THE KING AND THE MILLER.

Near Sans Souci, the favorite residence of Frederic the Great, there was a mill, which much interfered with the view from the palace. One day the king sent to inquire what the owner would take for the mill; and the unexpected reply came that the miller would not sell it for any money. The king, much incensed, gave orders that the mill should be pulled down. The miller made no resistance, but folding his arms, quietly remarked:

"The king may do this, but there are laws in Prussia."

And he took legal proceedings, the result of which was that the king had to rebuild the mill and to pay a good sum of money besides in compensation.

Although his Majesty was much chagrined at this end to the matter he put the best face he could upon it, and turning to his courtiers, he remarked:

"I am glad to see that there are just laws and upright judges in my kingdom."

A sequel to this incident occurred about forty years ago. A descendant of the miller of whom we have just been talking had come into possession of the mill.

After having struggled for several years against ever-increasing poverty, and being at length quite unable to keep on his business, he wrote to the king of Prussia, reminding him of the incident we have just related, and stating that, if his Majesty felt so disposed, he should be very thankful, in his present difficulty, to sell the mill. The king wrote the following reply with his own hand:

"My dear Neighbour,—I cannot allow you to sell the mill. It must always be in your possession as long as one member of your family exists, for it belongs to the history of Prussia. I regret, however, to hear you are in such straitened circumstances, and therefore send you herewith a sum of money, in the hope that it may be of some service in restoring your fortunes. Consider me always your affectionate neighbour, FREDERIC WILLIAM."

A SELF-DENYING BOY.

In a little town in Germany lived the widow of a forester. Her husband had died long ago, and left her nothing but the care of her three young sons. She had no little difficulty to make both ends meet, still she managed to live, sparingly but honestly. The two elder sons were at last old enough to leave home, the third remained with his mother still, and went daily to school. Then the war broke out, that time of great sorrow and distress. There were collections, and appeals for help for the thousands of poor wounded brothers in the war; the cry reached even the little town, and the list of contributors to the work of mercy was carried from house to house. The collectors came to the widow's house. She had given her mite, so they were going on, but her little son suddenly seized a pen, and quietly wrote down his name on the list for three dollars, which he counted out quite correctly into the hand of the astonished collector. It was more than many well-to-do trades people had given, more than some rich, miserly citizens had contributed. Where did the money come from? The little fellow had for years been longing to possess a watch, and every time that his mother or one of his elder brothers gave him a nickel, or a half-dime, or a dime, he put it carefully away. When he got enough nickels he would change them into a silver piece, and greatly did he rejoice at the increase of his treasure when he had his first whole dollar. Now at last it had grown into three, and soon—very soon now, he would have that pleasure to which he had been looking forward for such a long time—the joy of feeling that he had a watch in his pocket. But he gave up this long-desired pleasure, and readily parted with all the money for the wounded soldiers.

We cannot help hoping that some day the generous boy may hear the wished-for watch tick in his pocket, though he may have to wait some time longer before that time comes.
