A Pan-American Policy.

Special Evening Telegram.

WASHINGTON, To-day.

That the day is dawning when International peace and brotherhood shall prevail, when war shall be no more, was the tenor of all speeches at the closing sessions here of the American Society for the judicial settlement of International disputes. Mr. Justice Riddell, High Court, Ontario, at a banquet of the Society, spoke of the close ties, binding the English speaking nations, and declared the man who would try to stir up ill feeling between any branches of these nations would not only be a traitor to his own country but to the whole world, because the world was looking to them to push the victory of International peace. On the idea of referring the Panama Canal toll dispute between Britain and States, he said it was not a matter of great importance how the question was settled, but what was important was that it be settled right. The American people, he said, were the guardians of their own honour. English people were certain American people would ultimately do what they ought to do. He asserted he asked for no treaty between English speaking people, no formal union. For stronger than any parchment bond, there was a moral law holding them together. Jose Godery, Mexican Minister to Cuba, made a plea that this country help Mexico to return once more to peace. David Hill, former Ambassador to Germany, expressed the opinion that the day may not be far distant when there would be a court of International Justice. John Barrett urged the enlargement of the Monroe Doctrine into what he called a Pan-American policy where each nation would have some right attitude, some definite position, some self or some sense of independence as the States now has.

Miss Asquith's Speech

A Comprehensive Survey of the Political Situation.

Miss Asquith, opening a bazaar in aid of the Brixton Liberal Association yesterday, made a political speech. She predicted that there would be no General Election for a good while yet, and made excuses for the Reading bye-election, besides dealing with other leading questions of the day from a Liberal point of view.

Referring to Mr. Larkin's release, Miss Asquith said she was sure they were all greatly rejoiced that he was free. They were all convinced that in these days sedition was a rather medieval offence, especially now that Sir Edward Carson, with his law-abiding modern methods, had shown it of every shadow of glamour, and brought it down almost to humdrum respectability.

Continuing, Miss Asquith said the Liberal Party had borne the burden of promises thirty years, but they were going to get some of them out of the way this year, when the Welsh Disestablishment Bill and the Home Rule Bill became law. Their energies would then be released to deal with plural voting, land reform, and education. She wished to say from her father—(applause)—that he hoped they would send a Liberal from Brixton at the next election to help and support him in this great task. (Applause.)—Graphic, Nov. 14.

Bernhardt's extreme slowness was at one time the jest of Paris. The French journalist, Henri Rochefort, who died recently, once wrote: "An empty cab drove up to the theatre, and Sarah Bernhardt alighted from it!"

The Sheep's Head Barber.

While working as an apprentice in his early days to a blacksmith at Paisley, that great captain of industry, Sir William Arrol, the famous engineer, who died a few years ago, augmented the pittance paid to him in a quaint and curious manner. North of Tweed the national dish, second only to haggis itself, is "singit sheep's head." Before the head is cooked it is necessary to singe off the wool carefully with a red-hot iron, and it is the privilege of the "barber," as the one who performs this function is termed, to enjoy the perquisites arising from it.

According to Sir Robert Bursley, who relates the incident in a memoir of Sir William Arrol published by Blackwood, the great engineer acquired the reputation of being an operator of "singular care and completeness," and the worthy people of Paisley were in the habit of securing his services for the operation.

As a result of his work as the sheep's head barber, Arrol was able to add 4 or 5 pennies to his weekly earnings, and with these he "was able to pay for stockings and braces and bonnets, and before all for lessons at night schools in reading, writing, and arithmetic"—lessons which laid the foundation of his wonderful and unique career.

But the future builder of those monuments of engineering skill, the Tay and Forth Bridges, to mention only two of the stupendous achievements of Arrol, also augmented his meagre earnings in those days as a member of the porridge pots and their apprentices. "In the old-fashioned Scottish cottage an iron hook, called a 'lum cheek' or 'gabbie hook,' is suspended from within the chimney over the fire. On this hangs the family porridge pot, and many a sixpence did our hero now earn as guardian and mender-in-chief of these homely but useful implements."

Death of Mme. Marchesi.

A very notable link with the past has been broken by the death of Mme. Mathilde Marchesi in London. She was the mother of Blanche Marchesi, the famous prima donna, and as professor of singing at the Vienna Conservatoire she trained countless celebrities, including Antoinette Sterling, Calve and Melba.

She knew the Mendelssohn family well, she was a pupil of Garcia, she had met Meyerbeer and could tell—on that composer's mother's authority—of his nervousness when, as a boy, he first met Beethoven.

Mme. Marchesi had, after studying in Paris, made a great name as a concert singer in England. She possessed a fine mezzo-soprano voice. She married in 1852, an exiled Sicilian nobleman, the Marquis Salvatore della Rajata de Castone, who was a baritone singer and had taken the stage name of Marchesi.

If a carpet covers the whole floor sprinkle pieces of damp paper round the sides of the room then sweep up with a carpet broom. The paper will gather the dust close to the edge of the mop board.
