would not do under other circumstances. When the allied forces required additional labour at the front they did not hesitate to contract for 160,000 Chinese labourers. These labourers are being put at work behind the lines and are releasing so many soldiers, who are thus able to take their position in the trenches; and there is ample scope for hundreds of thousands of those Asiatics to work behind the lines. They can do such work as well as white men. The Allies have not hesitated, in an emergency, to adopt that system; and, while it may not be at present necessary for us to do likewise, it may become necessary for us in the future to do things which at present we would probably not think of doing. In any case, if the acreage under cultivation could be increased by one hundred thousand, two hundred thousand or five hundred thousand acres, and if it were necessary to secure additional labour in order to harvest the crop of grain on that increased acreage, I do not think anybody in this country would stop to consider whether the help obtained was red, black, or yellow.

Different opinions, which have been very interesting, have been expressed during the course of this debate. We have had many criticisms, but not a great deal of constructive criticism, and very few suggestions which would take the place of those made in the report of the committee. One honourable gentleman suggested a movement to get the people back to the land. That suggestion is to my mind a mere platitude. We cannot get people back to the land unless they want to go. Another honourable gentleman doubted the practicability of the tractor. He can satisfy himself on that point by seeing hundreds of tractors in operation in Western Canada, used for the very purposes mentioned in the committee's report. Another honourable gentleman advocated the establishment of demonstration farms. They are very good institutions in their way, but they would not provide immediate relief for the present situation. Another honourable gentleman threw up his hands in holy horror at the idea of bringing Asiatics or Orientals into Canada.

The honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson) has the idea that all that is necessary to do is wipe out the customs duties on agricultural machinery, and give the farmers wider markets. Well, the honourable gentleman had the opportunity for sixteen long years to carry into effect, when his party was in power, the very proposal he now suggests, so that he cannot blame this House if it now receives with incredulity the suggestions to do today what he failed to do in the past when he had the opportunity.

However, these are days of changing and conflicting views. Political ideas are now in the melting pot, and my own opinion is that the day is coming when in response to public opinion of Western Canada the Government of the day will be compelled to reconsider and reconstruct the present duties on agricultural machinery. If we are to ask the farmer to increase production for the welfare of the state, we should at the same time put him in a position to best carry that work into effect by reducing the cost of his implements of trade.

It may be considered political heresy for me to advocate such a change, but no one can live in Western Canada and disregard the strong demand for the abolition of customs duties on agricultural implements, such as is being made to-day by the man who rides the plough and has the votes.

I am not narrow enough to say that the reduction of the tariff should be confined, by any means, to agricultural implements at the demand of the western farmer. The present tariff is antiquated and out of date and needs revision along scientific lines to conform to conditions which have changed so much since the last revision. The western farmer knows what he wants and will not be satisfied until he gets it, but at the same time he is broad enough to support a tariff which gives justice to the other interests of the country while demanding justice for himself. A scientifically readjusted customs tariff may be too much to expect in the throes of the present struggle, but the Government which fails to keep its ear to the ground and refuses to hear the rumbling of public opinion for tariff revision after the war, would be out of touch with the people and its usefulness might well be questioned.

Out of all this discussion I should like to see something tangible result. I would suggest that preparations be made during the winter for the carrying into effect of some of the recommendations of the committee during the spring of next year. I would eliminate the bounty feature, because I do not think the farmers would be in favour of it; I do not think they would accept it. I would eliminate the recommendation with regard to Oriental labour, because I do not think we are prepared to accept the services of that class of labour at the present time, and it will be time enough to meet the situation when it arises. But if the Government started to put into effect the recommendation of the committee by purchasing even 25 tractors and distributing them at strategic points throughout the three western provinces, at an expenditure of from $50,000 to $100,000, we should at least get the benefit of whatever increased production resulted from the operation of those machines—which would be an important factor—and we should, above everything else, prove the utility of such an enterprise. That to my mind, would be one of the great advantages in at least making a start during the coming year. Besides proving the utility of the tractors, it would demonstrate whether or not the system of having government-owned tractors could be made effective and of advantage to the country. It may be that the utilization of even a small number of these machines would be the means of enormously increasing production in Western Canada, and thus enable the western farmer to assist the country to a great extent in liquidating its rapidly growing war debts.

Hon. F. NICHOLLS: Honourable gentlemen, in rising to close the debate, I desire first of all to thank the honourable leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) for his kindly remarks in regard to the industry which has been shown by myself in the preparation of the committee's report. I desire to say, however, that those commendations are due entirely to the members of the committee, who have been ready to meet at all times, even at unseasonable hours, in order that something might be prepared at this late stage of the session to submit to this honourable House.

The honourable leader of the Opposition stated that the committee was hardly empowered by the resolution appointing it to deal with these questions; but I take it that the wording of the resolution gave us full power to deal with them. After all, the question of production is one that concerns overseas and domestic trade very closely. At all events, even if the committee exceeded their powers, I am glad that we took that risk, because it has been the means of bringing about one of the most interesting debates that I have listened to during the present session. I may say also —and I am giving away no state secret in saying it—that the committee, in presenting this report for your consideration, did not expect—in fact, I may say they did not desire—that it would be concurred in. We feel that these are great questions. Every member of the committee believes that the question of agriculture is one that deserves the very best consideration at the present time. We know also that the labour situation requires very close consideration; and, while we as a committee did not propose that any decisive action should be taken in connection with the employment of Asiatic labour, we felt that it was a matter which should be brought to the attention of this honourable House and of the country, so that, if it were not considered —as I have no doubt it will not be considered—a satisfactory means at this time of overcoming the shortage of labour, better methods might be adopted than the present practice of arranging every year at the last moment for the reaping of the crops. I make no apology for having brought before the House this report on behalf of the committee, because it was felt that it might lead to some action being taken, either in this House or elsewhere, which would tend towards the improvement of the unsatisfactory conditions which we have set forth.

My honourable friend from Kamloops (Hon. Mr. Bostock) probably, like myself, can cast his mind back to his childhood, when he heard nursery rhymes at his mother's knee. I remember one which has been more or less a watchword to me during life; it is very short and simple; it is:

Tender-handed stroke a nettle
And it stings you for your pains;
Grasp it like a man of mettle
And it soft as silk remains.

These questions must be dealt with by this honourable House, which is the senior legislative body in this country. If we grasp them tender-handed, we shall feel the sting, because we have taken no decisive action. We want to grasp them like men of mettle, and I believe that the debate which has occurred on this report has been productive of good, not only for the present, but also for the future.

With reference to the remarks of the honourable gentleman from Portage la Prairie (Hon. Mr. Watson), I quite realize that there would be a great difference of opinion if the question of protection versus free trade were submitted to this honourable House, and the members of the Committee, on the whole, felt that that was a question entirely beyond their purview. It is a national question. It is a fiscal question. It is a question of party politics. The electors are the only people who can decide it. Therefore a committee, or this honourable House, would be wasting time in making suggestions, because the question of the tariff is one of the great dividing lines between the political parties to-day and any suggestion on our part would have no effect. The question will be decided by the voice of the people when they next have the opportunity of expressing their opinion, and whatever view the majority of the people take on this great question is, no doubt, what the Government of the day will loyally carry out.

The honourable gentleman from South Bruce (Hon. Mr. Donnelly) stated that many people had left the farms in the province of Ontario. Strangely enough, I happened to notice in yesterday morning's Toronto Globe an article which is very pertinent to the question and which I shall read to this honourable House.

Ontario's Rural Problem.

The immediate need of the hour is to see that emergency help is sent from the cities to the country, and in sufficient volume to insure the saving of the whole of this year's harvest. Behind the question of the moment, important as that is, there looms up a problem of infinitely greater importance. This problem has to do with the maintenance of a sufficient and permanent population in rural Ontario. We are not providing for that now. For years past the townships of the province have been going back in the matter of population. They have been going back not only relatively as compared with urban centres, they have actually lost, and lost heavily, in point of numbers.

The case mentioned by Mr. Elmer Lick, in the article in Country Life department of to-day's Globe, of one concession line from which nine families have disappeared within a distance of five miles, does not stand alone. The case mentioned by Mr. J. J. Morrison, of one township which has lost seven hundred people in the last twenty-five years and fifty in the last year, is not an isolated one.

Nor are these losses natural ones, that is they are not the result of a lessened need for man-power on the land. It is not farming, it is a tragedy, when six men are found alone on nine hundred acres of good land. Such a condition spells wellnigh unbearable hardship for those directly affected and economic loss for the whole country. As Mr. Lick points out, an addition of fifty per cent to the number of workers on the farm would not only make it easier for those now there, but it could be made the means of doubling the agricultural output of the province, because all this extra labour would be available for actual production.

How is the situation to be met? The recommendation of a committee of the Senate that, as a war measure only, Asiatic labour be imported to assist in the work of tilling the soil, is a counsel of despair. If such labour is imported at all the innovation will not be of a temporary nature. The Asiatics will become a fixture in the North as blacks have remained a fixture in the South, and we shall have in Canada the same sort of problem as that by which our American neighbors are confronted.

Besides, the question of rural population is not a temporary one; it has been with us for a quarter of a century at least, and it is yearly growing more acute. It is a great deal more than a question of securing a sufficient supply of foodstuffs for this year and next, and the year after that again; it is a question of maintaining a rural population of a quality equal to that which laid the foundations of this province—the finest community of the kind the world has ever known.

If the whole character of rural Ontario is to be radically changed, and changed it will be if conditions are not altered so as to hold on the land a fair proportion of the people born there, one of the most tragical failures in the history of civilization in North America will be recorded.

Honourable gentlemen, the case cited there is very pertinent, but you will notice that while the conditions are referred to as being lamentable, there is not one word of suggestion as to how those conditions can be overcome. We have listened to several speeches in the debate on this question, and in those speeches not one word of helpful criticism has been advanced—although some of the latest speakers have really advanced suggestions which I believe to be worthy of consideration by the committee.

The honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) advanced very cogent reasons why the question of fertilizers should be given greater consideration. He claimed that the use of fertilizers would add very greatly to the production of a given area of land. If my memory serves me correctly, he mentioned that it would almost double the output; but, waiving that aside, if it would increase the output of the soil by even a small percentage, we can imagine what would be the aggregate result of that increase upon the hundreds of millions of bushels of cereals produced in this country. An increase of even 10 per cent would mean a very great addition to our national wealth. I think that the question of fertilizers, which was not dealt with in the report of the committee, is a useful and helpful suggestion that may well be considered.

In conclusion, may I say, to sum up, that the views which the committee tried to bring before this honourable House in a fair and businesslike way, in order to get the benefit of suggestions, were the following:

(1) This is primarily an agricultural country.

(2) We have vast areas of wild lands available for cultivation.

(3) There is a material shortage of farm labour to care for the acreage at present under cultivation.

(4) If production is to be increased some productive plan for providing the necessary labour must be adopted.

(5) Increased production would be a boon to the Empire and its Allies, would increase our national wealth, reduce the cost of living, and also increase the traffic for Government railways, in which the public are now and will hereafter be so largely interested.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS.

The committee, in presenting this report, has achieved its object. An explorer generally opens up a new country by following the rivers from their mouth to their source. In following up those rivers, explorers have sometimes ascended a tributary and have had to retrace their steps until finally they have reached the source. Then the mapmakers have been able to plot out the explored territory, so that the world's commerce may follow in the track that has been made by the pioneers.

In making this report we are simply following up the stream; we may have gone up one tributary or another, but we are willing to retrace our steps until we finally reach the source. Therefore, honourable gentlemen, after having expressed, on behalf of the committee of which I have the honour of being a member, the great appreciation they feel for the very interesting and intelligent manner in which this question has been discussed, I would, with the leave of the House, withdraw my motion for the adoption of the report, and move that it be referred back to the Committee for further consideration.

Hon. P. TALBOT: Honourable gentlemen, I did not intend to take any part in this debate; but during the last few moments I have considered that I would be remiss in my duty if I did not say something in connection with this great question, as I am perhaps the only representative from Western Canada who lives on the farm, who works on the farm, who entered for his homestead nearly thirty years ago, and who has made his living from it since. I want to say, if I express the opinion of the farmers of Western Canada, that we ask no favours; we do not want anything but fair play. Let us sell our goods in the best market, let us buy what we want in the cheapest market, and Western Canada will be able to look out for itself.

For years the people of this country have been saying, "Back to the land, back to the land." We have all heard this matter discussed; but I fail to see how a bonus for ploughing, a bonus on machinery, or anything of that kind will induce the people to go back to the land. There is only one thing which will induce them to go back to the land, and that is to make farming the most profitable industry in the country. The people will go back to the land of their own accord and they will remain on the land if they can have the benefits of modern civilization and the advantages enjoyed by the people who are wealthy and who live in luxury.

The motion for concurrence in the report was withdrawn, and the motion to refer the report back to the committee for further consideration was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill 67, an Act to amend the Customs Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT (INSURANCE) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 54, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (respecting Insurance).

He said: We have in the general Insurance Act to-day legislation of a somewhat similar character to that embodied in this Bill; but, owing to certain questions which have arisen as to the authority of this Parliament to legislate for the enforcement of penalties regarding companies other than those coming within the authority of the Parliament of Canada, the provisions are very largely abortive. It is proposed, therefore that this legislation should be incorporated into the Criminal Code, so that it may become enforcible against all companies. The matter is one not only affecting insurance companies, but peculiarly affecting the public. As a matter of fact, the public are more interested in this subject than the companies themselves. It is unnecessary to point out the undesirability of unauthorized agents, or even agents with limited authority, canvassing for insurance from the public, when there is no guarantee that the contract of insurance, which they may represent as that which they wish to have entered into can be enforced in favour of the beneficiary. That is very often the case.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Does this cover fire insurance as well as life insurance?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, all insurance. The details of the Bill are fairly numerous. When we go into committee we can consider them with greater particularity than I can discuss them with at this time. I simply point out the policy of the measure.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK. I think this Bill is a move in the right direction; but I will point out to the honourable leader of the Government that this Bill was introduced into the House of Commons at the same time as the Insurance Bill, which so far has not reached this House. I presume that the House of Commons was able to consider this legislation along with the legislation contained in the Insurance Bill. I do not know how far this one bears upon the other, but I think we ought to have some idea as to whether we shall be able to consider the Insurance Bill before we finally deal with this matter. The clause affecting the acts of agents, and requiring them to do a legitimate business, is a good one. I do not quite appreciate the value of the clause which deals with the question of the agent's fee. I think the practice has been followed by agents of foregoing a portion of the fee to which they are entitled on the first premium, for the purpose of writing the insurance. I do not quite understand why we should pass legislation to prevent their doing that if they want to. As I understand, it does not in any way affect the premium which is paid to the company, and therefore does not affect the liability of the insurance company to the insured. However, these matters can be dealt with in committee.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: If this Bill tends to prohibit agents from deceiving the public in negotiating insurance, it will be a very valuable measure. Some of the companies, particularly life insurance companies, in order to induce people to insure with them, make prospectuses showing the value of policies and showing much larger profits than they afterwards pay to the insured. I think that if an agent shows a printed prospectus of the value of a policy after a certain term, the company ought to be held responsible for the terms on which the insurance is affected. The companies excuse themselves on the ground that their investments do not realize the rate of interest which they state in the prospectus. If there is any provision in this Act that would make a company liable for prospectuses that are put out to the public with their authority, I would approve of it very highly. There are agents all over the country constantly making false representations and inducing people to insure, and when they come to realize on the policies they find that they are not worth what they are said to be.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

PROVINCIAL PROHIBITION ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 121, an Act to amend an Act in aid of Provincial Legislation prohibiting or restricting the sale or use of Intoxicating Liquors.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Explain.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, this is a Bill further to restrict the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage. It will be within the recollection of honourable gentlemen that at the last session of Parliament we passed a fairly drastic measure making effective the legislation that might be passed by the provinces in the direction of prohibition. This is further legislation in that direction. I may, however, point out that certain sections included in this Bill were considered by the Senate last session and this House did not see eye to eye with the House of Commons with regard to the desirability of giving effect to them. They are now before us for consideration.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Which sections are those?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My recollection is that sections 2 and 3 were before us last session.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Were not those drastic enough?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: One deals with the circulation of newspaper advertisements and circulars in the different provinces; but that legislation would have effect only in those provinces that had passed legislation to meet the provisions of this particular clause. Of course, if a province exercises its discretion in a contrary direction, and does not place upon the statute book legislation dealing with the circulation of newspapers and the distribution of circulars advertising liquor, this section would not be effective in that particular province. Section 3 of the Bill may be said to be somewhat drastic in its character; but it is regarded by the Department of Justice as necessary for the proper enforcement of the Act, and representations have been made by the different provinces as to the desirability of this provision. It would permit of the accused being taken from one province to another in the event of its being desirable to prosecute him, say, in a province other than his own, or in the province in which the offence was committed.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Is that one of the clauses which the Senate refused to ratify?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. There is another clause giving constables or officers of the law additional authority in the matter of search. There is a further clause dealing with the operation of the Canada Temperance Act in provinces in which certain prohibitive or restrictive legislation may be in force.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: As the honourable leader of the Government has stated, this Bill places before us again certain clauses which we discussed at considerable length last session and to which the Senate did not agree. The minister in the other House has thought it well again to bring in legislation along these lines. It seems to me a little unfortunate that he has taken the matter up in this way, because, as far as I can learn, he has not given any satisfaction to the people whom he is apparently trying to benefit by this legislation. I have received a letter—and probably other gentlemen in this House have received similar letters—pointing out that this Bill is of no value—that it does not accomplished what is desired by the persons who are very anxious for legislation along these lines. They apparently wish the Dominion to take much stronger steps and act much more drastically—to deal with the whole question in a manner different from the way in which it is being dealt with in this Bill. I have always taken the stand that this matter is a question more for the provinces to deal with than for the Dominion. I believe I am correct in stating that the question of prohibition is actually being discussed in the legislature of the province of British Columbia. I have seen in one of the papers that the Bill to deal with it has been read a first and, I think, a second time. The present position is that seven out of the nine provinces have dealt with the matter and the eighth is dealing with it. I presume that the British Columbia Bill, having received its second reading, will probably be passed. If legislation of this kind is required, I think that this Bill is the right way of dealing with the matter; but when we come to the committee stage we shall have to consider very carefully the clauses which have been referred to in order to decide whether we are going to change the opinion which we expressed last year.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: The objection taken to the Bill referred to by the honourable leader of the Opposition (Hon. Mr. Bostock) was that it did not provide that the Act should be enforced by the Dominion, but referred its enforcement to the different provinces. It was argued there should be a Dominion law prohibiting the importation, sale, and advertising of liquors. Well, if a law of that kind were introduced, I do not hesitate to say, speaking for myself, that I would not be in favour of it. I am somewhat at a loss to know how this proposed measure is to be carried out. It places the management of the carrying of letters through the mails in the hands of the local authorities. Let me give an illustration of what I mean. I received the other day a letter from Baltimore advertising where liquors could be obtained in this and other provinces and also in the United States. Circulars were enclosed giving particulars as to prices and all other information necessary for a man to have if he wanted to buy liquor. How is a letter of that kind to be reached through the post office? I put that question the other day to the Minister of Justice. I asked him how he proposed to carry out this provision if it became law. He frankly admitted that there was the difficulty. Further, if this provision became law, it would prevent the circulation of the London Punch in Ontario or in any other province where a prohibitory law has been enacted; it would prevent the circulation of every foreign publication containing a liquor advertisement. It would have the effect of excluding the London Times and all other English and foreign newspapers that contained an advertisement for the sale of liquor, as well as affecting the newspapers published in the province. As this is a Government measure, I intend to ask the honourable leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), when we go into committee, how he proposes that the law shall be enforced, or how it is possible to enforce it without examining every newspaper sent into the country through the mails and every letter that comes from the United States or elsewhere. How is it to be known that a letter contains prohibited matter unless all letters are opened and read? These are some of the difficulties that have presented themselves to my mind with respect to the enactment of a law of this character. Other honourable gentlemen may be able to solve these difficulties; but we must, before passing this Bill, consider carefully the position in which it would place the country with reference to reading matter, whether in the form of circulars, newspapers, pamphlets, or books.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I wish to say a few words with regard to this Bill. In the first place, I am opposed to section 2. Honourable gentlemen may remember that when a similar Bill was discussed in this House last year I took exception to some of its clauses on the ground that I thought the legislation was malicious, and that is the view which I take with this section 2. For the life of me I cannot understand how or in what respect an advertisement of a certain brand of whisky in the Montreal Gazette or the Star circulating in the country can generate in any person a thirst for that particular liquor. It strikes me that this section is the production of some faddist, some person who simply wants to strike at one of his neighbours, without taking the trouble to consider whether it will do any good or not. He is content provided he can cause some inconvenience or loss or trouble to his neighbour. To my mind that section is not designed to meet any evil really existing in the country, and its effect would be to do a great deal of harm, apart altogether from the question whether or not it can be honestly and fairly carried out. The honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon Sir Mackenzie Bowell) has expressed exactly my view with regard to that section. I am opposed also to section 3. Paragraph 4A of this section is simply a reprint of a clause which was before us last year and which we struck out. Honourable gentlemen will see that section 4 provides three places where a man may be prosecuted for an offence under this Act: he may be tried at the city, town or other place from which the intoxicating liquor is sent. That is to say, if he lives in Montreal and has a warehouse in Ottawa, if he ships from Ottawa he may be prosecuted in Ottawa; or, if any of the intoxicating liquor is sent to Vancouver, he may be prosecuted in Vancouver—that is the second place; or, in the third place, he may be prosecuted in the city of Montreal where he lives. Honourable gentlemen may remember that when we got our Criminal Code Sir John Thompson was Minister of Justice, and the Criminal Code for some years permitted a man who had committed an offence in the eastern end of a province being taken from there and tried in any other county in the province; but just as soon as the people became aware of that fact there was an immediate change. The law which had been in effect previously was restored, namely, that the man should be tried in the town in which the offence had taken place. My objection to the second place fixed for the trial of a person charged with selling liquor is that the wording of the clause, as printed, "or in the city, town or other place to or into which such intoxicating liquor is to be sent, shipped, taken, brought, carried or imported," allows any person to lay a charge at the Peace River Crossing or anywhere in British Columbia against a man living in Montreal, Quebec, Halifax or Sydney. What happens if a man is taken out to the Pacific coast to be tried and is found to be innocent?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: He walks home.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not see any need for that provision, and I see in it all kinds of chances for hardship and——

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: And blackmail.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I see a vista of opportunities for blackmailing a man. When we get to the committee stage I propose to move an amendment to strike out those words. I propose to vote against section 2, and to move an amendment to paragraph 4 A on the lines which I have indicated.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: What about 4 B?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I would have no objection to 4 B.

Hon. G. D. ROBERTSON: I should like to draw the attention of this honourable House to subsections 4 A and 4 B of section 3, which in my humble opinion would in their application be vicious and unfair. Subsection 4 A provides that "a prosecution may be taken for any offence under this Act at any place from which intoxicating liquor is shipped, or in the city, town or other place, to or into which such liquor is sent, shipped, taken, brought, carried or imported." Subsection 4 B provides that a constable may enter any place to search for intoxicating liquor, and it refers particularly to railway warehouses, stations, and so forth. I should like to bring to the attention of this honourable House two incidents which have occurred within the past few months, wherein most unreasonable treatment was meted out to railway station agents under the provisions of provincial laws similar, I think, to this measure. For example, on the 23rd of December last a shipment of liquor was sent into the town of Matheson, on the line of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway. The agent, who was going on leave of absence for Christmas, got on the train that the liquor came off. When he returned on the 26th of December the liquor had been seized by the authorities, and the agent was arrested, tried, found guilty, fined $200, and dismissed from the company's service because he, as agent for the carrier, had liquor in his possession contrary to the provisions of the law. In the province of Manitoba a similar case occurred and a similar penalty was imposed. The agents in both cases lost their employment with the railway company, and it took some weeks, in one case a month, before the positions were restored to them, when the facts were brought to the notice of the railway officials. Therefore, were these clauses to be enacted it is possible that shipments might be traced and followed from the point of shipment with the intention of seizure on arrival at their destination, though the agent would have no knowledge whatever of the existence of the shipment. He might even be away from the station when the liquor was seized; but, as happened in one of the cases I have mentioned, he would be liable to be arrested, tried and fined. I think we ought to be particularly careful to see that men, who in the course of everyday business have the handling of shipments of this sort, should not be subjected to unfair criticism or improper prosecution.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Strictly speaking, I suppose this discussion is one which should take place in committee; but I think it is just as well or perhaps better that before that stage is reached the honourable leader of the Government should have some clear idea as to the points in the Bill which are considered objectionable—for instance, the points mentioned by the honourable gentleman from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson) and the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross). I hope the honourable the leader of the Government has a fairly open mind with respect to this Bill. There are one or two points that I think it well to direct attention to now. One is the clause mentioned by the honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) and the honourable gentleman from Middleton, providing a penalty up to $100, or imprisonment up to thirty days, or both a fine and imprisonment, for circulating a newspaper which happens to contain an advertisement of intoxicating beverages. As the honourable gentleman from Hastings pointed out, any one who forwards a copy of the London Times through the mails would be liable to prosecution under this clause, and in the same way any one who sent a copy of the Montreal Star or the Montreal Gazette into the province of Ontario, the province of British Columbia, or any other prohibition province, would be liable to this very severe penalty. Any one can see that the clause is unworkable.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Will the honourable gentleman explain how it works in the United States?

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not know how it works there. I know that in the state of Maine, where they have a very rigid prohibition law, one can get more bad liquor more easily than in any other place that I know of. I think clause 2 is entirely unworkable, tyrannical and absurd. The objects of the people who press for legislation of this kind are undoubtedly good, and I think that these laws on the whole have perhaps served a useful purpose; but there is such a thing as overdoing even the best of things, and we should not seek the best results by improper means. As my honourable friend pointed out, last year we rejected a clause similar to clause 3. I think that clause 4 B is the most objectionable one of all. It says:

When any constable—

It does not say a judge or an attorney general or an officer of that kind; it says:

When any constable or other peace officer has reason to believe that any intoxicating liquor is in any premises or place in violation of the provisions of this Act, he may enter and search such premises or place, including any government railway, vehicle or steamship, and seize and remove any intoxicating liquor and the packages containing the same, which he may find, and which he has reason to believe is there in violation of this Act.

If a constable takes it into his head that some man has in his house liquor that he purposes to offer for sale at a later date, that constable may go into that house without a search warrant or any other authority, and violate the sanctity of the house.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: It need not necessarily be for sale—if he has liquor in his possession in excess of a certain quantity.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Yes, any quantity in most cases. There is a saying that an Englishman's home is his castle; but the defences of the castle are removed by the proposed clause. I think the action of the Senate last year, with respect to the original measure, met with the approval of most of the common-sense people of the country, and I hope the Senate will have the courage and the good sense to treat the measure now before them in the same spirit.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: In the province of New Brunswick we have a prohibitory law and the Canada Temperance Act. Under the Canada Temperance Act any man can put into his house or wine cellar ten gallons of liquor.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Is that for a day or for a year?

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Until it is drunk, which might take a month, six months, or a year.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would not last that long in New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Under this provision a man can come in and, if he finds any liquor—it does not specify the quantity—he can bring up the occupant and have him heavily fined. I think it is a most outrageous thing.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Honourable gentlemen, speaking for the pioneer prohibition province, I might make a few observations from experience.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: If you wish me to say so, perhaps I might say from experience in every way. There is no doubt that this clause is objectionable. Entering a man's private residence is not in accordance with the British idea of the rights of the individual. So far as the clause affects government railways, it is all right. For years we have been under a handicap because the King owned the Government railway, and we could not seize the contraband liquor which was coming in in violation of our Prohibition Act and destroying our young men. No man will subscribe to the action of the Crown in taking special advantage and supplying liquor to bootleggers who distribute it over the country. That is the reason this provision was put into the Bill. For instance, a place is started up in Tignish for the illicit sale of liquor. The people in charge of it send to friends of my honourable friend from Halifax, or to friends of my honourable friend from St. John and import it; or, if they cannot import it from them they can send to Montreal and have a shipment of liquor sent down, and under the care of the Government it is sacred and the authorities cannot touch it. If liquor is sent by a private carrier the authorities can attack an innocent man, and fine him or send him to jail, as I was sorry to hear my honourable friend from Welland (Hon. Mr. Robertson) say had been done in one case. I was sorry to hear him say that any company incorporated by the laws of this country could relieve itself of responsibility by dismissing an innocent man. Government railways should stand in the same position as any other common carrier, and any constable should have the right, under the direction of some responsible authority where he lives, to prevent the illegal distribution of intoxicating liquors.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: I do not think the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) need be very much surprised at the provision with regard to the right of search by officers. My impression is that there is a law in force in Nova Scotia which is quite as drastic. There is really nothing new in that regard in this Bill. The fact that this legislation has again passed the Commons this year, after having been rejected by us last year, appears to me to be a very strong argument in favour of this House accepting it now. I understand that the House of Lords had to be reformed so that the English House of Commons could better assert its right to pass legislation in the public interest. Although this legislation was rejected by this House, the Commons having again passed it, this House ought to be very slow to reject it again, or it may come to pass that the House of Commons in Canada may declare that it is time the Senate of Canada should be reformed in that respect.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: They have no right here.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: They have all the rights that the people give them. So far as advertising is concerned, my impression is that this Bill is to be enacted only for the purpose of assisting provinces which have similar laws on their statute books. Therefore, these provisions, which will no doubt be discussed in detail, are only to come into operation in provinces which have adopted similar provisions. If that is true, I think the objections which have been made are not very well founded.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

CRIMINAL CODE AND EVIDENCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 124, an Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act.

He said: This Bill is made up of certain proposed amendments of a somewhat minor character to the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act. It is proposed under the first section to make the evidence of the wife admissible in prosecutions for non-support. This is a condition which does not obtain at the present time, but which is very much needed. Step-parents, foster parents, or guardians, who seduce or have illicit connection with their stepchildren, foster children or wards, are being brought under the provisions already in the Criminal Code touching employers who may have illicit relations with their employees. The Bill also places a broader definition upon the term "bawdy house," making it cover certain institutions where indecencies are practised. The section requiring traders to keep books has been redrawn. There is also attached to this Bill a new schedule of constables' fees. As I have said, the Bill is made up very largely, if not altogether, of small details which can be advantageously considered in committee.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday evening at eight o'clock.

ICE FOR VALCARTIER CAMP.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY inquired of the Government:

Does the Government still buy ice in Toronto for the use of our soldiers at Valcartier Camp near the city of Quebec?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No ice has ever been purchased in Toronto by the Department of Militia and Defence for the use of the troops at Valcartier camp.

ALLEGED INTERFERENCE WITH PUBLIC MEETING.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN inquired of the Government:

1. Is it true that at a public meeting, held at Sydney, C.B., to discuss public and national affairs, Canadian soldiers, invalided from England to Canada, jointly, and with the aid of sailors of British ships at that port broke up the meeting by manifestations of physical violence?
2. Is it true that the Mayor of Sydney and Mr. J. C. Watters, President of the Trades and Labour Union of Canada, were pelted with eggs by the said soldiers and sailors and obliged to retire from the platform?
3. Does the Government give encouragement to such conduct on the part of its soldiers and the sailors of the British navy?
4. If not, what measures does the Government propose to take to repress such occurrences in the future?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. The Government has no official knowledge of the alleged acts complained of being committed by men subject to the authority of the Government whose identity is known.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Answered by No. 1.
4. Any measures taken will be governed by the occurrence that may happen.

ALLEGED INTERFERENCE WITH LIBERAL CONVENTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN inquired of the Government:

1. Is it true that at the recent Convention, in Winnipeg, of the Liberal Electorate from the four provinces of the Northwest, viz.:—Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, Canadian soldiers, invalided from England to Canada, attempted to tear down and destroy mottoes and banners of Canadian Liberalism?
2. If so, do such returned soldiers remain on the pay-roll of the Militia Department receiving allowances or contributions from Patriotic Fund?
3. Does the Government propose to take measures to prevent military interference with the rights of free speech in the discussion of public affairs and national issues?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. The Government has no official information as to the alleged acts mentioned in question No. 1.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Any measures taken will be governed by the occurrence that may happen.

THE CABINET AND PUBLIC RUMOUR.

INQUIRY.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I desire to ask the honourable leader of the Government in this House if he can furnish the Senate of Canada with any information regarding rumours which are being circulated in the columns of the press respecting certain vacancies that have occurred in the Cabinet.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am sorry I cannot give to my honourable friend the information he desires. I have already laid on the Table the correspondence which has been exchanged between the late Minister of Public Works and the Prime Minister of Canada, and from a perusal of that the honourable gentleman may be able to satisfy himself.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT (JURORS) BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 97, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (respecting jurors), Hon. Mr. Daniel in the Chair.

The Bill was reported.

PROVINCIAL PROHIBITION AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 121, an Act to amend an Act in aid of Provincial Legislation prohibiting or restricting the sale or use of Intoxicating Liquors, Hon. Mr. Dennis in the Chair.

On section 1—sec. 3, par. a, amended by inserting "for beverage purposes" after "liquor."

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What is the object of that amendment?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is to describe the class of liquor that is prohibited. Of course, liquor for industrial, mechanical, scientific, medicinal, and possibly sacramental purposes, may be brought in.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—liquor advertisements:

Hon. W. B. ROSS moved that section 2 be struck out. He said: I gave my reasons to the House the other day for asking to have this clause struck out. I do not see any necessity for it or any good in it, and I think a great deal of harm would result from it. It appears to me to be in the nature of malicious and mischievous legislation.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I should like to ask the honourable leader of the Government if this refers to advertisements not only in papers from other provinces but in periodicals from other countries. Supposing I were receiving the Montreal Gazette, the London Punch, the New York Evening Post, or similar standard periodicals, would they be debarred?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Provided the province of Ontario passed such legislation. This provision would be simply supplementary to the legislation of the province.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The Federal and provincial statutes and the municipal by-laws and regulations concerning prohibition all contain provisions guaranteeing the sale and use of alcoholic liquors for the purposes and needs of medicine and pharmacy, of munitions, of manufacturing of light and power, and for other purposes and needs. How is a dean of the Anglican church away in the wilds, or a parish priest of the Catholic religion, or a Jewish rabbi in the slums, to find where to get wine or liquor for the purposes and needs of religion if the advertisements of wine and liquors are prohibited? If the advertisements of wines and liquors are prohibited by provincial laws, what right has this Parliament on behalf of the people to sanction such laws? Does not Parliament place itself in a stultified position, contradicting by this Act what it guarantees by other Acts? Where are people going to buy these products if they are not told in the press? By the press I do not mean simply the newspapers; I mean all the means and methods by which this class of goods can be brought to the attention of consumers. If a provision such as I intend to move were inserted in the Bill it might be all right:

Provided that no provision in this Act shall apply to any newspaper or other means or method of publication containing wine and liquor advertisements to serve the purposes and needs of religion, of medicine, of pharmacy, of science, of manufacturing, of war munitions, of light, heat and power, and any other interests and purposes authorized and governed by federal and provincial statutes, or by municipal by-laws and regulations.

Hon. Mr. ROSS.

This would protect the rights of manufacturers, doctors, and clergymen, by enabling them to learn where they could buy the goods they wanted.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am prepared to support the amendment of the honourable gentleman (Hon. W. B. Ross) to strike out clause 2. I think this is one of the most extraordinary clauses ever inserted in a Bill which has become before this Senate.

There is a saying that the greatest good should not be sought by the smallest evil; but this clause reverses that, because for very small good it proposes to do a very large evil. Under the operation of this clause the London Times and all other English papers, which come to this country in considerable numbers, and papers and periodicals that come here from the United States, as well as papers published in the non-prohibition province of Quebec, such as the Montreal Gazette and Star, could not be sent through the mails. If it were attempted to send any of those papers through the mails, numberless censors would have to be employed to open them and find out whether there was any liquor advertising in them. That seems to me to be a perfectly monstrous proposition to submit to any body of reasonable men. And what is the necessity for it? What good would it do? Suppose prohibition is in force in Ontario and liquor cannot go in there, I have no doubt the people of that province are too good temperance men to even read the liquor advertisements which happen to get there. To suppose that all the advertisements that might be inserted in all the newspapers that go into the province would influence the prohibitionists in the way of inducing them to drink, would do violence to one's high estimation of those people. If this clause becomes law it will lead to great inconvenience and confusion, and make the Parliament of Canada an object of ridicule to all reasonable people.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I intend to support the motion to strike out this clause, for the reason already assigned, and for this additional reason, that its enactment would logically mean that the Government of Ontario would be entitled to demand of the Dominion Government that all private correspondence be opened for the purpose of ascertaining whether there were in it any infractions of this Act. Are we really going to adopt a system of that kind, whereby the people of this country would be subject to having all their correspondence opened to ascertain whether there were in it any advertisements concerning liquors? I think it is a step for which there is no precedent, and I agree with the honourable gentleman who has just spoken (Hon. Mr. Power), that it would be a violation of common sense.

Brigadier-General Hon. Mr. MASON: It is difficult to understand why the promoters of this clause should have entertained the idea of making it a law, because, of the difficulty of its enforcement. To bring the matter home, I hold in my hand a list of the papers and reviews taken in the Senate reading room, and I find that from Great Britain alone there are fourteen papers that would come under the provisions of this law—all papers of great interest and value to the reading public. From France we receive four papers, two which would come under the provisions of this contemplated law. I trust the amendment will be carried.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I would like to add one word to my last remarks. God knows that there is darkness enough in Ontario to-day without preventing good papers from going into that province to give them light. If this Bill passes, the people of Ontario will have no papers to enlighten them.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I want to bring before the notice of those who propose this legislation the fact that sections 1 and 2 are contradictory. Section 1 prohibits the sending into a province of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes only; that is, it can be sent in for mechanical, medicinal or sacramental purposes. But section 2 prohibits the sending of an advertisement of intoxicating liquor that might be used for sacramental, medicinal or similar purposes. These sections do not seem to have had in their composition that amount of care which I think such legislation requires. Of course, the chief objection, to my mind, is the cutting off of first-class papers, the best illustrated and other papers that are published in the world to-day, from coming into this or any other province that passes a law prohibiting advertisements for the sale of any kind of liquor. While I would be very glad to assist the Government in any way that they might consider necessary to curb the liquor-drinking habit and assist the provinces in carrying out the prohibition laws, yet I think this section goes a little too far, and I do not think it is really in the public interest to pass it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to know from the leader of the Government how it is proposed to enforce this Act supposing this section should be passed. He says that this is simply an enabling clause, and will practically have no effect until a province adopts legislation bringing it into force. The province of British Columbia has adopted prohibition since this measure was brought down, and it might go on and pass legislation next session bringing this Act into force. We would then be placed in the position that my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) stated, of having all our letters opened in order to find whether any advertisements of intoxicating liquors were coming through the post.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It is not a suspensory law; it goes into operation at once.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I thought this was only an enabling clause.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. My honourable friend will observe in line 18 the words: "the publication or circulation of which is prohibited by the law of such province." This is an enabling clause to permit or give effect to any legislation of this character that may be passed by a province. If a province should pass such legislation prohibiting the circulation of literature and liquor advertisements in that province, then this law, if enacted, would automatically apply. It is only right for me to say to honourable gentlemen that there is a similar law in force in the United States. I cannot say whether it operates satisfactorily to the public of the United States or not, but Congress has apparently exercised its discretion in this same direction, and the section now under discussion is practically taken from the language of a similar law in the United States.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: When was it passed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Only recently, I believe. I have a copy of the law. It is known as Senate Amendment No. 34, and the provisions of the Act would be, I should say, even more stringent than the clause now under consideration. This is a matter entirely within the discretion of the provinces. The principle is well worth considering, and it is for this House to exercise its discretion as to its soundness whether the provinces should not be permitted to pass legislation of this kind so as to prohibit the circulation of literature containing liquor advertisements.

Brigadier General Hon. Mr. MASON: Has any province asked for that legislation?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, representations have been made in that direction. Now, if a province should exercise its discretion in that way it is for the people of the province to pronounce their judgment upon its soundness, and if it should do so it would not be unreasonable for a province to say to the Federal Government: "You should give us machinery supplementary to our legislation so as to secure its enforcement." As the Federal Government is charged with postal administration, it is quite obvious that legislation passed by a province would not be effective without the co-operation of this Government. In view of these considerations, this measure has been framed as submitted to you.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But I understand that the legislation of the United States known as Senate Amendment No. 34 was passed after Congress had decided to prohibit the manufacture and importation of intoxicating liquor in the United States.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No, nothing to do with it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand that law is in operation now.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But they had first decided to prohibit the manufacture and importation of intoxicating liquors into the United States with the exception of wine and beer, and Amendment No. 34 is an adjunct to that law. We have not the same condition of things in this Dominion.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This section only anticipates the passing of such legislation by a province.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But because a province chooses to pass a prohibition of that kind, does it follow that all the provinces should be interfered with?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If the newspapers and correspondence will be interfered with, I do not think it is reasonable to propose this clause.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I did not notice that the publication and circulation should be prohibited by the law of such province; but that really does not materially alter the case. If, for instance, the province of Ontario would itself undertake to see that newspapers did not publish liquor advertisements, or would exclude such newspapers as did publish such advertisements, it might not be so unreasonable; but they practically ask this Government to censor all newspapers and correspondence going into the province of Ontario. What is the object of it? There is really no specific object whatever to be gained, and I think it would be highly discreditable to the Senate to pass such an enactment as this.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is there any province that has thus far passed legislation absolutely prohibiting the importation or use of liquor within its borders?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is there any province in which it is absolutely prohibitive to buy liquor from outside?

Some Hon. SENATORS: No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If I am well informed, no one in Ontario can sell liquor but any one living in Ontario can buy liquor from outside the province.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is a limitation on the quantity, that is all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is there any law in any of the other provinces more advanced than that of Ontario? Is there any province where any individual is prohibited from keeping under his own roof a bottle of wine or of Scotch whisky?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Only to a limited quantity. For instance, legislation was passed at the last session of the Alberta Provincial Legislature limiting the quantity of intoxicating liquor that a householder could carry to a quart of spirits or a gallon of beer, I think. It is considered that it is safe for the citizens of that particular province to have that quantity in their possession. Apparently greater confidence is placed in the people of the province of Saskatchewan, where I think it is considered safe for a householder to have at least two quarts in his possession. Whether he is able to carry his liquor better than the Alberta man I cannot say, but that limitation prevails. I think that along those lines the western provinces have been more drastic than other provinces in looking after the welfare of their people.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I put this question because it seems to me that if an individual anywhere from the Atlantic to the Pacific has a right to buy liquor for himself, he should have the right to read advertisements indicating the place where he can buy such liquor. This legislation seems to me to be much ahead of the times.

It may be quite a discussible matter even when the provinces have gone a step further; but taking the legislation as it is in each province, and finding that every individual has a right to purchase liquor, I wonder what is the utility of passing this legislation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: The difficulty that presents itself to my mind in regard to this section is that it will be placing in the hands of each province some control over the Post Office Department. How is the clause to be made effective if the provinces which have prohibitive legislation have not the power to examine the letters and papers that are mailed into the province, to ascertain whether or not they come within the provisions of this law? Would it be necessary, under circumstances of that kind, for the Dominion to enact another law in order to take from the provinces the power to interfere with the mails, and in order to assume the responsibility of examining the mails and the newspapers that come into the prohibitive province? That is, to my mind, the greatest difficulty that presents itself with respect to the adoption of this clause if it is to be made at all effective or useful. The only conclusion to be arrived at is that if we adopt this clause and thus affirm the legislation of the province the Dominion Government surrenders to a certain extent the control of the mails of the province; and, while that may have effect in one province, how is it to be given effect in another province? Here is a specimen letter sent to me from Baltimore, containing an advertisement of a sale of liquor and stating where I can obtain liquor in Canada. The letter is dated at Montreal. The liquor seller in Montreal may send to the United States—say to Baltimore, whence this letter came—and order printed 10,000 circulars and have them mailed from there to different parts of the Dominion. He saves one cent on every letter, or $100 in the way of postage by mailing them in the United States instead of in Canada. That is one of the effects which this section would have upon the revenue of the country. I would go any length to prevent the indiscriminate use of liquor in any of the provinces or in the Dominion, but it does seem to me to be absurd to put upon the statute book, or to give the provinces the power to enact, a law which it is impossible to carry out.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If I may be allowed to add a word to what I have already said, I would draw the attention of the committee to this further point. Of course, the law would have effect only within the Dominion of Canada. It would be open to any citizen of Canada to go across the frontier into the United States and do from there the very thing which he is prohibited from doing on this side of the line. The newspapers published in Montreal might be sent to Rouse's Point and be mailed from there to Ontario, which would not be an infringement of the law.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would. I would point out to my honourable friend that the law would come into play at the point of distribution in the province.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It might come into play, but there is nothing in the text of the law to cover that. It would be merely an inference, and possibly the postmaster might think himself warranted under this Act in interfering. But I am speaking of the action itself, which would be a crime if committed in Canada, but if done on the other side of the line would not be against the law at all. The more we examine this Bill the more we see that—

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The worse it becomes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I desire to call the attention of this honourable committee to a declaration of policy by the honourable leader of the Government to which I take serious objection. He told this honourable committee that this Bill was for the purpose of enabling provincial legislation to be carried out. To that principle I take formal exception. Is this Parliament going to be the handmaid of provincial legislatures? Is this Parliament going to do what I would call the kitchen work of legislation? If this Parliament is going to be called upon to pass laws to enable a province to carry out its own measures, where are we going to stop? This is an enabling measure to help the province to carry out its own legislation. If the provincial legislature passes an Act which it cannot enforce, what right has it to call upon the Parliament of the Dominion of Canada for aid in enforcing the law? Cannot the honourable leader of the Government seize that point? I believe that he does. If this Parliament is to be called upon to pass laws to enable provincial legislation to be carried out, where will the matter end? In the provision of good roads? In the supply of electricity, or matters of that kind? Simply to mention these things shows the absurdity of the position. The honourable leader of the Government has given this honourable committee a false notion of the rights and prerogatives of this Parliament. If a provincial government cannot carry out legislation by themselves, they should not have here at their beck and call men who, though not representing the people of their province, will force legislation upon them. I hold that the reason given by the honourable leader of the Government is no ground upon which to base a request that this honourable committee will approve of this section.

The motion of the Hon. W. B. Ross to strike out section 2 was agreed to: yeas, 22; nays, 13.

On section 3—places where prosecutions may be taken:

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I move:

That subsection 4A be amended by striking out the words: "or in the city, town, or other place to or into which such intoxicating liquor is so sent, shipped, taken, brought, carried or imported."

These are the words which designate one of the three places at which it is proposed the offence may be tried. In the first part of the subsection it is provided that an offence may be tried at the place from which the liquor has been sent. At the end of the clause the third place at which an offence may be tried is designated—the place in which the accused resides. The second place mentioned in this section, the place to which the liquor is sent, is the one referred to in my motion. I do not want to argue this question again. It was discussed last year.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Would the honourable gentleman please read the clause as it would stand.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It would read:

4A. A prosecution for an offence under this Act may be brought and carried on and a conviction had in the city, town or other place from which any intoxicating liquor is unlawfully sent, shipped, taken or carried as aforesaid, or in the place in which the accused resides.

As the Bill stands now, it is provided, first, that a prosecution may be brought against a man at the place from which he shipped; or, secondly, he may be taken across the continent to the place to which the liquor was sent and may be tried there; or, thirdly, he may be tried at the place in which he resides. It is number 2 that I am moving to be struck out. It was pointed out last year, and it was pointed out the other day, that if the proposal contained in this Bill were adopted, it would be possible for a man living in Montreal, or Halifax, or Quebec, to be accused by some one living on the other side of the Rocky mountains of having violated the Act. He could be taken there under a warrant and tried, and if he were found innocent and discharged he would have to find his own way home as best he could. If my amendment is adopted, I think ample scope will be left for the carrying out of the Act by permitting of the prosecution of a man in Montreal, for instance, if his warehouse is in Montreal and he ships liquor from there, or of prosecuting him at the town or village where he resides, if he resides outside of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would like to ask the honourable leader of the Government, since section 2 is struck out of the Bill, if he thinks it is well to insist on passing section 3. It seems to me it would be merely to supplement the statute of 1916.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Section 2 relates to the circulation of literature. Section 3 relates to the handling of intoxicating liquor where it is unlawfully sent, shipped, taken or carried. So the subject-matter is absolutely distinct.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Section 2 of this Bill is for the purpose of amending section 3 of the Act, and section 3 of the Bill is for the purpose of amending section 4 of the Act. There is no connection between sections 2 and 3 of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think that this clause was in the Bill last year.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER: And the motion to strike it out was made by the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross). He has not moved this year that it be struck out, but his motion takes the poison out of it, and the reasons for the amendment are just as strong as they were last year. It seems to me to be contrary to all our ideas of British fair-play to take a man perhaps across the continent to try him. Under the amendment he would have to be tried where the offence is committed.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Section 4 of the Act of 1916 says:

On any prosecution for the violation of section one of this Act the accused person shall be deemed to have known or intended that such intoxicating liquor would be thereafter dealt with in violation of the law of the province into which such intoxicating liquor was sent, shipped, taken, brought, carried or imported, unless he proves that he had good reason for believing that the intoxicating liquor would only be dealt with in a lawful manner.

Then, section 5 provides that the provincial law shall be judicially noticed. Section 6 defines what shall be deemed to be "intoxicating liquor." Then we come to section 7, which says:

When it is brought to the attention of the Minister of Justice that an offence against any of the provisions of this Act has been committed outside the boundaries of any province which has enacted legislation prohibiting or restricting the sale of intoxicating liquor, he may, if the evidence put before him be in his judgment sufficient, take such steps as may be deemed necessary to prosecute any person charged with such offence.

Well, is not that the proper machinery? If I understand the purport of the motion to amend section 3, it provides that if the liquor were sent, say, from the province of Quebec, or from one of the Maritime Provinces, into the province of Ontario, the prosecution would have to take place at the place of residence of the party sending the liquor. Is there anything to repeal section 7, to which I have referred?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would not my honourable friend consider that section 7 was simply an additional power given for the enforcement of the Act? That is to say, it is not necessary for the Minister of Justice to take proceedings. They can be taken by the authorities of the particular province which has enacted the legislation outside of the boundaries of the province.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Would section 3, if amended as suggested, add anything to the Act of 1916? I would think not. I purpose to support the motion of the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross), but I think we should strike out the clause altogether, because it is unnecessary.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think that, under paragraph b of section 1 of the Act of 1916, a prosecution would successfully lie in a province beyond the boundaries of the province enacting the legislation in question because it is made an offence to:

Sell or cause to be sold any intoxicating liquor, knowing or intending that such intoxicating liquor will be sent, shipped, taken, brought or carried into any such province from any other province, or from any place outside of Canada, and thereafter dealt with in violation of the law of the province into which such intoxicating liquor is sent, shipped, taken, brought, carried or imported, as aforesaid.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The offence is the act of sending. It starts in the province from which the liquor is shipped.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is therefore an offence in that province.

Hon .Mr. DANDURAND: If the amendment of the honourable gentleman from Middleton carries, will not the rest be unnecessary?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The general criminal law already applies.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: If I understand it correctly, under the existing law it is an offence to ship liquor into a province which prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors. The intention of the Bill, as I understand it, is that any person who unlawfully ships liquor into such a province may be prosecuted for that offence either at the place from which he ships the liquor, the place to which the liquor is shipped, or the place of residence of the shipper. If I apprehend the amendment, it is intended that the prosecution shall take place at the place of shipment, or the place of residence of the shipper. During the discussion to-night I have been reflecting on this rather important subject, and I regret to observe that the Senate seems to be unaware of the very pertinent and potent effect of temperance reform, and that it is one of the biggest questions in the world to-day. The Senate appears to be lagging behind in regard to its information and its action on this question. Some years ago the Parliament of Canada, after due consideration, came to the conclusion that it would not be wise to introduce a Dominion prohibitory law, and put upon the provinces the responsibility and duty of dealing with the question, and it has been left to them to deal with it at the present time. In 1908 the Government introduced the policy of supplementing any legislation which the provinces might put upon their statute books in that regard. We have now these two principles before us: the principle of leaving the provinces to deal with this matter, and the principle introduced in 1908 of assisting by Dominion legislation in any legislation which the provinces may put upon ther books. If I understand this Bill, it comes within the policy which was deliberately adopted by this Parliament in 1908; and, in view of the tremendous advance which has been made in temperance reform the world over, it appears to me that honourable gentlemen have their ears very far away indeed from the ground, and that, instead of endeavouring to keep themselves in the forefront, they are endeavouring to get in the rear. Eight provinces out of nine have adopted prohibitory laws. I understand that certain legislation, including this clause, sent down last year from the House of Commons was rejected by this House. If I understand the temper of this House to-night, this body is proposing to overrule the deliberate judgment of the representatives of the people as expressed in the House of Commons last year and again expressed this year. They are going to do worse than that. In 1908 the Senate and the House of Commons, in an amendment to the Canada Temperance Act, put upon the statute book the identical language which is contained in the Bill before us to-night. Under that legislation power was given to enforce a penalty either at the shipping place, the place where the goods were received, or the residence of the accused. Not only is this Senate proposing to reject the knowledge that should be flowing into the minds of honourable gentlemen as to the necessity of dealing promptly and vigorously with this question, but it is going to emasculate the Bill and stultify itself. I hope that this House will have some respect for itself and for the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. POWER: We shall stand by what we did last year.

Hon. Mr. TANNER: I can only say that if honourable gentleman can change their minds in the face of that authority, they can do anything. This is the legislation that was passed in 1908 amending the Canada Temperance Act and making it unlawful to ship liquor from one province to another. Subclause C referred to in the clause which I am about to read is the clause prohibiting the shipment from one province into another in which prohibitory legislation is in force. Section 2 is as follows:

> Prosecutions for any offence under paragraph (c) of subsection 1 of this section, or under paragraph (c) of subsection 2 of this section may be brought and carried on and a conviction had in the city, town or other municipality, from which any intoxicating liquor is sent, shipped, brought or carried as aforesaid, or in the city, town or other municipality to or into which such intoxicating liquor is so sent, shipped, brought or carried.

If a man at Montreal, for example, is in the business of selling liquor, and he knows that in the province of Nova Scotia it is unlawful to sell liquor or have it for sale, but in spite of that chooses to ship liquor to Nova Scotia, it is right that the authorities should have the privilege of prosecuting him at Montreal, Halifax, Sydney, or New Glasgow, as the case may be.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I desire to call attention to the fact that chapter 71 deals with prohibition in different counties. The intention of that Act was that if a man living in one county offended against the Act he could be prosecuted in an adjoining county. There is a vast difference between passing a law of that kind and passing one whereby a man who lives in Prince Edward Island might be taken to British Columbia and prosecuted there. That question was very fully discussed last year, and this House, by a very large majority, came to the conclusion that it was not a law which should receive its sanction.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I should like to draw the attention of the honourable gentleman from Pictou (Hon. Mr. Tanner), who was not here last year, to the vast difference between the legislation passed in 1908 and that of last year. In the legislation of 1908 there was nothing of the nature of clause 4 of chapter 19 of 1916, which reads as follows:

> On any prosecution for the violation of section one of this Act the accused person shall be deemed to have known or intended that such intoxicating liquor would be thereafter dealt with in violation of the law of the province into which such intoxicating liquor was sent, shipped, taken, brought, carried, or imported, unless he proves that he had good reason for believing that the intoxicating liquor would only be dealt with in a lawful manner.

We were confronted with this difficulty, that a person could send liquor into a province without violating the law of that province; but, through misrepresentation on the part of the person ordering that liquor, the sending of it might become an illegal act when the liquor was turned to an illegal use in the province. The person selling the liquor could then be dragged from the place from which he had shipped the goods into a community hundreds of miles distant, where his standing was not known, to face an accusation of having sent goods with the intention of violating the law, or knowing that it would be violated. We felt that a person who sent liquor to a province where he had the legal right to send it, under the conviction that it would be used legally, should not be dragged hundreds of miles from his own jurisdiction to answer such an accusation.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Did we not decide that question last year?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We did.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Then what is the use of arguing it?

The amendment of Hon. W. B. Ross was agreed to, on division: yeas, 20; nays, 12.

Subsection 4 A, as amended, was agreed to.

On subsection 4B—constable may seize liquor and may search for same:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think this clause was not in the Bill we had before us last year. I would like to know from the leader of the Government what is the object of it? Does this mean that a constable is to be allowed to search any person's house without a warrant or any other authority? Can he walk in at any time and look through everything in a man's house merely on suspicion that the owner of the house has something in it which is contrary to this law? It seems to me that would be giving a constable tremendous power, and he has sufficient power under the Criminal Code.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He would probably have to get a search-warrant

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Under the Criminal Code?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. This section proposes to give the peace officer the widest possible range on search, provided he has reason to believe that intoxicating liquor is to be found in any of the places mentioned.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But I do not see why it should be necessary. Why should he not proceed in the ordinary way and get out a proper search-warrant? If he suspects that liquor is there, the procuring of a search-warrant would not interfere very much with his operations. To say that a constable may walk into anybody's house of his own volition and examine into everything, turn everything upside down would be to pass legislation in which I do not believe.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, the presumption is that liquor is made for consumption, and it is consumed very quickly sometimes; it disappears very rapidly; and, while a search-warrant was being secured the liquor might disappear, and thus the object of the Act would be defeated. Of course, it is for the committee to consider whether this right of search should extend to the dwelling-house of the man, or to such private premises as he may occupy at the time. He may be a traveller on a railway train, or he may be occupying an apartment. I think it is a very proper subject for serious consideration whether the right should be given to any constable or peace officer to search premises of that character. I think the provisions of the Bill are sound in giving him permission to search any public place —for instance, such places as are mentioned in the Bill, "including any Government railway, warehouse, vehicle, or steamship, and seize and remove," etc. It seems to me that this right of search should be given to a police officer or a constable in relation to any public place, including hotel premises.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But will not the honourable gentleman admit that this clause goes much further?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It does.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It allows entry into any private residence.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. It might seem out of place for me, having charge of the Bill, to criticise it; but I reserve to myself the right to differ from any provisions of this kind, and I am bound to say that I am not in favour of giving unlimited power to a constable to enter a private residence or the private premises of an individual, entirely irrespective of his having any authority so to do, and I think the clause should be limited to places such as those I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Perhaps the Government will amend the clause themselves at the third reading.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How would honourable gentlemen suggest that effect should be given to what I have suggested?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It would be done by adding, after the words, "premises or places," the words, "other than a private residence."

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: What about a private vehicle?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: What about passengers on trains?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Or in private yachts. There is generally liquor on a private yacht.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: You will oftener find it on board schooners.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: A schooner is a vehicle.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I suggest that this clause be allowed to stand.

Subsection 4B stands.

On subsection 4C—operation of Canada Temperance Act may be suspended upon petition:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The object of this section is that where petitions have been circulated, as provided, for the adoption of the Canada Temperance Act, and it is found that there is a prohibitory measure in the province, there may be a suspension of the proceedings which have been taken to bring into effect the Canada Temperance Act, because in some provinces —I understand in Ontario, in New Brunswick, and some other provinces—we have the anomaly that where there is a prohibitory liquor law of the province certain sections of that province are carved out, and the Canada Temperance Act is in force therein, thus placing in operation two different sets of machinery for the enforcement of liquor laws in that province. This is not desirable. Consequently it is proposed that uniformity should prevail in the province, and that the Canada Temperance Act should eventually be superseded by the prohibitory law of the province.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It simply means you avoid the necessity of having a Scott Act election in a district. While I believe in the liberty of the subject, and in the popular vote and all that, I think that as a rule the provincial laws are more effective than the Scott Act, and if the people feel that they wish to have that repealed and to come under the provincial law there is no reason why they should not do so without having an election.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I am sorry to disagree with my honourable friend from Halifax, because advantage has been taken by people in Halifax and also in my own province, by going behind the provision that made it illegal to sell in the province as an excuse for refusing to pay for liquor which they had purchased and brought in. I do not think my honourable friend from Halifax understands the conditions. For instance, it is unlawful for dealers to buy whisky and take it into Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick; but they can come to Quebec and buy one or two thousand dollars worth of liquor, and then repudiate payment because it is illegal to send liquor there. I do not think that is good ethics. If a man buys liquor he should pay for it, whether it is bought for the purpose of demoralizing the country, or for medicinal, sacramental or mechanical purposes, and the purchaser should have no right to repudiate his responsibility to pay for it by setting up the law prohibiting its entry.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Do I understand that this clause provides for retroactive legislation? In certain parts of Ontario the Canada Temperance Act has been adopted by the vote of the people. The present prohibition law in Ontario was placed on the statute book by Order in Council, and was never voted on by the people. As I read this clause, it overrides the vote of the people, who decided the particular form of temperance Act they required. I know that in the county of Peel, Ontario, the Canada Temperance Act is in force, and I should like to know whether, if this clause passes, it would override the vote of the people in that county.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It seems to me that when a law is passed for a whole province, declaring that it is illegal to sell liquor, it would supersede the Canada Temperance Act, but for my own part I do not see any objection to the clause as it stands.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I think this is a very good clause. The province of New Brunswick has recently passed a prohibition law. Some counties there are under the Canada Temperance Act, but they would rather be under the provincial prohibition law.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They are, are they not?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: In order to get under that law, they would have to hold an election, but with the Scott Act they would not. This will save the expense and trouble of that election.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Surely the honourable gentleman will not say that the Legislature of New Brunswick did not pass a law for the whole province.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: They passed a law for the whole province, but their law is overridden by the latter law, the Canada Temperance Act, and until the counties which have that do away with it—and they can do away with it only by another election—then the prohibition law of the province cannot come into force in those towns. This will save the trouble of the elections. and the Order in Council will take them from under the action of the Canada Temperance Act and put them, by that same motion, under the prohibition law of the province.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the outcome of certain petitions which have been received from the province of New Brunswick asking for a revocation of the order bringing the Canada Temperance Act into force in the particular district within which it may have been voted. Under the Canada Temperance Act, as I understand, certain petitions are presented to the Governor in Council, and then the Governor in Council causes a vote to be taken. This makes provision that where petitions are presented to the Governor in Council asking for a revocation of the Canada Temperance Act on account of prohibition being in force in that province, the Governor General in Council, if satisfied that the general law in force in the province is as strict as the Canada Temperance Act, can dispense with the polling of a vote as to whether the Canada Temperance Act shall remain in force or be revoked.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not take any serious objection to this clause, but we may as well understand what it means. There are certain counties in the province of New Brunswick which adopted the Canada Temperance Act. No move can be made to set aside the Canada Temperance Act until 30 days after the Act has been in force three years. If a petition signed by one-fourth of the electors is presented, the Governor in Council orders an election to be held, and a majority of the electors in the county can carry a repeal or have the Act continued. The effect of this subsection 4C is to allow the Governor in Council, acting upon a petition signed by one-fourth of the electors, to suspend the Canada Temperance Act in the county without the taking of a vote to ascertain whether or not there is a majority in the county for or against prohibition. If those counties in New Brunswick do not make a protest against this measure, I do not know of any reason why I should.

CRIMINAL CODE AND EVIDENCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 124, an Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act, Hon. Mr. Watson in the Chair.

On section 1—making evidence of wife admissible in prosecution:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This simply provides for making the evidence of the wife admissible in a prosecution for non-support as against the husband.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: All that the section states is that after the words "thirty-nine" in the fifth line thereof the words "two hundred and forty-two A" are to be added. I do not know how the amendment effects its purpose.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Honourable gentlemen, I do not usually ask any leeway for men who would be convicted under that clause; but would the purpose of this legislation be affected if we allowed it to stand over until to-morrow?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This section introduces into the Canada Evidence Act that particular section of the Criminal Code which throws upon the husband the responsibility of making provision for the support of his wife and family; it thus makes the evidence of the wife admissible for establishing a case of non-support.

Section 1 stands.

On section 3—definition enlarged to include places where indecencies practised:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This section enlarged the interpretation to be placed upon "common bawdy house."

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think this clause goes too far. I would call attention to this point. The clause reads:

> A common bawdy house is a house, room, set of rooms or place of any kind kept for purposes of prostitution or for the practice of acts of indecency, or occupied or resorted to by one or more persons for such purposes.

The last words of the clause, "or resorted to by one or more persons for such purposes," would mean that if the domicile of a person were used entirely without his knowledge for the purpose mentioned in that section, his house would be known and designated as a bawdy house.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The wording of the section is, "kept for purposes of prostitution or for the practice of acts of indecency, or occupied or resorted to by one or more persons for such purposes"—that is, for the purposes mentioned in the earlier lines of the section.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I do not see any objection to the other portion of the section, but it seems to me that it is very objectionable to extend it to include a place to which one or more persons may resort for the purposes mentioned. If they do so in the absence or without the knowledge of the owner of that residence, that house would be known and treated as a common bawdy house. We should add some words to that section so as to make it reach the offence committed. I would ask that the section be allowed to stand.

Section 3 stands.

On section 4—paragraph penalizing traders for not keeping books redrawn:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is a redrawn clause.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I understand that it is the last portion of the clause which is new: "but no person shall be prosecuted under the provisions of this paragraph by reason only of his having failed to keep such books of account at a period of more than five years before the date of such inability to pay his creditors." Is that correct?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Section 4 was agreed to.

On section 5—constables' fees revised:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The price of everything has increased.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This section provides for an increase in fees?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: A slight increase—very much less than the increase in the cost of the ordinary necessaries of life.

Section 5 was agreed to.

SHIPMENT VIA CANADIAN PORTS.

INQUIRY AND DISCUSSION.

Hon. D. O. L'ESPERANCE rose:

To call the attention of the Senate to the fact that our tidewater ports are now properly equipped for the storage and speedy handling of grain and other merchandise, and to urge that the exportation of our products by the allied government buyers should be routed through our Canadian ports as far as possible, and to inquire if it is the intention of the Government to take any action to prevent in future the bulk of the export of the oceanic traffic being routed via American ports.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, the matter to which I am now calling the attention of this House is of such vital importance for the welfare and prosperity of our country, that I deeply regret my inability to present it in the clear, concise and convincing manner that such an important question deserves. In view, however, of the railway legislation under discussion in the other House, I have decided to move this resolution, which in my judgment merits the careful consideration of honourable members.

Being a citizen of Quebec and chairman of the Quebec Harbour Commission, it is needless for me to say that I have at heart the development of that important port, one of the finest and best situated on the continent of North America. It is not my intention, however, to treat this vast subject from a local point of view.

It has been said by great captains of industry "that transportation is the key to national prosperity." This problem, therefore, is one that all the citizens of this country, and not those of Quebec alone, should have at heart to solve promptly on sound national lines.

The time for destructive trade rivalry has passed forever, I hope. With better and improved facilities for the interchange of trade between the East and the West and the development of our resources on a larger scale, our people are awakening to the tremendous possibilities of this rich and wonderful country. Our ideas have enlarged, our views have broadened, and we have come to realize at last that what is good for one part of Canada is good for the other, and that what retards and curtails the progress of one section reflects adversely on the other sections.

Great sacrifices have been made by the Eastern Provinces to help develop the West. Grants of money and grants of land have been made in large measure to build up two transcontinentals—the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk Pacific. A third transcontinental line, the Canadian Northern, has also been completed, which, although not so largely subsidized at first, was forced, in 1914, to appeal to the central Government for a large financial loan and got it. Last year both the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern had to be helped again, with the result that during the present session the Government is bringing in legislation which will add a tremendous sum to the already large debt of this country, and is a step towards the nationalization of Canadian railways. For my part, honourable gentlemen, I have no hesitation in saying that I will favour this project with both hands, if I am given the assurance that the Government has at the same time elaborated a complete and comprehensive programme of transportation. The country will be amply repaid for the great sacrifices made and contemplated if, in connection with the purchase of the Canadian Northern railway, we adopt a true national policy for the transportation of the products of the West.

I will not take up the valuable time of this House by quoting statistics which every one of you, honourable gentlemen, I feel sure, are well acquainted with. It is sufficient to say that, although this country is now equipped with three great transcontinental roads, it stands to our shame that over 60 per cent of the exportabl grain of the West is still being shipped through the United States ports. In 1915, out of 167 million bushels of grain shipped from Port Arthur and Fort William, only 62 millions passed by Canadian routes. In 1916, out of 312 millions, 180 million bushels found their way to American ports.

Hundreds of millions of dollars of public money were freely spent on the construction of transcontinental lines while it is only very recently that a few millions have been advanced for the equipment of our tide-water ports. While elevators were built in large numbers at the head of the Great Lakes, for a capacity of about 60 million bushels of grain, those at our eastern seaports could hardly store 25 per cent of this quantity. The result of this short-sighted policy could only be what it has been—a diversion of the grain stored at the head of the lakes to the better-equipped ports of the United States.

It is true that within the last few years a move has been made in the right direction. The ports of Montreal and Quebec have been advanced money for the construction of deep-water docks and elevators. St. John and Halifax are also receiving better consideration.

As regards Quebec, the port in which I am more particularly interested, I may say that the port is now fairly well equipped for taking care of a good portion of this traffic during the season of navigation. Along the docks of the Louise Basin and Pointe à Carcy there is ample room for the berthing of 17 large ocean-going ships, while the new docks nearing completion on the north of the embankment towards the river St. Charles will provide for five additional large ships, giving in all 22 berths for ocean-going transports of all dimensions with a water depth varying from 26 to 40 feet at low tide. These docks are accessible to the Canadian Pacific, whose Quebec terminal is right within the Quebec harbour, and also to the Canadian Northern and the National Transcontinental railways. Eleven modern, fire-proof freight sheds (covering an area of 283,500 square feet) are built on these docks. Great facilities for the handling of grain and other merchandise have been provided for. The Quebec Harbour Commissioners have built over 15 miles of railway tracks thoroughly equipped with freight cars and shunters. They have also provided the port with gantry cranes, locomotive cranes, one 50-ton floating crane, etc. Grain conveyers capable of loading direct from elevator to ship 60,000 bushels of grain per hour are now completed.

In 1914, when the port was not as well equipped as it is to-day, 518 ocean-going ships took cargoes and landed passengers in Quebec. In 1915, on account of the war, the number of ships was reduced to 441. In 1916 this number was further reduced, while this year we are practically ignored.

On the Louise embankment are two grain elevators: one capable of containing 250,000 bushels and a large modern reinforced concrete elevator of 1,000,000 capacity. A contract is now under way, and by the end of this fall an annex will be completed which will bring the total storage capacity of this elevator to 2,000,000 bushels. But, honourable gentlemen, in my humble opinion, the equipment of the port of Quebec, as regards storage capacity for grain, will still be very far below the requirements if we are to adopt a true national policy, that is, the export of Canadian products via Canadian routes and Canadian ports.

The Transcontinental railway has been a very costly one. The Canadian Northern is also to prove very costly to this country. Both are among the best-constructed railways in America. The level grades of the Transcontinental permit of a continuous haul of 1,700 tons per train as compared with 950 tons on the other railways. The construction of the Transcontinental railway has shortened the distance between Quebec and Winnipeg by 214 miles, and I am told that wheat for export from the latter point can now be profitably carried to Quebec by rail at less than 10 cents per bushel.

As I have already stated, the Government cannot justify its present policy of assuming the ownership and operation of the Grand Trunk Pacific and Canadian Northern railways otherwise than by assuming at the same time the development and equipment of the Canadian tidewater ports in such proportion as will take care of all the traffic within the scope and radius of these railways, and this can be done only by adopting a prompt, vigorous and energetic policy.

Hon. Mr. L'ESPERANCE.

First, a schedule of export rates via Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, and St. John, that will compare favourably at all seasons with the rates via Buffalo, Portland, New York and other American ports.

Second, the purchase of the needed rolling stock and locomotive power to transport this traffic to Quebec, in summer, and to St. John and Halifax in winter.

Third, by equipping the ports of Quebec, St. John and Halifax with the docks and grain elevators required to handle promptly all the traffic offered by these railways. The sums required for this equipment will be small as compared to the burden it is now proposed to assume.

No one would think of acquiring a large and expensive factory unless he had the machinery to operate it, and had definite, well-laid plans as to the business which was to come. The port of Quebec, I am sorry to say, is not receiving the traffic that it is entitled to get. It was to be, and should be, the eastern summer terminal of the Transcontinental railway. And while I am on the subject may I ask the honourable the leader of the Government why it is that, at a time when maritime rates are so high and bottoms so scarce, the port of Quebec, which is nearer to Liverpool than New York by 500 miles, is not taken better advantage of? Is the loss of one, two, three or more days on the return trip of a ship plying the ocean of so little consequence that it is not worth while to call the attention of the Imperial authorities to this state of affairs? If the Imperial authorities are aware of the facts, may we know the reason why ships are being diverted from Quebec to more distant ports?

We are making tremendous sacrifices in the present war. While our first aim is to help to win the war, no reasonable and sane citizen of this country should neglect to consider the great problems now confronting us or which will arise when peace is declared. This Dominion of ours has tremendous resources, resources which have barely been touched upon; but the wealth and prosperity which the development of these resources will carry must be kept within our borders.

We have not been careful enough in the past. We have allowed the fortune bestowed upon us by Providence to pour through foreign channels. If the great sacrifices we are now making result in teaching us a better national policy, the millions which we will have spent for the cause of the Allies shall not have been spent in vain.

Honourable gentlemen, I have had little time in life to give way to melodrama, poetry or fantastic dreams. I must therefore be excused if in dealing with this subject I grow enthusiastic. Fourteen years have now elapsed since I resigned a modest position on the Intercolonial railway to join a business firm in the old city of Champlain. How many times since, while walking on that historic terrace—known by the illustrious name of one of our greatest Governors, Lord Dufferin, I have admired that beautiful panorama which no word of mine can adequately describe. While my mind wandered over the wonderful landscape, my eyes were set on the beautiful map of water lying at my feet, and the question came, more pressing every day: why is it that this magnificent harbour of Quebec, almost unique in the world, certainly the greatest and best located tidewater port on the continent of North America, 500 miles nearer Liverpool than the port of New York, is not taken better advantage of?—a port that is accessible to the largest ships afloat, and the largest that man will ever build; a port which can safely harbour all the navies of the world; a port where converge all the great railways of this country—the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific; a port that could easily be kept open the year round, when it shall truly become the gateway for the freight and passenger traffic of a world-wide Empire. Why is it that this port, so richly endowed by Providence, is so neglected by men?

It is these thoughts and reflections, gentlemen, that have induced me to cast aside my natural distaste for public life in order to contribute to the best of my ability to obtain recognition for that great natural harbour—a recognition which will revolutionize the maritime trade of this young nation, cement together the people of the different provinces, and prove a great boon, not to Quebec alone, but to the whole of Canada and the Empire.

If my feeble words and deeds may contribute in the slightest degree to the realization of this great dream of mine, I shall be amply compensated for the harsh and unjust criticisms which some of my public acts have brought upon my head.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It does me good to hear a member on that side of the House agree with a member on this side. When I first advocated a rate of 10 cents a bushel from Winnipeg to Quebec, there were not many on my own side to sympathize with me, and those on the other side thought this was absurd. I would also remind honourable gentlemen that the railway authorities, those of the only railway then in existence, away back in 1903 or 1904, namely, the Canadian Pacific railway, said it was preposterous to think of ever carrying wheat between Winnipeg and Quebec for less than 20 cents a bushel. Now, if ever the Transcontinental railway between Winnipeg and Quebec has been justified, it is by the speech of the honourable gentleman who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. L'Espérance). He says, and says truly, that wheat can actually be transported at a profit—allowing for a return of the empty cars, if necessary—at 10 cents a bushel; and that statement is corroborated by a rate given by no less a man than the present Minister of Railways, the Hon. Frank Cochrane, a rate of 6 cents a bushel from Armstrong, on the National Transcontinental railway, to Quebec. If my memory serves me rightly, Armstrong is, speaking roughly, about 900 miles from Quebec westward. There remain 450 miles from Armstrong to Winnipeg. Six cents plus three cents for the other 450 miles, which is half of 900, make 9 cents; and allowing for the terminal in Winnipeg, one cent, which is not out of the way, the rate would be 10 cents a bushel.

I am quite in sympathy with the honourable gentleman from the Gulf division (Hon. Mr. L'Esperance) when he says that the port of Quebec should be equipped. There is no doubt that it should. The honourable gentleman seemed to be proud to tell this honourable House that there is now at Quebec one elevator, built of reinforced concrete, which can hold 1,250,000 bushels of grain, and that there will be in the near future another holding 1,000,000 bushels. Well, what is 2,250,000 bushels? At Port Arthur and Fort William there is at present, if I am rightly informed, a capacity for about 40,000,000 bushels or more of grain. There is no reason why the port of Quebec, my old native city, should not be developed. It has immense facilities.

When the honourable gentleman speaks of 15 miles of railway sidings built by the Harbour Commission, I must say that I do not know where they were put, for the area is very restricted; but there is beautiful level land in the estuary of the St. Charles river at Quebec. The formation is very similar to that of Fort William and Port Arthur, and slips could easily be cut into the land, as is being done at those ports; the earth could be excavated and wharves built on each side and elevators erected. There is a fine opportunity for developing that port. The honourable senator from Kingston (Hon. Mr. Richardson) has made use of the port of Quebec, and has handled a quantity of grain which would, I suppose, fill the present capacity at Quebec 160 times in one year; but if there were adequate facilities at the port the grain which is being held at Fort William and Port Arthur all through the winter months could be held just as well at Quebec and would be ready for the early navigation. Enough grain could be stored at the port of Quebec to keep the two railways, or even the three railways, busy if they hauled that grain during the winter time, when business is not very active.

The construction of the Transcontinental has been justified. After all, honourable gentlemen, we have the Transcontinental between Winnipeg and Quebec; we have built it with government money; it is in the hands of the Government to-day. Why not use it? I do not want to impute motives to the Government, but I understand that for a long time the Government was not in sympathy with the enterprise and did not give it a chance, as I have very often said in this honourable House; but, now that we have the railway, of the Government would equip the port of Quebec, as the honourable gentleman has just suggested, the National Transcontinental railway would be a going concern. I will say more: the Canadian Pacific railway would route a cargo over the Transcontinental, as by the Act they have a right to do. The distance between Winnipeg and Quebec is 214 miles shorter by the National Transcontinental than by the Canadian Pacific; and, as the honourable gentleman has truly said, one locomotive on the National Transcontinental railway can do the work of two locomotives on the Canadian Pacific—and I defy any one to contradict that statement. The Canadian Pacific railway between Port Arthur and North Bay runs up and down the height of land four times; it is a succession of toboggan slides. Still the Canadian Pacific is the road that is being pointed to as a magnificent railway. The roadbed is not bad, but the location is poor. There were reasons for locating it where it is, and I do not want to take up the time of this honourable House to explain them. The National Transcontinental railway, on the other hand, runs from Winnipeg, which is at a height of 800 feet above the sea level, up to lake Seul, which is at a level of 1,200 feet, and then along the plateau to the headwaters of the St. Maurice river, and from there down to Quebec. There are tangents of from twenty to twenty-five miles in length, where a train can run as fast as it is possible for a train to run, and with perfect safety. The road is a splendid road and I believe that if the object the honourable gentleman has in view is attained, that is, if the port of Quebec is developed, the National Transcontinental railway will prove to be one of the best assets of the country.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I rise to a point of order. I would like to know if it is permissible to discuss an inquiry? It ends with the words: "and will inquire if it is the intention of the Government," etc. So it is really an inquiry and not a motion. I think it is to be regretted that the honourable gentleman introduced the matter in this way, because I know that other senators would like to say something on it, but, thinking they would be out of order if they did so, have refrained from taking part in the discussion.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not wish to interrupt my honourable friend, but the item appears on the Order Paper under the heading of "motion," and that is why I discussed it. I apologize to this honourable House if I have spoken out of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: This inquiry is under the false heading of "motion," but inquiries of this kind, in which the attention of the House is called, are open to discussion. We move for a discussion of the inquiry, and the inquiry is made after the discussion takes place. That has always been the procedure in this honourable House.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Though the matter is placed under the heading of "motion," I have understood it to be an inquiry. It ends with the words: "and will inquire if it is the intention of the Government to take any action to prevent in future the bulk of the export of the oceanic traffic being routed via American ports." So it is an inquiry, and according to our rules it can be discussed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Sproule) has something to say, the debate may be adjourned, and he can prepare to take part in it the next time.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I did not wish to speak on the question at all; but an honourable senator mentioned the matter to me, and I said it was unfortunate that it did not appear on the Order Paper in a form which would, in my judgment, permit of discussion; because, without any motion being before the House, as I understand it, there could not properly be discussion.

Hon. Mr. POWER: May I be permitted to read the rule. Rule 40 says:

When it is intended to make a statement or raise a discussion on asking a question, the Senator having such intention, as part of the notice under rule 21, gives notice that he will call attention to the matter inquired into.

The honourable gentleman who has brought this matter before the House (Hon. Mr. L'Esperance) has complied with rule 40, and the question is open for discussion by the whole House. Questions of this kind, in which attention is called to certain matters, have been discussed in this House since 1877.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I do not intend to take up the time of the House at any length; but I have listened with a great deal of interest to the honourable gentleman for the Gulf division of Quebec (Hon. Mr. L'Esperance), and I think he has done rightly in calling the attention of this honourable House to the subject matter of his motion. I am particularly interested in it from the standpoint of foreign trade and the future of our trade after the war, and in my few remarks I propose to deal with this question on a broader basis than that of the mere question of adding to the shipping facilities of Quebec and using it more frequently as a port from which our exports should be shipped. I have before me a paragraph from a speech by Dr. Emery R. Johnson, Professor of Transportation and Commerce at the Pennsylvania University, one of the highest authorities on transportation in the United States. It is very brief. It reads:

A country of continental proportions can engage largely and profitably in foreign trade only if equipped with economical means of transportation both by land and by sea. The country well supplied with railways and inland waterways that are co-ordinately and efficiently managed and that serve all sections capable of settlement and development is able to engage successfully in the production of exports and to make profitable use of large quantities of imports both of raw materials and of more or less completely fabricated manufactures. The entire country with all its resources and energies may engage in industrial competition with other countries and sections of the world.

The point to which I wish to draw the attention of this honourable House is that our land transportation and our ocean transportation have not been and are not now co-ordinated. We have spent in round figures, $200,000,000 in developing our canal system. We have spent another $200,000,000 in what might be called facilities for water transportation in the way of dredging, harbour facilities, wharves, docks, and so forth. To that $400,000,000 may be added hundreds of millions of more dollars spent for the development of our railway facilities. Now, that is all spent for one purpose without any co-ordination in so far as ocean traffic is concerned. Let me give an example of what I call businesslike co-ordination for the purpose of reaching a desired end. The Canadian Pacific railway has a transportation line to the Pacific coast and it has at Vancouver its own fleet of ocean steamships. That is co-ordination. It is able to bring the traffic of the Far East to the western hemisphere. It not only adds very largely to the employment of capital and labour in Canada, but it adds to our national wealth, and advertises Canada more effectively, I believe, than any other advertisement. We are about to have before us in this honourable House —at all events, there are this afternoon being discussed in the other House—proposals for the taking over by the Government of the Canadian Northern railway.

That will give us, with the Intercolonial railway, a through line from the Atlantic to the Pacific; and, as the honourable member from the Gulf ports says, we have the most magnificent harbours in Montreal and Quebec. I rather object to Quebec being cited specifically, because at St. John and at Halifax we have spent many millions of dollars in improvements. The question is whether the attention of this House should not be seriously directed to the fact that there is now an opportunity for the Government to give consideration to the question of co-ordinating our inland and our ocean tansportation, to the end that the hundreds of millions of dollars already spent on our inland systems of communication and for the improvement of our waterways should be so utilized that this country can get the benefit of through overseas traffic by national shipping through national ports.

You will understand that something has to be done when I tell you that there is plenty of scope for shipbuilding. For five years before the war the total average tonnage of new ships built throughout the world was three million tons. Several million tons have been destroyed during the war by mines, by submarines, by wrecks, and by accidents, and in addition nearly every ocean going steamship plying along the trade routes is practically worn out because there has not been time to lay up for repairs owing to the urgent necessities of transportation. The United States has seen the necessity of taking action of this kind, and the Underwood Tariff Bill, which was passed in 1906, I think, made provision for the encouragement of the use of American ports and bottoms owned by or registered in the United States. By that Bill, provision was made that all goods imported into Ameican ports in American bottoms should receive a discount of 5 per cent on the customs duty.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: They did not get it.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: The provision is on the statute book. Perhaps the honourable member from Kingston can tell me whether that has been repealed or has not been put into effect.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: It was put into court and has been kept there for the last two or three years, and has not become effective.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I cite it as an evidence that the leading men of that country thought it necessary to make that provisions in order to encourage the use of American ports and bottoms; and if the first attempt was not successful, I have no doubt it will be followed up by some other method that will succeed. But I may show in another way that the United States is fully seized of the importance to American trade of providing facilities for overseas traffic in its own bottoms. General Goethals, one of the leading engineers of the United States, the chief engineer for the construction of the Panama canal, says:

A big beginning has been made, with both wooden and steel construction. Contracts have been let for 348 wooden ships, with a total tonnage of 1,218,000, and negotiations are under way for 100 more of these vessels. Contracts have also been let for 77 steel ships, with a tonnage of 643,800. Thus work is now in progress on 425 vessels, with a tonnage of 1,861,800, and the full programme contemplates the production of more than three million tons within eight months.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Are those wooden vessels?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Wooden and steel. I may tell you that during the first six months of this current year, 1917, shipbuilding companies in the United States have been incorporated with an aggregate capital of $200,000,000; yet Canada's effort has been the letting of a few contracts for wooden ships for war purposes, and which are not even to be owned in Canada.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Why will they not be owned in Canada?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Because they are sold to the British Government, and have to be registered in Great Britain. To show the facilities we have existent: the tonnage of the port of Montreal alone was three millions in 1900, six and one-half millions in 1910, and nine millions in 1914. These figures prove that we have the facilities if we had our own ships. I am quoting Montreal as the principal port; but any gentleman can easily get the figures of the other ports, which mount up very largely. The harbour elevators in Montreal handled, in 1907, one million bushels of grain; in 1908, nine millions; in 1909, twelve millions; in 1910, twenty-one millions; in 1911, twenty-one millions; in 1912, twenty-six millions; in 1913, forty-four millions; in 1914, the year before the war ,sixty-two millions of bushels. From these figures honourable gentlemen will see that the Government has not been backward in well-doing so far as concerns the providing of facilities for handling the trade; but provision was not made to prevent that trade from being handled almost entirely by foreign interests. The point I am trying to make is that the attention of the Government should be called to the necessity of co-ordination between our inland system and our overseas system. In 1913 I was one of a deputation that waited on the Government and presented a memorial, two paragraphs of which I will read :

Canada is so placed between Europe and the Far East that she should be able, if her land and water transportation systems were well developed and skilfully combined, to add to her other commercial advantages an immense carrying trade between those two enormous masses of population. As long, however, as the Canadian transportation system is weak on its water side this possibility cannot be realized.

What Canada Loses.

Apart from this, the atrophy of the Canadian marine deprives the country of profits at once possible and immense; and in addition inflicts positive and severe loss. Including allied and subsidiary interests, not far short of 200,000 persons draw pay from the railway industry of Canada; that is, not far short of a million Canadians are supported by it. Thus not only do the producers of Canada get their goods carried, but the carriage of those goods greatly increases their home market. Further, the producers have under substantial control the rates at and conditions under which their goods are carried; and they value this control highly.

Using Non-Canadian Ports and Non-Canadian Ships.

Compare with this the marine carriage of Canadian goods. It is very largely done by non-Canadians. On the Great Lakes Canadian shipping amounts to a contemptible fraction of the total bulk of tonnage afloat. On the ocean Canadian ships in 1911-12 carried only about one million out of nine million tons carried to and from Canadian ports; and in addition huge quantities of Canadian goods had passed through American ports. We are using non-Canadian ports and non-Canadian ships. Canadians pay from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 yearly in ocean freight rates, and these almost wholly go to outsiders; compare what we get in increased development, in increased home markets, from the $150,000,000 which Canadians pay annually in railway freight rates. Associated with this is entire lack of control of water transportation rates. At the moment when a powerful effort is being made to force the railways to lower their rates, ocean rates are shooting up with scarcely a word of comment."

In our railway freight rates on land transportation we have the public protected by means of the Dominion Railway Commission; but the whole value of that protection may be destroyed if, after carrying our produce over lines that have cost the country hundreds of millions of dollars, and delivering it at Canadian national ports that have also cost Canada additional hundreds of millions, we are forced to abide by whatever rate the foreign ship-owner chooses to charge us in order to get our goods to market. It is for that reason that I claim that greater attention should be given to the co-ordination of land and overseas transportation; and, until that co-ordination is achieved, we can never be a successful exporting country.

The honourable gentleman who introduced this motion did not suggest any substantial remedy; and, although I am not going to move any amendment, I would suggest to him and to this House that what I am now going to deal with might be a means of providing a remedy. Mr. J. A. Farrell, the president of the United States Steel Corporation, the largest commercial corporation in the world, recently presided at the National Foreign Trade Convention of the United States, and in closing he used these words:

In sober truth the motto of this convention, "Greater prosperity through greater foreign trade," might with entire correctness be made to read, "No enduring prosperity without foreign trade."

Neither can we have enduring prosperity, nor can we have foreign trade, unless we secure such co-ordination between our land transportation and our ocean-going transportation as will enable us, at least in a measure, to compete with the subsidized overseas traffic of Germany and other competing nations. The suggestion I would make as to a method that might, at all events, assist in alleviating the evil complained of, would be the passage of an Act similar to the Shipping Bill passed in the United States in 1915. That Act created the Shipping Board, somewhat in the lines of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and appropriated fifty million dollars for the purpose of establishing lines of shipping by granting subsidies, and in other ways. I do not refer to the question of granting subsidies so much as to the great value that a Shipping Board would be, if for no other purpose than to gather information, to make recommendations, and to make some virile effort to overcome the evil mentioned. I think all of us will admit that the Dominion Railway Board has been of great benefit to the people of this country, and I believe that the railways themselves, who were at first averse to its appointment, will admit that that board by its fairness has been of great benefit to the railways as well as to the people.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Hear, hear; that was a Liberal measure.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: If we were to institute a Shipping Board that would take up this whole question and co-ordinate the rates between overseas and inland transportation so that we could get through rates not only for all the produce, the wheat and the coarse grains, that we expect to export, but for manufactures and everything else, Canada might feel that she was able to enter into competition with the cargoes of the world. No country in the world has ever done so much as Canada, with her small population, on the northern half of this continent; but there is plenty of room for us to do more, and here is the way in which we can help ourselves, help the country, and help the Empire.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable gentleman said that ships were now being built in Canada for British register, and that they would not be Canadian ships although built with money supplied by the Canadian government. Is that right?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: So far as my understanding goes, those ships have been ordered by the Imperial Government through the Imperial Munitions Board, and they are being sold to Great Britain in the same manner as we are selling munitions, and when they are delivered on the other side they are no longer our property.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: But we advanced the money for them?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: No, the money is advanced by the Imperial Government.

Hon. JULES TESSIER: I wish to express my satisfaction that this question has been brought up, as it is one of vital interest to the district of Quebec which I represent, as well as to the province of Quebec and the whole of Canada. It is admitted that the equipment of the port of Quebec is a matter of national importance. As has been said, Quebec is the natural terminus of navigation for the East, where ships of the greatest tonnage can come and find every facility for discharging and loading cargo, and when that port is properly equipped any large fleet of steamers can be harboured in it with safety. The great Quebec bridge will be opened in a few weeks, and I hope this time with success, so that Quebec harbour will be in touch with all the railways of Canada, which can transport wheat and other products to any destination in Europe more cheaply by that than by any other route.

It has been suggested by the press that Quebec might be made a free port, like Hamburg in Germany, so that vessels arriving in Quebec could discharge their cargoes without any encumbrance, even of customs officers, who would only interfere when the goods would be released for their destination.

I am most happy to congratulate the honourable member from the Gulf (Hon. Mr. L'Esperance) upon having brought up this question. I am glad that he has found a seconder in the honourable member for Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls), a gentleman who has shown much talent and breadth of mind since taking his seat as a member of this House. I hope that the Government will do its best to help this enterprise and to meet the aspirations of Quebec.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Just exactly what does the honourable gentleman mean by urging that the port of Quebec should be made a free port? Does he mean free from harbour dues or customs duties?

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: I mean a port of free entry.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I would like to ask the mover of the motion if he knows the through rate on freight from Port Arthur, say, to Boston. Grain is carried at the lowest figure; frequently liners from New York carry grain across the ocean at a penny a bushel. If the honourable gentleman can tell us the through rate from Port Arthur, say, to Boston, we could form an idea for a comparison.

Hon. W. C. EDWARDS: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the addresses delivered to the House upon this question. It struck me that the question of free trade was very largely involved, because, if we are to have shipping from Canada, we must obtain return cargoes, and under a protective system we are very largely debarred from that condition. Trade always follows the line of least resistance, and so does shipping. The bulk of our grain is exported via New York, because rates by that route from the point of production to the point of use are lower and the facilities are greater than by our Canadian routes. I understand that the great bulk of the grain is not carried by tramp steamers, but by liners.

My honourable friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) dwelt on the question of transportation and the building of ships, and referred to the fact that the United States is now working in that direction. It is a fact that the United States transports in its own vessels, but a very small proportion of its products; the great bulk is carried in British, Norwegian, and other ships of foreign register. Prior to the American war the United States transported a very large percentage—I have forgotten the exact figure—60, 70 or 80 per cent—in their own ships; but as a result of the high protective system which came into force in that country, their ships were driven from the ocean. What I now state I know as a matter of fact. The passage of the Shipping Bill, which has been referred to, was so detrimental to the shipping interests of the United States that their large owners of ships immediately registered them under British registry. It is practically and positively impossible for a country to be a large shipping country under a protective system; and it is because of the trade system of Great Britain that she does practically the whole carrying trade of the world. We all delight to see the products of Canada going through our own ports to foreign countries; but we would not impose on the western producer a condition whereby his products would go to the countries that buy them at a higher rate of freight than would be the case if they were sent through another country. I do not believe in penalizing the people at both ends—levying protection against what they import and imposing unjust conditions upon their exports. Give the people a chance to live.

A great impetus has been given to shipbuilding in the United States, and to some extent in Canada, largely because of the enormous destruction of ships which is at present taking place; but it is a question whether Canada or the United States can be made shipping countries under their existing trade relations. Our trade returns show that the largest proportion of our exports are sold to Great Britain, and that by far the largest proportion of our purchases are from the United States. You cannot send goods to Britain by ships and bring goods back from the United States by ships. I should like to know under what system, as conditions exist at present, you can develop the shipping interests of Canada so far as the ocean is concerned.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman who has moved this motion (Hon. Mr. L'Esperance) has asked me, as representing the Government:

> If it is the intention of the Government to take any action to prevent in future the bulk of the exports of the oceanic traffic being routed via American ports.

I may point out that the phraseology of the motion itself absolves the Government from any criticism as to its inaction or passivity upon this particular question. The motion states that our Atlantic ports—> —are now properly equipped for the storage and speedy handling of grain and other merchandise, and that the exportation of our products by the allied government buyers should be routed through our Canadian ports.

There are sound economic reasons why it is impossible for the Government of any country to direct through artificial channels the promotion of shipping or the development of ports to the extent that seems to be anticipated by many people. My honourable friend from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) can always find in the absence of free trade a good reason for any of the so-called difficulties which confront us, and I have never known a difficulty that could not have been solved by my honourable friend from De Lanaudière (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) if proper recognition had been given to the sagacity of the statesmen who built the National Transcontinental railway.

The honourable gentleman from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) has alleged—and he seems to be sincere in the comfort which he derives from having pointed out from time to time, almost from time immemorial—that all these difficulties could be overcome by the adoption of free trade. Notwithstanding the criticism which he has directed to the development of American ports and the diminution of American shipping, it is quite manifest that the United States has been doing very well under a protective tariff. I have not learned that the United States has been suffering distress from the lack of national growth through the adoption of its trade policy. The trouble in regard to its shipping has been that the United States has always sought to place coast regulations and other restrictions around its shipping which have been absent in British shipping. Shipping has to be as free as the oceans over which the ships sail, and any nation that attempts to place restrictions upon its ships, either in port or out of port, will find that it has handicapped, not only the ships that come into its ports, but the ports themselves, to such an extent as to practically destroy the development of all its national ports.

My honourable friend referred to the legislation, passed a few years ago in the United States, which induced owners of American bottoms to register them as British bottoms. That was not due to the tariff of the United States; it was entirely owing to the tyrannical restrictions placed upon the shipping which came into United States ports. If the ports of Canada are to be built up, they have to be left free to the ships of the world.

If we seek to carry out this project by arbitrary measures, such as were suggested by the honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls), and attempt to coordinate our land transportation system with our sea-going system, we shall enter upon a policy which would be prejudicial to all the systems. In ocean transportation we cannot enforce such rates as we would upon inland transportation systems. There must be free competition, free rivalry between the ships of the whole world, if they are to come into our ports and develop them. Ships of every nation sail into Canadian ports, and it would be utterly impossible to devise any system whereby we might enforce against ocean-going vessels regulations such as the United States have sought to enforce against bottoms coming into American ports.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: The Canadian Pacific Company have done very well by co-ordinating their land and sea transportation systems. Why could not that be done with the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern systems?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: When my honourable friend talks about co-ordination between the inland transportation system and the ocean-going fleets of the Canadian Pacific railway, it is a misuse of language, because it is all one system. It is a system of through traffic from the Pacific to the Atlantic, or, in fact, around the world. We are confronted with an entirely different situation. Ships of every nation come into the port of Quebec and carry our products from there to the other ports of the world. There are manifest reasons why the ports of Montreal, St. John and Halifax have become enormously developed of late years. I venture to say that those three ports have developed proportionately to a greater extent almost than any others on the continent. We can very well understand the development of the port of Montreal. Montreal has been made a terminal point for the great transcontinental railway systems of Canada—the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk. It seems to me that the Government could not by any legislation say to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company: "Your fleet must leave Quebec, not Montreal." The greatest freedom must be given to all ships to sail from any port that they may think most advantageous. Furthermore, we cannot ignore the fact that there are certain prejudices against navigation in the St. Lawrence. I am not going to enter into a discussion upon that subject. The touchstone may be that insurance rates on the St. Lawrence are very much in advance of those exacted upon other routes.

I may say to my honourable friend from the Gulf (Hon. Mr. L'Esperance) who has brought this matter up, and who has favoured the House with a very interesting discussion upon it, that the Government of Canada has always taken a deep interest in the development of the port of Quebec, and of late years the present Government has concentrated a great deal of attention and the expenditure of a very large amount of money upon the development of the facilities and equipment of that port. I have no doubt that at a comparatively early day we shall reap some of the advantages which will flow from that expenditure. If the Government of Canada should enter upon the policy, which has been foreshadowed in the other House, of acquiring a large system like the Canadian Northern railway, that system together with the National Transcontinental and the Intercolonial would possibly enable the Government to carry out such a policy of co-ordination as exists between the Canadian Pacific railway and its fleet, which was so eloquently outlined by my honourable friend from Toronto. The time may come, and let us hope, honourable gentlemen, it will, when we may possess a system of national transportation by which Canada not only will be operating a great system of inland railways but may be sailing her own fleet to all parts of the world.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Honourable gentlemen, I should like to have this debate adjourned, because I desire to say a few words on the subject and am not prepared to do so at the present time. This is one of the most important questions to be dealt with in this honourable House, and one to which I feel it my duty to give some attention. If it is agreeable to the honourable leader of the Government, I would move the adjournment of the debate until Tuesday next.

The debate was adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT (JURORS) BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill 97, an Act to amend the Criminal Code (respecting jurors).—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The Senate again went into committee on Bill 73, an Act to amend The Meat and Canned Foods Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed. Hon. Mr. Daniel in the Chair.

On subsection 12A of section 2—Fish, etc., canneries to be subject to inspection; cans, etc., to be marked:

Hon. Mr. POWER: Is not this one of the clauses to which the honourable gentlemen from Tignish (Hon. Mr. Murphy) and Souris (Hon. Mr. McLean) objected?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have spoken to my honourable friends on the subject, and, with the exception of subsection 12D, to which I propose to move an amendment, the Bill appeals to them as being reasonably fair.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I may say, for the information of the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) that there is a general blanket clause with regard to labelling, and it has been agreed that it shall be put into effect every year, by Order in Council. In general, I do not believe in Orders in Council as taking the place of statutes, but under the circumstances it may be necessary to submit to an Order in Council in order that the interests of all concerned may be safeguarded. Whether the Government are Tory or Grit, they will likely pass that Order in Council to enable the industry to go on. As you will see in that clause, the Governor in Council is empowered to grant exemption in certain cases where the export or sale of the goods would be otherwise interfered with. It is for my honourable friends to say whether they think it is wise or not to leave that provision in the hands of the Government. I am satisfied that the Government will do what is right.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Let it go.

Subsection 12A of section 2 was agreed to.

On subsection 12D of section 2—contents and size of cans of lobster:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I move that the word "sixteen" in the third line of clause 12D be changed to "fourteen"; that the word "twelve" in line 4 be changed to "ten and a half"; that the word "eight" in the next subclause be changed to "seven"; and that the word "four" in the next line be changed to "three and a half".

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: And eliminate "picnic can" altogether. The name indicates what it is. Nobody is deceived.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me that it had better be taken out. It might lead to deception and it might possibly be a difficult matter to determine what a picnic can is. I would add to my motion that the words "a picnic can, ten ounces, avoirdupois," be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is there in the Meat and Canned Foods Act any definition of what a picnic can is?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; this seems to be a new term.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: As a matter of fact it never was defined; it was just an omnium gatherum.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would perhaps lead to confusion with the other packages. A picnic can might be put up as a pound can. I think the term should be struck out, and when the Bill comes up for a third reading, if it is desirable to reinstate it, we can do so then.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Do not give the picnic can a status, that is all.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Would not the honourable leader of the Government think it better to let this remain and include in the "picnic can" the fourteen ounces and other weights of cans as well as the ten ounces, so that the present practice would not be interfered with, but the door would be opened for the inauguration of perhaps better practices and the amendment would better meet the desire of the House of Commons?

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: The three-quarter pound can, containing ten and a half ounces, is really a picnic can; there is a difference of only half an ounce. So there would be no necessity for having the two sizes of picnic cans.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What has just been said is very pertinent to the question. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Beique) will observe that we have already made provision for the ten and one-half ounce can, and it seems to me rather anomalous to make a further provision for a picnic can when there is a difference of only half an ounce. It might possibly lead to confusion, and I think it is better to leave it out.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I do not see any objection to it. By the amendment you are preventing the inauguration of a practice under which the sixteen-ounce weight would be adopted.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then we would confine it strictly to weight.

The amendment was agreed to, and the subsection as amended was agreed to.

On subsection 12H of section 2—imported fish to be labelled, etc.:

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not think that clause is well worded. It provides that "all canned fish or shellfish imported into Canada shall be correctly labelled." I think it should read, "all cans of fish or shellfish."

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think if my honourable friend will look at the definition clause at the beginning, he will find that it makes the wording correct.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Ross) is a little too particular.

The subsection was agreed to.

On section 3—when liable for seizure:

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I am not going to make a serious objection, but I desire to register my protest against this clause. Small lobster packers, for instance, who pack perhaps one hundred or two hundred cases and who are running a little corner grocery, cannot take their cans from their own factory. They do not put a label on their pack, which would add 50 cents to the cost. I do not understand why section 3 was put in, and I think it should be struck out. All along the shores of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick it costs fully 50 cents to label a case of lobsters, and everything that adds to the cost to the man who produces is naturally charged to the consumer. It is for you, honourable gentleman, to say whether or not it is right to allow that section to pass—whether any good purpose would be served by requiring the small dealer to pay that extra 50 cents and charge it up to the consumer. I do not think it is in the interest of our domestic trade.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are protecting the public.

The section was agreed to.

The Bill was reported.

CRIMINAL CODE AND EVIDENCE ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The Senate again went into committee on Bill 124, an Act to Amend the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed. Hon. Mr. Crosby in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

On section 3—definition enlarged to include place where indecencies practised:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I took exception yesterday to the last words of this clause: "or occupied or resorted to by one or more persons for such purposes." If those words remain in the clause, it would mean, for instance, that a person might close his house during the summer season, and if a servant happened to go into the house and commit an act of indecency, that house would be stamped as a bawdy house. It seems to me that that is going too far, and I would suggest that those words be stricken out, and be replaced by the following:

> Any place occupied or resorted to for such practice shall, in as far as may be necessary to reach, arrest or punish the person or persons making use of the same, be treated as a common bawdy house.

I think that will answer the purpose, and yet not have the effect of stamping the house as a bawdy house.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would point out to my honourable friend that the amendment incorporated in the Bill is very much more of a protective character than the Act as it stands to-day, the new words introduced into the Bill being, "or for the practice of acts of indecency." The old law was:

> A common bawdy house is a house, room, set of rooms or place of any kind kept for purposes of prostitution or occupied or resorted to by one or more persons for such purposes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The law was bad as it was, and open to the abuse to which I direct attention. I move this amendment in the expectation that the Department of Justice will look into the question.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: Notwithstanding my high opinion of the member for De Salaberry, I do not think he has improved the Act. I would like to know why he wants to change that clause.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: My purpose is to remove the stigma placed upon a private residence which may be closed for the summer season, and in which an act of indecency might be committed without the knowledge of the owner. At the same time, my amendment provides that any party who commits an act of indecency may be reached with the same effect as if it were a bawdy house.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It seems to me that the clause as it stands covers everything.

If a servant went into the house, as suggested, or even if some one rented the house, it would not be "kept for purposes of prostitution," and if an accident happened the innocent holder would not be to blame.

The amendment was negatived on division: yeas, 11; nays, 14.

Section 3 was agreed to.

The Bill was reported.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at 3 o'clock.

THE SENATE.

THE MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN inquired of the Government:

1. Is there any foundation for the statement, persistently made in the public press of Canada, since the adoption of Bill 75, Compulsory Military Service Act, by the Senate, on the 8th of August, 1917, that the Government is not prepared to ask the Royal Assent to the said Bill 75?
2. If so, what is the cause or the reason for such unpreparedness and hesitation on the part of the Government?
3. Is there any foundation for the statement, in the public press, that the British Government has been, or is in negotiation with, or having "pourparlers" with the Government of Canada, regarding the adoption, the Royal sanction, and the enforcement of said Bill 75?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. No.

MINISTRY OF INLAND REVENUE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN inquired of the Government:

1. Does the Prime Minister of Canada intend or propose to fill the vacancy in the Federal Cabinet caused by the resignation of Hon. L. N. Patenaude from his position as Minister of Inland Revenue, tendered and acccepted on the 12th day of June?
2. If the Prime Minister so intends and proposes, when will he fill the said vacancy?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Yes.
2. The Government cannot fix the exact date.

ENFORCEMENT OF THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. H. J. CLORAN moved:

For a return of all correspondence and communications that may have taken place by letter, cable, wireless or otherwise, between the Government of Great Britain and Ireland and the Government of Canada either through His Excellency the Governor General or the Prime Minister, or any other Canadian authority, regarding the adoption, the Royal sanction, and the putting into force of Bill 75, commonly known as the Compulsory Service Act in Canada.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, I find it passing strange that Bill 75, commonly known as the Compulsory Military Service Act in Canada has not been definitely dealt with, although it was passed in the House of Commons three weeks ago. It was introduced into that House by the Prime Minister in a hurried manner, and put through as rapidly as possible, on the ground, as stated by the Prime Minister, that the Bill was absolutely necessary and of great urgency as a war measure, for the purpose of helping the Allies to win the war—there was not one minute to be lost; and while helping the Allies to win the war, it was intended to help our boys at the front by replacing them as they were killed or became wounded or disabled. Those were the reasons given by the Prime Minister in urging Parliament to pass this Bill without any delay.

What has happened since? The Bill came before this House three weeks ago; the Senate took only three or four days for its discussion and adopted it with a few slight amendments; and, for the convenience of the Government, and much to our own discomfort, we sat up until two or three o'clock in the morning to give our vote on that measure of supreme importance, a measure which has taken the precedence in every public meeting throughout the Dominion for the past six weeks. Only yesterday or the day before the Liberals of Winnipeg South unanimously adopted a motion calling for conscription of men at once. No later than last Saturday week, the Minister of Militia went to camp Borden and promised there and then that this Bill would be put into force immediately. These are facts known to the entire public.

What I desire to ascertain is, what kind of construction are we to place upon these facts. The Government is now more depleted than it was a week ago. The Government has to-day one minister less than it had three days ago, on account of its indecision and inaction. One of the most prominent ministers of the Cabinet for the past six years, the most influential, the most capable of dealing with the organization, especially in election matters, has gone out, on the same ground as that of this motion. He tendered his resignation a week ago and left the Cabinet a few days ago. It was announced in the House of Commons, and only yesterday in this House, that he had resigned on account of the indecision and inaction of the Prime Minister and of the Government in matters of this kind.

The object of my motion is to find out what are the real reasons for delay. That motion is plain and deals with a matter to which the attention of the people of this country has been called, and on which this Parliament has a right to an ample and non-mysterious explanation. This game of conscription must be played aboveboard. We must know what is going on in the councils of the country as well as on the floor of Parliament. We are all waiting as we showed by our vote, to hear that this measure shall be put into force immediately; and yet it is being held up. Held up by whom? Not by the House of Commons, because—I will not use the word smuggled; but last Saturday, after our amendments had been held up in the House of Commons for four days, it was put through when, I believe, there was no quorum in the House. Now, when the House of Commons and the Senate are ready to have this Bill go into immediate effect, why is it held up? Remember, what I say on this question is not to approve of the attitude of the Government in bringing down the measure and putting it through as has been done, or to ask for an immediate enforcement. I am not going to urge upon His Excellency the Governor General to sanction it without due consideration. I am not going to impede the Imperial authorities in weighing the situation which has been developed in Canada since the initiation of this Act, especially since its passage. I am not going to urge the Imperial authorities to weigh carefully and fully, as they are doing, the situation created in Canada by the initiation and passage of this Bill. The Imperial authorities would rather do without this Bill than see a civil war or rebellion in Canada. It is not a paltry 75,000 or 100,000 men from Canada who will win this war. The cry is a claptrap one, for party purposes. Win the war by the present Government! What right have they to claim that they alone in Canada can win the war? Is anybody in Canada who does not go to the colours to be called a traitor, a rebel, or a slacker, when he is working in the sweat of his brow to supply munitions for the boys at the front or to gather in the harvest for the boys at the front? I can readily understand that the Governor General and the Imperial authorities are taking the wiser course of deliberate consideration regarding the unfortunate results that will spring from this Bill. The Imperial authorities are farther away and can weigh the results must more accurately and much more devotedly to the Crown than can the politicians in Canada who are looking to maintain themselves in power in spite of the will of the people. The Imperial authorities say that it is better to do away with the so-called conscription of 75,000 or 100,000 men than to set race against race, and province against province, as this Bill unfortunately has done. By throwing this gaseous bomb into the political arena two months ago Sir Robert Borden not only disrupted the parties in the House of Commons and in the Senate, but he has disrupted Confederation as far as he could by this measure.

I want to know why Sir Robert Borden, after disrupting the two great political parties in both Houses of Parliament, after disrupting his own Cabinet, after setting province against province and race against race, and while our boys are fighting, bleeding, dying, and coming home disabled and wounded—I want to know what is the reason for his indecision and inaction at the present moment in regard to this Bill. I hold that if the Prime Minister does not at once obtain the sanction of the Imperial authorities, through His Excellency the Governor General, for putting this Bill into immediate force, the only duty left to him is to resign like a man and to relinquish the reins of office to the hands of a leader who will be able to do things along democratic lines. There is no disgrace, no shame in resigning from a position. Any observer who has taken an interest in parliamentary affairs, especially in Europe, has from month to month, and from year to year witnessed resignations, not of ordinary officials, but of the Prime Ministers of the Allied powers and of the Central powers. What course was taken by Viviani, whom we all admired two months ago at the time of his historical declaration of principle on the floor of this Parliament, after having successfully conducted the affairs of France for the first two years of the war? It was under his régime that the battle of the Marne was won and France was saved to civilization and liberty. But when Viviani's usefulness had gone what did he do? He went too, without growling, without calling for a coalition government, without going to his opponents for aid, without calling for a union. He did not stand on the order of his going. What course was followed by the Prime Minister of England, who brought to the front the ablest soldier of modern times, Kitchener, and jointly with him conducted the affairs of this war for two years? The Hon. Mr. Asquith, when he found his usefulness gone, did not stand on the order of his going; he went too. The same thing has happened a dozen times in Italy. Prime Ministers and ministers have resigned time and time again. I need not refer to other Allied powers, but let me give to the country and this Parliament the greatest example of all—an example which the Prime Minister ought to have followed long ago. Hollweg, the most formidable and the most skilled Chancellor or Prime Minister that ever ruled over the destinies of Germany, when it was found by the powers of the Empire that his usefulness had passed away, what did he do? He retired like a man. He went back to his garden and his art productions, to cultivate flowers and to paint. There was no growl from him. He did not look for a coalition with his opponents; he did not look for a national government. or a union government so called; he relinquished the reins of office and handed them over to a man whom the Kaiser and his advisers thought would be more capable. The same thing happened in Austria and Hungary. Has the same thing happened in Russia? Yes, it happened there, but it happened with a vengeance; it was not only the Prime Minister that went, it was the Czar himself, his entire family, his entire Government, and all that belonged to him. But here in Canada, when a statesman's usefulness has gone, he does not go; he stands on the order of his going. In Canada there is only one power to give him the order to go—the electorate of the country. Up to the present time he has declined to face the electorate of Canada. Some of his friends are still urging Parliament to pass another Extension Bill, but that will be a long way off. There is the difference between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Ministers of the belligerent countries— of France, England, Russia, Germany, Austria, and Hungary. In Canada one would imagine that the Tory right to govern was divine, that the Tory Administration was the only safeguard of the Empire, and that only through the fool laws of the Government could the boys at the front be saved from being killed, disabled or wounded. It is time for the Government to wake up and to see the humiliating position not only in which it finds itself, but into which it has forced this Canada of ours. We are being humiliated before the Empire and before the world on account of the administration of this Government. The world to-day looks on Canada as a divided nation, with race against race—shall I say religion against religion? Pretty near that—province against province. How long are we going to stand for this condition of affairs? We have to stand for it until the 7th of October.

If the Prime Minister cannot follow the example of the Prime Ministers and ministers in the several Parliaments which I have mentioned, at least he ought to follow the example of his own colleagues. Three years ago one of the brightest minds in the Cabinet, one of the best educated men then among us, the late Hon. Mr. Monk, resigned on a question of principle. He disagreed with the Prime Minister. He was man enough to resign. The ex-Minister of Militia, who has done more for the boys at the front than the entire department, who was known as plain Sam Hughes, was the idol of the boys at the front. I am not going to mitigate or condone the serious mistakes which he made; I have nothing to say as to his quarrels with the Government and with the Prime Minister; I have nothing to say about the treachery in the Cabinet against him. Like former ministers, he was in a nest of traitors and could not do anything. When he wanted to send soldiers to the front, he was told by the Prime Minister that the voluntary system had gone far enough and that it was time to let up on it. His mistakes are easily wiped out by the services which he rendered to Canada and to the Empire in raising 350,000 men under the voluntary system. What greater merit could a public man possess? But he resigned. He was practically forced out of the Cabinet. Then there was the Hon. Mr. Patenaude, the most able French Canadian in the Cabinet. He was not thinking to maintain himself in office at the expense of the electors? He did not think he was justified in keeping a portfolio when the electors deemed it a crime for him to continue in the Government. Others have remained for the loaves and fishes, but on the 12th of June last Hon. Mr. Patenaude tendered his resignation because of the principle of this very Bill. The vacancy has not yet been filled. The province of Quebec is without proper representation in the Cabinet to-day, and the honourable member for Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) and the brilliant new member from Quebec (Hon. Mr. L'Esperance) and others who ought to have the interests of Quebec at heart, should be to the fore demanding that the rights and privileges of the province of Quebec should be maintained. What do we find? There is absolute silence. What are these honourable gentlemen here for? Are they here to defend the rights and privileges of the province they represent? Why do not they stand up and demand that those rights and privileges shall be respected? Then we have the case of the honourable the Speaker of this House resigning one of the highest honours in the gift of the Crown on a question of principle, the principle that he was not fairly treated. He resigned like a man. That happened over a year ago.

These are things which the public want explained. The Parliament and the people are entitled to this information. We must not allow this Bill to be the object of catspaw play. It has been thrown from one meeting to another and from one convention to another. It was thrown into Parliament. When the Bill was introduced I said that it was not for the conscription of men, but the conscription of votes, and my prediction of five weeks ago has been fulfilled.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order. The honourable gentleman must speak to the motion before the House. He has no right to go beyond that.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I accept the decision, but I do not know whether the Speaker is a competent authority on the matter—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN—a competent authority on the decision, which I accept.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Do you want me to accept it? If you do—

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: We do not want any reflections on the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I will reflect on the leader of the Government who went over and whispered into his ear what to do.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I will have to name the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I was saying that this motion called on Parliament to give to the people full information regarding negotiations and communications that may have taken place between the Imperial authorities and the Governor General, the Prime Minister, or any other authority. I was on that point when I was called to order. I do not see how I could be closer to the subject of the motion. What I have said is based on fact, and what I want and what the country wants is a full knowledge of the inside story of the hold-up of Bill 75, commonly known as the Compulsory Military Service Act.

The motion was negatived on division: yeas, 6; nays, 18.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 118, an Act to amend the Government Railways Act, Hon. Mr. Landry in the Chair.

On section 2—definitions:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is there any difference between the "Government Railways" and "Canadian Government Railways"? I do not see the need of a double definition.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I presume they may be referred to in some statutes as the Canadian Government Railways.

Section 2 was agreed to.

On section 3—application of certain sections of Railway Act to government railways:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would like to have an explanation as to exactly what this means, and to what it refers.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This, of course, is in anticipation of the general Railway Act that we are now considering. Perhaps under the circumstances we had better not proceed with this Bill until we have the Consolidated Act. In fact, that is the reason why it stood over. Inasmuch as the number of the chapter has to be filled in, and as the Act we are now considering will be made applicable to it, it will probably be better to defer it. I therefore move that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Progress was reported.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT (NON-GAINFUL CORPORATIONS) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill U2, an Act to amend the Companies Act so as to provide for the incorporation by Letters Patent of Corporations for purposes other than that of gain.

He said: Some weeks ago I intimated that it was the intention of the Government to bring down legislation for the control of war charities, and also to adopt general provisions of the Companies Act, whereby the incorporation of such companies would be facilitated. We have had the Companies Act before us for some time, that is, before the Committee on Banking and Commerce of the Senate; but it is somewhat doubtful whether Parliament will be able to complete the Act during the present session. In anticipation of its not going through we have therefore selected from the Companies Act certain clauses that have already been passed by the Committee on Banking and Commerce, dealing with this subject, and those particular clauses are embodied in the Bill which is now before us. It proposes a short and cheap way of incorporating companies, associations, or corporations that have as their object war charities or other patriotic purposes. Application for incorporation will be made under the Companies Act to the proper branch of the Government, and letters patent will be issued with very little cost to the applicants for the objects set forth in those letters patent. I would therefore move the second reading of this Bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

WAR CHARITIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill V2, an Act relating to War Charities.

He said: This Bill may be said to be complementary to the previous Bill, the second reading of which I moved a few moments ago. The purpose of this Bill is to enforce by way of penalties any infraction of the law which is thereby created. This makes provision for prohibition against raising money for war charities without registration, the object being to place within the knowledge of the Government the organization of companies that have been called into being for this particular purpose. We have made certain exceptions, such, for instance, as church collections, and other exemptions may be made, from the term "war charities." The Bill makes provision for registration, and furnishes complete machinery for the carrying out of the law, and for controlling and regulating under a series of penalties the object which it has in view, that is, assisting war charities, and at the same time preventing their abuse.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: As I understand it, the object of this Bill is to enable any one desiring to raise money for the purpose of war charities to get cheap registration.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the first Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But I notice that this Bill also provides for some kind of registration. Is it intended that an individual can under this Act become registered for the purpose of raising money for war charities?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. In section 4 provision is made for registration. That would be a system of local registration. This Act is based somewhat on the English Act, but it is much less cumbersome. In fact, when the Bill was first drafted, there was incorporated in it much of the municipal machinery which obtains in England; but it is manifest that that would not be applicable here on account of the wide range of municipalities over which applicants would have to travel, and the lack of proper machinery for taking cognizance of organizations of this kind.

The chief object is to enforce penalties against infractions. In reality, the organization of those charities will take place under the former Bill; yet at the same time this Bill will be not only regulative, but will facilitate the organization of local charities in a way that the other does not contemplate.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I presume it is also aimed at preventing unauthorized persons from representing themselves as collecting money for a war charity, with the design of keeping for themselves the money so collected. Any gentleman who has ever read the paper called Truth, published in England, will very often have seen in it reference to people who make a business of collecting money for charities connected with the war or otherwise by working on the good nature of citizens, and practically appropriating that money to their own use. I do not know of any such case in this country, but I presume that this Bill would very largely prevent such a practice.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is directed against that kind of thing.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Would not this Bill, if it became law, prevent the activities of numerous societies of ladies connected with churches, who give dinners and hold bazaars and sales in order to raise money for the benefit of soldiers, or their dependents? If I read it correctly, I think this Bill would interfere with all that, unless such societies were registered for that purpose. If the Bill has that effect it will cause quite an interesting time amongst many ladies connected with churches.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Unless they come under section 4. When we go into committee we can deal with that.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

NORTHWEST GAME BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 100, an Act respecting Game in the Northwest Territories of Canada.

He said: This Bill makes provision for the protection of game in the Northwest Territories of Canada. Honourable gentlemen know that there is a very large section of our northwest which is unorganized territory. It is proposed to revise the game regulations which are now in operation in that portion of Canada, and not only to enforce to a greater extent the laws now upon our statute book, but to add to the protection of the big game in that section of our Dominion by the adoption of penalties and the appointment of proper officers.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Do you propose to enlarge the staff of game wardens?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As my honourable friend will observe, the Bill may be said to be divided into two parts, one of which deals with the regulations which will be in force relating to the game mentioned, particularly in section 4, and the penalties which will be attached to any infraction of the law. The other part deals with the appointment of the necessary officers to see that the law is duly enforced. Somewhat similar legislation has been passed by the western provinces. For instance, Ontario, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia have all legislated in the direction of adopting, by order in council, such regulations as will successfully protect the game in their respective provinces. Of course, the section of the Dominion covered by this Bill is entirely outside of any of the provinces mentioned. It would be impossible by statute to deal with exactitude with all the conditions which obtain in a country so very sparsely populated, and where it is so difficult to secure information as in that section of Canada. Honourable gentlemen familiar with game will observe, by looking at section 4, the very wide range of game covered by this Act, and will recognize the necessity of protecting that game. Of late years there has been a tendency on the part of American hunters particularly to drift over into our northern territory by way of Alaska, with a view to hunting game. Unless there is a very rigid enforcement of the law, and unless we adopt regulations of such a character as will warrant our relying on the carrying out of the law, it will only be a short time before our game will have disappeared. I think that has been the experience of the United States to a very large extent, particularly in Alaska, where the caribou and similar game have almost entirely disappeared.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: There are licenses for the open season?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This Bill makes provision for the open season. This is a matter to be placed entirely in the hands of the Government, so that it may adopt such regulations as will most strongly and efficiently carry out the objects of the Act. It will be readily appreciated by honourable gentlemen that we shall have to rely mostly upon the Northwest Mounted Police to enforce the Act, and this Bill makes special provision for the selection of officers from amongst the Northwest Mounted Police and other government officials for that purpose. I may say that this Bill has received special consideration in the Commons, on account of the interest taken in the subject by the members from the western provinces, and it has been largely redrafted; so the Bill in its present form may be said to be a very well-considered and well-digested piece of legislation.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: How is a knowledge of the Act to be disseminated amongst the people of the Northwest, especially where the population consists largely of Indians and Eskimos?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Indians have certain rights that the whites have not.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: This Bill is another step in the right direction, to protect the resources of the country, but there is one point to which I wish to draw the attention of my honourable friend. He has just told us that we shall have to depend mostly upon the Northwest Mounted Police for the carrying out of the regulations. Well, if anybody violates those regulations in the polar regions, for instance, and is arrested, who is going to try him? Will that man have to travel a thousand miles or so? Are there in that country any courts that will decide his case?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The game officers will be ex-officio justices of the peace. Even as the law is to-day, that is the practice carried out in the Northwest; the officer of the police performs practically all the duties in regard to the carrying out of the law—as to the arrest of the accused, his trial, and so on. That is necessary in the very nature of the conditions in that far country.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: You cannot expect the man who makes the arrest to judge the accused, can you? He would surely decide in his own favour.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That may be, but that is practically the law to-day. I do not want to say anything about my own experiences, but when I went into the Northwest, in the pre-railway days, the Northwest Mounted Police fulfilled all the offices.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: They were judge and jury.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They were sheriff, jailer, judge, and everything else.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: And hangman.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And I do not know that the practice was subject to any abuse. It seems to me, looking back upon my experiences in that country, that the system which prevailed at that time—though it lacked, of course, the very elaborate machinery of to-day—was much more advantageous for the administration of justice than the present system.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: I do not want any elaborate machinery, but I should like to see some provision made for the trying of a case. I have the fullest confidence in the mounted policeman, but if he is all alone at the post how is the case of a violation of the law to be tried?

Hon. Mr. WATSON: He will try it himself.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Try it himself? Then God help the accused.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The mounted policemen's instructions are that the accused shall be tried by a disinterested justice if there is any possibility of that being done, but where it becomes evident that if that were done the accused would have to travel say one hundred miles or more, the law is to be administered on the spot. Natural justice, in fact, is carried out.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: There is at the present time a case in point. Two Eskimos were brought from the Polar sea to Saskatchewan to be tried for murder. How is it they were not tried on the spot?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There are no police up there.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I wish that the honourable leader of the House, before we go into committee, would make some inquiry as to paragraph a of section 4. That paragraph gives as the close season for moose, caribou, deer, mountain sheep and mountain goat, from the first day of April to the 15th day of July, and from the first day of October to the first day of December. I cannot understand why the close season should be as there set out. The month of August and September are really the months when moose and caribou need most to be protected. Then, as I understand, is the rutting season, which is just the time of the year when no one should be allowed to kill a moose or a caribou. There may be some good reason for this paragraph, and I am calling the honourable gentleman's attention to it so that he may inquire and find out the reason.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I shall make inquiry into that.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

MINISTRY OF OVERSEAS MILITARY FORCES AND PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 122, an Act respecting the Minister of the Overseas Military Forces, the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

He said: This is a Bill to make provision for the appointment of an Overseas Minister of Militia, or to authorize the appointment which has already been made. As honourable gentlemen are aware, no legislation has been brought down until the present session authorizing the creation of this particular office, although it has been established by Order in Council under the War Measures Act. It is needless to point out that the enormous task which has been thrown upon the Militia Department in connection with the organization and transporting overseas of our Expeditionary Force requires that we should have in England some machinery for the proper administration of our military affairs on the continent. As honourable gentlemen know, Sir George Perley, the acting High Commissioner for Canada, has been transacting the duties of this office for nearly twelve months past, and he has been transacting those duties, I think, in a way that appeals very strongly to the people of Canada and in the interests of our forces upon that side of the water. The Bill provides that the office shall continue during the war and for such period afterwards as will permit of the winding-up of the duties of the office. The minister is given the same status as any other Minister of the Crown, and the same salary.

The Bill also makes provision for the appointment of a Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence and a Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is unnecessary to point out that the duties which have been cast upon the Minister of Militia in Canada have been so very largely augmented by reason of our engagement in the war as to render it desirable that he should be given all the help possible. Consequently the office of Parliamentary Secretary has been created and has been ably and acceptably filled by the present incumbent, Mr. McCurdy, of Halifax. It is proposed, not that the parliamentary secretary should become a member of the Cabinet, but that he should perform the duties which are set out in the Bill. It is also unnecessary to say—because honourable gentlemen will appreciate the fact—that the duties thrown upon the Prime Minister have increased so overwhelmingly as to render it almost impossible for him to transact them all with credit to himself and with advantage to the country. Hence the office of Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs has been created for the purpose of assisting the Prime Minister in his very arduous duties. It is proposed that the parliamentary secretaries of those two departments shall be paid at the rate of $5,000 per annum, and that their duties shall be for the continuance of the war and until the end of the session of Parliament held next after the cessation of the war.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: In both cases?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In both cases—as to the Overseas Minister of Militia and as to the two parliamentary secretaries.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This Bill involves something rather new to us in this country—the idea of creating a position in the Government and allowing a member of the House of Commons to hold that position without going before the country for a confirmation of his appointment. My honourable friend the leader of the Government has not given us any very strong reasons why this position of Minister of the Overseas Military Forces had to be created. We have heard from the ex-Minister of Militia that this office was absolutely unnecessary. He has stated in another place that the work had been done very much better, and at very much less expense to the country, before the position of Minister of Overseas Military Forces was created, than it has been done since. The situation at the present time is that we have in England a Minister of Militia who has, as we understand, a large number of officials under him and is carrying on a very important work; but, at the same time, we apparently have no control over him and no means of finding out what is being done in that department. I do not think that any statement as to the number of officials in the department, or any particulars as to how the department is carried on, has ever been rendered to Parliament. It would seem to me that it must lead to much confusion to have one minister responsible for the work of the department in Canada, another minister responsible for the work of the department in England, and, as far as we know, either of them able to initiate a policy or carry out his ideas without any relation to the other. I do not wish to say anything derogatory to the holder of the office; but I certainly think that it would have been much better to keep the department in England under the control of the Minister of Militia in Canada, and that arrangements could have been made so that the work would be done just as well by experienced officials who would carry out instructions as they received them.

With regard to the other two positions created by this Bill, those of Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, I understand that these officials have been acting for many months. Inasmuch as there is every likelihood of an election coming off shortly, I hardly see the necessity of bringing in this legislation at the present time in order to place them in those positions, when they could go to the country and have their positions confirmed in any event at the time of the general election. These gentlemen, no doubt, have been doing quite a good work for the country; but I think that it is not a satisfactory way for us to legislate to depart from the principle that any member of Parliament who is offered a position of emolument under the Crown shall not accept it without going back to his constituents for confirmation in his position. It is breaking away from a principle which has been followed ever since representative government was established.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In England the principle has been ignored; legislation has been enacted against it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Under special conditions existing there.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Conditions similar to those which exist here.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: For instance, when Mr. Winston Churchill was appointed the other day to a position under the Crown, he went back for re-election.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The British Parliament has legislated so that certain ministers, who occupy positions that have been necessitated by the war, shall not be required to go back for re-election. The British Parliament has created, for instance, the Ministry of Labour, the Ministry of Food Control, the Ministry of Shipping, the offices of parliamentary secretaries, all with salaries attached, and it has been enacted by Imperial statute that it shall not be necessary for the incumbents of those offices to go back for re-election, because the offices terminate immediately after the war.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think that if my honourable friend went further into that matter he would find that the reason was that it was desired to bring into the Government men who had training along business lines, but who had not been in public life, and had had nothing to do with running elections. It was very necessary, in the interests of the business of the country, to have those particular men in the Government, and there was a possibility that, having had no experience in public life and no experience in such matters as elections, they might be defeated if they had to go to a constituency for election. Furthermore, as they were not in public life at the time of their appointment they did not represent any constituency to which they could go for re-election. But in this particular case we are passing legislation for the purpose of placing in certain positions gentlemen who represent constituencies in the House of Commons; therefore I think that they are in a position somewhat different from that of the gentlemen to whom my honourable friend has referred.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: And with no extraordinary qualifications.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: As I mentioned before, Mr. Winston Churchill, who was taken back into the Cabinet the other day, returned to his constituency for re-election before accepting the position. I therefore think that this legislation is hardly justifiable; but of course the Government must take the responsibility for it.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: With regard to the remarks that have just been made by the honourable gentleman from Kamloops (Hon. Mr. Bostock), I think it is a fact that, while the Right Honourable Mr. Churchill went back to his constituency for re-election after being appointed recently to the Cabinet, there are no contested elections held in Great Britain for any such purpose as that.

So far as the appointment of parliamentary under-secretaries is concerned, if my memory is correct—and if it is not I am open to correction—although they received a salary, those gentlemen were never expected to go back to their constituents. The reason, as I understand it, is that they are not members of the Cabinet in the same way that cabinet ministers are, but are the appointees of the minister for whom they act as under-secretaries. The cases are not at all the same. In fact, I am not sure whether under-secretaries belong to the Cabinet or not. I do not think they do.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think the honourable gentleman from St. John (Hon. Mr. Daniel) is mistaken with respect to under-secretaries in the Old Country. Under ordinary circumstances they have to go back for election.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is a distinction drawn between parliamentary secretaries and under-secretaries. I am referring to parliamentary secretaries.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am not finding fault with that provision of the Bill, because, as we are going to have an election very shortly, it would perhaps be unfair to the gentlemen who are to fill the positions of parliamentary secretaries that they should have to run two elections within a very short time. There is an Under-Secretary for External Affairs who was appointed under an Act which was passed, I think, some ten years ago. He is a permanent officer, and a very competent officer, quite capable, I think, of doing any work that has to be done in that direction. Further, honourable gentlemen will notice that there is very little discussion either in this House or in the other House with respect to what may be called external affairs. I think the creation of a Parliamentary Secretary of External Affairs is quite unnecessary. I quite concur in what has been said by the honourable gentleman from British Columbia (Hon. Mr. Bostock) with respect to the Overseas Minister of Militia. It seems to me that it is a most anomalous and awkward condition that there should be a Minister of Militia here and another Minister of Militia in England. I should think it would be better to send another secretary to England. The officer in England should be under the control of the Government here, and should be subordinate to the Minister of Militia.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, August, 28, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

THE SENATE.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

FINANCIAL STATEMENTS.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

1. What is the extent and the particulars of the obligations to the province of British Columbia, and certain municipalities in British Columbia, that the Dominion Government will have to assume under the proposed arrangement for taking over the Canadian Northern Railway system?
2. Are there similar obligations to any of the other provinces?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The following statement shows the lines of railway and other works of the Canadian Northern Pacific railway which have been aided by the guarantee of securities by the province of British Columbia, also the extent of the guarantee in each case:

1. (a) Main line ..... 500 miles.
   Vancouver island ..... 100 "

   C.N.P. 4% securities guaranteed, $35,000 per mile.
   C.N.P. 4½% securities (on main line only), $10,000 per mile.

2. Branch lines:
   (a) Westminster to Vancouver 11 miles.
   (b) Westminster to Steveston 15 "
   (c) Victoria to Union bay.. 18 "
   (d) Vancouver island extension 150 "
   (e) Kamloops to Vernon..... 145 "

   C.N.P. 4½% securities guaranteed, $35,000 per mile.

3. Terminals: Vancouver, New Westminster, Port Mann, Steveston, Victoria, Union

Bay—Canadian Northern Pacific 4½ per cent securities guaranteed, $10,000,000.

As to 1, the main line has been completed. The first 100 miles on the island have been fully graded, but not railed on account of the impossibility of obtaining steel. So far as item No. 1 is concerned, there are practically no further obligations to be assumed with the exception of track-laying on Vancouver island line.

As to 2 (a), the construction of the line between New Westminster and Vancouver has been deferred. In the meantime, the company has entered into a running rights arrangement with the Vancouver, Victoria and Eastern Railway to use their line between these points. This arrangement had the sanction of the local authorities, the line being opened for traffic by them accordingly. In view of the fact that this avoids duplication of lines and will answer the purposes of traffic for many years, it may be expedient to subsequently consider making this arrangement permanent.

As to 2 (b), New Westminster to Steveston. Line graded and track laid. Connection with main line at New Westminster end, including bridge over north arm of the Fraser river yet to be completed, this portion being deferred pending consideration of utilization of existing lines of another railway.

As to 2 (c), Victoria-Union Bay line is completed and in operation.

As to 2 (d), Vancouver island extension. Line graded to Alberni. Construction north of this point deferred owing to war.

As to 2 (e), Kamloops to Vernon. Branch line from main line into city of Kamloops under construction and certain rights of way acquired. Construction on balance of line deferred owing to war.

As to 3, terminals. The company's programme for terminals at Pacific coast points involved an expenditure of approximately $10,000,000, of which the principal works were in the city of Vancouver. It was intended that these facilities would be provided from time to time to meet the requirements of traffic upon the opening of the various lines. The war having begun prior to the completion of any of the lines, this delayed the company's terminal programme. Contracts, however, were made with various parties for the necessary filling of False creek and the construction of a station, terminal, freight sheds, etc. This work is in progress at the present time, and it is expected will be completed ready for operation early in the new year. The agreement with the province of British Columbia does not specify the extent of the obligation of the company in respect to these terminals, it being merely provided that the proceeds of the guaranteed securities above mentioned should be entirely expended for such purposes.

It should be noted that the original contract with the province made under date of 2nd April, 1910, has been notified in certain particulars by special arrangements between the company and the province, and it is specifically provided in the contract that if, owing to unforeseen engineering difficulties or other circumstances beyond the reasonable control of the company, it will be impossible or impracticable to carry out absolutely the terms of the agreement, the Lieutenant-Governor may from time to time authorize amendments therein so long as the spirit of the agreement is not departed from.

With respect to the construction of the balance of the mileage referred to in 2, conditions arising out of the war have rendered it impossible at the present time to proceed with the further construction of branch lines. No change in these conditions can be expected until at least some time after the conclusion of the war, and even then unforeseen circumstances may arise which will require an entire readjustment of the arrangement between the company and the province with respect thereto.

Municipal Obligations.

The Canadian Northern Pacific Railway has not entered into any contract with any municipality in British Columbia with the exception of the city of Vancouver with regard to the False creek terminals. Considerable progress has been made in the performance of this contract, and the work is still under way, provision for this being largely included under the terminal securities guaranteed by the province. Owing to conditions arising out of the war, this work, in common with the work upon the lines of railway, has been more or less delayed, but the contract with the municipality makes provision for extension of time due to delays arising by reason of strikes King's enemies or other unavoidable causes.

In the province of Manitoba there are no construction contracts of any description outstanding.

Statements are attached showing the contracts made with the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and progress made in respect thereof. These contracts have been subject to amendment from time to time as circumstances have arisen, and the company did not contemplate any difficulty in making such modifications as may be reasonably in the interests of all the parties. In view of conditions created by the war, and new conditions which may arise after the war, it may be necessary to modify these contracts still further in so far as they are completed; and, since the interests of the provinces and the company are closely allied in railway matters, it is not contemplated that there will be any great difficulty in doing so.

There are no outstanding construction contracts with any municipalities in any of the three provinces.

SHIPMENT VIA CANADIAN PORTS.

The Senate resumed from August 22 the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. L'Espérance:

To call the attention of the Senate to the fact that our tidewater ports are now properly equipped for the storage and speedy handling of grain and other merchandise, and to urge that the exportation of our products by the allied government buyers should be routed through our Canadian ports as far as possible, and to inquire if it is the intention of the Government to take any action to prevent in future the bulk of the export of the oceanic traffic being routed via American ports.

Hon. A. B. CROSBY: Honourable gentlemen, the resolution which was moved by the honourable member for the Gulf (Hon. Mr. L'Espérance), and on which I had the honour of adjourning the debate, is a very important one. It deals with transportation both for domestic purposes and for export; it deals with terminal facilities. It deals with that great question which has been placed before the people of the Dominion of Canada to-day more forcibly perhaps than ever before. I would pray the indulgence of this House for a short time while I refer to the transportation question as it affects us in eastern Canada.

I want, first, to congratulate the honourable gentleman who moved this resolution on the very able and eloquent manner in which he has brought the matter before this honourable House. I want to congratulate, also, the province of Quebec, from which he comes, and particularly the city of Quebec, on having a gentleman so enthusiastic, so optimistic, and so strong in his desire to see that that province and that old city by the sea shall get the consideration which it has apparently not received in the past.

Now that the time has arrived when the great railway systems of the Dominion of Canada are about to be taken over and managed by the Government of Canada, it is fair to ask if the people farther east may not expect a fair share, in fact, the whole, of the exports from this great Dominion through our Atlantic ports. The honourable gentleman states that the port of Quebec is now equipped with terminal facilities for all the export from this Dominion across the Atlantic. I congratulate him on that; but while that great old city by the sea is, as he stated in his speech, one whose port can be kept open all the year—and I can congratulate him on that also—he must remember that the great ports of St. John, Halifax, Louisburg, North Sydney and Sydney, any one of them sufficient for any ordinary nation, are all open throughout the entire year. However, as we are the possessors of an extraordinary country, all of these ports may be needed.

But, while congratulating my honourable friend that the port of Quebec has sufficient terminal facilities, I am sorry to say that the same cannot be said of the terminals further east. In the port of St. John great preparations have been made by the great Canadian Pacific railway, with facilities for handling exports. In the port of Halifax, I am pleased to say, fair progress is being made, though not as speedily as I should like to see, but we are approaching the time when we shall have facilities for handling a great deal of the shipments for overseas—and a large portion of our Canadian shipments must go overseas via Halifax. As our neighbours to the south of us are our competitors in this connection, it is certainly fair for us to expect and assume that shipments which originate in the Northwest, or in the centre of Canada, shall go through Canadian ports. We have for a long time been emphasizing, both in Parliament and out of it, the right of Canadian ports to the Canadian export trade. I have often wished, honourable gentlemen, that it were possible for the western and eastern citizens of this country interested in public affairs or occupying seats in the House of Commons and in this Chamber to assemble on some occasions and travel from the East to the West and back again, to observe and take into consideration all the great opportunities and facilities that exist in this Dominion for cultivation in the West and for export in the East. I think this would have the effect of creating a much better feeling amongst our people than exists at the present time. There are in the West good and true men who desire good fellowship to prevail in this country; but, I am sorry to say, we sometimes find, on the contrary, men from the western part of this Dominion who think and talk only of the interests of the West and forget the East altogether. That is an unfortunate condition; because, honourable gentlemen, this great country of ours, to my mind, has a great future before it, but that future can be properly realized only by good fellowship, by neighbourly feeling between the great West and the East. As my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. L'Espérance) has said about Quebec, what is good for Quebec is good for the whole Dominion; so I say, what is good for the western part of Canada is good for the eastern part, and what is good for the East must be good also for the West. We are all living under the same flag, and desire to remain under it forever. Therefore it would be better for us if there were closer relations among our people, and if a better understanding and knowledge and friendship prevailed. Under all circumstances, it is necessary to make little sacrifices one for the other, just as in family matters some member of the family may occasionally have to make sacrifices in the interests of the other members.

The honourable gentleman from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards), in speaking on this question, said that it was a free trade matter. Well, to my honourable friend, everything seems to be a free trade matter; he never thinks of anything but free trade. Yet he has not in his mind that idea of free trade which I should like to see him have, so far as Canada is concerned. I have heard the honourable gentleman make two or three speeches, and they were all of the same character. They were not in any way flattering to Canada. Honourable gentlemen, I have been sorry to hear such remarks coming from a man of his standing in this Dominion, and who should have more knowledge than his speeches would indicate that he possesses. I as a new member have been really ashamed to listen to the speeches recently made by that honourable gentlemen, and I think there are few men in Canada who would not feel as I do. Furthermore, if that honourable gentleman will read the speech made by his honoured leader in the other House on the occasion when he presented a resolution to incorporate the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, or the National Transcontinental railway. I am sure it will furnish a good lesson to the honourable gentleman. I hope he will read that speech and consider it carefully before he makes another speech in this House on Canadian resources.

Honourable gentlemen, we have to-day a railway problem in Canada. I am not going to discuss the question of the cost to this country of the Transcontinental Railway or the Grand Trunk Pacific. We know that we have the railway, and I am told by many that it is a good road. I am told by others that it has cost too much. However, if it is a good road I do not care whether it has cost a little more than it ought to have cost, because we have the road and need it, and can make good use of it. I cannot help thinking of what was stated by public men in this country when the Canadian Pacific railway was built with the assistance of the Government. There were at that time in this country men who said that the road would not earn the cost of the grease for the axles. They were able and competent men, and believed in what they said at that time. But what was the result? I need not say more on that question, for everybody knows what was the result. I think that history is perhaps repeating itself to-day. One thing is certain, honourable gentlemen, that in the case of every large project started in this country, no matter where, or how well started, or how quickly built, it is found by the time the project is finished that it is too small for this country. So I think we need not trouble ourselves to discuss what the cost of the railway was. The time for that is past. We cannot now change the cost, but we have the road; and, even if it cost a little more than it should, let us make the best use of it. We need the road, and in order to prove that, I desire to read a line or two from a report made by one of the most eminent civil engineers in this country, or perhaps on the continent of America. What that gentleman says will give us some idea of our situation respecting railway facilities. This is a report, issued by the Canadian Society of Civil Engineers, of a paper read by Mr. W. F. Tye, who is well known to you all. He was the chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific railway for some years and is now a consulting engineer in the city of Montreal, a man of outstanding ability. This is what he says of the condition of our railroads:

> A consolidation of the Grand Trunk, the Grand Trunk Pacific, Transcontinental and Canadian Northern railways would give a well-balanced system. The Grand Trunk has an excellent system in the east, with terminals in all large and important centers—

Well, I do not agree with him. I do not know whether or not my friend has ever been farther east than the cities of Montreal and Quebec. I am not going to say anything about those great seaports.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Is the honourable gentleman referring to me as his friend?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I hope the honourable gentleman is my friend. I like to look on his smiling face as that of one of my friends; but the gentleman whom I am quoting is Mr. W. F. Tye. He apparently refers particularly to the ports of Montreal and Quebec. Of course, the city of St. John, as I have already stated, has considerable terminal facilities, and we are getting some in the city of Halifax—I hope it is not too late. There are also, in the Maritime Provinces, the ports of Sydney, North Sydney and Louisburg, ports which are open practically the entire year, and, if my honourable friend from the Gulf (Hon. Mr. L'Espérance) can succeed in hurrying the scheme which he has in mind, the port of Quebec also will be open the whole year. Mr. Tye goes on to say:

The Canadian Northern has a good system of feeders in the west; the Grand Trunk has not. Each is strong where the other is weak. Combining them must, of necessity, be the most economical and efficient way of handling the situation.

Those are Mr. Tye's observations with regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern. He said further:

Such a combination would not require more than $100,000,000 to provide it with sufficient rolling stock and to put it in proper physical condition to compete with the Canadian Pacific.

Honourable gentlemen, you can see from that statement, made by a man of such standing, that he knows what he is talking about. He was chief engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That is enough to recommend a man anywhere. He tells how, with the expenditure of that $100,000,000 in providing additional feeders and in equipping terminals, we should have another transcontinental railway that would compare with the Canadian Pacific railway and be a good competitor of that company. He says further:

The saving in capital cost would be at least $300,000,000, and, at present rates of interest, the saving in fixed charges at least $15,000,000 per annum.

He is there discussing the question of having the roads brought under one management. Mr. Tye claims that this country is responsible for those railroads, which have been assisted and subsidized by the Government of this country, whatever Government it hay have been; Canada is responsible for carrying them on; therefore he suggests that we have now reached the point when those railways should be consolidated and managed by the Dominion Government. I hope and trust that such a plan may be adopted as will be in the interest of the people of this country and as will free the railways as much as possible from political influence in any form. I expect, honourable gentlemen, that this Chamber will play a very important part in the consolidation of those railways and the bringing of them under Government supervision.

Mr. Tye, continuing his paper, deals with another question; but I shall not bring it up because it refers to the cost of the Transcontinental railway, and, as I have already said, I have no complaint to make about the cost. When an article is bought, we must be satisfied with it. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Casgrain) tells us we have a good property in the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, and from what I have learned from men who are in a posiion to know the situation, I am satisfied that we have a good railway. The task now is to see to it that the Government shall make such arrangement in the management of these railways that our exports will not be shipped by way of the United States.

My honourable friend from the Gulf division (Hon. Mr. L'Espérance) stated that in 1916 more than two-thirds of the exports that went from this country were sent through United States ports. Honourable gentlemen, I say this is a time when the representatives of the people should see to it that that condition shall not continue, but that our exports shall go through our own ports. That is one of the most essential matters. We have paid the piper and we ought now to have the benefit. I remember reading of Abe Lincoln that when he was discussing the question of free trade or protection, he said that he did not know very much about free trade or protection, but if a man could keep the dollar he had in his own country, that was better than letting it go out of the country. So I say even if our railways cost a little more than they should have done, let us make those railways improve the export trade and benefit the people of Canada. We have, as has been stated by the railway expert whom I have quoted, a splendid combination of railways, and out of that combination, at very little expense, $100,000,000—and you know how small that amount is nowadays—we do no talk of anything less than millions—we shall be able to get a well-balanced railway system, capable of competing with the Canadian Pacific railway.

The Grand Trunk railway never was a friend of Canada, particularly of eastern Canada. If the promotors of that company had had the necessary confidence and had known Canada as they should have known it, I am sure that they would have owned the Canadian Pacific railway. What position did they take, even after the Canadian Pacific railway came into existence? They did not ask for a railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific; all they asked for was a railway from Winnipeg to the Pacific, for the purpose of gathering freight. Was it to take the freight to the eastern ports of Canada? No. Every dollar was to be spent on terminals in the United States, with the exception of the city of Montreal, and the freight was to be taken to American ports. When a bargain was made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company with the Government in regard to handling the freight of the Intercolonial railway, what happened? The freight that the Grand Trunk railway brought down to Montreal was handed over to the Intercolonial railway, and the freight that was brought to Montreal by the Intercolonial railway from the Atlantic coast was handed over to the Grand Trunk railway. But there was a proviso made that if the freight handed over to the Intercolonial railway went to St. John it would cost so much, and if it went to Halifax it would cost one cent per hundred pounds or 20 cents a ton more than if it went to St. John, and what was the reason? It was because they did not mind putting the port of St. John into competition with Portland. The result was that St. John, Portland, Boston, and New York were on an even footing, but Halifax was working under a disadvantage. Why was this? The Grand Trunk Railway Company knew that if Halifax was put on the same basis as the other ports, it would be disadvantageous to the Grand Trunk Railway Company which had its terminals and its money invested in Portland, because Halifax was easy of access and closer to Europe than Portland. That same condition exists to-day, but I hope and trust that it will soon be at an end. When the Government takes over these railroads I hope that not only Halifax, but every other Atlantic port, North Sydney, Sydney, and others—will be put on a proper basis. What my honourable friend said about bringing the fleets of the world to the port of Quebec is quite true. It is also true of the ports of Halifax, Sydney, and North Sydney. You could put the navies of the world in the harbour of Halifax, and you would have difficulty in finding them if you did not know just where they were. To-day the ships of the world are calling at Halifax, and for what purpose? All ships that go to neutral ports call at Halifax to be examined before they can go any further, and if any honourable gentleman were to go to Halifax and stay a week, unless he was told to take a run out to Bedford Basin and see ships there in numbers anywhere from 60 to 100 at a time, he would not know that they were in Halifax harbour.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: The Kaiser would like to own that.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: That is what he is fighting for, but he will never own it. Honourable gentlemen who have not visited the East should do so as soon as possible and see what we have there. If the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia had not come into Confederation, but had gone over to the United States, where would we be to-day? We would be willing to pay any money for those provinces, particularly for the province of Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia is the wharf of the continent of America, not of Canada alone, and every article that is produced on this continent should be shipped through that province. If Great Britain had not made the mistake of trying to make our friends to the South of us pay a little more taxes, the whole country would be ours to-day, and the exports of this continent would be send out of our harbours. Another mistake was made later on, not by the British people, however, but by the American people. I speak of the time that we were looking for what my honourable friend from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) thinks so much of—free trade. It is a good thing that our friends to the South of us did not share my honourable friend's views, for if we had got reciprocity, it is possible that we would have been annexed without knowing it. They refused it, and there were only two things left for us to do: go into some bargain with them or go to the West, and we went West and met with success. Canada made the Canadian Pacific railway, and the Canadian Pacific railway in return has made Canada.

The honourable the leader of this House has said that the high seas are free and should be free. I ask who made them free but that old British bulldog keeping his eye on the sea, because he knew that his home was an island in the middle of the sea and that the only chance of existence that he had was to keep the sea free and under his control. He is fighting to-day for that freedom—to keep the seas free. Shipping interest and shipping trade are two different things. There is not a maritime nation in the world to-day that is not augmenting and assisting in every way possible in the building of ships, of wood, iron, or steel. The province of Nova Scotia has built more good ships for transatlantic trade at less cost than any other place in the world of its size. They could put their ships in competition with ships built in any part of the world, and their ships were sold to all countries and found in every port. The provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick have also done very well in this respect. But what encouragement did we get? My honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) and I do not often agree, because he is nearly always wrong, but he will agree with me in this, that the province of Nova Scotia was so long fighting against Confederation that when it came into Confederation it was like the Grand Trunk Pacific railway to-day. We entered into Confederation, but we said we would not stay, we were bound to get out, and we kept on fighting to get out of Confederation for many years. What did we get?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Better terms.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: We got better terms, but no matter what terms we got, they were not good enough. You could not persuade the people that they would be as well off under Confederation as without it. I am sure that my honourable friend is persuaded now, and that if you asked him to-day if he would break away from Confederation he would answer no. We did not accept Confederation as we should have done, and consequently we did not have the things that we should have had. We suffered under many disadvantages. I need not refer to statistics which I have under my hand, but if any honourable gentleman desires it, I shall be glad to read them. To go back to 1874—we started in shipbuilding a little before that—we had, I think, in the province of Nova Scotia, something like 3,000 ships; in the province of Quebec I think there were about 1,700 ships, and in New Brunswick perhaps 1,100 ships. In the province of Prince Edward Island there were about 400 ships. There is no island in the world of its size that has produced what Prince Edward Island has produced. The ships constructed in Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island were the best ships and were built for the least money that they could be built for in any part of the world. There are men in those provinces to-day, shipmasters and men engaged in shipping interests, and if they could hear me they would say Amen to what I am going to say. We built our ships and sent them to Liverpool, London, Manchester, and other ports, loaded with our exports, principally lumber. They went over to Britain, and what was the result? There was an organization there known as the British Board of Trade —it was a good thing for them, but it was not a good thing for us. They looked at those beautiful ships—England was a free-trade country—and what did they do? If we had had a fair show we would have our steel ships on the ocean to-day in competition with those of every other nation of the world. A country that can compete as Nova Scotia did can compete with the world. Our shipbuilders can build steel and iron ships in the same way that they built wooden ships. You do not need to train men in our country to build anything—they are born that way. Our ships went to the other side, and what took place? They would come into a port with a cargo of lumber and with a crew of good and true men. Honourable gentlemen who have had any interest in shipping will understand that when you put a man in charge of a ship which has cost you $25,000 or $30,000 or $40,000, it is like giving a man a cheque for that amount and letting him put it in his vest pocket and go all over the world with it; but if he comes back to you with a good profit, he can come back without the cheque. The man in charge of the ship must be trusted. When the ship reached port and the cargo was discharged, what was the result? He was told: "You cannot have this ship go back to sea; you must take away the forecastle (that is the house for the accommodation of the men) and you must put your men away down below the main deck"—Honourable gentlemen who are familiar with shipping will understand what I mean—"you must take your cabin, which is on the deck, and put it below." Now, not only was it impossible to get our men to go below deck, but the alterations would involve an expenditure of perhaps $1,000 or $2,000 or $3,000 by the shipowner, who has perhaps put every spare dollar into his ship in order to send it overseas. That expenditure was too much for them. What would hapen? Just as soon as the Board of Trade placed that embargo upon them, the shipowners would be compelled to sell their ships. They sold them frequently at a profit, and to whom did they sell? To the Norwegian, to the Swede, to the Dane, to the Hollander, to anybody at all; and the new owner would go aboard the ship and put up his flag, the Norwegian or some other foreign flag, and take the cargo from Great Britain that our shipowner would have taken if he had not been interrupted, and carry it overseas to a British port without any interference whatever. What are Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Holland, and such countries, doing to-day? Great Britain built up their shipping and they are using it to-day to smuggle goods into the country of our enemies, thus helping them to keep on fighting us. I am not saying they have done so intentionally, but there is no doubt at all of the fact. Since our cousins across the border have entered the war, we have had evidences of the fact which I have mentioned.

The Board of Trade had another way of interfering with us. In Canada we discovered that wire rigging of ships would be an advantage because it was a cheaper way of rigging a ship. This may not be of much interest to honourable gentlemen here who are not much interested in shipping. A proof that it was the best kind of rigging is to be found in the fact that to-day wire rigging is adopted by every country in the world. But what was the effect of using that style of rigging in the early days? The British authorities would go aboard of our ship and say, "You must take off that new rigging which you have put on in Canada, and put on instead hemp rigging, or you cannot go out of this port." That was the situation.

Another difficulty which we had to face was the fact that those restrictions did not apply to Norwegians or any other foreigners. I could mention the name of a captain who met with the conditions of which I am speaking. He went over to Liverpool, and he had to come back from Liverpool without a pound of cargo on his ship because he could not get a certain pass from the Board of Trade, though he was a man who was capable of sailing a ship from one end of the world to the other—not only capable of sailing, but thoroughly trustworthy.

Then, again, there was another disadvantage in the fact that our men who were trained in Canada, who had been on board ships as sailors since they were boys, and had become good and true sailors and officers, competent to sail a ship in any part of the world, could not obtain certificates from the Board of Trade when they went to Britain, and could not take a ship out of Liverpool or London, or Manchester, or any other British port, without certificates from the Board of Trade. What did that mean? To get a certificate meant that a man would have to go to school again. Many of these men had not the opportunity of getting much schooling, but they had sufficient training and experience to be competent as sailors to sail a ship in any part of the world. These men were debarred from taking their ships back. The consequence was that the man who had not the Board of Trade certificate had to bring his ship back to the home port without a pound of cargo on board.

Those were some of the disadvantages which discouraged us in the shipbuilding industry in the early days. Then, we had no encouragement. Not only did we receive no assistance at all, but we were discouraged. This matter may not seem to be of importance; my honourable friends may not think very much of it; but I can assure you it is a very important matter to us people in the East, and it is very important to the question of shipbuilding, as I will try to show before I sit down. I am mentioning now some of the obstacles which we had to encounter. My honourable friend from the Gulf division (Hon. Mr. L'Espérance) can go to some of the old shipping firms in Quebec—I have no doubt some members are still living—and mention to them what I am in a feeble way trying to show, and they will corroborate my statement and say, "Yes, that is true; we have had that experience."

That situation was such that it would be impossible for people in any part of the world to meet it successfully. Where did the opposition come from in connection with shipping in the early days but from our own friends? As I said before, the Government of Canada took no interest in the matter. I am not blaming the Government. My honourable friends will understand that if I wanted to blame the Government of 1874, there would be quite an inducement for me to do so, but I am not blaming the Government; I am blaming ourselves, and for this reason: the province of Nova Scotia and the other Maritime Provinces did not accept Confederation at the beginning, as I believe they should have done, and therefore could not come to the Dominion of Canada for assistance in appealing to the Mother Land. The Mother Land did not know she was placing us under that disadvantage; but if we had accepted Confederation, as we should have done, we might have been able to obtain relief.

But, before I leave this aspect of the subject, let me point out a further difficulty. The man in the Maritime Provinces who owned a ship had a crew of say twelve or thirteen or fourteen men. If he lost that ship in Honolulu or any other part of the world, he paid his men off and the ship might be a total loss, for he might not have insurance; and if it was a total loss he would be a poor man, on account of having lost perhaps all his wealth, about $10,000. In the Maritime Provinces men are not so wealthy as in other parts of Canada; we do not own millions and we do not make our money in the same way as people in other parts of Canada. The shipowners were honest, thrifty, hardworking men, and a loss of that kind meant a great deal to them. What would happen in such a case? If the crew did not want to return home they would stay there or go to some other foreign place, and when they became stranded they could appeal to the British Consul, who would send them to England. The British Consul would furnish the money necessary to take them to England, and the British Board of Trade would take the account, which might be $500 or $700 or $1,000, and send it on. To whom? To the Minister of Marine and Fisheries of Canada, and the owner of the vessel in Canada would have to pay the money. You would hardly believe that. And that is the case to-day. Any British subject who becomes stranded in any part of the world, if he goes before the British consul, is taken care of by the consul and sent back, and the expenses are charged to the general account of Great Britain or Canada, as the case may be. The shipowner in this case would have to pay the money even if he had to sell his house in order to do so. You can imagine what a deterrent that was and under what a disadvantage it placed a man who had put his last dollar into the construction of the ship. Is it any wonder that we have gone out of the building of wooden ships?

Another reason why we had to give up wooden ship construction was this. Reference was made the other day to our neighbours to the south of us; they are the only people besides ourselves who have any considerable coasting trade. The United States has the largest coasting trade of any country in the world, and I think we come next. We have a splendid coasting trade, a trade which can be built up as our country is developed. But what are the conditions If you go to the United States you will find wooden ships of four, five or six masts being constructed. I think they have built one seven-masted ship. But in the United States you will find that their splendid coasting trade has been saved for their own ships. No ship can take a dollar's worth of cargo from one port to another in United States territory, whether in the United States proper or in Cuba or their islands, except in a United States bottom.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That regulation is suspended at present.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I do not think so.

Hon. Mr. GIRROIR: Suspended for the war.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: It may be, but I have not heard of it.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: It has been suspended since the beginning of the war, but that does not affect the argument.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Not in the slightest. The United States have preserved their splendid coasting trade, but what have we done in Canada? We have opened our Canadian ports to the Norwegian, to the Swede, to the Dane, to any customer who comes along; we allow him to come into Canadian waters and coast from one port to another.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If they go from one port in Canada to another they have to pay a duty on their ship.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: My honourable friend is mistaken. He will find that what I am stating is correct.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: When does a ship pay duty then?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: She never pays duty until she is transferred from the Norwegian flag to the British flag, and the Britisher goes to the Custom House and declares he is the owner of the ship.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: A Canadian ship—

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: If my honourable friend will follow me carefully he will receive some information on shipping which he does not possess at the present time. As my honourable friend from Cape Breton (Hon. Mr. McLennan) understands, the Norwegian ship, or the ship from Sweden or Denmark, may come into the port of Sydney to take a cargo from the Dominion Transport Company, the Nova Scotia Steel and Iron Company, the Dominion Coal Company, or any other company, and is just as free as the air; the only thing she has to do is to take good care that when she leaves Norway she has enough provisions to last three years. After that time she may go back and load up again. That is the kind of trade my honourable friend from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) likes. That is exactly the situation. My honourable friend from Cape Breton, who knows the conditions perhaps better than I do, and who ought to be making this speech, will correct me if I am wrong. A protest was made to the Dominion Government some years ago. The Government passed an Order in Council to the effect that no foreign ships under 1,500 tons could carry on a coastwise trade; but our efforts in that respect were offset to a very large extent by our friends—for instance, the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, and the Nova Scotia Steel Company.

I desire to say here and now—though it is a slight digression—that it was a great thing for Canada that the Government gave bounties on iron and steel. I am not saying that to hurt the feelings of my honourable friend from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards). Where would Canada be to-day if those bounties had not been given? We would have no Dominion Iron and Steel Company, no Nova Scotia Steel Company, no real manufacturing concerns at all, and we would be unable to manufacture a single shell or anything in that line.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: That was done under the Laurier Government.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Let me say to my honourable friend that I am not quarreling with any government. I am in favour of anything which is good for the country. I do not care what government introduces it. I do not, like my honourable friend, object to a thing because it comes from a certain government; and if my honourable friend would act in a similar manner, as I believe he will after to-day, he would be easier to get along with in matters which come before this honourable House. What I desire to say is that the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, the Nova Scotia Steel Company, and such great corporations are always looking after their interest, and they can always show that what is good for them is good for the country. My honourable friend the senior member for Halifax knows that what I am saying is correct—that those great companies would go to the Government year after year, and put their case before the Government, saying, "Unless you give us the privilege of engaging those Norwegian or other foreign ships for our coastwise trade we cannot do business at all." There may have been something in that, but many people said, "It is not a right and fair thing to give them a bounty if they are acting on that basis."

I remember an occasion, which occurred not long ago, when the late president of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company wrote a letter to the Prime Minister of Canada in which he set forth that these ships are built with British money and owned by British people; that the only thing done was to put the Norwegian flag upon them and sail them under the Norwegian flag. Now, can you beat that? What does it mean? It simply means this, that if we build them of British money, in British shipyards, why do we not have them fly the British flag? The reason, honourable gentlemen, is that if the ship flies under the Norwegian or the Swedish flag, the crew can be hired for three years for less than half the money which would have to be paid to our British sailors, and they can be fed for little or nothing. Therefore it is an advantage for these great corporations to have ships run in that way, in order that their profits may be greater. I do not say their profits are greater than they ought to be, but I do not like to see them made in that way. The proper way to make profits is to do so by building up the country and treating fairly the people of the country, who are treating the corporations fairly.

My honourable friend from Tignish (Hon. Mr. Murphy) remembers very well, and I can well remember, when a big fleet of Quebec vessels came down in the spring of the year to the Cape Breton coal ports and taking their cargo back up the St. Lawrence, made money in the coastwise trade. But a time came when that ship flying the British flag would go into Sydney, North Sydney, Louisburg or some other port, and what was the result? While she was under the chute loading, a ship flying the Norwegian flag would be sighted, and she would be ordered out, so that the Norwegian ship might come in and take cargo in order to fulfil her contract.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: What was that for?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I do not know what it was for unless it was intended to kill our trade. I am simply stating it as a fact. I put this before you for the purpose of showing the disadvantages that the people of eastern Canada were under. Nothing but that condition would have kept them down. We would have had our ships, and we would have been able to help the Motherland to a much greater extent than we are doing.

I very well remember the first time I met my honourable friend from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls). About fifteen or sixteen years ago I went with a delegation to Toronto—and at that time the honourable gentleman was a very young man. Every one spoke of him as Fred Nicholls, the great man of Toronto, and he is still Fred Nicholls, the great man from Toronto. I never had such a compliment paid to me in all my life as I had when I met the honourable gentleman after fifteen years, and he said, "Well, Crosby, I remember you." I am quite sure that if it had been my honourable friend from Halifax he would have said, "I have forgotten you."

To prove what I am going to say, I may state that Russia to-day is giving as much as $58 or $60 a ton for the construction of vessels and is granting large subsidies for vessels constructed outside of Russia and put on the Russian register. France is paying $35 or $38 a ton for ships constructed in France. Spain is doing the same thing. Norway and Sweden are offering every inducement. In Germany they carry freight over the railroads practically free to encourage the construction of ships. This is very important, and I know what I am talking about. Frequently honourable gentlemen stand up here and discuss things that they do not understand, but I defy any honourable gentleman here to contradict the statements that I have made this afternoon. It may be said that I am a politician, but if I am it has been the truth that has made me one; facts and figures have helped me. All these countries are giving bounties for ships.

As I was saying, I went to Toronto with a delegation for the purpose of discussing the question of bounties for iron ships. We came to the conclusion that $5 a ton would be ample to give in the beginning. We approached the Prime Minister at that time, and had a very pleasant interview with him; he treated us very nicely, but we did not get the bounty. It did not require a very great change of mind for him to give bounties, for he had already given bounties to the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, but he was full of ideas on free trade. It was suggested to him that the Government might give a bounty of $3 a ton. I remember fighting to get that $3 a ton, because I said that would establish the principle, and perhaps we would be able to go back and get $5 a ton. Had we succeeded on that occasion, what would have been the result to-day? We had been building wooden ships in competition with the world, and, given a fair opportunity, we could compete in the building of steel ships. If that policy had been carried out, now that we have the railways, we would have owned a transportation system from Canada to the Motherland, and would have been able to control the markets of the world. I agree with the honourable the leader of the Government that the high seas must be free, but I say that in order to have trade we must not only carry our products to the threshold of our country, but we must see them to the thresholds of other nations. We must promote friendly relations with our neighbours. If I asked the honourable gentleman from Simcoe (Hon. Mr. McCall), who knows the Bible from cover to cover, he could tell us who our neighbours are? I say that our neighbours are the neighbours of the West, the neighbours of the East, the neighbours within the borders of Canada, and anything that we can do to assist any of them helps all indirectly.

I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the House. I had intended to say only a few words, but I felt that I must tell the House of some of these things, which I am sure have astonished them. I have not read the statistics; I have no desire to read them; I am just speaking from my knowledge of shipping affairs; and I would be a very dull man, with the opportunities that I have had, if I did not know something about this question. Any statement that I have made is founded on fact. We have settled the question of inland transportation, and now we are concerned with the question of shipping. This question should have been attended to years ago, but it is never too late to do good. Let the honourable the leader of the Government go to the Prime Minister and induce them to do something. We never knew how rich Canada was before. We have been at war for three years, and where do we find ourselves financially? Better than when we started. At the beginning of the war everybody was afraid to show his money for fear the Government would grab it. Now the Government can keep on grabbing. If my honourable friend from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) would only say the word, he could bonus enough ships to start on. Let the honourable the leader of the Government bring this matter to the notice of the Government and insist upon their taking it up and giving eastern Canada an opportunity to start the shipbuilding industry. I do not want to wait for a Union Government. All I want is to see this policy put into operation which will help this country to continue doing the splendid business that we have been doing. I could show that no people have accomplished anything like what Canada has done in the matter of transportation. Let us start in the shipbuilding business. I know the honourable the leader of the Government will take this matter up, because he is true to the best interests of this country, and he will see that we receive some encouragement, so that we may create a splendid line of shipping across the high seas to connect with the railway system which will be in the hands of the Government.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I have already spoken on this question, but I should like to ask if the honourable gentleman saw the Scientific American of August 11, which contains a beautiful view of the port of Halifax, and also a general view of the new Halifax dock system, which it says has the largest docks in the world, costing $30,000,000, and which is expected to be completed on the 1st of January next. All that the honourable gentleman desires seems to be fulfilled. The ships of Uncle Sam's navy are entitled to go there, and are going there, and about 50 vessels of 7,500 tons each can dock at the same time. I will send this over to the honourable gentleman. I am very glad to hear the honourable gentleman advocating shipbuilding in Canada. I advocated it on many occasions.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The honourable gentleman need not have told me about that view, because, if it is a view of Halifax, I know it is a beautiful view. I referred particularly to the ports of Sydney, North Sydney and Louisburg. The work at Halifax is well under way.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Bostock, the debate was adjourned.

ARMY AND NAVY VETERANS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE moved the second reading of Bill B, an Act to incorporate the Army and Navy Veterans in Canada.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The applicants for this Bill are a corporation that has been in existence for a considerable period of time. They have asked for certain amendments to their Act of Incorporation, and have included in their Bill provisions which would practically make it a War Charities Bill. They have agreed to strike those out, and there is now no objection to the Bill being proceeded with.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to understand a little more about this Bill.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: It is simply a Bill to give a Dominion charter to the army and navy veterans. They have had a provincial charter since 1886, and have been doing business since that time. The association has grown beyond the province of Manitoba; for instance, they have 500 members in the province of Saskatchewan, and they want to extend their associations throughout the different provinces. The president, Col. Carruthers, is here from Winnipeg, also Mr. Tupper, and they would like to have this Bill gone on with in committee. Anything that is objectionable they would be willing to strike out.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: These men are veterans of what wars?

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: The Fenian raid.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: And the Riel rebellion?

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: And the rebellion, too.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And the Boer war?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Not in 1886.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: These men have come in since. The association is enlarging now so as to include returned soldiers.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: How is it that there is nothing of that kind in Montreal or Toronto? Have the veterans all gone west? Do they not come east at all?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is simply the absence of patriotic spirit.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: The only thing connected with this which it seems to me should receive consideration is whether this association of veterans will have such power as will enable them to engraft into their society all the veterans who may be available for joining such a society in the future, or whether there will be others springing up in other parts of the country. If I have understood the honourable senator (Hon. Mr. Sharpe) aright, he said that the aim was to have the association extensive enough to cover the whole Dominion, and that veterans in any part of the Dominion, or men who became veterans at any time in the history of the country, could join that association. I have not seen the Bill nor had an opportunity of examining it, but it seems to me that before committing ourselves to the principle of the Bill we ought to know something about its scope and aims, as to which the honourable senator has not yet informed us. In the absence of that I think it would be as well to allow it to stand for a time, in order that we may learn more about it.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Well, it has been on the Order Paper now for seven or eight weeks; the honourable leader of the Government has the copy of the Bill with the objectionable parts marked out, and any member may see it. The honourable leader of the Government is perfectly satisfied to proceed with it, and it is not going to interfere with the general legislation he will bring in later.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; it is a Bill which is very meritorious in all its provisions. The only objection that was raised on behalf of the Government when the Bill was first introduced was that there were incorporated in it certain provisions which were not considered desirable without being subject to a general Act; that is, provisions establishing hospitals and educational institutions, providing for the collection of charitable funds by subscriptions, and otherwise. It was considered desirable that powers of that character should not be given to an organization of this kind, but should be brought under general legislation. Now, the promoters of this Bill have consented to have struck out of the Bill the provisions to which I have referred, and which rendered it objectionable, unless regulated by a general Act. The Bill, as I have already said, is very meritorious—very desirable indeed—and this Parliament should have no hesitation in assisting an organization of this kind in promoting the objects set forth in the Bill. Honourable gentlemen can readily peruse the Bill.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, but we cannot peruse the alterations.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I may say, by way of explanation, that I looked for the Bill two or three times and supposed it was not printed because it was not on any of my files. I do not desire to oppose the Bill, but desire only that it shall be along such lines as will not interfere with the rights of others in connection with societies of this kind.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT (NON-GAINFUL CORPORATIONS) BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill U2, an Act to amend The Companies Act so as to provide for the incorporation by Letters Patent of corporations for purposes other than that of gain. Hon. Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say that the Committee on Banking and Commerce has already considered the sections which are embodied in this Bill, and the reason they have been taken out of the Companies Act, which is now under consideration by that committee, is apprehensive that the Bill may not pass the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That is, the Companies Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the amendment to the Companies Act. Hence we have simply taken out of that Bill section 2, which has been before the committee, and which has been considered by it, and we are asking that it be made law with a view to promoting the objects of associations of the kind mentioned.

On paragraph 7A (1) of section 2—Corporations without purpose of gain:

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I should like to say, with reference to this clause, that I do not see on the spur of the moment any real grounds for the suspicion that it may be used improperly; but it appears to be one of the Acts that give powers of incorporation, and in such cases, although incorporation was said to be not for gain but for philanthropic or public purposes, we too often find afterwards that the very reverse is the case. I need only cite as an example what has occurred in Canada of late years in regard to racing corporations. They were incorporated, not for the purpose of making money, but for the somewhat philanthropic purpose of improving the breed of horses in Canada. But what have we found? That a few men invested a few dollars in an Act of Incorporation—take the Hamilton Jockey Club if you like, or the Toronto Jockey Club, or the Montreal one—and after running for some years, and by manipulation from time to time, they are rapidly becoming very wealthy under the incorporation that was said at first to be not for the purpose of making money, but for the purpose of helping on some very laudable enterprise in the country. The question has suggested itself to my mind, could companies do likewise under this provision of the Joint Stock Companies Act? Whether they could under this Act or not, they could under the old Joint Stock Companies Act. But when we are tacking on the Companies Act an amendment to make it easier for persons to get incorporation than under the old Act, we ought to be very careful that we do not leave the door open for persons to take advantage of the amended Act to do the very things we declare they may not do. If you read the report made on the racing of the country to-day, you will see that there are eight or nine corporate bodies, which, a few years ago, declared they had really no financial interest whatever; and then it is laid bare, and made as clear as noonday sun, that they are getting a return of more than $1,000 for every $10 which they invested in these enterprises some years ago, and they are turning their corporations to a very bad use—to a use which is very detrimental to the interests of the country. Yet we are told that we are powerless to prevent this because they now have vested rights which we cannot take away from them. They got those vested rights under false pretenses. It was not thought that the authority granted them under the Joint Stock Companies Act could be used in connection with the lines in which they are now engaged, but by one device after another they have succeeded, and I am quite sure that I would be within the mark in stating, with regard to those nine companies, that, with the powers they possess, the owners will receive a return of more than a million dollars if they are allowed to go on for a short time. Yet it was stated in this House and in the Commons that from the interest which they had they would reap no profit; but when they were brought before a Royal Commission and obliged to tell what it meant to them, you found that it meant a great deal. I have not the report at the moment. If I had, I should like to read it to show the House what those corporations are to-day as compared with what they were represented to be a few years ago, when incorporation was obtained under the Joint Stock Companies Act. Now, the only thing about this Bill which occurs to me is that, whether the organization seeking to be incorporated is for church purposes, or for racing purposes, or for sporting purposes, or for fishing or something of that kind, the incorporation might ultimately give to a few favoured individuals rights and powers which might be detrimental to the interests of the country, or infringe very seriously upon what ought to be the rights of the community as distinguished from the rights of a few who got incorporation under the new Act, which was somewhat loose; and yet we could not deprive them of such rights and powers without buying them out at a very high price.

There is another point in connection with this matter. As to many of these societies —take religious corporations, if you like— I do not know what their position would be with regard to the law of mortmain, or what property they could hold, or how they could hold it; but in the absence of any such knowledge one is inclined to look with a little suspicion upon any loose Act that enables any corporation or any body of men to become incorporated, apparently for some very laudable or innocent purpose, and gives them power which afterwards they turn to their own personal gain, and which makes them very wealthy; and they turn those powers not only to their own personal gain but to the detriment perhaps of the moral fibre of the community, or into some line which we would very gladly have avoided if we had only known at the time we enacted the loose law of which they took advantage in getting their corporate powers.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Under subsection 7 the company is made to state the purposes for which incorporation is sought, but there is nothing here to the effect that it shall not have any capital stock. I do not know whether persons coming to Canada and organizing themselves under this new section of the Act would be able to avoid the declaration as to the amount of capital stock they would have, supposing they wanted to use the Act for wrong purposes.

Hon, Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My answer to that would be that the corporation must necessarily be the creature of the statute or of the charter by which it is incorporated, and, unless general powers are included in the statute, the corporation cannot exercise any powers greater than those given it. This Bill, as honourable gentlemen will observe, limits the powers that may be exercised to those enumerated in the Bill itself. Paragraph 7 A of section 2 sets forth quite clearly that the corporations that are to be incorporated or to receive letters patent are those without the purpose of gain. It seems to me that that should be explicit enough; but if my honourable friend from East Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule) has any doubt about the matter, I see no good reason why the word "sporting" should be included in the eleventh line, and I am quite willing that that word should be stricken out.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I think that is a good idea.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then the subsection would read:

When the application is for the creation of a corporation for national, patriotic, religious, philanthropic, charitable, artistic or other objects—

I would say "or other kindred objects."

Hon. Mr. POWER: Suppose a number of gentlemen wish to establish a game society; that would, in one sense, be a sporting society?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think we might leave the word "sporting" in.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But, for the purpose of reassuring my honourable friend from East Grey, I would say that under the present law, if a sporting organization having for its object the promotion of racing, wants incorporation under letters patent, they have the machinery of the Joint Stock Companies Act available to them to-day. This Bill gives no additional authority or power or inducement to those who may wish to become organized for purposes such as he has mentioned. The Companies Act as it stands upon the statute-book is wide open to all parties who may want to become incorporated for any of the purposes which are contemplated by the Act.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: They could not exercise those rights in the way they desire to exercise them unless under that sporting-club provision. How do these societies exercise those rights? They first got corporate powers and then organized their companies. Later we amended the Criminal Code to prevent their selling pools on the races. Then they introduced the pari-mutuel, which was said to be a very harmless system; and, by virtue of the law which we put upon the statute book to prevent other companies exercising these powers, we gave them a monopoly of the business. The result was that they enlarged their capital stock, ostensibly for the purpose of developing their business, whereas the outside world could see that there was in reality no money put in on those lines. In this way the stock became still more valuable. Some of them have sold out, at from 20 to 40 times the original value.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: What is the difference under the Joint Stock Companies Act that prevents new corporations from getting the privilege?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: It is the amendment to the Criminal Code that made it a crime to do what they were doing.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Did the original charter give them power to do these things that you call crimes or was it just by by-law?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: There was no power given in the Act, I believe. I do not know where they got their power to do it. Then we passed the Act requiring the pool selling to be within a certain radius. After that, they adopted the new system, or pari-mutuel, and that seemed to help them. A member of one of these associations put in only $100, and it was sworn, I believe, that his holding was worth at least $48,000, on account of the privileges they enjoyed by virtue of the Criminal Code shutting out all others from the same line of business.

Hon. Mr. MACDONELL: I think the honourable gentleman from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule) is unduly alarmed. I understand and appreciate to the full the weight of his remarks, but what is being done here is not in line with what the honourable gentleman has in mind. We are simply asked to incorporate a company or provide the means of incorporating a company in a simple and cheap way. This in no way alters or affects directly or indirectly any law that we have now. What this says is that the people can become incorporated for certain purposes that any individual can now carry on by himself. I may say that this is an extremely beneficial measure. There are organizations throughout Canada of the nature mentioned here, which every session are burdening the Parliament of Canada with applications for special Acts, which means great expense. The word "sporting" does not authorize anything that is illegal, but will enable sporting organizations, such as rowing clubs, to become incorporated.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I do not think the honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Macdonell) has quite met the point which struck me. We do not state anything here about the question of capital stock. Should we not say that they are not to have any capital stock at all, inasmuch as it is mentioned in the other part of the Companies Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is not necessary to have any capital stock under this Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Could it be understood as simply meaning that they did not have to state the amount?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Bill is simply for the purpose of incorporation. That can be obtained without capital stock, inasmuch as they are carrying on their business without the purpose of gain. They will be able to carry out all their objects without capital stock. My honourable friend from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule) asked how these racing companies became incorporated, and he expressed apprehension. Under section 5 of the Companies Act, any company can become incorporated and receive all the powers to which the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends, except with regard to the operation of telegraphs, railways, and telephones; so there already is machinery upon the statute book, which is not being interfered with, by which any of these companies can become incorporated. The legislation which he refers to is regulative, preventing them carrying on certain practices in connection with racing. This in no way extends the law except to furnish a speedy and cheap way of incorporating patriotic and charitable organizations.

Paragraph 7A (1) of section 2 was agreed to.

On paragraph 4 of section 2—amendment of by-laws:

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think it might be well to insert here, after paragraph 4, a paragraph to the effect that the Secretary of State shall have the right to examine or to have examined the affairs of the company at any time. It seems to me that it is desirable that there should be something of that sort in order to avoid the abuses which the honourable gentleman from Grey has referred to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have no objection.

Paragraph 4 of section 2 was agreed to.

On paragraph 5 of section 2—existing corporations:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Law Clerk of the Senate, in checking over subsections 5, 6, and 7, has suggested certain improvements which I think should be embodied in the Bill. It is proposed that subsection 5 should read as follows:

(5) Any existing corporation created by or under any Act of the Parliament of Canada for any of the objects mentioned in subsection (1) of this section may apply under this section for the issue of letters patent creating it a corporation under those provisions of Part 1 of this Act which apply to corporations created under this section, and upon the issue of such letters patent the said provisions shall apply to the corporations created thereby.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It is only a difference in wording.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is suggested that the following be substituted for section 6:

(6) 1. The following sections of Part 1 of this Act shall not apply to corporations created under this section, namely, sections 7 to 9 both inclusive, 26, 33, 38 to 43 both inclusive, 45 to 68 both inclusive, 68A as enacted by section 2 of chapter 23 of the statutes of 1914, 70-78 both inclusive, 80 to 84 both inclusive, 86 to 88 both inclusive, paragraphs (d) and (e) of section 89, 90, 101 to 104 both inclusive, 106, 114, 115.

2. The other sections of Part 1 of this Act shall apply to corporations created under this section.

That is to say, we exclude from the operations of these organizations the sections which I have read, inasmuch as they are entirely unnecessary and really cumbersome, and in the very nature of things would not apply to organizations of this character. As paragraph 7 it is proposed to insert the following:

(7) In applying to corporations created under this section those sections of Part 1 of this Act which apply to such corporations—

(a) the word "company" shall be deemed to mean a corporation so created;

(b) the word "shareholder" shall be deemed to mean a member of such a corporation;

(c) a provision that the votes of shareholders representing a specified proportion in value of the stock of a company shall be requisite for any purpose shall be deemed to mean that the votes of a like proportion in number of the members of the corporation are requisite for that purpose.

That is to say, they need not be shareholders in the sense in which the word is used in the Companies Act at the present time. They need not have stock. They will be shareholders inasmuch as they are promoters or interested in the corporation.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would suggest to my honourable friend that we might have those printed in the Minutes.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. I was about to suggest that we go through the Bill, and, in anticipation of my honourable friend's suggested amendment, that the committee sit again with the reprinted Bill before them. With the permission of the House I should like to dispose of the provisions in the Bill as it is. I move, for the time being, the adoption of these amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

On section 4—new form C, notice of incorporation:

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think the schedule needs a slight amendment. The form reads in this way:

Public notice is hereby given that under the first part of the Companies Act letters patent have been issued under the seal of the Secretary of State, bearing date the ..... day of ..... incorporating (here state names, address, etc.) for the purpose of (here state the undertaking of the company, or, in the case of a corporation not for the purposes of gain, the objects of the corporation, as set forth in the letters patent).

Now, there is no necessity for that, for all the corporations incorporated under this Act will be not for purposes of gain.

And then:

—by the name of (here state the name of the company or corporation as in the letters patent) [with a total capital stock of.....dollars divided into.....shares of..... dollars.]

That ought all to go out, because there is no capital stock. The schedule goes on:

(In the case of a corporation not for purposes of gain the words between square brackets will be left out.)

Those are the words I have just quoted, as to total stock.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I thought we were leaving the present form C in the Companies Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This form would apply to the letters patent.

Hon. Mr. POWER: We should not mix up two things.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The two have apparently been mixed up. This form might apply to either.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The title of this Bill is: "An Act to amend the Companies Act so as to provide for the incorporation by Letters Patent of Corporations for purposes other than gain." We had better not repeal the old schedule, but make form C the schedule to this Act.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: There seems to be something hardly consistent, because in the first place the Bill is for the purpose of enabling parties to be incorporated for purposes other than that of gain, but towards the end of the Bill we find the words, "in the case of a corporation not for purposes of gain." That would naturally imply that there must be some incorporations expected under this Act which would be for purposes of gain.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will let that stand, and when the other clauses are printed we will take that up. I think it would be better to have a separate form for this particular kind of company.

Progress was reported.

WAR CHARITIES BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill V2, an Act relating to War Charities, Hon. Mr. Talbot in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I said a few words with regard to this Bill when it was up before, and I have since made some inquiries. I think that if the Bill were passed in anything like its present form it would strike at a great many societies which are doing very commendable work in the country today. I have jotted down the names of some of them which to my personal knowledge have raised a great deal of money and devoted it to admirable purposes. Take, for instance, the Daughters of the Empire. They have held entertainments, evening parties, or other gatherings for the purpose of raising money, which they have used to provide socks, mittens and other comforts for the soldiers who have gone overseas. The Ladies Aid societies of the different churches have been, in our part of the country at least, raising considerable money for the purpose of buying yarn for knitting.

These societies keep their work going on all the time and have sent thousands of socks and other comforts to the soldiers abroad. Then there is the Ladies Patriotic Society, which is doing similar work— supplying socks, mittens, cigars, cigarettes, and other needs for the soldiers. Then there is a social or dancing club which has been raising money in the same way, and others by garden parties, by social teas, by magic lantern performances, and by lectures. I think that all these organizations would come under this Act if it were strictly enforced, and would be subject to prosecution and obliged to stop their operations along patriotic lines. There is perhaps a great deal of money raised for patriotic purposes which never reaches its destination, and there ought to be, if we could provide it, some device to prevent the misappropriation of such money, because it is a fraud upon the general public. People in their generosity will often give when they are not very well able to do so, if the plea is put before them that the contribution is for charity, for the comfort of the soldiers, or for similar purposes. Money is therefore obtained very easily, and it is quite conceivable that much of it does not ultimately go to the end for which it was raised. Therefore, if some restriction could be put upon organizations who misapply their funds, it would be very desirable. Now, take paragraph b of section 2. What is it for? It says:

War charities means any fund, institution or association, whether established before or after the commencement of this Act, having for its object or among its objects the relief of suffering or distress or the supplying of needs or comforts to sufferers from the war, or to soldiers, returned soldiers, or their families or dependents, or any other charitable purpose connected with the present European war. Any question whether a charity is a war charity shall be finally determined by the minister.

Section 3 provides:

It shall not be lawful to make any appeal to the public for donations or subscriptions—

That is what they are doing all the time.

—in money or in kind for any war charity as hereinbefore defined,—

I have read what a war charity is, as defined.

—or to raise or attempt to raise money for any such war charity by promoting any bazaar, sale, entertainment or exhibition, or by any similar means, unless—

(a) the war charity is either exempt from registration, or is registered under this Act; and

(b) the approval in writing of the executive committee or other governing body of the war charity has been obtained, either directly or through some person duly authorized to give such approval on behalf of such governing body.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Read subsection 4 of section 3.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE (reading):

The minister may exempt any war charity from registration under this Act.

Well, I admit that, but to me the question appears to be, how many of these organizations will go on and raise money without knowing that they ought to comply with this Act. Or, if they all come under it, they would, I think, keep a small army of officials occupied all the time in giving the necessary authority for the raising of money. Quite a large branch would be built up under this clause, I think, judging by the number of societies which are operating in the country at the present time. It would in my opinion be the part of wisdom to be somewhat cautious about their legislation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This Bill may be subject to much of the criticism which my honourable friend has offered; and yet, notwithstanding this fact, it is obvious that we have to make some provisions by law to curtail the many abuses to which communities are being subjected by persons making collections, and very large collections, without having any authority or any responsibility.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: And some of those collections are very unwise.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. Now, the machinery furnished by the Act is very simple. In the first place, if any of the organizations referred to by my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Sproule) should come under paragraph b of section 2 and should be a war charity within the meaning of the Bill, a letter to the minister, who is Secretary of State, will at once secure an exemption from the application of the Act to the organization concerned. I do not think the proposed measure would throw any particular responsibility or unnecessary trouble upon such an organization by requiring it to communicate with the minister in order to obtain exemption. The advantages which must flow from placing provisions of this kind upon the statute-book will much more than counterbalance any little inconvenience which some of those charitable organizations may suffer by having to apply to the minister for that exemption. My honourable friend will observe also from the last clause in the Bill that there is no probability of proceedings of an aggravated or vexatious character being brought against any of those organizations, because proceedings for offences shall not be instituted except with the consent of the minister. Hence I think the provisions of the Bill are well safeguarded.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I am afraid I cannot agree with the honourable gentleman from East Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule). I do not quite see why there should be any exemptions. As I undersand it, this registration will not be expensive or onerous for any of these charities to comply with, and when reading the Bill I failed to see why there should be any exemption—why all these charities should not make application to the minister for registration, and I do not understand what is the benefit of having any exemption at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There might be some specific case where it might be desirable to take up a subscription, and that would exhaust that particular charity or organization; hence it would be undesirable that such an organization should be registered.

On subsection 3 of section 3—when section to begin to apply:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: This subsection says:

This section, so far as it relates to registration, shall not apply to any war charity until the expiration of three months after the passing of this Act, or to any war charity pending the decision of the registration authority on an application for the registration of such charity made within such period.

In the next section it is provided that the minister shall be the registration authority, but he can also appoint a local registration authority. Would those words, "registration authority," as appearing in subsection 3 of section 3, cover the local registration authorities as well, or do they mean that all applications must be made to the minister in the first instance? Supposing a local registration authority is constituted in British Columbia and a charity organization in that province applies for registration; would they have to apply to the minister and then have the application referred back to the local registration authority?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. My honourable friend will see in paragraph 2 of section 4:

The minister shall be the registration authority, and he may by warrant under his hand and seal of office appoint a committee or committees to be a local registration authority or authorities for such district or districts as may be defined in such warrant.

Then paragraph ii provides:

The members of such committee shall perform their duties without remuneration.

I think subsections 3 and 4 make provision that they may issue the necessary authority.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But, as I take it, according to the wording of the Act, "registration authority" means the minister, does it not? In subsection 2 of section 4 it is stated that the minister shall be the registration authority.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The powers of the local registration authority are specific. You will see that subsection 4 of section 4 provides:

The registration authority or local registration authority may, before registering any war charity, make such inquiries.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It seems to me, inasmuch as it is stated that the minister is the registration authority. that every association would have first to be registered by the minister, and then for anything that takes place after that registration the association can be left to the local registration authority.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. The local registration authority may also register, as my honourable friend will see, under paragraph 4 of section 4. The registration may be done by either the minister or the local registration authority.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Is it contemplated to establish a number of districts in each of which there is to be a registration authority?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes; a local registration authority.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I presume the honourable gentleman does not at the present time know what is contemplated with regard to the size of the district?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. The application would state what the district is.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: The minister would appoint a local registration authority for a particular district, who would require that certain facts should be stated in the application for registration? There is no number of districts specified in the Bill, is there?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. The probability is that the minister would assign some officer of the local Government as local registration authority. This measure has to some extent been copied from the machinery which is used in England in dealing with the subject. In England the registration is dealt with by the municipalities; they are the local registration authorities; but in Canada municipal authorities are not clearly enough defined to permit of that arrangement being carried out successfully in this country. This Bill will permit of the minister appointing any authority as a local registration authority to whom application can be made.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I still think that subsection 3 of section 3 ought to read "the decision of the registration authority or of the local registration authority," in order to be clear. The same applies to subsection 1 of section 4, because it is distinctly stated in subsection 2 of section 4 that the minister shall be the registration authority. If the organizations desiring registration are to apply in certain instances to the local registration authorities, I think the Bill ought to state that; otherwise it seems to require that application be made to the minister and to the minister only.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Could we not say after the words "registration authority" in line 12, "or of the local registration authority"?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would not be applicable to subsection 3 of section 3, would it? It seems to me that it should be inserted in line 26, where provision is made for the selection or appointment of a local registration authority by the minister.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: If the decision which is necessary under subsection 3 of section 3 be given by the registration authority, that will mean the minister. The latter part of this section reads as follows:

or to any war charities pending the decision of the registration authority on an application for the registration of such charities made within such period.

I understood my honourable friend to say that that could also be given by the local registration authority.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. The minister creates the local registration authority.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: He is the registration authority.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He creates a committee or committees to be the local registration authority or authorities.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think line 12 should read:

—pending the decision of the registration authority or the local registration authority.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I do not see that would be necessary, because, while this subsection refers to the decision of the registration authority, it is not defined until we get to subsection 4. Subsection 2 of section 4 practically makes the decision that of the registration authority through the minister and his appointment.

Hon. Mr. POWER: In subsection 2 of section 4 it is stated that the minister shall be the registration authority. A local registration authority is powerless; it must wait for the decision of the minister. That is what it means, because you say further down that the minister is the registration authority, and you say here, "pending the decision of the registration authority."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The decision is on the application.

Hon. Mr. POWER: By subdivision 2 of section 4 the minister has the power to appoint local registration authorities, and under subsection 4 of section 4 these local authorities have the power to refuse to register. Is it not simpler to say in subsection 3 of section 3: "or the local registration authority." That removes all doubt.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: All right.

Hon Mr. THOMPSON: The side note says "registration authority." Then it goes on and adds that the minister shall be the registration authority with his local registration boards.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is not very important.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I do not see what difficulty can arise by the minister being the registration authority. He transfers to the local registration authorities his authority. They act through him. It is the minister acting, although it has been done by the local authority.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Take the case of some person, say in British Columbia, who consults a lawyer to look over this Act and see what is necessary. He takes this Bill and finds that it is decided that the minister is the registration authority. He will probably report to the people who employ him that they have to get a decision of the minister, whereas if you put in the local registration authority, he knows he can get his decision from the authority in Victoria.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will accept that amendment.

Subsection 3 of section 3, amended as proposed, was agreed to.

On subsection 6 of section 4—certificates and returns to be made to minister:

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: This says that certificate and returns are to be made to the minister, but lower down it provides that returns are to be made to the local registration authority.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Subsection 2 of section 5 requires this to be sent to the minister.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Subsections 6 and 7 of section 4 only relates to the registration.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think they are contradictory.

Subsection 6 of section 4 was agreed to.

On section 5—conditions to be complied with by registered charities—paragraph i:

Hon. W. B. ROSS: What is the meaning of the words "by a responsible committee?"

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is simply an adjective. There is no harm in leaving it in.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: They will never get a committee.

The paragraph was agreed to.

On paragraph iv of section 5:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It seems to me rather confusing to say:

Such particulars with regard to account and other records as the registration authority or the minister may require shall be furnished to the registration authority or the minister.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I think it is rather a good provision. The local people might want some information.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: If it means the local registration authority, I think "local" ought to be put in there.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: I take it that the records and the papers and accounts might be filed either with the local registration authority or with the minister.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the minister requires it, they have to forward them to him.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Suppose that people in a remote part of the country felt sufficiently interested in the organization to try to ascertain whether it was being properly conducted or not and wished to avail themselves of that provision of the law which says that books must be kept and open to inspection,, they would naturally ask, "Where can we find them? Are they with the local board or are they at Ottawa with the minister?"

The CHAIRMAN: Paragraph iv is amended as follows:

Such particulars with regard to accounts and other records as the local registration authority or the minister may require, shall be furnished to the local registration authority or the minister, and the books and accounts of the charity shall be open to inspection at any time by any person duly authorised by the local registration authority or by the minister.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: It seems to me that that is going rather far. The books may be inspected by any person duly authorized by the local authority. I think the public ought to have the right to satisfy themselves.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The minister may inquire under that.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Suppose I have reason to suspect that there is fraudulent work going on in my locality, and I go to the local board and say that I wish to look over the minutes, the answer would very properly be, "You have no authority to come here; you can only get that from us."

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Cannot he appeal to the minister in that case and get permission?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Yes, I should think I could. The paragraph was agreed to .

On subsection 2 of section 7—appeal:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: If there was any objection to the decision of the minister, there would be no appeal.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You must come to Caesar some time or other.

Section 7 was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I would like to ask the minister if an incorporated society like the Red Cross would be required to register under this Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should not think so, because the Red Cross is already incorporated.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Take, for instance, the Ladies Aid societies of the churches.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If they come within paragraph b of section 2 they would have to be exempted.

The Bill was reported, with amendments.

At six o'clock the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

NORTHWEST GAME BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill 100, an Act respecting game in the Northwest Territories of Canada. Hon. Mr. Landry in the Chair.

On section 4—close seasons:

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think we should insert the word "trapped" here, as it is used in the definition clause, and I move that it be inserted between the words "hunted" and "taken," in line 10. There might possibly be some question as to whether the word "taken" included "trapped."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I see no objection to that.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Then, as to paragraph a, the honourable the leader of the Government stated that he would look into the point that I raised, that the close season is not what it should be. Has the honourable gentleman had the leisure to do so?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I have not done so.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The point I made the other day was that July and August were the times of the year when the game most needed protection. That is the time when animals mate in that part of the country. In the province of British Columbia I think the close season ends on the 1st of September; in my own province it ends on the 15th of September; in Ontario it ends, I think, on the 1st of October, and the law in Quebec is somewhat similar. I think the clause should read that animals shall not be taken between the 1st day of April and the 1st day of September.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will take the matter up with the Department of the Interior. We have had the assistance of what is known as the Wild Life Commission, which is made up of members of the Conservation Commission and others who are experts on questions of this kind.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I observe that this clause is taken from the old Act, and since that time the population has extended into the neighbouring provinces.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is in the unorganized territory.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am aware of that. There are game laws in the provinces of British Columbia and Alberta which adjoin the unorganized territory, and if this clause remained as it is there would be nothing to hinder pothunters from going into the Northwest territory and killing any number of deer or moose. There should be some restriction on that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend will put in his amendment I will take up the matter with the Department of the Interior.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I would strike out all the words after the second "the" in line 14, and substitute "the 1st day of September" for "the 15th day of July."

Paragraph a stands.

On paragraph b of section 4—mink, fisher and marten:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I see that we are repealing the old Act and that this Act is very much more stringent. I suggest that it might be possible to go a little further and provide, as is provided in the province of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, that the females shall not be killed at any time. I understand that in these three provinces it is all right to kill moose, elk, wapiti, caribou, and deer at certain times, but at no time are females to be killed, and no animals are to be killed until they are of a certain age. I think that would be a very good provision to insert in this Act in order to protect the females and the young stock.

Hon. Mr. POWER: There is something to be said in favour of the view of the honourable gentleman; but in Nova Scotia we passed an Act containing a provision that cow moose should not be killed at any season of the year. That law has been in operation now for some three or four years, with the the result that within the last few years, at a place where the moose yarded, there were some six or eight or more cows all barren. The bull had been killed off and the cows are barren. I am not objecting to the amendment, but I doubt the wisdom of it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That can be governed by the license which is issued by the minister. Consequently, if it is desirable in the interests of game that this should not be done, the license can be so limited. Under subsection 9 of section 4 it will be observed that no person can engage in hunting except under a license issued by the minister. It seems unwise to provide arbitrarily that the female animals should not be killed.

Paragraph c was agreed to.

On paragraph d—muskrat:

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Under this provision muskrats can be trapped all winter. All the young will be killed off.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I see that by subsection 10 of this section regulations can be made by the Governor in Council. Can the honourable the leader of the House tell us what those regulations would cover? Would they cover anything more than the clauses of the Bill?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The regulations would cover all the purposes which we have in view in this Bill.

Paragraph d was agreed to.

On subsection 6 of section 4—white pelicans:

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is the surveyor and the explorer bound to take out a license?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, under subclause 9 I should say it would be necessary for them to procure a license.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I hardly think so.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I would like to ask the honourable member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) if subsections 4, 5 and 6 would not require to have the word "trapped" inserted, to make them correspond with subsection 1 of section 4?

Hon. Mr. POWER: Yes, I think so.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: In line 2 of each of those subsections insert the word "trapped" after the word "hunted."

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: In subsection 7 also. The subsections, amended as suggested, were agreed to.

On subsection 10 of section 4—regulations:

Hon. Mr. POWER: It seems to me that the Governor in Council should have power to make regulations governing the number of mammals and birds that may be killed or taken by any person in one season. That is a provision which I think is to be found in the game laws of nearly all the provinces, and it is intended to prevent pot hunting. I would move that the following words be inserted before paragraph f:

Governing the number of mammals and birds that may be killed or taken by any person in one season.

Subsection 10, amended as proposed, was agreed to.

On section 5—contracts with Indians and others:

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Section 5 provides a penalty for any one entering into a contract with or employing any Indian, Eskimo, etc., and section 18 states that where no special penalty has been provided, a fine of one hundred dollars to five hundred dollars, or imprisonnement for a term not exceeding six months, shall be the penalty. But why not make the Eskimo and the Indian also liable to prosecution for violation of section 5 of the Act?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Act does not apply to them. My honourable friend will see that under subsection 9 of section 4 they are even permitted to take the game. An exception is provided in the case of "a native-born Indian, Eskimo or halfbreed, who is a bona fide resident of the Northwest territories."

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But that is for his own use. Section 5 provides that no person shall enter into a contract or agreement with an Indian or Eskimo for the purpose of breaking the Act; but only the person entering into the contract is punished, and the Eskimo or Indian who is particeps criminis gets off.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The Eskimo or the Indian is not as likely to appreciate the mischief as much as a white man would.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are really the wards of the Government, the Indians particularly. An Eskimo should surely not be held responsible for entering into such a contract as is mentioned in section 5.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But my honourable friend does not follow my argument. Here is a violation of the Act in which two persons engage, but only one of them is punished. The Eskimo or the Indian who makes a contract with a person to violate the Act is doing so for a consideration; he is getting something out of it. He is getting something to which under the Act he is not entitled; in other words, he is not killing or taking game for his own use, but is doing it for the use of somebody else, who is paying him something to help him violate the Act. Why should he get off?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I suppose it is on the ground that he is not expected to know the law.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You could not collect a fine from him anyway.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If the argument of ignorance of the law is accepted, the Eskimo may commit murder and escape punishment—he may get off scot free. What is the difference between the two cases? It is only a difference of degree.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: In support of what the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) states, I may cite this fact, which I have been told is true, that the Hudson Bay Company employs the Eskimos in the nefarious work of killing game to such an extent that it is tending to destroy some species. Some ten years ago one factory, I was told—I was in Labrador last summer—got as many as 30,000 wild geese, which were exported to the United States. The eider duck, which was in my time very common and numerous in New Brunswick and the other Maritime Provinces, has practically disappeared, and the cause is attributed to the massacre of those birds by the Eskimos in the service of the Hudson Bay Company. The eider duck honourable gentlemen, is a most precious bird. If you refer to history, you will find that the Vikings had a law imposing severe punishment, even the death penalty, for the wanton destruction of them. That most valuable bird which in antiquity would have been sacred is disappearing—it has practically disappeared. I would suggest that the law should reach the Eskimo or those persons who employ Eskimos for the destruction of those birds. I would call the attention of my honourable friend the leader of the Government to the fact which I have mentioned. But as to the 30,000 wild geese having been killed at one factory, I was positively assured of that last year, when I visited Labrador.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am quite serious, and the more I think of it the more it strikes me that this is a proper provision to put into the Act. This Act is, of course, intended for the protection of game, but if the Eskimo and the Indian, who have carte blanche at all times to kill or take game, are allowed to make agreements of the kind referred to in this section and get off scot free if they are caught, there is no deterrent for them and they have nothing to lose. The Indian or Eskimo will enter into an agreement of that kind if he is going to be paid and knows that if he is caught only the other man will be punished. I would invite my honourable friend's serious consideration to this question.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If we deter the man who employs the Indian or Eskimo, by the infliction of a fine and imprisonment, or either, will not that be sufficient? The Indian or the Eskimo then cannot engage in any illegal hunting, so long as we punish the person who seeks to violate the law. In the second place, while a fine of $500 or less may be imposed, how are we seriously going to consider to impose a fine on an Indian or an Eskimo?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: But we may impose a fine upon the white man who buys from him.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We could fine him, but not the Eskimo.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Are there any jails into which the Eskimos could be put?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The Act provides for that:

> When because of the distance or for want of conveyance or communication, or for any other cause, it is not convenient to confine any convicted person in the nearest gaol or other place of confinement, the convicting authority shall have power to confine such person in any suitable building which is more convenient to the place of trial, and to take all necessary precautions to prevent his escape therefrom.

That is the answer to my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: It appears to me that while there is a provision here to prevent any one from entering into an agreement with an Indian or an Eskimo, it does not penalize any one who purchases from the Eskimo or Indian, although he may not have an agreement with him. This Act, as far as I can see, places no prohibition on the Indian or Eskimo from killing game, whether for his own use or even for barter, and there is no prohibition put on any one from purchasing the fur or game from the Indian or Eskimo; the only prohibition is from making an agreement with him to do certain things. The point I wish to make is that the omission is in not having a penalty against any one who purchases this game or fur, or whatever is caught, contrary to the intention of this Act, otherwise than by an agreement.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Of course, the objection would be that the Indian can take the game for himself; he is not limited.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Yes, but if he cannot dispose of it, if he gains no advantage, then he ceases to do it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But he can eat it, or he can sell it.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: But if he could not sell it there would be no advantage for him to kill it, except for his own use.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Section 8 provides for that:

No person without lawful excuse, the proof whereof shall lie on him, shall buy, sell or have in his possession any game, or the nests, or eggs of any wild bird, or any part thereof, during the close season.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: But that would not apply to the Indian?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I suppose that would cover the case.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Lo, the poor Indian will not have a chance to trade with the Hudson Bay Company any more.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend not consider my suggestion and allow the section to stand so that we may think it over?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot think of any way of imposing a fine or imprisonment upon Indians or Eskimos in that far north country. If we punish the white man who seeks to violate the law through an Indian or Eskimo, it seems to me that we do all that is necessary for the observance of the Act. I have no objection to speaking to the Minister of the Interior to see if it would be at all possible to enforce any such provision as is proposed by my honourable friend.

The section was agreed to.

On subsection 2 of section 7—duty of constables:

Hon Mr. POWER: I notice that in the Act which this Bill proposes to repeal the accused can be tried before a commissioned officer of the Northwest Mounted Police. Under the Bill as we have it, apparently he can be tried before an ordinary constable of the Northwest Mounted Police.

The honourable leader of the Government remembers that that point was raised in the discussion earlier. It does seem to me going rather far to say that a policeman may arrest a man and try him afterwards.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That subsection does not make a constable a justice of the peace.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But then it would have to be in the Northwest Territories?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Well, is it advisable to confine it there, if there be no justice of the peace?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The officers of the mounted police are ex officio justices of the peace.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I did not know that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes; under the Police Act.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: There is one point which occurs to me. I may be wrong, but section 6 says:

All members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and the sub-collector of Customs at Herschel Island, shall be ex-officio game officers.

Then, section 7 says:

Any game officer, when he considers it necessary so to do, may appoint a constable or constables.

If all the Northwest Mounted Police are game officers, where are the constables? Are there no other constables than the Northwest Mounted Police in the Northwest Territories?

Hon. Mr. POWER: The game officer appoints the constable.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: He appoints a substitute.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It seems rather confusing to say that a game officer may appoint a constable. Is not the game officer a constable?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: He may be an outsider. A person who is not a member of the Northwest Mounted Police could be appointed by a game officer as a constable.

The section was agreed to.

On section 12—giving false information:

Hon. Mr. POWER: The marginal note is not correct. It does not provide punishment for refusing information, but simply for giving false information?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We can change that by striking out in the marginal note the words, "refusing information or"

The section, amended as proposed, was agreed to.

On section 14—arrest on view:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would it be necessary to insert the word "constable," as it has been used in other places?

Hon. Mr. POWER: If he is a peace officer he is a constable.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would that cover both?

Hon. Mr. POWER: Yes.

The section was agreed to.

On section 18—penalties:

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Is not the penalty very high?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But there is a minimum fine.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: But that section still gives the Mounted Police officers the power to inflict the whole fine of $500.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The difficulty is to discriminate. Suppose a hunter comes in and shoots several buffalo or musk oxen, or animals of that kind, it would be a very serious offence.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I was going to call attention to the fact that in the existing law there is a provision for the levying of the amount of the fine on the goods of the accused, and there does not seem to be anything in this Bill to make provision for that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think under the Criminal Code that would be done in any event. A distress would issue for the collection of the fine.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I looked into the Criminal Code and did not see it. Section 30 of chapter 151 of the Revised Statute says:

> The authority making the conviction may order that, in default of payment of the penalty and the costs of conviction, forthwith or within such time as he orders, the penalty and costs shall be levied by distress and sale of the goods.

I think there should be something of that kind in this Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will look into that matter. My recollection is that the Criminal Code makes ample provision for the collection of fines by distress where a summary conviction is made.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Has my honourable friend noticed that, whilst a fine of $500 is imposed for infractions of sections 4 and 5, that is, for killing or taking out of season, when it comes to deal with offences created by section 11, the maximum fine is $100. Section 11 says:

> Any person who assaults, obstructs or interferes with any game officer, game warden, constable or other peace officer in the discharge of any duty under the provisions of this Act or of any regulation, shall be guilty of a violation of this Act.

In other words, the man who assaults or obstructs a game officer cannot be fined more than $100, but a man who takes an egg can be fined $500. The illustration perhaps is not apt, but the argument remains that for obstructing a game officer the maximum fine is $100. That seems to be altogether unreasonable as compared with the other penalties provided by the other sections.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: They depend on the value of the animals.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Under subsections a and b animals might be destroyed to the value of thousands of dollars, and it would not be unreasonable to inflict the fine. Suppose a police officer were assaulted in the city of Ottawa, would there be any probability of the punishment being greater than $100 fine or two months' imprisonment?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The illustration is not apt. We are dealing with the Northwest Territory. The point that I make is that the most serious offence of all has the lightest penalty attached to it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, that is arguable.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It would be very simple to insert at the end of paragraph b:

> For any offence under subsection 9 of section 4 or under section 11.

The section, as amended, was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Before we finish with the Bill perhaps I may be allowed to make a suggestion. In most of the provinces the law forbids the hunting of deer or moose with dogs. The Government might bear that in mind when making the regulations. If people are allowed to use dogs they will kill off the moose and deer in very short order.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Section 10 is going to come into conflict with the Criminal Code.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will observe that this constitutes an offence entirely different to that under the Criminal Code. It is an offence under this Act. That is, provision is made for a specific offence under this Act. It seems to me it would oust the provision in the Criminal Code.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: But the offence is exactly the same in both cases; it is obstructing a police officer. Why should it be imprisonment in one case and a fine of $100 in another?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The object in making provision here is evidently to make the Act complete in itself. This Act will find its way into those very distant parts in the Northwest Territories, whereas probably the Criminal Code would not be known there.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) is strongly in support of my contention that the penalty is altogether inadequate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But the fine is $100.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But by comparison with the Criminal Code the penalty provided in this instance is very much lighter and is altogether inadequate.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not as to the fine; as to the imprisonment?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Yes.

Progress was reported.

PROVINCIAL PROHIBITION AMENDMENT BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The Senate again went into Committee on Bill 121, an Act to amend an Act in aid of Provincial Legislation prohibiting or restricting the sale or use of Intoxicating Liquors.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed. Hon. Mr. McLennan in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Honourable gentlemen, when we were last in committee we reserved paragraph 4 B of section 3 and it was proposed to strike out the words, "Such premises or place, including any Government." As honourable gentlemen will see, that would not make a very intelligible amendment to that clause, and it has been suggested by the Government that we should incorporate into this Bill sections 136 (as enacted in 1916, chapter 14) and 117 of the Canada Temperance Act. The section is necessary to give right of search over government railways, etc. I will read the section which it is proposed to substitute.

Hon. Mr. POWER: You propose to strike out 4B?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, in its entirety, and to substitute this in lieu thereof:

> Sections 136 (as enacted in 1916, c. 14) and 117 of the Canada Temperance Act. The section is necessary to give right of search over Government railways, etc.
> 4b. If it is proved upon oath before any Judge of the sessions of the peace, recorder, police magistrate, stipendiary magistrate, two justices of the peace or any magistrate having the power or authority of two or more justices of the peace, that there is reasonable cause to suspect that any intoxicating liquor is in any premises or place and that such intoxicating liquor is or has been dealt with contrary to the provisions of this Act, such officer may grant a warrant to search such premises or place, including any Government railway, vehicle or steamship, for such intoxicating liquor, and if the same or any part thereof is there found, to seize and bring the same before him, and when any person is convicted of any offence against any of the provisions of this Act the officer or officers so convicting may adjudge and order, in addition to any other penalty, that the intoxicating liquor in respect to which the offence was committed and which has been seized under a search warrant as aforesaid, and all kegs, barrels, cases, boxes, bottles, packages, and other receptacles of any kind whatsoever, found containing the same be forfeited and destroyed, and such order shall thereupon be carried out by the constable or peace officer who executed the said search warrant or by such other person as may be thereunto authorized by the officer or officers who have made such conviction.

Honourable gentlemen will see that that is the law to-day under the Canada Temperance Act, and it considerably abridges the wide powers of search provided for in this Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am not disposed to be particularly favourable to stringent prohibition legislation; but I would suggest, with reference to the words "including any government railway, vehicle or steamship," that very often the worst kind of work is not done on board steamship or on government railways, but is done, perhaps, in schooners and boats and canoes, and I would suggest—I suppose the honourable leader of the Government will accept the amendment—that after the word "steamship" the following words be inserted: "vessel, boat or canoe." The bootleggers are much more likely to use boats or schooners than steamships.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Why not put in the word "craft" instead of "canoe?"

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Craft of any description.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Why should the right of search be limited to government railways?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think that should include all railways? Why not strike out the word "Government"?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The special language is intended to cover the case of the Crown.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Say "any Government railway or other railway." We may possibly misapprehend the use of the words "government railway" there. The Crown would have to be expressly mentioned before a search-warrant could be executed to search government premises. It seems to me that the meaning of this is any government railway, government vehicle, or government steamship. Here are three separate properties that may be owned by the Crown—a railway, a vehicle, or a steamship. Any private property belonging to a corporation would be governed by the other language.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It would put another construction on the Temperance Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This provision seems to have been specially prepared to cover Crown properties.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It has been on the statutes. I think perhaps we had better let it go as it is.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: If the Crown is not mentioned, it cannot be touched?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The words, "boat or canoe" have been accepted?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would be a government boat, vessel or canoe. Does my honourable friend want the Bill amended in that way?

Hon. Mr. POWER: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think it is best to leave the section as it is. It is taken word for word from the Canada Temperance Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think the honourable gentleman has another amendment with respect to entering without a warrant.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This supersedes it.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: I ask the honourable gentleman if he is going to leave out the right to search government railways?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, we are adopting it as it is.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY: You say that under that clause you have no right to search government railways.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes, it is specially mentioned.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would like to point out that section 136 of chapter 14 of 1916 does not agree with the clause the honourable gentleman read.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This was given to me by the parliamentary draughtsman. Is not the proposed section sufficiently comprehensive to cover all premises? It says:

—that there is reasonable cause to suspect that any intoxicating liquor is in any premises or place and that such intoxicating liquor is or has been dealt with contrary to the provisions of this Act.

It seems to me that this is an improvement upon the provisions of the Bill which we are now considering, which gives a latitude that should not be entertained for a moment. This clause makes provision for the issuance of a summons, which I think is very desirable. Although it is not in the exact language of the Act referred to, yet on the whole the proposed section appeals to me as a very great improvement on the form contained in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I understand that the Act as it now appears in the statutes will be substituted for the clause in the hands of the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: The motion is that section 4 B be struck out and this clause substituted for it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: We should adopt the Act as it stands now, not a section which has been repealed.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Why is it necessary to adopt any part of the Canada Temperance Act? This supersedes it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would not do to adopt the amended section in its entirety, because in several places it refers to "Part 2 of this Act," and "The Temperance Act of 1864" and so on. It is a question in my mind whether it is good legislation to enumerate the many places mentioned in the Canada Temperance Act, for instance, dwelling house, store, shop, warehouse, outhouse, garden, yard, and so on. That only places a limitation on the Act. The language in the amendment which I have handed to the chairman seems to me to be preferable.

The new section was agreed to.

On subsection 4A of section 3:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I ask honourable gentlemen to reconsider clause 3, which was stricken out? It has been pointed out by the Minister of Justice that this clause, which was rejected by the Senate last session, and again this session, is really necessary for the proper carrying out of the Act. The violation of the law of one province may occur in another province. The only effective way of enforcing the Act is to provide that a prosecution may take place in the province where the law has been violated. If there is prohibition in one province and no prohibition in another, it is manifest that a violation of the Act should not be permitted to take place in the province where prohibition does not obtain. If there is a deliberate violation of the law in that way, it is reasonable, I contend, that the prosecution should take place where the offence was first committed; otherwise it becomes quite apparent that it will be impossible to enforce a prohibitory liquor law in those provinces in which prohibition obtains if, in the provinces where it does not obtain, latitude is given to ship all the liquor anybody wishes to ship into a province where the law does obtain.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: My honourable friend has not touched upon the question of the hardships that may be imposed on people by this very clause. A man may be brought all the way across the Dominion of Canada to stand his trial, and then be turned loose to get back again as best he can.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He can easily avoid that by not committing the offence.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Suppose he is innocent?

Hon. Mr. POWER: With a fairly full House the Senate decided by a considerable majority to make the amendment to which reference has been made, and I trust the leader of the House will not insist upon our retracing our steps when we have such a thin House as we have to-night. I agree with the honourable the leader of the Government in thinking the prosecution should be taken in the place to which the liquor is sent and not in the place from which it is sent.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: How will you be able to reach the offender if the prosecution is not to take place at the destination instead of at the place of shipment?

Hon. Mr. POWER:: If a man has made a contract to have the goods sent to him, it seems to me that there should not be much trouble.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You may not find the offender at the point of destination. Liquor may be shipped to the order of the shipper. Clearly the offence has been committed at the point of shipment.

Hon. Mr. POWER: In the city of Montreal the business is perfectly legitimate, and if a man ships goods to British Columbia. which he has a perfect right to do, and which the law of the province does not forbid him doing, he is liable to be taken to British Columbia to be tried.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think the reason given by the Minister of Justice for putting this clause back is the strongest that I have yet heard for leaving it out. The Minister of Justice said that it would be easier to get a conviction in a temperance province than in a province where the people were not so much interested in the question. That is to say, if you take a man out of the province where the people are perhaps indifferent, but where the judges and magistrates would be quite ready to administer justice, and take him into a neighbouring province where perhaps the people are excited on the question, it would be easy, I suppose, to get the conviction. That makes the clause all the more dangerous. A man might be taken out of one province and into another province and not get a fair trial. The commencement of this offence is not the delivery of the liquor at its point of destination. The illegal act, if there is one, commences at the point from which the liquor is shipped. That is the beginning of the offence, and that place and the place of residence of the accused are the places where the man should be tried. I protest against a man who is accused of a crime being treated as if he were guilty. If a man is arrested at Halifax or Montreal and taken to the Northwest Territories it does not necessarily follow that he is guilty. What is going to happen to him after he is taken across the continent, found not guilty, and discharged? The Government does not make any provision to pay his way home.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I took this opportunity of presenting the matter to the House. If the House is not in a receptive mood, and does not look at it from that standpoint, I move that the committee rise, and report the Bill as amended.

The Bill was reported with amendments.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow afternoon.

Bill 121, an Act to amend an Act in aid of Provincial Legislation prohibiting or restricting the sale or use of intoxicating liquors, as amended.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

MINISTER OF OVERSEAS MILITARY FORCES AND PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The Senate again went into Committee on Bill 122, an Act respecting the Minister of the Overseas Military Forces, the Parliamentary Secretary of the Department of Militia and Defence, and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed. Hon. Mr. Daniel in the Chair.

On paragraph 5A of section 1—appointment of Minister of Overseas Military Forces:

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: What are to be the functions of the Minister of Overseas Military Forces? Is this to be a case of the Mikado and the Tycoon. Now, which is to be the Tycoon and which the Mikado?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You take your choice.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: "You pays your money and you takes your choice." Very well. In regard to militia matters, it is not so much a question of the Government's fault; the trouble is the personnel under them. Members of the other House and members of the Senate have no way, unless they have been in close touch with the militia all their lives, of finding out what they should know about what is going on in the department. If I remember rightly, the Auditor General's Report puts the expenditure en bloc. Now, we have no explanation. I do not propose at this late period of the session to ask—although it would be a proper thing to do—for the details of the expenditure to be laid before Parliament. If Parliament votes so much money to the department without asking for particulars as to this and that, there should be laid before Parliament a return or statement giving details as to how the money was expended. My honourable friend who has just taken his seat (Hon. Mr. Cloran) has put in a notice of inquiry which shows how necessary it is that some information of the kind should be available. An ordinary layman would not understand why a lieutenant-general or a major general in Halifax, who is in a very responsible position, should draw less pay than a man in St. John, who does not know anything about soldiers to start with, has never been at the front, and who, when he went to England at the time of the Diamond Jubilee, had his command taken away from him because he could not march his men up and down the street. We find this officer drawing $6,000 odd. We have no details of the circumstances. The militia list does not show the name of this celebrated general anywhere. He is a dragoon, on foot just now. The militia list of 1916 shows him as a provisional brigadier-general, which rank was extended again for one year up to 1917. When you refer to the command at the front, there is no record of him at all. My honourable friend has said that when calling out the Militia these appointments can be made. I do not think my honourable friend has looked into the question or thought of it for a moment. A brigade is composed of a certain number of regiments, and the commander for the time being is a brigadier-general. No such force exists in New Brunswick. There is nothing there but a few gentlemen officers moving about. And yet this officer draws all this pay as a brigadier. It is because of things of this kind that we should know something of the duties of the Minister of Militia overseas. How far will his régime extend? This Bill may be all right; I do not know anything about it; I have not studied it. I might refer to the returns brought down in the House of Commons on the 21st of June, which showed that $400,000 per annum was paid to officers in Halifax, N.S., who were not shedding their blood for the country, for the Conservative party, nor for the King.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: That included St. John.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: No, we would not have anything to do with Halifax. There are soldiers over there. Does my honourable friend want me to say what he drew for advertising?

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Yes, if you like.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: It is not worth while. Is there to be any check placed upon the expenditure of the people's money? I am of the opinion that the Militia Department should be under the administration of one man who is capable of doing his work, and who will do it, and will not be drawn aside. He should be placed outside of the influence of politics. Canada has done an immense amount of work in shipping her men to the front, and whoever did that work deserves great credit at the hands of the country. Mistakes have been made. I think it was a great mistake to promise 500,000 men. It might have been possible to keep the strength up to 200,000 or even 250,000. The Militia Department has been all at sea; there was nobody to guide it, nobody qualified with the necessary military knowledge. The men had to go anyway, with Oliver equipment and so forth, which was condemned thirty-five years ago, and which was again condemned by the British Government when the troops reached England. I do not think the Government was a party to that transaction; the trouble was caused through the ignorance of the persons who were in charge of the administration. Another mistake was made with regard to the spade with the hole in it. $103,000 is too much to pay for a hole. Perhaps spades were trumps.

The CHAIRMAN: We are now dealing with subclause 5A of section 1.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I am perfectly in order. I am speaking to the principle of the Bill.

The CHAIRMAN: The principle has already been agreed to.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: The honourable gentleman can give his reasons for opposing the first clause.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Certainly. I think the honourable leader of the Government appreciates the point I am making. I am not attacking the Government; I am simply offering suggestions. These things should be guarded against in the interests of the public purse. Probably a little later on we shall have the direction of affairs, and we should say what we would do. We are merely speaking now of what they are going to do and of what we think they should do. The Government has been endeavouring to do its duty, and probably it did all it could under the circumstances, surrounded as it was by a lot of men wanting appointments. I could name one man drawing $2,000 a year who is not doing a day's work for it at all; but I do not want to attack him; he has a wife and children, and they are nice people. I am glad that he was able to get some benefit with the rest of them; but these things should not occur, and the country will ask those who are here what they think about this legislation. This is a very important Bill. I might point out that the Bill hardly goes far enough. What provision is going to be made with regard to the Militia Act in Canada? Are we to continue under the old régime, or is there going to be a small standing force established, or is there going to be a small staff established for the training of higher officers? The Bill should provide that the overseas Minister of Militia should not be interfered with, and there should not be two jurisdictions with regard to the militia. The fighting forces at the front know what is wanted. The department here is merely a spending department. Parliament votes so much money for the department to spend. Parliament should not put into their hands all the powers of General Currie and others. Those men at the front do not want ideas from here. They want to look to where the head officer of the army is. To-day he is in London. The man that we appoint should be free from all influences, and his ipse dixit should carry.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: My honourable friend has drawn the attention of the Senate to one mistake that was made with regard to the Oliver equipment. Will this Bill provide for such little accidents as happened, for instance, when the first contingent went abroad? I have it on very reliable information that $20,000 worth of Mothersill's seasick remedy was bought for the use of the first contingent. That was a very kind provision, because, unfortunately, we are not all sailors; but there was one slight mistake made. The whole of that $20,000 worth of Mothersill's seasick remedy was put on board one ship. Were the poor fellows on board that ship to consume it all so that the rest would feel the benefit of it? This incident made us the laughing-stock of Europe for quite a time. People inquired right and left: "How is it, when you are kind enough to provide the necessary remedy, that there was not an officer capable of distributing that $20,000 worth of seasick remedy among all the ships?"

Paragraph 5A of section 1 was agreed to.

On paragraph 2 of section 1—duties:

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I think we should have a little explanation on this point from the honourable the leader of the Government. This section says: "Such other duties as have been or may be assigned to him." The inference to be drawn is that the Minister of Militia overseas has no functions, or that he has functions that can be interfered with from here.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If the civil minister is responsible for the military affairs overseas, what is the commander in chief at the front to do?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The commander is not charged with the administration of military affairs.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable senator from Rothesay (Hon. Mr. Domville) was informed that the Overseas Minister would be in charge of military affairs. There is no termination to the words military affairs. The Overseas Minister could countermand or counteract the action of the general at the front. I do not think this Bill is absolutely necessary. I am of the same opinion as the ex-Minister of Militia, that one minister is enough to look after the army, without dividing the responsibility and the authority of the department. I think that Hon. Sir Sam Hughes is perfectly right in his opposition to the Government against the appointment of the Overseas Minister.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: He has done good work.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Division of authority of this kind can only lead to results that will be beneficial neither to the country nor to the army, neither to the soldiers at the front nor to those in the hospitals. Who is the soldier to obey? Is it the minister? Is it the Minister Overseas? Is it the general, his commanding officer? You are putting the poor soldier in a dilemma from which he will not be able to escape. He will get instructions from one department and get different instructions from another —all under the same Government. Of course, any discussion which takes place here will not affect the nature of the Bill or any of its terms. We know that; but it is well that the people of Canada should know that views different from those of the Government exist, and exist in the army—in the camps and on the firing line. It is well that the soldiers who are fighting the battles of Canada; and on behalf of the Empire and the Allies, should know that they have friends here in Canada, both in and out of Parliament, who will stand by their views with regard to this matter.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I do not think the leader of the Government understood my point. Perhaps I did not make myself sufficiently clear. In England the War Office used to rule. Now it is the Secretary of State for War and not the War Office. The Secretary of War has charge of the Army. Up to a certain date, I think 1860, the army was called the King's Army, and it was all run from the Horse Guards; then it was removed from the King, and the responsibility for administration and everything else connected with the War Office was placed on the Secretary of State for War, as representing the people. He held his position and performed his functions by right of the people, and not under the Crown or by virtue of the organization of the Horse Guards. They were stripped of all their powers except that of carrying out the details of munitions, horse equipment, uniform, and matters of that kind. They had their expert boards of various kinds,—for munitions of war, for projectiles, etc.—and they were held responsible for those matters; but the administration of the affairs of the Army was not in their hands but was given to the Secretary of State for War. Now, the Secretary of State for War—which the minister really is—will, under this proposed Act, be in England. Let me take up the thread of the remarks made by my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Cloran) just now. Supposing, for argument's sake, that General Currie were called back from the front. He is a splendid general, recently rewarded by the Crown—knighted on the field of battle. It is well recognized what a good man, and what a great soldier he is. Now, suppose he differs with this gentleman in England who is charged with the responsibility for the administration of our military affairs overseas. There is the stickler, in my opinion. How is the overseas minister to interfere with the troops at the front? When the troops go across the water into active service, or into the arena of war, they come under the authority of the Commander in Chief of the British Forces. An officer such as General Currie, we will say, gets an order from the minister to come back home. It might happen. There is at present in the city of St. John an officer who received orders to come back. He fought in South Africa and has his medal, and he went to the front two or three years ago. They have sent him back because they had no place for him overseas, yet those who had not done anything have been left in London in prominent positions. If it is possible, I should like to have this paragraph changed so as to provide that military responsibility could not be assumed by the minister in England as against the authorities at the front, as could be done under this present clause. Does my honourable friend not think so? Why not? Canada has sent overseas a force of 300,000 or 400,000. The soldiers go to the front. The minister in London has a bureau and is administering all the military affairs. He is either absolute or he is not absolute; and that should be defined. I do not at all agree with this subsection.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If I understand correctly the division of authority that has been made with respect to the overseas forces, it is this. There is a general in the field, General Currie.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLLE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: But there is also a general in England, that is, General Turner, who has control of the training of the troops.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: That is correct.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: One does not interfere in the work of the other.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: That is correct; but what I say is that the power of placing or replacing men at the front would be absolute. General Turner is in England looking after all the affairs of the army of Canada in England, but he should not be given the power to bring General Currie back or to remove him. General Currie, as I have stated, has earned his laurels at the front, but under this Bill anybody in charge of the administration in London could bring him back.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, no. Whatever we do is done under the Imperial authorities.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think the only thing that it would be possible to do would be for the overseas minister to make a recommendation to the proper authority in the field, and if the Commander in Chief, Field Marshal Haig, or any other authority there, gives permission, an officer will be allowed to come back, but not otherwise.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I have already cited the case of the St. John man who has been sent back home. I could name him, but that is not necessary. He is a fine officer.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Officers certainly come back, but many of them come back on leave.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: This officer is not on leave. Probably his case will be brought before the House, but I do not intend dealing with it at the present time.

Paragraph 2 of section 1 was agreed to.

Paragraph 3A of section 2—Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like to ask the honourable leader of the Government for some explanation about this. I do not think we had much explanation when we were discussing this Bill on the second reading, as to why it was necessary to make this appointment to the Department of External Affairs. We can quite understand that there has been a great deal of work in connection with the Militia Department, and it was probably necessary to make the appointment of Parliamentary Secretary in connection with that department; but we are not aware of any great amount of extra work in connection with the Department of External Affairs, which would render necessary the appointment of a Parliamentary Under-Secretary. In another place a good deal of criticism was raised as to this appointment, and some reflection was cast upon the way in which the gentleman who has been appointed to the position was fulfilling his duties. I think it would be of interest if the honourable leader of the Government would give for the information of this honourable House some explanation with regard to this matter.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should be very glad to give my honourable friend the information. If there is in the Dominion of Canada any public man to whom my honourable friend can point who has more to do than the Prime Minister, I certainly am unaware of any such person. The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, as my honourable friend very well knows, is being appointed to assist the Prime Minister, who fills the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I do not think that any honourable gentleman in this House will hesitate for a moment in conceding that no man is busier than the Prime Minister, no man has more to do or greater responsibilities on his shoulders. The Prime Minister is engaged practically from early morning until midnight in the transaction of the public affairs of this country, particularly at this most crucial of all times.

The Honourable Hugh Clark has been appointed to the position of Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. Mr. Clark is a man who has been well and favourably known in Canada for many years. He has been one of the leading journalists of the Dominion and occupies a very prominent position in his profession, of which he is an ornament. Certain reflections have been cast upon Colonel Clark in the other place, to which my honourable friend refers. They have been foundationless; they are simply a tissue of fabrications. No one has assumed the responsibility of charging Colonel Clark with any of the allegations with which his name has been associated, of preparing political literature, etc. If Hon. Mr. Clark as a journalist should choose to write an article for his paper, who is going to object to that? I venture to say that no man in this House is kept busier than that same gentleman in performing the public duties which are assigned to that particular office which he is filling so well.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Will the honourable gentleman kindly explain to me, for I do not quite understand, what paragraph 3A, respecting the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, has to do with the Militia Department?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This Bill deals with other matters than militia matters; it is not made exclusively applicable to the Militia Department or to militia affairs. This paragraph deals with the creation of an office to be known as the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: But why should not that come under the Representation Act? Why bring it in here? You might just as well bring in all sorts of offices. My honourable friend may smile. He does not approve of this any more than I do, but he has no explanation to give, and cannot give any such explanation as I ask for. I see his difficulty; I recognize it.

Paragraph 3A of section 2 was agreed to.

On section 3—salaries:

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: A salary of $7,000 per annum is a very small one for a minister of the Crown, responsible to the Crown and responsible to the public. The officer in St. John to whom I have referred can walk about the streets of that city, and is drawing nearly $7,000, and has no such responsibilities. Why should not a minister of the Crown have a larger salary than that? I object to that clause.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This is the sum which is paid to all other ministers of the Crown.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I know that, but I say that $7,000 is not a respectable sum to be paid to a man representing Canada overseas. There is where the trouble comes in; a man in that position has to meet a great deal of expense, and unless he is a millionaire and can pay the expense out of his own pocket he has great temptations. I believe that the Minister Overseas should have $25,000—or at least $10,000 or $12,000. The officer at St. John is drawing $7,000 or $8,000, is doing nothing, and is responsible to nobody. Just compare the two cases. My honourable friend sees that I am right. Have we not the power to make that $10,000?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This House has no authority to do so.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The St. John man could not be reached by this Act.

Section 3 was agreed to.

On section 5—salaries to be paid from first appointment:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think there is a clerical error in that section; it refers to the "salaries prescribed by section one of this Act." I think that ought to be "salaries prescribed by section three."

Hon. Mr. POWER: There is no salary prescribed by section one.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I want to express my surprise that the Government should propose such a clause, exempting two ministers from going to the people for re-election, when there is so little need for such legislation, which violates the general principle. Here we are on the threshold of a general election. It seems to me that this measure could well have been laid aside, and the ministers could have awaited the general election to seek the endorsation of the people.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Inasmuch as they are appointed for the duration of the war, and the offices expire at the end of the session of Parliament next after the termination of the war, and, furthermore, inasmuch as a similar thing has been done in England, surely there is justification for doing this in Canada.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course I know the present conditions are abnormal, but there would seem to be hardly any necessity for violating the general principle when a general election is in sight.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I suppose these gentlemen are not going to the country to be elected. Of course, Sir George Perley will have to be elected.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes. We are simply legislating as to the office.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: It seems to me that the Bill might perhaps go further.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Sir George Perley is going to continue to be the Overseas Minister until six months after the war. It does not matter what may happen in the meantime. The present Government may go out of power.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will find that in section 1 provision is made for the appointment of a Minister of the Overseas Military Forces. Then, it is provided that this office shall continue, not that the incumbents shall continue in office. There may be half-a-dozen different persons who will occupy that office.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Unless he dies, he would continue in office.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: The Bill says that he shall hold office during pleasure. Supposing he does not resign, has the next Government got to put him out? They will have to do something.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: This is what comes of departing from the true British principle of representative Government.

Hon. Mr. POWER: If there is a general election and the present Government is defeated, the Overseas Minister of Militia will go out with his colleagues.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course he will.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I notice that this clause says:

> The several persons holding the said offices shall each be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada the several salaries prescribed by section 1 of this Act for the several periods during which they have, respectively, held the said offices, and the salaries for the said offices shall be paid from the following dates.

And so on. This clause is retroactive. In one case it will go back to the 31st of October, 1916. I think it was stated by Mr. McCurdy in the other House that he had no intention of accepting any salary—that when he was appointed he was quite ready to take the position and do the work, but that he did not desire any salary. I do not see any reason why the matter should be put in this way in the Bill. If Mr. McCurdy is not going to take the salary, why should the provisions be made retroactive to the time he was appointed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not know whether he is going to take it or not. The Bill simply makes provision for the salary from the time the office was created. If any of the incumbents refuse the salary, the country is so much ahead, that is all.

The section was agreed to.

The Bill was reported.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT (NON-GAINFUL CORPORATIONS) BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into Committee on Bill U2, an Act to amend the Companies Act so as to provide for the incorporation by Letters Patent of Corporations for purposes other than that of gain. Hon. Mr. Thompson in the Chair.

On section 4—New Form C, notice of incorporation:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Form C stood yesterday, I think because my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) seemed to have the impression that Form C should be made applicable solely to companies without gain, such as patriotic associations, charitable associations, and so on. It will be observed that Form C is applicable both to the class of companies that we have made provision for and to the old class of companies, and there is no reason why it should not be adapted to either.

The section was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER: There was another amendment which I suggested, which I think the honourable gentleman was prepared to consider. It would go in after subclause 5 of section 2. It provides for the examination of the books of the company:

> The Secretary of State may, on the application of not less than one-fifth in number of the persons on the corporation's register of members, or of his own motion, appoint one or more competent inspectors to inquire into the affairs of the corporation, and to report thereon in such manner as he may direct.

It will be remembered that the honourable gentleman from Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule) called attention to the fact that irregularities did sometimes occur.

The proposed amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I should like to point out to the honourable the leader of the House that, if this schedule is adopted in the form in which we have it, it may lead to some question as to the schedule of the original Act. Section 4 of the Bill says that "Form C in the schedule to the said Act is hereby repealed and the following is substituted therefor."

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Form C contemplates some corporation with capital stock, whereas there is no provision in the Bill for such corporation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will see that by section 3:

> Notice of the granting of the letters patent shall be forthwith given by the Secretary of State of Canada by one insertion in the Canada Gazette.

The Secretary of State gives this notice to the public.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Should not Form C be changed to make it correspond with the name of the Bill, or should not the name of the Bill be changed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Secretary of State simply gives this notice to the public and he frames it according to the conditions.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Suppose it were a company for the purpose of gain?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then he would adapt it to that. This goes into the Companies Act.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Subsection 5 of section 2 provides only for companies incorporated by Act of the Parliament of Canada. I think it would be better to enlarge that section in order to permit companies incorporated by provincial legislation, and desiring to extend their operations into more than one province, to be incorporated under this Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not quite follow my honourable friend. A corporation to which letters patent are issued under this Bill will have power to operate throughout the country.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Take a corporation of that nature incorporated under letters patent of a province. A corporation of that kind, although it desired to extend its operations beyond one province into one or two or three other provinces, or the whole Dominion, could not claim the benefit of this Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would not my honourable friend think that a provincial corporation that wanted to extend its operations would at once make application to come under this Act?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: What I am pointing out is that it could not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The clause could be made to read, "any corporation" without making any reference to the Parliament of Canada.

Subsection 5 of section 2 was reconsidered.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE moved:

That after the words "Act of the Parliament of Canada" the following words be added:

"Or under provincial authority, but whose operation extends to more than one province for any of the objects mentioned in this section."

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Honourable gentlemen, this seems to me to be introducing a principle which in the past has caused a great deal of controversy and trouble in the House of Commons, with regard to bringing provincial Acts under federal authority. In many of the provincial Acts there are provisions which are applicable only to the requirements of the province, and if they are divorced from the original intention and given federal authority, instead of being repealed, they will not accord with the provincial law. For instance, in connection with some of our Railway Acts we have had a great deal of difficulty in this respect. I remember distinctly discussing the Joint Stock Companies Act some years ago, when it was intended to amend it considerably so as to make it workable. One of the provisions of the Bill was similar to this, and it was found rather difficult to deal with. I am very much afraid that if we introduce the principle here, it may be found in the future that some provincial Acts of incorporation have been extended under the provisions of this law so as to come under federal authority, and that by that means we have done away with the control which it was intended in the first instance, by the provincial Act, that the province should have.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The answer to that is that if a provincial company seeks incorporation under this Act and if the provincial incorporation contains provisions entirely inconsistent with the provisions or powers of the Dominion Act, the corporation will have to renounce those provisions. In other words, the provincial corporation gets incorporation under the Dominion Act only within the powers or limitations of the Dominion Act, and if there is any inconsistency it will have to give them up. I mean that because provincial corporation may apply under this new Act for incorporation it does not follow that it will get from the Dominion all the powers that it got from the province.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It could get them anyway by applying for them under this Act.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: The company incorporated will come under federal authority, and there are provisions in the Bill which require that reference shall be made to some authority in the province to determine the rights of the incorporators. Which will govern on the carrying out of the provisions of the incorporation, the provincial or the federal authority? If regard is had only to the federal authority, then the provincial law may be violated. That is just the trouble that arose over and over again in connection with the railway laws. The question was whether to apply to the provincial Board of Commissioners or to the Federal Board of Commissioners, and it was found that you could not make the law workable without a violation of either the federal or the provincial law. Therefore it seems to me that it is important to look very carefully into this matter before we commit ourselves to the extent of giving the right which is proposed. A corporation wants to extend its operations from Ontario to Quebec, and it makes application without any regard to the provincial rights, and when it commences to operate under that new authority, it finds itself in conflict with the provincial law.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I appreciate the suggestion of my honourable friend, and I realize that if the principle which I have suggested is to be introduced, the wording should be such that provision shall be made for the surrendering of the provincial charter. I suggest that the clause be left unchanged. I withdraw and reserve my proposed amendment. I may make a motion on the third reading of the Bill.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think it is ultra vires as it is worded at present.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The difficulty referred to by my honourable friend from East Grey (Hon. Mr. Sproule) is not the difficulty to which my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) refers. The difficulty which my honourable friend from East Grey has in mind is that by applying for incorporation under this Act, provincial corporations might withdraw themselves from limitations or obligations under which they are bound by provincial legislation. I think that is the difficulty which my honourable friend desires to overcome, and I think there is a great deal in his contention after all, because some companies might seek this means of relieving themselves of the burdens to which they are subject by provincial legislation. There is very serious objection to that.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: A provincial company cannot apply for incorporation under that section unless the legislature of the province has first authorized it to do so.

The proposed amendment was withdrawn, and subsection 5 of section 2 was agreed to

The Bill was reported, with amendments.

NORTHWEST GAME BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The Senate again went into committee on Bill 100, an Act respecting Game in the Northwest Territories of Canada.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed. Hon. Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yesterday we passed all the sections of this Bill with the exception of paragraph a of section 4. An amendment was moved by the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power), which I was to consider. By the amendment it is proposed that the following be substituted for paragraph (a) of section 4:

(a) Moose, deer and mountain goat between the first day of April and the first day of September;

(b) Caribou and mountain sheep between the first day of April and the first day of August, and between the first day of October and the first day of December.

I move that amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Perhaps I may be allowed just briefly to explain to the Committee why the caribou and mountain sheep are put on a different footing from the other animals. It appears that the skins of these two animals are very much used by the Eskimo, and, I think, by the Indians, for purposes of clothing, etc., and those skins have to be got during the comparatively warm weather; and, in order to meet the wishes of the Eskimos and Indians, this little change has been made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Bill was reported with amendments.

INCOME WAR TAX BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 117, an Act to authorize the levying of a War Tax upon certain incomes.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, this Bill proposes to levy a tax upon incomes, exempting in the first place all incomes not exceeding $1,500 in the case of unmarried persons, and widows or widowers without dependent children, and not exceeding $3,000 in the case of all other persons. Upon incomes beyond the two classes mentioned four per cent will be imposed, with a super-tax in an ascending scale upon incomes that are classified, likewise in an ascending scale: for instance, over $6,000 to $10,000, a super-tax of two per cent; over $10,000 to $20,000, five per cent; over $20,000 to $30,000, eight per cent; over $30,000 to $50,000, 10 per cent; over $50,000 to $100,000, 15 per cent; and over $100,000, 25 per cent.

I need scarcely say that this Bill has not been introduced as the result of a general demand upon the Government to adopt this form of taxation. Almost invariably we find the community divided into two sections in respect of taxation, namely, the section that seeks to impose the tax upon the other, and the section that seeks in turn to distribute it as much as possible upon the more dominant section. This tax is unquestionably the outcome of public opinion as represented by the most numerous class of citizens—a class which in all probability will have to contribute very little to the taxation provided for in the Bill. Under representative institutions this is the natural consequence—and very properly so—of the right which the majority has to govern the minority. The Government of Canada, although from time to time for a great number of years, more or less importuned to adopt a system of income taxation, has succeeded up to the present time in avoiding the assumption of that responsibility.

I suppose there is no form of taxation more unpopular than that of an income tax, and for various reasons. In the first place, tradition has for centuries past established sources of taxation by which incomes to a very large extent have succeeded in escaping the burden of taxation which should be placed upon them. Tradition has established, by some means or other—it is difficult to understand why—that most of the taxation, particularly for local purposes, should be placed upon land. The unpopularity of an income tax rests very largely also upon the fact that it affects the individual more directly than any other class of tax. It is a direct tax that is imposed upon him; it involves an extended inquiry into his personal affairs; and it seeks to detach from his personal fortune the amount of the tax which is imposed upon him. He looks upon it rather as a personal contribution than as a contribution which is properly made as a share of the burden of the State.

I doubt if there is any tax that is logically so defensible as an income tax. Incomes may be divided into four classes, which have to be considered in connection with such a tax. In the first place, there is the income which falls below the amount that is taxable—the income of those who come under the exemption, and very properly so. If the income of a citizen be only sufficient to provide the necessities or even the ordinary comforts of life, it would be unreasonable for the State to ask that the citizen limited to such an income should contribute to the burdens of the State, when there are incomes sufficiently far in advance of the amount of which he is in receipt to very well bear the incidence of taxation.

We then come to the first income that is available for such a tax, namely, the income that will furnish the citizen with the necessities and comforts of life, and yet leave a surplus. There is no reason why such an income should not bear the burden of public taxation. Then there is the income that is so large as to permit of a man living in extravagance or maintaining such a degree of luxury as is incompatible with good citizenship. In this age of democracy, when the theory that all men are equal prevails, I think the state should not hesitate to impress upon incomes of the kind which I have just described the burden of the state to such an extent as the state may consider that they should contribute. There is still another class of incomes that are so large as to render it impossible under extreme conditions to spend the interest which annually becomes capital. The public are most willing that those who are so fortunate as to possess incomes of the last two classes should contribute to any extent. The sympathy of the public is undoubtedly with the man whose income will not permit of its being taxed to any extent, but immediately the income goes beyond that point the receiver of the income loses the sympathy of the public in proportion to the largeness of the income.

It seems to me that we are living in an age when the state can very well say that those who are in receipt of very large incomes are more or less partners with the state, and that the state is entitled to participate in the profits on those incomes. All the institutions of government are so established as to be for the advantage and benefit of the public to a greater extent than has ever existed before, and the larger incomes must contribute, in the degree to which they are possessed by the owners, to the maintenance of those institutions which the state is called upon to maintain under the peculiar conditions of the twentieth century. The very institutions that have to be maintained by the state for the protection of life and property, for peace and good government, are all necessary not only to the building up of incomes, but to their enjoyment. If by reason of the maintenance of law, order and good government those incomes are built up and property is protected, there is no reason why the state should not logically say: "We are entitled to participate in the profits which you have made from your various investments or the various businesses in which you are engaged. I think the principle must be recognized at once that there is no class of property in the state that should be made so available for taxation as incomes.

Take, for instance, the other classes of property upon which we levy taxation. The municipalities and provincial governments levy the great bulk of their taxes on real estate. There is no evidence prima facie that the property in question can pay the tax without feeling it severely, or without the owner suffering possibly to an extent which will be embarrassing. We levy a tax indiscriminately on property which possibly may not be self-supporting. We levy by indirect methods a tax upon products, a tax upon imports. It may be that those products and imports cannot readily pay the tax which is imposed upon them, and it may be found upon investigation that such is the case. It is unquestionably clear that income is profit. It can be readily ascertained whether a man has an income beyond that which he really needs to live upon. There is no class of property upon which a tax can be levied with the same degree of certainty as to the incidence falling equitably upon the property, as that of income. Up to the present time the Government has been able to raise sufficient revenue without having recourse to this particular form of taxation.

It is needless to say that this is a war measure; but having originated as a war measure I am not prepared to say that such a system of taxation will not continue. The older countries of Europe, and the United States, have reached the point when they have adopted the income tax as practically a permanent system of taxation. It may be so in Canada. I simply mention that fact to indicate the reason why the Government has reached the point when it is considered necessary to augment the revenues of the country by this particular system of taxation.

I need not go into the details of the Bill. Of necessity it is a complex Bill.

Hon Mr. THOMPSON: Is it a money Bill?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That may be susceptible of discussion and argument.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: We cannot amend it, I suppose.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There is no question whatsoever that it is a money Bill, but to what extent we may consider the Bill it will be for the Senate to determine.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That does not imply that we shall not be able to examine it in committee.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should be very sorry to take any such extreme ground as to say that the members of the Senate could not make suggestions as to how the Bill might be improved.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I suppose that in the last analysis we would have to give way to the Commons; but until we reach that point the views of the Senate should be welcomed.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: If the Commons do not accept our suggestions we can throw out the whole Bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED: It is not to be whispered, but the House of Commons is but a fallible body. It is possible that they have not exhausted all the intelligence that may be concentrated in this House; but, as my honourable friend has observed, it is the right of the Senate to consider even a money Bill, and to reject it if it is not approved of. However, I have no doubt that the Commons will be only too glad to give every consideration to any improvements which the Senate may be able to suggest.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the disquisition of the leader of the Government on the question of income tax. I noticed that he dealt with it in the same manner in which it has always been dealt with by members of governments, especially Finance Ministers. I think on no occasion has the system of income tax been first introduced into any House except as a war measure; but it has been found to be such a convenient and useful tax that no Government, as far as I know, has ever been prepared to abolish the tax once it has been established. I have always felt that direct taxation was a better method than indirect taxation. When people pay taxes directly they realize that they are paying the money out for taxes, and they are apt to take a very much greater interest in the way in which the money is expended, and to watch more carefully the details of the expenditure on the part of the Government. I think that will be one very good effect which will be derived in this country from the imposition of an income tax. It will bring home the fact that the people have to pay taxes directly for the purpose of providing for the expenditure—I may say the very heavy expenditure—under which we are placed at the present time. They will therefore hold whatever Government is in power more closely to account for the expenditure of the money that is coming into their hands.

The honourable leader of the Government has referred to four different classes of incomes. Figures were given in another place showing the way in which this tax would apply to certain incomes. I do not purpose going into those figures; but I want to draw attention to the fact that as the tax increases, although in reading the Bill it looks to be a large increase, the effect on the individual is not as great as I think it possibly might be. When a tax of $40 is deducted from a small income, as it would be in the case of an income of $4,000, it may mean a great deal more to the man in receipt of that income than it would mean to take $5,260 from an income of $50,000. A man who is living on an income of $4,000 a year probably has to watch very carefully to see that he makes both ends meet; but the man who has an income of $50,000 a year or over can easily afford to pay a tax of $5,260. If any criticism is to be made of this Bill, I think it would be that the higher incomes could bear a heavier tax than they are called upon to bear under the Bill.

My honourable friend did not say how the amount of income was to be arrived at. He spoke of income generally; but there is such a thing as gross income and net income. Probably when we get to the committee stage we can take that question up, and the leader of the Government may be able to tell us exactly what is meant. Other governments have found it advisable to deal with the question by dividing incomes into two parts: that which a man earns by his profession or his work, and that which a man receives from his investments and securities. Very often a difference is made in the amount of the tax that a man is called upon to pay, depending upon whether his income is derived entirely from his profession or business, or salary, or whether it is derived from interest which he receives on stocks, bonds, shares, or rent. That is done in England, and I think in other countries also. I think such a provision would be a very good one, because we have to consider that the income derived by a man from his profession or his business is very largely dependent upon the man himself, his capability for carrying on his profession or business, his general health, and other things that enter into his general life. I think it is usually recognized that a man in that position should be so placed that he can afford to put away a certain amount in case of accident or any trouble that may occur to him, and that it is not fair to levy as high a tax on that class of income as is levied upon an income derived from interest on stocks or shares, rents, or other fixed returns.

A question was raised as to people being deterred from coming to this country. I do not fear anything of that kind, because I think people generally, especially immigrants coming to this country from European countries, are so accustomed to a tax of this kind that it would not in any way affect their decision to come to Canada to make their living.

As I said before, I think that direct taxation appeals very largely to people who understand the incidence of it. They recognize that they know better what the Government is deriving by direct taxation from the people, and they watch more carefully the way the money is expended. The only point that I desire to make is that I think it would have been wiser on the part of the Government if they had instituted this income tax before. When the war started the Government seemed to consider that it was better to raise the duties, and thus increase the revenues which they received by indirect taxation. I think it would have been better for the country if they had made up their minds to introduce an income tax rather than increase the duties on imported goods.

There will be, I think, when we reach the committee stage of the Bill, several matters which we shall want to discuss, and I am glad to know that my honourable friend realizes that we have every right to make, at any rate, suggestions to the House of Commons as to the way that the Bill may be amended.

Hon. R. DANDURAND: Honourable gentlemen, I should like to add a few words to what has already been said in commendation of the general principle of income taxation. We are all agreed that it is a fairer taxation than the indirect taxation which is drawn from customs. It is fairer because the load is carried by those who are best able to bear it, and in proportion to their strength or their capacity.

One of the objections that I see to this Bill is that it does not sufficiently differentiate amongst the persons in each of the classes up to a certain amount, say up to $20,000.

I have not examined closely the various income taxes imposed in different countries throughout the world; but I had occasion to see the income law of the French Republic, and in it I noticed that there are five or six columns wherein appear the charges which are imposed upon the taxpayers. If the taxpayer is single, he appears in the first column and bears the whole load. If he is married, a small deduction is made. If he has one child, again a deduction is made; and there are proportionate reductions in the case of two, three, four, five and six children. It stands to reason that a person with an income of $7,000, $8,000 or $10,000 a year, and who has no children, can better afford to pay the tax than one who has five or six children to take care of and educate; and I regret that this legislation does not take into consideration the charges which the heads of families are obliged to meet.

In that respect, I suppose, we are powerless. The question has been raised in the House of Commons and the Minister of Finance has decided against it. I doubt that even the unanimous recommendation of the Senate would induce the House of Commons to reconsider this legislation. If they will not do so this year, they may be induced perhaps, if we touch upon that point, to review this legislation after the war, when it is bound to be examined anew, under the normal conditions which will then prevail.

There is one other remark which I should like to make, and it bears upon the interpretation to be given to the word "income." In section 3 an interpretation is given to the word:

> For the purposes of this Act, "income" means the annual profit or gain or gratuity, whether ascertained and capable of computation as being wages, salary, or other fixed amount, or unascertained as being fees or emoluments, or as being profits from a trade or commercial or financial or other business or calling, directly or indirectly received by a person from any office or employment, or from any profession or calling, or from any trade, manufacture or business, as the case may be; and shall include the interest, dividends or profits directly or indirectly received from money at interest upon any security or without security, or from stocks, or from any other investment, and, whether such gains or profits are divided or distributed or not, and also the annual profit or gain from any other source; with the following exemptions and deductions.

And the exemptions and deductions follow. At first sight it seems clear that income should be interpreted as being the net income. I am sorry that the word "net" is not in the clause, and I would suggest to my honourable friend to see if the interpretation should not be made somewhat clearer and if the opinion should not be expressed by this House that it is the net income that will be taxed and that the word "net" should be inserted in this section. I confess that, in reading the Act through, I have come to the conclusion that there would be considerable divergence of opinion by the tribunals that will have to pass upon it in deciding what is taxable, that is, the net income of the individual, and what is exempted. I am not speaking of those things which are specially exempted, but of what should go in the column of liabilities against the gross income of the contributor. I was all the more nonplussed as to the decisions that would be rendered upon the interpretation of this clause when I read the explanations given by the honourable the Minister of Finance, who was responsible for the carrying out of this Bill. He stated that a party owning built property, in stating his income, could charge against the rentals received the interest on mortgages, the taxes, insurance and repairs; but when the minister was asked if from the income of a person holding building lots, mortgages, and upon which taxes would have to be paid—unproductive property—these charges should be deducted, he answered in the negative. He cited the case of a person in Toronto or Ottawa drawing a salary of $5,000 or $10,000 and having real estate in the Northwest which would bring no income, but on which he would be called upon to pay $2,000 or $3,000 a year in taxes. The minister was of opinion that in that instance that $2,000 or $3,000 which he would have to pay upon that unproductive real estate should not be deducted from his ordinary income. Members of the House of Commons, on both sides, took issue with the honourable the Minister of Finance as to the interpretation placed upon the clause. I think that most members of this House will take exception to that interpretation. Of course, it will not be what we shall say, nor what has been said in the Commons, that will constitute the law; the law will be found within the four corners of this Act; yet when we see the head of the department charged with the administration of this Act giving such an extraordinary interpretation as to what is an individual's income, it seems that we need to go closely into this measure and scrutinize it and try to make it so clear that there shall be the minimum of dispute before the ordinary tribunals; and if we are all agreed that in the last analysis a person will be made to pay taxes only upon what is his net income, it seems to me that it is our duty to make that point clear. If a person has an income, from divers sources, of $10,000, $15,000 or $20,000, but happens to have against that income liabilities which eat up half or two-thirds of it, surely the State will not tax him upon his liabilities—for it would be tantamount to that. The State, it seems, will tax him only upon the residue—the net income which has been at his disposal during the year. I make these general remarks because it seems to me that the Act will be sufficiently difficult in its application at the outset without clouding the principle which underlies the whole Bill, that of the interpretation of the word "income."

Hon. Wm. ROCHE: The honourable leader of the Government has given us an explanation of political economy, expressing his favour of income tax, and the honourable the leader of the Opposition has also expressed himself as being enamoured of an income tax. Both these gentlemen should remember that it is not an alternative, or choice, but we have all the other taxes already, and this income tax is a surplusage—an additional tax which will not be abandoned with the termination of the war. I am not going into the details of the Bill, because I do not understand them altogether; but I would ask the minister who leads this honourable House if he will kindly tell us whether or not the principle of duality runs through this Bill. I give one or two instances which I think might occur under the operation of the Act. Suppose, for instance, an individual pays a business tax. Would he be liable under this Act to be taxed on all the profit that is derived from that business, when it is his income? Again, take the case of a partnership which has to pay a business tax, and the several partners in which have in addition to pay this income tax on that which has already been taxed. Then again, in the case of a company which has paid a tax on business profits, would each of the partners or shareholders in the company be liable to be taxed on his individual income, when his income had already been taxed in the co-partnership tax? Then, again, there would be the case of a bank. A bank pays a large amount of business profits tax; it has also made contributions to all the funds. It was not the bank that did it; the bank is no entity; it was the shareholders' money that paid these taxes. Now, will each shareholder who has a sufficient income under this Bill be liable to pay a second time on his income? The tax upon his income has really been paid by the bank in its corporate form. The principle of duality apparently runs through this Bill. I would like to understand it better. An explanation would throw light upon all the clauses of this Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I agree with the opinion which has been expressed as to the equity, in principle, of the income tax. It is a principle which has been applied all over Europe, and which was sure to be applied to this country sooner or later. But I must express my regret that it has, of necessity, come to Canada so soon; and I do so now because I entertain very grave apprehensions that it may be fatal to the future of this country. It is quite true, as was stated by the honourable leader of the Opposition, that European countries will be so burdened that their people will not find much difference between Canada and their own countries if they choose to emigrate; but the difference might tell against Canada in another respect. Of course, it must be borne in mind that Canada is a large country, and undeveloped, and will require a great deal of capital for its development, and we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the income tax, heavy as it will be, will be a great objection and will to a very large extent deter capital from being imported into this country. This disadvantage will be aggravated, I am afraid, by the fact that we are alongside a very prosperous and rich country, the United States. The United States, it is true, have gone into the war, but they have great national wealth, and they are taking the means of paying the cost of the war within a very short period. They propose, if I am correctly informed, to levy at once an income tax amounting to as much as $1,500,000,000. The United States Steel Corporation will pay very nearly $200,000,000 this year as income tax or business tax. The exact figure is said to be over $197,000,000 for that one corporation alone, and there are a number of other corporations which will pay $100,000,000 or more. I am quite satisfied that within two or three years after the war is ended the United States will have no income tax, while Canada, alongside that country, will be, of necessity, loaded with a large income tax.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Our income tax will be reduced after the war.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I do not know.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It will take a long time to reduce it.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am afraid that at the rate at which we are going it will not be reduced for a long term of years. I am afraid that it will be a very great obstacle to the development of this country. I quite appreciate, as the honourable leader of the Opposition has stated, the indirect advantage. It will have the effect of stirring up leaders in society. Men of wealth are as a rule men of influence, and they will better realize the necessity of seeing that the country is properly administered and that expenditures are not lavishly made, because they will recognize that they will be called upon to put their hands deeply into their pockets to defray any unnecessary expenditure.

I quite agree with what has been said with regard to some features of this Bill. First, I think the word "income" is not properly defined. The honourable the Minister of Finance admits that it was intended to mean net income. If that is so, it should be clearly stated in the Bill. If it is not so, it would not be fair, because a man may receive an income of $3,000 a year, and outside of his living expenses he may have to pay taxes, interest on mortgages, and other things, amounting in all to very near the total of his income. It would not be fair to tax that man to the same extent as if he had no debts. This is one of the features of the Bill which should be changed.

There is another feature of the Bill upon which I think this House should express its opinion—I refer to the question of a man's family. The Bill goes on the principle that if a man is unmarried he should be satisfied with $1,500 a year free of taxation, and if he is married the amount is increased to $3,000; but no difference is made between a man who is living alone with his wife, having no other dependents, and a man who may have six, seven or ten children. It violates one's sense of justice to accept a principle of that kind. The principle which obtains in France, and I think also in England, should be followed. It is a proper principle. Living is too expensive to say that there shall be no difference made between a man who has five or six or ten children dependent upon him and a man who has no person dependent upon him but his wife.

There are other features of the Bill which will have to be looked into. I refer particularly to subsections a and b of section 3. I would not go into the details now but for the fact that I may not be able to be present when the Bill is considered in committee. Subsection a excepts "the value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent." On referring to the debate in the House of Commons I find that the Minister of Finance stated that it was not the intention to exempt the income on such properties—that it was the intention to exempt only the capital. If that is the case it should be so stated, because if it is not stated I am very much afraid that the accessory will go with the principal; therefore not only the principal but the income would be exempted, and it would not be fair at all. Take the case of a man who has inherited $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 of property—and we all know of such cases—if the whole of that fortune, or if the income from it were exempted, it surely would not be fair. Subsection b says:

> The proceeds of life insurance policies paid upon the death of the person insured, or payments made or credited to the insured on life insurance endowment or annuity contracts upon the maturity of the term mentioned in the contract or upon the surrender of the contract.

If that provision were to remain in the Bill it would be very easy for a man to transform his income into an annuity. He would pay a large sum possibly, but in consideration of the amount which he would thus pay he would get a yearly amount of $10,000, or $15,000, or $20,000, or $100,000, and under this clause of the Bill that amount would be exempt from taxation. Surely that is not the intention of the Bill. It would be opening the widest door for the evasion of this law. It is true that the question was raised in the House of Commons, but they seem to have acquiesced in the opinion of the Minister of Finance. I do not see that any vote was taken. The opinion of the Minister of Finance was not challenged.

These are some of the reasons why we should urge our views upon the House of Commons as strongly as we possibly can. I hope the House of Commons will take these reasons into serious consideration and accept the suggestions made by this honourable House.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Before entering into a discussion on this Bill, I should like to ask the honourable the leader of the Government if this is a money Bill?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Therefore no amendment can be made to the Bill; therefore no discussion is necessary. If I understand the matter correctly, even the leader of the Government here, in his wisdom—and he has a good deal of it—if he wanted to make an amendment to the Bill could not do so. He would be powerless. That is the understanding, is it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: He would get the Government to change it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The leader of the Government in this House is no more capable of making an amendment to this Bill than any other honourable gentleman. He cannot amend his own Bill. Then, what is the use of discussing it? If the honourable the leader of the Government tells me that he can make an amendment to the Bill and that I can follow suit, then I shall be prepared to enter into a discussion upon it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not propose to make any amendments.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Would the honourable gentleman have the power to do so?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: When we go into committee on the Bill it will be for the House to deal with it in whatsoever way they think best.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What is the use of going into committee on the Bill if the Senate has no right to amend it?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It has the right.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It has the right to make an amendment to a Money Bill? In my experience in this House it has always been laid down that a Money Bill could not be amended. This question has been ruled upon several times from the Chair. If that rule is going to be changed I am quite prepared to accept it. I think it would be better that this Senate should not be here simply to accept what the House of Commons gives us, without discussion, without analysis, without amendment. My experience has been that we might talk night in and night out with no result. I am getting tired of that kind of discussion. If we cannot do something there is no use in wasting our breath and bluffing the country.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Choquette, the debate was adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

CANADIAN OFFICERS IN BRITISH FORCES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK called the attention of the Government to the hardship caused to the officers of the Canadian Expeditionary Force being transferred from the Canadian Service to the British Service without a proper understanding of the terms of transfer being arrived at, and inquired:

1. Can an officer of the Canadian Militia be compelled to transfer from the Canadian to the British service against his will?
2. Can a Canadian officer loaned by Canada to the British War Office be transferred to the British service against his will?
3. Can the separation allowance granted to wives of Canadian officers be taken from them without notice or explanation?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. No.

2. No.

3. Yes; when there are good and sufficient reasons, but such cases are extremely rare.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I desire in this connection to refer to the case of an officer who was a member of the Canadian militia. When the war broke out he took an active part in getting volunteers for his regiment, which was a mounted battalion stationed at Kamloops. The battalion came down to Valcartier with a full complement of 650 men and officers. At Valcartier the battalion was broken up. This officer then went forward to England, and, as I understand, was loaned to the British Government and received an appointment in England. Afterwards he was moved to Egypt and later on to Mesopotamia, where he was wounded. Upon his return to England he was informed by the British Government that he was not entitled to the special allowance made to British officers who had served in the forces in Mesopotamia, inasmuch as he was looked upon as a Canadian officer. Later on, on May 14, 1917, he was informed indirectly that he had been transferred to the British War Office and that the allowance which had been given to his wife in common with the wives of other Canadian officers had been withdrawn without notice either to himself or to his wife. It seems rather a hardship that because he was a Canadian officer he was not entitled to the special allowance made to British officers in Mesopotamia, and in the second place that he was transferred without any definite notice to the British forces, and that his wife was cut off from the allowance which is given to the wives of Canadian officers. I understand that this officer took the matter up before the Imperial Board and was thanked by General Smuts for doing so, as it affected officers belonging to New Zealand, Australian, and South African forces in England, and in consequence materially helped in their success in getting recognition from the British War Office. Therefore I want to bring this matter to the attention of the Government in the hope that they will give some consideraion to it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I shall be glad to attach the remarks of my honourable friend to the inquiry and submit them to the Department of Militia.

THE STEAMER LEEBRO.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

1. What is the annual rental paid by the Department of Marine and Fisheries or the Department of Naval Service for the steamer Leebro?
2. From Whom is this vessel rented?
3. What are the terms of the arrangement?
4. Are the wages and expenses of the crew paid in addition to the rent?
5. How long has the present arrangement been in existence?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. This vessel is under charter to the Department of Marine and Fisheries at $150 per day, for so long as the department shall require her services.

2. The Crescent Shipping Company, Victoria, B.C.

3. The rates referred to are for the steamer all found in supplies of all kinds, and cover the wages of the necessary officers and crew for navigating the boat, also fuel and provisions. The owners have also to keep the vessel in repair at their own expense.

4. No.

5. The Leebro has been chartered by the department from time to time since June 3, 1908, the rate being $135 per day until December 16, 1911, when the department succeeded in getting a reduction of $10 per day. The steamer has been in service from that date until August 1, 1917, at $125 per day, on which date the rate was increased to $150 per day, owing to the increased cost of coal, supplies, wages, etc.

EXPERIMENTAL FARMS AND RETURNED SOLDIERS.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

Hon. GEORGE G. FOSTER rose:

To call the attention of the Senate to Experimental Farms being operated by the Government of Canada, their location, the acreage contained in each farm, the distance from each farm to the nearest post office and the nearest village or city, and the population of such village or city, and the employees kept in connection with each farm.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, in moving for the information which I have requested in connection with the Experimental Farms of Canada, my object is to bring before this House—and before the Government—a question which I believe to be of great importance to this country, to the returned soldiers, and to the usefulness of the Experimental Farms of Canada. I am aware that the members of this body, irrespective of the differences which may divide them on other questions, are united in their desire to meet the obligations which we are under to the men who have served this country and the Empire; and that every honourable member of this House, no matter from what province or part of the country he may come, is determined that Canada shall discharge to the last limit the obligation which she owes to the men who have defended us.

I may say that when I gave notice of this motion, I had not had the opportunity of hearing the remarks of the honourable senator from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Boyer). It was only afterwards that I learned that his mind and mine, so far as this important question is concerned, ran very much along the same line. We have in Canada a system of Experimental Farms which have furnished a large amount of experience and wisdom which is at the disposal of our farmers and which has brought to the country untold wealth. I believe that we can to-day utilize those same institutions in another direction to bring to us still more benefit and profit. I am aware that there is, in the minds of certain people who have spent their lives in cities, whether they have lived in a palace or a hovel, a prejudice against country life, and a dislike for the conditions that exist in the country. But, honourable gentlemen, I am convinced that if we can develop a certain branch of our Experimental Farms in such a way as to introduce into agricultural life men who have been temporarily maimed, men who through illness are unable to exercise the functions which they exercised before the war and are perhaps unable to resume their former occupations, but who with improved health and strength might be able and willing to engage in agriculture, even in a small way; and if this can be done we shall have accomplished a great deal for them and for Canada.

Now, it is not my intention to enter into the details of any plan. It is my desire simply to call the attention of the House to this matter and to ask for the appointment of a committee to consider it. I should like to see associated with each one of those Experimental Farms a building and organization—not a hut, but a comfortable, well regulated institution, in which would be received not men who should be in hospitals, but either men who are unable to engage in any other occupation or men who have indicated a desire to engage in farming and who would have an opportunity to learn there, as they could in no other way. I am aware that there is a disposition on the part of the Government, as has already been announced in the other House, to provide certain places to which these men can go; but that does not meet the idea which I have in my mind. It is not that these men shall be sent to be cared for in an institution simply because it is in the country; it is not that they shall be housed in hospitals where they can be properly attended to, and have nothing to do after they leave the doctors' care except to think of the horrors of the past and perhaps the horrors of the future. It is that they shall be so situated in everyday life that they will have an incentive to go out from one of those great institutions and take part in the development of a farm and have something to do besides thinking of their sad experiences. I believe, honourable gentlemen, that if we could create in one of these institutions a home such as I have described, and place in it some of those men who are to-day suffering in the cities, as all men must suffer who have been engaged in active life and find themselves with nothing to do—if we could take those men to any one of these farms, especially the one that I have in my mind, and make them comfortable and get them interested in the progress and development of that farm, it would be not only better for this country but infinitely better for every man who went into the institution. That being the case, it seems to me that it is our duty and the duty of this Government to consider carefully the question of the utilization of these farms along the line which I have indicated.

There is, honourable gentlemen, another feature to this matter. I hear that the Government are using and will continue to use every effort to develop as far as possible the agricultural industry of this country after the war, and for the benefit of the returned soldiers; but there is an aspect of that project to which I desire to call the attention of this House. My home is in the province of Quebec; and, notwithstanding what anybody may say concerning it, I love the province of Quebec. Loving the province of Quebec, I turn my eyes to the Experimental Farm on the bank of the beautiful river St. Francis at Lennoxville, where I see a chance to create a home for the men, French and English, who have gone from the province of Quebec and fought the battles of this Empire, and have returned partially unable to resume their ordinary work. It is perfectly right for me to say that when our men come back to the Eastern Townships we would prefer to see them located in a home in the Eastern Townships rather than anywhere else in Canada. That is what I have in mind, honourable gentlemen, when I say that we ask the Government to consider carefully the utilization of that institution by establishing in connection with it a home for those of our men especially who were engaged in agriculture before they went to the war, and who when they come back may be unable to return home to take the care and control of a whole farm, but could be useful in aiding in the development of that institution, situated among the hills and mountains of the Eastern Townships, in which they would be happier, enjoy life and regain their health more quickly than in any other spot on earth.

Honourable gentlemen, if I am in order to do so, I would move that a committee composed of two members from each side of this House be appointed for the purpose of investigating this matter—a committee composed of the honourable senator from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique), the honourable senator from Rigaud (Hon. Mr. Boyer), the honourable senator from Bedford (Hon. Mr. Pope), all of whom I know to be interested in agriculture; and I should be honoured to be a member of that committee; and I would suggest that the committee investigate the situation at Lennoxville and consider, with the other members of this House, the further enlargement of the scheme, in order that the idea which I have briefly outlined to you may be carried out. Later other farms can be utilized.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I suppose that this motion will be in sequence to the first motion moved by the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend has asked in his motion for certain information and I have very great pleasure in placing this information upon the Table.

May I permitted at the same time to say that the Chamber is greatly indebted to my honourable friend for directing our attention to the very important subject on which he has so eloquently spoken. While the Dominion Government has given considerable attention to the cultivation and development of our Experimental Farms, and the country has invested a great deal of money in them, yet I am not one of those who believe that everything has been done that the Government can do in connection with public undertakings of this kind. No matter to what extent the Government of the day may devote its attention to developing and perfecting, so far as we possibly can, any system, agricultural or otherwise, that can be greatly assisted by the intelligent consideration of the subject, not only by members of Parliament, but by the public generally. It is therefore something to be appreciated when gentlemen, particularly those occupying public positions, identify themselves with important subjects of this kind for the purpose of improving the systems which we are utilizing. There is no question in my mind as to the Experimental Farm system, adopted by the Government of Canada and pursued so successfully for many years, being one of our great public undertakings, and one of which we may well be proud. Yet it has always been impressed upon my mind that we might make our Experimental Farms very much more practical. There is no good reason, it seems to me, why those farms should not be used in connection with the very important work outlined by my honourable friend from Alma (Hon. Mr. Foster). The war has undoubtedly thrown very great problems upon our hands, problems which will demand our most serious and very best attention for many years to come, problems which revolutionize our preconceived ideas upon many questions affecting public interests. The people of Canada will have to adapt themselves to that general and national readjustment which must necessarily take place after the cessation of the war. It would be of great national interest to the people of Canada if the Experimental Farms, the long list of which I have placed upon the Table to-day in answer to my honourable friend's question, could be utilized for the very important purposes which he has so very well described. If by the use of these farms we can create a love for farming, even an interest on the part of our people to settle upon the land and become engaged in the very important work of agriculture, and to recognize the importance of this not only to themselves but also to the Dominion of Canada, by reason of the increased production, we shall accomplish one of the most important public duties upon which we can enter.

It is a matter of much gratification to this honourable House that so much interest has been taken in the subject of agriculture, not only during the present session, but also during the last session of Parliament. My honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) made a very important move in this direction last session in moving for the appointment of a committee to deal with the many questions which enter into the subject of agriculture. I am satisfied that the investigation which has been made into that important subject will be of great national benefit and will reflect the deep interest taken by the Senate of Canada in the promotion of agriculture. I am very glad to see my honourable friend from Alma (Hon. Mr. Foster) interesting himself in this specific subject. It seems to me that, by concentrating upon some specific subject, by taking up a particular problem and bringing an intelligent interest and attention to bear upon it, we are likely to be more effective than we can be by dealing with subjects generally. My honourable friend has taken hold of a problem which may be worked out with great advantage to the best interests, not only of the returned soldier, but of the people of Canada.

I need not say, what I have said on other occasions, that the Government have fully recognized the seriousness of the questions with which they are called upon to deal in connection with the return of the soldiers after the cessation of the war. Up to the present time they have given serious attention to many questions involved in the solution of this particular problem of dealing with the returned soldiers. The Government are to-day engaged in carrying on vocational training on a very large scale from the Atlantic to the Pacific. They have on their hands approximately 10,000 returned soldiers, all of whom are more or less compelled to take up the question of vocational training. Not only are many of the men applying themselves closely to the new vocations or occupations in which they are interested and which for the balance of their lives they will follow, but their application to a particular branch of study or of industry is giving to many of them the inspiration as to their future in life which, owing to the many calamities of the war, they had to some extent lost. The presentation of the present problem, in addition to the many problems with which the Government has already grappled in this connection, will be a matter of very great interest. This problem is one which must necessarily command the attention of the Government, and I hope some way may be found of meeting the views which have been expressed so ably by my honourable friend from Alma. It is needless to say that the committee for which my honourable friend has moved will have a very important subject to deal with, and I am sure that it will be the desire, not only of the Government, already engaged in this work, but of every honourable member of this House, that this subject shall receive the very best attention and interest at our hands, and that such action may be taken as will result in very great benefit to the men who are concerned.

Hon. T. S. SPROULE: Honourable gentlemen, I regard the proposal made on this occasion as very good, very timely, and very appropriate. The problem is, I presume, one which most people are thinking about to-day: what is the best thing that can be done with the returned soldiers? Those institutions which are providing for vocational training on various lines are undoubtedly proceeding in the right direction, and will absorb a large number of the returned soldiers; but, there are many of the men who left farms and are more familiar with farm life and farm work than with any other line. One of the difficulties with which I apprehend they will be confronted on their return, if they contemplate settling down to agricultural life again, will be the question, where can they settle so as to avoid the lonesomeness of life on the farm and have the advantages of the company and the freedom which they have enjoyed in the last few years, and which have become part and parcel of their life worked into it to such an extent as to have become second nature. The next difficulty with which they will be confronted will be the management of a farm. What makes for the success or failure of farm life? It is the knowledge of how to put in the crop, where to put it in, how to provide for the care of it, when to market it, how to prepare it for the market, and all these things. Now, I foresee in this proposal a very valuable and important suggestion which might be made, and that is, that if a large number of these men were located within a reasonable distance of one of these farms, the employees of the farm could give an oversight to their work and give them instructions from day to day and from week to week on the various problems of farm life on which they would require to be informed, and encourage them to take advantage at the right time of the opportunities offered to them, and which would make for their success or failure in proportion as they attended or did not attend. I think some scheme might be worked out whereby these farm hands could be made very valuable in educating returned soldiers and in keeping them in touch with the operations of the life in which they are engaged. They could give them valuable information and advice with regard to machinery, grains that might be grown, or the lines of agricultural industry which might be followed in their particular locality. They could advise them as to whether dairying, bee-keeping, stock raising, grain raising or any other line would bring the greatest returns to those engaged in it. This would keep their interest centred to such an extent that they would probably solve the farming problem successfully, instead of becoming tired of it and may be becoming absolute failures. I think there would be fifty chances to one in favour of success under this system as compared with what would be the result if returned soldiers were sent individually into Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, or Alberta, and left to settle down by themselves, buy any machinery that they liked and go into any class of farming they chose, without being given proper information. If this problem is not taken hold of, they will become tired of farm life and go back to the cities. If this suggestion were acted upon, these men would be in closer touch with society in their localities and with those things that are of value to them. I regard it as probable that forty-eight out of fifty would be more likely to make a success under this system than five out of a hundred would make if they were sent out to the farms individually therefore it meets with my hearty approval.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: I shall just detain the House for a moment in order to say that the Military Hospitals Commission, of which Hon. Sir James Lougheed is chairman, and which has the care of returned soldiers, is quite in sympathy with the spirit of the motion made by the honourable gentleman from Alma (Hon. Mr. Foster), and is already taking certain steps along that road. Arrangements are about completed with the great agricultural college of Saint Anne de Bellevue, near Montreal. There will be an institution for the care of soldiers coming from that district and elsewhere, and it was located there especially so that they might derive the advantages to be gained from that agricultural college. The Government of Ontario has placed a splendid institution at Guelph at our disposal. It has workshops and immediately adjoins the Guelph Agricultural College. There again the advantages of that college were a very important consideration in deciding us to take advantage of the offer which was made. I am sure that the report of the proposed committee will receive every consideration from hon. Sir James Lougheed and his colleagues.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I wish to congratulate the honourable gentleman who brought up this very important question. When I say that I am a farmer's son, he will understand that I am interested in this question and want to do all that I possibly can to help in this matter. I should like, however, to ask the committee, when they go to these Experimental Farms, not to forget to go to Cap Rouge in Quebec, where there is one of the best farms situated on the shores of the St. Lawrence. It is about 10 miles from Quebec city. I should be glad if they sent as many of these heroes as possible down there, so that they could learn everything in a practical way.

The motion was agreed to.

INCOME WAR TAX BILL.

SECOND READING.

The Senate resumed from August 29 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed for the second reading of Bill 117, an Act to authorize the levying of a War Tax upon certain incomes.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Honourable gentlemen, as this proposed income tax is absolutely necessary to the carrying on of the war. I think the Bill is a good one, because it will place the taxes on the shoulders of those best able to pay them. For myself I am sorry to say that, not being one of that class, I do not expect to be called upon to pay many thousands of dollars in taxes. The people who will be most sorry will be either those who are not able to pay the tax or those who are going to be loaded with taxes. What I most particularly wish to say at the present time is that I think the scale of taxes is most unfair. Take the case of men who come under classes c, d and e of section 4 of the Bill. Class c covers those who have incomes of from $10,000 to $20,000. This classification is most unfair, because one man may have a large family, and another one may have no children at all, but they will have to pay the same amount in taxes. According to this Bill, a man who has an income of say $10,500, and who has five or six children, will have to pay the same amount as a man who has an income of $19,900, and who has no children. It is most unfair; in fact, it is immoral, because it would lead to race suicide in some provinces where the sanctity of marriage is not so well recognized as it is in the province of Quebec. Some people would be inclined not to raise children. It is immoral to put temptation in the way of these people, and the percentage of families who have no children and who have an income of between $10,000 and $20,000 is very large. I call the attention of the Government to this fact. I think it would be well to have some amendment to remedy that condition. Something should be deducted in the case of a man who has a family.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Is it understood that there will be free discussion in committee on this question?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes. I may say that the discussion will probably take place on the details of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I think it is agreed on all hands that this is a money Bill. The object of submitting it to a committee is to amend or alter it. It is the function of the House of Commons to make all grants of money to the King. There is no doubt that this is an aid to the King. Why should we interfere with the undoubted prerogative of the House of Commons? We should be setting a bad precedent which might lead to a conflict with the House of Commons. I think the line is very clearly drawn that the Senate shall not interfere with money Bills either to amend or to negative them. The House of Commons has the right to alter such Bills, but we have no right, and I would oppose the motion to commit the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are only following the usual course adopted with reference to all Bills. If the House is of the same opinion as my honourable friend from Halifax, that we should allow the Bill to go through as it is, I would not object to taking the third reading to-day.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time.

SHIPMENT VIA CANADIAN PORTS.

DISCUSSION CONTINUED.

The Senate resume from August 28 the adjourned debate on the inquiry of Hon. Mr. L'Espérance:

To call to the attention of the Senate to the fact that our tidewater ports are now properly equipped for the storage and speedy handling of grain and other merchandise, and to urge that the exportation of our products by the allied government buyers should be routed through our Canadian ports as far as possible, and to inquire if it is the intention of the Government to take any action to prevent in future the bulk of the export of the oceanic traffic being routed via American ports.

Hon. P. A. CHOQUETTE: Honourable gentlemen, I was unfortunately absent from the House when the honourable gentleman from the Gulf division (Hon. Mr. L'Espérance) brought up this important question of the tidewater ports; but I have read with pleasure and interest, not only the speech of the honourable gentleman himself, but also the remarks made by the seconder of the resolution, the honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls), who spoke a good word for Quebec, the remarks made by the honourable gentleman from De Lanaudière, (Hon. Mr. Casgrain), and those of the honourable gentleman from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards). I am sorry to have to disagree with the statement in the motion of the honourable gentleman from the Gulf division that "the tidewater ports are now properly equipped for the storage and speedy handling of grain and other merchandise," etc. I think this statement is incorrect and is, moreover, misleading. It has misled even the honourable the junior member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Crosby), who said in his address:

The honourable gentleman states that the port of Quebec is now equipped with terminal facilities sufficient for all the export from this Dominion across the Atlantic.

So I say that the remarks made by the honourable gentleman from the Gulf division were not only inaccurate, but very misleading. I have taken the trouble to obtain some information from the Quebec Board of Trade and the Mayor of Quebec in order to correct that statement, so that later on we may not be reproached for having said that we wanted nothing more for the port of Quebec, because we had all that we required. So it is most important at this time to place the facts before this honourable House and show the necessity of improving and continuing to improve not only the port of Quebec but all Canadian ports.

I understand from the remarks made by the mover of the resolution that, in introducing this question, he had two different points of view: first, that of the necessity and importance of the matter; and, secondly, that stated in the following remarks, which he made at the close of the address:

If my feeble words and deeds may contribute in the slightest degree to the realization of this great dream of mine, I shall be amply compensated for the harsh and unjust criticisms which some of my public acts have brought upon my head.

It is hardly necessary to point out that the only excuse for that statement by the honourable gentleman was the vote which he gave in this House recently on the question of conscription; because, from his past declarations, not only in the elections of 1911, but since then, we all know that he was opposed to conscription. Of course, he had the right to change his mind; I have nothing to say against that; but there is no doubt that his change of mind has brought upon him the harsh criticisms of his conduct—which are, I may say, not unjust, but fair. At all events, in order to show my good fellowship towards him, I am quite willing to overlook that and consider only the interest he has in the port of Quebec and his remarks upon that subject, reserving to myself the right to criticise his declaration that our ports are completely equipped for the storage and speedy handling of grain and other merchandise.

Honourable gentlemen, as a matter of fact, the equipment of our ports has only just commenced. At St. John the contract awarded to Norton Griffith has been suspended. At Halifax only one pier out of the six piers which are to constitute the admirable series of ship-docks for that port has been finished; and I see by the remarks of the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Crosby) on this subject that he complained that the work was not completed and slow progress was being made. At Quebec, where the 17 berths of the original Louise docks were found to be insufficient for the traffic prior to the completion of the Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern, only five additional berths are being constructed. They are not yet completed, though they have been under construction for five years. At Montreal the dock and elevator accommodation is continually being congested by the traffic brought there by the canals and by the older railways, which have been in operation for many years. So it may be said that practically no terminals have been completed at our seaports for the two new transcontinental railways, which are now ready to carry the grain of the Northwest to Canadian ports, if only there were at those ports grain storage accommodation and steamship berths to dock the steamers required to transport the grain to Europe. Does this indicate much foresight on the part of the Government? I am not going to make political capital on this point, for I place some little blame on the Liberal Government, which did not do all that could have been done, or even all that was promised. It is true that the Government at that time said they were building the Transcontinental railway and the Quebec bridge, which took a great deal of money; but in preparing for the completion of the Transcontinental and of the Quebec bridge they ought to have seen to the improvement of our ports.

Does it, I ask, indicate much foresight on the part of this Government, who have known for the last six years that the two great transcontinental railways were nearing completion, and that without seaport terminals they are useless for the handling of the grain from the Northwest? Is it not rather a deplorable want of foresight, similar to that shown in failing to provide any rolling stock for operating one of these great railways, upon whose construction more than $150,000,000 of the people's money has been expended? How did the Government expect that railway to be operated without rolling stock?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I would like to ask, is the honourable gentleman quoting some authority, or is he reading his speech?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: These are my notes on the subject of terminals and ports. One cannot be expected to know all about the subject. I wrote to a friend in Quebec, a member of the Board of Trade, and he has given me some information.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The question I am asking, Mr. Speaker and honourable gentleman, is one which I should like to have answered. Is the honourable gentleman reading his own speech, or is he quoting some authority? If he is quoting, let us hear from whom.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am referring to notes which I have made from information obtained from a gentleman who is thoroughly familiar with this subject—much more familiar than my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: The honourable gentleman must know that it is contrary to the rules of this House for any member to read his own speech.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: A member has no right to read his speech, but he has a right to refer to his notes. If he makes a quotation, he must state from whom.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am going to quote the opinions of the Mayor of Quebec and the President of the Board of Trade on this subject.

It is true that we have in Quebec an elevator, completed last year, with a capacity of 1,000,000 bushels, which is now being enlarged, and that elevator has already proved the ability of the new Transcontinental railway to fulfil the purpose for which it was intended, namely, the cheapening of grain transportation, because it has permitted of the loading of six steamships at Quebec with Manitoba grain, brought there by that new, short, well-graded railway, at a freight rate of ten cents per bushel, a freight rate more than three cents per bushel cheaper than the ordinary rail-and-water rate via Fort William to Montreal or New York. And the Acting Minister of Railways has told the House of Commons that this cheap rate has been profitable to the railway, whose level grades permit of handling double the tonnage heretofore hauled.

But, honourable gentlemen, of what use is a million bushel elevator—which may handle at the outside three to five million bushels in a season—to take care of the exports from the West, which last year amounted to nearly three hundred million bushels? Is it any wonder that nearly two-thirds of this quantity went to Buffalo and New York for shipment?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Mr. Speaker, I must rise again to a point of order. I really want to know whether the honourable gentleman is reading his speech or a speech which somebody else has written for him and from which he is quoting. It is needless to point out the rule that a member in making a speech has a perfect right to refer to notes, but he has no right to read the speech. If the honourable gentleman is going to read the speech, we want to know who wrote it, so that we may have some authority for the statements made and may know to whom we are listening. There is no doubt in my mind that the honourable gentleman is reading his speech, and I desire to call the Speaker's attention to this.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: If the honourable gentleman is reading his speech I shall have to object to that; but I cannot object to his referring to his notes.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: My honourable friend is reading his speech. There is no doubt about it.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I was not in the House the other day when this matter was discussed; I was in Quebec; but I read the speech of the honourable gentleman who moved the resolution, and I took notes. I dictated these notes, which are my own, from the information I got at Quebec. They have been translated from French into English, but I have not had time to memorize all the quotations. I am speaking from my own notes, and I may tell the honourable gentleman that I am able to make a speech of my own, whether he is able to do it or not.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: That is what I want my honourable friend to do—to make a speech of his own; and I have no objection to his referring to his notes, as any other honourable gentleman may do. But I am asking if he has any right to read a speech here. No one knows better than he does that it is against the rules. Any speech which I may make here is my own, and not anybody else's, and I want the honourable gentleman to make his own speech.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I think I am entitled to refer to my own notes. I repeat, these notes have been translated from French into English in order that they may be understood by members who, like my honourable friend, cannnot understand French. I am going to continue.

Is it any wonder that nearly two-thirds of the quantity shipped from the Canadian West went to Buffalo and New York, and that a large proportion of the balance finally reached Portland?

The Government have been repeatedly urged during the last five years to build elevator storage at Quebec for 10,000,000 bushels and for an equal quantity at each of the ports of Halifax and St. John. What have they done? One-tenth of what is asked for at Quebec, and nothing at all at Halifax and St. John. That is the information I received from parties who understand all about transportation matters. It is true we are building an excellent system of steamship docks at Halifax, with berths for 27 steamers, and berths for 25 steamers are being provided for at St. John.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I do not wish to interrupt my honourable friend, but I should like to ask him where he got the quotation regarding 25 steamship berths at St. John.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: From the Quebec Board of Trade report.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: It is wrong.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: It may be. Honourable gentlemen will have the opportunity of saying whether it is correct or not, but that is the information I got from the Quebec Board of Trade.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: There should be 25, but there are not.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: For what year was the report?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: It would be last year. It is to be hoped that to the steamship berths now being provided the necessary elevator accommodation will be added as quickly as possible. If the Transcontinental railway is to have any success it must have terminals of its own at its seaports. I cannot conceive anything so short-sighted as the manner in which this important question has been treated by this Government; but also, I must add, by the late Government in some respects. The Government railways, which have cost the country a quarter of a billion dollars, have no terminals of their own. At Montreal they are at the mercy of the Grand Trunk, and at Quebec at the mercy of the Canadian Pacific. We can imagine what that must cost annually. At Quebec the Government purchased three miles of splendid deep-water frontage on the St. Lawrence front, between the Champlain market and Sillery, for the freight business of the Transcontinental, and it is admirably suited in every way for that purpose.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I am afraid I must point out that the honourable gentleman is reading his speech.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Not at all. I am not reading my speech.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I would not have said a word about the matter but that my attention has been called to it.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: The same rule applies to everybody. Other honourable gentlemen have read their speeches from beginning to end, and in their own language.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: His own colleague has read a speech.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I was saying that the Government purchased a splendid deep-water frontage on the St. Lawrence between the Champlain market and Sillery for the business of the Transcontinental, and it is very well adapted in every way for the purpose; yet they allow themselves to be induced by some unhappy influence to use the Canadian Pacific railway terminals and the very limited area of the Louise docks, where, as everybody in Quebec knows, there is not room enough to shunt a modern freight train. If more docks and elevators are to be built at Quebec it is to be hoped that they will be built on the property on the St. Lawrence front acquired by the Government for the purpose. But do the Government really intend to equip their railway with proper terminals at Quebec? The people of Quebec do not seem to think so, because the Mayor of Quebec some months ago wrote a formal protest to the Prime Minister, calling upon the Government to carry out its engagement with the city as to terminals, as made by a notarial agreement executed as far back as 1910.

Now, here is a quotation—not my own. It is a letter from the Mayor of Quebec to the Prime Minister dealing with all these matters which I am now bringing up. I have secured the best information, in order to be as accurate as possible in presenting these facts. I am not blaming this Government entirely for the situation, and am not saying that they have intentionally done anything against Quebec or any port in this country; but I want to emphasize that the statements which I am making are facts. If the views of the honourable gentleman from the Gulf division are wrong, I might say something on the subject myself; but my statements would not carry as much weight, so far as the public or the Government are concerned, as the authority of the Mayor of Quebec, supported by the city council, or the authority of the Board of Trade, acting on the recommendation of its president. Letters have been exchanged between the Mayor of Quebec and the Government, and between the Board of Trade and the Government, but nothing has been done in the matter. The letter of the Mayor of Quebec is as follows :

[Translation.]

Quebec, June 20, 1917.

To the Right Honourable
Sir Robert Borden,
Prime Minister of Canada.

Dear Sir,

I have the honour to enclose copy of a letter addressed by the Hon. F. Cochrane, Minister of Railways, to Sir George Foster, in reply to a telegram received from the Quebec Board of Trade, and which states "that the Railways Department does not at present need shops for the Transcontinental railway at Quebec, since those in operation at Moncton, Rivière du Loup and Transcona are adequate for the work to be done, and that on account of our heavy financial burdens the minister does not see the necessity of incurring the expense of equipping railway shops at Quebec until they become absolutely necessary."

I respectfully submit that this decision of the honourable the Minister of Railways has made a painful impression on the citizens of Quebec, who are fully convinced that they have vested rights in this matter which cannot be ignored.

In the first place the city of Quebec has contributed largely towards the Transcontinental railway, while no other city in Canada has been called upon to do anything in the same direction.

For a nominal sum we turned over to the Transcontinental the Champlain market property, the most valuable ground on the river front of the city, covering a space of 282,000 feet and worth, judging by adjacent property, from $5 to $9 per square foot, or over $1,400,000. We permitted the destruction by the Government of the biggest market in the city, the Champlain market, the building of which alone was worth at least $250,000, in order to allow of the land being used for the purposes of the Transcontinental.

In consequence of the destruction of this market the city has been obliged to establish a new market on the banks of the St. Charles river, and this new market cannot be used by the small market boats until after the present sluicing and dredging operations on the St. Charles river have been completed.

To facilitate the Railway Department in locating the terminus of the Transcontinental the city consented to grant to it without charge 133,000 feet of ground in Victoria park, worth at current prices about $400,000.

The city agreed also to furnish free of charge the water supply for the railway workshops of the Government, a concession which the city refuses to the most deserving charities, and the capital value of which represents a very considerable sum of money.

M. Napoleon Drouin, ex-mayor of Quebec, sent as a delegate to Ottawa on November 2, 1915 by the City Council of Quebec, has proven by official documents that these different grants represent a value of over $3,000,000. In return for these enormous sacrifices, which are out of proportion to the means and the population of Quebec, and which were imposed upon us as much by the previous government as by the Government of the day, the Government, by a legal contract dated August 26, 1910, undertook to build in Champlain ward, on the St. Lawrence river front, docks, elevators and terminal facilities to the value of $2,000,000 over and above the cost of the right of way and the cost of construction of the shops, and in addition to the wharves which were then in course of construction and on which the work has since been suspended. The Government undertook to build the said shops within the limits of the city or in its immediate vicinity.

The city of Quebec has never renounced any of these conditions, and the Government has never fulfilled any part of the obligations specified in the contract, except with reference to the construction of workshops, which were erected in one ward of the city and were completed a few months ago at a cost of $1,800,000, with the exception of one building, and are not yet in operation and have not been equipped. The honourable the Minister of Railways has alleged that the shops in operation at Moncton, Rivière du Loup and Transcona are sufficient for the work necessary, and does not see the necessity of incurring the expense of equipping the railway shops at Quebec before they are needed.

We are of opinion that the minister has been badly advised by his subordinates in this matter. Thus it is a notorious fact that the Intercolonial shops at Moncton and Rivière du Loup are inadequate for the Intercolonial. How can it be maintained that they can be overloaded with the work of the Transcontinental, which extends a distance of 1,800 miles? The Transcona shops are not utilised merely for the Transcontinental alone, they do all the work of the Grand Trunk Pacific from Winnipeg to Prince Rupert, a distance of 1,800 miles. Moreover, the Transcona shops are not located so as to be able to serve the Transcontinental economically. Those shops are 448 miles from the head of Lake Superior and 1,350 miles from tidal waters, so that the cost of coal, steel and other materials required is very high. On the other hand, Quebec is more advantageously situated, nearer tidal waters, where these materials can be delivered at much less expense. Labour is cheap here, and Quebec besides being at the head of ocean navigation, is a central point for the Government railway system, and is a peculiarly suitable location for the big workshops which the Government has built here.

The Government must certainly have had all these advantages in view and deemed them of great value when it agreed by contract with the city of Quebec to build the shops in this city at a cost of about $2,000,000. The expense of equipping the shops is assuredly not a sufficient reason to justify the attitude taken by the Government towards the city of Quebec.

It has been pointed out to the Government that the Transcontinental is not adequately provided with rolling stock, that thousands of carloads of pulp-wood and other freight, the product of the labours of the new settlers along the railway, cannot be transported for lack of cars. There is no more favourable place than the workshops at St. Malo for the building of these cars. These St. Malo shops could employ 1,500 men, thus relieving the unemployment at Quebec due to the sudden closing down of the Ross factory and the dismissal of nearly 3,000 employees. The Transcontinental lacks rolling stock; why not build it at once?

May I point out also that the manner in which the Transcontinental is being operated by the Railways Department is far from being satisfactory to the people of Quebec. Every effort is apparently made to provide a rapid service with first-class equipment, between Toronto and Winnipeg, where three transcontinental lines are in competition, and where, the Canadian Pacific being shorter than the Transcontinental, the latter cannot compete successfully. But from Quebec to Winnipeg, where the Transcontinental is 214 miles shorter than the Canadian Pacific, nothing is being done to encourage the steamship traffic from overseas and from the Maritime Provinces to take advantage of this great saving of distance and of time. The trains are made up of old worn-out cars from the Intercolonial, whose appearance and sanitary condition leave much to be desired. In fact, this line between Quebec and Cochrane is treated like a simple branch line instead of being considered as the main line, shortening the distance between Quebec and Winnipeg. And yet this is what had been represented to the citizens of Quebec when they were induced to agree to concessions equivalent to $3,000,000.

In spite of all these disadvantages, the operations of the railway show the surprising result of gross receipts amounting to $5,798,516 and a surplus of $429,455. This magnificent result, which you did not expect, shows clearly the wisdom and necessity of equipping this highly valuable property by establishing suitable terminals and providing sufficient rolling stock without further delay, so that this railway may stop the diverting of our western trade towards the United States, which now occurs to an alarming extent.

In conclusion, I am desired by the City Council of Quebec to protest strongly against the decision of the honourable the Minister of Railways not to operate the Quebec workshops, and I respectfully submit that it should be done without delay and that the terminal work in Champlain ward should be completed without delay, in accordance with the terms of the agreement of August 26, 1910.

If, however, the Government persists in not treating this railway as a national enterprise, which would provide the farmers of the Northwest with cheaper transportation for their grain shipped to Canadian ports, an object which we have always understood Parliament had in view when the construction of the Transcontinental was decided upon, I beg to state that the city of Quebec intends to cancel all its arrangements with the Government and to take back the Champlain market property, requiring of course repayment to the city of the value of the market buildings torn down by the Government.

I have the honour to be sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Signed) H. E. Lavigueur,
Mayor of Quebec.

P.S.—Since writing this letter I learn that the honourable the Minister of Railways has given orders that the rails on the main line of the Transcontinental between Quebec and St. Prosper, a distance of fifty miles, be taken up. I venture to protest strongly against that decision, which will compel this railway to use the lines of its two greatest rivals in order to enter the city of Quebec, its only eastern terminal.

Very respectfully,
(Signed) E. H. Lavigueur,
Mayor of Quebec.

A few days ago Hon. Mr. Rogers was asked in the House of Commons by Hon. Mr. Graham, ex-Minister of Railways, why there was no provision in the budget for extra elevator accommodation at Quebec, Halifax and St. John, to handle the grain traffic of the Transcontinental railway. Hon. Mr. Rogers replied that he could see some use for such facilities at Halifax and St. John, but not at Quebec, which, he said, is only a summer port. Can it be possible that this statement reflects the views of the Government with regard to the port of Quebec? Can this be the reason why 27 new steamship berths are being built at Halifax, that the plans propose 25 new berths at St. John, and that only five are being built at Quebec? If fifty-two new steamship berths are required at St. John to do the business of this railway for five winter months of the year, how is the business of the other seven months to be done unless there are similar facilities at Quebec, which is the summer terminus of this railway?

If the present disastrous situation is not soon remedied it is going to have a serious effect upon the future of Canada. Parliament consented to the vast expenditure involved in the construction of the Transcontinental railway upon the distinct understanding: firstly, that it would materially reduce the cost of transporting the grain of the farmers of the Northwest; secondly, that the railway would bring all its ocean traffic to Canadian seaports; thirdly, that there would always be ocean steamers at those seaports to handle the traffic. We have been bitterly disappointed. The railway has proved its ability to reduce by 3 cents per bushel, or one-quarter, the cost of carrying the grain. If this understanding were carried out, this saving would mean that the farmer would get that much more for his grain, which would be equivalent to an annual gain of about $20,000,000, on the basis of the crop of two years ago. But it cannot be carried out, because the railway has no terminals and no elevators, and to add to the difficulty, on account of higher marine insurance, ships charge higher freight rates from all Canadian ports than they do from New York. The result is that, after the colossal expenditure in building three transcontinental railways the people of this young country find that two-thirds of the trade which was to have been done by these railways at Canadian seaports, is being done at the seaports of the United States. If this condition cannot be remedied, it is a misfortune which may result in breaking up the Confederation. This condition can be remedied, and in my humble opinion the remedy has been very clearly stated to the Government in a resolution which was passed at a general meeting of the Quebec Board of Trade, which was amplified by a letter from the President of that board to the Prime Minister, which I now read so that it may be preserved in Hansard:

Quebec, July 14, 1917.

The Right Hon. Sir R. L. Borden, Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—At the last general meeting of the Quebec Board of Trade held in the month of June, a resolution was adopted—a copy of which was sent you—respectfully suggesting that the Government should not adopt either of the reports, made by the majority and the minority of the Royal Commission named by the Government to report as to the railway system of Canada, and as to the best means to be adopted to overcome the financial and other difficulties which have arisen, owing to the unfortunate duplication of lines.

May I be permitted to explain, a little more at length, the views of the Quebec Board of Trade, which influenced the recommendations expressed in the resolution in question.

The reports of the Royal Commission both recommend, though not to the same extent, the acquisition and operation by the Government of certain railways constructed by companies.

We are of opinion that this would not be the wisest course—in the first place, it would mean an increase of the public debt of Canada to a figure so vast that it might weaken the splendid financial strength of the country in the money markets of the world. In the second place, Government operation of railways is often far from being satisfactory, and it lacks the initiative which company management generally has, initiative of which we have so splendid an example in the case of the Canadian Pacific, which has done so much to bring about the great prosperity and financial strength that we now enjoy.

Our Board is of opinion, as stated in the resolution, "that the Government management of its own mileage, between Halifax, Quebec and Winnipeg, now operated by the Government, should be sufficient to regulate rates, so as to direct the western trade to Canadian seaports; and that it would seem wise to let the railways work out their own financial problems, and to concentrate Government efforts upon the proper equipment of our seaports with steamship docks and grain storage, upon reducing marine insurance rates and thereby attracting vessels to our seaports, upon building or causing to be built ocean steamers to carry the trade of Canada, and in this way making our railway system fulfil the objects for which it was created, and arrest the alarming diversion of our trade to United States seaports."

We look upon the Transcontinental Railway between Winnipeg, Quebec and Moncton, as being a most valuable addition to the public works of the country, which, if properly completed and equipped with terminals at its seaports, will soon repay Canada, directly and indirectly, the interest upon its great cost. It shortens the distance between the wheat fields and tide water by 214 miles, it is so level that its trains can carry nearly double the tonnage heretofore carried—it runs, between Quebec and Cochrane, through the greatest spruce forests in the world, where numerous water powers are already attracting costly industries which will turn that spruce into pulp and paper, affording employment to thousands and furnishing traffic to the railway. Already more than four thousand new settlers have gone into this district to cultivate the lands of the new and fertile clay belt through which this railway runs. They, too, are furnishing the railway a large traffic in forest products.

In the first year of its operation, this road, without terminals at its seaports, and almost without equipment, has earned the very large sum of $5,800,000, or more than $3,200 per mile, a wonderful return for a new road through an uninhabited country. In short, the Transcontinental railway, derided by many people, as costly and useless, has proved itself. Already its trains shorten the time for ocean passengers and mails between tide water and Winnipeg by nine hours, and have reduced the freight upon the export wheat of the Northwestern farmer by more than three cents per bushel.

We are firmly convinced that if ample grain storage is provided at Quebec, Halifax and St. John, so that the railway may have a constant, instead of an intermittent traffic in grain, if steamship docks are built at Quebec (the steamship berths now building at Quebec are entirely inadequate) and St. John, similar to those now being built at Halifax, and if the railway is properly equipped with rolling stock, it will fulfil the objects intended by Parliament at its inception, namely the saving in freight upon the wheat of the farmer of the Northwest, with the consequent increase in the value of his grain, and the securing of its traffic for Canadian seaports. We believe it will do more, because it can be used by Government as a regulator of freight rates, and thus put a stop to the alarming diversion of our western trade to United States seaports, via Fort William and Buffalo, which last year took away from us two-thirds of the grain which should have been shipped from Canadian ports.

We would therefore most earnestly and respectfully suggest that the Government should not adopt either of the reports of the Royal Commission, which would involve a very large increase in the public debt—but that they should, rather, devote their energies and the resources of the country, without hesitation, to putting a stop to the diversion of our trade to foreign ports, and to making it secure for Canadian ports.

We are firmly of opinion that this can be brought about:

1. By building grain storage for ten million bushels at each of the ports of Quebec, Halifax and St. John, with steamship docks at Quebec and St. John similar to those now being built at Halifax, and also an ample equipment of rolling stock for the government railway system, in which, we are glad to see a beginning has been made, so that the trade of the country may not be stifled, as is the case at present, and that, when necessary, some of the stock may be rented to help out the needs of other Canadian railways, until they are fully equipped.

2. By Government control of marine insurance rates, so that the insurance rates from Canadian ports shall by agreement with the underwriters, be at all seasons of the year the same as from New York. The present discrimination against Canadian ports is driving ships to New York. This might cost the Government something annually, but the result would be worth the sacrifice.

3. By Government compelling all subsidized steamers to accept the same rates of ocean freight to and from Canadian ports, as are current, from month to month, at New York. There would, once the insurance difficulty is overcome, be no injustice in this, because Quebec is 500 miles and Halifax 700 miles closer to Liverpool than New York is.—This might be regulated through the medium of the Railway Commission.

4. The Government to build and operate, in connection with the Transcontinental and Intercolonial railways, not less than ten large ocean freight steamers of 10,000 to 15,000 tons capacity, to run a semi-weekly service from Quebec in summer and Halifax or St. John in winter. These ships could handle about 50 million bushels annually, which would ensure a constant traffic, all the year round, to the trains of the Government railway system, and, in combination with the railway, would prove a regulator of freight rates, to the joint benefit of the farmer of the Northwest and of Canadian ports.

This may seem a programme involving heavy expenditure, but the amount will be trivial, compared with the many millions which would be required if the Government were to take over the railways, mentioned in the reports of the Royal Commission. Moreover, what we suggest is essential if Canada is to reap the benefits expected from our enormous expenditure for three transcontinental railways, and if we wish to arrest the present diversion of two-thirds of our trade to United States seaports, which is so alarming.

The public is always being threatened with the spectre of the dire results which it is said must follow if Parliament does not again come to the rescue of railways which have been built with more or less erroneous judgment as to location—But have we not already done enough in that direction? Will any great harm come if these roads are left to work out their own salvation, with perhaps a little judicious help as to equipment and ocean terminals? The traffic of these roads is increasing rapidly —why should not the financial interests which have carried them so far carry the load a little longer?

Yours respectfully,
(Sgd) J. G. Scott,
President Quebec Board of Trade.

I may say that this Mr. Scott is one of the most able men in transportation matters, either by railway or by water, and is an authority on this question.

Honourable gentlemen will see from the facts that I have put before the House that the Quebec Board of Trade had communicated with board of trade in other provinces. This, in my opinion, is the remedy for the extremely serious position in which Canada finds itself to-day. If the Government will follow the advice given I feel confident that the farmers of the Northwest and the seaports of Canada will soon reap all the benefits which were promised in Parliament when the building of this railway was undertaken.

The question was raised, I think by the honourable gentleman from De la Durantaye (Hon. Mr. Tessier) as to it being in the interest of Canada in general and of Quebec in particular to declare Quebec a free port. This is a question upon which I am not ready to pronounce myself. We know that the port of Hamburg in Germany is a free port; but whether it would be advantageous to Quebec to be a free port is a question which requires some study, and I have not had the occasion nor the time to study it. It will be time enough to discuss this question when the Government have taken all the facts into consideration, and have come to a conclusion. I hope that the Government will seriously consider the letter from the Mayor of Quebec. I put my own opinions aside—and the letter from the Quebec Board of Trade.

Quebec is entitled to special consideration. Some seven or eight years ago, as is mentioned in the letter of the Mayor, Quebec gave property valued at over $3,000,000 in order that the Government might build elevators, terminals, a union station, and workshops, and do whatever was necessary to make the port of Quebec ready to receive all the grain from the west. Nothing has been done as yet. All we have got is a little station on Champlain market. Properties that cost over $1,000,000 were sold to the Government for $100,000 on the understanding that over $3,000,000 would be expended in building elevators, and so on. We were promised workshops. They have built workshops, but, instead of putting them in the place where it was decided that should go, they were built in St. Malo, near Quebec. These workshops were completed nearly two years ago, but they have been closed down and nothing has been done since then. They have never repaired an engine there, they have never done a dollar's worth of work for the public. I point out to the Government the special position that we are in, apart from what ought to be done for the port of Quebec, and I ask the Government to look into these facts and do what is right not only in the interest of Quebec but of the Dominion at large. I have no doubt that the honourable gentleman from the Gulf division (Hon. Mr. L'Espérance) introduced his resolution in good faith, and I congratulate him upon it. Certainly he is in earnest and knows something about the question, being still chairman of the harbour commission; but I think his enthusiasm has carried him too far. What he has said was no doubt in good faith, but when he says that "our tidewater ports are properly equipped for the storage and speedy handling of grain and other merchandise, it is misleading and would prevent our obtaining what is due to us if not put right.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Honourable gentlemen, this is a very important subject and need not be approached with any feeling of acrimony. The honourable member for Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) has stated his case very well. Every one must agree that we want to export our products through our own ports.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: My honourable friend from Halifax says, "Hear, hear." Halifax got $30,000,000, but St. John, with Courtenay Bay, has been given only two or three millions.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: $15,000,000 was voted for St. John five or six years ago.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: $15,000,000?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: For construction at Courtenay Bay.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: My honourable friend says that there is $15,000,000 in the estimates.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: They have been spending the money for years. It may not be in the estimates to-day.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I refer to the honourable the leader of the Government. He will tell us what is in the estimates.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot answer my honourable friend. I know that within the last six years the Government has spent an extraordinarily large sum of money in St. John.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: That is all right, but my honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Crosby) says that there is $15,000,000 in the estimates now.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I said they had been spending it.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I leave it to the House. The honourable gentleman said there was $15,000,000 in the estimates.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I did not say that. I object to my honourable friend saying that I did.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: It does not make any difference what the honourable gentleman says; it cuts no ice here; nobody cares anything about it.

I am in favour of this resolution, but I object to it being stated that the Government is putting up twenty-five berths at St John. That is incorrect. Admitting all this great expenditure in Halifax, and admitting the value of that port to the representatives from there and I have the greatest appreciation for them I say that Courtenay bay is still standing without anything having been done, everything closed down on account of the Norton Griffith contract. Where are the twenty-five berths? A promise is like a pipe, it is made to be broken.

With all due deference to my honourable friend from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette), I ask him how is grain going to be shipped from Quebec in the winter? The port is closed. St. John is an open port. Perhaps I am taking up too much of the time of the House, but this is a burning question. We in St. John have stood quietly by. We know the disadvantages of Halifax, that on account of the long haul grain cannot be carried as cheaply that way as by St. John.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Soon it will all go by the Hudson Bay railway.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I do not know about that. That is only my honourable friend's opinion. The honourable gentleman from Grandville has expressed the opinion that whatever can be sent by way of the lower provinces should go to Quebec in the summer time. We in St. John have no objection to that; but when winter comes we have a right to hope, a right to expect nay, a right to demand— that the port of St. John should not be held up as it is to-day.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Before five years have passed, Quebec will be an open port all the year round.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I may not be here to see that day. I suppose we cannot agree on everything, but we agree in the main. Halifax should get something; it has been struggling for years. The railway through New Brunswick was built to give a short line to Halifax, and I think it is 17 miles longer than the Intercolonial. Why should St. John be held up? Nothing has been done for Courtenay bay unless it has been done in the dying hours of Parliament. The Government may have had a change of heart, and may have thought that if they did something it would influence St. John in their favour. Time will show whether St. John will resent that or whether they will allow themselves to be passed over. Of course, it is natural that St. John should occupy a commanding position, with its short line to Montreal and the West. All that the people of St. John ask is a fair share of the trade. They do not ask to be bolstered up here and there, with walls and things of that kind such as Halifax has, but they ask the Government to give them, as is given to the rest of the Dominion, such aid and facilities as will place them in a position to do the business to which they are entitled. My friends who will read what I am saying now will know that in my humble way I am speaking on behalf of the city of St. John. It is nearly forty-five years since my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Landry) and myself came into Parliament. I have had a chance of judging of the merits of various questions without losing my temper in differing from the views of others. We are asking for our rights. My honourable friend the leader of the Government has pointed out that now is a good time to call the attention of the Government to what may be done. My honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Crosby) will admit that anything which builds up St. John is going to help Halifax, and anything which builds up Halifax will help St. John. We do not object to the development of the West by the construction of railways, etc., for which we must pay our share, but by this motion attention is called to the needs of our eastern ports. I suppose it is now too late in the session for this Government to take action; but at any rate I trust that when we meet—what is it?—the new National Government, my honourable friend from Halifax will support me in urging that consideration shall be given to the winter port trade.

Hon. H. W. RICHARDSON: I notice that the motion calls attention to the port of Quebec, stating that it is properly equipped for the handling of grain and other merchandise, and that the exporters should use that port as much as possible. That is a very creditable motion,and it deals with a matter of great importance at the present time. When steamships are so scarce as they are at present, any saving that can be made in the voyage from North America to Europe should be made. It is desirable to use the port of Quebec, which is the closest to Europe—closer than New York or Montreal. There is a saving of a day, or a day and a half, in the voyage between Quebec and Liverpool as compared with the voyage from Montreal to Liverpool. A 10,000-ton ship is now worth, I suppose, from $3,000 to $5,000 a day; so that in a day and a half a saving of from $5,000 to $7,000 is effected by using the port of Quebec. Now, I am coming down to dollars and cents, because, after all, we may have all the elevators we want, and do all the dredging that is required, but if the merchandise cannot be sent most cheaply through that port all the dredging or elevator accommodation is of no use. Grain, like water, will flow through the easiest channel, that is, the cheapest channel. I have been engaged in the grain trade since 1873 and have followed the export trade closely. My firm was among the first to ship Manitoba wheat to Europe. No matter how loyal I have been to Canada or how anxious to build up Canadian trade, I have been forced many times in the past to use American ports to forward my grain to Europe.

Now, let us go back and see what has been the cause of this. The United States were exporters of grain long before we were. When our trade was in its infancy theirs was at its zenith, and the practice was established of shipping grain through American ports. Railways and elevator systems were built for the purpose of handling grain going in that direction, and the lines of boats were calling at American ports to move the grain. That system cannot be changed in a day, but it is changing year by year. There are now only one or two United States ports which are regular line shippers—the ports of New York and Boston; the other ports are tramp shippers. For instance, Baltimore is an immense shipper of grain, but it ships almost entirely by tramp boats. Portland is a big shipper of grain—Canadian grain most of it, sent by the Grand Trunk. Some Chicago grain, it is true, goes to Portland, but nine-tenths of the shipments going to that port come from our Northwest. Why? Because Portland is closer than any other port to the inland shipping points. The Grand Trunk is using Portland exclusively for its winter exports. Because both Halifax and St. John are farther, it costs more money to move the grain to Halifax and St. John—there is no question about it; and it is going to be very hard to overcome these difficulties.

Again, the port of Buffalo is a late fall port. It is open at the very close of navigation. It has an immense elevator system.

While I am on this subject I am going to speak very plainly. There is, so far as I am aware, no elevator in the United States built by the Government. The trade have built the grain elevators, and they are located on the routes best adapted for trade, where most money can be made out of them. When a government undertakes to build an elevator at one port—for instance, at the port of Montreal—other ports claim an equal right to assistance. Quebec asks for aid, as Quebec has a right to do, and receives it. Then Halifax and St. John do likewise. This assistance would never have been necessary if the erection of elevators had been left entirely to the trade.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I do not know.

Hon Mr. RICHARDSON: The Government have taken the matter out of the hands of the trade and have built the elevators.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Let me ask my honourable friend why the work started at Courtenay bay, at St. John, was left after a considerable amount of money, a million or two dollars, had been spent. If it was not to be used, why should it have been started? There is an inner story to that, but I do not want to go into it.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: I am not able to answer why the Government does certain things, but I suppose it is the ambition of the Government to encourage the export of Canadian products through Canadian ports as much as possible; or it should be.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Yes, that is right.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Let us consider the grain trade. I will give you a little information regarding that, because I do not believe any of you know much about it. It is thought to be a speculative trade. It is believed that a man makes money in it because he plunges—that he makes his fortune by buying up long on grain and selling it. Nothing of the kind. If the business is properly conducted there is not a line of trade in the country to-day in which there is less speculation.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: What does the honourable gentleman mean by "properly conducted"?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: If the man who buys grain can sell it on future, it is his right to do so. If I have a line of elevators, say 75 elevators, in the Northwest—as I have—these elevators are buying at the proper season 1,000, 2,000, 3,000 or 4,000 bushels of grain each per day. A report comes in by wire in the evening, and next morning my man goes into the pit, on the floor of the exchange, and he sells next month's delivery against that grain. It has been bought and sold and is shipped so that it will arrive at the terminal elevator to protect the sale, and the profit of the elevator handler is legitimate. Or if I am shipping grain to Europe my man goes into the pit of the exchange and buys openly; if I sell the grain in February I buy it for May. The grain is shipped from some country elevator, and the storage must be paid for. That is straight business—there is no speculation about it, and if it is done properly there is no more legitimate business on the face of the earth.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Cannot the shippers route the grain from the west in any direction they like? There is no law to compel them to send it to a particular port.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: No, there is not. Grain is like water; it flows in the easiest channel.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: The proper channel along which to send it is the cheapest.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: The grain in the Northwest is brought into country elevators. That grain is shipped out to terminal elevators, which are at Fort William and Port Arthur. It is held there under Government inspection and supervision, both inward and outward. From there the grain is moved, almost entirely by water. It is shipped to the seaboard by the cheapest route, whatever route that may be. Sometime the St. Lawrence is the cheapest, and sometimes the cheapest route is via Buffalo and American railroads. It depends very largely upon the quantity of grain and the quantity of ore and things of that kind, shipped by the lake. It is entirely a matter of freight.

However, I digressed from what I was saying. Buffalo is the natural port for winter distribution, because late in the fall of the year the ore docks on lake Superior and lake Michigan freeze up. The ore is all crushed and finely ground, and when the weather gets cold about the middle of November, the steamers carrying ore have to discontinue those shipments.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Iron ore is it?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Iron ore. Then they will take a cargo to Buffalo, and if the weather is favourable they will return to Fort William and load another cargo, of grain, and hold it free of storage. The grain is carried in the steamers all winter, if the owner of the grain so desires, and there are storage charges on it, but only a small insurance charge. When the owner of that grain sells it for shipment abroad he orders the steamer to go to the elevator. Then it is put on the cars, and four days afterwards it goes aboard the steamship in the port of New York.

Now, you can see the immense amount of American tonnage that becomes available late in November. That must be used, and we are at present practically the only shippers of grain, for the American Northwest does not ship much grain now. They do ship some oats and corn but very little wheat, except in the months of August and September. After that they require all their wheat for themselves. So the grain from Canada goes by way of Buffalo, and the American railroad gets the haul to the port of New York, and New York gets the distributing charges. Incidentally, the New York brokers and New York grain men are helped by this flow of Canadian shipments to their ports.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: About eighty per cent of the grain goes to the States, does it not?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Last year we shipped more grain by the Canadian route than by Buffalo. We shipped by water to Canadian ports 80,687,000 bushels of wheat, and by water to American ports 81,000,000 bushels of wheat—practically the same quantity—a difference of only 500,000 bushels. But we shipped by rail in Canada 10,670,000 bushels of wheat. So we shipped 9,000,000 more bushels of wheat by the Canadian route than through the United States.

Then, take our shipments of oats, which are sometimes forgotten. People are inclined to forget that we have more in this country than wheat. We are large shippers of oats. Last year we shipped through Canada 33,000,000 bushels.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: That quantity was shipped abroad, was it?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes, 33,000,000 bushels; and through American channels we shipped only 17,000,000. Further, we shipped 12,000,000 bushels of oats by rail, A considerable quantity is used for domestic purposes in Ontario and Quebec.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: For porridge.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Again, we shipped from the West last year, by water 4,500,000 bushels of barley; we shipped 3,500,000 bushels to Buffalo, and three-quarters of a million bushels by rail in Canada. So honourable gentlemen will see that it is a mistake to think that Buffalo is taking more trade than we are giving to our own ports. In 1914 and 1915 the situation was different, because we had a tremendous crop and our towns were not able to take care of it. Last year we shipped as much of the crop by our own channels as by the United States route, but unfortunately we could not ship more, because we did not have more space in which to carry it.

Then, it must be remembered that conditions are not normal to-day. A great many of our Canadian boats were built for the St. Lawrence and the Welland canal trade. They are small draft boats, carrying 2,200 or 2,300 tons. The owners of these boats at the outbreak of the war found it more advantageous to send them on the ocean than to have them remain on the lakes; so this class of tonnage has gone out on the ocean. I do not think it will ever be entirely replaced, because a few years hence the trade will change. The Welland canal will be available. That will permit of deep draft vessels of 21 or 22 feet to continue eastward, and will revolutionize the trade, providing the ports of Montreal and Quebec can take care of the grain which will be shipped there.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Do not forget Halifax and St. John.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: They will be used in the winter time only—never in summer time. They cannot take care of the grain during the season of navigation. Even when the new Erie canal—which is supposed to cheapen the rate via Buffalo by two cents a bushel—is completed, there will be no route which can compete with the new Welland canal. That is the only way in which our grain trade can be saved to this country.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Why?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: I will tell you why in a moment. Buffalo and Port Colborne are at equal distances from the West, both at the foot of lake Erie. It takes a large steamer, say a 10,000-ton steamer, 11 days to load, unload, and make the round trip from the head of lake Superior to the port of Buffalo and back. If the steamer proceeds, say to Kingston, at the end of lake Ontario, the end of deep water navigation, it takes her 24 or 25 hours longer, and the return trip the same time; say an additional two days, or two and a half are required. The ordinary rate to Buffalo in summer time is from $1\frac{3}{4}$ to 2 cents a bushel. The rate to Kingston is only two-elevenths more because it takes only two-elevenths of the time to make the additional trip. The freight from Buffalo to New York would be at least $3\frac{1}{2}$ cents, and it is often $5\frac{1}{2}$. The freight from Kingston to Montreal is $1\frac{3}{4}$ or 2c. That is a saving of a couple of cents a bushel; but the war has put public works back, and it will be ten years before this condition obtains. Then, there are other things, such as free ports and boats getting into port without much pilotage. There are two classes of boats being used in the grain trade: one is the line steamer and the other is the tramp. The agents for the line steamer are located in Montreal or New York as the case may be. The shipper's agent goes to that man and says, "What have you to offer to-day?" The ship agent says, "Oh, I can give you ten loads for next month." That means ten lots of 8,000 bushels each. The term "load" is taken from the old Erie canal barges each of which carried 8,000 bushels. The rate on grain is not so profitable to the line agent as the rate on package freight, such as cheese, butter, hogs; but, as he does not know that he is going to get enough package freight to load his steamers, he is going to make sure that he gets a load of some kind. He has a boat a week. If he finds that he has a load of package freight the first week he does not take your grain. He may wait until the second, the third, or even the fourth week before he will take it; therefore you have to get the tramp steamers in. In the past the captain of a tramp steamer going to the port of Montreal did not know the route, had never been there before, and the insurance rates going up the Gulf were very heavy—we used to have marine losses on the St. Lawrence river, and all these things hindered Montreal in getting tramp ships to come there. The Marine Department has improved navigation on the river, and there are better pilots. I think that for the last two seasons we have not had a loss on the St. Lawrence river which amounted to anything, which shows that it is just as good a stream to navigate as there is in any part of the world.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Does the pilot go from Montreal right out to sea?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes, the pilot goes to Father Point.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Can you ship as cheaply by tramp steamers as you can by passenger vessels?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Oh, yes, more cheaply—perhaps three cents a quarter, or three-eighths of a cent a bushel. You get consideration because the cargo is poured in quickly, and you guarantee to load in three or four days, as the case may be, or pay a penalty. The tramps ship has one hold, and likes to get a load of one kind of stuff. For this reason the rates are a little cheaper and we are able to sell the cargo in Europe and compete with shipment from other ports. In the future there will be tramp steamers at Montreal and Quebec which will be of great assistance to the trade, and when our lake navigation is fixed up as it should be there is no route on this continent over which grain can be carried as cheaply as by the St. Lawrence.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: What about the Hudson bay?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: If the Hudson bay route were possible, it is impracticable. Years ago I advised the Government to hire a couple of Norwegian tramp steamers and to put them in to service for a couple of years in order to demonstrate how many voyages they could make to the Hudson bay and back. There are things which make the Hudson bay route impossible in the grain trade. Grain is liquid. In that respect it is as near to gold as anything on earth; there is always a market for it; it can be sold any day between ten o'clock in the morning and one o'clock; therefore a banker considers that it is the very best margin security that he can have, and he is willing to go within 10 cents a bushel of its value. But would he advance 10cents a bushel if you put it in the Hudson bay? There is another point to be considered. Grain has to be carried for months and months. Our crop in the Northwest does not come out until October; that grain would not get to the Hudson bay until the season of navigation was closed, and it would have to be kept there until the next June.

Hon. Mr. POWER: July.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: It costs a cent a bushel a month for insurance and another cent a bushel for interest. If you keep the grain there for seven or eight months you have 16 cents a bushel against it, and whatever price you get for it you are putting it into the cheapest market to meet the American soft wheat raised in Texas and Oklahoma which is shipped in July and August. As a crop proposition or a banking proposition it is an impossibility.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Do you think any of the grain will go by way of Vancouver and the Panama Canal?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: I see no reason why it should not. I think the time will come when the wheat from the Edmonton district and Southern Alberta may be routed through the Panama Canal by way of Vancouver. That route is quite feasible if you have a crop of good hard grain. If you had a crop like that of last year, which was not harvested until the winter when there was ice and snow all through it, which moistened it so that it would not keep, I think that route would be exceedingly dangerous.

I think that the port of Quebec should have business this year, as it is within the power of the Government to give it, because it is going to save ocean tonnage. Ocean tonnage at present is worth $5,000 or $6,000 a day, and there is not enough of it to go around. We are straining every nerve in this country to build ships. To-day the Government is paying four times the ordinary value per ton for ships. I think a man could go out to-day and get a contract to build a ship at from $175 to $200 a ton. $40 a ton has been the European price for ships in the past.

To-day our railroads are doing better; they are moving their freight. What they will do when the grain has to be moved is a question that I cannot answer. The railroads could be induced to take this package freight to Quebec.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: According to the argument of my honourable friend, the only time that grain could be shipped from the Maritime Provinces is in the winter, when these other points are closed up.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: No, summer and winter.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: You will never make a success of shipping grain from St. John and Halifax during the summer months.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I understand the honourable gentleman to say that the St. Lawrence route is the cheapest possible route to the ocean.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: Yes.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: How would the Georgian Bay Canal compare with it?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: The Ottawa river was originally a short route for the trappers, voyageurs, and Indians, from the St. Lawrence to the Georgian Bay and the West. Sentimentally it is splendid; historically it is very nice; but as a business proposition it is impossible, and the sooner this Commission that the Government is paying money to is done away with the better. The Ottawa river rises and falls 17 feet in a year, and the report of the Commission says it is very doubtful if there is sufficient water at the height of land, and it advises several years of careful consideration. In addition to that, there are some 34 half-mile curves in that canal, and to take a boat which is 650 feet long around a half-mile curve——

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Then the honourable gentleman would agree that it is a twin brother to the Hudson Bay railway?

Some Hon. SENATORS: No, no.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: How many bushels of wheat will the largest steamer on the lakes carry?

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON: The largest steamer on the lakes would carry 400,000 odd bushels, but the ordinary carrier has a capacity of from 330,000 to 360,000 bushels. She will draw 19 feet of water—perhaps not quite that. It is not very often that she can get through the Soo canal when she is drawing 19 feet.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. RICHARDSON.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, September 3, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

THE SENATE.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON presented the report of the Committee on Banking and Commerce, to whom was referred Bill Q2, an Act to amend the Companies Act.

He said: I should like to state that this report represents a great many hours' work on the part of the Banking and Commerce Committee at a great many sittings. A most exhaustive study has been given to the Bill; and, while it incorporates very largely the Imperial Act, it is made to conform to the conditions in Canada, provincial as well as federal. I regret to notice, by a report from another place, that $5,000 for the administration of the Companies Act is to be withdrawn, and that a Bill for the revision of the Companies Act which had been introduced by the leader of the Senate it has been found impossible to go on with this session. I should like to say further that this matter ought to be treated in a different manner, as it would be if there were on the part of the representatives of the other House such a disposition to expedite legislation coming from this House as is exhibited by the honourable leader of the Government in this House toward their legislation My honourable friend the leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), I find by the Minutes of Proceedings, asks that the several standing committees be allowed to sit during the sittings of the Senate, and that all the rules in respect of legislation be suspended, in order that we may deal with legislation coming from the other branch of Parliament. They are asking us to deal with very important legislation—legislation that is controversial, that has taken a great length of time. I really think that, after the work which has been devoted to this Bill, it should be passed at this session. We should enter a protest. The other branch of Parliament should treat our legislation as we are disposed to treat theirs.

RAILWAY MILEAGE AND GRADES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN inquired of the Government:

1. What is the mileage by the Canadian Pacific Railway between Winnipeg and Quebec?
2. What is the mileage by the Canadian Northern Railway between Winnipeg and Quebec?
3. What is the mileage by the National Transcontinental Railway between Winnipeg and Quebec?
4. What is the total adverse grade on the Canadian Pacific going east, from Winnipeg to Quebec?
5. What is the total adverse grade going west on the same road?
6. What is the total adverse grade going east on the Canadian Northern Railway between Winnipeg and Quebec—the same going west?
7. What is the total adverse grade going east on the National Transcontinental Railway between Winnipeg and Quebec? The same going west?

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. 1,587 miles.
2. 1,640 miles.
3. 1,351 miles.

4 and 5. Information has been received from the railways concerned, as follows:—Canadian Pacific Railway—ruling grades vary from 0.3 per cent to 1.1 per cent, on different subdivisions eastbound and from 0.4 to 1.25 per cent on different subdivisions westbound.

6. Canadian Northern Railway—Main line from Quebec to Winnipeg is built to 5-10 of 1 per cent, westbound and 4-10 of 1 per cent eastbound grades with the exception of 53 miles of westbound and 84 miles of eastbound short momentum grades which can be reduced later when necessary. Of these latter temporary grades, there are less than 6 miles of 1 per cent and less than one mile of 1.15 per cent grade. All other temporary grades are less than 1 per cent

7. National Transcontinental Railway—The total adverse grade on the National Transcontinental eastbound from Winnipeg to Quebec amounts to 608.0 miles in length and 8,946.7 feet of a raise. The total adverse grade westbound over the same distance and between the same points amounts to 536.8 miles in length and 9,730.3 feet of a raise.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: With the leave of the House I ask that this be not printed, as it does not answer all the questions that I put. Is it understood that it will not appear in Hansard?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should very much prefer my honourable friend to state wherein it is not an answer.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The answer to the first three questions are all right. The other question asked what is the total adverse grade. That means the sum of the adverse grades on each of the three roads. A long rigmarole is given in this answer which does not answer the question at all. I suppose honourable gentlemen know what the total adverse grade means. It is the grade up which a locomotive must haul a train. The total on the National Transcontinental railway and on the Grand Trunk Pacific is 6,900 feet, whilst on the Canadian Pacific railway it is 23,000 feet. On the Canadian Pacific railway, for instance, between the Pacific and the Atlantic, every ton of freight has to be raised a height of 23,000 feet, or nearly 5 miles, whilst on the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific railways the freight has to be raised only 6,000 feet. I think the Canadian Northern railway would make a very good showing in this respect. The answer has nothing to do with that at all.

TUBERCULOSIS IN EXPEDITIONARY FORCE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL inquired of the Government:

1. How many cases of tuberculosis have been discovered in the Canadian Expeditionary Force?
   (a) In Canada?
   (b) Returned from England?
   (c) Returned from France?
2. How many cases of tuberculosis are there at present in the Canadian Expeditionary Force?
3. How many of these are now in Canada?
4. What provision has been made, and is intended to be made for the treatment of these cases, either by the Department of Militia or the Military Hospitals Commission?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. It is impossible to give absolute details as to the number of cases of tuberculosis discovered in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, as many of these men may be in the hospitals in France and England for other causes and not in sanatoria. The records of the Military Hospitals Commission show as follows:

(a) Invalided in Canada before going overseas	1,271
(b & c) Invalided in France & England	1,359
Not known where invalided	27
In England awaiting return to Canada	600
	3,257

The records of the Commission do not show whether men returned from overseas have been to France. This information could be obtained but it would take some days.

2. The number of cases of tuberculosis at present in the Canadian Expeditionary Force cannot be given, other than in so far as the information contained in the previous answer is concerned.

3. The number of those now in Canada is as follows:

In sanatoria:
Not been overseas	324
From England & France	838
Not know	27
		1,189
Discharged		1,468
		2,657

Of the latter 858 have been pensioned.

4. The question of treatment for men suffering from tuberculosis has engaged the attention of the Military Hospitals Commission since its inception. Use has been made of existing sanatoria, and in many cases additions have been erected, partly at the expense of the sanatorium authorities. Several institutions have been taken over entirely by the Commission and are being operated as sanatoria.

The following is a statement of the accommodation at present available, with the number of beds:—

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY SHARES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a copy of all resolutions passed by the Canadian Northern Railway Company in connection with the creation, issue, or allotment of shares and of all original entries made in the books of the company for the carrying out of such resolutions.

The motion was agreed to.

MORNING SITTINGS OF THE SENATE.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That commencing on Tuesday next, unless differently ordered, there shall be two distinct sittings of the Senate every day, the first sitting to commence at 11 o'clock a.m., until 1 o'clock p.m., and the second sitting to commence at 3 o'clock p.m., and that all Standing and Select Committees of the Senate be permitted to sit while the Senate is in session, notwithstanding anything contrary in Rule 86.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would ask my honourable friend if it is necessary to pass this motion at the present time. We have only two orders on the Order Paper to-day and have a very light Order Paper apparently for to-morrow unless there are other Bills coming up. Although my honourable friend stated last Thursday, I think, that he expected we should probably prorogue next Saturday, from what I can learn I do not think that event is liable to come about quite so soon. I should like my honourable friend to consider whether this motion could not stand. We do not wish to interfere or to retard the business of the House.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In my judgment the motion is desirable. We have before us to-day the Income Tax Bill, whi-is a very important Bill, and which will necessitate very considerable discussion. There will be read to-day, and placed on the Order Paper for second reading, the Military Voters Bill and the Canadian Northern Railway Company Bill. These are measures which will involve considerable discussion. It is therefore desirable that, if we can accelerate the various steps through which they have to go, we should do so. I am not going to ask the House to invoke unnecessarily the suspension of its rules, nor am I going to ask it to sit more than is absolutely necessary; but it seems to me desirable that we should get through as soon as possible, particularly in view of the fact that there is only one measure to detain the Commons. I am not going to ask the House to sit morning and afternoon unless it becomes necessary; at the same time I should like very much to have the rule suspended, so that if there is a pressure of business, we shall be able to do so.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The motion says that we shall sit to-morrow morning.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We can adjourn until the afternoon.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Does the honourable gentleman think it quite right that the committees should sit while the two important Bills which he has mentioned are being discussed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should be very glad to take that point into consideration. I am not going to ask the House to sit unless it is absolutely necessary.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable gentleman has stated that there is only one measure before the House of Commons to retard prorogation—the Franchise Act. Am I correct in that? If so, I have to say that if I were a member of the House of Commons the Franchise Act would not pass until the 8th of October. If that is the only measure that is going to retard prorogation, my advice to the House of Commons is to retard its passage until the 8th of October. It is unfortunate that the House of Commons has not availed itself of its privileges to retard legislation which is diametrically opposed to the principles of government in Canada. If I had half a dozen men around me the Senate would not prorogue until the 8th of October. Unfortunately I am alone.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman from Victoria is something like Casabianca—he stands alone. I think it is not usual to move the motion which has been moved by the honourable the leader of the Government quite as early as this. The Commons are not sitting in the morning yet, and, while there might be no very great objection to suspending other rules which require notice, I think the honourable gentleman might agree to let the motion with respect to morning sittings stand until to-morrow or the day after.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will not sit to-morrow morning.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The Railway Committee has a very important meeting to-morrow.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have no intention of asking the House to sit in the morning unless it becomes absolutely necessary. It is my intention to move that when the House adjourns it adjourn until to-morrow afternoon.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE: I think it would be safer if the honourable gentleman would take that motion off the Order Paper. The honourable the leader of the Government looks very kind, but he may not always be so kind. He may insist upon meeting at 11 o'clock in the morning. I think it would be better if the leader of the Government were kind enough to drop it. I oppose the motion, and will vote against it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The honourable the leader of the Government may perhaps amend it, and satisfy everybody by putting off morning sittings until Wednesday or Thursday.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will move that the word "Wednesday" be substituted for the word "Tuesday."

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: This is what I call Senate closure.

The motion, amended as proposed, was agreed to.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved:

That from, and inclusive of to-day, and until the end of the Session, rules 23f, 24a, b, d, e and h, 63, 119, 129, 130, and 131 be suspended in so far as they relate to Public or Private Bills.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does my honourable friend purpose to proceed with this motion to-day?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will let it stand, but I may say that I will move this motion with reference to certain Bills which will come up. For instance, I expect that the Insurance Bill will be up to-day, and I should like it to go to committee. We have promised certain representatives of the financial interests that it would go to the Committee on Banking and Commerce, although it is a public Act. Therefore I should like to suspend the rule when it comes up, in order to speed its stages.

The motion stands.

ALLEGED RETIREMENT OF HON. SENATOR LA RIVIERE.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I wish to draw the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to an item that appeared in the Ottawa Journal-Press of August 31st last, which reads as follows:

Hon. La Rivière leaving the Senate.

Hon. A. A. C. La Rivière, the first senator appointed by Sir Robert Borden after he came into office in 1911, and for many years one of most prominent figures in the public life of Manitoba, has resigned, and it is probable that he will be succeeded by Mr. Aimé Bernard, Conservative member of the Manitoba legislature.

Mr. La Rivière has become tired of parliamentary life and now prefers the quietude of his home in St. Boniface.

The ex-senator is a native of Montreal, where he was born in 1842, but he moved to Manitoba in 1871. He was elected for St. Boniface in the local legislature a few years later, and in 1881 was appointed provincial secretary. Subsequently he held other portfolios, and in 1889 was elected to the Federal Parliament for Provencher. He represented that constituency until 1904.

It looks as if there had been some arrangement made between Mr. Aimé Bernard and Senator La Rivière in this matter that Mr. Aimé Bernard is to succeed him. I do not know whether the leader of the Government has any information that he can give the Senate, as to whether it is understood that Mr. Bernard is to succeed the Hon. Mr. La Rivière?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot give my honourable friend any information on that subject whatsoever.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am not surprised.

INCOME WAR TAX BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

On motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed, the Senate went into committee on Bill 117, an Act to authorize the levying of a War Tax upon certain Incomes. Hon. Mr Sproule in the Chair.

On section 1—title:

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Mr. Chairman, would it not be well at this stage of the proceedings for you to decide whether it is competent for the Senate to consider or to attempt to amend or alter this Bill? Some honourable gentlemen are of opinion that the Senate has no right to interfere with a tax being given to the King by the House of Commons. Others are of opinion that the Senate cannot consider or take part in this matter. Would it not be advantageous, before consuming time, that that question should be decided by you?

Hon. Mr CLORAN: I think the proposition made by the honourable senator from Halifax is quite in order, not only from his personal point of view, but also in keeping with the constitution governing the proceedings of this honourable House and those of the popular House. I dislike to be a party to a lottery; but when a tax Bill comes down to the Senate from the House of Commons we can do only one of two things—either adopt the measure en bloc or throw it out en bloc. To my mind, whoever drafted the constitution giving the Senate powers of legislation and powers of consultation were very remiss. What is the use of this honourable House discussing the provisions of this Act if we cannot amend it? There is no use. There may be some use in giving the country our ideas and counsel in the matter, but under the constitution we have absolutely no right to amend a money Bill coming from the House of Commons. That is our position under the constitution and by parliamentary practice. We are put out of business. We can criticise, but of what use is criticism unless we can bring forth an amendment? I have been ruled out dozens of times by this House on that point. I consider that this honourable committee would be wasting time in discussing the provisions of this Act if it has no power to amend it. You,

Mr. Chairman, are probably one of the oldest authorities on parliamentary procedure in this House, and I think you will decide that the point taken by the honourable member from Halifax was well taken.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not know whether the honourable senator from Halifax raised a point of order.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: No, he did not raise it.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think perhaps it would be as well to discuss the point whenever an amendment is proposed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Do I understand that the point of order has been raised?

Some Hon. SENATORS: No.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Did the honourable member raise a point of order?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I asked the opinion of the Chairman as to whether we were in order in proceeding to the consideration of this Bill when we had no power to consider it.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That is a point of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Is that to be taken as a point of order?

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Because, if the Chairman gives only an opinion, he is not ruling on the question; that is why I want to know whether a point of order is taken or not.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: If I understand the honourable senator from Halifax, he is asking a ruling on the point whether this Senate can amend this Bill or not.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There is no point of order taken. There is nothing before the Chair but the Bill. If no amendment is made, there is no need of putting a question to the Chair.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I do not take quite the same view as the honourable gentlemen from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) with respect to the question asked by my honourable colleague from Halifax. We should not be too technical, and I think that practically he has raised a question of order. I say this with all deference to the authority behind me (Hon. Mr. Cloran), who has stated that the Senate must either accept the Bill as a whole or reject it as a whole. I do not undertake to decide that question; I think probably the Senate would have the right to make amendments in the Bill; but the point is that after we have gone through the Bill the Senate may conclude that it should not be passed at all, but that we should throw it out. Without going through the Bill we cannot find out what its character is.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: This House is not limited to the two courses mentioned, namely, of accepting the Bill in toto or rejecting it in toto. I think there is another course, that is, to offer to the Commons any amendments that commend themselves to the judgment of this honourable House. Any such amendment of Bills of this kind should be accompanied with a special message acknowledging that this House has no right to force upon the House of Commons an amendment, but rather offering it as a suggestion for their consideration. In acting in that way we are within the spirit and the letter of the law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: More than one decision has already been given on that point, and the purport of the bulk of those decisions was that the Senate had no right to amend any money Bill; Yet the Senate by its vote reversed those decisions and asserted the contrary opinion. Honourable gentlemen will not find in any Parliamentary law anything that would prevent us from offering amendments, but it is the privilege of the House of Commons not to accept them. As was stated on one occasion by the honourable senator, from Halifax, we are not bound to diminish our authority here. Let us take as much as we can, and if we are called to order by the decision of the House of Commons, it will be our duty to withdraw our amendments or reject the Bill altogether. Therefore I think we may venture to offer all the amendments possible, and the House of Commons will be within their strict rights if they refuse those amendments, as they are not obliged to accept any amendment of a money Bill coming from this House. That, in my opinion, is sufficient to prevent us from pressing our amendments, but we may make them under the rulings I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Does the honourable gentleman suggest that we should make certain amendments and send them down with the Bill that we will have passed?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: We have liberty to thresh out the Bill, and if the House of Commons do not accept our amendments, they would be seized of the Bill and could go on with it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If we pass the Bill with amendments and the House of Commons reject our amendments, the Bill drops or they ask for a conference.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw the attention of this honourable House to two precedents one in 1900, and one in 1903. The one of 1900 was a Bill increasing the salaries of judges and containing money clauses. One clause increased by three the number of judges of the Superior Court in the province of Quebec. On the motion of the honourable gentleman from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell) that clause was eliminated, many other amendments were adopted, and the Bill was sent back to the House of Commons; and it pleased the House of Commons to accept our amendments. In 1903 the same Bill came from the House of Commons increasing the salaries of judges by $2,000 a year, and containing other clauses which bore upon the expenditure of money. It was to a clause in that Bill that the honourable gentleman from Hastings referred the other day when he cited the case of a judge who resigned his position before he had been fifteen years on the bench, and before he had earned the right to his pension, but who was appointed to one of the Lieutenant-Governorships of Canada. In that case the Government reserved to itself the right to give the judge his pension, although, I might say incidentally, the clause did not say that he would have to cover the fifteen years in those two functions. The Senate differed from the House of Commons and struck out that clause of the Bill which authorized the Government of Canada to pay a certain amount of money in the form of pension to a judge who had not completed his fifteen years. The House of Commons accepted our amendment and the Bill became law. In those two cases the Senate amended a money Bill and sent it to the Commons; and I draw attention to the fact that one of those amendments was initiated by the ministerial party of to-day, and the second by the party on this side of the House. So that in those two instances both parties went on record as asserting the right of the Senate to make the amendment. What would have happened if the House of Commons had differed with the Senate I do not know; but at all events it seems to me that we have in those two instances the fact that we have proceeded to amend money Bills. The honourable gentleman from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran) says money Bills cannot be amended. Well, there are Bills which deal with money matters only in certain of their clauses, while other clauses can by common consent be amended. That is the reason why I said that we should await an amendment, and then discuss the question now raised.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I think the case cited by the honourable member from De Lorimier (Hon Mr. Dandurand) is hardly parallel with this Act. But in order that the matter may be clear in my mind, I would like to ask the honourable leader of the Government, if this Bill were sent back to the Commons with one or two amendments, and the Commons refused to accept those amendments, whether the Bill would fall to the ground, or whether it could be sent back here for reconsideration in its original form. My own views would be governed largely by that decision. If we amend the Bill and it is sent back to the Commons at this late date of the session, we run the risk of having no income tax at all during the next ensuing year, by reason of the Commons not accepting the amendment. Therefore I ask the honourable leader of the Government for his opinion on that question.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I desire to make a few remarks upon the question which is now before us, because it is important not only with regard to this Bill, but with regard to all Bills of a similar nature involving taxes or the appropriation of public revenue. The first remark I wish to make is that it must be borne in mind that we have a statutory constitution, the British North America Act. We are not on the same footing with regard to our constitution as the House of Lords and the House of Commons in England. They grew up with the country and their procedure is largely built upon precedents; but I do not think it makes the slightest difference how many precedents are set up to-day about what has been done in this House in the past. If those precedents are in accordance with the British North America Act, our constitution, they are right; if they are not in accordance with the Act, then we are not bound by them—they are all wrong. It is necessary to go back every time to the original constitution. Now, with regard to Bills for appropriating public revenue or levying a tax, which for the purpose of discussion we may call money Bills, my view, which I have adopted after giving full consideration to the question, is that this House cannot originate a money Bill. It must originate in the House of Commons. Further, if a specific sum is mentioned in a Bill which comes to us, we cannot increase the amount, because the increasing of it is a question involved in the proposition that the Bill originate in the Commons. Apart from that, in my humble opinion, there are no limitations at all upon this honourable House; we can either reduce the amount or throw out the Bill.

There are two sections of the British North America Act to be considered—sections 53 and 54. Section 54 deals with the House of Commons. The House of Commons cannot originate money Bills; these Bills have to originate with the Governor General. It is worth while to consider what happens in the House of Commons with regard to these Bills. When the Committee of Supply or the Committee of Ways and Means come to deal with a money Bill, some person, speaking for the Governor General, has to say that the Bill has His Excellency's consent. The House of Commons cannot increase the sum recommended by the Governor General. If he recommends a million dollars neither of those committees can make it $1,500,000. There must be another recommendation for the increase. But the committee can reduce the amount, or throw out the Bill.

I desire to make one further remark on that point. I find it laid down very distinctly that it is unconstitutional, or at all events bad practice, for the Committee of Ways and Means or the Committee of Supply to tag on a recommendation, or a suggestion, or a qualification, to the resolution before them; they should pass it, or amend it, or reject it. For that reason I do not believe in our making amendments in the way of pious resolutions with regard to any money Bill in this House, and sending the Bill back in the hope that the House of Commons may entertain those amendments and perhaps embody them in the Bill. My view is that we must do one of two things: We must legislate or not legislate. I think, arguing upon the analogy with what happened in those matters, that it would be an objectionable practice for us to make suggestions for the amendment of a Bill; either we ought not to make suggestions at all, or we ought to put our amendments into the Bill.

Section 54 of the British North America Act is the section of which I have been speaking:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or Bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or Bill is proposed.

When we go back to section 53 we find:

> Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

There is a rule of this House that when a money Bill comes up, this House requires an assurance that the House of Commons had the recommendation or the consent of the Governor General. The House of Commons have seen fit to pass rule 78 in which they embody section 53 of the British North America Act, and then add that it is their sole right to impose conditions and terms, etc., and further, add the words that the vote is not alterable by the Senate. Now, I want to know where the House of Commons got the right to pass that rule. In the first place, there is no use in comparing our powers with the powers of the House of Lords or the House of Commons in England. They are common law institutions, while ours are statutory We are bound by the British North America Act, and, unless the House of Commons can find in the British North America Act the power to pass a rule that we have no right to amend a Bill, then I say their rule is not of the slightest value.

The only possible argument that may be set up is based on the Act that was passed in 1868 relating to the powers and privileges of the two Houses; but when you come to examine that, you find that it does not deal with the legislative jurisdiction of the two Houses at all. It simply says that the powers and privileges of the two Houses, the Senate and the House of Commons, in Canada, shall be the powers, privileges and immunities of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. The Act of 1868 dealt simply with the question of the privileges of members and the arrest and imprisonment of members, also with the protection of the publication of the debates. I have tried to see if that Act could possibly be construed into an authority enabling the House of Commons to pass their rule 78.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Has the honourable gentleman the wording of the Act before him?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes. I quote from Bourinot:

On the assembling of the first parliament of the Dominion in 1867-8, an Act was passed "to define the privileges, immunities, and powers of the Senate and the House of Commons, and to give summary protection to persons employed in the publication of parliamentary papers." Under this Act the Two Houses respectively and their members shall exercise like privileges as at the time of the passing of the British North America Act, 1867 (sec. 18), were enjoyed by the Commons House of Great Britain, so far as the same are consistent with the said Act. These privileges are deemed part of the general and public law of Canada, and it is not necessary to plead the same, but they shall be noticed judicially in the courts.

All of Bourinot's comments on this point are in the same direction: they simply deal with the powers and rights of the Houses on the lines I have indicated, and not with the legislative jurisdiction of the two Houses. Most members of this House will remember that a rule was made by the Senate with regard to the taking of evidence on oath. The law officers of the Crown said it was ultra vires. Then there was other legislation with regard to the taking of oaths. But the question of examining witnesses under oath is now on a very distinct footing; that is to say, it is done by Act of Parliament, not by rule of the House of Commons or by rule of the Senate. All this, to my mind, points to the same thing —that if the House of Commons want to make rule 78 law, they must drop it as a rule of the House of Commons and get it embodied in an Act of the Parliament of Canada and assented to by the Imperial Parliament. Until that time comes we shall be governed entirely by section 53 of the British North America Act, which leaves us unfettered. I am strongly of the opinion that until new legislation is passed we are bound simply by the two limitations of which I have spoken, namely, that we cannot originate a money Bill and we cannot increase the amount involved. Apart from those limitations, we are free to deal with it as with any other Bill.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: The honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) has certainly taken down the restrictive fences to a considerable extent. If the only restriction against the right of the Senate to deal with money Bills is a rule of the House of Commons, and if there is nothing in the constitution against it, the honourable gentleman has let in a great deal of daylight upon the situation in this House. I have never heard that doctrine before. I am quite delighted to hear it. Do I understand the honourable gentleman to say that when a money or appropriation Bill comes into this House we are at liberty to take out items, or reduce items, or to change that money Bill? The honourable gentleman has taken the ground that we can decrease them or cut them out. Well, I am delighted to know that. I should like to hear the opinion of the honourable the leader of the Government on that question, and the sentiments of other honourable gentlemen who have been members of this House for many years.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: That question deserves an answer. I suppose I must give it. For many a year I have been preaching practically the same doctrine as that laid down by a competent authority, a man in touch with the lines of democratic government. And I am glad to know that the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) holds that opinion. How many times have I been called to order by the honourable the ex-Speaker here and the honourable the ex-Speaker there for discussing matters of this kind. Time and time again has my mouth been closed because the proposal which I had been discussing on behalf of the people was a money Bill. Now we have, to my mind, one of the brightest, ablest and best men in this Senate giving his view on the subject. I have listened to him with delight, as to a man who has common sense, and I have listened to the honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) who asked the honourable leader of the Government a pointed question, which he should have answered on the spot. The honourable gentleman from Toronto asked the leader of the Government: if the Senate adopts an amendment to a money Bill and that Bill goes down to the House of Commons with such amendment and it is not accepted by the Commons, does the Bill drop there and ipso facto become law, after signature by the Governor General, without coming back to the Senate? That was a fair question. The honourable leader of the Government has not yet answered it. If he does not answer it, I am on the horns of a dilemma. I do not know why he does not answer it. He is just as good as the Minister of Justice. I believe he is better. If, though the amendments made to a money Bill by this honourable House are not accepted in the Commons, the Bill becomes law, then I will take extreme objection to such a procedure. What would be the use of this House passing amendments if they are going to be spat upon and buried without a decent funeral? Under such conditions, before allowing a Bill to go down to the House of Commons with amendments, I, as a representative of the people, would demand the withdrawal of the Bill or its rejection by the Senate. What would be the use of our passing amendments and sending them to the House of Commons if they are to be rejected and dropped there and the Bill is to become law? We should then lose half our rights; we should lose half our rights in being unable to reject the Bill in toto. There is one horn of the dilemma. Suppose the Bill goes down to the House of Commons with amendments and the House of Commons accepts the amendments. They must be sent back here to be re-endorsed. We would save our position; at least, we would accomplish our mission. These are the two horns of the dilemma. I am in sympathy with the honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls) in asking the Government what the procedure would be. It is not a party question; it is not a political question; it is a question in the interest of public legislation for the benefit of the people. We should not be kept in the dark. We should not be asked to do things that we know nothing about. The question put should be answered.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: May I interrupt the honourable gentleman and say that I asked the question, and I expect that it will be answered if the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran) will give the leader of the Government an opportunity to answer it. The honourable gentleman from Victoria is taking up the whole time of the House in repeating the question which I asked.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: When the question was put to the leader of the Government I asked for an answer, and if he had given his answer at the time I would have had nothing to say, and I can assure the honourable gentleman from Toronto that I would not take up his time, which is so valuable. I am trying to force the Government to give an answer. I asked the honourable the leader of the Government to answer the question at once. He declined to do so. He allowed other members to take the floor. I am here to defend the rights of the country and of the Senate. I think some other honourable gentlemen here do not represent the people very much.

Hon. Mr. POWER: At the risk of being considered an intruder I venture to say a word or two with respect to this question. It is not unnatural that the honourable gentleman from Toronto (Hon. Mr. Nicholls), who has been only a few days in the Senate, should not be quite clear as to the relations between the two Houses; but that an honourable gentleman like the honourable gentleman from Victoria (Hon. Mr. Cloran), who has been devoting his capacious intellect to the working of this House and to the working of the parliamentary system in Canada for some fifteen years, should want information on a question of almost every day practice is something which puzzles me. There has never been any question raised about the rule by gentlemen who have been any time in this House. If we make an amendment to a Bill which comes from the Commons, and the Bill goes back to the Commons with that amendment, or with three or four amendments, which the Commons accept, the Bill comes back with a message that they have accepted our amendments. If they accept one amendment and reject two, they send a message stating the fact. Then it is for the Senate to recede from the amendments which they have made or to insist upon them. That is as far as a matter generally goes. But sometimes, if the Senate feels very strongly on the matter and that they must insist on the amendments, they send a message to the Commons asking for a conference, and representatives of the two Houses are supposed to meet. That is now done by message. As a general rule, when the Commons refusal comes, we say that we shall insist or that we shall not insist. In the case of a Bill like the one before the House, if we made amendments to which the Commons did not agree and to which they said they did not agree, I assume that we should say we would not insist.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: May I be allowed to add a word to what I have already said? When I spoke first I took it for granted that it had always been assumed by this House up to this moment that money Bills were within the exclusive jurisdiction of the House of Commons. That is a practice which has been followed and upon which we have been acting heretofore, with two exceptions. Ever since I have been in this honourable House, I, for one, have contended that a Bill may contain provisions which pertain to money Bills and provisions which are foreign to money Bills. In other words, I have claimed that matters which, strictly speaking, should be covered by two different Bills could be united in one; and I have claimed the absolute right of this House to amend such clauses, as I did not consider that they were money clauses at all. I think that doctrine was adopted in this honourable House on several occasions. The other doctrine which has been followed by this House heretofore is, as stated by my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand), that—although the Senate dealt with clauses which were strictly-speaking money-bill clauses—this House has deemed it advisable under certain circumstances to offer amendments and to send them to the House of Commons; and as a rule those amendments are accepted by the House of Commons. That is what I intended to suggest when I spoke a few moments ago. I must confess that the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) has thrown a good deal of light on the question, and, as presently advised, I must say that I think he is quite right. He has stated the unquestionable principle that the Parliament of Canada is not governed by common law, so to speak, as are the Imperial House of Commons and the House of Lords. They are not acting under any statutory law; they are acting under customs and usages which are the result of long practice; but the Parliament of Canada is acting under a written constitution and must remain within the four corners of that statute. So far as they are within the four corners of the statute they are entitled to exercise all the rights and privileges which are given to them by that statute.

The honourable member from Middleton has referred to sections 53 and 54 of the British North America Act. Let me add that reference should also be made to sections 17 and 91, in order to make it more complete. The honourable member no doubt did not lose sight of those sections. I refer to them for the benefit of the lay members of this House. Section 17 says:

> There shall be one Parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen and Upper House, styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

This is the Parliament by which the powers are exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and of course by the Queen or the Governor General, as the case may be, who sanctions or refuses to sanction any Bill that is passed. Then, we have section 91 of the constitution, which says:

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say:

Then we find the enumeration of subjects which are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. The next section gives a list of those subjects which come within the jurisdiction of the provinces. But there is a proviso that anything which does not come within the exclusive powers of the provinces shall appertain to the Federal Parliament. In section 17 and section 91 we have the enunciation that the legislative power of this Parliament is exercised by the Queen, by the Senate, and by the House of Commons. Now, if the constitution had remained there, the Senate and the House of Commons would have been on a par as far as powers are concerned, and we have to look into the constitution to see whether there is any restriction to be found as regards one branch or the other. Then, we must refer to section 53 and section 54, as did the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) and ascertain what the powers are. Section 53 says:

> Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

The honourable gentleman very properly cited section 54 first. It says:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or Bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or Bill is proposed.

Section 54 limits the power of the House of Commons to this extent, that any recommendation of money votes must first be approved by the Governor in Council. Section 53 contains the restriction as regards this honourable House; but one cannot find any restriction other than that. Therefore, I think the honourable gentleman from Middleton has clearly shown that to say there are other restrictions would be importing restrictions which are not to be found in the constitution and which are merely to be found in a rule of the House of Commons. Surely it will not be contended seriously that the House of Commons has any power to make any rules governing this honourable House. It has the power to make its own rules and the Senate has the power to make its own rules. As was very properly said by the honourable member for Middleton, it would be only after the substance of that rule was enacted into a law, to which the Senate of course would have to assent, that the powers of this House could be curtailed, as they are sought to be curtailed by that rule of the House of Commons. I entirely agree with the doctrine laid down by the honourable gentleman from Middleton.

Hon Mr. LANDRY: I suppose the consequence of that doctrine would be that if a Supply Bill came here we would have a right to diminish the expenditure asked for.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Certainly.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Why not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot subscribe entirely to the views expressed by my honourable friend from Middleton. While in the main I agree with him, yet, with reference to the reduction of a Supply Bill or of any appropriation, I entirely disagree with him, for the simple reason that section 53 of the British North America Act makes provision for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue by the Commons, or the imposition of any tax or impost originating in the House of Commons. If the Commons enjoys the exclusive right to appropriate any part of the public revenue, it must be that particular part which is appropriated by the House of Commons, otherwise a reduced appropriation would not be appropriation made by the House of Commons. That is manifest.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Will the honourable gentleman allow me to suggest that he does not seem to remain within the wording of section 53?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Section 53 of the British North America Act says:

> Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: "Shall originate."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Now, if there be an imposition of a tax or an impost that must originate in the House of Commons, it must be for the fixed amount determined by the House of Commons; otherwise it is not the Bill of the House of Commons. If the House of Commons should impose a tax or impost of $150,000 for a particular purpose and we should reduce it to $100,000, it is manifest that it is not the same Bill at all. The same would apply to the earlier part of section 53, namely, the appropriation of any part of the public revenue. That is to say, a Bill appropriating an amount out of the public revenue, or imposing a tax or impost, must be for the amount determined by the House of Commons; otherwise we might reduce it to an infinitesimal part, and hence it would be equivalent to our originating a Bill of an entirely different character.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But we can reject it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I quite agree with my honourable friend as to that.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Is there not a rule somewhere else which will guide us as to that? It is not open to a member of the House of Commons to originate any expenditure of money. But the moment the Bill has been originated the members of the House of Commons are absolute masters of the measure and can deal with it as they like, provided the amount authorized by the Governor in Council is not exceeded. Therefore I call the attention of the honourable members to the significance of the word "originate."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I quite appreciate what my honourable friend has said, but it seems to me perfectly obvious that if a tax, or an impost, or an appropriation be made by the House of Commons, and we interfere with that appropriation, or tax, or impost, reducing it from the amount that was fixed by the House of Commons, then it is not the appropriation, tax, or impost originating or made by the House of Commons. To carry the argument to its logical conclusion, you might reduce that amount to an infinitesimal part and thus entirely convert it into an appropriation, a tax, or impost differing so absolutely from the original that it would simply have originated in this House. That would be an assumption on our part to deal with all tax Bills to the same extent as the House of Commons does. It seems to me that the difficulty into which the Senate has fallen in the past has been very largely owing to our failure to analyse or enter as fully as we have done to-day into what the original powers of the Senate are in reference to money Bills. We have started from the assumption that the Senate had no right to amend a money Bill, and we have never gone beyond that and ascertained what our powers were. Discussions in this chamber up to the present time have been along the line as to what constitutes a money Bill, and not as to the Senate's original powers. It seems to me quite manifest that the rule passed by the House of Commons some time ago dealing with money Bills, and which would certainly fetter this Senate, was passed without any authority. Rule 78 of the House of Commons is as follows:

All aids and supplies granted to His Majesty by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all Bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint, in all such Bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

From that I dissent. I think the House of Commons has no authority whatever to pass such a rule. That authority must necessarily come from the British North America Act. Nevertheless, it seems to me that in considering a money Bill, what we have to determine is how far the Bill constitutes an appropriation originated by the House of Commons, or the imposing of the tax or impost in question.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Might I ask the honourable leader of the Government at what period the right of the House of Commons and also of the Senate was reduced? Undoubtedly under the original provisions of the British North America Act the House of Commons had all the powers of the House of Commons in England, and the Senate had all the powers of the House of Lords.

Hon. Mr. POWER: No.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Yes, but afterwards they were reduced.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The House of Commons and the Senate as we have them to-day are bodies which were created by the British North America Act. Our Constitution is a written one, and we cannot go outside of the four corners of the British North America Act to determine what are the powers and authority of the House of Commons and the Senate.

Some question has arisen as to what the result would be if the House of Commons did not concur in any amendment made by the Senate. My honourable friend from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) has properly explained that, so it is not necessary to enter into it; but we have two rules which enter very fully into that subject, namely, Rules 66 and 67, and honourable gentlemen will find those Rules more explanatory than I can make them. They are as follows:

66. In any case where a Bill, originating in the Senate and amended in the Commons, is returned to the House of Commons with any of the amendments made by the Commons disagreed to, or where a Bill originating in the Commons has been amended in the Senate, and has been returned to the Senate with any of the Senate amendments disagreed to, and the Senate decides to insist on such amendments, or any of them, and returns the Bill to the Commons, the message accompanying such Bill shall also contain reasons for the Senate not agreeing to the amendments proposed by the House of Commons, or for the Senate insisting on its own amendments, as the case may be; and such reasons shall be drawn up by a committee of three senators, to be appointed for the purpose when the Senate decides to disagree to, or insist on, as the case may be, the amendments in question.

67. In cases in which the Commons disagree to any amendments made by the Senate, or insist upon any amendments to which the Senate has disagreed, the Senate is willing to receive the reasons of the Commons for their disagreeing or insisting, as the case may be, by message, without a conference; unless at any time the Commons should desire to communicate the same at a conference.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: This discussion has been of vast importance to the administration of public affairs in this country. The leader of the Government has just stated that money Bills originating in the House of Commons cannot be amended by this honourable body. I venture to state that that view is not well founded. All money Bills do not originate in the Commons at all. Such Bills—call them money Bills, appropriation Bills or aid Bills—originate in the Cabinet—in the Government of the country.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Not a Bill—a resolution.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Money expenditure has to come from the Government, sanctioned by the Governor General; so such Bills do not originate even among the members of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The Bill does.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: But I mean the sanction of the money. The offering of the money must come from the Governor General through his ministers. Then whatever the Bill may be, it is presented to the House of Commons, and it lies with the representatives of the people there to discuss that Bill, not to increase the amount suggested by the Governor in Council to his Cabinet, but the House of Commons may diminish the amount. The Government may call for a customs tax, say, of 35 per cent ad valorem on a certain article. It is the privilege of any member of the House of Commons to have that reduced to 34, 33, and so on, but it is not his privilege to say that instead of the suggestion of the Government it should be 36 per cent. He has the privilege and the right to reduce, but not the right or privilege to increase. Suppose the figure is reduced, and that Bill is sent to the Senate for endorsation, we have no more right than the members of the House of Commons to increase the tax proposed by the Government; but we have an equal right with the members of the House of Commons to reduce that taxation, and that is the point made by the able senator from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross). The right of the Senate has been ignored under false pretenses of authority that are dead and gone, under political necessity, under party exigency; but when we examine the situation from an unpartisan point of view, we must admit that the Senate of Canada for the past fifty years has been cutting its own wings, so much so that it is unable to fly any distance. It is time that a halt was called to the cutting off of our powers, rights and privileges, not for our own honour and glory, but in the interest of the people. Why should the Senate of Canada abdicate its rights and powers when the British North America Act does not exact it? I am glad to see that the honourable the leader of the Government has gone a considerable distance in the direction of democratic government, and also that the honourable senator from Middleton has taken such an honourable stand on behalf of this Senate. I do not propose to take any objection to any provision of this Bill; if I made any protest, it would be that the Minister of Finance did not make the tax heavier on those who should bear the burden. It is not my intention to oppose any provision for the raising of taxes to keep our boys fed, clothed and munitioned at the front; if I made any objection, it would be that the Bill does not go far enough along that line.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We have proceeded up to this date on the assumption that our powers were analogous to those exercised by the House of Lords, and we have been proceeding on the traditions of the British Parliament and citing May and Bourinot as to the practice.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Even the first clause of the rules of our Senate say that we should follow those of the House of Lords as far as they can be applied to our proceedings.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: We have proceeded on that assumption. If we turn to the British North America Act and limit our view to the powers therein granted, it may be that the conclusions of the honourable senator from Middleton are correct. If so, I do not agree with the honourable the leader of the Government as to the right of the Commons to originate and maintain the whole of its vote. The honourable leader has said that our sole right is to reject the Supply Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I said we had not the right to reduce, that is all.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But if we take the text of the clauses cited by the honourable gentleman from Middleton, Nos. 53 and 54, it seems to me that all that remains with the Commons is the right to initiate. Now, if we have the right to reject in toto, have we not the right to cut in two? It will be for the Commons to say if that amendment suits them; if it does not, then the Bill returns to this House and the Senate decides whether it will stand by its amendment or allow the Bill to fall. So much as to the interpretation of the British North America Act.

Now as to the tradition of the House of Lords, when we assumed the right of the Senate to amend money Bills which contain money clauses, and to reject some of those clauses, we based our action upon good precedent. I cite May, 12th edition, of this year, page 519:

> The right of the Lords to reject a Bill for granting aids and supplies to the Crown has been held to include a right to omit provisions creating charges upon the people, when such provisions form a separate subject in a Bill which the Lords are otherwise entitled to amend. The claim of privilege cannot, therefore, be raised by the Commons regarding amendments to such Bills, whereby a whole clause, or series of clauses, has been omitted by the Lords, which, though relating to a charge, and not admitting of amendment, yet concerned a subject separable from the general objects of the Bill. On the 30th July, 1867, it was very clearly put, by Earl Grey and Viscount Eversley, that the right of the Lords to omit a clause, which they were unable to amend, relating to a separate subject, was equivalent to their right to reject a Bill which they could not amend without an infraction of the privileges of the Commons.

That is why I claim that we could not ask from the Chair a general opinion as to what are our rights to amend a Bill containing money clauses until a question is put to the Chair on the concrete point in the form of an amendment.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: How does the honourable gentleman explain that phrase;

"the right to omit a clause which they could not amend"? What does that mean?

THE CHAIRMAN: In reference to the question asked by the honourable member from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Roche), as I have always understood, it is not the duty either of the Speaker or the Chairman to rule on the question. There must be a concrete objection taken by way of a point of order, which was not done. I think the discussion which has taken place has thrown considerable light on the matter. Some things have been said with which I would not agree: but I do not think it is competent for me to enter into any argument. I have always understood, as quoted in May, that all the aids and supplies to His Majesty in Parliament are the sole gift of the Commons, but they are recommended first by the representative of the Crown, and all Bills for the granting of any such aids and supplies ought to begin with the Commons, and that "it is the undoubted and sole right and qualification of the Commons to limit and appoint in such Bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications"—which I take it would mean quantity as well as particular purpose—"and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be deducted or altered by the Lords." That is what May says. That, I take it, is the authority which controls the House of Commons in England and which is our best example. Then I take up Todd's "Parliamentary Government." Todd has always been regarded as one of our best writers. He says:

> The British North America Act, 1867, Sec. 53, declares that "Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Commons." No further definition of the relative powers of the two Houses is ordinarily made by any statute. but constitutional practice goes much farther than this.

I mention this merely because it seems to me to go further than the honourable gentleman who said we are justified in going only so far as the law has given us authority to go. My understanding has always been that the constitution of the British Parliament, as well as ours, is growing all the time by evolution and accretion.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Not ours.

The CHAIRMAN: Ours, in many directions. We have practices that are not common in the House of Commons in England, but which have been followed here for years, and our own authorities lay down the principle that when we want to establish a rule to govern us, the rule shall be made by a committee and endorsed by the House, and after that it shall control the House. So I think that we go a little farther than we are authorized by the statutory authority laid down in the British North America Act; but any clause in the British North America Act which specifically governs our conduct cannot be departed from in any way. That point, I think, was very plainly commented on by Speaker Coburn in the House of Commons many years ago, and a very clear distinction was made.

With regard to the question how far the Senate can amend these Bills, I have been looking up the Journals of the Senate, and find that there is a summary of the Bills as to which they disagreed with the Commons—Bills that might be called money Bills; but it does not seem to me in looking over them that the point in dispute referred to changing the amount of money involved is one of them. I read from the Journals of the Senate for 1912-13, page 537.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: That is taken from Bramwell.

The CHAIRMAN: I find that Bills have been amended:

> To rectify mistakes apparent in the context or other parts of the Bill;
> To rectify mistakes in amendments made by committees on Bills;
> To rectify mistakes in recitals;
> To rectify mistakes in description of persons;
> To rectify clerical errors;
> To amend surreptitious alteration of Bill;
> Being for alteration of dates elapsed or nearly elapsed;
> Being for clearer explanation of the intention of the Bill;
> Being for greater caution, and no alteration of the intention of the Bill;

Where the Commons have rejected some suggestions by the Senate:

> It has been maintained, during the discussion of the point of order, that the Senate had no right to interfere with Bills which increase the expenditure of money, but would have a right to amend such Bills in order to decrease or prevent the expenditure of money. I admit that, at first sight, I was of that opinion, but the authority of May, cited by the Hon. Secretary of State, at page 542, after saying that the House of Lords is excluded, not only from the power of initiating or amending Bills dealing with public expenditure or revenue, but also from initiating public Bills which would create a charge upon the people or which would deal with the administration or employment of those charges.

Then the Commons go on to say that in accepting some of the Senate's suggestions with regard to amendments it must be distinctly understood that they are not thereby establishing a precedent or recognizing that the Senate have the right to amend.

Section 1 was agreed to.

On section 2—definitions:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would suggest that section 2 be amended by inserting, after paragraph a, as paragraph b: "income" means net income."

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I think that amendment would be better in section 3.

Section 2 was agreed to.

On section 3—income:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Are we all agreed upon the interpretation of the word "income," that it means the net income which is taxed? I am addressing myself particularly to the honourable leader of the Government.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Generally speaking, yes. That is a very large question which my honourable friend submits to me. The policy of the Bill is to make the net income taxable. It is needless to say that, notwithstanding that statement, many questions will arise as to what really constitutes net income

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, I take it for granted that the idea of the Bill is to reach the income which is enjoyed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: So if from a gross income of $10,000 liabilities of $5,000 must be deducted, it stands to reason that the income which a person emjoys is the net income of $5,000.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I would not agree to that proposal.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Of course, when I speak of liabilities I do not refer to liabilities incurred in the expenditure of the net income; I speak of fixed liabilities, such as the interest on a loan, or the taxes which a person pays upon property which gives him a return. It seems to me that we are all agreed that the Government does not intend to levy a tax upon the liabilities. The tax is levied upon the profits.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Suppose the person does not get profits?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: If he does not get profits, then there is no income.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Though he may have his money invested.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In estimating profit the liabilities have to be taken into consideration.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Certainly.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The first test is whether the liabilities have been spent in earning the income. A man earns, say, $10,000 and he owes $5,000. If that $5,000 has been spent in earning the income of $10,000, it must be deducted.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Yes. I would draw the attention of this honourable House to the clause of the United States Act passed in 1913. Section 2, subdivision 1, says:

> There shall be levied, assessed, collected and paid annually upon the entire net income arising or accruing from all sources in the preceding calendar year to every citizen of the United States, whether residing at home or abroad, and to every person residing in the United States, though not a citizen thereof, a tax of one percentum per annum upon such income, except as hereinafter provided; and a like tax shall be assessed, levied, collected and paid annually upon the entire net income from all property owned and of every business, trade or profession carried on in the United States by persons residing elsewhere.

There is a clear statement that the United States will levy its taxation only upon the entire net income. When the Government there presents its demand to the individual, it will ask, "What is your income?" And that individual will understand that it is his net income that is referred to, because surely it is not upon his gross income that he will be taxed. A business has a gross income and has a net income.

I do not see so clear a statement in the English law; but the English Act is not a piece of legislation which has been brought forward complete and logical, like the American Act; it has been changed from year to year.

I would suggest that section 3 be amended in order that its meaning may be expressed more clearly by inserting the word "net" in the following places: in the second line, before the word "profit" and before the word "gain" and in the fifth line before the word "profits."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will see that if he proceeds to qualify those words he must consistently do so throughout the section. It seems to me that "income" can have only one meaning; "profit" can have only one meaning; "gratuity" can have only one meaning; "gain" can have only one meaning. All these words are used in the Act, and unless we are prepared to qualify each by prefixing the word "net," we only introduce confusion into the Bill.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I make the suggestion because I want to have a clearer indication given that what the State desires is that it is upon the net profit that the income tax shall be levied. Even then there will be, I am quite sure, a sufficient latitude for people to differ in a number of instances where the question will arise as to what constitutes a charge or a liability and what constitutes net profit. But it seams to me that we should go as far as possible towards making it clear that it is the net profit which is aimed at. It is all the more necessary that the word "net" should be added, because subsection 3 of section 3 contains the words "net profit."

In the case of the income of persons residing, or having their head office or principal place of business outside of Canada, but carrying on business in Canada, either directly or through or in the name of any other person, the income shall be the net profit or gain arising from the business of such person in Canada.

What distinction will a person be able to make between the words contained in subsection 1 of section 3, where "profit or gain or gratuity" are mentioned as meant by the word "income," and the words contained in subsection 3 of section 3, where a different expression is used to apply to the very same thing:

The income shall be the net income or gain arising from the business of such person in Canada.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think it would have been better if the word "net" had been left out in that case.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: There you have the indication that it is the net profit which is taxable, while generally it would seem by inference that it is not the net profit which is aimed at.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I would have been better pleased if the honourable member from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) had put a stated case, so that we could all understand the matter once and for all. I will endeavour to do so. Suppose a man has been in business for himself; he has been unfortunate, and he has accumulated a liability and has handed over to his bank his assets as security, with an undertaking to pay the liability off within a term of years. After that he has to accept a salaried position—it does not matter whether his salary is $5,000 or $10,000 a year—say, at $10,000. That man has to pay the bank, in order to recover the assets which he has had to hypothecate, say $3,000 a year. Is his income $10,000 or $7,000?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I have no hesitation in saying that it should be $7,000. That is all he will get and enjoy for that year. If the honourable gentleman asks me to suggest a case, I will repeat an illustration given by the Minister of Finance. I do not know if the Minister of Finance felt as sure of his ground after the discussion as he did when he brought the argument forward and used it. It was as follows: A man in Ottawa has a salary of $5,000 from a bank, and has that salary during the whole of the year 1917, which is the year upon which he will be taxed. For the last five or ten years he has had some vacant lots in the city of Ottawa, which he has inherited. He has not yet disposed of the lots; they are on his hands and he pays taxes upon them. Should not those taxes be deducted from his $5,000? What is his net income? I contend that his net income is not the $5,000 which he receives, because he cannot enjoy the $5,000. He must first pay his taxes. Suppose that upon those lots there is a mortgage of $5,000. He pays interest on that mortgage.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Would you deduct a man's life insurance?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No, I would not.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Suppose he spends $500 a year on life insurance, is that to be deducted?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Is not putting money into real estate the same thing?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He has that charge; he owes $5,000 on a mortgage.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: He gets the advantage of it when he pays it off.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He does not get the advantage until the lots are sold, and if they are sold below the value of the mortgage he receives no advantage.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend puts the word "net" before the word "income" in that particular case, will that throw any light upon the matter? Let us deal with this case. My honourablbe friend has given as an illustration the case of a man with a salary of $5,000 from a bank. This man also has some real estate. What is his income? Is his income that derivable from his usual occupation of a banker, or is he to deduct the liabilities that may attach themselves to some other investment into which he has gone?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I will answer my honourable friend's question by another question. Instead of vacant lots this man has a house which he rents for $1,000 a year. He has charges of $500 to meet, taxes, interest upon a mortgage, and insurance, leaving $500, which he draws from the house. What is the net income of that man? Is it not the $5,000 which he draws plus the net profits from the house? Will my honourable friend contend that he gets $6,000 a year?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Suppose that under the mortgage he has to pay not only interest, but $100 annually of the principal, would you deduct that $100?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No. That is practically an investment. But, as a matter of fact, what is the amount of income he will enjoy in that situation? He will enjoy $5,500. If my honourable friend admits that from that $1,000 which he draws from that property $500 of charges must be deducted—and I think he will come to that conclusion—then how much should be deducted if the next year that house is not rented? The charges remain, but the man has not got the rental of $1,000. Then, I say his income is no more $5,500; his income, which was $5,000, which he received as a salary, is really $4,500. If he had the rental the state would tax the profit of the transaction, but the state surely must stand to lose if the income is reduced by the loss of the rental.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable member for De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) has shown that in the Act of the United States the words used are "net income," and I think he has conclusively shown that it is opportune to use that word here. I refer to Foster's "Income Tax," where I find this:

Judicial Definitions of Income.—It was said by Lord Chancellor Halsbury of England: "I think it cannot be doubted, upon the language and the whole purport and meaning of the income tax acts, that it never was intended to tax capital . . . as income at all events." Lord Macnaghten: "In every case the tax is a tax on income, whatever may be the standard by which the income is measured. It is a tax on 'profits or gains' in the case of duties chargeable under Schedule (A), and the expression 'profits and gains' is constantly applied without distinction to the subject of charge under all the schedules."

There are a few dicta in the state courts to the contrary.

"Strictly speaking, 'income' means that which comes in or is received from any business or investment of capital without reference to the outgoing expenditures." Accordingly, in a Georgia case "annual income" was construed as meaning "gross income." So, "property may have an annual value 'without any income'." And the term "profits or income" has been construed as meaning "gross profits" or "gross income," and not "net profits" or "net income." By the rule of construction, noscitur a sociis, however, the words in this statute must be construed in connection with those to which it is joined, namely, gains and profits; and it is evidently the intention, as a general rule, to tax only the profits of the taxpayer, not his whole revenue. Accordingly, money received as the result of the change of an investment, or as the proceeds of a sale without profit, is not income.

This book deals with the laws on income in Great Britain, the United States, France, and other countries. In the United States they have gone further than has been mentioned by my honourable friend from De Lorimier. They go this far:

That in computing net income for the purpose of the normal tax there shall be allowed as deductions: First, the necessary expenses actually paid in carrying on any business, not including personal, living, or family expenses; second, all interest paid within the year by a taxable person on indebtedness; third, all national, state, county, school, and municipal taxes paid within the year, not including those assessed against local benefits; fourth, losses actually sustained during the year, incurred in trade or arising from fires, storms or shipwreck, and not compensated for by insurance or otherwise; fifth, debts due to the taxpayer actually ascertained to be worthless and charged off within one year; sixth, a reasonable allowance for the exhaustion, wear and tear of property arising out of its use or employment in the business, not to exceed, in the case of mines, 5 per centum of the gross value at the mine of the output for the year for which the computation is made, but no deduction shall be made for any amount of expense of restoring property or making good the exhaustion thereof for which an allowance is or has been made.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is that the English Act?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: No, the United States Act.

Provided, that no deduction shall be allowed for any amount paid out for new buildings, permanent improvements, or betterments, made to increase the value of any property or estate; seventh, the amount received as dividends upon the stock or from the net earnings of any corporation, joint stock company, association, or insurance company which is taxable upon its net income, as hereinafter provided; eighth, the amount of income, the tax upon which has been paid or withheld for payment at the source of the income, under the provisions of this section, provided that whenever the tax upon the income of a person is required to be withheld and paid at the source as hereinafter required, if such annual income does not exceed the sum of $3,000 or is not fixed or certain, or is indefinite, or irregular as to amount or time of accrual, the same shall not be deducted in the personal return of such person.

The Act goes on to define more closely how the net income is arrived at. It seems to me that we should all agree that what is intended is to tax the net income of a person. Of course, there are nice questions which arise and which will arise in practice in the working of the Act, as to what constitutes "net income," but I think we should adopt the suggestion and insert the word "net."

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I would think it was not the intention of the Act to tax property twice; but would not that be done in the case of a bank? The moneys in the bank belong to the shareholders. If there was no dividend declared, there would be a payment of taxes made on the earnings of the bank, where as if the profits were distributed to the shareholders, they would be called upon to pay a tax on this same money under the Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is provided for.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I should like to limit my amendment to putting the word "net" in the second line of clause 3, after the word "annual." I draw the attention of my honourable friend to the fact that he will have either to add that word "net" in the first part of the clause or else strike out the word "net" in the last part.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think it is well to bear in mind that this Act is not a tax on the person, and it is not a tax on capital. It must be entirely upon income and what you have to deal with under the Act is not gross income or net income; it is the statutory income. The statute undertakes to ascertain what is the income on which you have to pay a tax. In doing that it puts in one account the profits of your business or your salary, and in the other it puts the number of exemptions, and by subtracting those exemptions you find the statutory income. I cannot see how the insertion of the word "net" there will do anything more than probably cause trouble. The annual profit or gain from the business, after all, is not made any more specific or definite by inserting that word. The important thing is to check over the exemption items—a. b, c, d, e, f. In the American Act, which has been used very freely by the draftsmen of this Act, the income of a person is ascertained in one way with certain exemptions, while the income of a corporation is arrived at in another way. Our Act has put them both together, with this qualification, that at the end of section 4 we find that corporations are liable only for the normal tax and not for the super-tax at all, while individuals are liable for the latter. In the United States Act of 1913 there are a larger number of exemptions than in our Act, and national, provincial and municipal taxes are deducted from the tax paid by individuals; but they are not exempted from the income of companies, which pay only the normal tax.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: What would be the position of our business under this Act?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It is not exempted. That raises the question whether a clause should not be inserted at the end there.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: It occurs to me that "net income" in that case covers the amount. In the case of a corporation there is no question about what the income is; it is net income after everything has been disposed of; but an individual who has an income, and who is carrying on certain operations, is not placed in the same position as a corporation unless provision is made.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The honourable gentleman is evidently treating the matter from the personal standpoint. If a man has a business, say a lumber business, to find out what the income from that business is you do not subtract the general debts, but only the debts that are incurred in carrying on the business.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: That is exactly my point.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: But if the man deals in outside matters and loses money on the stock exchange, he cannot deduct that.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: No, but if he buys and pays for a certain stock, borrowing money for the purchase, and gets an income from it, but has to pay interest on the borrowed money, is that interest which he pays on his loan to be deducted from his gross income from the stock?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If a man went into a gambling transaction and lost money on stock, he would not pay on that.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: My question does not refer to a gambling transaction at all. Suppose a man borrows money from the bank to buy stock; he pays interest on that loan; he receives an income from that stock equal to what he borrowed; then he has no income at all. As an individual he would have to pay under this Act.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: But he has no annual profit.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: That is perfectly true; hence I think it is highly desirable to say "net income," because that would determine that case precisely.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Suppose a man paid the bank up, would he have income?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: If he once paid the bank, the stock would be his property then, and he would have an income.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: True, the man enjoys an income, but why should he pay for the stock out of the income?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: He owes the bank the money borrowed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But he is creating capital by paying for the stock.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Suppose a man receives $5,000 of income from certain stock, but is paying the bank on a loan interest to an equivalent amount, or a less amount?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: If the man borrowed from the bank at 6 per cent and the stock paid him 8 per cent, what would you do?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: He would have to pay on the 2 per cent.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The interest that he pays would be deducted from the money that goes to income.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think it must be pretty clear to the committee that the wording of this clause is not ideal. Here are a number of astute lawyers and keen business men who do not seem to see quite distinctly the meaning of the clause. How, then, can we expect people who have not those advantages to know what it means? I think the amendment suggested by the honourable member from De Lorimier is a very judicious one. Every one has a fair idea of what net income means, and if you are going to tax net income, as I think is intended, the right thing is to say so. Moreover I cannot see why the people who happen to be doing business and residing in Canada should be treated differently from persons who reside outside of Canada. Subsection 3 provides that non-residents' income shall be net profit or gain; why should not the same words be used in the case of residents of Canada? As the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier says, either the first or the third subsection must be changed, for there is no reason why a man living outside of Canada should be in a better position than one living here.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I understood from the honourable member for Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) that this Bill is drafted on the basis of taxing total receipts less the deductions.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No; in section 3 (1) the words in line 2 are "the annual profit or gain."

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Take the case of a joint stock company, are we agreed that what should be taxed are the net profits of that company? And suppose the company has borrowed $50,000, the interest payable yearly on the amount borrowed will be deducted for the purpose of ascertaining the amount upon which the tax will bear. It seems to me that the same rule should apply to the individual. Take two individuals, A and B, each of whom owns a number of properties that are rented. In one case the tenants pay taxes, and in the other the owner pays them. Under this wording I fear they would not be treated equally. Unless we adopt the words "net income" in one case the taxes would be deducted in fixing the income, and in the other case there would be no deduction because the owner is not paying taxes. In the United States they have gone further and have undertaken to designate what is the net income. Take also the case of two bank clerks, each receiving $5,000 salary, one occupying his own house, which is clear from incumbrance, the other being subject to a mortgage of $5,000. Surely interest on that $5,000 would be deducted before the second clerk would be taxed on the amount of his salary. A number of such cases might be cited to show the necessity of determining whether the tax should be on net income or not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I should like to put this question to my honourable friend from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Edwards). Suppose a man borrows from a bank $10,000 to invest in buying stocks, and pays 6 per cent for the loan, and draws 6 per cent from the investment, there would then be no profit?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Then would not that be covered by the word profit as well as if we said "net profit"?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: No, because this covers an individual as well as a company. When you take the annual profit, it deals with an individual who is in business, and I take it that annual profit there means the gross profit. Then he has to make the deductions from the profit on his business before he can arrive at his real net income or net profit.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: My honourable friend assumes exactly what I am contending for, that only net profits should be reckoned on.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been moved by Hon. Mr. Dandurand that the word "net" be added after the word "annual" in the second line of section 3.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: We have heard the views of several honourable gentlemen on the question of inserting the word "net." My views are those of the ordinary man on the street. The ordinary citizen, who will take up this Act, as he will have to do, for he is going to be taxed under it, will draw his conclusions. Supposing the Bill is left as it is at present, without the word "net," he reads it over and finds that "income" means the annual profit or gain—the amount that he obtains by carrying on his profession or business, as the clause states. So he infers that it is the whole income which is to be taxed, until he turns over the leaf and finds that there are certain exemptions and deductions which are to be made in order to arrive at the income which is to be taxed. On the other hand, supposing the word "net" is inserted, he comes to the conclusion that it is only his net income which is to be taxed; that the deductions provided for in the Act are to be made, and there be other deductions in addition to those. Well, what does the ordinary man consider to be his net income? He looks upon his net income—especially when he is ascertaining it for the purpose of taxation—as being the income that is left after all possible deductions are made. So it appears to me that inserting the word "net" in this clause would only create confusion instead of preventing it. I for one certainly think that the clause is clearer and better defined as it stands than it would be with the word "net" inserted. I have been aided very much in arriving at this conclusion by the very clear statement made by the honourable gentleman from Middleton, who pointed out that the income to be taxed is the income mentioned in this Act, with the deduction to be made only as provided for in the Act. It appears to me that to put in the word "net" would cause controversy which would not arise if the word were left out. A man may oppose the taxation which is put upon him, and his lawyer immediately pitches on the word "net." To my mind it would increase the confusion and create trouble. Whereas the idea of the honourable gentleman who introduced the amendment was perhaps that it might make the Act clearer, it appears to me it would simply have the opposite effect. The amendment is not brought in for the purpose of providing people with a chance to evade taxation. This Bill is for the purpose of taxing the people. It describes, in various clauses, the kinds of taxation to be imposed—the property and income on which the taxation is placed. It is to my mind pretty clear, and I think if the word "net" is added to subsection 3 it would not be made clearer, but the change would have the opposite effect. As far as I am concerned, I shall be obliged to vote against the amendment.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I presume, then, that the honourable gentleman, when he comes to subsection 3 of this section, in which the non-resident is taxed only on his net income, will propose to strike out the word "net" in that subsection?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I may. I have not yet come to that clause. I like to take the matter up clause by clause.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I was about to suggest that it might be well to allow this clause to stand with the suggestion which my honourable friend from De Lorimier has made. Then we can consider it in its application to the other clauses as we go through the Bill, and we can return to it afterwards.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Before we leave this subsection, I think it would be well to draw the attention of this honourable House to the fact that the amendment of the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier, if it is adopted, should be followed by other amendments—such, for instance, as this addition:

> Provided, however, that in determining the net income the personal and living expenses shall not be taken into consideration.

I think it might come at the end of paragraph f of subsection 1.

Then there are other changes which might be made. Paragraph a should also be amended. I would call attention also to this fact, that the construction which would be put upon the words, "annual profit or gain," if the word "net" is not added, would be influenced considerably by the fact that deductions are made. I think that the context of the clause would tend to show that the tax is not to be imposed on net profit or net income, because the clause enumerates the deductions which should be made. For instance, the Act governing the income tax law of the United States makes deductions and enumerates them; the deductions are all supposed to be enumerated. The moment an enumeration of the deductions is made, those mentioned will be presumed to cover all the deductions and will exclude other deductions, which I think might be made if none were specified in the Act.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC: If the word "net" is added to the Bill, will it mean that a man deduct all his living expenses?

Some Hon. SENATORS: No, no.

Hon. Mr. BOLDUC: If all the living expenses were deducted, there would be in many cases no profit left. "Net profit" ought to mean the profit remaining after certain deductions are made.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is proposed to mention specifically that living expenses shall not be deducted. I think that is what my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Béique) intends in the amendment he proposes to make.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: There are two ways of arriving at the amount of taxable income. One would be to take the net income and place the tax upon that. The other would be to take the whole of the income and then make the deductions. But there are certain deductions provided for in paragraphs a, b, c, d, e and f of this Bill, and they must remain in it. Do I understand the honourable gentleman to say that he proposes to move that these exceptions be taken out?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: No.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The way I propose to look at the question is to consider what deductions should be made from the total income. But, by whichever way the amount taxable is arrived at, the question is as broad as it is long.

Then, I want to call attention to what I think is probably an omission from subsection 3 on the part of the draftsman. I think he made this Bill a little ambiguous where the Act from which it was copied is perfectly clear. In paragraph a of subsection 1 you will find the words:

> The value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent.

The wording of the American Act is this:

> Any other source, including the income from, but not the value of, property acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent.

That is very clear.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But that phrase cannot be included in the clause as it is now drafted.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: That wording makes the intention clearer. If that wording were included in this Bill paragraph a would be a part of subsection 1 of section 3, paragraph b would become a, paragraph c would become b.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would the honourable gentleman propose to insert it as paragraph a?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No; it would have to be included in subsection a of section 3.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Why should you treat it differently from the way in which it is treated here? Why not say:

> The income from property acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Paragraph a is an exemption.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would come in after the word "source."

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If the suggestion were to make an addition after the word "source," I understand that paragraph a would be struck out.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes, and b would become a.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: It seems to me that that is going entirely against the law as laid down this afternoon with regard to the Senate increasing taxation. That is going to increase taxation. As it stands at present, it is only the value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise, or descent that is deducted; but my honourable friend is going to put in the income from those things, so he is adding that much to the taxation Bill which we have before us. I appeal to him whether, according to his own view as expressed in this House, this Senate has the power to do that.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I would say yes to the honourable gentleman. I am only trying to make the meaning of that clause clear. A man gets, say in January, a legacy of $10,000, and it earns $500 during the year. Under this section the $500 is assessed, but the corpus of the property is not. That is my reading of the Act. I have not any doubt that that is what it means, but many people have been troubled about it: Therefore, to make it clear that you are exempting the corpus or the principal and only taxing the interest, I move that after the word "source" the following be added:

including the income tax from, but not—

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would call attention to line 28, in section 3; or unascertained as being fees or emoluments, or as being profits from a trade or commercial or financial or other business or calling, directly or indirectly received by a person from any office or employment.

In the first instance, one concludes that that means unascertained fees, or emoluments; but clause 7 of the Bill says:

Every person liable to taxation under this Act shall, on or before the 28th day of February in each year, without any notice or demand, deliver to the minister a return, in such form as the minister may prescribe, of his total income during the last preceding calendar year.

I presume those fees and emoluments are the actual fees and emoluments which he has been able to collect. They are not what a man has written on his books, what he has charged against clients, but which he may never collect. I take it that the fees and emoluments, under clause 7, must be the ones which he actually collects.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would not that be qualified by the words in the 30th line of section 3, "directly or indirectly received"?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Then, would it not be better to strike out the words "unascertained"?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: There might be an unascertained amount.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But if it is not received——

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The income would only be the fees or emoluments which he actually collects.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would be placing a premium upon allowing fees or emoluments to remain unascertained.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: He would collect them the following year.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: "Unascertained" may not be uncollectable. The unascertained amount may be contingent upon something else, settlements of accounts, or an arbitration, or something of that sort. It might not go into the statement of that year, but it would have to go in the following year.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Until it is ascertained it does not become part of the income.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It stands to reason, then, that he could not put it in the statement for that particular year.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Then, what is the good of putting in the word "unascertained"?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He would escape taxation when it was ascertained. He might ascertain it immediately afterwards. It would permit of all kinds of evasion; it would place a premium on leaving fees unascertained.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The fees will only become part of the income when they are actually collected.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I draw attention to the fact that this is in the definition of the word "income." The word "income" means wages, salary, profit, or gain, whether ascertained or unascertained. I suppose it does not mean that the tax will be collected if those unascertained profits are not collected, yet I see the point which my honourable friend makes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I understand that the suggestion of the honourable the leader of the Opposition is merely to strike out the word "unascertained," leaving fees or emoluments.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If that is done, let us see what it will lead to. Take a medical man. He may have $5,000 of accounts on his books. They are unascertained fees. They have to be taken into account, whether collected or not. He may lose half of them when he comes to collect them, but he will have paid much more than he should have paid. Under the English Act there is a provision to cover things of this kind. There is a certain delay granted to a man to show that he has paid more than he should have paid, and in that case he is entitled to be reimbursed in order to reduce the amount to the exact amount which he should have paid. Under this Act there is no such remedy, and if these words remain in the Bill all these fees would have to be taken into consideration, although a man might never collect half of them. I am not exactly sure as to whether there can be any objection to striking out these words, but surely there are strong reasons why they should not appear in the Bill as it stands.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What does my honourable friend think of the words in line 30, whether they have been "directly or indirectly" received by a person? There may be an unascertained amount.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Do these words bear on the point?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think so. Profits may be of the same class. The form under section 7, to which my honourable gentlemen to the right, with regard to vision for unascertained accounts. It is to be a form prescribed by the minister. It seems to me obvious that if they are unascertained they cannot be included in the form and be subject to the tax before being realized, but they would appear in the statement of the following year.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I am sorry that I am not able to agree with the three honourable gentlemen to my right, with regard to this clause. I recognize the imperfections of this Bill, but I cannot see that the language that we are dealing with now is open to the criticism which has been bestowed upon it. "The annual profits, whether ascertained and capable of computation as being wages, salary, or other fixed amount"—these are all things that do not require investigation. If a man is paid $2 a day in wages, you know what his income is; if his salary is $2,000 a year, you know what it is. That is ascertained without any further inquiries. But when you come to deal with profits from a trade or commercial or financial or other business, then you come to something which requires investigation and inquiry before you can ascertain what the amount to be assessed is, and it is unascertained. I think the language fills the bill well enough.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I take the same view. Nearly every business in the world closes at the end of the year. In taking an inventory there are a lot of outstanding accounts which have not been paid, and the usual practice is to put a fair value upon them. If they are all good; if they are doubtful, they are taken as of some value; and if they are bad they are taken as of no value I cannot see the difference between a business firm estimating its assets and a professional man.

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: Take the case of a man who is a partner in a business and who is making no money outside of that. His share, say, amounts to $2,200, and he pays an income tax to the local government and pays his school taxes and other taxes. Would that be deducted before the net profit was computed? We all know that above 7 per cent a man has to pay a 25-per-cent tax on his profits; but does the local income tax come out of the amount that he is assessed?

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: It is involved in the question that stands.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think that the leader of the Opposition is a little at variance with us about this word "unascertained" in confining this word to fees or emoluments. I understand that "unascertained" runs through all the rest of the section. It may be ascertained or unascertained.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It says:

or unascertained as being fees or emoluments.

Then there is a comma.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I have no doubt that it should not be there, because in the second line you have "ascertained" and in the fourth line "unascertained," and you will find at the very end of the section that the gains or profits are assessable, whether they are distributed or not. A man may have an interest in a company, they might have their statement ready, or it might have to stand over. Taking out that comma—

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: If that were taken out, I think it would put the matter right to some extent; but the honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) and the honourable gentleman from Russell (Hon. Mr. Edwards), in speaking of this both speak of the profits of business. Professional men do not generally make up a balance sheet such as ordinary business men do, and if this matter is not set out very clearly there will be trouble in finding what the income is. I would not take it from section 7 that the fees charged up during the year for professional services rendered would be the income, for many of those fees might not be collected. A balance sheet would have to be drawn up and a certain amount written off for bad debts, etc., before the income could be arrived at.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: A professional man is not liable for taxation on income until it is received.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But if it is received is it ascertained?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Yes, it is ascertained if it is received.

Hon. Mr. POWER: But the total is not ascertained.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I would move that paragraph b be amended by making it read as follows:

The proceeds of life insurance policies paid upon the death of the person insured, but not the interest or income therefrom, or payments made or credited to the insured on life insurance endowment.

—striking out the rest of the paragraph. My reasons for the suggestion are these. We are dealing with exceptions or deductions to be made. Suppose the sum of $50,000 is paid to a beneficiary, surely the intention is to treat this as capital, but not to include as a deduction the interest or income from that $50,000. Then the second part which I wish struck out is this:

Or annuity contracts upon the maturity of the term mentioned in the contract or upon the surrender of the contract.

There is no reason to leave those words in. Surely it is not the intention that any person may make a contract with an insurance company, paying say $100,000 or $200,000, and in consideration of that payment receive an annual income of $20,000 or $30,000 on which no taxes would be levied. If those words were allowed to remain I think the Bill would be open to abuse in that direction.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The proposal is, briefly, that annuities should not be exempt?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The American Act has a proviso by which the proceeds of life insurance policies or endowments or annuity contracts are added to a man's capital.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is not the way it is here. It would look as if it were to be exempt from the payment of income.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: It is the same argument that prompted the honourable gentlemen to move his amendment to subclause a.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: As I see the point, it would be covered by striking out the words "or annuity contracts." An insurance endowment that is paid to a man during his life-time is capital, and not income, and I should suppose that the clause, "upon the maturity of the term mentioned in a contract or upon the surrender of the contract," would still apply to those life insurance endowments, which are unquestionably capital.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The Act has nothing to do with saying how a man shall deal with his profits, whether he puts them in the fire or in an annuity; but suppose I had an endowment contract, and it were coming due this year, and I had paid nine payments and had one more to pay, before the contract fell in, when the contract comes due and the endowment is paid it ought not to be treated as income for this year, but rather as my capital.

Hon. Mr. McLEAN: I know a case where a man at a certain age paid $10,000 into a company, and from that he was to receive $1,500 a year during his lifetime.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: That is what I wanted to cover. I am afraid the Act is open to exclude from taxation annuities of that kind. If, by the payment of $100,000 in cash, a man of my age should be entitled to receive $12,000 or $15,000 yearly for life, why should not that annual payment be taxed ?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It will pay income tax.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But I am afraid that under the wording of subclause b it would not be taxed at all, because it would be an annuity.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That could be cured by taking the words from the American Act and adding them, saying that this subclause shall not include as income the proceeds of life-insurance policies.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: My amendment may be too radical—that it should not affect contracts already in existence; but even so, suppose that a year ago I had made a contract of the kind I mentioned, it should be clear that this $15,000 annual payment should be taxed.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Suppose a man put $1,000 a year on deposit in the Savings Bank, and after ten years he has $10,000 with accumulated interest, he would pay income tax on that to-day. He could take another method, and buy an annuity with that $10,000. It is only right that in both cases, while the money is accumulating in the bank, or is invested in the annuity, the income or interest on the amount should be taxed.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The inequality of it lies in this fact. Let us assume that $100,000 will purchase an annuity of $15,000 a year. The owner of that $100,000, if he had it invested on interest at 6 per cent, would be liable to pay an income tax on $6,000 a year; but if he bought an annuity, he has an income of $15,000 a year, on which he will have to pay income tax, which would be much larger than on his income from an investment of $100,000 at interest at 6 per cent. How are you to provide for that inequality? The question is, is it equitable to make the annuity liable to the income tax to the full extent, whereas if the man invested the same principal with which he bought the annuity, he would pay a very much smaller proportion of income tax? However, I suppose that is one of the difficulties that would have to be worked out.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: Does not the honourable leader of the Government overlook the fact that here the annuity is exempted?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But we are providing against that. In my judgment there is no reason why it should be exempt.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: To return to subclause c: if this income tax lasts for any length of time I think it would be well to consider inserting a clause stating that after the allowances on the amount of the original cost of the mine or well there should not be any further allowances deducted.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You can readjust that at any time. Suppose there is an allowance made, it is not an enduring allowance, so to speak.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: In a province where a moratorium is in effect, what would happen to the revenue where people cannot collect their rents and income? That would apply in Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In that case they would not have an income, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: That would be a case of unascertained income.

Subsection 1 of section 3 stands.

Subsection 2 of section 3—holding companies—was agreed to.

Subsection 3 of section 3—non-residents—stands.

Subsection 4 of section 3—undistributed gains—was agreed to.

On subsection 1 of section 4—income tax:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would make a proposal to the honourable leader of the Government in regard to this clause. I find that in the English Act, passed in the year 1910, provision was made for exception in the case of a man whose income from all sources does not exceed £500, but who has a child or children living under sixteen years, relief being given in such case to the extent of £10 for each child.

To that provision a further one was added, defining what 'children' meant, and so on. Apparently they found that that was a good move, and in the Act of 1914 they extended the provision as follows:

> Section 7. Section 68 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (which gives to individuals whose total income does not exceed £500 relief from income tax equal to the amount of tax on ten pounds in respect of every child under the age of sixteen years of age), shall have effect as if £20 were substituted for £10.

In the year 1915 section 24 amended the clause still further, providing:

> Section 7 of the Finance Act, 1914 (which extends to the relief from income tax given in respect of children), shall have effect as if £25 were substituted for £20.

So they raised the amount that might be deducted from the income return to £25 for every child under 16 years of age. Then in the Act of 1916 they further provided:

> Section 68 of the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910 (which gives to individuals whose total income does not exceed £500 relief from income tax in respect of children), shall, as amended by any subsequent Act, have effect as if £700 were substituted as the limit of income for £500.

So honourable gentlemen will see that in Great Britain they started by making the remission of £10 for each child; then they apparently found it was better to raise it to £25; and they further raised the amount of income to which this provision might apply from £500 to £700. I think that is a point which the Government might very well consider in regard to the conditions of this country at the present time. I think that some consideration should be given to married people with children, and I would propose that an amendment somewhat like the following should be made:

After the word "persons" in the twenty-second line, that is, in paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 4, the following should be added.

Provided, however, that when they have children dependent on them an amount not exceeding $300 for each child so dependent on them may be deducted from the amount by which their income exceeds $3,000, before any tax shall be assessed, levied and paid thereon.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman fixes no age in the first place.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: No, I have not fixed any age; I have left it to the committee to say whether they think it is desirable to insert the age or not. I have just put it generally—"dependent," because paragraph a of subsection 1 of section 4 reads:

Four per centum upon all incomes exceeding fifteen hundred dollars in the case of unmarried persons and widows or widowers without dependent children and exceeding three thousand dollars in the case of all other persons.

Hon. Mr. POWER: That would be a certain measure of justice to the province of Quebec. In England the premium is only $100 for each child, and the honourable gentleman proposes $300. Let us split the difference and make it $200.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Supposing a man's income were $4,000. First of all, $3,000 is deducted; then there is $1,000 left on which he would have to pay an income tax on 4 per cent. If he had one child he could deduct $300 from that $1,000, leaving only $700 on which he would pay the tax of 4 per cent. If he had two children he could deduct $600, and so on.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: And if he had half a dozen children he would not have to pay any tax at all?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: No, if the income did not exceed the $4,000.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: This Bill is constructed to meet the case of persons with dependent children. Where there are no children the tax is upon any amount exceeding $1,500, but where there are children the income is exempt up to $3,000. I know this point was discussed in the other House, and the excuse was given, or the defence made, that this difference was made because of dependent children.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What is the amount mentioned in the English Act?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Twenty-five pounds —about $100.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I think the exemption of $3,000 for married persons is enough as compared with the exemption for others, who are assessed on incomes in excess of $1,500.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend thinks that $3,000 exempted is a large amount.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I did not say that.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I thought I was repeating my honourable friend's words. Three thousand dollars for a couple to live upon is a sum which under certain circumstances may be sufficient, but what about a couple with six or ten children? I saw only last week an announcement of a widow returning to the city with six daughters; and I have a friend who has eight daughters growing up. I have an idea of what it means to maintain six or seven daughters growing up and going out. It seems to me unjust to put on the same footing a married couple without children and with an income of $5,000 a year, and another married couple with six or seven children. A remark was made a few moments ago that one could have such a large family that he would be free from all taxes. I have in my hand a schedule of the income tax law which was passed by the Parliament of France. Of course, it was a pre-war income tax, not a war tax. Take for instance a person having an income of 20,000 francs.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: That is, $4,000.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Four thousand dollars. An unmarried taxpayer without dependents pays 120 francs; a married taxpayer without dependents, 96 francs; a married couple having one dependent, 79 francs, 80 centimes; with two children or two dependents, 64 francs, 80 centimes; three dependents, 48 francs; four dependents, 36 francs, 40 centimes; five dependents, 26 francs, 40 centimes; six dependents, 16 francs; seven dependents, 10 francs; eight dependents, seven francs; nine dependents, four francs; ten dependents, one franc.

I think it would perhaps be interesting for future reference to have this whole schedule inserted in our Hansard, because it gives the sliding scale. The unmarried taxpayer enjoys the same exemptions according to the number of his dependants. In this present bill we make no such provision. There are unmarried persons who have dependents. There are some—I know some myself—who have brought up brothers and sisters and have not married because they had those dependents. And yet they are not given the privilege that is accorded to the married couple with dependents. It seems to me that it is a most just provision to reduce the tax in proportion to the number of dependents that a person has under his care.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I thought the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Bostock) proposed to reduce the amount from $300.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say to my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock) that I could not accept that amendment. It would so materially reduce the income tax as to interfere with its effectiveness.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: We might just as well strike it out altogether.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is the honourable gentleman objecting to the principle or to the amount?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The amendment would introduce into the Act an entirely new principle calculated to substantially reduce the tax, and it goes so far, I think, as to warrant my statement that we have no right to introduce an element of that kind into the Bill. The other amendments which we have made are explanatory of the purposes of the Bill, and not an interference with the tax.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: The amendment would not increase the tax; it would reduce it. We have already decided that this House can reduce a tax.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have no doubt my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. Mr. Ross) will support the amendment.

Hon. W. C. EDWARDS: Honourable gentlemen, I understood from my honourable friend the leader of the Government that an opportunity would be afforded for discussing the general principle of the Bill; and, without expressing any opinion as to the amendment suggested, I should like, if I may be permitted, to say a few words on the general principle. Is that agreeable, Mr. Chairman?

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: That would require unanimous consent, would it not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It was understood on the second reading of the Bill that an opportunity would be given for discussing it further in committee.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: If it is preferable to defer my remarks till the third reading, I will do so.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Go ahead now, and let us have the information.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I shall not detain the House long. My purpose in speaking is not to offer factious opposition to the Bill. The honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) entirely expressed my views when he spoke the other day, and to say that I endorse his speech would practically cover the ground. I am afraid this Bill will not achieve the objects which are intended. Canada is not like the old European countries or the United States, a large proportion of whose populations have fixed incomes. In Canada there are but a limited number of fixed incomes. All the businesses in this country upon which large incomes accrue are those connected with the development of the natural resources of the country, or its manufacturing. All, or nearly all the businesses of this country are large borrowers. My view is that the effect of this Bill will be to hinder development and enterprise; that it will have the very opposite effect from that which is intended, and that incomes such as there may be to-day will very rapidly decrease. From this unfortunate war, which has brought about present conditions, there are certain classes of manufacturers in this country who profit very largely—manufacturers who before the war, many of them, were in a very doubtful position. The classes in Canada who derive the greatest benefit from the artificial conditions which now prevail in Canada are those manufacturers and the agriculturists and the labouring classes. Those who suffer most are, many of them, engaged in the development of our national resources. For instance, the industry in which I am myself employed is crushed to the very earth as a consequence of the conditions brought about by the war. I do not think that the lumber trade of Canada to-day is making one dollar—that is my honest conviction; and I do not see any hope for its immediate recovery. Now, those who levy taxation may always intend to be as just as possible. I do not wish at all to criticise the Minister of Finance. If there is a man in Canada to-day who is to be pitied it is the Finance Minister, for he has at present the most difficult task of perhaps any Canadian; and I am afraid that his position will not improve. The Finance Minister of the immediate future, whether it be the present minister or another—whoever he may be—will have a very difficult task before him. If there are any other gentlemen in Canada to be pitied besides the Finance Minister, they are the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition. I do not criticise in any unfair way whatever. In speeches that have been made not far from here on the question of conscription, a tremendous effort was made in the direction of taxing what was called "wealth." The newspapers of Canada talked of the idea, and from one end of Canada to the other, we heard not only of conscription of men but of conscription of wealth; but as yet I have not heard from any of those sources what definition was given to wealth. Most of the gentlemen who were speaking on that subject in another Chamber, and most of the newspapers who were writing upon the subject, seemed to imagine that there were certain individuals in Canada who had immense wealth stored away somewhere, and they wanted to get at that wealth and make it pay taxes.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Confiscate it.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Yes. But they were overlooking the fact that there was no wealth in the country except property and labour. This idea that there is a store of money in Canada is all nonsense. Canada possesses very little money indeed. The basis upon which we are trading is credit. I am sure that it is the desire of any minister to tax fairly, and if taxation is levied, every man from the lowest to the highest should pay his fair relative proportion; but under this law that is not going to be the case. In my opinion, the supertax, as it is called, is not a fair imposition. A great many people think that because a man or a company has acquired a considerable amount of wealth, that individual or company should pay out of proportion to those who have not accumulated as much. This is the position. My neighbour and I start out in this world with equal opportunities and equal advantages in every respect. I am a profligate, but a money-maker; I spend my money as I go. My family enjoys from day to day everything that I acquire in the operation of business; they have every luxury and enjoy all the pleasures that this world can afford. My neighbour is a more frugal man, a more judicious man; he accumulates something and leaves something to his family; but because he has done so he is penalized while my family goes scot-free. My family have had their pleasure and luxury throughout my lifetime, but I leave them penniless. Those who apply themselves, those who are industrious and frugal are the subjects of undue taxation. I do not desire to occupy the time of the House for more than a moment, but I desire to point out that in this imagining as to great wealth, and where that great wealth exists, those who have been discussing the question overlook the fact, that after all the great wealth of Canada is in the hands of the agriculturists of the country. The capital invested in agriculture in Canada—in farm lands, machinery, live stock, and so forth—amounts to the sum of $3,509,000,000 while the capital engaged in manufacturing in this country is just about half that amount, showing—I am going to make a statement that I know no politician would make who was looking for votes—that as a general thing the farmers of Canada are practically exempt from taxation under this Act. The speakers and newspapers which I have referred to have been advocating to conscription of wealth, and, after all, the wealth of Canada is not conscripted at all. It is not the wealth of Canada that is conscripted; it is those who are endeavoring to develop the resources of Canada and to improve conditions financially and in a commercial way who are penalized. I say again that my anticipation is that as years go on it will be found that under this Act the incomes from the sources which I have mentioned will largely disappear. In my humble opinion a very great mistake has been made. I do not blame the Finance Minister for this mistake. After reading the speeches, I cannot believe that the Minister of Finance himself is favourable to this provision. My humble opinion is that it was forced upon him—that owing to articles in the newspapers of the country, and the speeches made in another Chamber, not so very far from here, he has found it necessary to accept and to put into effect something in which he himself does not believe.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK May I suggest to the honourable the leader of the Government that this matter stand for consideration until we come back to the other clauses?

Paragraph f stands.

On paragraph g of section 4—over $100,000, twenty-five per cent:

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Is this the surtax, so-called?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, the 4 per cent runs all through, then the additional tax is added.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The total tax is 29 per cent on anything in excess of $100,000.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The surtax is graduated.

Subsection 1 of section 4 was agreed to.

On subsection 2 of section 4—corporations pay 4 per cent; fiscal year of corporations:

Hon. Mr. POWER: I think the honourable the leader of the Government ought to explain why corporations are treated in a more friendly way than individuals.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The individuals will pay the tax through their stock in the corporations, and otherwise.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: The honourable gentleman will notice that paragraph f of section 3 works in with subsection 2 of section 4. The corporation pays the normal tax of 4 per cent under paragraph f of section 3, and the shareholder who draws a dividend from a corporation is exempted as to that 4 per cent. The 4 per cent is collected at the source by the company in which a man is a shareholder, and he escapes it under paragraph f of section 3; otherwise he would be paying twice. With regard to the surtax, the shareholders come under the general terms of the Act.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Commencing on line 43, this subsection says:

And the minister may permit any corporation subject to the normal tax, the fiscal year of which is not the calendar year, to make a return and to have the tax payable by it computed upon the basis of its income for the twelve months ending with its last fiscal year preceding the date of assessment.

Take the case of a corporation whose fiscal year ends in July. The tax may be computed on the basis of its income for the twelve months ending with its last fiscal year preceding the date of assessment. The last fiscal year may have been a very profitable one, but the operations of the current year may result in a loss. How would the tax be computed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It is discretionary with the minister. The minister may permit the corporation to do so-and-so.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: If he does not permit—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Before exercising his discretion I assume that the minister will be familiar with the facts, particularly covering the conditions which the honourable gentleman has just mentioned.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: In that case, the matter would have to be deferred until the result of the next fiscal year was decided. It could not be computed for the calendar year, and if the corporation claimed that it was not going to make a profit, that its operations might result in a loss notwithstanding that the previous year had been a profitable one, I do not see what could be done.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is in the hands of the minister.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: As I understand the Bill, if the business year of the corporation does not terminate at the usual time, it provides that that shall be taken as the period of computation. That is all that is involved.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The effect of this Act will go back to the 1st of January this year, I understand.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Suppose the fiscal year of the company ends in July, the Bill provides for the computing of the tax upon the basis of the six months—

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: It cannot do that.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It seems to be open to some objection.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I should like a little further explanation. The honourable gentleman from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) gave an explanation of this question. I understood him to say that a shareholder in a company would not pay the tax of 4 per cent on the dividends on his stock. Suppose a man had an income of $5,000 from shares in the Canadian Pacific railway. In the first instance the railway company would pay a tax of 4 per cent on the profits.

and the $5,000 would go to the individual as his dividends on the stock. Would the shareholder not have to pay the normal tax on that $5,000?

Hon. Mr. ROSS: Only the surtax.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He would only have to pay a tax in case the dividends amounted to $6,000 or over.

Subsection 2 of section 4 was agreed to.

On subsection 3 of section 4—partnerships not liable to tax:

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: What about an individual? In the first place, an individual carrying on business would have to pay a tax on his profits. If he receives sufficient income he would have to pay again on his income. There is exemption for partners in a business and there is provision for shareholders in a company; but so far as I can see a private individual would have to pay twice.

Subsection 3 of section 4 was agreed to.

On section 5—incomes not liable to tax:

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: I think we ought to be benevolent and include in this section the indemnity of members of the House of Commons, because I am told they spend it all before they come into Parliament. No. doubt the modesty of the members in the Commons prevented the inclusion of such a clause in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I would like to understand if subclause i would provide that all a person would need to do in order to be entirely free from taxation would be to invest his entire capital in Dominion of Canada war bonds? If so, to that extent it is an estoppel of enterprise. Another point is that by subclause c the income of any company, commission or association not less than ninety per cent of the stock or capital of which is owned by a province or a municipality, shall not be liable to taxation. I am not objecting to that, but I am wondering how it would work out. Suppose the municipality of Ottawa should go into the coal business, as is proposed, and supply say ten per cent of the citizens with coal, and make a profit, that company would be exempt from taxes, and the ninety per cent of the citizens who did not purchase their coal from the municipal company would be at a disadvantage because they would have to pay the surplus of the tax themselves for the benefit of the ten per cent who bought coal free from taxation.

Hon. M. BOSTOCK.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: I suppose subclause j referring to military and naval pay would include the aerial service.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, it is a branch of the service.

Section 5 was agreed to.

On subsection 1 of section 6—payment of tax at source:

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: There will be great difficulty in carrying out this plan. In many instances the greater part of the year is past before this Act comes into effect, and as those payments have already been made they cannot be deducted now as far as this year is concerned.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In that case the section would not apply.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Yes, I think the employer would be responsible.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, because the Act was not in force when they paid it over. It would only apply to money that has not been paid over after the Act comes into operation.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: In the case of a person whose dividends are collected by a trust company, I suppose they would be charged to pay the income tax out of their collections?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If I read this section correctly, not only the normal tax but the supertax will have to be collected under it. This section in the American Act is of value because it covers non-residents, such as a shareholder in the Canadian Pacific railway living in Amsterdam, who gets a dividend from that company, but who does not pay any tax under this section because he is not carrying on business here. The American Act of 1913 provides for the payment of the income tax out of the dividend payable to the non-resident alien. We do not need this section 6 as much as they do in the United States, for our section 20 makes this tax a debt due to His Majesty, so that if we had not section 6 at all we could collect the whole of our income tax. Subsection 2 of section 6—no exemption unless notice given and return made—is very clumsy and will cause friction. Section 7 provides for annual returns of total income; yet under subsection 2 of section 6 a man will have to file a statement with the Minister; then under section 7 he must file his regular statement. Where we are not going after non-residents, I think it would be better to take section 6 out altogether, and in place of this somewhat indefinite clause, require the persons therein named to open new books and make a very careful examination of those to whom they are paying annual or periodical gains, profit or income, amounting to $1,500 in one case and $3,000 in another. It would be far better to let the money be paid over to those entitled to it, and let them settle with the Government for their income tax, for presumably none of them can get out.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: How it would be in the case of ladies with incomes? Would they have to prepare books and make out accounts of income?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes. No distinction as to ladies is made.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: If you strike out section 6 you take away the duties of guardians over lunatics or infants, do you not?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No. The guardian makes the return; the lunatic does not do anything.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Why do you limit this to non-residents in Canada and exclude residents?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Because section 4 provides for income tax from every person residing or ordinarily resident in Canada or carrying on any business in Canada. A man who gets his money out of the Canadian Pacific railway is not carrying on business in Canada. Section 4 does not include a non-resident alien, who merely draws income from this country but does not do business. More than that, we know from the discussion in the other House that they were endeavouring to provide for the non-taxation of persons abroad, and making them not subject to our income tax.

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: Would they not be subject to our income tax as shareholders of our corporations? A railway company would collect that tax from every shareholder, irrespective of whether he was a resident or a non-resident.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Section 6 would cause a great deal of friction.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: What is the interpretation that the honourable gentleman puts on the words "when the income tax of a taxpayer is withheld and deducted under the provisions of this section"? This is the beginning of subsection 2 of section 6. What is the meaning of the words: "withheld and deducted"?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It means withheld or deducted by the person who is the employer of the taxpayer.

Hon. Mr BEIQUE: If he does not comply with the Act—that is what I understand.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If I have a clerk to whom I am paying $4,000 a year, I am required under section 6, subsection 1, to deduct the tax from his income.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: From the surplus of $1,000?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: That is quite plain.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Suppose that man had exemptions which would wipe out that $1,000 surplus and relieve him from paying any income tax at all. Then subsection 2 says:

> When the income tax of a taxpayer is withheld and deducted under the provisions of this section, such taxpayer shall not receive the benefit of any exemption or deduction under this Act unless he shall, not less than thirty days prior to the day on which the return of his income is due, under section seven hereof, (a) file with the person who is required to withhold and pay the tax for him a notice in writing claiming such exemption or deduction and thereupon the tax to the extent of such exemption or deduction shall not be withheld from such taxpayer, and (b) file with the person aforesaid and with the minister such return of his income and a statement of the deduction and exemptions as the minister may direct.

That man must file with the Finance Minister a statement that the thousand dollars is consumed by exemptions. There is a section in the American Act which is said to be very complicated, and in the elucidation of that section seventeen questions are asked and answered; and the American Act, remember, deals with only normal taxes, whereas, in this Bill of ours there are the normal tax and the supertax; so it is much more complicated.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I quite agree with the suggestion of the honourable gentleman who has just spoken, and I would call attention to the fact that the taxpayer might be treated unfairly by the person who has withheld the money, and might not know of the money being withheld before the thirty days had expired. I think there should be some provision in this section to the effect that the minister should have the power to extend the time allowance of 30 days. But I would point out that under section 6 as well as under subsection 4 of section 7, administrators and persons in such capacity are called upon to deduct and withhold the portion of the income which is to go to the Government as a tax, from the money going to the taxpayer.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I point out to my honourable friend while he is on his feet that this period of 30 days is for the benefit of the taxpayer; that is to say, he notifies the person withholding the taxes, and if he notifies him within 30 days that he is entitled to exemption, the money must be paid to him. So I do not know what application my honourable friend's suggestion could have, as to the minister extending the time, because this provision is simply to prevent the money from being withheld from the person entitled to it. Subsection 2 of section 6 is for the benefit of the taxpayer.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But the beneficiary is given 30 days in which to file the statement mentioned in the section, and if he fails to file the statement he loses the right of doing so and of claiming the exemption; and the 30 days may elapse without his knowing that the person has collected the money or withheld it. That is the point I was making. I do not know whether I made myself clear or not.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but it is 30 days prior to the day on which the return of his income is due. Suppose that period is extended. Presumably on the day when the income tax is due the money is paid over to the Government. Consequently the time could not be extended.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: At any rate, when I was interrupted I was dealing with another point, the point that under subsection 1 of section 6, and under paragraph 4 of section 7, employers, who are paying out moneys, or administrators who are collecting moneys, are obliged to retain out of those moneys, for the Government, the amount of the tax which is payable by the taxpayer. In answer to the honourable gentleman from Rideau (Hon. Mr. Edwards) a few moments ago, the honourable leader of the Government stated that the provisions of section 6 would not apply to the current year.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I said they would not apply if the money had been paid over.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: The honourable gentleman is quite right—if the whole of the money has been paid over; but suppose that nine months out of the twelve elapse before this Bill becomes law and that in the meantime an employee, for instance, has been paid his wages every month. Very likely he has spent his wages. For the 12 months he is obliged to pay a tax of, say, $1,000. The moment that the Act comes into effect the employer would be bound to keep the money that is in his possession to the extent of $1,000, and would therefore be prevented from paying out any more money until he has made sure that the tax for which his employee is liable has been covered. So I think it would be very important to add to that clause the provision that it shall not apply to the current year.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: When I was speaking last someone interrupted me with a question as to what would happen in the case of a person unable to make the return required. That is provided for in subsection 3 of section 7. There is no difficulty about that. When I was speaking before I used the term "non-resident aliens." Of course I used the word "alien" in the sense of non-Canadian. Section 4 says:

> There shall be assessed, levied and paid upon the income during the preceding year of every person residing or ordinarily resident in Canada or carrying on any business in Canada—

An alien, strictly so called—that is, a citizen of the United States, or a Norwegian, or a Dutchman— will be exempt; and I take it also that all residents of any part of the British Empire other than Canada would be exempt from taxation on the same terms as the non-resident aliens. The question of income tax is one which has been engaging the attention of the British and Colonial governments for some time past. Just how the matter stands to-day I do not know; but I do know that in some of the West Indian islands it is proposed to levy an income tax on people who reside outside of the islands.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I know that in the United States the income tax is levied on the foreigner.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: But it is a tax of only 1 per centum.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But the law is now being changed.

Hon. Mr. W. B. ROSS: The tax may be increased.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: There are indications that it is to be very much increased.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: May I remind my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Ross) that there would be this difficulty, I think, in taxing the receipts from investments in this country against a non-resident alien, that we should have to know whether he was an unmarried man and so entitled to exemption only up to $1,500, or whether he was a married man and exempt up to $3,000.

Hon. Mr. W. B. ROSS: There would be no difficulty, because he is not liable to the tax.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: But if you put him in?

Hon. Mr. W. B. ROSS: It is not proposed to put him in. I would ask that this section be allowed to stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I agree to that.

Section 6 stands.

On subsection 3 of section 7—return by guardian, legal representative, etc.:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: What is the meaning of the term "such person" in line 20? Is that the deceased? "And if there is no person to make a return under the provisions of this subsection, then such person."

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Such person as may be required.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The minister may call upon anybody to make a return.

Subsection 3 of section 7 was agreed to.

On subsection 4 of section 7—returns by employers of salaries and by companies of dividends, etc.:

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I suppose that is similar to the first clause, requiring that a return shall be made without any notice or demand "in such form as the Minister may prescribe."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Subsection 4 of section 7 is germane to section 6, and I think we had better let it stand until we are considering section 6.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I do not see any objection to that clause. The point that I was making refers to the first paragraph of section 6.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then we will pass this subsection and we can reconsider it later if necessary.

The subsection was agreed to.

On subsection 2 of section 10—minister not bound by returns:

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Does that put to one side all the statements made by the taxpayer? If the minister appears to doubt them he can turn them down.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

The subsection was agreed to.

On subsection 2 of section 12—oath:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I would ask the leader of the Government whether he does not think that the clause about secrecy should apply to the Board of Referees. As I read clause 11, it applies only to officials of the Government. The oath taken by the Board of Referees under the schedule does not say anything about secrecy. I think the Board should be bound to secrecy in the same way that officials of the Department are bound. Boards are appointed in different parts of the country, and things may come out about business that people do not wish to come out.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Should the boards be sworn to secrecy or have enforced upon them any more than any other tribunal? Such a provision might be very unfortunate. For instance, if the statement of a taxpayer as to his income were impeached, it might become a matter of public examination. I think we shall have to rely upon the boards just as we do under the War Profits Tax Act, the Business Profits War Tax Act, and the Special War Revenue Act.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is it advisable that the inquiries be held in public?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not necessarily.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Would not the taxpayer be interested in having the examination in camera? He surely will not desire that the public be made aware of his whole business organisation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It seems to me that it will have to be left largely to the discretion of the Boards, and they will be almost entirely governed by the peculiar conditions which may arise touching the examination of the taxpayer. In all cases the statement is prepared by the man himself, and it is only in the case of such a statement being impeached or tested by the board that any publicity can be given to it. To verify it would probably involve some examination being made.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Under section 11 any person employed in the service of His Majesty is prevented from communicating information to any person not legally entitled to it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: That would protect the persons as well as the officers referred to in section 11.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would not the boards be included among the persons mentioned in section 11 ?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It seems to me that it would be better to amend section 11 by adding the words, after the word "Majesty" the words "or members of the boards hereinafter mentioned."

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are appointees of His Majesty. It seems to me that section 11 has these very officials in contemplation.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would it cover them ?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think so.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I am afraid not. That section is to cover employees of the Government, not the members of the boards.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Board of Referees is in the service of His Majesty.

Hon. Mr. DANIEL: Are they paid a salary ?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes. They are appointed for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Bill.

Subsection 2 of section 12 was agreed to.

On section 13—court of revision:

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Section 11 provides for secretary. I think the provision in section 11 applies to section 12, but when we come to section 13 it says :

A Board shall act as a Court of Revision.

A court is usually public. This would be the situation. A person makes a return, but the details of his affairs are not made public. If any official thinks the return does not disclose everything, this man has to go before a court of revision a public court and bring all his business affairs before the public in order to get justice even if his statement is afterwards proved to be correct.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What does the honourable gentleman propose ?

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I am not proposing anything ?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Does not that condition exist in the case of any taxation? A court of revision is held more or less in public and the whole question has to be gone into before the court. I suppose it might be a deterrent to sending in a false report.

Section 13 was agreed to.

On section 19—no assessment to be set aside for technical reasons:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I suggest that a clause be added here providing that the proceedings of the board and of the Exchequer Court may be held in camera.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I intended to press that point, because I realize that a person might shrink from making a statement in public regarding most intimate matters concerning his income, and his liabilities to the banks or other persons.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think there is much to be said in favour of that view.

Section 19 was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I propose that the following be added as section 19a:

All the proceedings of the Board and of the Exchequer Court shall be held in camera.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Should we make it a hard and fast rule, or would it be better to say "at the demand of the taxpayer."

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It should be at the request of the taxpayer.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: "If requested by the taxpayer."

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: I do not know whether section 11, as to secrecy, applies to these proceedings. They may be held in camera, but still the officers are not bound to secrecy.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, the officers are in the service of the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Mr. NICHOLLS: Would the judges of the Exchequer Court come under that regulation?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Certainly, if the proceedings are held in camera, that means that they are secret.

Section 19a was agreed to.

Section 20—tax a debt due the Crown—was agreed to.

Section 21—recovery of tax, etc.—was agreed to.

Section 22—minister to administer Act—was agreed to.

On section 23—appointment of officers to administer Act, and their salaries:

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I would like to know from the Government if it has been discussed who should be the officers to collect this tax. Can we be told if we have not throughout the land already federal officers who could take charge of the income tax, without an army of new officers being appointed as officers?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The machinery will be somewhat similar to the officers who have been appointed for the collection of the special business profits war tax. They will be the same class; they are not very numerous, either.

Section 23 was agreed to.

Section 24—first return under Act, February 28, 1918, and 1917 first year's income to be taxed—was agreed to.

The schedule was agreed to.

Progress was reported.

THE INSURANCE BILL.

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS.

Bill 53, An Act respecting Insurance—Hon. Sir James Lougheed—was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: From the appearance of the Bill it seems to be a revision of the old Act. Are there many clauses?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot say, but our purpose is to refer it to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce, so that those who desire to be heard may be heard before that committee. I would therefore move that Rule 63 be suspended and that the Bill be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

The motion was agreed to, and the Bill was read the second time and referred accordingly.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

LOANS TO CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

MOTION FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK moved:

That an order of the Senate do issue for a statement showing the amount of each loan made by the Canadian Northern Company or subsidiary companies, the net proceeds of such loan, giving separately the amount of commission and other expenses incurred in connection with it, also showing the cost of the money to the company when the aforementioned items are taken into consideration.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I suppose we are bound to approve them.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will be quite safe in taking them on faith, or on sight. Honourable gentlemen will recall that in many Acts of Parliament we provide that returns of this kind shall be placed on the table of the Senate and on the table of the House of Commons and approved by both Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill P, an Act to incorporate The Army and Navy Veterans in Canada.—Hon. Mr. Boyer.

COMPANIES ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON moved that the amendments made by the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce to Bill Q2, an Act to amend the Companies Act, be concurred in.

He said: Honourable gentlemen, if you refer to the Minutes of Proceedings you will have some idea of the work done by the Committee on Banking and Commerce with respect to this Bill. In moving concurrence in the amendments made by the committee, I should like to suggest that, if this resolution be adopted, the Bill be given a third reading so that it may be sent to the other branch of Parliament. We are being asked to-day, as has been stated by the honourable leader of the House, to consider an Insurance Bill of over 180 sections; and surely, if the committee is disposed to meet to-night to consider that Bill, we ought to receive similar treatment from the other branch of Parliament with respect to legislation which we send to them.

The amendments were concurred in, and, by leave of the House, the Bill was read the third time and passed.

INCOME WAR TAX BILL.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE.

The Senate again went into committee on Bill 117, an Act to authorize the levying of a War Tax upon certain incomes.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed. Hon. Mr. Sproule in the Chair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: When the committee rose last night we had gone through the Bill and reserved certain sections for further consideration. The first section reserved was section 3, in which my honourable friend from De Lorimier (Hon. Mr. Dandurand) moved to insert the word "net" between the words "annual" and "profit" in the second line.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: In the absence of the honourable gentleman from De Lorimier, I will move that the word "net" be inserted after the word "annual" in the second line of section 3.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As I pointed out yesterday, it is a very nice question whether the insertion of the word "net" before the word "profit" would in any way change the meaning. True, it was introduced in another section—in subsection 3 of section 3; but the question to be considered is whether it would not be better to strike it out there and wherever else it occurs in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Is it not the intention that the tax shall be on the net profit or net income?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the intention.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Then, if it is the intention, can there be any harm in stating "net income"?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The only difficulty about it is that "net income" is a very general term. We may think that it is possessed of an exactitude which will, without any difficulty, allow the determination or the ascertainment of what "income" means.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: The income must be sworn to, must it not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But it will be seen from a reading of the Bill that, after all, it is really not the net income. Yesterday we made provision to except personal and household expenses; consequently we are not dealing with net income. Nor are we dealing with gross income. We are dealing with what, in the conventional phrase, constitutes a man's income—not with what the meaning of "net" may be nor what the meaning of "gross" may be.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But I think it was shown yesterday that if the word "net" is not used the wording is liable to be interpreted differently. As it was admitted by the Finance Minister that the Bill was intended to bear on the net income, I think we should say so. Does not the honourable gentleman think that it would be inadvisable to strike out the word "net" in subsection 3 of section 3? If it were struck out, the tax would be payable on the profit, or the gross income. When dealing with a business it is surely necessary to say whether it is the net profit or the gross profit which is referred to; if neither the one nor the other is mentioned, there is confusion. I think it very important that the word "net" be inserted. Of course, I appreciate the necessity, as a consequence of inserting the word "net," of declaring that the personal and household expenses shall not be taken into consideration, and I am prepared to move a second amendment in that direction.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: My honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed), in referring to this matter, spoke rather as if he were putting the word "net" before the word "income," but the question we are dealing with is as to the annual net profit or gain of a company, and I certainly think it is desirable to put the word in there, because I think it is well understood amongst accountants that there is a gross profit and the net profit, and the danger is that if the word "profit" is left by itself, it may be taken to mean the gross profit. I notice also that in subsection f of this same section the word "net" is used; so I think it would be very much better to retain the word "net" in the third subsection and insert it in the second line of the third clause than to strike out the word "net" from the third subsection of this clause. I think everybody will understand what a net profit means, and it would tend to make the definition very much clearer.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not think the insertion of this word "net" is going to make any improvement in the Act. If the annual profit or gain means what is made over and above expenses, of course that is the net profit. But I suggest that we insert the word "net" after the word "annual" in the second line of section 3, and make whatever corresponding changes are necessary throughout the Bill. It will then go back to the other House. and if it is found that a fundamental change has been made which spoils the whole Bill, of course the other House will not agree to the change, and we can have a conference or we need not insist upon our amendment.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: As the honourable leader of the Government states, a man has an income or he does not have an income, and by inserting the word "net" there would be an opportunity given to a man to say, "I am paying municipal taxes and other taxes of various kinds, and have no income." There is where I think the objection raised by the honourable leader of the Government is correct. But when you come to deal with companies, it is another question. A man may take in a large stock of raw material and it may appear that he is going to have a profit, but he may find later that there will be no profit.

The amendment, to insert the word "net" after the word "annual," in the second line of section 3, was agreed to.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Next there is an amendment proposed in line 8, page 2, in section 3.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: That was, I think, a motion made by myself, that we take exemption a out of the list of exemptions and insert it in the body of subsection 1, so as to make the subsection read this way, after the word "source":

Including the income from but not the value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent.

Then the other paragraphs will change their letters, b becoming a, c becoming b, and so on.

Hon. Mr. POWER: It seems to me that inserting those words, after which come the words "with the following exemptions and deductions," will tend to cloud the meaning of that subsection. I would suggest that in paragraph a we should leave the words, "the value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent," and add the words, "but not including the income therefrom."

Hon. W. B. ROSS: But we want to include the income from a bequest, though we do not want to include the corpus. I pointed out that this section in the American Act read thus:

From any other source, including the income from but not the value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent.

Making it perfectly clear that if one gets a bequest this year of $10,000, and it earns five per cent, the $500 of interest counts as a part of his income, but the $10,000 goes to capital account and is not part of his income.

The amendment was agreed to.

On paragraph b of section 3, subsection 1—exemption of proceeds of life insurance policies:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yesterday I suggested an amendment, and although I have no doubt as to the advisibility of amending the first part of this paragraph, I have some hesitation in dealing with the last part of it, the portion relating to annuity contracts, because I am not quite satisfied as to its meaning. My suggestion was that paragraph b be made to read as follows:

The proceeds of life insurance policies paid upon the death of the person insured, but not the interest or income therefrom.

I have no hesitation in saying that those words should be inserted there, but possibly they should also be inserted as qualifying the other part of the paragraph also. As to that I am not quite clear. I would suggest that the honourable leader of the Government defer this paragraph.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, I think that is desirable. I have just been pointing out to my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) that paragraphs a and b are in the same category, and if the amendment which has just been adopted be made applicable to a as it appears in the Bill, it should likewise be made applicable to b, as nothing warrants a distinction being drawn between the two. I am quite willing that this paragraph should stand so that we can give it further consideration.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not think you need give further consideration to this. I think b ought to go with a.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then, if a and b go together, it seems to me the amendment might be expressed in this way that the earning power of the value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent, and likewise the proceeds of life insurance as outlined here, should be subject to the tax. And that is the meaning. When we come to paragraph c, we deal with an entirely different class of property, with allowances being made for depreciation, and so on.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There is this difference, however, between paragraphs a and b, that you would have the amount payable yearly by way of dividends on insurance policies applied at the discretion of the taxpayer, either in reduction pro tanto of the premium, by which he would evade the tax, or in capitalizing the amount.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If it has earning power, its earnings should become liable to the tax.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: To me paragraphs a and b are not on the same footing, because under b you leave it to the taxpayer's discretion whether he will pay the tax on that or not: For instance, instead of having the amount capitalized, he has it deducted from the premium and he escapes so much of the tax.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The amendment simply proposes that if there be an income from or an earning power in that species of property it should become liable to taxation.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: If a man gets a fund by way of income he has to pay the tax on it, no matter what he does with it; he may put it into the fire, or it may go to pay his insurance.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Paragraph c provides for an allowance being made for the exhaustion of mines and wells, that is, oil and gas. There are gas and oil wells giving out every day, and you cannot determine or make any allowance for their exhaustion.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: In the province of Quebec it is the custom, when a man marries, if he has no capital, to insure his life in favour of his wife, so that in case of his death she is left with some kind of an income; but as a rule the insurance is substituted, as we call it, in favour of the children, so that the wife has only the revenue from that insurance. How does that come up in the Bill?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Whatever the earning power of that insurance is would be the wife's income.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: But the principal of the insurance would not be taxed under this Bill?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: Under paragraph d, suppose a party is taxed upon his business profits, could he be taxed again on his income from that business? Would an individual doing business on his own account have to pay two taxes—first on the profits of the business, and, second, on the income he derived from it?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: He would not be twice taxed by the Government. A private individual is taxed only on his income, no matter from what source it may come.

Hon. Mr. ROCHE: But would the profits of the business which he does be taxed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That would be his income, which can only be ascertained from the profits of the business. We determine what his income is from that particular business and that income is taxed according to the provisions of the Bill.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I move that paragraph b be amended on the same lines as the amendment to paragraph a, beginning b with the words, "including income from but not"— and then going on, leaving the whole of paragraph b.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then I understand my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) withdraws the amendment which he proposed yesterday?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Yes, this amendment will carry out my idea; but I would suggest that in the first line of b, instead of the words "upon the death" it should read, "during the life or upon the death.' I do not see any necessity of differentiating between the two.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Would not the latter part of paragraph b be included in that? It seems to me that that language fairly well covers all payments that would be made to the living.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: This would cover the whole thing.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: How would it work when a policy was under hypothecation?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would not affect the hypothecation. It only affects the proceeds of the policy when they come into the hands of the beneficiary.

The amendment of the Hon. Mr. Beique was withdrawn, and subsection 1 of section 3 was amended to read, after the word "source," as follows:

Including income from but not the value of property acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent, and including the income from but not the proceeds of life insurance policies paid upon the death of the person insured, or payment made or credited to the insured on life insurance endowment or annuity contracts upon the maturity of the term mentioned in the contract or upon the surrender of the contract, with the following exemptions and deductions.

On paragraph c (new paragraph a)—allowance for depreciation, etc.:

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Suppose there is some big work under construction which will take two or three years before there is any real income from it, but which may have some receipts—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the construction is being carried on out of capital it is not taken into consideration.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Would you not put that in?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think not; that would only confuse matters. If the business of the corporation shows earnings greater than its outgoings—I am not dealing with capital now—then it has income which is liable to be taxed. This is a matter for investigation afterwards by means of the machinery that will be put into motion by the Department of Finance.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: It seems to me that the amendment to paragraphs a and b is an error, for this reason. The beneficiary under an insurance policy has very often two options, to accept either an income or the whole principal. If the beneficiary accepts the whole principal, no matter what it is, he or she may invest that and lose it; and then, of course, there will be no income from it. On the other hand, if it is decided to take the income from the policy there will be a tax upon that income. Would it not be as well to leave the provision as it is?

The CHAIRMAN: These amendments have been disposed of.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Supposing the beneficiary takes the $20,000, or whatever the principal is, and loses it, there is no income whatever to pay upon; but if he decides to take an income of say $1,000, rather than the principal, he is taxed on that $1,000.

Paragraph a was agreed to.

Paragraph f (new paragraph d) was amended by the addition, after the word "Act," in line 34, of the following words:

Provided, however, that in determining the income, personal and living expenses shall not be taken into consideration.

On paragraph a of section 4—over $1,500 in certain cases and over $3,000, 4 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN: It is proposed that the following be inserted in line 22 of page 3 after the word "person":

Provided, however, that when they have children dependent on them, an amount not exceeding three hundred dollars for each child so dependent on them may be deducted from the amount by which their income exceeds three thousand dollars and on which no tax shall be assessed, levied and paid.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As I said to my honourable friend yesterday, that amendment is so directly against the principle of the Bill and encroaches to such an extent on the rights of the Commons, because it proposes to reduce the volume of the taxation, that while it may be possessed of every merit, yet I regret to say that I cannot accede to it.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Would my honourable friend see any difficulty if the amount were reduced. Is it not that he thinks that $300 is too high? This is a matter that will probably have to be considered, if not this year, in future years, if this measure is continued. I think it is very proper that allowance should be made. Of course, if my honourable friend thinks that we are going outside of our prerogative in making an amendment of this kind, probably it is better not to press it; but I thought it was a matter that should be brought to the attention of honourable members, so that they could consider it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I understand that the question was brought up in the House of Commons, and manifestly it did not receive the approval of that House. To insert a radical change of that kind in the Bill would result only in bringing this House into conflict with the Commons. As I say, it is an encroachment on the principle which we have laid down heretofore, that we cannot interfere seriously with a money Bill.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If we want to better the Bill, I do not see why we cannot bring in an amendment to that effect. Take the case of two families. One consists of a man and his wife, who have an income of $3,000 that will not be taxed. Their neighbour has the same income and five, six or seven children. He will be at a great disadvantage. I think the clause is immoral. I ask the Government to give us a good Bill, a moral Bill.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I do not like to be too insistent; but I would not feel that I was properly discharging my duty if I did not call the attention of this honourable House to the injustice which will be done if some consideration is not given to the suggestion made by the honourable the leader of the Opposition. It is true that the question was raised in the House of Commons, but the persons who raised it did not insist strongly enough. The Finance Minister did not see his way clear at the moment and the matter was dropped. I think that the matter was not properly drawn to the attention of the honourable minister, and it is our duty to draw his attention to it now. I desire to call attention to a very important consideration. First, a tax of this kind should be based on the principle of equity. I think that will not be denied. The community should feel that they are being treated on the basis of equality and that the tax is equally distributed. The people are surely not being treated equally, or in equity, if a married person having five, six, or ten children has no more exemption than a married person having only his wife. If the exemption for each is limited to $3,000, surely the living expenses of the one will double, or almost double, those of the other. Therefore it is not treating the taxpayers equally. There is, in connection with this question, the fact that both in England and in France that principle of equality has been recognized and has been incorporated in the law, and I think it is our duty, at least in all matters of this kind, to follow the example of England and not to adopt an arbitrary clause such as the one which is to be found in this Bill. I would suggest to the honourable leader of the Government to reduce the amount of the allowance. It may be considered too high. I do not think that it really is too high; but in order to conciliate the House of Commons, or rather the Finance Minister, as much as possible, I would for my part be prepared to reduce the amount considerably, possibly to cut it in two, making it $150 instead of $300 for each child. But surely we should insist upon inserting that principle in the Bill.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: Should we not profit by the experience of nations that have had income taxes for forty or fifty years? Authors actually claim that the decrease in the birth-rate in certain countries of Europe was primarily caused by the fact that no differences were made in the taxation as to the number of children. My attention has been drawn to this clause by a young married man who is the happy father of nine girls. He asked me: "Should not some differences be made, in view of the present high cost of living?" He said: "I have to pay double wages to servants because no servant will come into such a large family without higher wages; I estimate the cost of each child to be $40 a month, including clothing, food, schooling and servants." In the province of Quebec an Act of the Legislature was passed some years ago to encourage the growth of population. A grant of 100 acres of the best land that could be chosen in the province was made as a gift to the father of 12 children. Is this Bill not reversing a policy which, though at that time it was called child's play, if you please, has had its good effects? It promoted the settlement of a large portion of the northern part of the province of Quebec, and it was an encouragement to large families. Of course, we know they are the gift of God. We should not tax them, or, if we do tax them, an allowance should be made for each child. As I said before, we should profit by the experience of European nations. The best writers have actually attributed the decrease in the birth-rate to the enormous income tax that was imposed without any regard to the number of children in the family.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not want to add anything to what has already been said except perhaps to give an illustration which will bring forcibly to my honourable friend, as it will to most of us, the strength of the amendment proposed by the honourable leader of the Opposition. For instance, in Ottawa, there are a number of families in which there are one, two, three or four children who have finished their schooling and are employed in the Civil Service at a salary of $700, $800 or $1,000 and who would be exempt from taxation under this Bill. Next door to them there may be a family of six or seven children, all of school age and attending school, and dependent upon the head of the family. You will see how inequitably the tax will work out, and surely some provision ought to be made to discriminate in cases of that sort. It strikes me that there is a great deal of strength in the amendment moved by the honourable leader of the Opposition.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I point out, in the first place, that the proposal involves this House practically exempting from the Bill a very large class of persons. I think that no honourable gentleman will seriously lay down the principle that the Senate, in dealing with a Bill of this character, should proceed to modify it or change it so as to exempt a class which would represent a very large proportion of the people of Canada from the operation of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: The more the better.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It must be borne in mind that this is a taxing measure, and if we proceeded by one fell stroke to exempt families to the extent mentioned, we should have to consider further the increase of the rate of taxation; because if we exempt that class of persons from the operation of the Bill, we must increase the tax for the purpose of raising the revenue necessitated by the requirements of the Government.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Increase it in paragraph g.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To adopt the amendment proposed would at once bring us into conflict with the House of Commons, because they have already disapproved of the principles laid down in the amendment moved by my honourable friend.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Was that amendment proposed in the House of Commons?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It was discussed there.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: But was an amendment proposed similar to the amendment moved by my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock)?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not know, but the question was discussed and the proposal was not entertained.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The honourable gentleman said it was defeated.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I was under the impression that a motion had been made; I may not be justified in saying that, but I know the question was discussed. Now, in the second place, all taxing measures are more or less inequitable. It is utterly impossible to pass a taxing measure in which the incidence of taxation will rest equitably upon all classes of the community. Honourable gentlemen can very well conceive difficulties that would be involved in our considering every family in the Dominion and adjusting this tax to the burden of family life, so to speak, as represented by that family. It would not be practicable. It may be said that it is so in England—

Hon. Mr. BOYER: It could easily be done.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But I venture to say that in a sparsely-settled country like Canada it would be extremely difficult to carry out. In the next place, let me point out that parents with large families do enjoy more or less exemption from incidence of taxation which falls upon, say, persons without families. Take for instance, the school tax. The school tax in every municipality is paid equally by the man who has no family and by the man with a large family.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is quite fair.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is to say, the bachelor or the man without any family, who enjoys no advantage from the maintenance of our educational institutions, is contributing the same proportion of tax as the man with a large family who uses the schools.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is not a good argument.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I am simply pointing out as an illustration that we cannot possibly pass a taxing measure which will distribute equal justice to all. We must pass a general measure, more or less by rule of thumb, which will result in the raising of a certain amount of revenue. Under the circumstances, while the proposal has very much merit, and a similar plan has been followed in some countries of Europe, I do not think that it can be applied in Canada.

Hon. Mr. GILLMOR: Why not put a tax on land values, which would be fair to everybody and nobody would suffer?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The owner of the land would.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: I think we ought to do everything possible by legislation to encourage the natural increase in Canada. Nearly all countries in the world have been devoting their attention to devising ways and means to increase the population. The contention of the honourable leader of the House, that a man ought to be thankful because he is not penalized for having his children allowed to go to school, is, it seems to me, the limit in framing an argument. If the honourable gentleman wants to increase the taxation, why not make an allowance for large families, and increase the tax under paragraph g, whereby a man with an income exceeding $100,000 has to pay a tax of only 25 per cent? He does not require $75,000 to live on. There are in Ottawa families by the hundreds with half a dozen children and living on an income of perhaps $1,000 a year. It seems to me that the proposition made by the honourable leader of the Opposition is a fair one. It ought to be seriously considered, and the amendment proposed should be inserted in the Act. And, if the Government wish to have a change made so as to obtain an amount of money equal to that which would be taken away by this amendment, let them double the tax on the man with an income exceeding $100,000.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I would suggest that at the end of paragraph a of subsection

1 of section 4 the following words should be added: "subject to a discount of the tax of five per cent for every child." That would be encouraging the raising of children. I do not see that there would be any difficulty about that. To me it appears very simple. My honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Gillmor) has very fairly stated that the land should be made to bear the tax. Perhaps that cannot be done, but this proposal which I make could be very easily put into effect.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think it very likely that the amendment moved by the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Bostock) would be accepted by the House of Commons if the amount were reduced to $150. And possibly they might suggest that the exemption for married people be reduced from $3,000 to $2,500, which would make up for the exemption in favour of children. For my part I would readily assent to that, and I hope the honourable the leader of the Government will acquiesce.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Perhaps my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Bostock) would allow his motion to follow mine.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is that an amendment to the amendment which is now before the committee?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I do not want to move an amendment to my honourable friend's motion, but could not the two motions be patched together? Or perhaps the honourable gentleman would allow me to put my motion first, and, if it is not carried, then his can be put.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think we had better dispose of this one first. I would like to ask the leave of the committee to reduce the amount mentioned in my motion from $300 to $150. I think that might meet the wishes of the committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I rise simply to call attention to the fact that by the English Act, as I understand it, the exemption is limited to twenty-five pounds for each child. That is practically $100. Further, the exemption is limited to children under the age of 16 years. Those are two very important qualifications.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: I think that the reduction from $3,000 to $2,500 suggested by the honourable gentleman from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) is not quite as large a reduction as we ought to make if we amend this section as proposed. I cannot imagine why the man with only his wife dependent upon him should be allowed an exemption of $1,000 more than the widower or unmarried person without dependents. Again, I think that an exemption allowance of $1,000 in the case of married persons, together with a reduction of $300, or $150, for each child, is more than may be necessary. I think the income exempt from taxation in the case of married persons ought to be reduced to $2,000; but perhaps it is the judgment of the House that the present arrangement ought to be tried for one year to see how it works out.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I am very sorry that the Government, through the honourable leader of this House declare that it is impossible to do justice. Every measure, the honourable gentleman says, must be fraught with injustice, and when we ask that the Government do justice, he says that it is not possible. Why not? Why cannot the Government give to families with three, four, five or six children an advantage similar to that which married people with no children have over them? That is what we ask—nothing more. If the Government wishes to be approved by the people, it must do something for the people. That measure will not be very popular, I know.

Hon. Mr. TESSIER: That is friendly advice.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No taxes are popular.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: If a just tax is imposed it will be accepted. If the tax is not just, it will not be accepted in the same spirit.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Lost.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: No; let us have a division on the question. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the proposed amendment.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Although I do so very reluctantly, I must raise a question of order in connection with this motion. This would be so manifestly the exercise of power co-ordinate with that of the House of Commons in the imposing of a tax, that it seems to me we would be going beyond the limit of what we in this House are entitled to do. The House of Commons could do nothing more than that. The House of Commons, of course, could not originate the Bill; it must be brought down upon the recommendation of His Excellency the Governor General; then it is within the power of the House of Commons to reduce the amount involved in the Bill. The House of Commons could not increase the tax, but could reduce it. Now, in passing an amendment of this kind we would—I do not like to use the phrase, but it is nothing more nor less than this—we arrogate to ourselves the right to exercise a power co-ordinate with that of the House of Commons in reducing a tax which has originated in that House upon the recommendation of the Governor General. There would be no distinction between the exercise of the authority of the House of Commons and the action of this Chamber in thus dealing with a taxing measure. So I raise that point of order, Mr. Chairman, and would ask you to rule upon it.

Hon. Mr LANDRY: Yesterday we had a very interesting discussion on this point. The Crown fixes the sum to be levied, the Government submits to the House of Commons a resolution for the amount and a Bill is founded upon that resolution. The House of Commons has the right to reduce the amount, and often that is done. When the Bill comes here we can reduce the amount, but not increase it. That was the proposition laid down yesterday, and I thought my honourable friend, the leader of the Government, acquiesced.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I demurred.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: As a member of this House, if not as leader of the Government, he saw the justice of the contention of my honourable friend from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross); and when I asked whether we could amend a subsidy Bill my honourable friend said, "Why not?" The principle is there, and we must accept all the conclusions that flow from it; and if we have the right to lessen the burdens put upon the people, I do not see why we have not the right to ask that certain taxes should not be levied on families that have numerous children. I know that you may cite May, but May has nothing to do with this case; for he explains the British constitution, which is unwritten, while we are bound by the British North America Act. I see some honourable gentlemen are going to cite a decision I gave.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is what I was going to suggest—that we cite Landry.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: When I see my error I admit it and change my view. I am open to conviction.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: You will not see it.

Hon. Mr LANDRY: Yes, I do; but that has nothing to do with this case. My decision was overruled by the Senate, which gave another decision, and I am standing by the Senate in that decision. May has no more anything to do with this question, because, as my honorable friend the leader of the Government said yesterday, we must find within the four corners of the British North America Act all the powers that we have, and we found there that we had the power to amend money Bills.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: When the honourable member from Middleton (Hon. W. B. Ross) yesterday referred to the wording of sections 53 and 54 of the British North America Act the attention of this honourable House was drawn for the first time to the very important distinction which should be made between the House of Lords and the House of Commons in England, and the Senate and the House of Commons in this country, because in England there is no written constitution, while we act under a statute. I am disappointed that the honourable leader of the Government does not acquiesce in the view expressed by the honourable member from Middleton yesterday, which seems to me so clear. Admittedly it is incontestable that, when the constitution says no private member of the House of Commons can originate a money Bill or a Bill of taxation, that privilege is reserved to the members of the Government; but when the Bill has been originated by the Government the members of the House of Commons are at full liberty to deal with it, to adopt, reject or amend it, provided they do not increase the tax or the amount of expenditure authorized by the Governor in Council. Is it not clear to every honourable member of this House that we occupy exactly the same position? The constitution says that money Bills must originate in the House of Commons, but the moment such a Bill comes here, is it not perfectly clear that we are in the same position as members of the House of Commons in the other case, and are at liberty to deal with the money Bill as we wish provided we do not increase the amount of the appropriation, or the amount of the tax, that we are at liberty to reduce it. I hope the chairman of this committee will bear in mind the distinction to be made between the doctrines prevailing in England, based upon the usages and customs which have been adopted by the House of Lords and the House of Commons there, which are not guided or governed by a written constitution or statute, but are under common law, and the conditions here, where we are under a statute which does not in any way abridge the privileges of this House except by stating that a money Bill must originate in the House of Commons and that this House cannot increase the expenditure or tax, but it may decrease either.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER: According to the theory just propounded, an appropriation Bill for say, two million dollars might come here from the other House, and we could reduce it to one million dollars. That procedure is new to me, and one that we have never exercised here; and if we attempted to exercise it the other House would not countenance it, neither, possibly, would the country. A distinction must be made between Bills. Most of the Bills involve a certain amount of expenditure for putting them in force, and such Bills may be amended, even if some money consideration may creep in; but we cannot amend a money Bill, such as this one, for raising revenue or an appropriation Bill. That has been the usage in this House. I take exactly the same view on this matter as my honourable leader.

The CHAIRMAN: With regard to the point of order, I think it is clearly laid down in Bourinot's Parliamentary Practice, quoting from English authorities as well, what the Senate may do or may not do with regard to a money Bill, or a taxation Bill, which this is. Bourinot reads as follows:

Appropriation and Taxation Bills.—As a general rule, public Bills may originate in either House; but whenever they grant supplies of any kind, or involve directly or indirectly the levying or appropriation of any tax upon the people, they must be initiated in the popular branch, in accordance with law and English constitutional practice. Section 53 of the British North America Act, 1867, expressly provides:

"Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Commons."

And a rule of the House of Commons declares explicitly:

"78. All aids and supplies granted to His Majesty by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all Bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit, and appoint in all such Bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants which are not alterable by the Senate."

Then there is this note below:

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE.

This standing order is literally taken from the English resolution of 3rd of July, 1878 (9 English Commons Journals, 235, 509). It was amended by the English Commons in 1860 when the Lords rejected the Paper Duties Repeal Bill, so as to assert more emphatically the constitutional right of the Commons in this particular. 159 Eng. Hansard (3) 1383. May, 583. Todd, Parl. Gvt. in England, 1, 810.

That, in addition to my knowledge of the number of times this question has been brought up both in the House of Commons and in the Senate, and the final rulings on it, induces me to rule that the point is well taken, and that the Senate could not alter the Bill in the direction proposed by this amendment.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I appeal from that decision of the Chair.

The Hon. the Speaker having resumed the Chair, the Chairman of the Committee reported as follows:

The point of order was raised by the leader of the House that as the Bill under consideration by the committee was a money Bill, it was not competent for the Senate to adopt the amendment, as it would be an amendment to a money Bill, which it is not within the province of the Senate to amend.

The Senate divided on the question, Shall the ruling of the Chairman be confirmed? and the same was confirmed on the following division:

McHugh,

The Committee resumed, Hon. Mr. Sproule in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Mr. Chairman, what I have to offer is not an amendment to a money Bill; it is merely adding the words:

subject to a discount of 5 per cent off the tax for every child.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Harmless as it looks, I am very sorry that I cannot accept it. I point out to my honourable friend and also to the Chair that it is practically the same question as that which has already been decided. It is in another form, but the same principle is involved, and I would ask the Chair to hold that it is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: The question has already been decided by the Chair, and afterwards by the House. In my judgment this amendment involves exactly the same principle and therefore would be out of order.

On subsection 3 of section 3—non-residents:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This was allowed to stand last evening. I assume that this will remain as it is owing to the word "net" having been inserted in another line.

Subsection 3 of section 3 was agreed to.

On section 6—payment of tax at source:

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I propose that the word "normal" be inserted before the word "tax," in the 26th line, so that the amount deducted by corporations and others should only be the normal tax and not the surtax. It is obvious that corporations or employers not knowing what the surtax would be, could not intelligently withhold amounts to cover the exact tax.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Eight months of 1917 have passed. Payments have been made every month. How can the 4 per cent be made to apply?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If a sufficient amount is held back to cover the tax—

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: Too much time has already elapsed.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I thought that we could not amend a money Bill, and now we are going to amend it.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: And it is amended by the Government.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I think we ought to have a ruling on this. We are good natured, but this must not be one-sided, and I would like a ruling as to whether or not a money Bill can be amended in this House —and on the motion of a member of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN: If the honourable member raises a point of order and asks my ruling, it would be that this is not amending a money clause; it is only explaining what the money clause means.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Are we called upon to adopt such a ruling?

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Oh, no.

The amendment was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Mr. Chairman, I move that the first subsection of section 6 be further amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

The provisions of this subsection shall come into effect only at the expiration of the current year.

Hon. Mr. EDWARDS: I think that is right.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think honourable gentlemen will realize that it cannot take effect during the current year, for the reason which I gave yesterday.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Has my honourable friend read the earlier language of the section? It will be seen that if the persons in the capacity mentioned have not the control, receipt, disposal or payment of the amount, they do not pay it. The saving language of that is quite sufficient.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But no reserve is made. This covers the case of an employee, does it not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Suppose nothing has been reserved; the wages have been paid for six or nine months, or until this Bill comes into operation. The employer will be prevented from paying any more money to his employee until he has made provision for paying the whole amount of the tax. Therefore, the employee may not receive any more wages for the balance of the year, which would be a very serious hardship. I do not object to the clause taking effect for future years, but this Bill would become effective from the first of January last, and I do not think that is proper.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: May I point out to my honourable friend that there is a third of the year, four months, yet to run. The sum to be paid over would be infinitesimal. It would be the percentage on the amount of income exceeding $1,500 or $3,000, according to the class of the employee. Hence, assuming that an employee was receiving $6,000 a year there would be only three thousand dollars of that liable to the tax. The tax would be $120, and that would not be an excessive amount for the employer to hold between now and the end of the year. The super-tax does not come into play until the income exceeds $6,000; so the tax would be only 4 per cent of the amount in excess of $3,000. The number of employees who would be drawing a salary of $6,000 would be but a small proportion of all the employees throughout Canada.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But the section does not cover employers only; it covers also persons occupying positions of trust, such as administrators, and the amount they would have to retain might be large and might inconvenience the taxpayer very much. The Government is not deprived of its recourse. The Government would still have recourse against the taxpayer.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Before this question is decided, I should like to have some further information. If I understand this Bill rightly, the annual return to be made to the minister under section 7 is the return of the income from the first of January, 1917, to the 31st of December, 1917, but the tax is paid after the 28th of February, 1918. And there is a clause which provides that the minister shall, on or before the 30th day of April in each year, or such other date as he may prescribe, determine the several amounts payable for the tax. But that tax will be paid in 1918.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Is it to be paid on the income which the person derives in 1917?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, for the year 1917. But it may be pointed out that employers—I use that term in the broadest sense, including corporations and others who may have control of the moneys in question—can easily determine what is the amount to be held back, because they know the salary of the employee, and all they have to do is to deduct four per cent of the amount in excess of the exemption. This does not deal with the supertax. Therefore it seems to me it is but a reasonable provision to make. Furthermore, it will assure to the Government the collection of the tax, whereas if the Act did not come into operation until after the 1st of January next, as proposed in the amendment of my honourable friend, the person liable to pay the tax might have nothing with which to pay it, or might not be here. We should have absolved the employer from holding back the tax, and consequently the Government, I venture to say, would in a fair percentage of cases be deprived of the tax which should have been held.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: What would happen in the case of an employee, who, we will say, left the company in the first week in January of 1918? The tax is collected on his salary for 1917?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They hold it out of his salary—out of the salary he will be earning between now and the end of the year. All they have to do is pay four per cent upon the amount for which he is liable.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But, technically speaking, until the notice is sent out by the minister, the employer would not have any legal notice of the law.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, he could hold back the amount of the tax, because immediately the Act receives the Royal Assent it comes into operation, and the wages or moneys held under the control of the employer become impressed with liability for the tax.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I think the honourable leader of the Government is losing sight of this fact that the Act would be retroactive to the 1st of January, 1917. Suppose that the normal tax on the wages of the employee amounts to $300. At the end of the first month after this Act comes into operation it would be the duty of the employer to keep back that $300—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: —from the wages of the employee, and therefore the employee would be in danger of having nothing to live upon.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: My honourable friend will see that such an employee would be drawing practically $1,000 a month, if his tax amounts to $300. That is to say the normal tax, in order to reach $300, would have to be on an income of practically $8,000 in excess of the $3,000 which is exempted.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I was not here for the vote, but I want a little information with regard to this Bill. I want to know what power or right this Parliament has to impose upon a citizen of Canada duties for which that citizen is not paid. Has this Parliament the right and the power to compel a citizen to do work for which he is not paid? An employer has 700, or 800, or 2,000 men under his control. He pays them large salaries. Is that man obliged to do the work of this Government for nothing, in keeping a new set of books and keeping tab on his employees in regard to this tax? I hold that if the employer applied to the court this law would be declared ultra vires—completely ultra vires. This Parliament has no right to force any citizen in this country to do work for which he is not paid. The Government is running amuck with these Bills. If they want to get the taxes, let them collect them. I have no power and no right to force my neighbour to do work for me without pay.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: I do not share in the fears entertained by the honourable gentleman who has moved this amendment. No hardship or difficulty of the kind which he contemplates can possibly arise under section 6. If you look at the first four lines you will see that it applies only to incomes that are fixed or determined. If the income is not determined or fixed, it is not touched. But suppose a man is getting $200 a quarter, or $100 a month. The person having the control or disposal of the salary deducts the four per cent.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE For the eight months.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: No; he cannot bulk it he has to deduct on each payment as it is made. Take this year, for instance. More than half the year is gone and certain fixed or determined sums are paid over. There is no way by which anything can be deducted from those sums that are already paid over.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That is the point.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is on that point we cannot agree.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: Let us see what the Act says.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Let the amendment be put and rejected.

Hon. Mr. ROSS: I do nct see the slightest need of it.

The amendment was negatived.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: There is just one point I wanted to raise, and I may as well raise it now. I think we discussed last night the question of the income of an alien. It was pointed out that under this Act we do not touch the income, for instance, of a person drawing dividends from the Canadian Pacific Railway and living outside of Canada. But the other side of the question suggests itself to me. What happens in the case of a man who has securities invested, we will say, in England? He is paying at the present time on the income which he receives on those securities a tax of at least 25 per cent—the normal tax imposed in England at the present time—and he may be paying more. Will that income received from England be taxed again in this country under this Bill? Or will that be an exemption to be allowed by the minister?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does the honourable gentleman refer to a case where the money is sent from England?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Yes, the case where the income is really paid in England, but is drawn in this country. It has already been taxed in England to the extent, I understand, of 25 per cent. Will that income be taxed again in this country?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not see anything to exempt such a person.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I do not know whether it would be possible for the minister to grant the exemption. There is only one paragraph under which it might, perhaps, be done; that is, paragraph c of section 3.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not think the minister has any discretion in the matter.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It seems rather a hardship that such a man should be taxed.

Hon. W. B. ROSS: It is a hardship, as the honourable gentleman says, and that very thing is happening to me. I am paying two income taxes on one dividend; I pay the tax in a foreign country, and when the dividend comes here I have to pay another tax. I know one colony where exemption is granted on an income which has paid income tax in England, but, strange to say, there is no exemption for an income that is paying a tax in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: They do it for England?

Hon. W. B. ROSS: They do it for England, but they do not do it for the colonies, and yet they are getting probably more favours from Canada than from the Mother Country. That opens up a very big question, which I think must be settled after the war, the question of what the provinces of Canada and the colonies of Great Britain, among themselves and with the Mother Country, are going to do with regard to the question of a double and in some cases a triple taxation, and what they are going to do with foreign countries. I am inclined to think it is a wise policy on the part of the Government to omit from this Bill non-resident aliens. If that class is left out, it may be easier to borrow money. There is at present a fight between Nova Scotia and Quebec—in fact, there is a regular war going on amongst our provinces as to who shall have certain taxes. This whole question must some day or other be settled. However, as the Bill stands now, I have no doubt at all that if a tax is paid on an income received from abroad, the income will be taxed again in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Unless we put an exemption in the Act. It is quite possible to put among the exemption clauses an exemption dealing with that class of cases. I do not know whether the honourable leader of the Government would be ready to consider that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I think the Government would object to it. The taxpayer will be subject to a municipal income tax, and he may be subject to a provincial income tax, but he will have to pay this tax. There is no substantial distinction between the man who may be drawing an income from a foreign country or from Great Britain and other citizens. They may have to pay an income tax two or three times over.

Section 6 was agreed to.

The Bill, as amended, was reported.

The Senate adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock.

THE SENATE.

Wednesday, September 5, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

CAPTAIN J. W. CARTER.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK inquired of the Government:

1. Has Captain J. W. Carter, late 172nd Battalion, been appointed to recruiting depot on Portland, Oregon, under British Recruiting Mission?
2. Did Captain Carter refuse to revert in rank when in England?
3. Was he brought back to Canada in consequence?
4. Why was this position not given to an officer returned from the western front?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. Yes.
2. No. He was not allowed permission to revert by reason of medical report concerning his eyesight.
3. No.
4. Because the Officer Commanding Military District No. 11 reported no suitable returned officer available for this duty.

OTTAWA SEPARATE SCHOOLS CASE.

DISCUSSION AND INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to call the attention of the Government to the following facts:

1. In the course of the year 1915, the Legislature of the province of Ontario, by Chapter 45 of the Statute 5 George V, authorized the Minister of Public Education of the province to appoint a commission, and to confer upon it the rights, privileges and powers, heretofore vested in the Roman Catholic Separate School Commissioners for the city of Ottawa, regularly elected by the popular vote of the ratepayers of the said city.
2. On or about the 26th July, 1915, the Minister of Public Education of the province of Ontario appointed such a commission which, under the name of "The Ottawa Separate School Commission" took possession by force, of the properties and moneys belonging to the regular commission which it purposes to replace.
3. On the 6th November, 1916, in appeal before His Most Excellent Majesty the King, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council declared the said Chapter 45 of the Statute 5 George V ultra vires of the Legislature of Ontario and condemned "The Ottawa Separate School Commission," created under the provisions of the said Ontario legislation, to disappear completely and to pay to the regular Commission elected by the popular vote, all judicial expenses incurred therefor.

4. Notwithstanding the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and in defiance of the same, the Legislature of the province of Ontario, during its last session enacted the two following laws, viz.:—Chapter 59, "An Act respecting the appointment of a commission for the Ottawa Separate Schools," and Chapter 60: "An Act respecting the Roman Catholic Separate Schools of the city of Ottawa." The first Act mentioned has for object to authorize the appointment, by the Lieutenant Governor in Council, of a special commission with power to fulfil the duties and exercise the rights and privileges of the present commissioners elected by the people, and to take and assume the control and direction of the Roman Catholic Separate Schools, entrusted by law to the present commissioners, as well as the administration of the properties and moneys belonging to the said schools. The second Act mentioned (Chap. 60) has for object, to validate and legalize the acts of administration of the said "Ottawa Separate School Commission" and the payments made and the indebtedness incurred by the members of the said commission in the conduct and administration (illegal) of the Roman Catholic Separate Schools of the city of Ottawa, from the date of the appointment of the said commission, until after the date of the said judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and, at the same time, to compel the present commissioners to pay all said debts, defray all said expenses, incur all obligations, and indemnify the members of the said commission of all debts incurred during their (illegal) administration of the said schools.

5. Prior to the assent, on the 12th April last, by the Lietenant-Governor of Ontario, of the two said laws, an application was made in due time to reserve these two Bills for the assent of the Governor General, under the provisions contained in sections 56 and 90 of the British North America Act, 1867, but this application was rejected.

6. In the course of the discussion of these Bills in committee, and at the time of their coming up for third reading, an amendment was proposed, asking that these Bills be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada, in order to obtain from that tribunal its opinion on the constitutional validity of a legislation re-enacting principles already formally condemned by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The amendment was defeated.

7. Immediately after the assent to these laws by the Lieutenant Governor, an application for disallowance was addressed to His Excellency the Governor General, and duly received, as it appears by the reply given, on the 17th July last, to an inquiry made in this House by the Honourable Mr. Landry.

8. Quite recently, in order to meet these obligations, the Roman Catholic Separate School Board Commissioners, in the free exercise of their administrative functions, signed, in favour of a creditor, a cheque for a few thousand dollars, to be paid by a bank where the said Board had a special sinking fund now amounting to $39,000. The bank refuses to honour this cheque and bases its refusal on the privilege granted to it by Chapter 60 of the Statutes of the last Ontario provincial session, to retain the moneys received in deposit for the benefit of a commission abolished by the judgment, without appeal, of the highest tribunal of the Empire. This privilege is worded as follows:

"5. This Act may be invoked as a means of defence in any proceeding now before the Courts or which may hereafter be instituted by the Board of Commissioners against any person or corporation in connection with any sum of money received or expended by the above mentioned commission."

9. The situation created by the refusal of the bank to honour the cheques issued by the School Board Commissioners, is put to light by the following declaration from Mr. Sam. Genest, chairman of the said board.

The Montreal Gazette reproduces the following despatch:

Faces receivership—Bank refuses Ottawa Separate School Board Cheque.

"Ottawa, August 22.—The Ottawa Separate School Board faces a receivership, according to a statement by chairman Genest to-day. The Bank of Ottawa, which holds $39,000 of the Board's sinking funds, has refused to honour a cheque for $3,459, drawn in favour of the Union St. Joseph Society, in payment of a maturing debenture. The bank's refusal to hand over the money is based on provincial legislation empowering it to retain the sinking funds to liquidate debts incurred when the government commission was in control of schools. There are a number of debentures coming due and the sinking fund with which they were to have been met will not be available. Suits instituted by debenture holders for recovery of their moneys may force the Board into liquidation, Genest stated."

After having called the attention of the Government to the above-mentioned facts, Hon. Mr. Landry inquired:

(a) Is the Government aware that under the provisions of the British North America Act, they have the absolute and indisputable power to disallow any Act passed by a Provincial Legislature?

(b) Does the Government intend to accede to the request which was addressed to them to exercise this power, and will they, without further delay, disallow both Chapters 59 and 60 of the Statutes of the last session of the Legislature of Ontario, which are manifestly unjust, iniquitous, and unconstitutional, and the existence of which, if it is prolonged by the non-intervention of the Central Power, constitutes an outrageous defiance of the judgment of the Privy Council, and an immediate and continual menace to the general peace and interests of the country?

(c) In the event of, by their refusal to exercise their right and their duty to intervene, the Federal Power assuming the grave responsibility of contributing to this nearing and inevitable receivership which would close the schools of the Catholic minority, and throw on the streets the ten thousand children who attend the same, what other solution to the embarrassing problem could they offer to preserve to this minority the advantages which it has a right to claim in virtue of the final judgment of the highest tribunal of the British Empire?

He said: I have here the judgment that was rendered on November 2, 1916, by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the Lord Chancellor, Viscount Haldane, Lord Atkinson, Lord Shaw and Lord Paramov. I will not read it all, but will quote these few extracts:

In the present case the appellant board are elected trustees for the management of the Roman Catholic Separate Schools within the city of Ottawa. They represent the supporters of the Roman Catholic Separate Schools within the area of the city, and as such elected trustees enjoy the right of management which was conferred under the Separate Schools Act 1863. Apart, therefore, from any words of limitation or any imputation to be drawn from the context, appellant board represent a section of the class of persons who are within the protection of provision (1). Their Lordships can find neither limiting words nor anything in the context that would imply that they are excluded from the benefit of the provision. They are not the less within the provisions than any other board similarly constituted would have similar rights and privileges. They would be entitled to the protection of the provision, though they were the only Board of trustees in the province constituted under "The Separate Schools Act" of 1863. But if the appellant Board represents people who come within the protection of provision (1), it is difficult to appreciate the argument that no legal right or privilege existing in the province at the union with respect to denominational schools has been prejudicially affected. It is possible that an interference with a legal right or privilege may not in all cases imply that such right or privilege has been prejudicially affected. It is not necessary to consider such a possibility, and this question does not arise for decision in the appeal. The case before their Lordships is not that of a mere interference with a right or privilege but of a provision which enables it to be withdrawn in toto for an indefinite time. Their Lordships have no doubt the power so given would be exercised with wisdom and moderation, but it is the creation of the power and not its exercise that is subject to objection, and the objection would not be removed even though the powers conferred were never exercised at all. To give authority to withdraw a right or privilege under these conditions necessarily operates to the prejudice of the class of persons affected by the withdrawal. Whether or not a different policy might have been preferable, either in the opinion of the provincial legislature or in that of the courts is not a relevant consideration. It was argued that no evidence on behalf of the appellant Board had been called to prove that the withdrawal of their rights, powers and privileges, operated to their prejudice. In the opinion of their Lordships no such evidence was necessary.

These notes were transmitted to the King's Most Excellent Majesty sitting at Buckingham Palace, and the judgment rendered by the Judical Committee of the Privy Council was:

The Lords of the Committee, in obedience to His late Majesty's said Order in Council, have taken the said humble Petitions and Appeals into consideration and having heard Counsel on behalf of the Appellants the Respondents, the Ottawa Separate School Commission and the Attorney-General of Ontario, their Lordships do this day agree humbly to report to Your Majesty as their opinion (1) that these Appeals ought to be allowed (2) that the judgments of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario both dated the 3rd day of April, 1916, and the Judgments of the Supreme Court of Ontario both dated the 18th day of November, 1915, ought to be set aside (3) that it ought to be declared that the Act of the Legislature of Ontario, 5 George V, Chap. 45 as framed is ultra vires of such Legislature (4) that liberty ought to be reserved to the Appellants to apply to the said Supreme Court for relief in accordance with this declaration; and (5)—

Which applies especially to the case now before this House—

—that the respondents, the Ottawa Separate School Commission ought to pay the costs of the Appellants and the Respondents, the Corporation of the City of Ottawa and the Quebec Bank, incurred in the Courts below.

So this judgment, besides setting aside the Act of the legislature of the province of Ontario, declared by the same judgment to be ultra vires, condemned the Ottawa Separate Schools Commission to pay the costs of appeal to the Ottawa Board of Separate Schools and to the banks which had taken issue before the Privy Council.

I shall read the second Act that was passed by the Ontario legislature so as to put this House in perfect cognizance of what it states. It was presented as Bill No. 154, and became chapter 60. It was sanctioned, I think, on the 12th day of April, 1917. It is now, by reason of a demand of its disallowance, under the ban, if I may so express myself, of the Federal Government. It is entitled, "An Act respecting the Roman Catholic Schools of the City of Ottawa." I will read the preamble. I will not discuss it any further than to say that the preamble contains more than one error of fact:

Whereas pursuant to an Act respecting the Board of Trustees of the Roman Catholic Separate Schools of the City of Ottawa passed in the fifth year of the reign of His Majesty King George the Fifth, chaptered 45, the Minister of Education with the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, on the 20th day of July, 1915, appointed a Commission consisting of Denis Murphy, now deceased, Thomas D'Arcy McGee and Arthur Charbonneau, herein referred to as "the Commissioners," to conduct and manage the Roman Catholic Separate Schools of the City of Ottawa, which said Act has been declared to be ultra vires; and whereas the Board of Trustees of the said Separate Schools prior to the appointment of the said Commission, had neglected and failed to open, keep open, maintain and conduct the said schools according to law and to provide qualified teachers therefor, had threatened at various times to close the said schools and had neglected and refused to discharge and perform the duties imposed upon it by law to the loss and damage of the supporters of the said schools and to the serious prejudice of the children entitled to attend the same; and whereas by reason of the neglect and default of the Board as aforesaid it was necessary to provide special means for the education of the children entitled to attend the said schools until the Board should be willing to perform its lawful duties in respect to said schools and the Commissioners were appointed for that purpose; and whereas the Commissioners entered into possession of the school premises and property on the 26th day of July, 1915, and thereafter maintained and conducted the said schools continuously until the said Act was declared to be ultra vires, during the whole of which time the said Board was unwilling to conduct the said schools according to law; and whereas the Commissioners in carrying on said schools and meeting obligations of the Board disbursed $68,873.43, which at the date of their appointment stood to the credit of the Board at the Quebec Bank at Ottawa, the further sum of $84,156.04 received out of Court pursuant to an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario, dated the 3rd day of April, 1916, and the further sum of $71,944.08 received from other sources, all of which sums of money were by law applicable to the maintenance and conduct of the said schools; and the Commissioners in the maintenance, conduct and management of the said schools, also incurred a liability to the Bank of Ottawa for $71,891.16 and interest thereon which still remains unpaid; and whereas the Board has commenced actions against the Quebec Bank, the Bank of Ottawa and the Commissioners to recover the moneys so disbursed as aforesaid and has refused to assume the said liability to the Bank of Ottawa and it is desirable to declare the rights of the parties.

This law pretends to settle the rights of the parties while the whole matter was in the courts.

Therefore His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Ontario, enacts as follows:

1. It is declared that the Commissioners disbursed the moneys and incurred the liability herein recited for payments and expenditures which were necessary to maintain and carry on the said schools and which should have been made by the Board in the proper conduct and management of the said schools but for its wrongful neglect and default as aforesaid.

2. It is further declared that the said payments and expenditures shall be deemed for all purposes to have been made by the Commissioners for and on behalf and at the request of the Board and that the Commissioners are entitled to indemnity from the Board in respect thereof.

3. It is further declared that the said liability of $71,891.16 and interest thereon to the Bank of Ottawa subject to the rights of third parties, if any, is a debt of the Board to the said Bank and that the Bank is entitled to set off the same against any other moneys of the Board in its hands.

4. In default of payment of the said liability by the Board the same may be paid to the bank out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the Province and thereafter the said sum with proper interest thereon shall be a debt to His Majesty and may be recovered from the Board in any action brought for that purpose.

5. This Act may be pleaded as a defence to any action now pending or that may hereafter be brought by the Board against any person or Corporation in respect of any of the moneys received and disbursed by the Commission as aforesaid.

That is the law enacted by the Government to meet the expenses incurred by the commission named by the Government at the time when, according to the law, and according to the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the commissioners elected by the people had the sole right to administer the money of the separate schools of the city of Ottawa. In addition to that, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council condemned that Commission to pay to the real commission the money that they had, and to pay the costs of the suit which had gone through different courts up to the Privy Council. But now it is the money of those who won the case before the Privy Council that has to be disposed of, and the nominees of that commission named by the Government are to be indemnified. Those who have won the suit are obliged to pay their costs, and the costs of the Government Commission, although the Privy Council has declared to the contrary. But we have appealed to the Governor General in Council, and our petition asks for the disallowance of these obnoxious and unconstitutional acts.

The power of disallowance is clearly expressed in section 90 of the British North America Act, which is as follows:

90. The following provisions of this Act respecting the Parliament of Canada, namely—the provisions relating to appropriation and tax Bills, the recommendation of money votes, the assent to Bills, the disallowance of Acts, and the signification of pleasure on Bills reserved—shall extend and apply to the Legislature of the several provinces as if those provisions were here-re-enacted and made applicable in terms to the respective provinces and the Legislatures thereof, with the substitution of the Lieutenant Governor of the province for the Governor General, of the Governor General for the Queen, and for a secretary of state, of one year for two years, and of the province for Canada.

This section provides that during the term of one year, which has been substituted for two years, any provincial Act may be disallowed. Last year we tried, through a petition, to obtain the disallowance of the Act passed by the Ontario Legislature in that year constituting the first government commission. The Federal Government, in a memorandum prepared by the Minister of Justice, said that the power of disallowance could not very well be disputed, and there is no dispute that the power is given by the British North America Act. Such powers, he added, must of course be exercised upon sound principles of statesmanship. I agree in that opinion; but where I disagree with the Minister of Justice is when he pretends that the exercise of the power of disallowance must not conflict with the powers of a legislature. We must admit that if the right of the Federal Government to intervene and disallow a provincial Act is not disputed, it cannot be exercised without conflicting with a provincial legislative power. It is the essence of an act of disallowance to create a conflict between two jurisdictions, one superior to the other; and the superior one is bound to carry its point. Now, if we consult Lefroy in his volume, "Canada's Federal System," we find this:

It is right to notice the veto power which the Federal Government possesses over provincial legislation, which is a special feature of the Constitution of Canada distinguishing it from that of the United States. In words of the Privy Council: "Under the constitution of the United States each state may make laws for itself, uncontrolled by the Federal power, and subject only to the limits placed by law on the range of subjects within its jurisdiction." But in the case of Canada, the British North America Act "makes an elaborate distribution of the whole field of legislative authority between two legislative bodies, and at the same time provides for the federated provinces a carefully balanced constitution, under which no one of the parts can pass laws for itself, except under the control of the whole, acting through the Governor General." This Federal veto power is that principle of central control of which the late Mr. Cardwell, as Secretary of State for the colonies, says, in a despatch to the Governor General of December 3rd, 1864, acknowledging the receipt of Quebec Resolutions: "The importance of this principle cannot be overrated. Its maintenance is essential to the practical efficiency of the system, and to its harmonious operation, both in the general government and in the government of the several provinces."

Another very well-known authority on the Canadian Constitution, Clement, says at page 156 of his book. "The Law of the Canadian Constitution":

A very sharp line of distinction was drawn between the exercise by the Dominion Government, as a matter of political expediency, of the power of disallowance of provincial Acts, and the exercise by the courts of the judicial function of declaring an Act ultra vires. As expressed by the Chancellor of Ontario, the supervision touching provincial legislation entrusted to the Dominion Government works in the plane of political expediency as well as that of jural capacity, while the question for the courts is as to the latter merely. The framing of the Quebec Resolutions, upon which the British North America Act is founded, was the work of the most eminent legal minds of that day in Canada; and a glance at the debates upon these Resolutions will show that they thoroughly appreciated the distinction pointed out in these later days by the Chancellor. Throughout the debates it was clearly recognized that the exercise by the Dominion Government of the power of disallowance was to be exercised in support of federal unity,—e.g., to preserve the minorities in different parts of the confederated provinces from oppression at the hands of the majorities.

I think that is very conclusive; but I have still more; I have the opinion of the present Minister of Justice, quoted by Lefroy in his book, "Canada's Federal System," page 43, as follows:

Mr. Doherty, in his report as Minister of Justice, dated January 20, 1912, and duly approved by Order in Council, advised against disallowance, but at the same time he distinctly asserts that the veto power may constitutionally be exercised on the ground of hardship and injustice to the rights affected. He says: "There was considerable discussion at the hearing as to the practice and precedents in respect of disallowance of legislation by reason of unjust provisions, or because of its interference with vested rights or the obligations of contract, and a recent report of the predecessor in office of the undersigned was quoted as showing that the Governor General should in no case be advised to disallow for such reasons. It is true, as has been frequently pointed out, that it is very difficult for the Government of the Dominion, acting through the Governor General, to review local legislation or consider its qualities upon questions of hardship or injustice to the rights affected, and this is manifest not only by expressions in reports of the ministers, but also by the fact that but a single instance is cited in which the Governor General has exercised the power upon these grounds alone. The undersigned entertains no doubt, however, that the power is constitutionally capable of exercise, and may on occasion be properly invoked for the purpose of preventing, not inconsistently with the public interest, irreparable injustice or undue interference with private rights or property through the operation of local statutes intra vires of the legislatures.

That proves that it is not the fact that a law is unconstitutional that should guide the Federal Government in the exercise of its right of disallowance; but it is the public interest that should lead the Government to exercise that right. I think in the present instance disallowance by the Federal Parliament would be in the public interest, when the legislature of Ontario has decided, in the face of the condemnation given to its special laws by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, to pass the legislation complained of.

I may add, to the second and third question to which I call the attention of the Government, that if in the face of so flagrant an abuse of the power of the legislature of Ontario the Government of the day refuses to intervene, then as a consequence it accepts all that flows from that refusal.

This is not a question of race; it is a question of the Catholic minority and the Protestant majority; and if 10,000 children not only of French schools or bilingual schools, but of English separate schools, will be shut out of those schools and thrown on the streets of the capital, this is surely a case where the rights of disallowance should be invoked in the public interest. I hope the Government, through its leader in this House, will be able to give us the assurance that this is one of those cases in which the Government must intervene, and that we shall have justice from the Federal authorities under the powers given them by the constitution. If this power is not exercised now, when will the power of disallowance ever be exercised? I leave that question to the Government. I know that in the present instance we shall receive from the leader of the Government the assurance that justice will be meted to us.

Hon. N. A. BELCOURT: Honourable gentlemen, I had not anticipated that this matter would come up for discussion this afternoon, but I feel that the case is one which I cannot allow to pass without adding something to what has been said by the honourable member from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry). I shall endeavour to confine myself to matters upon which he has not touched, and to make my remarks as brief as possible.

As the honourable gentleman has already explained, the matter is one with regard to which the Roman Catholic Separate School ratepayers of Ottawa have applied to the Government of Canada for the disallowance of the legislation passed by the Government of the province of Ontario during the session of 1917. The application for disallowance is based, as honourable gentlemen may surmise, upon sections 56 and 90 of the British North America Act. Section 56 reads as follows:

Where the Governor General assents to a Bil in the Queen's name, he shall by the first convenient opportunity send an authentic copy of the Act to one of Her Majesty's principal secretaries of state, and if the Queen in Council within two years after receipt thereof by the Secretary of State thinks fit to disallow the Act, such disallowance (with a certificate of the Secretary of State of the day on which the Act was received by him) being signified by the Governor General, by speech or message to each of the Houses of the Parliament, or by proclamation, shall annul the Act from and after the day of such signification.

Honourable gentlemen will notice that a delay of two years is fixed by section 56 for the disallowance by the Imperial Government of Dominion legislation. Now, if we refer to section 90, we find that a similar provision is made applicable as between the Federal Government and the governments of the various provinces. Section 90 reads:

The following provisions of this Act respecting the Parliament of Canada, namely,—the provisions relating to appropriation and tax Bills, the recommendation of money votes, the assent to Bills, the disallowance of Acts, and the signification of pleasure on Bills reserved, —shall extend and apply to the Legislatures of the several provinces as if those provisions were here re-enacted and made applicable in terms to the respective provinces and the Legislatures thereof, with the substitution of the Lieutenant Governor of the province for the Governor General, of the Governor General for the Queen, and for a Secretary of State, of one year for two years, and of the province for Canada.

The period, therefore, within which the Government of Canada may use the power of disallowance of these Acts will expire one year from the time these Acts were sanctioned by the Lieutenant Governor of the province of Ontario, which was sometime in the month of April or March last.

The two Acts, the disallowance of which is asked for, are embodied in the statutes of this year, 1917; one is chapter 59 and the other is chapter 60. My honourable friend from Stadacona (Hon. Mr. Landry) has dealt in his notice more particularly with chapter 60, which is the statute imposing upon the School Commission the obligation of paying debts and liabilities incurred by the School Commission declared ultra vires by the Privy Council. In order not to repeat what has been said by the honourable gentleman from Stadacona, I am going to deal more particularly with chapter 59, the Act under which the Government of Ontario has the power by Order in Council to appoint a commission similar to the commission which was declared by the Privy Council to be ultra vires. May I be pardoned if I read some sections of this Act, which was assented to on April 12:

1. Whenever the said Board shall neglect or refuse to conduct the schools under its control according to law the minister, with the approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, may appoint a commission of not less than three nor more than seven persons to act in place of the Board.

2. The Commission may take possession of and administer the property and assets of or under the control of the Board and may levy and collect any rates and taxes which the Board might otherwise be entitled to levy and collect and shall exercise and perform the rights, powers, privileges and duties of the Board in place of the Board.

3. The conduct and management of the schols shall be restored to the Board by the Minister of Education whenever it shall appear that the schools will be conducted by the Board according to law.

4. If any question arises as to whether the circumstances justify the appointment or the continuance of a commission it shall be determined on summary application to the Supreme Court at Toronto.

5. The Supreme Court may on summary application make any order that may be necessary to secure to the Commission appointed under this Act possession of the property and assets to which it is entitled.

6. The Commissioner shall be a Corporation and the Minister of Education with the approval aforesaid may appoint commissioners in addition to or in substitution for commissioners theretofore appointed, provided the number of persons forming a commission shall not at any time exceed seven.

7. The Commission shall conduct the said schools in accordance with the Separate School Act.

In 1915 a statute containing similar provisions was enacted by the legislature of the province of Ontario. It is chapter 45 of the statutes of 1915. Among other things it provides:

3. If, in the opinion of the Minister of Education, the said Board fails to comply with any of the provisions of this Act,—

And I invite honourable gentlemen to compare the language of the two Acts, which is almost identical—

—he shall have power, with the approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Council—

(a) To appoint a commission of not less than three nor more than seven persons;

(b) To vest in and confer upon any commission so appointed, all or any of the powers possessed by the Board under statute or otherwise, including the right to deal with and administer the rights, properties and assets of the Board and all such other powers as he may think proper and expedient to carry out the object and intent of this Act;

(c) To suspend or withdraw all or any part of the rights, powers and privileges of the Board, and whenever he may think desirable to restore the whole or any part of the same and to revest the same in the Board;

(d) To make such use or disposition of any legislative grant that would be payable to the said Board on the warrant of any inspector for the use of the said schools or any of them as the minister may in writing direct.

I will not trouble the House by reading any more of the Act. I am reading the sections in order to point out that the legislation of 1915 and the legislation of 1917, which is complained of, are couched in exactly the same language. Exactly the same powers are conferred by the statute of 1917 as were conferred by the 1915 Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Would the honourable gentleman mind telling us what is the difference between the two Acts?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I see no substantial difference at all. The only difference is as to the manner of carrying out the provisions; but as to the provisions themselves, they are the same. Honourable gentlemen will notice that both Acts have for their principal object the taking away of the powers of the School Board elected by the people, and the conferring of them upon a commission appointed by the provincial government. The statute of 1915 gave the minister the discretionary power to restore to the Separate School Board the whole or any part of its powers if he thought fit. The Act of 1917 has a similar provision, but it is not worded in exactly the same way. Section 3 says:

The conduct and management of the schools shall be restored to the Board by the Minister of Education whenever it shall appear that the schools will be conducted by the Board according to law.

The 1915 Act says:

(c) To suspend or withdraw all or any part of the rights, powers and privileges of the Board, and whenever he may think desirable to restore the whole or any part of the same and to revest the same in the Board;

I think honourable gentlemen will agree that while the wording is not the same there is no difference in the substance of the power conferred.

In 1915 the Separate School Board for the city of Ottawa naturally objected to this commission. They took legal proceedings to have it declared that the statute appointing the commission was ultra vires of the legislature and consequently void. At the same time steps were taken to contest the constitutionality of regulation 17, of which we have heard a great deal. The two proceedings were carried on almost simultaneously, and when they came before the Privy Council the appeals were dealt with one immediately after the other. I am not going to deal with that part of the proceedings which concerned regulation 17; that is not before the House. The only question before the House is, as pointed out by my honourable friend, the right to appoint the commission with such powers as have been conferred upon it by the legislature. The courts of Ontario—the Supreme Court and the Court of Appeal—both held that the statute of 1915, which I have analysed, was within the power of the legislature—that the legislature had the power to appoint the commission and clothe it with the powers which it subsequently exercised.

I should have stated that the ground upon which the Separate School Board for the city of Ottawa relied in making out their case that this legislation was ultra vires was the statute of 1863, chapter 5 of 26 Victoria, the statute under which the Roman Catholic Separate Schools of Ontario derive their powers with regard to education in the province. It is an Act entitled, "An Act to restore to Roman Catholics in Upper Canada certain rights in respect to Separate Schools." I am going to read only those sections of the Act which are necessary in order that honourable gentlemen may have an understanding of this matter:

2. Any number of persons, not less than five, being heads of families. and freeholders or householders, resident within any school section of any Township, Incorporated Village or Town, or within any ward of any City or Town, and being Roman Catholics, may convene a public meeting of persons desiring to establish a Separate School for Roman Catholics, in such school section or ward, for the election of Trustees for the management of the same.

3. A majority of the persons present, being freeholders or householders, and being Roman Catholics, and not candidates for election as Trustees, may, at any such meeting, elect three persons resident within such section or an adjoining section to Act as Trustees for the management of such Separate School; and any person, being a British subject, not less than twenty-one years of age, may be elected as a Trustee, whether he be a freeholder or householder, or not.

7. The Trustees of Separate Schools forming a body corporate under this Act, shall have the power to impose, levy and collect School rates or subscriptions, upon and from persons sending children to, or subscribing towards the support of such schools, and shall have all the powers in respect of Separate Schools, that the Trustees of Common Schools have and possess under the provisions of the Act relating to Common Schools.

Then follow various provisions with regard to teachers, regulations, etc. The main contention of the school trustees of Ottawa was that the Act of 1915 constituted a violation of the provisions of sections 2, 3 and 7, which I have read, involving the right to conduct and manage the schools, the right to elect school trustees, the right to levy taxes and have those taxes applied by the trustees for the maintenance and conduct of the schools. By this Act the trustees were created bodies corporate for the purpose of exercising those rights.

Now, if we look at section 93 of the British North America Act, we find that those are the very rights and privileges which the British North America Act made perpetual and which no provincial legislature can in any way prejudice:

In and for each Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to Education, subject and according to the following provisions:

1. Nothing in any such Law shall prejudicially affect the right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by Law in the Province at the Union.

The Act of 1915 clearly, definitely, and permanently took away all those rights from the school trustees elected under the Act of 1863, which was in force in Upper Canada at the time of the Union, and is still in force.

The Privy Council held that while the province of Ontario had unrestricted power with regard to regulating the schools, they had not the power to take away the rights guaranteed by the British North America Act, and which are to be found in the statute of 1863, which I have read; they could not pass any legislation which would in any way prejudicially affect the right to elect trustees and the right of those trustees to collect taxes and conduct and manage the schools. It was upon that ground that the Privy Council held by their judgment of November, 1916, that the legislation of 1915 was ultra vires.

Now, we find that in 1917, in defiance of the judment of the Privy Council—

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: May I ask my honourable friend—what reasons were given by the Ontario Legislature for the passing of such an Act?

Hon. M. BELCOURT: Because the schools were not conducted in the manner the department thought proper; because regulation 17 of the department was not being obeyed in these schools.

Hon. Mr. BLAIN: In other words, are we to understand that the Act was passed because the Ottawa Separate School Board refused to carry out the law of the province in respect to education?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I do not think I could be more definite. I want to be very plain to my honourable friend. The Ontario Government passed the law of 1915 because the Ottawa Separate School Board refused to obey Regulation 17 of the Department of Education. That was the ground, and I cannot make it any plainer or more definite.

The Privy Council, I repeat, maintained that regulation 17 was within the power of the legislature, or for that matter any kind of regulation; because the Privy Council thought, and so decided, that under section 93 of the British North America Act the province is subject to no restriction whatever with regard to regulations concerning the language to be used in the schools. They can impose any sort of regulation in that regard. They might regulate to-morrow that in the schools of Ontario no language should be used but Chinese, or Hindostanee, and the Dominion Government or the courts could have nothing to say about it. They may do anything that is absurd, they may go to the limit of absurdity, and yet be within their rights. But when it came to taking away powers which were granted to the Roman Catholics prior to Confederation, and which by section 93 of the British North America Act were guaranteed to them, the Privy Council held definitely that the province of Ontario, or any other province, had no right to pass any legislation which would prejudice those rights.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It has been asked whether the reason the new law was passed by the legislature of Ontario was that the School Board had disregarded Rule 17, and the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) answered yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: That is the reason they gave.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Was there evidence before the Privy Council that the School Board had disregarded Regulation 17?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: There was some evidence adduced at the hearing that the Board had declared its intention not to obey Regulation 17. There was some evidence before the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: So the matter was before the Privy Council?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It was before the Privy Council in the other case. The judgment was against the Board in one case, because the Privy Council held that the Ontario Government had the right to pass any regulation; but, with regard to powers to conduct schools, to levy taxes, and to administer the money and property of the schools, they held that it was a right, a power, or a privilege which had been granted in 1863 and enforced in 1867, and made permanent by section 93 of the British North America Act, and could not be affected by any legislation. In order that there may be no doubt as to what the powers are, let me again repeat that by the statute of 1917, which is identical with the Act of 1915, the rights which I have described to levy and collect taxes and to administer the schools are conferred upon a Commission which may be appointed by the Lieutenant Governor. Section 2 says:

The commission may take possession of and administer the property and assets of or under the control of the Board and may levy and collect any rates and taxes which the Board might otherwise be entitled to levy and collect and shall exercise and perform the rights, powers, privileges and duties of the Board in place of the Board.

Power is taken to wipe out the Board completely, to wholly and permanently destroy the rights, powers and privileges of the School Commissioners under the law of 1863, and confer the same on Commissioners to be named by the Executive of Ontario. Anybody who will take the trouble to read the Act of 1915 and the judgment of the Privy Council, and the Act of 1917, can come to no other conclusion than that this legislation is manifestly ultra vires.

My honourable friend has explained that the Separate School Trustees of the city of Ottawa have applied to the Federal Government for disallowance of that statute. The legislation of 1917 was passed by the Ontario Government for no other purpose than to defeat the judgment of the Privy Council. As explained by my honourable friend, not only have the same powers been taken by the legislation of 1917 that were conferred by the legislation of 1915, but all the acts which have been done by the Commissioners appointed under the Act of 1915 in the meantime are validated. The Ontario legislature steps in and says: "Yes, the Privy Council may have declared certain acts to be illegal, but we say they are valid." And it is provided that the statute may be pleaded as a defence to any action taken or which may be taken against the illegal Commission for the forcible taking possession of the money and property of the Trustees.

It is clearly in the public interest that this legislation should be disallowed. It is the duty of the Federal Government to maintain and uphold the British North America Act. That Act is a partnership agreement entered into between the various provinces at Confederation. Each of the provinces owes a duty to its partners. It is the duty of each to see that the provisions of the Act are observed, and it seems to me that the responsibility rests principally upon the Dominion Government. The Privy Council has declared that the action of the Ontario legislature is not in accordance with the provisions of the British North America Act, and manifestly it is the duty of the Federal Government to see that no legislation is passed in defiance of that judgment. I ask honourable gentlemen, what did their lordships of the Privy Council think when they saw that their decision was ignored, and that the legislature of Ontario went to the length of passing legislation in defiance of that judgment, and for the purpose of defeating its decrees and orders? So long as we choose to maintain the right of appeal to the Privy Council it is incumbent upon us, and especially upon the Dominion Government, to see that the judgments of the Privy Council are respected.

I can conceive of no laws in our country that are of greater importance than the laws concerning the schools. The gentlemen in Ontario who have had charge of this legislation of 1915 have been telling the Roman Catholic ratepayers of Ottawa to obey the law. I think the ratepayers can very well say to those gentlemen in return, "Obey the law." The judgment of the Privy Council is beyond repeal. There is no doubt about the law, and we ask the Dominion Government to see that the law is obeyed with regard to this legislation. Regulation 17 is not in question now. There is no question as to whether French shall be taught in the schools or whether the language of instruction shall be English. The sole and only question now involved is the right granted to the Roman Catholics of Ontario to have schools of their own and to maintain them and control the money levied for that purpose. Ontario is not the only province with a minority; there is just as large, in fact, a larger minority in Quebec, which is just as much interested in having section 93 of the British North America Act respected.

Just think what would happen if such legislation as we have here were proposed in Quebec. Suppose it were proposed to take away from the English section the right to control and administer their schools. There would be a rebellion in Quebec in 24 hours. If the Dominion Government does see that the law is respected in Ontario, what guarantee is there that the law is going to be respected with regard to the minorities in the other provinces?

Now, one word only as to Regulation 17. If honourable gentlemen, just for the sake of enlightening themselves on this question, will take Regulation 17, and substitute the word "English" for the word "French," and the word "French" for the word "English," I promise that they will get the biggest shock that they ever had. Possibly when this matter is brought home to them in that way they will realize the grave injustice that is being done to the minority in Ontario. To my mind there is a solemn duty, especially on the part of the Federal Government, to take this matter in hand. There has been too much delay, too much avoiding of the question. The question has to be settled to-day, to-morrow, or ten years from now, and the sooner it is settled, the sooner the rights of the minority of Ontario are respected, the better it will be for Canada and the national unity of Canada.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I would have expected that some honourable gentleman from Ontario would have endeavored to answer the statements made by the honourable gentleman who has spoken. I am still prepared to resume my seat if some one on the other side of the House, especially from Ontario, intends to refute the arguments which have been advanced. My mind is open on this question, and I should be glad to hear some one from Ontario argue that these facts are not correct.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I think this question may, with a view to the better understanding of the question, be discussed further. There are other views taken of it than those which have been enunciated by my honourable friend to my left (Hon. Mr. Landry) and by the honourable gentleman from Ottawa (Hon. Mr. Belcourt). I would gladly therefore move the adjournment of the debate until Monday next.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Parliament will be prorogued by that time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: That would be a happy thing if it were so. However, I assure the House that I am setting Monday, not in anticipation of the House being prorogued, because if I thought that would be the case I would make it an earlier day.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: It is understood that I shall have the right to speak on this question.

The debate was adjourned.

GENERAL FEDERAL ELECTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN inquired:

1. Is there any truth in, or any foundation for, the statement made in the public press friendly to the Government, that after the expiration of the life of the present House of Commons, which will take place five weeks hence, on the 7th of October, 1917, the General Federal Election will not be held before the 18th of March, 1918?

2. If such statement be well founded, does the Prime Minister propose to retain the reins of office and to administer the affairs of Canada without a mandate from the Electorate of Canada sanctioning, approving and authorizing such action on his part?

3. If not, does the Prime Minister consider such intended or proposed action on his part to be in line with the forms of responsible government and with the principles of democratic representation in the councils and Parliament of the nation?

4. Will the Prime Minister follow and adopt the constitutional practice and Parliamentary precedents of all previous governments of Canada since Confederation, in the case of dissolution or of expiration of the life of the House of Commons, by calling for an immediate General Election and appeal to the Electorate for authority to carry on the business of the country?

5. If not, what does the Prime Minister propose to do in case of an Imperial or Allied crisis during the war, or a national emergency at home, requiring the consultation and approval of the House of Commons, in view of the non-existence of duly elected and authorized representatives of the people in the House of Commons?

6. Under what provisions of The British North American Act does the Prime Minister intend or propose to hold the reigns of office, with himself and his colleagues defunct as representatives of the people, with the exception of the Honourable Sir James Lougheed, Minister without portfolio, in the Senate?

SHIPBUILDING IN THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FARRELL inquired of the Government:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to construct ships for commercial use or Government purposes in the Provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, or any of said Provinces?

2. If so, have any contracts for building ships been concluded, and with whom?

3. What is the contract price per ton to be paid for building said ships?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. The subject is under consideration.
2. No contracts have been concluded.
3. Answered by No. 2.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Before the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I want to refer the honourable the leader of the Government to two motions that I moved to which I have not yet received any reply. The first was on the 30th of August for an order of the Senate:

For a copy of all resolutions passed by the Canadian Northern Railway Company in connection with the creation, issue, or allotment of shares and of all original entries made in the books of the company for the carrying out of such resolutions.

I moved the second motion yesterday which was as follows:

That an Order of the Senate do issue for a Statement showing the amount of each loan made by the Canadian Northern Company or subsidiary companies, the net proceeds of such loan, giving separately the amount of commission and other expenses incurred in connection with it, also showing the cost of the money to the company when the aforementioned items are paid for building said ships?

I am aware that these two motions probably call for a considerable amount of information, and that it may not have been possible for the leader of the Government to obtain the information at present. In view of that fact, and in view of the fact that I have asked for further information, to which I think this House is, entitled, it is my intention to ask the leader of the Government if, when we come to the consideration of Bill 125, respecting the Canadian Northern Railway Company, if he would be prepared, after the second reading of the Bill, to move that the Bill be referred to the Railway Committee for the purpose of getting this information and other information that the members of this House may consider necessary. This matter is an important one, one in which the country is taking a great interest, one that involves a very large amount of money and is committing the country to a very large liability; so I think this House is entitled to the fullest information before it is asked to adopt the provisions contained in the Bill.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I may say to my honourable friend that I will leave nothing undone to obtain for him, before we get into the committee stage, all the information for which he has asked, if it is at all available. As to sending this Bill to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, such a proposal is not to be entertained. This is a public Bill, and to say that a very small proportion of this House should undertake to deal with it would be manifestly unfair to the whole House.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: May I point out to the leader of the Government that we have here, for instance, a report that has been issued and brought down to the members of the House, which gives a statement of the assets and liabilities of the companies but any honourable gentlemen who have looked at that report must be very confused as to what the position of the company is, and it would not appear to me to be very difficult thing to bring officials of the company before the committee of the Senate itself for the purpose of finding out the real meaning of this report. It would be very much more satisfactory if we were in a position to examine certain officials, or even the accountants who are responsible for issuing this report, and find out from them the meaning of the figures presented to us; because I do not think any honourable gentlemen who has had time to study this report can come to a conclusion as to the position of the company. During this session of Parliament the Senate has adjourned on several occasions because they had not enough work to do; but at the present time they are anxious to give the very best service they can to the country in the consideration of this matter, and I think they are quite prepared to give the time necessary to thoroughly inquire into this matter, so that the country may not be committed to a liability amounting to over half a billion dollars.

INCOME WAR TAX BILL.

THIRD READING.

Bill 117, An Act to authorize the levying of a War Tax upon certain incomes—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY ACQUISITION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED moved the second reading of Bill 125, An Act providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company.

He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill it is almost unnecessary for me to make any detailed explanation as to what it is proposed to do, because I doubt if any subject has received so much consideration not only from honourable gentlemen who constitute the Parliament of Canada, but also on the part of the public generally.

The growth of Canada within the last thirty-five years cannot be better illustrated than by the progress which has been made, not only in our transportation systems but in the railway legislation which is to be found upon the statute books of the Parliament of Canada during that period. In 1882 the Canadian Pacific railway, as we now know it, came into existence. Legislation was placed upon the statute book making provision for a cash subsidy of twenty-five million dollars and a land subsidy of twenty-five million acres of land to aid in the construction of that road. At that time the undertaking was looked upon as a work of very great magnitude, and the assistance which was proffered by the Government of Canada in aid of that enterprise was considered to possess equally great magnitude. Disaster was predicted for the undertaking when it was entered upon. Those predictions continued for a very considerable time thereafter, until finally that great undertaking was brought to a sucessful conclusion, and to-day Canada boasts of having in it probably the greatest transportation system in the world.

Notwithstanding the responsibilities we assumed in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the disaster which was predicted for it, we, being apparently possessed of short memories, entered upon an equally great undertaking in 1903. Without any hesitation, as a bolt from the blue, Canada entered upon the construction of a second transcontinental system without the public anticipating that such an undertaking was about to be assumed. That enterprise has cost the people of Canada something in excess of two hundred millions of money—an amount which at the time of the building of the Canadian Pacific railway would not have been thought of for a moment. Notwithstanding the expenditures which we entered upon in 1903 for the construction of the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific railways, and notwithstanding the unsuccessful conclusion which up to the present time has been the fate of that great undertaking, the Government of Canada in 1911, in the face of its experience of the 1903 legislation, merrily entered on the building of a third transcontinental system; and the Ex-Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Sir Wilfrid Laurier, notwithstanding the unfortunate financial condition of those two undertakings, for which his Government was primarily responsible, informed the Parliament of Canada the other day that he is still of opinion that the country was not only justified in carrying them through, but really required the third transcontinental system to meet its transportation necessities.

I mention these things to show not only the progress that Canada made in railway building, but the confidence which the country feels in itself to-day in assuming enormous financial responsibilities or undertakings of this character. To-day we are confronted with the problem of the third transcontinental system of which I have spoken, namely, the Canadian Northern Railway system, which is in practically an insolvent condition. The Government of Canada is called upon to solve that problem; and as the Parliament of Canada we are now asked to discuss the Government's proposals for dealing with this great railway system under the unfortunate financial conditions in which it is involved. In order to appreciate properly the problem we have to solve, and to deal with it effectively, it is necessary to familiarize ourselves with the facts. If the Canadian Northern Railway Company were wholly a federal enterprise, in no way complicated or entangled with the different provinces of Canada in its financial arrangements, the problem would be comparatively easy; but we are called upon to deal with a financial problem affecting a railway corporation of various entities. The main line of the system is composed of no less than six different companies, many of them provincial organizations. We find that not only the Dominion Government but five of the provinces of Canada are interested in the problem which faces us; so that the question arises, what can best be done in view of all the facts with which we are confronted?

In the first place, the Government of Canada is committed to guarantees of this railway system to the extent of $104,613,247. Those guarantees affect the Canadian Northern railway proper, the Canadian Northern Alberta railway, and the Canadian Northern Ontario railway. The difficulty faces us, however, that the guarantees of the Federal Government just mentioned, are postponed to the provincial securities or guaranties which have been issued against the roads which I shall mention in the different provinces. One of these is a guarantee by the Province of Ontario of $7,859,997, issued upon those portions of the main line in that province, called, the Canadian Northern Ontario railway. We find that the Manitoba Government has issued guarantees to the amount of $25,662,545 upon different sections of the road—one upon the Canadian Northern railway, another upon the Canadian Northern Manitoba, another upon branch line bonds, another upon the Manitoba and South-Eastern railway. The Saskatchewan government has issued guarantees amounting to $14,884,213, covering the Canadian Northern railway and the Canadian Northern Saskatchewan railway. The government of the province of Alberta has issued guarantees amounting to $18,950,361, covering the Canadian Northern railway and the Canadian Northwestern railway. Then we find that the province of British Columbia has issued guarantees amounting to $40,157,523, covering the Canadian Northern Pacific railway. That makes a total, in all, of $107,514,642 of guarantees issued by the provincial governments.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What about the province of Quebec, that dark and unwise province? How much has it guaranteed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are not dealing with it yet.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Do I understand the honourable gentleman to say that all those provincial guarantees come ahead of our federal guarantee?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. This being the case, it devolves upon the Parliament of Canada to decide what shall be done under those peculiar circumstances. I might say that there are in addition unguaranteed securities amounting to $126,917,672.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What about the federal guarantee?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That amounts to $104,613,247. Now let us first consider the road in its entirety. Let us assume for the moment that we are individually interested, that we have given guarantees to the extent mentioned, that we have given cash subsidies, of which there has been paid by the Dominion Government $31,286,720, by the different provinces of Canada $6,821,724, and by the municipalities of Canada $675,704, or in round numbers thirty-eight or thirty-nine millions.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What about land grants?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Land grants have been made to the company to the extent of 6,555,708 acres. Nova Scotia gave 150,000 acres, Quebec 402,860 acres, Ontario 2,000,000 acres, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta 4,002,848.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is there anything to show how much land they have sold and how much they have realized from those sales?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I will come to that later.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Manitoba and Saskatchewan had no lands to give; the lands mentioned in those provinces are dominion lands.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the Dominion land grant in those provinces. The Government of Canada, therefore, finds itself in this position: it has guaranteed the bonds to the amount mentioned; it has given cash subsidies and made land grants to the amounts mentioned. The cash subsidies and the land grants have of course disappeared except as they are represented in the construction of the road, but Canada has no claim for any reimbursement on account of those cash subsidies and land grants.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Do the cash subsidies include the fifteen millions voted last year?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, they do not include the loan. The guarantees, of course, are outstanding, and Canada is liable upon them. As I have said, the road is in an insolvent condition; it cannot meet its obligations. What will be the consequence of the present situation if there is not intervention either by the Government of Canada or by the different provinces of Canada which are committed on their guarantees to the payment of the obligations involved?

There are two considerations which must present themselves to our minds in dealing with this question. The first is the public policy involved in the construction of this road and in its being carried to a successful conclusion so as to become a going concern, thus contributing to the transportation facilities built up in Canada. When the National Transcontinental railway undertaking was entered upon by Canada there was, as we all very well know, an agitation not only throughout the whole of the West, but throughout the whole of Canada, that a transportation system should be built up to provide competition with the Canadian Pacific railway, assuring to the people of Canada not only additional transportation facilities, but that regulation of rates and of facilities which it was contended was absolutely necessary for the growth and development of the country. There is no question that the Canadian Northern system, even when it was merely a colonization system throughout the West, was one of the most valuable factors in the transportation facilities of our western country. That system contributed to the development of the resources of the western provinces quite as much as any other transportation system that had been constructed, and, apart from its transcontinental character, it is to-day one of the most valuable colonization systems, if not the most valuable, that we have west of the Great Lakes. The development of those western provinces, through transportation facilities being given them, is absolutely essential to the development of Canada. What is for the development of those provinces must necessarily be for the benefit of the provinces east of the Great Lakes. Therefore there is closely associated with this road the great national problem of the development of our resources through the transportation facilities which it affords, not only in being a competitor of other roads, but in the work it is calculated to do as a separate transportation system. Therefore this road has entered into our national growth and national development to such an extent that we must regard it not merely as a railway undertaking but as one of the great national problems of Canada. Consequently the question of public policy cannot be overlooked in considering the attitude which Canada as a whole should assume towards this enterprise.

As I have said, we find the road in a condition of insolvency. Will the Dominion Government intervene, or will it leave the provincial governments to intervene? If the provincial governments intervene, they are in a position to intervene only with regard to such portions of the road as are covered by their guarantees, and as are in their respective provinces. If the Dominion Government should not take any action by way of relieving the situation as it confronts us at the present time, the duty would be cast upon each province of Canada—that is, each province that has guaranteed the bonds of the company—to save itself.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Or the creditors.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Well, the creditors, of course, will look to the provinces. Immediately the creditors take proceedings to realize upon their bonds, the province at once becomes involved as guarantor. It undoubtedly has to intervene at once and meet the obligations within its own boundaries and under its own guarantees. Now, assuming for the moment that we would not be called upon to make good any of our financial obligations, can we conceive that it would be in the interest of Canada to permit this transportation system to be broken up into six different entities, each entity to be under the control of the particular government that has guaranteed its bonds, and to be operated as a separate system, as undoubtedly would be the case? It is therefore manifest that the Dominion Government cannot stand idly by and allow the creditors of the different sections of the road to take proceedings upon their securities, and thus divide the road into the various entities into which it must become resolved.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Can the honourable gentleman tell me if the fact of insolvency is recognized and accepted by the company? What act of default can the honourable gentleman point to which would indicate insolvency, or support and establish that statement as to insolvency?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They have not been able to protect the interest upon their bonds. The net earnings of the road are not sufficient in themselves to meet the interest of the bonds, let alone to make betterment, provide rolling stock, etc.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Has the company approached the Government with a written statement to the effect that they are unable to meet their obligations?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The evidence is incontrovertible that assistance must be given. Now, that view of the matter presents to us another consideration, namely, the question as between the plan which is embodied in the Bill and that which has been urged in certain quarters, namely, that the Government should permit a receiver to be appointed and the road to be thrown into liquidation. The same difficulty would present itself with reference to the receivership. I need scarcely point out to honourable gentlemen that it would result in a multiplicity of receiverships a receiver being appointed for each province.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Oh, no. The Exchequer Court could deal with it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Let me just inform honourable gentlemen as to what the situation is in that respect. The Exchequer Court Act gives to the Exchequer Court authority amongst other things, to appoint the receiver of any railway, or section of railway, not wholly within any one province or otherwise subject to the legislative authority of a province. When any such railway is wholly within a province, the superior courts of the province have concurrent jurisdiction with the Exchequer Court in all matters within the purview of the Act. That is to say, the superior court of each province, where the road is wholly within the province, has concurrent jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: If the honourable gentleman will allow me, I would point out that the Canadian Northern is a railway extending all over the country; therefore it is not within one province only.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No; it is a series of roads. I speak advisedly on that matter. There are six different roads that make up the Canadian Northern.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Where is the missing link?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Over there.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, I think I hear the voice. The superior courts of the provinces have concurrent jurisdiction with the Exchequer Court in all matters within the purview of the Act. The purpose of the Act was simply to get over a difficulty previously experienced in attempting to proceed in a court of one province to wind up, foreclose, or otherwise deal with properties of a railway which extends into two or more provinces. In the case of the Canadian Northern system the railway lines of the Quebec and Lake St. John railway, the Canadian Northern Quebec railway, the Canadian Northwestern railway, the Canadian Northern Alberta railway, the Canadian Northern Saskatchewan railway, the Canadian Northern Pacific railway, the Halifax and Southwestern railway, and certain other small railways lie wholly within the limits of one province or another; and in respect of all those roads the superior court of each province would have jurisdiction to appoint receivers.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Concurrently with the Exchequer Court.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes; but you cannot oust the jurisdiction of the superior court of a province, and if the creditors of a particular road should invoke the courts of that province, that fact might oust the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court because it is only concurrent.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Will the honourable gentleman permit me just one question?

Some Hon. SENATORS: No.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: The honourable leader is more considerate than his followers. The question I want to put to the honourable leader of the Government is: Were not all these roads declared by statute to be for the general advantage of Canada? Would not that, therefore, bring them under Federal jurisdiction?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Were they not all declared to be for the general advantage of Canada? I have not read the statutes, but I believe they were.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They are all separate roads.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I know, but they were declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Only the lines of the Canadian Northern and the Canadian Northern Ontario extend into two or more provinces. It is therefore possible in each of these cases for the bondholders, or the creditors of the company, to appeal to the superior courts of the respective provinces for their protection. Since the interest of the bondholders in many cases conflict, it is not impossible that the concurrent local jurisdiction would be appealed to. The Canadian Northern system is not a single system. It is rather a single company, and the properties of the constituent companies included in the system are not sections of a railway within the meaning of the Act. If the Exchequer Court's jurisdiction were solely invoked, application would require to be made on behalf of each company involved. Moreover, the Duluth, Winnipeg and Pacific railway and the Duluth, Rainy Lake and Winnipeg Railway companies are not within the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court, because these lines lie outside of Canada, in the United States. Therefore, we have facing us three conditions, namely: the roads lying outside of Canada, the roads lying within the different provinces, and those which extend beyond any one province, which enter at least two provinces.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The honourable gentleman told us that the Dominion Government guarantees are $104,000,000. Can my honourable friend tell us upon what roads those guarantees bear?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not know that I have the information by me; it covers the whole system; but the issue of bonds which would have to be issued in pursuance of those guarantees would be subsequent to the provincial issues.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What is to prevent the Dominion Government from applying to the Exchequer Court for a Dominion receiver? That would cover the whole system.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Exchequer Court would not have exclusive jurisdiction over these roads. In the first place it would not have any jurisdiction as to the roads in the United States. It would not have exclusive jurisdiction as to the roads within each province, because its jurisdiction is concurrent with the jurisdiction of the Superior Court, and the Superior Court of each province could be invoked at the instance of the creditors or of the bondholders upon those sections of the road. If honourable gentlemen will take into consideration for a moment what would be involved in the very serious step of appointing a receiver, they will see that it would not appeal to the best interests of Canada, nor to the intelligence and commonsense of those who take an interest in this question. It must be remembered that the main line of the system, from Quebec to Vancouver, is owned by six different companies, apart from other companies owning branch lines in subsidiary enterprises. I will enumerate the different companies which this legislation will cover. Each of these companies has been financed separately, with separate mortgages, and in some cases separate trust deeds. Owing to the conflicting interests of the various bondholders, it would be impossible to appoint a single receiver for the whole system. Each set of bondholders would probably require a separate receiver to protect their interests. When my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Belcourt) speaks of the Exchequer Court appointing one receiver for the whole system, he presupposes that those separate sets of creditors, whose interests may be in conflict, would quietly submit to the appointment of one receiver to wind up interests thus in conflict, that are entirely separate from each other. Consequently I say that under the circumstances, while it would not be impossible to have one receiver appointed, yet it would be improbable that those conflicting interests would agree upon the appointment of one receiver to occupy the very anomalous position of deciding, at his own discretion, so to speak, interests of a very conflicting nature. We have to assume that each set of creditors would place in motion the machinery which they would consider best calculated to realize their indebtedness. They are not concerned in the maintenance of the entire system. They are not concerned in the public policy which may be involved in this enormous enterprise. They are concerned only in one question, and that is, how they can best realize the money which they have placed in that section of the road. Therefore, assuming that that view would be taken of it, each receiver would require a large staff, and the expenses of trustees, receivers, attorneys, accountants, and other employees would be something enormous, entirely apart from the breaking up of the system.

Then the appointment of different receiverships would involve abandonment of the present system of uniform operation and accounting, and the substitution of separate operation and separate accounting in respect of the various lines and enterprises. Furthermore, I would point out that immediately that step is taken, the question of the rolling stock in relation to the whole system comes into consideration. The rolling stock is owned by the parent company, the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the receiver of the Canadian Northern Railway Company would control the situation, and I think give preference to the interests which they represent rather than to those represented by constituent and subsidiary companies. The trustees who control the receivers are not in every case identical, and a conflict in this respect might be anticipated. The result would be the paralysis of the entire system. It would result in the dislocation of the enormous system which is at present being harmoniously operated as one complete and entire system. What would be the position of holders of government guaranteed securities? They are not compelled to realize upon their securities. They would reasonably demand, and very properly so, from the Government guaranteeing those securities, the immediate payment of both principal and interest; and we would therefore set in motion the Government of the different provinces of Canada in the winding-up of this company. Would the different provinces sit idly by and permit the Dominion Government to wind up this road? I submit not.

Hon Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Then there is the further consideration which is not to be overlooked—the financial situation as we find it to-day. Most of the bonds of this company have been floated; they represent 3½ or 4 per cent securities; and the trust deeds under which those bonds have been issued, I think, all provide that in the case of insolvency or receivership the principal at once becomes due. To go into the money markets of the world to-day to float this enterprise would probably cost the Government of Canada at least 7 per cent. I venture to say that the securities of such a company, if they could be placed, could not be placed upon the market at less than 7 per cent.

Now, I might, in a word, summarize what a receivership would mean. In the first place, it would mean unnecessary expense, duplication of receivers; consequent disintegration of the system; confusion in operation and accounting; enforcement by bondholders of government guarantees; the forced sale of certain lines; the forced intervention of the Dominion Government to save assets; the enormous cost of refinancing at the present rates, if refinancing be at all possible.

May I now point out to the House the constituent and subsidiary companies comprising the Canadian Northern railway, which constituent and subsidiary companies will pass over to the Government of Canada in the carrying out of the scheme which we have in view, namely, the acquisition of the stock.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: Before coming to that point, may I ask this question, which is important, as to whether it is true that all these railways have been declared to be railways for the general advantage of Canada?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot at the moment say; but I would say to my honourable friend that the legal position which I have pointed out is borne out by legal authority which I think cannot be controverted, namely, that those sections of the railway in each province, and being separate sections of the railway, would come within the jurisdiction of the respective superior courts of those provinces, which would exercise concurrent jurisdiction with the Exchequer Court in the matter of a receivership.

The companies that are known as constituent companies are as follow:

The Bay of Quinte railway company; the Canadian Northern Pacific railway company; the Canadian Northern Alberta railway company; Canadian Northern Western railway company; Canadian Northern Saskatchewan railway company; Canadian Northern Manitoba railway company; Canadian Northern Ontario railway company; Canadian Northern Quebec railway company; Canadian Northern system terminals, limited; the Central Ontario railway company; Duluth, Winnipeg and Pacific railway company; the Halifax and South Western railway company; the Irondale, Bancroft and Ottawa railway company; the Lake Superior Terminals company, limited; the Minnesota and Ontario Bridge railway; the Minnesota and Manitoba Railway company; the Marmora railway and Mining company; the Mount Royal and Terminal company, limited; the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto railway company; the Quebec and Lake St. John railway; the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan railroad and steamboat company.

The subsidiary companies are: the Canadian Northern Railway Express company, Limited; the Canadian Northern Transfer company, Limited; the Canadian Northern Telegraph company, including the Great Northwestern Telegraph company in Canada; the Canadian Northern Steamships, Limited; the St. Boniface Western Land company, the Winnipeg Land company, Limited; the Niagara, St. Catharines and Toronto Railway company.

I may now say to my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Béique) that all these railways have not been declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: How many have?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I cannot say. If honourable gentleman will turn to page 1½ of the Financial Statement, the assets and liabilities of the companies will be seen. It is unnecessary for me to go over these in detail.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What is meant by "current liabilities pay rolls, $1,832,708?" Are these arrears of salary?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Those would be the liabilities on the pay-roll at that date.

Hon. Mr BELCOURT: They would be paid off since.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, these are changing all the time. This is the balance sheet of the 30th of June, 1916.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: My honourable friend is going to read from this statement of the 30th of June, 1916. I understand that a much later statement was brought down in the other House. I think it was of the 30th of April, 1917.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The 15th of June, 1917.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: My honourable friend has not got a copy of that statement?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If there is such a statement it will be forthcoming when we go into Committee.

It is almost unnecessary to point out the advantage which the acquisition of this system will be to the Intercolonial railway, which is already owned by the Government. It will undoubtedly give the people of Canada a complete transcontinental system from the Atlantic to the Pacific; it will permit of the Intercolonial railway coming into Montreal over the tracks and into the terminals of the Canadian Northern railway system, which admittedly are of a superior character; it will save to the Government of Canada a very substantial amount which is now being paid to the Grand Trunk Railway company for the use of their terminals and tracks as an entrance to the city of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: We have not got the terminals.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The money is there for the completion of the terminals. It is true that as time progresses additional expenditures will have to be made to meet the requirements from time to time. Furthermore, the acquisition of this road will be of decided advantage to the operation of the National Transcontinental system. I have asked one of the railway officials to place in the corridor a map showing how the two roads may be linked up together, and honourable gentlemen will see the advantage which it will be, not only to both systems, but to the people of Canada, to have two additional systems competing with the Canadian Pacific to the head of the lakes. By the construction of a small branch of about 17 miles in length, to a place called, I think, Long Lake, the two roads can be connected so that there can be direct communication over the Transcontinental railway via the Canadian Northern into Port Arthur and Fort William. This will overcome the difficulty in reaching those points over the Lake Superior branch of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. If honourable gentlemen will look at the map, they will see that so far as westbound traffic is concerned, the people of Canada are at present practically precluded from reaching the head of the lakes. Those are advantages which will represent millions of dollars to be gained by the acquisition of this road.

If Canada should not acquire this road, are we willing to allow it to be absorbed, say by the Canadian Pacific railway, or by any private aggregation of capital? If this road should be acquired by the Canadian Pacific railway, it would add 9,500 miles of track to that enormous and magnificent system; but, at the same time, it would destroy the idea that the people of Canada had when this road was converted into a transcontinental system and was made a competitor of existing transportation systems across the continent. That is a matter to be considered. It is for the Parliament of Canada to decide whether it is in the interests of the public of Canada that an enormous railway system of this character should be under the control of one particular system.

There are perhaps two alternatives. One is to allow the present Canadian Pacific Railway system to absorb the Canadian Northern. Another is to have the Government of Canada stand to one side and permit the provinces of Canada to take the necessary proceedings to save their guarantees with reference to the different sections of the road within those provinces. It seems to me that public opinion will not hesitate a moment in approving of the scheme embodied in this Bill, and I venture to say that in the future, when normal conditions return after the war is over, and Canada proceeds upon its course of development as in the past, the public of Canada will wonder why we considered for one moment the adoption of any other scheme than that embodied in this Bill.

It is needless for me to say that this scheme was supported in the past by the political party which is now so vigorously opposing it. In 1914 this policy was supported in the House of Commons by the Liberal party—at least, the principle involved in this Bill, namely, that the stock should be acquired by the Government of Canada, and that the value of that stock should be determined by arbitration. Our friends in the Liberal party were so hopeful at that time that they were willing to fix a maximum of $30,000,000 for the acquisition of this stock. I will venture to say that under the present proposal nothing approaching that enormous sum will have to be paid for the acquisition of the stock.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Is not the honourable gentleman overlooking the fact that since then we have advanced $45,000,000 and $15,000,000?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That has been spent on the road.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is there anything to show what disposition has been made of those amounts?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. Returns have been made to the Government regularly.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend bring down those particulars?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes. I think there has been something like nearly 2,000 miles added to this road since that time. My recollection is that the mileage of the road at that time was 7,000 odd miles. Yet my honourable friends were willing that the maximum of $30,000,000 should be fixed for the stock. In pointing out the obligations that the Government of Canada has assumed, I omitted to state that we are already the owners of $40,000,000 of the stock. That of course would go with the $60,000,000. The entire stock is $100,000,000.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: What number of railways have we to look to for the $45,000,000?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It would be necessary to go through the legislation already on the statute book to establish that.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Every railway in Canada connected with the Northern system—7,161 miles.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Another consideration, of which it seems to me honourable gentleman must necessarily approve, is the plan that is being adopted of having this road operated by a company that will be entirely independent of the Government. Although the directorate will be appointed by the Government, they will be left entirely free of all control by the Government, and will be as independent in the administration and operation of the road as if the Government had practically no interest in it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Has the Government come to conclusion as to who is to operate and manage the railway?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, the personnel has not been considered yet, as far as I am aware.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Are the present managers to be retained?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Which managers do you mean?

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Mackenzie and Mann.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Is that determined?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Oh, yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: They are not to have any voice in the management ?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They will withdraw from the directorate.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: What is the consideration for which they will withdraw?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the Dominion of Canada becomes the owner of the stock, I fancy that will be sufficient assurance that we can name our own directorate.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I notice that in the other House the view was advanced several times that it would be a very decided advantage to keep the present management; that is why I put the question.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If my honourable friend had pursued the matter further, he would have found that the reference was to the operating management, and the names were mentioned. Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann distinctly understand that their association with the road ends immediately this Bill goes through.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: They might get a further title, say a peerage.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: No, they remain the powers behind the throne.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I notice that the value of the road is to be determined as of the date of signing the agreement. Does my honourable friend see how very vague that is? Has anything been determined as to the time when it is to be signed?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It will be signed immediately this legislation is passed.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: It does not say so.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But my honourable friend must see that we cannot enter into the agreement until we have the authority of Parliament, as embodied in this Act, to negotiate such an agreement. Nothing could be more satisfactory, it seems to me, than to provide that the value of the assets is to be decided as of the date of the agreement. No other date could very well be fixed.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am not so sure of that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: What would my honourable friend suggest?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: Cannot we easily agree upon a second fact, since one important one has been admitted, that we are facing a bankrupt concern—that the common stock is valueless?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is necessarily an element to be taken into consideration in the arbitration. I have not time to dwell at any length on the scheme of arbitration, but it seems to me that no other scheme can be worked out than that which is to be found in the Bill. But my honourable friend is quite wrong in saying that it is established that there is no value in the stock. A concern may be insolvent, and yet the equities it holds may have a very substantial value; at least, that is shewn according to the statements made by valuators appointed by the royal commission.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: The Drayton-Acworth report says it is valueless.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Of course, the commission stated that the value of the stock was non-existent, yet it was shown there conclusively that there was a very substantial omission of assets. There was cash omitted to the amount of $25,000,000, made up of the proceeds of certain securities yet in the hands of the provinces and in trust companies, while the bond issue of which the $25,000,000 forms part of the proceeds was charged up as a liability in its entirety; there were accounts receiveable omitted, amounting to $8,890,000; then there was a list of operating materials and other supplies, amounting to $916,000, and for earnings, freight in transit, $558,000; also there were land assets omitted—and I shall mention in a moment how it happened that those were omitted. Lands amount to 3,245,987 acres. Then, deferred payments and accrued interest amount to $6,662,000. On the liability side there is a shortage of $25,000,000, representing convertible income bonds.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: How did they miss those things in the report?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: When Prof. Swain was called upon to give a valuation of the road he made a physical valuation, and did not consider these matters as necessarily coming within the duty which he was asked to perform; he thought they did not form part of the physical assets of the road, and consequently they were omitted. I am not discussing whether there is a value in the assets; that is for the arbitration to decide.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Even adding that, it does not make enough.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That shows $40,000,000 of a surplus.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: I would like to ask who Prof. Swain is?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Prof. Swain is considered to be the leading expert in the United States on physical valuations of railways. He is attached, I understand, to the professoriate of Harvard University, and is employed by the United States Government in valuations of this character.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend will notice that the Drayton-Acworth report is not dated, and there is nothing to indicate the date; it should be at the foot of page viii.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: So far as I can recollect, the report was made last spring. I will get the date. With these explanations, and the desire to further facilitate the inquiry of the Senate when we go into Committee, I move the second reading of the Bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I have listened with unusual care and attention to the instructive and able address of the leader of the House, but I failed to get any information on one point, which I assume he omitted through inadvertency. The honourable gentleman did not give the House the reasons why the Government did not proceed under the Act of 1914.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Because they consider the way they are proceeding to-day is very much better.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: The honourable leader said that those current liabilities were constantly changing. If he will look at page 1, he will see that they were $12,944,152, and if he looks at the year afterwards he will find that they are exactly the same; so they are not changing very much.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is a coincidence, probably.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, but there are twelve million chances that it should not be.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: In the arbitration that is to take place all those matters are to be taken into consideration. We do not for a moment accept as conclusive the balance sheets which have been handed us to-day, or the different items that have been included in the balance sheets. Of course, a very full inquiry will have to be made into the exact figures.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: My honourable friend will understand that we look to him for information, and since he has decided, speaking for himself and the friends who stand around him, that this Bill will not go to the Railway Committee and we will not have a chance to examine the officials of the Canadian Northern—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Does my honourable friend think that we should call the officials of the Canadian Northern and put them through a cross-examination before the standing committee? Is my honourable friend serious about that?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I may tell my honourable friend that if he were retained for a syndicate to value the assets and examine into the liabilities of a concern in order to put in a bid, he would avail himself of all the information he could obtain, and he would engage the best accountants if he did not do it himself, so as to get an exact account of the real situation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But these will be the functions of the arbitrators. Surely my honourable friend does not think that we are going to sit here as a Senate and examine documents and determine the company's assets and liabilities.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But we are passing legislation which implies that this bankrupt concern, as my honourable friend has called it—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, I did not say that; I said it was insolvent; I did not use the word bankrupt at all.

Hon. M. DANDURAND: Then I will withdraw the expression—that this insolvent concern has an equity in its common stock. When we pass this legislation there is an implication that there is something that should be arbitrated, that we recognize the possibility that there may be a value—I should perhaps go further and say the probability of a value —attached to that common stock. This being so, it seems to me that it is most important that we should have information on these points: Has that $100,000,000 of common stock, of which we now own $40,000,000 been issued for value? Has the treasury of the company received any cash value for that stock, or has it been distributed for one cause or another? I find on page xliii of the Drayton-Acworth report this statement:

> We find, then, $370,000,000 to be the maximum possible cost of the Canadian Northern system as at present existing. In other words, as indeed is frankly admitted by Canadian Northern witnesses—

And, of course, we have not those witnesses and cannot ask them—

> —the Canadian Northern shares represent no cash investment.

Does my honourable friend accept this statement, and recognize that that stock has been distributed, and when distributed represented nothing but future hopes, or water, to use the common word?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I might answer my honourable friend in this way: Is he not aware of any stock on which cash was never paid, that has yet come into value?

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: I know that stock that has been distributed has appreciated, but the question I put is simply this, has this stock been distributed without a cent falling into the treasury of the company?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: As my honourable friend puts it emphatically in that way, I would ask him to consider this statement which has been made, and which I think appears in the report, that the land grants to which I have referred were all handed over by Mackenzie and Mann in consideration of this stock being given them.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: But to whom had the land been granted?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: To the different roads that finally went into making the Canadian Northern system; but the grants were controlled by the promoters, Mackenzie and Mann, and when the roads were constructed and the land grants earned those land grants went to the promoters. The Government handed them over; the promoters were entitled to them. Then, I would point out to my honourable friend that from the beginning of construction down to the present time, extending over fifteen or twenty years, the services of those men as contractors have been given gratuitously. My honourable friend will find from the report of the Commission that the ability and economy exercised by Mackenzie and Mann in the construction of that road have enured not only to its financial but its engineering advantage. My honourable friend is placing reliance upon the report of the Royal Commission. I would refer him to page lxi, in which this statement is made:

> The result of our inquiries leads us to the conviction that both Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann had a firm belief in the ultimate success of their undertaking, and in their own ability to carry it to a successful conclusion.
> It was therefore obviously in their interest, as owners of all the common stock, that the road should be as well located and as economically constructed as possible. And they did their utmost to attain this end. The success of their endeavours may be judged from the fact that Canadian Northern construction from Tollerton (120 miles west of Edmonton) to Vancouver cost $88,629 per mile, while the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific from Wolf Creek (on the opposite side of the Athabaska river from Tollerton) to Prince Rupert cost $112,000 per mile. It is true that the Canadian Northern had the benefit of the "tote" roads built by the Grand Trunk Pacific between Pembina river and Resplendent, as the Grand Trunk Pacific was first in the field; but as against that it had to face higher costs of labour and material. We believe that, speaking generally, one consideration may be set off against the other. Again, the cost of construction of the Canadian Northern from Port Arthur east to Montreal can be compared fairly to the cost of the construction of the National Transcontinental from Winnipeg to Quebec. The cost of the Canadian Northern was $52,602 per mile, including in this amount interest at 5 per cent during the construction period, but excluding the Montreal passenger terminal. The cost of the National Transcontinental was $93,735 per mile, including interest at 3 per cent down to December 31, 1914, but excluding the cost of the Quebec bridge.

That is, $93,735 per mile as against $52,602 per mile, and on the mountain section $88,629 per mile as against $112,000.

Hon. Mr. DANDURAND: This road was built by Mackenzie and Mann as contractors for the road, was it not?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes, but they made no charge for their services, and my honourable friend can easily figure out what their services would be on a construction cost of practically $400,000,000 if they exercised the right as they could have done, of charging a percentage on force account in addition to the land grant which I have mentioned.

At six o'clock, the Senate took recess.

The Senate resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. HEWITT BOSTOCK: I should like first to congratulate my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) on his speech and the free and easy way in which he handled this question. It is a question which, it seems to me, affects all the interests of the country so seriously and has such an enormous amount of detail in it that it is very difficult to know what points to touch upon and what points to leave out.

My honourable friend dealt with the question of the responsibility for the railway construction in the country—a question which has been discussed before in this House, but which I do not think I can allow to pass without making a few remarks upon it. The honourable gentleman left on the House the impression that the late Government was practically responsible not only for the Grand Trunk Pacific, but also for the whole of the Canadian Northern construction. If my honourable friend will carry his mind back to the year after the present Government came in, he will remember that a vote was put through Parliament granting to the Canadian Northern Pacific a cash subsidy of $12,000 a mile, which I for one opposed very strongly in this House; and he will realize, I think, that the late Government had no responsibility for the granting to the Canadian Northern Pacific of that cash subsidy or the assistance that was given to that section of the Canadian Northern Railway. The Conservative party in the province and the Conservative party in the Dominion must bear the full responsibility for the position in which the province of British Columbia finds itself with regard to the liabilities of this railway.

My honourable friend, I am glad to say, did not try to get away from the point that this company is practically insolvent today. He realizes the position in which the company is placed, but he did not go into the matter to show us clearly in what way this act of insolvency had been committed, and did not deal with the question as in my opinion it should have been dealt with. I would like to refer the honourable gentleman to remarks which he made in 1914, when the question of the granting to this company of a guarantee of $45,000,000 was before this House. Very great interest was taken in the question throughout the country, and it was thoroughly discussed here. The honourable gentleman on that occasion assured the House and the country that the Government was fully aware of the position they were then taking. I think it will be of interest to read to the House a statement that was made by the honourable leader of the Government at that time, in 1914, with reference to the legislation which was being put through Parliament. The honourable gentleman said on June 5, 1914:

> The agreement makes further provision, and of the most satisfactory character, in the interests of the public in the event of default arising by the company in the carrying out of its obligations, permitting the Government to enter upon and take possession of the road, and subject to Parliament to take over the entire system as the property of the Government of Canada. It may not be out of place in this connection to say that in the agreement which has been worked out in this measure looking to the Government obtaining every possible security to protect its guarantee, in addition to every precaution being taken to see to the application of all moneys being made upon actual construction and thus furnishing every assurance for the completion of the road. In the provisions as to the right of foreclosure, of possession and of assuming not only entire control but entire ownership, the Government combines the advantage of having the system completed without assuming public ownership and of owning two-fifths of the entire capital stock which in the event of the undertaking becoming a successful and prosperous enterprise will be a national asset upon which the people of Canada will have every reason to congratulate themselves. On the other hand, should default arise and should the Government of Canada be called upon to invoke their rights under the agreement to take possession of the road, we have the advantage of the present contractors completing the undertaking at a cost substantially less than it would be at all possible for the Government of Canada at present to enter upon and complete the undertaking themselves. It will probably be readily admitted that Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, are in a position to complete this undertaking at probably fifty per cent less than the Government of Canada could enter upon such a responsibility and carry on the work to a completion.

The honourable gentleman went on to say:

> We have the further advantage that if default is made we shall have had the aid which we are now voting applied in the completion of the undertaking without disturbing the financial conditions of Canada at this very critical period in our financial history. We shall escape precipitating a panic in Canada at a time when it was never more necessary to maintain the public credit and to meet the financial exigencies of the hour. This measure gives assurance of a satisfactory completion of this great undertaking and if default should arise, then under the provisions of the agreement the Government of Canada will be able automatically to enter into possession of the property and to assume control and public ownership without at the present moment producing a financial convulsion within our own boundaries, not to speak of the impairment to our national credit abroad.

That was what the honourable gentleman stated to the House when the Bill was introduced to grant this company a guarantee of $45,000,000. That statement went out to the country, and it was only fair for the country to assume that when default was completed, action would be taken according to that statute. Perhaps I had better read for the information of honourable gentlemen the clauses of the statute which dealt with that question. Section 21 says:

The following shall be events of default within the meaning of this Act, viz,

I do not know that it is necessary to read that, because the honourable gentleman (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) has admitted that the company is insolvent. Section 22 says:

1. Upon the happening of any event of default and at any time or times while the same shall continue, it shall be lawful for the Governor in Council after such notice to the Canadian Northern as the Governor in Council may direct, to declare to be vacant the offices of the directors of the Canadian Northern and of any of the Constituent or Subsidiary Companies which may be subject to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, and to appoint a board or boards of directors in lieu thereof respectively (any former director being eligible for appointment).

2. The power of appointment herein conferred upon the Governor in Council shall be a continuous power and shall be exercisable from time to time and so often as any event of default may exist and be continuing.

There is a clause dealing with the term of offices, and vacancies, and directors. Then, section 24 says:

If authorized by the Parliament of Canada, the Governor in Council may on such terms and conditions (if any) as Parliament may prescribe, at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing, by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed, and the same shall thereupon be vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada, any statutory enactment or any rule of law or equity to the contrary notwithstanding.

Honourable gentlemen will notice that in that particular clause it is provided that "at any time while any event of default shall exist and be continuing," the Governor may "by order declare the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern and of all other persons whomsoever in the mortgaged premises to be foreclosed, and thereupon the equity of redemption of the Canadian Northern (and of such other persons) in the mortgaged premises and every part thereof shall be and become absolutely barred and foreclosed." I do not think that any stronger language than that could have been used. That was put on the statute book and held out to the country as the action that the Government would take if the event of default did happen in the management of this railway.

I could go on quoting statements made at that time by other ministers of the Crown, holding up to the country this same policy as the way in which this question would be dealt with in the event of default occuring; but I do not think it is necessary to take up the time of the House in doing so.

The Government last year, after agreeing to advance the sum of $15,000,000 in order that this railway might be carried on, brought down an estimate providing for the appointment of a Royal Commission to deal with the railway question and to report to the country what they found to be the condition of this railway. I find on turning to the report of the Commissioners, Drayton and Acworth, page 84, the following words;

We feel that the appointment of receivers is not in the interest of the country's credit. It certainly is not in the interest of the companies, as the evidence of this report shows that the property of the Grand Trunk Company, if it were put into a receiver's hands, would leave little or nothing for the shareholders. The result of court proceedings would probably be to divest the shareholders of all interest, and to place the Government in the position to take, to the fullest extent, the advantages of their legal position as holders of defaulting securities. But, though we hope receiverships will not be necessary, we think the Government must face the possibility of being compelled to take the course we have indicated.

In the case of the Canadian Northern Railway Company no proceedings in court are requisite. Under the provisions of section 24 of the Canadian Northern Railway Guarantee Act, 1914 (4-5 Geo. V, chap. 20)—

That is the section which I have just read—

—the Governor General in Council has power, when authorized by Parliament, to declare by Order, if default is made by the company in payment of interest on the $45,000,000 guaranteed securities (the interest on which is at present being found by the Government) that the equity of redemption of the company is absolutely barred and foreclosed; and thereupon the whole property becomes vested in His Majesty in right of the Dominion of Canada.

That is the statement made by Drayton and Acworth in their report to the Government. It is true that the Government have tried to find fault with the report. Some time after it was issued the statement was made in the House that certain items had been left out; but there is a clear statement by the commissioners appointed by the Government of the way that this whole question could be handled, and I think it is the way that it should be handled, because it is the way the Government told Parliament and the country that they would handle it if any case of default occurred in the dealings of this railway company.

The honourable gentleman (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) has told us to-day that he is anxious to give us all the information possible with regard to this company in order that we may be in a position to vote intelligently on the question. I am very sorry that the honourable gentleman could not see his way to granting the request that I made to him, that this matter be referred to the Railway Committee, because I think that the information which it is necessary for this House to have before dealing with the question could have been obtained very much better in that way than by discussing the question in this Chamber.

Various statements have been issued to the public, and any honourable gentleman who takes up these statements, reads them and compares them, will find that he is in a very difficult position in trying to arrive at the truth respecting the condition of this railway company. In talking to honourable gentlemen and others about this matter I have found that there is a great deal of misapprehension in the public mind as to what is included and what is not included in the Canadian Northern Railway system. When you talk about subsidiary companies and all that class of security, some persons seem to consider that they include all the investments which Mackenzie and Mann had outside of their railways; but I asked a question of the honourable leader of the Government in regard to this matter the other day and I learned then that the Canadian Town Properties, Limited, has nothing to do with the Canadian Northern Railway Company; and there are a large number of other companies which a great many people think are included in this whole system; such as lumber companies, fishing companies, smelting companies, mining companies, street railway companies, and concerns of that kind. But if they study the Act of 1914 I think they will see that they are absolutely tied down to the companies named in that Act, although I think that my honourable friend this afternoon referred to a telegraph company and an express company which I did not think were included in the list of 1914. I mention these matters to show the misapprehension that exists in the public mind, and even in the minds of honourable gentlemen in this Chamber, as to what is really included in the Canadian Northern system, and as to what is not included.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK.

When we come to deal with the question of what the Canadian Northern system really represents, it is very difficult to agree as to what is meant, and as to what is the real value of the system.

The honourable gentleman to-day made the point that in the Drayton-Acworth report no account was taken of the land grants, that is, land given by the country at various times to some of the railway companies which are now included in the Canadian Northern Railway system. The honourable gentleman spoke of these land grants as if the lands belonged to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann when the roads were building, and as if those gentlemen were most philanthropic when they presented what was left of these land grants, together with the mortgages upon them, to the country as part of the Canadian Northern Railway system. The honourable gentleman referred to the report of Professor Swain on this matter; but after looking at what is said by Messrs. Drayton and Acworth with regard to this report, I cannot see that the contention of my honourable friend is right. On page 43 of the Drayton-Acworth report I find this statement:

> Professor Swain's method of arriving at his results are fully explained in his report, which is printed as an appendix hereto.

Honourable gentlemen will see that this all refers to the physical basis of the road.

> He makes the total cost of reproduction new, $397,441,567. From this he deducts for depreciation, $40,031,889, making the cost of reproduction of the property in its present condition $357,409,678. This, however, does not include equipment. Equipment was inspected by Mr. Buchanan and, on the basis of his report as to quantities and condition, a valuation has been made by W. H. Chadbourn, C. E., chief engineer of our valuation staff.

I presume that he is a member of the Railway Commission.

> He finds the cost of reproduction new at pre-war prices to be $56,590,418, and the depreciation to be $11,250,433, making the present value $45,339,985. Putting the two valuations together, we have $402,749,663 as the fair cost of reproducing the entire physical Canadian Northern system in its present condition.

Honourable gentlemen will see that in considering this question Professor Swain did not need to take into account the lands which the Government of Canada had given to the railways.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I did not contend that. I said that there were in round figures 850,000 acres of land yet held by the company, valued at $15 per acre; that in deferred payments there was approximately $7,000,000 due.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understood my honourable friend to say that the value of these lands was not taken into account in Professor Swain's report.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: They were not. They were omitted.

Hon. Mr. THOMPSON: Are not all the lands owned by the railways subject to the $20,000,000 land mortgage?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No. There is land to be sold that will realize in round figures between $12,000,000 and $15,000,000.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The point which I am trying to make is that Professor Swain was dealing with the physical reproduction of this road, and therefore it is quite understandable that he would not take into account——

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is what I say.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: But that does not show that the land, and the equity that was left, outside of the mortgage, was not taken into account in this report.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: It was not.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I think I can show that it was. The statement then goes on to say:

> Now, the outstanding liabilities (bonds, debentures, notes, and bank and other loans) of the company exceed $400,000,000.

The total for the equipment given in this report of Professor Swain amounts to $402,701,663, and the liabilities against it to $400,000,000.

> Reckoning on this basis, it appears that the liabilities are practically equal to the reproduction cost of the physical property. But the physical property does not all belong to the Canadian Northern shareholders. There are minority holdings in several of the subsidiary undertakings. The Canadian Northern interests in these undertakings only corresponds to its percentage proportion of their respective share capitals. This implies a reduction of more than $10,000,000 in the estimate of the assets belonging to the Canadian Northern shareholders. We find, then that, on the physical basis, the value of the property of the Canadian Northern shareholders is distinctly less than the amount of the liabilities against it. On this basis the equity of the shareholders must be regarded as nonexistent.

That is the result of Professor Swain's report, and the summing up of the matter by Messrs. Drayton and Acworth.

I would ask the honourable gentleman to turn to page 19 of the report, where Messrs. Drayton and Acworth give in condensed form the amount of money and guarantees that have been furnished by the Dominion of Canada. Honourable gentlemen will see that the cash subsides granted to the Canadian Northern railway by the Dominion Government, the provincial Governments, and the municipalities, amount to $38,874,148; the proceeds of lands sold amount to $34,379,809; loans outstanding on investments, $25,858,166; guarantees outstanding $199,141,140; making a total of $298,253,263. They deal with this question later on, and they make the statement:

> That the company has not now, and as far as we can see, will not have in the near future, such credit as to enable it to raise the necessary capital. As we have already shown, the public investment, direct and indirect, in the Canadian Northern system amounts to $298,000,000. We do not recommend further public investment in the system, as at present constituted.

Honourable gentlemen will see that in that figure named by Messrs. Drayton and Acworth they take into consideration the question of these lands.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Will you show me where?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Where did they get the proceeds of what is sold?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the original land grant. Will my honourable friend pardon me for interrupting?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Certainly.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I quote from a letter sent to Sir Thomas White pointing out omissions that were made, and, if the House will permit me, I will read it. It says:

> I may state that it is quite clear that there is an error in that part of the Commissioners' report; the following assets on the asset side are omitted: cash, $25,000,000; accounts receivable, $8,890,000; operating materials and supplies, $916,000; earnings, freight in transit, $558,000; lands unsold, 3,245,987 acres; deferred payments and accrued interest, $6,662,000; on the liability side, there is a shortage of some $25,000,000.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I do not think the statement which my honourable friend has just given has been given anywhere before. It is a different statement from the one which I have here and to which I propose to refer. I think it emphasizes the point that I am trying to make, namely, the difficulty of arriving at what is the real position of this company, and what liabilities we may have to assume, and what the value of this company is. Of course, some of these questions can be dealt with very much better in committee than at the present time, but I want to refer to them because my honourable friend will understand why we want the information and he will also understand the difficulty in arriving at a clear understanding as to the position of the company.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That has all been included in the liabilities.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The honourable gentleman then referred to the statement of the assets and liabilities of this company, published in blue-book form. We find there that the funded debt of the Canadian Northern Railway company is given in schedule A as $162,192,440. The funded debt of the affiliated companies, schedule B, $123,223,824, a total of $285,416,264. But when we take the figures given in that same report, on pages 5, 6 and 7, we find the list of securities totals $359,931,635. There is a difference there of $74,000,000. The whole $359,931,635 would, I believe, be liabilities not only of the Canadian Northern, but of the affiliated companies, and I do not understand why there should be such a difference in the balance sheet. It does not show where that mortgage of $21,000,000 is taken into account. Another point on which we should get information is this: There is a statement on page 8 giving a memorandum of the short-term loans and current liabilities as of June 15, 1917, the total being $98,276,883. I do not wish to quote more figures than are necessary; so I would simply say that that amount includes London loans, Canada loans, New York loans, and other obligations. Honourable gentlemen will find, however, by referring to pages 11 and 12, particulars of the first three of those loans; but when they come to other obligations $24,289,609, on page 8, we can get no information at all out of this statement, as there do not seem to be any particulars of that item telling, what those obligations are or represent—whether they are secured in any way to the people who have loaned the money on any of those securities. We ought to know the meaning of that item.

I have a typewritten statement here which was handed to me, headed: "Sessional Paper No. 237B." I do not know whether my honourable friend has a copy of it, and possibly other honourable gentlemen may not have it, as I suppose it has not been printed. This statement gives some information which my honourable friend read out just now, but not all of it in the same way. I find in this statement, first of all, items relating to payments on interest account. Possibly, as my honourable friend has not a copy, it might be well to read the statement in order to get it on Hansard. The statement reads as follows:

Monday, August 13, 1917.
Sessional Papers No. 237B.
Finance Department, Ottawa.
The Canadian Northern Railway Company.

The Government have advanced to date to the Canadian Northern Railway company on interest account, under section 29 of the Acts of 1914, the sum of $2,634,500.01, as follows:

The company have paid to the Government interest in full on above advance to March 1, 1917, the sum of $35,952.04, as follows:

April 4, 1917, in full to March 1, 1917	29,311.66

The next payment of interest on interest is due September 1, 1917.

Then there is a letter dated August 11, 1917, from A. J. Mitchell, assistant to the Vice-President, addressed to Hon. Sir Thomas White, as follows:

Canadian Northern Railway System.
Office of Assistant to the Vice-President,
Toronto, August 11, 1917.

Hon. Sir Thomas White,
Minister of Finance,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir:—

I herewith beg to hand you the following statements with respect to the Canadian Northern Railway:

1. Interim Condensed Balance Sheet as at April 30, 1917.

(Inasmuch as the operating returns for June were not complete, and as it would entail considerable delay in having these prepared, we are submitting the condensed balance sheet to April 30. There will be little difference between this statement and the results shown in the June 30 balance sheet.)

2. Statement of estimate of cost to complete lines and terminals under construction and financial provision for same.

3. Statement of contractors' and other construction accounts outstanding, 30th June, 1917.

4. Memorandum re unsold lands.

5. Estimate of amount required for betterments and rolling stock for three years.

Yours truly,
A. J. Mitchell,
Assistant to Vice-President.

I draw the attention of honourable gentlemen to this fact, that when they compare this statement, which is signed by H. J. Foreman, Chief Accountant, with the statement of the 30th June, 1916, which is signed by the chartered accountants, they will find items in this statement which are not in the other one, and I decidedly think those variations need some explanation; for chartered accountants are supposed to have gone thoroughly into this matter, and they are expected to get all the information that the company has to give. It would take too long to make a comparison of the entire statement, but I think we should have some explanation as to where and why the difference occurs, and how it comes that the statement given by the accountant of the Company does not agree in these matters with that given by the chartered accountants, who, I presume, are a very reputable firm, and who would make every endeavour to see that they got exact figures and made a correct statement of the affairs of the Company.

This sessional paper goes on to make another statement as to cost of completion of lines and terminals under construction, as follows :

Canadian Northern Railway system.

Arrangements could be made to defer the balance till after the war, when same will be subject to such changes as conditions may necessitate.

Certified correct,
A. J. Mitchell.

In connection with that statement it might be proper to draw attention to a telegram that was sent to the Premier a short time ago by the Minister of Railways of British Columbia, asking what would be the position of British Columbia in regard to contracts existing between that province and the Canadian Northern Pacific railway, amounting to between $20,000,000 and $25,000,000. The figures given here do not seem to bear any relation to $20,000,000 or $25,000,000. I have not been able to see that any reply was made either by Sir Thomas White or Sir Robert Borden that would give any explanation or information to the Minister of Railways in British Columbia as to the position his province would occupy in the matter.

Then, there is a further statement here of accounts outstanding on construction, June 30th, 1917 :

This is certified correct by the treasurer of the Company, although I notice he does not sign his name to it.

I feel, honourable gentlemen, that I ought to apologize to the House for taking up so much time in reading all these figures, but, inasmuch as this statement had not been issued in the form of a blue book, from which honourable gentlemen could obtain the information, I felt that it was better to put the statement in the official report so that they could refer to it. But it only shows that we are justified in asking for a great deal more information than we have been able to get, and I hope that we shall succeed in obtaining the information we require.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Before the Bill is passed.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: Honourable gentlemen will notice that under section 3 of the Bill which is now before the House, provision is made for the Government to spend $25,000,000 during the next year, and that sum, of course, will be spent on this road. That is an estimate made by the Government of what is required to operate the road during this next year and to pay the interest on securities and on other liabilities falling due. I think it would be to the advantage of the House to read what was said by Drayton and Acworth in their report, with reference to an estimate submitted by the Canadian Northern:

The Canadian Northern estimate submitted to us further calculated that, in the course of the next five years, the company will need to spend $12,500,000 of new capital for additions and betterments, and $25,000,000 for new equipment. We consider these estimates entirely inadequate, and especially so in relation to the estimate of 90 per cent increase in gross receipts. The company has acknowledged that its equipment is inadequate to take care of its existing business. That equipment stands in the company's books at $59,000,000. If the business were to increase 90 per cent, it would seem to need not $25,000,000, but over $50,000,000 spent on new equipment to handle it.

Then they refer to a comparison between the Canadian Pacific railway equipment and that of the Canadian Northern railway. The Canadian Pacific railway has seven freight cars per mile of line. The Canadian Northern has only three:

We think it will need five; and this implies an addition of 20,000 cars to the existing stock. This alone would imply, even if prices dropped to those current a year ago, an additional expenditure of something like $30,000,000. And the same thing is true in respect of locomotives. Nor can the estimate of $12,500,000 for additions and betterments, spread over a system of 10,000 miles during five years, be sustained, more especially in the case of a system that is only just emerging from the construction stage. It works out at $250 per mile per annum. It is impossible that the needs of a rapidly growing property can be adequately provided for at any such figure.

We think that $40,000,000 for equipment, and perhaps $30,000,000 for additions and betterments, would be a moderate estimate of the system's needs in the next five years, assuming that the Canadian Northern remains separate and independent.

Hon. Mr. BEAUBIEN: At what page is that?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That it at page 41 of Drayton and Acworth's report. Honourable gentlemen will see there the amount that Drayton and Acworth considered necessary to be spent within the next five years in connection with equipment, additions and betterments, and they will realize that the amount of $25,000,000 which the Government is this year providing is only like a first instalment of what will have to be spent in order to complete this system and make it capable of properly handling the produce offered to it throughout the Dominion and carrying it to market in the way that should be done.

I have dealt in this matter with the amount of money that has been put into this road and with the physical condition of the road. My honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) in speaking to-day referred to the question of the stock of the company; but from the figures that I have presented to the House and the portions of this report which I have read, I think honourable gentlemen will see that the question of the common stock of the company is one that we should not be taking into account. What we want to arrive at is what the country is going to get in return for taking over the liabilities of this road. I have shown already, by the figures which I have quoted that the physical value of the road is less than the liabilities that are standing against it, according to the statement of the Drayton-Acworth report. In addition to the liabilities mentioned there, if I understand anything about this question, I understand that there are a number of liabilities which the Government will have to deal with, when they take over the road. When the Government assume these liabilities they will probably be expected to pay up in full. If those liabilities were due by the Canadian Northern railway as represented by Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, the probabilities are that they would be treated very differently. So far as I have been able to find, very little account has been given of the undetermined and outstanding liabilities. The persons to whom the money is owed, or who think that money is owed to them, will consider that the Government should deal with them very differently from the way in which the Canadian Northern as represented by Messrs Mackenzie and Mann would deal with them.

The honourable leader of the Government in his speech to-day, referring to the question of securities, acknowledged that those held by the Dominion Government ranked after the securities held by the provinces; but he did not say anything about the amount of $147,000,000 of securities that are entered in the bluebook as unguaranteed securities, and if I understand anything about this matter, the Government must become liable for those securities just the same as for the others. I think I am right in that view of the situation, because I have seen in the financial columns of papers published in England, and other places where the securities are held, that when it was noised abroad that the Government were considering taking over this whole system and that it would possibly become a Government road, these securities immediately jumped up several points in the markets of the world, and were reported to have a value nobody would have placed on them before this event happened. That will show honourable gentlemen the liabilities which the country is assuming in dealing with this road as the Government proposes to do, and that it is a very serious matter to deal with in this way. I have quoted to the House a section of the Act of 1914 to show the powers which the Government took to themselves with reference to the Canadian Northern, and so far we have had no explanation from the honourable leader of the Government in this House why the Government should not deal with the matter in the way indicated at that time.

I would like to give a few more figures, although I fear that I have quoted so many figures to-night that honourable gentlemen will be very tired of them. An estimate was made of the amount of liabilities that would fall upon the country, through this company. The estimate is as follows:

Amount of indebtedness placed on Canada by Government taking over Canadian Northern Railway:

Bonded indebtedness	$359,931,635.64
Equipment bonds	14,846,500.00
Income convertible debenture stock	25,000,000.00
Loans and liabilities	112,723,035.00
Equipment expenditures—

Those are the expenditures to which I referred just now in quoting from the Drayton-Acworth report—the estimate of expenditures required for the next five years.

Equipment expenditures	$40,000,000.00
Additions and betterments	30,000,000.00
Interest on equipment bonds	645,778.75

Then, assuming that the arbitrators award the par value of the stock, there would be $60,000,000 more to add.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The honourable gentleman wants to put a premium on that.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: No; I take it that the par value of these shares is the amount stated in the Bill, $60,000,000; therefore, it is fair to add that amount. Then, cost of arbitrators, $100,000, and payments by the Government to recoup banks, $10,000,000; making a total of $653,246,949.39.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is that my honourable friend's own estimate?

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: It is the figures which I have made up.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I should think so.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: That is exclusive of the stock. I think that honourable gentlemen, looking at those figures, will see they are fair; and it may be that the arbitrators will charge more than $100,000 for their services. These are not my figures.

Hon. M. CROSBY: The honourable gentleman denies them now.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: The figures are all taken from the reports issued by the Government. I have simply compiled them and totalled them up, because I wanted to show to honourable gentlemen the liabilities which the Government is placing upon the country, and I wanted to try to impress upon them the seriousness of this whole situation. Before we agree to saddling the country with any such burden as that, we ought to have the very fullest possible information, and we should know exactly what we are doing; and I regret to say that at the present time, from the information we have so far obtained, I do not see that we are able to realize what we are doing and how the whole matter will affect the credit of the country in the future.

In regard to the question of Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, and their interest in this matter, I do not think that they come into the question to any great extent; but, at the same time, we are placed in this position, giving these gentlemen every credit for what they have done, for the enterprise they have shown and the way that they have carried on the railway building throughout Canada. They have succeeded in building a transcontinental line, or the best part of a transcontinental line; but what they have done has been done with the money and credit supplied by the country, and from the figures which I have given it is very difficult to see that they have placed any of their own money into this enterprise. They have played a very large and important part in the development of this country in the past. Had they played it successfully, had things not gone against them, they would probably have made a great deal of money out of the transaction; but, inasmuch as the money which they have used has been practically put up by the country, and that they have used very largely the credit of the country in carrying on this enterprise and other enterprises, I do not quite see why we should grant any special favours to these gentlemen or treat them differently from other men who have shown quite as much enterprise in business and who have not had quite as much assistance in the past, but who have had to bear the brunt and burden of the non-success of their business if it has proved unsuccessful.

I want again to impress upon the House the fact that I asked the leader of the Government if he could not refer this matter to the Railway Committee in order that we might deal with it. I think we could obtain a great deal of information which we have not got at the present time if we did refer this matter to that committee, and had an opportunity of asking the chief of the Board of Railway Commissioners, Sir Henry Drayton, and any other officers whom it might be necessary to have come before us, to give us information, which would help us to understand the situation very much better than we do now. There are officials of the company whom we might have before us—for instance, Mr. Mitchell, vice-president of the company, who has placed his name to a portion of the report. We might also call the chartered accountants, inasmuch as their report of the 30th of June, 1916, does not entirely agree with the report which is now made by the accountant of the company. We might get a great deal of information in this way; but my honourable friend practically told us that this information the arbitrators themselves will have to get, and that we will have to deal with this matter without getting this information, and put this matter through without having an opportunity of dealing with it as I think we should. For a considerable portion of this session there has not been much to do, and now that an important piece of legislation is brought before us, we on this side of the House, and I think all honourable gentlemen in this House, are quite ready to go into the matter fully in order to obtain the information necessary to decide upon this Bill; but, inasmuch as my honourable friend has not seen his way to accede to the request which I have made, I beg to move in amendment to his motion, for the second reading:

That the word "not" be inserted before the word "now" and the following words be added at the end of the question: "but that further consideration of the said Bill be deferred until the following information has been communicated to the Senate:

The production of the report made to the Government by the directors of the Canadian Northern railway system, including the directors appointed to the board by the Government under section 16, chapter 20, of the statutes of 1914; the names of the stockholders of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway Company; the names of the pledgees of this stock.

An explanation of how it happens that the funded debt of the Canadian Northern Railway Company shown in balance sheet, 30th June, 1916, is $162,192,440.38, and that of affiliated companies is $123,223,824.19, making a total of $285,416,264.57, whereas the statement of securities outstanding, guaranteed and unguaranteed, shows an amount of $359,931,-635.64, as appears in the financial statement printed by order of Parliament.

The bonded debt, floating debt, and other liabilities, direct and indirect, of each of the affiliated companies of the Canadian Northern Company, whose capital stock is held or partly held by that company.

The amount of bonds, debentures or other securities pledged for loans to the Canadian Northern Railway company.

The amount of loans and the amount of securities on which such loans have been made to Mackenzie and Mann, Limited, or to the Canadian Northern railway.

When these loans are paid to whom will the securities so pledged revert, to the Canadian Northern railway, to Mackenzie and Mann, or to other parties?

The companies to whom the Canadian Northern railway owes $16,666,957 on construction account, and the amounts due each company.

The construction companies to whom the Canadian Northern railway owes the $1,277,323 and the amounts due each company.

The persons or companies to whom the Canadian Northern railway owes the $11,161,443 as floating liabilities, and the amount due to each.

The amount of money advanced by financial institutions to the Canadian Northern railway and the securities pledged therefor.

The names of the persons or financial institutions to whom the capital stock of the Canadian Northern railway belonging to Mackenzie and Mann Limited, or Sir William Mackenzie or Sir Donald Mann, amounting to $51,000,000, has been pledge. The date or dates on which said stock was so pledged and the amount received in each case and what other securities have been given to said pledgees with said stock.

The debts now owing by the Canadian Northern railway other than those referred to in the financial statement submitted to Parliament.

Hon. J. S. McLENNAN: Honourable gentlemen, I shall somewhat change the course of the discussion which has taken place on this important subject by visualizing it from a different angle. I shall not quote any figures. The acuteness of the situation in regard to the transportation problem in this country is evidenced by the fact that at this particular time, when we are within a few days, let us hope, of the end of this Parliament, and within a few weeks or months of an election, that the Government has brought down a Bill of this kind. The complexity of this Bill and the complexity of the conditions on which it is based is shown by the difficulty which has been experienced in dealing with it by honourable gentlemen who have shown so much ability in presenting facts and figures before us.

This Bill proposes a course of action which has occasioned a great deal of comment throughout the country. As I have heard it, that comment has been mostly unfavourable, and apparently is bound to alienate very important elements in the make-up of Canada. Under ordinary circumstances it would be very bad tactics for any Government to introduce such a Bill. At this time, when the result of the coming election, on which will depend the spirit in which Canada will prosecute her part in the war, and her relations both internally and with the other parts of the Empire and our Allies, it is quite evident that the proposed course of action is due to the direst necessity.

This is a matter of vital importance, because it is perfectly evident, whether the remaining $60,000,000 of the Canadian Northern railway stock is worth par, as has just been hinted, or is worth nothing, that the action proposed by this Bill involves the expenditure of a very considerable amount of money. This is a time when the money in the treasury of Canada and the money that can be brought into the treasury of Canada can ill be spared from more necessary and vital projects.

This Bill involves the settlement of a very great principle, on a side issue. It involves the settling of the question of the nationalization of railways upon the question of the present necessities of the Canadian Northern railway. Although it is objectionable, it often happens that a very great principle is not settled upon its merits, but by reason of necessity for action in regard to some concrete case. That, I think, is the case at present. Moreover, the settlement as far as it goes is incomplete. It leaves out of the question the Transcontinental railway and the general railroad situation in Canada. More than that, it throws upon the Government, and upon departments already over-burdened with work, the necessity of working out some scheme by which the evils connected with the action which may be taken may be minimised. Whatever good is in the situation created by the Bill—and I hope and trust that I may be able to show to the House that there is a possibility of very material good in it—it seems to me that we are in a condition somewhat like that in which some of us find ourselves with regard to our private affairs. We have had an interest in an enterprise, an enterprise which has suffered from the infantile diseases which all enterprises suffer from, and has got into difficulties. Those immediately in charge of the enterprise have proposed some way out of the difficulty. We have thought that the proposed scheme was onerous or unworkable, and have suggested many things which we thought might be done differently. In most cases the result has been, particularly if we have had confidence in the judgment of those persons, that we have finally come to the conclusion that the scheme proposed by them, disagreeable as it may be, onerous as the burdens may be which it will cast upon us, is after all the best that can be done under the circumstances, and we have accepted it. In some cases this has worked well; in others, unfortunately, it has worked ill. That is the situation which confronts us to-day on a national scale, and it must be dealt with.

It may be evident to the House from what I have said that I have rather a distaste for this Bill. However, I have sought all the information I could obtain on this particular phase of the subject, namely, that of transportation as affecting the economic wellbeing of the people—a question which has always interested me. With a great deal of ardour and with a considerable amount of energy, I started within the last few days to read through all the debates in the other House on this subject. There was such a thin vein of gold in proportion to the amount of barren rock that I found my ardour chilled and my energy dissipated long before I got to the end of it.

If I may say a word as to my personal relations to this general question, I have never had any transaction with that bank which is said to be so vitally interested in the affairs of Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann; and, although I have known both of those gentlemen for a great many years, I think there is nobody whom I have known so long with whom I have exchanged so few words. Within recent times, although not by the honourable gentleman who just preceded me, one has heard them spoken of as if they were disturbers of the commonweal, and the source of the greater part of our economic woe. That has been the attitude during the last few months. But I think we must all remember the many years during which those gentlemen were hailed as empire builders. If they were over-enthusiastic, so was Canada.

Before we deal too severely with them, or with the Bill for which we are responsible, dealing with the problem as it now presents itself, we should look a little at how this condition of affairs, deplorable as it may be, came about. In the nineties Canada came into her own. It was the time of harvest, the day of high hopes as to great endeavours that had gone on through more barren years. One great Canadian enterprise, a railway one, became highly profitable to investors outside of Canada, with all the consequent results of a generous credit which Canada enjoyed. There were many other great successes in this country. We had a great tide of immigration; our surpluses were very lavish. In relation to the expansion of railways, there was another aspect which had to do with the direction that the railroad situation took. It was this, that the Liberal party, or those high in its councils, wished to become responsible for, and to have the name of that party linked with, a great transcontinental line, as they frankly admitted that their predecessors in charge of that party had been mistaken in so strongly opposing the first transcontinental line that was built. As we all know, there came on a great era of railway expansion. Let me quote from Mr. Smith, who was the third commissioner in investigating our railway situation; he speaks of this matter in the minority report from which I quote:

> It is unfortunate that Canada did not have a policy of regulation in this period which could have prevented needless duplication of lines and facilities. Competing lines have been built where effective regulation could have saved a large part of the investment, while completely satisfying every reasonable and proper need for service. Instead of co-ordination and conservation under government supervision, railways were permitted to duplicate plant in fields not yet productive enough to support the one. The Government, on the other hand, was, in one way or another, aiding both projects, if it had not indeed itself promoted either or both projects. Very naturally, it has not and could not have obtained the benefit which should have followed a correct programme of Government aid. The policy of Government aid makes the need for regulation of railway building more necessary even than where private capital is depended upon, for in the latter case the proposal must at least have promise of commercial success before capital can be induced to come in and give it support. To the absence of such regulation must be charged responsibility for no small part of the railway problem of to-day. (Page xciii.)

That is the view of a stranger; but we who are here know that Parliament was responsible, that Parliament gave every charter and voted every subsidy for railways that were built during this and all other periods since Confederation. I am not dwelling in any partisan sense on the point that another Government happened to be in power, but simply to show that the era of great expansion came about, as it probably would have done, whatever party had been in power. But it will be a crime if future parliaments of Canada forget the evils and difficulties that were created by this course. It seems to me it would be an almost equal crime if some tribunal, thoroughly familiar with the economic and railway aspects of these questions, and independent of party politics, does not give the benefit of its opinions to succeeding parliaments before they take action in the matter of granting charters and giving subsidies and other forms of government aid.

In essence I am perfectly in accord with one phase of the remarks of the honourable senator who has just preceded me, namely, the necessity for information on the great questions that are brought before us. Time after time, since I have known anything of Parliament, and long before I ever hoped to join this august body, I had been struck with the way in which these matters of the greatest importance were brought down in the closing days of the session, when there is actual, common, physiological pressure on us all to get away and hurry things through; and I trust that I have the feeling of the House with me in voicing this protest. This Parliament is dying—it is almost dead—and the only thing that is certain about the next Parliament is that, subject to the changes and chances of this mortal life, we will be here in the Senate. I hope, however, that the new Parliament will discontinue this most deplorable practice of permitting legislation to pass without adequate information, and without allowing full time for the consideration of grave questions. If it does not do so, a mechanic not extraordinarily skilled could devise a machine which could record our votes just as well as we could if we were here. I have no doubt those who have memories of what has occurred in the Senate will recall many protests such as I have just voiced. If we are to make those protests effective we must ask the new Parliament and the Senate—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Why not begin now?

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: That is a matter of conscience; and in relation to the issues of this Bill, had the acuteness of the situation to which I have just referred been different, I do not know but that it might have been well in the interests of the Senate to consider carefully the suggestion that has just been made.

I had grave doubts as to how I should vote on this Bill until I went into the House of Commons last Wednesday night and heard the speech of the Prime Minister on the third reading of this Bill. In the course of his speech Sir Robert Borden said:

> I said, in speaking of the problem that lies before the people of Canada, then—and I desire to repeat it to-night—that I think it will be necessary for the railway companies and the Government to get together in the immediate future, and deal with the possibility of having a system of co-operative management of all the railways in Canada.

Later on he said:

> If the Canadian Pacific railway, by acquiring the Canadian Northern railway, can save itself $100,000,000 in construction, that, to my mind, seems to indicate that there are facilities upon the lines of the Canadian Northern which are not employed, and which might be employed, and used by the Canadian Pacific railway, under some system of co-operative management, so as to save that expenditure to the people of this country.

Again:

> I have gone into that question, as far as my limited knowledge will permit, with some of the heads of great railway systems in Canada, and I think they are coming to the conclusion that some such system of co-operative management as I have mentioned might well be carried out.

Then again:

> That is what we must aim at; that is what we must attain, if state ownership is to continue in Canada; if the beginning now made is to be carried out to a larger future. Hon. gentlemen who are interested in the welfare of this country and who realize, as I am sure we all do, how greatly the future of Canada depends upon the reasonable and wise solution of this question, will, I am sure, give their minds to the consideration which I have put forward. I put it forward, of course, without any expert knowledge as to railway operation; but what has been accomplished in Great Britain during the past year or two may well give us a lead.

Again:

> Does any hon. gentleman, even though he be no more acquainted than I am with railway operation, doubt that by the system of co-operative management to which I have alluded we can save millions of dollars annually at all times in the future? There is absolutely no doubt about it; it seems plain to me that such was the case. I asked these railway experts about it, and every one of them has told me that it should be practicable to carry out some system of that kind in this country, we would save not only enormous sums in the way of capital expenditure, but enormous sums every year, perhaps $15,000,000 or $20,000,000, in the operation of these roads. That is one of the great problems of Canada in the immediate future. It is one of the problems to which every member of the House ought to direct his attention; it is one of the problems which must engage the attention of the Parliament that is to be summoned in the near future.

May I crave the indulgence of the House if I lay before it some details that I have gathered as to what has been done in England from the military standpoint along the constructive lines of which the Prime Minister spoke in those passages I have just quoted? When the Prime Minister stated that he thought something could be done along those lines, with which I have some degree of familiarity, it had a very considerable influence in determining me to support this Bill, which will provide an opportunity to work out this plan of co-operation, and I trust, also, that it will show the extremely great advantages to Canada of such a course.

In England, by the Regulations of the Act passed in 1871, the Government was given power, by warrant of the Secretary of State, to take control of all the railways, the whole of their plant, or any part of it, whenever an emergency arose. That Act remained a dead letter for many years. Naturally the experience of England in that connection was peculiarly a military one. The English railways had shown great capacity for the transportation of troops in 1881, on the occasion of two great reviews at Windsor and Edinburgh, and proved that they could assemble at any point 50,000 men in twenty-four hours. During the South African war the same kind of thing went on. The London and Southwestern railway handled 335,000 men in the latter part of 1899 and 1900, as well as 29,500 horses. In one day they were able to despatch from Southampton, which is not a very large harbour, five transports fully loaded with troops. During the South African war this speed was of the very greatest importance, and was due to the Government of the day appointing a transport officer, whose function was to coordinate the military, the admiralty and the technical railroad handling of men. In 1912 on one railway there were over 120,000 men assembled rapidly in the eastern counties without any disturbance, or any serious delay to ordinary passenger trains. In that same year the Act of 1871 was revived, and steps were taken to operate it if the necessity arose, and the English Government worked it out, without being hampered by details. They appointed a committee whose instructions were simply to receive and carry out the orders of the Government. The committee consisted of the managers of the principal trunk lines of England, their chairman being the president of the British Board of Trade. While we hear a great deal about the unpreparedness of England for the war, and we know that the preparation she had in the beginning was very trifling compared with what they are now; on a good many points, of which this is one, she was ready below the surface. This railway committee was able to operate quickly, just in the same way that the great fleet happened to be in the North Sea at the psychological moment. So on the 4th of August, that date which is forever branded in the minds of all of this generation, Mr. Asquith, one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, signed an order placing under Government control all the railways in the United Kingdom, and all their equipment, to be used for the conveyance of His Majesty's troops and all sorts of goods, or for any other purpose which the Government might see fit, and the committee at once set to work—

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: How many miles of railway would there be in the railways of England?

Hon. Mr. McLENNAN: I do not know; I have no idea; but it is a great mileage, as you know, and the system of railways is very intricate and complicated—more so than anything we have on this continent. The Government guaranteed them their dividends of 1913. The details of the arrangement between the Government and the companies are few; but I notice from reports that at the annual meetings of the various railway companies' stockholders held last year and the year before, the chairmen were vying with each other in recounting the good work done under this system of Government control. In 1915 one railway, the Great Eastern, averaged 32 special military trains a day; another, the Northwestern, carried over a million extra tons of freight, besides placing many of its manufacturing facilities at the disposal of the Government. All the shareholders seemed satisfied, as they expressed themselves at their annual meetings, with this system. Lord Claude Hamilton, the Chairman of the Great Eastern railway, pointed out to their shareholders with pride, that Captain Fryatt, who was murdered by the Germans, had been one of their old and very valued officers.

The system began with the commendation of the Opposition. Mr. Walter Long, then in opposition, said on November 16, 1914:

The control of the railways has not only worked without a single hitch, but with the most wonderful regard for the convenience of the public at large. It has been, I think, one of the most successful enterprises undertaken in this country.

Most of the references in the British Hansard, which I have followed down to last June, have been along the same lines. At the end of last year Mr. Bonar Law said that he had noticed:

That the House of Commons was anxious to know what had been the effect of the bargain made at the outbreak of war. In regard to that I can only say there has been complete justification for what has been said on previous occasions—that it was a good bargain for the state. It was good not only from the point of view of the convenience, the immense convenience which central control gave us, but it has been good also financially.

In the last number of the Nineteenth Century, in an article on the problems of war control, after three years of experience, it is stated :

Such in broad outline is the claim made upon the railway companies, and it would be hard indeed to find a branch of national service which has worked so well, so smoothly and with so little unnecessary change and disturbance.

I have said that few details of the working were available, but if a well-authenticated report is true, a careful schedule of the time of landing the First Expeditionary Force in France had been worked out; so well was it executed that the last soldier was landed in France half an hour ahead of schedule time.

Again—and this is an instance which comes close home to us—a young Canadian was wounded at three in the morning on the glorious day of Vimy; so perfect were the transport arrangements that before four o'clock in the same afternoon he was in bed in a London hospital.

In the United States the following action was taken at a meeting of railroad presidents on April 11th last:

Resolved, that the railroads of the United States acting through their chief executive officers here and now assembled, and stirred by a high sense of their opportunity to be of the greatest service to their country in the present national crisis, do hereby pledge themselves with the Government of the United States, with the governments of the several states and with one another, that during the present war they will co-ordinate their operations in a continental railway system merging during the period all their merely individual and competitive activities in the effort to produce a maximum of national transportation efficiency. To this end they hereby agree to create an organization which shall have general authority to formulate, in detail, and from time to time, a policy of operation of all or any of the railways which policy, when and as announced by such temporary organization, shall be accepted and earnestly made effective by the several managements of the individual railroad companies here represented.

An executive committee was forthwith formed, the president of which was Mr. Fairfax Harrison, and with him were joined four of the best-known railroad men of the United States. Their official bulletin to August 1 shows that they have done much to give effect in the fullest sense to the spirit of the above resolution. The railroads of that country had voluntarily cancelled train service amounting to sixteen million passenger train miles, saving 1,100,000 tons of coal. They had relinquished in favour of water carriage half of the coal supply of the American Northwest. Thirty-six railways turned over to other roads, the need of which was greater than their own, nearly 69,000 freight cars.

Notwithstanding these remarkable results, I have all but the highest authority for saying that the English system is in the opinion of the gentleman whom I quote preferable to the American. He explained it in this way, that as the American roads each has to safeguard the interests of its shareholders, they are bound to look out for high-class freight, whereas freight of the lower classifications, in many instances, was of greater advantage to the nation.

With regard to Germany, I may point out that a great part of that nation's commercial expansion was due, not so much to government assistance as to the associations of their manufacturers, which divided the costs of obtaining business and produced the goods by that one of their members who could most advantageously do so.

Canada can also contribute instances to the value of co-operation. Last winter grain was hauled to Fort William by the Canadian Northern, and then carried eastwards by the Canadian Pacific, with advantage to the shipper and to both roads. The coal situation was bettered by joint action on the part of the railways. The railways abandoned seventy or eighty trains, making available man-power and motive-power for more important services; but these efforts were sporadic and voluntary. What Canada requires is a reasoned, continuous, and efficient system of securing these benefits.

It is well worth considering whether under the War Measures Act, section 6 of which gives full power, all the railways of this country should not be taken over and worked as a unit, under an executive commitee made up on the general lines of the English arrangement, with a president whose duty it would be to safeguard the interests of the public, and an executive chairman of the highest skill in railway technique and management, and all the advantages of an English transport officer. Those railways which have earnings should receive dividends. Allowances should be made for renewals and repairs. Incentives should be kept alive, so that high standards where they exist may be maintained.

The question of deficits is a matter which I shall not touch upon. The deficits will have to be paid by the Government or the taxpayers in any case, and I am very sure that if such a system were worked out there would be less deficit than there would be under any other system. There are economies which might be effected in the arrangement of tracks and which are dealt with on page 76 of the Drayton-Acworth report. We would have the advantage of mobile equipment. That is, railway motive power and rolling stock would go where it was most needed. That would give to our railway systems an advantage similar to that we have always claimed for our Canadian banks as compared with those of the United States, namely, that under our system of agencies money goes to that part of the country where it is most needed at a particular time, it flows freely from one place to another; whereas under the American system the route of money from one district of the country to another is circuitous and slow. The adoption of such a system would make the cars and locomotives of the whole railway system available where they were most needed; they would go by the quickest and easiest route, and we would not have, as we have often had in the past, freight being delayed for lack of cars and engines when on an adjacent road there were cars and engines to spare. That is one of the advantages over the existing system. In addition to that, there is at present a large staff of what might be called business-getters, canvassers, freight agents, etc., many of whom could be dispensed with or put to more profitable employment. There are under the present system many expenses in the way of separate staffs of officers, which could be eliminated. There is no question, it seems to me, that a joint engineering staff, a staff for higher auditing, and a staff of efficiency experts would give better results, and for less money, than those obtained under the individualistic system. I believe we have in Canada men who can work out this plan, and it is to be hoped that they will rise to the high level reached in England, where the officials have subordinated their loyalty to their own company or their own system to their loyalty to the State. This is a tendency which would be greatly helpful if this proposal should be carried out. Railway men are accustomed to association. There are traffic associations, passenger associations, master car builders, master mechanics, maintenance-of-way men, motive power men and all the rest. There is not the slightest subdivision, I think I am right in saying, in the whole work of the railways of this continent that has not an association which enables them to get together, to confer, discuss and exchange experiences. It is only human nature, it is only part of the loyalty a man feels to his system, that he is rather inclined to go to such meetings in order to get rather than to give. With the wider outlook which they would have in aiding a national interest, helping to get the best possible results for the people of Canada out of the whole railway system of the country, all those men would, if I know anything of railway men, go there prepared to give for the common benefit rather than to get for their own.

If this scheme be carried out, we shall certainly gain a vast amount of knowledge as to what the possibilities of the future might be in the way of nationalization and in the way of joint operation.

I have no desire that this experiment should lead to nationalization of the railways. On the contrary, my experience of government operation is against it. But, wherever it leads, this experience is indispensible to the best results. We cannot devise a sound scheme at present, because experience shows that any scheme now devised would not be permanent; but out of the experience of such a commandeered and common operation of the railways, I think we might well develop a knowledge of tendencies, a knowledge of what has been proved to be possible, a knowledge of what has been tried and found to be disadvantageous, and some permanent system might be devised which would be of the utmost benefit to the country and possibly make the action we are now taking prove to be wiser than it appears to some of those who have spoken and will speak on this subject.

Hon. J. P. B. CASGRAIN: Honourable gentlemen, this is certainly the most important matter that has come before this House. The members of the Senate are about to assume a responsibility greater than any that has ever been assumed by them during the existence of this honourable House. I must at the outset express my surprise at the levity with which the honourable leader of the Government (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) has approached the subject this afternoon. He is generally very much in earnest about all Government measures which he presents to this House, but this afternoon he seemed as if his heart were not in this transaction, and, knowing him as I have had the advantage of knowing him for more than seventeen years, as a good business man, I knew very well that it was hard for him to keep a straight face when telling us that we were doing good business in taking over the Canadian Northern.

The honourable leader of the House has given us very little information, notwithstanding the great desire of my leader (Hon. Mr. Bostock) to obtain information. The honourable leader of the House read—and, I must say, not in his usual style, but in a very indifferent way, for evidently he had not opened the book before—some statements that are contained in this blue-book. Honourable gentlemen will remember that when we were called upon to vote the guarantee of $45,000,000 we had a much bigger book than this, and it contained not only the statement made by the company, but also a statement by the Government, so that we might compare both statements. This book evidently—and I am glad the honourable leader of the Government has admitted it—has been prepared simply by the company, and, as I understand, the Government takes no responsibility whatever for the document. Later on, in dealing with this document, I will show that we cannot be expected to have very much confidence in it.

With regard to the honourable gentleman from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan), I was at first uncertain as to how he felt. He said this Bill was distasteful to him, and I was almost in hopes that he would disapprove of it; but he had gone to the other Chamber, he said, and heard some one speaking in favour of this measure. It was none other than the Prime Minister of this country. After listening to that speech, the honourable gentleman, like St. Paul on the way to Damascus, saw the light, and to-day the honourable gentleman is in favour of the measure, although it might be supposed that a prudent man like himself would in a matter of this kind like to know what the country is going to buy—what it is paying for, and whether it would be to the advantage of the country to put through this transaction. In the province of Quebec we have a saying with reference to an estate: "Accepter la succession sous bénéfice d'inventaire." That is, we accept an estate on the understanding that we shall have the advantage of making an inventory to see what is in it. In this case there is no inventory made and we have not the faintest idea of what the responsibilities and liabilities will be. The Canadian Northern railway is a tremendous undertaking, I do not deny it. It has 9,513 miles of railway. I may bring home to honourable gentlemen the magnitude of that railway when I say that it would have been necessary to build one mile of railway every day of the year, winter and summer, for the last twenty-five years in order to have over 9,000 miles—not quite as much as the mileage of the Canadian Northern.

Let me say to this honourable House, in the first place, that the people of Canada have their eyes riveted upon this Senate to-day. Here in Parliament, in the circle in which we move, it may perhaps be supposed that the public is indifferent in this transaction.

Those who busy themselves with finance in this country hope that the Senate will find some means of improving this scheme and protecting the interests of the public. If the Senate can do this and protect the people from what appears to be the greatest raid upon the treasury that has ever been —not perpetrated, but thought of, this body would rise in the public opinion of the country, and no one in our lifetime would ever talk about the uselessness of this Chamber. There are business men in this House who handle large enterprises, and if they put their heads together, I believe they might find some way of overcoming the difficulty. The Government is face to face with a difficult problem, but I believe it can be overcome. The honourable gentleman from Cape Breton (Hon. Mr. McLennan) said that he started out enthusiastically to read the report of the debate that had taken place in the other House on this question, but that he had not remained sufficiently enthusiastic to read it all. I may say that I have read the whole of the debate, and the more I read the more I was convinced that no one on either side of the House could say to what expenditure the country was going to be committed. Was it to be $400,000,000? Was it to be $500,000,000? Was it to be $800,000,000? Neither member of Parliament nor minister of the Crown has fixed a price for this undertaking.

There should be some way of fixing a limit. Every one knows that only plungers will go into a matter of this kind without fixing a limit. At first the people of the country were bewildered; they were gasping before plunging into the unknown; they could not realize that this matter was being seriously thought of. They thought it impossible that the Government should take any action without first having the fullest information. The Minister of Finance has displayed a great deal of ability and talent; he seems to be well informed with regard to the ramifications of this matter; but he never fixed a price, never said what we were to pay for this railway.

One man cannot expect to know all about the 9,513 miles of this railway; he can only speak of things which come under his own eye, things which he sees every day. I pass the sites of the terminals of the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal company on Dorchester street every day, and see an immense excavation there. This enterprise does not belong to the Canadian Northern railway. As I understand the transaction, the Terminal company issued bonds, which were guaranteed, not by the Canadian Northern Quebec railway, not by the Canadian Northern Ontario railway, not by six or seven of these companies, but by the Canadian Northern Railway company alone. Some arrangement had to be made by which the interest on these bonds would be met. A lease was made to the Canadian Northern railway, and the money to be paid under that lease was sufficient to pay the estimated interest—mark the words, the estimated interest—on the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal railway. The rental payable under this lease is sufficient to meet the interest on the bonds; but the cost will exceed the estimate by millions of dollars, and who is going to pay the interest on the excess cost? The Canadian Northern railway will pay only to the extent of their lease; but what will the Government do?

The figures which I am about to quote were asked for by members in another place, and, after considerable delay, they were given to them. The estimated cost of the tunnel itself is $4,631,427. The expenditure on that work to April 30, 1917, was $4,566,072.72. I should like to say en passant that that is an outrageous price for a tunnel of that length; but even at that it will be noted that if it were built at the estimated cost it would only require $65,248 to complete the work. The estimated cost of the terminals is $723,616, and the expenditure to April 30 amounts to $282,242, leaving a balance of $441,373. The Montreal station has not been built yet. It is going to be cheap, because we are supposed to build it. The estimated cost of the station is $110,823. That is the cheapest station in Montreal. The Windsor station is within 200 yards of this proposed station, and what did it cost? How many millions of dollars? This Parliament is told that this station is going to cost only $110,000, and it is said that $95,823 has been spent on it to date, and that $14,999.62 will finish that station. The figures are very precise, $15,000 might have been allowed for the completion of this work. I ask any honourable gentleman who lives in Montreal if he has seen this station. The Canadian Northern Railway company is very particular as to the amount which the country will have to expend to complete that work. The next item is the electrification of the tunnel, $425,127. The expenditure to the 30th of April is $372,236.02, and the cost to complete it is $32,890.98. Then we come to the branch railway from the West Portal to the junction with the Canadian Northern railway. The estimated cost of this work is $182,458, and $119,329.14 has been spent on it to date, leaving a balance of $63,138.86 to carry it to completion. I pass by this locality very often, and there is a filling to be made there that will take the whole of that amount. The estimated cost of engineering contingencies is $585,177. Up to date $543,370.46 has been paid out, leaving a balance of $41,806 to be spent. The estimate for real estate is $2,155,593, and to date $2,110,593.99, has been expended leaving an amount of $44,999. I know for a fact that all the lands bought by the Canadian Northern railway have not been paid for in full.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We are not taking those over.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: They are supposed to be Canadian Northern yards.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Not the town site behind the mountain.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am not speaking of Model City. The Canadian Northern bought about 5,000 acres of land back of the mountain. The honourable gentleman from Montarville (Hon. Mr. Beaubien) knows that they bought that land, and I dare say that he knows, as I do, that the only money that passed between the agents and the sellers was about enough to pay the commission to the agents and a very small payment on account, and when the other payments became due representatives of the railway company went to the various landowners and told them that they had not the necessary money and could not pay, and asked them what they were going to do about it. They said: "You may sue us, but you will get nothing for two or three years. If you will defer these payments we will make a proposition to you." I do not know whether they knew that some kind Providence or some kind Government would assume their liabilities; but they said: "If you will defer these payments we will agree to pay you the interest; if you do not want to take that you will get nothing at all." The people had to consent to defer the payments and in some cases they got their first payment and interest. This land was supposed to be for yards for the Canadian Northern railway.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: What is the cost of the land?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: 5,000 acres of land selling all the way from $1,000 to $2,000 per acre. The honourable gentleman can work that out himself.

Hon. Mr. BOYER: One of the interested parties told me no later than last week that they had sold $3,000,000 worth of land, but that they had to take back $2,500,000; so where does the benefit come in?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Now we come down to property damages. The property damages were estimated at $175,000, a low figure, and are not paid for yet. The company claim that they have paid on that account $122,220.87, leaving a balance of $52,779.13 to settle all the remaining damages. Honourable gentlemen know, and every one in Montreal knows, that McGill University has a claim for $500,000. We know also what took place when the railway went under the property of Hon. H. B. Rainville at the corner of Sherbrooke street. Mr. Rainville is a wealthy lawyer, and he was not frightened. The railway went under part of his property, and he took out an injunction and they decided that they had better settle. A friend of Sir Donald Mann went to him and said: "Look here, Sir Donald, this man Rainville is a bad actor; you will have to settle or he will take you to the Privy Council and tie up everything." Mr. Rainville had a lot which was 50 feet by 150 feet, and the railway bought it and paid $165,000 for it. I happen to know of this, because I was Mr. Rainville's arbitrator. The matter was settled out of court. Mr. Rainville got $100,000 in cash, and took a mortgage of $65,000 on the property. That is only one property. And yet in the statement furnished to Parliament it is claimed that they are going to settle the land damages with $52,799.13. Then, there is interest during construction, $1,432,129.59. The expenditure up to date is $1,420,827, leaving simply the interest due, $11,300 in round numbers, making the estimated cost of the tunnel and the terminal say $10,401,361, and the expenditures to April 30, 1917, was $9,632,718, leaving $768,643, to complete the work.

The tunnel and terminal companies sold bonds and collected the money in order to finish this work. Where has that money gone? I appeal seriously to the members of the Senate, will the balance of that money be handed back to the Government in order to finish this work? There has been expended for right of way from the terminal to the harbour $1,316,806, but there are deferred payments amounting to $174,000 on property acquired for extension of present terminals. That only shows that this Parliament is receiving information which is absolutely wrong on the face of it, and there is not a man in Montreal who would pretend that the figures given here, and given in all seriousness in another place by the Minister of Finance, would be sufficient to finish the work. They say they are going to finish it for $578,643; but I have had statements from reliable engineers and architects that five times that amount would hardly finish that work. They propose to get money by selling crushed stone taken from the tunnel, and they want this country to go peddling that stone around for sale. They estimate that for macadam that crushed stone would be worth $512,254, and they say they have received already $322,254, and they expect to get $190,000 for the balance.

In British Columbia the Canadian Northern Pacific railway flooded a great deal of land with their irrigation scheme, and now there have been many claims made on account of that flooding. I am told that Mackenzie and Mann have been able to stand off those claims; but will the Government have the strength of character to say to the people: "We will not allow you anything?" There has also been trouble from one of the tunnels of the Canadian Northern Pacific sliding into the Fraser river and blocking it so that the salmon could not ascend the river, and the fishing interests will now make claims. Of course, those people could enter claims against Mackenzie and Mann of the Canadian Northern Railway company; but they had a beautiful system that any one who wanted to sue them could never strike the right company that did the thing complained of. If they sued the Canadian Northern it was the Canadian Northern Quebec or some other company they should have sued, hence they were non-suited; but now these people will come against the Government, which cannot divide itself, and the people in the salmon industry whose business was injured will have to be looked after by this Government. I think this is a very bad time for the Government to go borrowing money. I move the adjournment of the debate.

The debate was adjourned.

SUPPLY BILL NO. 3.

FIRST READING.

Bill 128, an Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service, for the financial year ending the 31st of March, 1918.—Hon. Sir James Lougheed.

CORRECTION OF THE MINUTES.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: In the minutes received to-day it is incorrectly represented that an appeal was taken by Honourable Mr. Bostock from the ruling of His Honour the Speaker, whereas it should have been from the ruling of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole, Hon. Mr. Sproule. The minutes also report, in the record of the vote, that the Honourable Mr. Bolduc maintained his own decision, and that the Honourable Mr. Sproule maintained his own decision.

Hon. Mr. WATSON: Why should he not?

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: All the time I was Speaker I never heard of such a thing. I always took care not to vote to sustain my own decision. But that is not the point I want to make. The point is that this whole report is a romance, and the events did not take place at all as reported, and I move that the minutes be amended accordingly, and call the attention of the officials to the point.

The SPEAKER: I may add that I voted for upholding the decision of the Chairman. The honourable member for Stadacona states that he never did that, but he must recognize that his decisions were always reversed.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I preferred to have a decision reversed, and do what I believed and what I still believe to be the convenient thing.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: You had no confidence in them yourself.

The Senate adjourned until three o'clock to-morrow

THE SENATE.

Thursday, September 6, 1917.

The Senate met at Three o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE PARLIAMENT BUILDING FIRE.

INQUIRY.

Hon Mr. CLORAN inquired:

1. Does the Government intend to accept and pay claims of damages for the loss of wearing apparel, or other appurtenances and belongings in the destruction by fire, of the Parliament Buildings in February, 1915?
2. Does the Department of Justice consider the Government to be liable or responsible for the alleged damages?
3. If so, will the Government accept and pay claims for the loss of the lives of those persons who perished in the said fire, namely, W. Law, M.P., A. Laplante, Assistant Clerk of the House of Commons, the two employees of the Public Works Department, Alp. Desjardins and Mr. Fanning, all of whom were on active duty and service at the time of the catastrophe. Also of the two lady guests of the Speaker of the House of Commons, Hon. A. Sévigny, namely, Mrs. Bray and Mrs. Morin, of Quebec?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED:

1. The Government is considering certain claims which have been made.
2. Not in law.
3. Answered by Nos. 1 and 2; and, furthermore, it may be said that the Government has already made certain allowances to the families of certain of those mentioned in No. 3.

AN IMMEDIATE GENERAL ELECTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN rose to call the attention of the Senate to the following facts:

1. That the constitutional life of the present House of Commons ends on the 7th day of October, 1917.
2. That no Government provision, so far, has been made for the immediate representation of the Electorate of Canada in the House of Commons after such expiration of life of the present House of Commons.

3. That since Confederation, every dissolution of the House of Commons, or expiration of the life of the same, was followed by an immediate General Election.

And to inquire:

What proposed or specific action does the Government intend to take in the matter?

He said: I am taking this question up on very high grounds. The House is well acquainted with the motion which stands in my name. This motion places before the country a question of the highest importance to a democracy. This question brings to the attention, not only of this House, but of Canada in its entirety, the fact that on the 7th of October the country will be without representation either on the floor of the House of Commons or in the councils of the nation. This is a grave crisis to meet. If the Government has been delinquent, it is not due to any want of warning on my part. I have notified them time and time again, and let me once more, and for the last time——

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Probably you will be able to swallow that. When you talk of the expiration of Parliament you are talking against the Constitution. Do the gentlemen who say, "Hear, hear," know anything about it? Not a thing. There is no such thing as the expiration of the life of Parliament. Parliament is composed of the House of Commons and the Senate. The House of Commons must die within the five years named by the British North America Act. Under the British North America Act the Senate goes on until the members themselves die. The term "expiration of Parliament" is a misnomer; it is a misconception of the rights of the people under the Constitution of Canada. We are the main part of Parliament, and the better half is on the other side of the House—they are in the feminine district. We are a permanent body. The House of Commons dies on the 7th of October, and the representatives in the House of Commons who constitute the executive power in Canada die with it. Now, what will happen? The lessees of power in the Dominion of Canada are Sir Robert Borden and his sixteen or seventeen ministers, who, according to the British North America Act, constitute the Privy Council advising the Governor General. The lessors are the people of Canada, and that power is leased to the lessees through a general election by the people of Canada. I think this comparison will strike the imagination and common sense of the people. I will liken them to a tenant and a landlord. The tenant leases a farm or a residence from the landlord. The tenant enters into an agreement with the landlord that he shall have a lease of a house or a farm for a period of five years under certain conditions. The lessee occupies that farm or that house during five years, which he has a right to do. At the end of the five years his lease expires. What does he do? If the lessee is a law-abiding citizen he will be out of that house or off that farm at the end of five years; but if he is not a law- abiding citizen he will remain, especially if he thinks the house or the farm suits his purpose or if he is going to make a profit by remaining. He says to himself, "It is true that my lease of that farm is up, but I am going to remain on." Then the landlord has only one recourse: he has to appeal to the law of the land, through the courts. The landlord appeals to the law of the land, and asks that his property be protected. That takes some time. The courts intervene; they render a judgment of ejectment, calling upon the officers of the law to eject this man forcibly. That is the common practice throughout this land, and, I believe throughout every civilized land. The position of the Government of Canada and the people of Canada is identical with that of lessee and lessor or of tenant and landlord. The executive power of the House of Commons hold a lease from the landlord, the people of Canada, to occupy the residence and the premises of the country for five years, no more. What happens in the present case? The lessees—that is, Sir Robert's Government and the present House of Commons—defy the will of the landlord, the electorate of Canada. They say, "No, we will not vacate the premises; we are going to remain." It is plain to me that such is the position taken, because the Government is now unable to face the difficulty. They have only four weeks to prepare for an election—an evacuation of the premises—and the rumour goes that they do not intend to hold the election until March 18, next. Any sensible man knows that an evacuation of the premises, on the expiration of a lease of power by a Government which introduces measures by which it will be able to continue to hold on to the premises, cannot be performed inside of three weeks nor three months. Take, for instance, the Military Voters Bill. Take the new Franchise Act which is being presented to-day in the House of Commons. How long is it going to continue to rig up machinery of that kind to defeat the popular will? This Government is actually battling against the bulwarks of our constitution; and I hold that the people of this country cannot be too soon apprised of what is going on in this House and in the other House in regard to the destruction of their domestic rights. Here is a Government discredited, paralyzed and now on its deathbed, and yet trying by every means possible, fair and unfair, to divert the electoral vote of this country into its own channels. There is no doubt about that. I stand here, even if alone, to protest against this attack on the democratic rights of a democratic people. My son and other men's sons have been fighting and are still fighting for the rule of democracy in Europe, and we are denied it right here on the floor of the Senate and on the floor of the House of Commons. We are muzzled.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: You ought to be.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We are muzzled—not here, thank God. You have not succeeded in muzzling us yet, and before you put on the muzzle you will get many a sharp bite, I tell you. You have not got the muzzle on the Senate; but you have it on the House of Commons, and it is used in a most unpardonable, arbitrary manner.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: What? Is it used in a peaceful manner?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Mr. Speaker and honourable gentlemen——

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: I rise to a point of order. I can quite understand the hon. gentleman making an inquiry; but he is now discussing a thing which has no existence at all; he is urging that an election should be held after Parliament prorogues. We are going to have an election.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: When?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: Immediately after the 7th of October.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: When is immediately?

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: It will be soon enough for the honourable gentleman and his followers.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Sit down; that is no point of order. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. What right has the honourable gentleman to interfere with my free speech ?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The honourable gentleman from Victoria division (Hon. Mr. Cloran) has no right to accuse the House of Commons of acting in an improper manner.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I did not. If His Honour the Speaker will tell me when I did, I will withdraw my remarks.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: A little while ago. I would advise the honourable gentleman to withdraw that expression.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I did not attack the House of Commons. I would be very sorry to do so.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Oh, oh.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN. But I say that the House of Commons has been muzzled. Who is going to deny that ?

Hon. Mr. GORDON: It is a pity the honourable gentleman is not muzzled.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: It was muzzled last Tuesday, and has been for the past two or three days. If honourable gentlemen opposite do not understand the word "muzzled."

Hon. Mr. CROSBY: We would understand it if it were applied to the honourable gentleman. I rise again to a point of order. Can the honourable gentleman talk in that fashion in this House ?

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: I am very much obliged to the honourable gentleman. I like these points of order. If the honourable gentleman thinks for one moment that it flabbergasts me, he is mistaken. Now, to suit the refined tastes of honourable gentlemen opposite, I will quote the constitution in regard to the powers, rights, privileges and limitations of the House of Commons, the Government, the Governor General, and, I am proud to say, the very few limitations on the Senate. Death is about the only limitation on this House. What does the constitution say? Section 9 says :

The Executive Government and Authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

Now it is vested in the King. Section 10 says :

The provisions of this Act referring to the Governor General extend and apply to the Governor General for the time being of Canada, or other the Chief Executive Officer or Administrator for the time being carrying on the Government of Canada on behalf and in the Name of the Queen, by whatever title he is designated.

Section 11 says :

There shall be a council to aid and advise in the government of Canada, to be styled the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, and the persons who are to be members of that council shall be from time to time chosen and summoned by the Governor General—

For the time being. Honourable gentlemen who have not read this had better read it and digest it. The Governor General has absolutely no power outside the term of his office, under the King, the Queen, or anybody else. There is the constitution in black and white. The Governor General for the time being shall have the free power in the name of the King. What right has his Executive Council to say, "Good morning, Governor; you are going, but we remain." That is practically what the Government is about to do. They are making no provision for their replacement a few weeks hence. Is not that a flagrant violation of the constitution? What right has the Government to retain the reins of office? Absolutely no more right than the first ten men you would meet on the public street. I hold that this example of despising the constitution is an incitement to the populace to anarchy. What right have these men whose leave of office has expired to continue in office? No more right than the three tailors of Tooley street who, as Dickens said, ran the British Empire for quite a number of years. When the term even of the Governor General for the time being has expired, he cannot continue in office unless reappointed by the Imperial authorities—unless there is a second or third declaration from the King that the Governor General is still his representative in Canada. Yet the Government to-day, though its term has expired, retains office and administers the affairs of the country without any sanction or endorsation from the people who gave them power. Cannot the Senate see the situation? If the Senate does not, you are profoundly asleep, but the country is awake and will stand by the constitution even if the Senate does not.

Now, what does the constitution say in regard to the life of Parliament:

20. There shall be a session of the Parliament of Canada once at least in every year, so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of the Parliament in one session and its first sitting in the next session.

As matters are going, what would happen? This Government would dissolve the House, say, on the 5th or 6th of October, and remain in power for 12 months.

An Hon. SENATOR: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: Some honourable gentleman says, "hear, hear." Go straight over to Germany; that is where the honourable gentleman belongs. A Government that would descend to do a thing of that kind should meet with supreme contempt and direct condemnation from the people. I have no doubt that the present Government would postpone the election for 12 months if it could; but the estimates have been voted only for six months, up to the 31st of March, and they will be obliged to hold the election in any case, willy-nilly, before that date, because by the 31st of March the supplies will all have been squandered and they will need more. Therefore they will need to have Parliament assemble before the 31st of March in order to vote subsidies for the next three months. There is where the Liberal party in the House of Commons and in the Senate made a grave mistake, in according to the present Government six months' supplies ahead of time instead of according them three months' rations, which was enough for them.

These are plain facts, and are we to be told that His Majesty's loyal Opposition in this House or elsewhere, and especially in the country, have no right to dispute this unwonted attack against the constitution and the rights of the people of this country? Are we to sit here without protesting? That is all we can do; but I have no doubt that the protests from this honourable House and from other quarters will have full weight in the judgment of the country when the opportunity is given the people to rebuke this Government for its dealings in public affairs. The matter is more serious, honourable gentlemen, than you imagine. There are too many regrettable scenes in the country to-day in opposition to laws which have not been sanctioned by the people; and let us not here in this House, party or no party, invite the people to take the road of anarchy. This is the time to have union Government right here in this House. Coalition or union Government is being preached, but right here we ought to coalesce and impose the will of the people on a Government which is disregarding it.

The next clause of the British North America Act which governs this Parliament, especially the junior branch of it, is:

50. Every House of Commons shall continue for five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the House (subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor General), and no longer.

And no longer. These are the only three provisions in the British North America Act which govern the existence of Parliament as a whole. I hold, with many constitutional lawyers, that the amendment which, I suppose because of our fear of war results, we condescended to endorse, the amendment asked by the Prime Minister to extend the life of Parliament for one year, was in flagrant violation of the constitution and a flagrant wrong against the people, who had a right to be consulted on that measure. That extension of Parliament is now a precedent in Imperial legislation, and when it suits the purpose of any party they can change the constitution by simply forcing an extension through the House of Commons, having it adopted in the Senate, and sending it over to the British Parliament to be sanctioned. The extension that was granted will expire in a few days, and no provision has been made by the present Government to replace the House of Commons.

I want to point out the distinction between a dissolution of the House of Commons and the expiration of the life of that House. Under the constitution the House of Commons is elected for five years but no longer, unless dissolved by the Privy Council before that time. But that does not do away with the right of the existing executive power to remain; it is they who dissolve Parliament, which does not die by itself. The executive power says to the members of the House of Commons: "We have decided to put you out of business, and we are going to have another body to represent the people." and all that the House of Commons can say to the Government of the day is, "Au revoir." That does not put the Government of the day out of business; they have a right to remain in office and administer the affairs of the country. That has been the constitutional practice since Confederation and it is only proper. But though the Government does not die when Parliament is dissolved, yet when the House of Commons expires the Government, representing that body, dies with it, because they are all members of the House of Commons; and when that House dies, under direction of the constitution the men who represent that House in the executive committee of power must die with it. No constitutional lawyer will contest that. If the Government dies with the House of Commons, who is entitled to take the reins of office and administer the country's affairs? Under the British North America Act there is only one power on earth that can authorize the Government to take the reins of power, namely, the people of Canada, the electorate.

Therefore the condition of things is serious, and from the popular point of view it is grave. What will the people say? What will the working men say, the ordinary taxpayers say? They will say, "Those men who are holding the reins of office are not there by my vote or sanction." The assumption of power under such circumstances is an incitement to unlawful means of government, commonly called anarchy, and this Government least of all should give such an example. I hold that it is their duty not to ask or take time to rig up schemes to beat their opponents in this election. They have no right to do so, and they ought to be ashamed, in the face of the democracy of this country—civilized, lawful democracy—to teach the people these lessons of anarchy. I think I have done my duty in stating these facts for the benefit of the country, and I know that if all the members of the Government were of the same mind as my honourable friend the leader in this House, we would have no such condition of things in Canada.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The answer to the inquiry of my honourable friend is that the Government will take the necessary constitutional steps for the holding of a general election at such time as may be determined by proper authority.

Hon. Mr. CLORAN: We are the authority.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Hon. P. A. CHOQUETTE moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a copy of all letters, documents, correspondence, exchanged between the Governor General, Prime Minister, Minister of Justice, and all members of the Government, senators, members of Parliament, or citizens, generally, about:

1. The putting at once into execution the Military Service Act.

2. The adjourning of putting it in force only after the next general election, and

3. As to means to be taken to enforce the law if there is opposition to it.

He said: In making this motion my intention is to request the Government to postpone the enforcement of the Military Service Bill until after the next general election. In view of what has been said to-day by the honourable member for Victoria, (Hon. Mr. Cloran), and the answer given to him, the Government seems to be willing to do the proper thing, and to bring on the general election not long after the 7th of October next. There is no doubt that from now till then there will not be time to put the Conscription Act in force, or to put in motion the necessary machinery for calling to the colours those who are to be selected under that Act.

Going back to what was said a few days ago before the Act was signed, I read the following statement from the Journal-Press of Ottawa, of August 30:

> After that will come the actual calling to the colours of specified numbers and classes of those who have not been exempted. In all probability the final stage of getting the men out for training will not be reached until after the new year.

More than that, I notice in the Montreal Gazette of the 29th August the following:

> It is possible that after being called and trained the new battalion will not be required on the other side.

We know that the Montreal Gazette not long ago was against conscription; but we also know that it has changed its views, for reasons unknown to me, and which I prefer not to know; but it is a fact that the Gazette is now supporting the Conscription Act. That paper, however, reflects the opinion of the Government in stating that soldiers who should be called may not be required at the battle-front; and by another organ of the Government we learn that those who will be called will not be ready to go into training till after next January. If that is true—and I claim that it is, and that it is physically impossible that it should be otherwise—would it not be better, before the call is made, to wait for the verdict of the people, and hold an election as soon as possible after the expiration of this Parliament on the 7th of October next, say a few weeks or a month or two afterwards, and to specifically declare that the Conscription Act will not be put in force before that general election? If that were done, the people would wait with confidence for the verdict at the election, and I for one would be prepared after the Federal election, if this Government is maintained—I hope it will not be—to go on the hustings and advocate submission to the Conscription Act, and also send to the recruiting stations any persons over whom I have authority, to give their names at once to be enlisted. That is the position I take, and have always taken.

Those who have called on the Government to postpone the enforcement of this Act until after the election have been accused of wishing to block conscription. The other day I noticed in the Toronto News an item stating that Lord Shaughnessy was accused of being an anti-conscriptionist because he had said that we had sent enough men to the front, and that we ought to wait before sending any more. But the supporters of the Government themselves have appealed to the Government not to put the Conscription Act in force until after the election, and not later than yesterday I read in the Montreal Gazette the following:

> La Patrie is absolutely against the putting in force of the conscription bill before a general election. "Unless, however, the Government changes its opinion there is nothing to indicate that the Bill will not be put into force," adds the same authority. La Patrie does not think, however, that the ministry should put too much confidence in the second paragraph of article 16, which forbids counselling disobedience to the law. "It is possible indeed, that in putting into effect the bill without popular sanction, and especially when the people are to have inevitably an occasion to pronounce upon it without much delay, resistance may, in fact, take place without even being advised. For months past resistance to this law has been preached in many sections of the country and we consider that it would be unwise on the part of the Government to provoke it, taking into account that the people will certainly have the last word to say in the general election, which cannot be delayed indefinitely."

So that not only those who are against conscription but those who are supporting it ask the Government, for the sake of the Conscription Act itself, and for the sake of peace and harmony in this country, to postpone the enforcement of the Act until after the election. It is clear that the people of this country are divided into two camps, those in favour of conscription and those against it, and we know that the latter are in a great majority in every province of this country, not even excepting Ontario.

Some Hon. SENATORS: No.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: The best proof of that statement I can bring is that every conscriptionist member of the other House voted against the referendum proposed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier because it was going to be defeated. Not only in Ontario and in the West the same ground was taken, that if the referendum was submitted to the people it would be defeated. So I am right in saying that those who are against conscription being enforced before it is submitted to the people are in the great majority in this country.

But who are the persons who are for conscription? They are very few, but influential. First, I am sorry to say, are those who have a mind only to punish Quebec because they say Quebec has not done its part—which is a slander on the province of Quebec. Secondly, they are members of Parliament who are for conscription because they think that with immediate enforcement of conscription and an election cry they will be more easily elected. Third, there are parties who are for conscription and for continuing the war, because they are manufacturers of munitions, sellers of bacon and nickel, who are making big profits, such as the Davies Company, of which Mr. J. W. Flavelle, Chairman of the Imperial Munitions Board, is the head. Here is a list of manufacturers who are making the following profits: United States Steel Corporation, $207,945,953; Bethlehem Steel Corporation, $53,715,041; Anaconda Copper Mining Company, $39,087,187; Utah Copper Company, $32,174,480; American Smelting and Refining Company, $11,158,-084; E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., $76,581,729; General Chemical Company, $9,700,191; Central Leather Company, $12,-016,397; American Sugar Refining Company, $4,211,408; Republic Iron and Steel Company, $11,687,863; Standard Oil Company of New York, $20,425,510; Corn Products Refining Company, $3,798,892. And last, but not least, is the "Soo" Corporation, which in its last report shows net earnings of subsidiary companies to be $5,323,004, an increase of $1,800,000 over 1915-1916. These are the people who are asking for conscription and asking to go on with the war.

Hon. Mr. McSWEENEY: Cannot you give us the Canadian companies?

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I have not the names here, but they have been published in the Hansard of the other House. But I come back to the name of Sir H. B. Ames, who is the head of the Patriotic Fund. Here is the head of the Patriotic Fund asking men to go out and be killed, and at the same time making every effort to have them enlisted because he is making money in one way and distributing it in another. Personally I have the greatest respect for him. What was this gentleman doing six years ago?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I rise to a question of order. The Conscription Act is the law of Canada at the present time. It has been put into operation, and any motion which my honourable friend makes for the bringing down of documents, in which he has for his object the suspension of the Conscription Act, is manifestly abortive. My honourable friend cannot advocate the suspension of any statute. He might as well ask for the suspension of the Bank Act, the Criminal Code, or any other public Act.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I suppose I can discuss the question of order. The Act has been signed, but for my honourable friend, who is a serious man, to say—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Royal assent has been given, and it is the law of the land.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: It has been sanctioned here by the Governor, but a proclamation must be issued to call out the men, and I am asking that proclamation be not issued until after the general election. I cannot see how my honourable friend can say that the motion which I have made for the production of documents is not a proper thing to discuss.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The Military Service Act has been passed and sanctioned and is now the law of the land. I suppose that the honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) has the right to ask that the operation of the law be delayed, but he has not the right to speak against the Act. I advise him to confine his argument to the motion for the production of the correspondence for which he has asked.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: That is satisfactory. I was asking the Government not to put conscription into force. I was saying this.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You were attacking everybody in sight.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: No. I was giving a reason. I said there were two camps of men, one asking that the proclamation be issued at once, and that the Act be put into force, and I think there are those who are interested in doing that. Perhaps I am going too far, but I am willing to admit my fault, if necessary. But there are those who are anxious that the proclamation to put the Act into force shall be published in the Gazette. I am asking for the production of the correspondence from those who are against putting the Act into operation. I will give the reasons. I know that letters have been received in thousands by the Government, asking them to delay putting the Act into force until after a general election. The first thing I can do to justify those who are asking the Government not to put the Act into force and send more men to the war, is to read an extract from a letter published in a Montreal paper. This letter was written by a soldier who had been at the front. He said:

> I have seen the horrors of this war, the broken bodies on their beds of pain, the broken hearts of those bereaved, the awful mutilations that must be carried to the grave, the waste, the wanton waste of homes and towns and piled up treasures, the fruit of sweat and tears, and I solemnly declare that for the man who makes war on his fellows with the modern weapons of destruction there are no torments made in hell to fit his crime. If such a man there be, and such a nation, every cradle, every mother in her home, every maiden trusting chivalry, every Christian knowing Christ, cries to you and me, and to all who would have peace secure to bind them fast.

These are some reasons why this war must stop and why many men are asking the Government not to put into force now this law which will send their sons—

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order, order. I advised the honourable gentleman to confine himself to the motion before the House. His line of argument is such as to create excitement in the country and opposition to the operation of the law.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Furthermore, this Act is in force. It is not dependent on any proclamation. The machinery under the Act has been set in motion, and the discussion of this subject is entirely out of order. I ask the ruling of the Chair upon this question, and I intend to prosecute this to the end, no matter what the ruling of the Chair may be.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I understand that the honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) made a motion as to the issuing of the proclamation. Now, that proclamation has not yet been issued, and I can understand that the honourable gentleman, as is very natural, holding his views, should appeal to the Government to postpone the issuing of the proclamation.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The Act is in force.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: I understand the Act necessitates the issuance of a proclamation of the Governor General in order to call out the first class.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: From time to time. However, I raise the point of order that this discussion is entirely out of order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I have ruled that the discussion must be confined to the motion as it stands. I ruled that the line of argument used by the honourable gentleman has been such as to cause excitement in the country, and to have a bad effect upon the people.

Hon Mr. NICHOLLS: Might I ask the honourable the leader of the Government in this House if it is a fact that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, has already accepted the Act by agreeing to nominate one-half of the tribunals?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: So far as I am personally concerned, I object to any discussion other than upon the point of order now raised. I raised the point of order that the Act is in force, and discussion upon any other question is out of order. Under the notice of motion the honourable gentleman has no right to discuss the subject which he is discussing. The motion simply asks for certain papers.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I cannot understand why—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: We will give you to understand why. A man who will preach sedition in this House will be taught why. I propose that any member of this House who preaches sedition, as this honourable gentleman is doing, will not be heard by this House. I will ask this House to exercise the power which it has to prevent an honourable gentleman from doing that here.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: The honourable gentleman has no right to say that I am preaching sedition, and I challenge him to produce one word—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Every word. If you had given expression to these sentiments in Europe, there would have been a firing-squad called out.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am in order. I have the floor. I rise to a point of order. I ask the honourable gentleman to withdraw his words, I am not a Carson to raise soldiers to fight a law, as he did to fight Home Rule for Ireland; nor am I the head of an order which burned Gladstone in effigy when he proposed to abolish the Anglican Church in Ireland, and whose chaplain general, the Reverend Mr. Flanagan, cried out before a great assembly in Belfast, "If the Queen signs this Bill we will throw her crown into the Boyne, the same as we did that of King James."

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: You are a regular pro-German.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Order. The question is raised that the honourable gentleman has been preaching sedition. In my opinion, the arguments used by the honourable gentleman in moving the motion were very seditious.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I rise again to the point of order that the honourable gentleman has no right to make any observations, other than to move for the papers named in the motion.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Do you pretend that I have no right to speak on that?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Do you rise a point of order that when I move for an address for papers I have no right to explain?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Is that the point of order?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I ask the ruling of the Chair, as to whether the honourable gentleman has any right to discuss anything other than the papers mentioned in the motion.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I have already given my ruling. The honourable gentleman has no right to speak on anything but the motion which is now before the House.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That motion simply asks for the production of certain papers.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I am very much surprised at all this fuss, because I am asking to have certain correspondence produced with regard to enforcing the Military Service Act, and asking the Government to postpone its enforcement. I do not see why there should be a point of order raised on that. I have given the reasons of those who are asking this, and who are mentioned in the letters before the Government.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I object to that. The honourable gentleman has no evidence of any letters being before the Government. I take exception to his making reference to any letters of the kind referred to. I ask for a ruling on that point.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: And I am going to say—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Honourable gentlemen, I regret very much that we should have this little disturbance; but whatever our feelings may be just at the present moment, I think that we should consider the possible precedent that we are creating. The honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) moved, as he has the right to move, that a humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate certain papers. The honourable gentleman has a right to make that motion, and he has a right—it has been the uniform practice in this House for fifty years—in making the motion, to make such remarks as are necessary to show why his motion is made.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Yes, but not sedition.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: Oh, shut up.

Hon. Mr. POWER: I quite recognize the fact that perhaps in one or two portions of his address the honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette) reflected on an Act which has been passed by Parliament, which is something which he has no right to do. But I think he has a perfect right to discuss the motion on the Order Paper, so long as he confines himself to that. Of course, he must be guarded in his language. As I said when I began, I think it would be very regrettable to establish a precedent now which might lead to very objectionable results in the future.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The House will assume all responsibility for that.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I agree with the honourable gentleman from Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) that it would be a regrettable thing if we went too far; but I must warn the honourable gentleman that when he uses arguments, in moving a motion, which I consider to be seditious, I will call him to order and will take the responsibility.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I understand, Mr. Speaker, that in the course of his speech the honourable gentleman alluded to a proclamation which has not yet been issued. In the Act it is enacted that the Governor in Council may issue a proclamation calling certain persons to arms. That has not been done yet. Do I understand that the honourable member in his speech asked the Government to delay that, or gave reasons for delaying the issuing of the proclamation?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: The point of order is that the line of argument used by the honourable gentleman from Grandville was such as would create excitement in the country, and delay putting the law into operation.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I must object to the remarks of the leader of the Government and the Speaker, and say that I have used no seditious words. I do not want anybody to put expressions into my mouth which I never used. I never used seditious words.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You are so disloyal that you do not know what sedition is.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I do know what sedition is. I know that Carson and the Orange Order were seditious.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I shall have to name the honourable gentleman the next time.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE (translation): Mr. Speaker, considering your position and how you got it, you should not show so much zeal for the Government.

The Hon. the SPEAKER (translation): Mr. Choquette, sit down. (Text): The honourable gentleman has no right to be insulting.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I ask the honourable the Speaker to maintain order, and if the honourable gentleman does not observe order, I ask the Speaker to name him.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I have named him.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Then I propose to move a motion.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: What is the meaning of this ?

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. DOMVILLE: You are only fit to howl, the whole of you.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Inasmuch as the honourable the Speaker has named the honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette), if that honourable gentleman does not retract his discourtesy to this House, I will move that he be suspended from the service of the House for a certain number of days. I purpose doing that at once.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Before the honourable gentleman from Grandville answers, I want to state that His Honour the Speaker did not name the honourable member. He told him "Asseyez-vous" sit down. That is not the way in which the Speaker names a member.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I beg pardon; I named the honourable gentleman, and asked him to sit down.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I will resume my remarks.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I do not propose that the honourable gentleman shall do so. Do I understand that His Honour the Speaker has named the honourable gentleman from Grandville for interrupting the proceedings of this House?

The Hon. the SPEAKER: Yes.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: My honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) is mistaken.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: For having refused to submit himself to the judgment of the House.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Will my honourable friend permit me?

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I propose asking—

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: If my honourable friend will permit me—

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Let us try to conduct ourselves like gentlemen. There is no use in shouting "order." My honourable friend is mistaken. The conversation during which the Speaker claims to have named the honourable gentleman from Grandville was in French. There are very few honourable gentlemen on that side of the House who understand French. I understand it, and am quite close to His Honour the Speaker. His Honour the Speaker, if he claims that he did name the honourable gentleman—I am not quite sure that he did—did not name him for any discourtesy to the House.

Hon. Mr. DENNIS: Excuse me. He said, for insulting him.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Not discourtesy to the House, but for an insult to himself. If that is worse, then let it be worse, but let us understand where we are at. Let us not assume what my honourable friend (Hon. Sir James Lougheed) says, that the honourable gentleman was named for discourtesy to the House. It was not for that reason he was named, if he was named at all. So it is a matter entirely between the Speaker and the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Choquette).

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Not at all. The honourable gentleman is wrong.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Honourable gentlemen, I do not know exactly where we are at. I thought the Speaker told me to sit down because he had a decision to give. Anyhow, I am willing to abide by the decision of the Speaker. I may have said something in French—I do not remember exactly what it was; he told me to sit down, and I thought it was that he might give a decision.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I think my honourable friend would be well advised if he withdrew the words which he addressed to the Speaker.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: If in what I have said there has been something offensive to the Speaker, I am willing to withdraw it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: If the honourable gentleman does not withdraw his discourtesy to his Honour the Speaker, and consequently to this honourable House, I propose to move for the suspension of the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I was just going to say: I do not remember exactly the words I used, but if the Speaker has taken them as offensive, I am willing to withdraw them. I never had any intention of showing any disrespect to the Speaker.

Well, honourable gentlemen, to close my remarks on this motion asking for the production of documents. I was speaking of the special reason why this law should not be put into force before the general election. I do not see how otherwise I can put the matter before this honourable House and convince the House that the enforcement of the Act ought to stand until after the general election, which will be very soon. The reason which I gave to the House and to the Government for not putting it in force before the people pronounce upon it, and send abroad those in whom I am interested—

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I propose that the honourable gentleman shall not discuss that phase of the question.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: And furthermore, as I have raised the question of order. I again ask His Honour the Speaker to rule upon it; and, if my honourable friend persists in renewing his discourtesy to the Speaker, and consequently to this House, I shall take the responsibility of moving for his suspension.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I would like to know what is the point of order. I want to discuss the point of order.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Order, order.

Other Hon. SENATORS: Sit down.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I want to know what is the point of order.

Hon. Mr. LAVERGNE. That is the honourable gentleman's right. The honourable gentleman has a right to know what the point of order is.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: Mr. Speaker, am I to understand that, as a member of this House I have not the right to give my personal reasons, why I ask the Government to postpone the proclamation for the enforcement of the Act? Do I understand that I have not the right to do so? If that is so, then I have only to sit down.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Well, sit down.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: I will not sit down at the demand of the honourable gentleman.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I have raised the point of order. The point I have raised is this, that this Act is in force. There is no such thing as suspending a proclamation in this way. Furthermore, the Act is in force, there is no such proclamation as that to which my honourable friend refers. The machinery of this Act is in motion now and will continue in motion.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Furthermore, I raise the point of order that the honourable gentleman has no right to discuss any of the subjects mentioned in this motion, inasmuch as it is simply a motion for the bringing down of certain papers, and not for the discussion of those papers.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think the honourable leader of the House is under a certain misapprehension. The Military Service Act has been passed, but have we no right to discuss that law? Yes, we have a right to discuss any law. The only thing we cannot do is to prevent people from obeying the law. But we have a right to go on any hustings and discuss the law, and we may say it is a bad law or it is a good law. We may estimate the law as we like. That is a liberty we have, and no law can take that liberty away from us. A common orator at a meeting could get up on the hustings and give his opinion on this law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: No, he could not—under the present law.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes, yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: He would be arrested and sent to jail.

Hon. Mr LANDRY: No, no. I think that is a misapprehension. The law does not say that at all. I would like the honourable gentleman (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), if he makes that contention, to point out the section of the law which prevents a man from discussing it or expressing his opinion upon it. But my honourable friend (Hon. Mr. Choquette) was not discussing the law; he was only asking this. In the law there is, I claim—though my honourable friend may think differently—a clause which says that after the tribunals have been formed, a proclamation will issue calling upon persons between certain ages, between 20 and 34, to report.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I ask His Honour the Speaker to rule simply on the question if, once an Act of Parliament has been passed, it can be discussed in this House, and if its suspension can be asked for. Nothing is said in the motion about this proclamation; the motion does not deal with any proclamation; it deals with the putting into execution of the Military Service Act. I say it has been put into execution; it was put into execution several days ago. Therefore I raise the point whether this question is in order. I raise it on that ground, and that alone.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But you will allow us to discuss the question of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Yes, we are discussing the question of order.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I want honourable gentlemen to confine themselves to the question of order. We are not discussing the proclamation mentioned in the Act, we are discussing the Act. Nothing is said about the proclamation..

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I know nothing is said, but clause 4 of the Act says that:

> The Governor in Council may from time to time by proclamation call out on active service as aforesaid for the defence of Canada, either in Canada or beyond Canada, any class or subclass of men described in section three and all men within the class or subclass so called out shall, from the date of such proclamation, be deemed to be soldiers enlisted in the Military Forces of Canada and subject to military law—

Here the law declares that those persons will not be soldiers until the proclamation has been issued. Consequently there is in the law a section which says that the proclamation must be issued before those persons are called to arms. Well, the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Choquette) was discussing that question, and a point of order is raised to the effect that it is not permissible to discuss any provision in that law, or the law itself. I say that we can discuss the law. Moreover, in that particular case the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Choquette) was not discussing the law, but was asking the Government to delay until after the election the proclamation which the Governor has the power to issue, but which has not yet been issued. I do not see that the point of order is well taken in this case.

Hon. T. S. SPROULE: There is another principle involved in this case different from the ordinary one, and which has not been mentioned yet. The Act is an Act of Parliament, assented to by the Crown. If I understand, the rules, it is not the right of any member of this House to take up and discuss an Act once it is passed, and advance arguments why it should not be put into operation, or why its operation should be delayed or interfered with. It is a completed Act of the Parliament of Canada, passed during the present session. Therefore the discussion of it cannot be revived nor can its operation be interfered with. Any conduct in that direction in this House would be, in my judgment, improper. Therefore I think the point of order is well taken but, outside of that, there are the penal clauses of the Act, which are binding upon every one in regard to interference with the enforcement of the Act or its operation. I hold that those sections have a very strong bearing upon any arguments that may be advanced in this House with regard to the measure, because it has been put into operation and should be left to go through all the ramifications of its work without being again reviewed in this Chamber. I think it is quite improper and out of order to review or discuss it, or to give reasons why the operation of the Act should be stopped, or prevented, or interfered with. I think that any of those arguments are improper and out of order.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: Will the honourable gentleman read those penal clauses?

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: It does not pertain properly to a point of order to do so.

Hon. Mr. POWER: In the few observations that I had the pleasure of addressing to the House a while ago, I stated that it was improper and unparliamentary to reflect on any action of the House. To tell the honest truth, I did not follow the honourable gentleman from Grandville (Hon. Mr. Choquette), but if the honourable gentleman reflected on the Conscription Act, found fault with it and spoke of it in uncomplimentary terms, he was wrong. But that is not the question. The question is this. The Act requires that a proclamation shall be issued. The honourable gentleman from Grandville addressed a plea to the House, and perhaps more particularly to the Government, asking them not to have that proclamation issued until after the election. That does not reflect on the past action of the House.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: It certainly means the suspension of the operation of the Act.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Honourable gentlemen should try to keep their heads and not be carried away by the strong feelings of the moment. I quite understand, as the honourable gentleman from Grandville has a rather aggressive way of addressing the House, that possibly some honourable gentlemen opposite felt, in fact, "riled" about it.

Hon. Mr. SHARPE: Not at all.

Hon. Mr. POWER: But we must not let our angry passions rise. We must keep our heads cool.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Does the honourable gentleman contend that the House has a right to reconsider at the same session its former action in the adoption of a law? At the next session that honourable gentleman might make a motion to repeal or alter or amend a law. But this Parliament at this session has passed a law; that law has received the Royal Assent and has been placed upon the statute book. Does the honourable gentleman from Halifax say that honourable gentlemen have a right to bring up that question and discuss it again?

Hon. Mr. POWER: No, I never dreamed of saying anything of the sort. What I said was this, that in the Act there is a provision for the issue of a proclamation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: We know that.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Then, the honourable gentleman should not have addressed his remarks to me, if he knows that; because the issue of that proclamation is a matter within the discretion of the Government.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: But there is nothing in the motion about a proclamation.

Hon. Mr. POWER: The honourable gentleman from Grandville is pleading with the Government not to exercise that discretion at a very early date.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Yes, but he does not include in his motion anything about the proclamation.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Then he should.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: The honourable member for Halifax (Hon. Mr. Power) admitted at the outset that he did not hear what the honourable member from Grandville said; therefore I for one feel that he should be excused. I think that if he had heard what the honourable gentleman from Grandville said he would be of the same opinion as the rest of us—that it was a speech pro-German and seditious.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I again rise to a point of order and I ask that His Honour the Speaker decide the point of order or that honourable gentlemen confine themselves to the point of order. May I point out that the Military Service Act has already been voted upon by the House. On August 3 we voted.

Pursuant to the Order of the Day, the Senate resumed the adjourned debate on the motion that the Bill 75, "An Act respecting Military Service," be now read a second time, and the motion, in amendment:

That the following words be added at the end of the question: "With the understanding that this Bill will not come into force till after the general elections."

Now we are discussing this all over again.

Hon. Mr. POWER: Not at all.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: That is the vote of the House upon it, and it is clearly laid down in Bourinot that such a question cannot be discussed again. The House not only voted upon the Bill itself, but voted specifically upon enforcement.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY: I think there is a distinction to be made between the Bill and the proclamation.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: I hesitate to take part in the discussion even of the point of order, because I did not hear the honourable gentleman from Grandville; but I must call the attention of the honourable leader of the Government to an evident mistake which he is making. The amendment to which he referred was an amendment to the Bill. Of course, that has been discussed and the Bill has become law. There is no question about that.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: And cannot be discussed at this session.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: But it provides machinery which is to be put in motion by the Government, to call out the persons who are eligible for military service. This is to be done by proclamation. It remains at the discretion of the Government when this shall be done. The Government, in the exercise of its discretion, may do it tomorrow, or it may delay this proclamation until after the election or a year hence, if it chooses to do so. Surely it is open to any citizens in this country to petition the Government, for reasons which may be assigned, to delay the issue of the proclamation; and, although the motion might have been worded differently, and more to the point, I think it is evident that the point is as to the putting at once into execution of the Military Service Act, and evidently the honourable gentleman (Hon. Mr. Choquette) directed his remarks to the proclamation to which I have referred. I think that ought to dispose of that part of the matter.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: Did the honourable gentleman hear what he said?

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: It is not necessary that I should have heard what he said, in order to discuss the point of order. I think the honourable leader of the Government goes too far when he says that no reference can be made to the Bill. True, the Bill has become law; but in the next general election it will be open to any one to go on the hustings and claim that it should be repealed, and to give his reasons why the electors should vote against such and such. The Minister of Justice has so stated in the other House, and unquestionably it would be unbearable if, because a Conscription Act has been passed, a party who opposes that Act would be debarred in the general election from urging that as a reason why the Government should not be sustained.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: You cannot discuss it in this House. That is what we are saying. This is not the hustings.

Hon. Mr. BEIQUE: We cannot discuss it because it is not pertinent; but I might possibly raise a question under which it would become pertinent.

Hon. Mr. PLANTA: Even if the honourable gentleman was in order in discussing the Bill, the language which he used, or the last part of it was most offensive to many who heard it. May I be permitted, as probably one of many here who have lost sons, and still have sons fighting, that it is very hard indeed to contain oneself when listening to the language which was used by the honourable gentleman from Grandville in addressing this honourable House. I wish to say that if the same language had been used by a soap-box orator on the street, he would have been thrown into jail for treason.

Some Hon. SENATORS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: As a matter of order, we should not adopt any rule which would be found embarrassing later on. My honourable friend the leader of the Government has raised a point of order which I think ought to be settled—that no remarks whatever can be made on the Bill which has been passed. I agree with my honourable friend from De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique) in saying that that is wrong, and that we would be making a very serious mistake if we were to so hold. I agree that we have no right to discuss this Bill itself, or any other Bill which has been passed this session. I thoroughly agree with my honourable friend from Hastings (Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell), that it is against the rules to discuss any matter which has been disposed of; but what is my honourable friend discussing? He is discussing the action to be taken, not by the House but by the Government, in connection with this Act, something to be done in pursuance of the Act, in carrying out the Act, namely, the proclamation.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Is he not fortifying that by practically the very same arguments that were used in this House against the Conscription Bill itself and the wisdom of it.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am not dealing with the arguments which the honourable gentleman advanced; some of them I agree with and some I totally disagree with. But that is not the point. The question is whether we are permitted, in the words of my honourable friend the leader of this House, to discuss something which is pertinent or relates to or arises out of that Bill. I say we have that right, and I am going to advance a reason which I think will convince my honourable friend who has just interrupted me.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: I would like to call the attention of the House and the Speaker to the fact that the honourable gentleman has only the right to discuss the question once.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I have not discussed this point of order before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: No, but your are discussing the attitude of my honourable friend, and you have spoken two or three times.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: The leader has spoken at least a dozen times on this.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Then the rule to which I have called attention applies to the leader of the House as well as to you.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: I believe that the honourable gentleman from Ottawa is speaking on the point of order.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: I am going to advance an argument which I think will convince my honourable friend from Hastings. If the occasion arises to-morrow or in a month from now for this Government, in the opinion of my honourable friend from Hastings, to issue this proclamation, and the Government does not do it, does my honourable friend contend that he would not have the right to rise in this House and move a vote of censure against this Government for not doing it?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: Yes; you can move a vote of want of confidence if you like.

Hon. Mr. BELCOURT: Then have we not a right to discuss this proclamation? Is not that the test of it?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL : No; that is not in the motion at all. The motion has nothing to do with it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I ask a strict interpretation of this motion.

The Hon. the SPEAKER: If the honourable gentleman from Grandville had confined his remarks to the motion now before us, I would have great hesitation in declaring the motion out of order; but during the speech he used some expressions against the Act to make the people believe that it was a wrong Act, and that the people ought to oppose it. That was my understanding of his remarks, and I see in May, 12th edition, the following:

> The mention of a statute would seem to be partly open to the same objection as improper language applied to Parliament itself.

Therefore I declare the point of order well taken.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: In the Bill itself it is said that the Governor in Council may, upon the recommendation of the Central Appeal Judge, make proclamation with respect to establishment, etc. In my motion I am asking the Government, or the Governor in Council, not to make this proclamation now, but to postpone it until after the next election. I must say I protest against the distortion of what I said. Some of reasons I have for asking the Government not to put this Act in force now are those given by La Patrie and the Gazette, of Montreal, and the Journal-Press, of Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. SPROULE: Order: the honourable gentleman is drifting into the same lines.

Hon. Mr. GORDON: You still want to help Germany.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: The reasons given by those newspapers were: first, that the proclamation would have no effect for the present, because perhaps the young men would not be wanted on the other side; and, secondly, as the Journal-Press said, because they would not be in training before January. According to the constitutional law, this Parliament must be prorogued before the 7th of October, and according to the unwritten law, if not the written constitution, the election must be held in a few months thereafter; and, if that election should take place before November or December, there would be time thereafter to issue the proclamation that the Governor in Council may issue under section 3 of the Act.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: I rise again to a question of order. I did raise the question of order, that the senator from Grandville had no right to discuss this motion, which simply asks for the bringing down of certain papers from the Government. He has given no notice that he intends to discuss it. It cannot be expressly or impliedly understood or interpreted to mean that there would be discussion on it. It is a bald request for papers.

Hon. Mr. CHOQUETTE: My motion is for an address to His Excellency the Governor General asking him to have placed before this House documents which are in the hands of the Government, and which I wish to see. I am only asking now that the proclamation mentioned in the Military Service Act be proposed till after the election. With all due respect to the remarks of my honourable friend, I am exceedingly surprised at this stormy debate when I am only about taking the position of the Journal-Press and the other papers I have mentioned. In order not to raise prejudices in the minds of persons who are so ready to jump up on very little pretext and call a point of order, I now move my motion.

The motion was put and declared lost.

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY ACQUISITION BILL.

DEBATE ON THE MOTION FOR THE SECOND READING, AND THE AMENDMENT THERETO.

The Senate resumed from September 5 the adjourned debate on the motion of Hon. Sir James Lougheed that Bill 125, An Act providing for the acquisition by His Majesty of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company, be now read a second time, and the motion in amendment of Hon. Mr. Bostock:—

That the word "not" be inserted before the word "now" and the following substituted therefor:

The further consideration of this Bill be deferred until the following information has been communicated to the Senate, the production of the report made to the Government by the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway system, including the directors appointed to the board by the Government under section 16, chapter 20, of the statutes of 1914; the names of the stockholders of the stock of the Canadian Northern Railway company; the names of the pledgees of this stock, etc.

Hon. J. B. P. CASGRAIN: When I stopped speaking yesterday evening we were emerging from Mount Royal tunnel. I am sure that as this subject involves a matter of only $600,000,000, it will not create very much excitement in this House, and that the discussion will be conducted in a most peaceful manner. In speaking of the $52,000 that was supposed to be sufficient to pay for damages to property, I should have added that there is an agreement between the Canadian Northern Railway company and the Mount Royal Tunnel and Terminal company and the proprietors of the land by which no damages are to be settled until one year has elapsed after the work is completed; so it is evident that the account is more than uncertain; and as I came forward with only one large account which they have to settle, it stands to reason that there will be many millions of dollars required to settle all the others.

I regret that I must take issue with the honourable leader of the Government when he said yesterday afternoon that the amounts guaranteed by the Federal Government were all second mortgages, and that the provinces ranked before the Federal Government in their guarantees. I understand that the Federal Government in some cases, at any rate in one case that I am sure of, ranked before anybody else. I think the honourable gentleman said that the Federal Government always came after the provincial governments in ranking on the guarantees.

Hon. Sir. JAMES LOUGHEED: Yes.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I have been careful not to antagonize our friends on the other side of this House in my remarks, because, in view of the uncertainty of the amount of the liabilities on account of the meagre information given us, some of our friends on the other side might be in favour of the motion of the leader of the Opposition to obtain more information.

Therefore I wanted to forget for the moment that there are Conservatives and Liberals, or that there had been one Administration before the present one; but in the very preface of his remarks the honourable leader of the Government said that if we were put in this situation it was due to the Administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. We are quite willing to take our part of the blame. Since we have to discuss this matter, I shall go a little further, so as to put only that part of the blame that belongs to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Liberal party on their shoulders, and at the same time put on the shoulders of the present Administration that part of the blame which belongs to them. They cannot deny that they are blameable for the greater part. They cannot go back on their own child. We were guilty, if there is any guilt in it, of guaranteeing $35,000 a mile for a distance of 1,050 miles, from Port Arthur to Montreal, making roughly a little over $35,000,000. When the agreement to give that guarantee was made I was one of the parties who was strongly in favour of it, and I thought at that time that we were making a good bargain; and, if this House will bear with me, I think I can prove that the then promoters of the enterprise, Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann, said that, instead of asking for the ordinary subsidy of $6,400 a mile for a road costing $35,000 a mile for a distance of 1,050 miles, they preferred a guarantee. That is to say, if the railroad cost above $15,000 a mile, half of the $6,400 would be applicable to the second subsidy. For every additional dollar that was spent above that, if the double subsidy was earned, the road had to cost more than $15,000 a mile by at least $6,400. There is no question that the road between Port Arthur and Montreal would cost more than the amount necessary to ensure the double subsidy. The leader of the House told us yesterday that it cost $52,000 a mile, therefore they were entitled, under the law, to the $6,400. A subsidy of $6,400 a mile for a railroad 1,050 miles in length makes very nearly $7,000,000. The applicants for this subsidy said: "Do not give us the ordinary subsidy; we prefer taking a guarantee; you will keep the $7,000,000 in the public treasury, but you will give us a guarantee of $35,000,000." Up to that time the Canadian Northern had always honoured their obligations, had always paid their coupons, and apparently there was no risk whatever in giving them this guarantee. The road was to cost a great deal more than the amount required, and we were getting a first mortgage on that road from Port Arthur to Hawkesbury. I have the very words here:

> It was a first mortgage on every mile of that road, barring the small piece near Hawkesbury of 50 or 60 miles on which bonds had already been issued, and on which the Government had to be satisfied with a second mortgage.

The road cost $52,000 a mile; therefore they had to get $17,000 more on every mile. The Government was perfectly well guaranteed; and to-day, if the Government wanted to exercise their legal power and bring that part of the road to sale, they would find more than one railway in this country that would be glad to take it and recoup the money to the Government for the $35,000,000 guarantee given to that road. Why the Government does not do that I do not know. There is to my mind no excuse for sacrificing that.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Is my honourable friend at liberty to say what company would take over that road from Port Arthur to Montreal?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I am not at liberty to say, but I know it.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Perhaps the honourable gentleman would inform the Government of the facts, so that these parties could take advantage of the offer.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: Supposing this guarantee had been given by trustees or some big financial institution, what would happen if they let this first mortgage go by default? Would they not be recreant to their trust? Not only would they be recreant to their trust, but there would be only one place for them, if they did it with criminal intent—it would be jail or the penitentiary. Of course. I am not saying that those who are doing it should go there; but it is in the face of these facts that a group of business men, the very biggest business men in Montreal, signed a letter which appeared in the Montreal Gazette. That paper is, to my mind, the best Conservative paper that we have in our province, or perhaps in the country. It is a reliable paper. There is one honourable gentleman who has just recently been admitted to this House who would be glad to hear what I have to say about it. I do not believe that paper would have published this letter and the editorial which accompanied it if they had not been sincere. It is true that they have been silent since.

Then, take the Toronto Globe, which passed as the Bible with good Presbyterians in Ontario for many years. You do not see any flamboyant titles about this deal in it. Why does not the Globe come out? However, here are the names of the gentlemen who signed this protest. First is F. W. Molson, a director of Molsons Bank, a director of the City and District Savings Bank, and a very prominent man in Montreal. The next is Huntley R. Drummond, a director of the Bank of Montreal, president of the Canada Sugar Company, and a son of the late Sir George A. Drummond, for many years one of the strongest Conservatives in this House. When there are Conservative gatherings in Montreal he is always the first to be there; nevertheless he saw fit to send this protest to the Government. These big business men do not put their names on paper before the public unless they think there is a big emergency. The next name is Zeph. Hébert, President of the Board of Trade of the city of Montreal, president of Hébert & Company, one of the largest wholesale houses in this country, which has a turnover in excess of $3,000,000 a year. Next is Mr. A. J. Brown, K. C., director of the Royal Bank and of many large commercial enterprises, a man who is supposed to be a great commercial lawyer and the confidential adviser of some of our biggest men in Montreal. I have known men of very great importance who have said that unless A. J. Brown put his initials to a document, it would not do. The next is H. A. Ekers, who was mayor of Montreal by acclamation, a very popular man in Montreal, twice Conservative candidate in that city, and even at the risk of displeasing his party—and I am sure he would not like to do that under the present circumstance—he put his name to this letter. Next is Mr. Charles Chaput, president of Charles Chaput & Co. Then there is Mr. Charles Meredith, president of Meredith & Co., the leading bond house in Montreal. To show you the importance of this company, I may say that its vice-president is Sir Charles B. Gordon, vice-president of the Bank of Montreal, who was singled out for honours by His Majesty for services rendered during this war. The next is C. S. Campbell, K.C., the great commercial lawyer, a son of Sir Alexander Campbell, who at one time was leader of the Government in this House, and Minister of Justice under Sir John Macdonald. Then there is W. R. Miller, who was last year president of the Board of Trade of Montreal, and president of the Edwardsburg Starch Company. Then there is George Caverhill, a director of the Montreal Light, Heat and Power Company, president of Caverhill, Learmont and Company, the largest and oldest hardware company in the district. The next name is that of William McMaster, who is a very important man, a director of the Bank of Montreal and president of the Canada Explosives Company, a man who is doing business with this Governement and with the Munitions Board; still he did not hesitate to tell the Government what he thought. The next name is H. W. Blackwell, vice-president of the Merchants Bank and vice-president of the Steel Foundries.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: Are there any ordinary every-day citizens on the list?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: No, I think they avoided getting any but the most prominent names. Next is Andrew J. Dawes, a director of the Merchants Bank and president of the National Breweries.

Hon. Mr. McMEANS: Are there any prominent men outside of Montreal?

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: There is my honourable friend from Winnipeg (Hon. Mr. McMeans). The next name on the list is Robert Hampson, president of Hampson & Sons. F. Howard Wilson, director of the Merchants Bank and the Montreal Tramways. James Morgan, president of Henry Morgan & Company, a company which occupies a position in Montreal somewhat similar to that occupied by Eatons in Toronto. George E. Drummond, a director of the Molsons Bank. I have named the activities of these gentlemen from memory. They are all good Conservatives, with the exception perhaps of one. I venture to say that not more than one of these men, if he voted, voted for Sir Wilfrid Laurier at the last election.

Hon. Mr. POPE: They know better than that.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: I may say that it was intentional that the banks should be represented. In the list of names which I have mentioned, there are two directors of the Molsons Bank, one of the Royal Bank, two of the Bank of Montreal, and two of the Merchants Bank. I am sure that lots of other names could have been put to this letter; but the fact that there are only a few and these the leading men of Montreal and friends of the present Administration, makes it all the stronger. Now, I will read the letter. It says:

The Government Bill to authorize the purchase by it of the capital stock of the Canadian Northern railway is half-way through the House of Commons and will shortly be in the Senate. If it becomes law, it will impose on Canada, at a time when the country is under an unprecedented strain, a burden of unknown magnitude, one certainly greater than any ever before imposed upon this country, with the exception of the war debt.

The purchase of a defined piece of railway property is one thing. The buying of stock in a company with unascertained assets and unknown liabilities is another. Once the Government becomes the principal owner of the common stock, it must provide out of loans or taxes for all the debts of the railway due or to become due and for all future losses in operating. The estimates of expenditure still necessary to be made run into enormous figures.

No one knows what the real extent of its obligations are. The railway has bonds outstanding and debts unpaid; so have its subsidiaries. There are guarantees given by it to other companies, unpaid balances on contracts and upon accounts, but to what extent is unknown.

What its assets are is equally unknown. It operates and is interested in railway companies, land companies, telegraph companies, tunnel companies, lumber companies and hotel companies.

Will the Government shut up these hotels, or will they be temperance hotels?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL: They will be temperance hotels.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It would be nice, I think, to stay at a Government hotel. It would be the first time that we could say we had been at the public trough.

But no one knows how far it owns them, what their assets or liabilities are, nor to what extent the railway company is responsible for their liabilities.

No other railway company nor any other group of business men would consider such an acquisition except after elaborate examination and reports from accountants and appraisers on the assets and liabilities, and then only subject to a solvent guarantee that all supposed assets would be delivered and that no undisclosed debts or obligations would appear.

In the United States the usual course has been to place the roads in the hands of a receiver.

To find out these things, where such examinations and guarantee cannot be had, the usual course in the United States has been to place the road in the hands of a receiver, whose staff can ascertain them and place before those interested an accurate and clear statement. Systems quite as large, notably the Union Pacific, the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe and the Rock Island, have in the United States been through this process and have emerged from it with capital written down to correspond to the actual values in a solvent condition and able to perform their duties as public servants.

The only examination so far had into the affairs of the Canadian Northern has resulted in the opinion of two of three railway experts that the stock proposed to be purchased was worth nothing. That means that whatever its nominal value may be, the unsecured debts are more than enough to prevent its being sold to any reasonably prudent purchaser. In view of the fact that no money was paid to the company for the stock and that the company has never been able to earn anything upon it, there was and is no reason to expect any other result from examination.

No agreement or obligation to purchase is produced. In fact, nothing has transpired except verbally and then between members of the Government not named and persons whose names are not disclosed. In fact what is to be paid, who is to get paid for it, what the cost and the attendant obligations are, no one knows. The smallest transaction in common life could not be concluded in such a way, and any attempt to do it by trustees responsible to a court would unquestionably be a breach of trust, and this is the largest and most onerous undertaking ever contemplated by any Canadian Government, and the most risky. It is safe to say that no road capitalized above its earning power can ever be a useful public servant, nor can any road bought by a Government for more than its worth ever be anything but a continuous drain on the taxpayer.

The Canadian Northern railway was built as a private speculation. Its bonds were sold to financiers at a discount. No money was received into its treasury for its stock. Nothing has been made public which would justify the taxing of other citizens of this country for the purpose of giving fictitious value to these bonds and stocks. The interest and other charges on Canada due to the war increase every day and even now are so great that it is difficult to say from what source they can be paid without an economic strain never hitherto undergone and a cutting down of expenses not yet even begun.

The credit of the country abroad is less than it has ever been. The last loan of $100,000,000 at 5 per cent for two years netted only $96,111,111. In other words, the country is borrowing money at a charge of more than 8 per cent per annum.

I will explain that in a minute:

Its future credit may depend entirely on the belief of foreign bankers that good money will not be sent after bad, and that speculative enterprises will be allowed to find the financial level called for by their intrinsic merits.

The undersigned, all of whom as investors, have a stake in the prosperity of this country desire to call the attention of their fellow-countrymen to the grave risk they all are running of having their own earnings diverted for the purpose of securing profits to bondholders and stockholders of a concern, the equity in whose enterprise has been declared by the only people at all in a position to form an opinion to be of no value. It is also urged that the strongest possible protests be made before it is too late to all senators and members of Parliament.

The names follow; they are the names which I gave beforehand.

I said that I would explain this 8 per cent. The last loan, as we all know, was made in New York, and the amount was $100,000,000. The Minister of Finance declared that he received from it $96,250,000. J. P. Morgan & Co. say, and they print, that all the Minister of Finance for Canada got was $96,111,111. There is a difference—and out of this $96,111,111 the Minister of Finance had to pay a commission of three-quarters of a million; so that the Canadian Treasury got only $94,360,000. But, let us take the Finance Minister's own figures, $94,500,000, as correct, although for what purpose the American Company prints another amount I do not know. The interest on $100,000,000 for two years at 5 per cent is $10,000,000. In addition to that, when our Finance Minister goes back to New York he cannot take back that $94,500,000 and say, "That is all I have, and that is all I am going to give you." He must take back from Canada $100,000,000 though where he will get that amount I do not know. There is a deficit of $5,500,000 to be made up. That amount plus the $10,000,000 makes a total of $15,500,000. For what? The only money which the Finance Minister will have had the use of is the $94,500,000. We must pay $15,500,000 for that loan. If you will figure out the interest, you will find that it is 8.03 per cent. Any schoolboy can figure that out. That is what we are paying, and it is at this time that we would go into an enterprise which, within the next 12 months, will require the raising of $35,000,000 or $40,000,000, as I will show.

I claim that this is not the time for such a proposal, and that if some other means can be devised of dealing with the question it ought to be adopted. And there is a means which is quite certain, in the opinion of some very good lawyers. Everybody in this House may not be aware that there is on the statute books a law having special reference to insolvent railways. That law was placed on the statute-book in the year 1904 by the honourable member for De Salaberry (Hon. Mr. Beique), and it has given satisfaction every time it has been invoked. Here is a very short summary of it, and in case there should be in the minds of some honourable gentlemen any doubt respecting the existence of efficient machinery under the present law to wind up the Canadian Northern Railway company the following may be useful.

Under the provisions of the Exchequer Court Act, Chapter 140 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, Section 26 provides that the court has the power to order in such a manner as it may prescribe the sale or reorganization of a railway, subject to Federal jurisdiction, at the instance of the Minister of Railways, when the railway company has become insolvent. The court in such a case shall have all the powers for the appointment of a receiver, the interim preservation of the property, the delivery of possession, the making of all the necessary inquiries, the taking of accounts, the settling and determining of claims and priorities of creditors, the taxing and payment of costs, and generally the taking and directing of all such proceedings requisite and necessary to enforce its order or decree and render it effective, as in mortgage actions in the High Court of Justice in England.

The receiver whom the court may appoint takes possession of the railway and its accessories and under the direction of the court works and operates the railway, and maintains its accessories in good condition, renews the same or any part thereof, and does generally all acts necessary for the preservation, working, maintenance, administration and operation of the railway, and conducts suits on behalf of the Company in its name. He may also, if the court so directs, complete the construction and equipment of the railway.

The cases in which a railway company shall be deemed to be insolvent are enumerated in section 27, the provisions of which cover almost every conceivable case of financial difficulty. The section corresponds closely to a similar section in the Act for winding up insolvent companies, except that it is more stringent as to delays. These proceedings have been used to wind up and sell the Quebec Southern railway, the Atlantic and Lake Superior railway, the Baie des Chaleurs railway, the Central Ontario railway, the Père Marquette railway, which is now in the hands of a receiver under the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court.

I may say also that the same group of persons who are interested in, or behind, the Canadian Northern people are many of them interested also in another railway, a tramway this time, far from here—in Barcelona, Spain, and that railway is also in the hands of a receiver; and if this group could receive, as is intended, $25,000,000 cash just now, that amount might be very useful in order to save the railway in Barcelona, where, it appears, the Spaniards were allowed to ride too cheaply on the cars, and not enough money was earned to pay the expenses, on the contract. In any case that $25,000,000 would be very convenient now to enable that same group to release that enterprise. There is also a group interested in South America, in Rio Janeiro. By the way, the receiver appointed for the Barcelona railway was appointed in London, England.

People seem to be afraid to go before the Exchequer Court; they think it would be a terrible thing. Well, it is not. I was myself interested in two railways which went before the Exchequer Court. The process might take a little time. It might have the effect of a moratorium. It might stay the hand of all the hungry creditors who would pounce upon the fast-emptying treasury of this country. The proceedings of the Exchequer Court would take sufficient time perhaps to let the clouds roll by, and enable us to get money at less than 8 per cent. A receivership is the most prudent and easiest way, and in the United States it has resulted in excellent management. A receiver can borrow more cheaply than any other institution. When a receiver has been appointed and is acting under the jurisdiction of the court he buys anything that he may need either for the operation of the railroad or to complete its construction or to provide equipment. Anything he buys, he buys under the order of the court. He has the very first lien on the railroad, and every dollar that he spends goes before even the first mortgage and the second mortgage and the bonds. Consequently he is in a better position to borrow money than any one else. The appointment of a receiver would be a good method for the Government to adopt.

To submit this matter to arbitrators would be reverting to the system which obtained forty or fifty years ago. Whenever at that time a difficulty of this kind had to be settled, there were well-known Federal arbitrators appointed who went about the country settling claims. That system was not found satisfactory, and the Exchequer Court was given the necessary powers, and since then the Exchequer Court has been dealing with such matters. If the matter were left to the Exchequer Court, the country would at least know the cost. I stated last night that we did not know what we were undertaking. If the matter is dealt with by the Exchequer Court, the bondholders would appear with their bonds and the claims of all who had claims would be presented, and an order of the court would issue that no claims would be entertained or allowed after a certain date. There would be an end to the claims. But under the method now being followed the door is left wide open, and, after the stock has been paid for by the Government up to $25,000,000, the Bill authorizes other claims to come in. There is nothing I can see in the Bill which will put an end to the claims. But if the matter goes to the Exchequer Court, the court would declare that after the 20th of December next, or after the 1st of February next, no further claims would be received. The matter would be dealt with like any other insolvent estate, and the country would know the amount of these claims. Besides, every one who went before the Exchequer Court would have to prove his claim. If a pledgee came there with debentures to the amount of $100,000, and these debentures had never been sold to him, if he had simply made a loan of, say, $30,000 or $40,000 on them, that fact would be declared in the court and the country would not have to pay the $100,000, the face value or the par value of the bonds. The Exchequer Court would allow that man to rank according to his debt, and not higher. The honourable gentleman from Sydney (Hon. Mr. McLennan) is, I am sure, a fairminded man. He said last night that this Bill is distasteful to him. I appeal to him especially, and to other honourable gentlemen in this House if the question should not be referred to a court, where every person would have to prove his claim, and whose priority would rank according to the amount he had paid? His status would be fixed definitely and his claim settled.

If you read the Bill you will notice that the arbitrators are supposed to deal with the matter in a summary way. It was argued that that provision meant that they would sit from day to day, but "in a summary way" has another meaning. To refer the matter to the court does not necessarily involve the sale of the railway. A judgment of the Exchequer Court is equal to an act of this Parliament. The Exchequer Court has full power to order the reorganization of this railway, and that might result in a new Canadian Northern system, with all the watered stock squeezed out of it and the system put on a paying basis and enabled to continue.

There should be no fear of receiverships in this country. Everybody should know that the appointment of a receiver has always been the best and easiest way of pulling a company out of difficulties. Honourable gentlemen are well aware that half—in fact, 75 per cent of the roads of the United States have been at some time or other in the hands of receivers; and when they were in the hands of receivers the public got the very best of service. It is a well know axiom in the United States that no railroad is better run than a railroad in the hands of a receiver. All the receiver has to do is to receive the money and give good service to the public. After all, the first duty of a railroad is to serve the public properly; and the receiver is the one who sees to that. He is not worried as to whether or not the coupons shall be paid, or whether or not there shall be any dividends for the shareholders. All he is paid for is to give good service, and he gives good service. The Wabash, which is an important system in the United States, has just emerged from the hands of a receiver and is all the better for it. The Rock Island railway, the Chicago and Great Western—these railroads went through the hands of receivers and came out all the better.

There is another great advantage. There is a certain amount of commitments by the Canadian Northern. When I speak of commitments I mean that there have been many promises made by the various companies and by the promoters, Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann. They have committed themselves to do many things. It is well know that in the province of British Columbia alone they are committed to the extent of $20,000,000 or $25,000,000. Where will the money come from? British Columbia guaranteed $40,000,000, as the blue-book says, or $47,000,000, according to the statement of the Attorney General. $7,000,000 does not seem to be much one way or the other, for we seem to be going it blind in this matter. However, if this matter went to the Exchequer Court all the promises that have been made would have to be proven, and the country would not be held responsible for them if they were not. For instance, when Mackenzie and Mann got those guarantees from municipalities they agreed to build certain stations of a certain style, and this and that. If these affairs went through the receiver's hands, all that would be cut out, because there would be no more liens unless the people went to the Exchequer Court and that court decided that they were entitled to them, which would be very doubtful. It would be very easy for the Government, in their clemency and generosity, to hand over anything that they believed was due in equity, if not in law; but their position would be very much stronger if they exercised the rights given under the legislation of 1914, by which the company is barred from even discussing the taking over of the railway. Under that legislation the Government could step into the property like an ordinary mortgagee, and there is no good reason why the Government should depart from that law.

One objection that was heard in another place and repeated in this House was that there would be seven receivers. The leader of the Government in this House told us last night, corroborating what his own leader had said in another place, that there would be seven.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: No, six. Let us make it six. I do not think I insisted on seven.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN: It would be seven, counting the Exchequer Court. Now, the legislation of 1914 expressly declares that all the subsidiary companies which up to that time had not been declared to be railways for the general advantage of Canada should come under Federal authority, and they were so placed, and they are still there. Then why does the leader of this House talk about seven receiverships, seven courts of law, seven sets of lawyers, in face of the fact that through the Exchequer Court one receiver could be appointed who could deal with the whole problem? In the interests of this country, in this time of stress and financial difficulty and uncertainty, a receiver could keep that railway in operation and in such condition that we would be able to deal with it later on when proper investigation was made. The Exchequer Court was created for that very purpose, and the law put on the statute book by the honourable member for De Salaberry is an excellent law. The Exchequer Court has the same power as an act of Parliament.

To show how good the Exchequer Court is, I may mention that when the matter of the Quebec and Saguenay railway came before Judge Cassels in that court, although the Government's lawyer allowed one amount of $500,000, and another of $794,869, or a total of $1,294,869, and said the railway was entitled to that, Judge Cassels cut out both amounts. If in that comparatively small matter of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 he was able to cut off over a million, how much would he cut off if this Canadian Northern matter were referred to him? We are now practically saying: "We accept the whole mortgage, the whole of the unknown liabilities, all the commitments, all the equipment trust; we accept everything; and we will have an inquiry
