"SHIP AHOY!"
A Story in thirty-six Cable Lengths.

SEVENTH CABLE LENGTH.
HOW MR. LONGDALE GAVE MR. MERRITT A HINT.
He went to a cupboard, and brought out a decanter and a glass; while Mr. Merritt, who was white with rage, strode up and down the room till a jerk opened the door, and upon him Mr. Longdale turned to vent his spleen.

"If you please, sir," began the clerk.
"Curse you! Don't you see we are engaged? How dare you intrude like this!"
The clerk glanced at the sherry decanter, and was gone in an instant.

"Now, my dear boy," said Longdale, suavely.
"Don't 'dear boy' me, Longdale," cried Merritt, dashing his hand upon the table.

Then, dragging up a chair, he seated himself in front of his partner, who was calmly pouring out a glass of the amber fluid.

"Look here, I came into your firm when your name stank so that you could get neither cargo nor men. I came in, and brought money."

"You're true, my dear boy—your sherry—but you need not raise your voice so that the clerks can hear."

"I came into the firm with money, and it was a stipulation that, though junior, I should have full voice in all matters."

"Quite true, my dear boy," said so you have. You are determined to do everything—really senior partner."

"What do you call that, then, engaging that fellow?"
"My dear boy, taste your wine; it really is excellent."

"D—n the wine!" roared Merritt, and he swept the glass off the table in his rage. "I tell you I won't have it. I won't put up with it. I'll snatch away the morsel that his soul craved; drag from him the consolation of religion; take from him the life-buoy his fingers tried to hold; force him back into the flames. Curse him! curse him! he hissed, between his teeth. 'If only had him here!'"

He stamped the heel of his patent-leather boot down upon the floor as he spoke, and made as if he were giving his enemy's face beneath it.

"Has he dared, then?" said Longdale, coolly sipping his sherry, and crumpling his biscuit between his fingers, as he curiously watched the working of his partner's face.

"Never mind what he has dared, and what he has not. The scoundrel struck me—curse him! and I could not strike him again. I don't care, I'll own it," he cried stammering in his speech, in his rage and exultation. "I was afraid of him; but I'll be even with him yet."

Longdale did not speak, but rose from his chair, obtained a fresh glass, filled it, pushed it to his partner, and then repeated himself, just as Mr. Merritt snatched up the glass, poured its contents down his throat, and thrust it forward to be refilled.

"That's better," said Longdale, pouring out a fresh glassful.

"I have this stopped at once," said Merritt, suddenly changing from his furious excitement to a hard, bitter, business tone of voice. "Ring for one of the clerks."

As he spoke he reached out his hand for the cable ring, but Longdale coolly drew it back.

"Stop a minute, Merritt," he said, quietly. "don't be rash."

"Rash? I tell you, I'll have the whole affair cancelled."

"Listen to me, you are a business man—a shrewd man. Have you thought this over?"
"No; it wants no thinking over."

"Yes, it does—quietly. You are with us now, Merritt, and I can speak plainly as to Rutherford. Though I did not know it, it seems that I have been working in your interest."

"Now, look here," cried Merritt, fiercely. "I'm not to be cajoled. Pass me that bell."

"But you are to be spoken to, and shown where you are wrong, when you are wrong. Stop a moment," he said, for Merritt was about to interrupt. "You will own it yourself. You have sold Anderson?"

Merritt sat silent and glaring; face of a leaden pallor, and his head contracted.

"Well, he was engaged to China."

Merritt did not speak; he was tainting himself by a fort of will.
