TWO BOYS AND A BEAR.

(Conclusion.) Had the boys been supplied with ammunition they would, no doubt, have stood their ground; but under the circumstances they saw fit to run. They did not look around, but they felt that the bear was pursuing and gaining in the race. Charley was ahead, and when he reached the one of the two trees which stood nearest the barn he ran up into it almost as nimbly as the squirrel at which he had fired in the morning. Arthur hesitated a moment, and then climbed the
