Few Hints On Helping Yourself and Your Neighbors-Above All Don't Lose Hope.

Don't lose hope in the future of your town, but study conditions that need correction and set about to apply He who would set a good example a remedy.

He who would set a good example before his neighbors will patronize every home industry that is worthy of support.

If your neighbor is a grumbler and cannot see any good in the town or its people and if he is not of the kind that can be reformed, let him seek a home elsewhere. A change of air will be good for him, for yourself and the town in general.

When there is any work to be done, don't wait for your neighbor, Tom Jones or Dick Brown, to commence. Get a move on yourself and go to them and pull hand in hand with them.

Don't think that enterprise consists of sending your money from your home town to help build up business enterprises and add to the wealth of capitalists in large cities. No, this is not enterprise; rather lack of public spiritedness.

Don't be afraid of criticism. Study well your duty as a citizen and go about it without feer or fever and to suppose the proportion of the service of the proposed to the service of the ser

There is little use in feeling sore because your neighbor has been successful. He may have worked intelligently and hard to succeed while you have been idling your time and doing a lot of grumbling instead of trying to build up trade and your town.

Sometimes the retired favour who.

Sometimes the retired farmer who comes to town to live feels that it is not his place to take an active part in town affairs. A few encourazing words may change his attitude and make him one of the progressive factors in the town.

Your town will not lose out by impressing each and every farmer in the neighborhood with the fact that the place is for his benefit as much as for hose who reside within its corporate

Business men of a town should make the farmers feel that they are always welcome visitors and not men to place. The farmers are the mainstays of agricultural towns, and are to a great extent the ones on whom the chants are mainly dependent support. They are quite as much in-terested in the prosperity of the town as are the residents of the place and should be made to feel that the town is as important to them as to residents of it.

"That is rather surprising," answered Curran, "for I have been practicing all night."

While thus lying ill Curran was visited by a friend, Father O'Leary, who also loved his joke.

Because you could let me in," said facetious counselor. "It would be much better for you, Curran," said the good humored priest, "that I had the keys of the other place, because I could then let you out."

Relaxations.

"Every mind frets for relaxations," says a writer. "Some men find it sufficient relief to take their pleasures on their own little tennis courts or croquet lawn. Others, like Richelieu, will call in the servants and have a leaping match in the hall; or, like Cardinal Mazarin, shut themselves in the cardinal management. rarin, shut themselves in a room and fly over the chairs. Sir Isaac Holden used to get recreation out of compulsory walking. The more active the mind the greater the need for physical recreation. Gladstone cut down trees, rode and walked, and when none of these occupations was open to him threw himself head over heels down a grass bank. This feat was eclipsed by the staid and orderly member of the House of Commons who would solemnly throw a back somersault as he walked home through Hyde park." One evening while John Addington Symonds was at Oxford he dined with Prof. Jowett. After dinner the latter sat staring at the Are and would not speak, but yet did not seem to want Symonds to go. At last he spoke oracularly: "When I don't say anything, people fancy I am thinking about something. Generally I am thinking about nothing at all. Good night!" At another time he said: "Mr. Swinburne is a most curious young man. He used to bring me long and eloquent essays. He had a very remarkable power of language, but it was all language. I could never find that he was following any line of thought."
