total amount of electricity. This is called induction.

There is no doubt that the electric charge of a cloud comes from a first charge multiplied by induction. The first charge may be acquired by evaporation, for we know that electricity may be generated in that way. Or it may be generated by the friction or rubbing of vapour-laden air, which, moving as wind, comes in contact with objects on the earth's surface.

This vapour is composed of very tiny drops of water, each of which becomes electrified, the charge accumulating on its surface. Now, as these drops come together and run into larger drops there is the same quantity of water and of electricity as when the drops were separate, but there is a good deal less surface, and the electric charge is intensified to that extent.

The drops so formed attract smaller drops by their greater power, and thus condensation, with continual increase of power, goes on rapidly, and a thundercloud begins to form. As the cloud is sent forward by the wind it affects the earth's surface by induction, and the earth's surface affects it in the same way, the cloud becoming positively and the earth negatively charged. This goes on rapidly, electric energy being continually drawn to the cloud from the air, and the same quantity being repelled from the earth below. Thus it is that the thundercloud forms so quickly and acquires so great an electric power.

DARE TO BE YOURSELF.

"Be myself! Of course, I am myself," you say, "how could I be anybody else?" Oh, it is quite easy. I will show you how.

I happened once to know a youth who ceased to be himself. He was educated in a certain school and had a somewhat remarkable career; he was steady, regular, and industrious, and as decent a boy all round as you could find anywhere. He gained a scholarship, went to another school and did equally well. Then he went out into the world, found a place in an office where a number of youths were at work, and here unfortunately he lost himself. How? Well, in this way: he began to imitate their manner of speech, and it was neither straight nor sweet. Filthy jokes and unseemly language became the practice of his life, and one day, when spoken to about it, this was his answer: "I know it's all wrong, but then I don't like to be different from the others."

The boy, you see, had ceased to be himself in his imitation of others; he spoke language which he knew ought not to be uttered, but had not the courage to keep out of a rut in which others were walking.

It may seem a small matter, but it is a plucky thing to do for a lad when he sees what is right and dares to be himself—stand alone, be singular.

Most people are like sheep—they follow one another without thought. One evening a man was driving a number of sheep through the streets of a town. The lights from a shop window fell upon a post and the shadow was thrown across the street. The leading sheep thought it was something in the way and jumped over it, the rest did just the same!

I went into a church one day, and though I hope I always behave properly this time I was very considerably amused, and inwardly smiled many times. The sermon came on, and as the preacher gave out his text I was startled—I heard the tones of a well-known voice, the voice of a preacher who had obtained considerable repute. I listened with care and there could be no mistake—the tone, the pronunciation, the formation of the sentences, were all those of my friend; then I noted the preacher's movements and they were the same—the uplifted eyes, the clasped hands, and every peculiarity, they were all there, the man had ceased to be himself and was trying to be another man, but I need hardly say he did not attain to the other man's success. In fact I never knew a man who tried to be a mere imitation of another who was a success. This is a point
