Rosner's function was like that of the cheerful flunkey, who carries the state umbrella over Poo-Bah. He was always at the monarch's elbow, ever attentive and ready to interpret the slightest action or accident as a new vidence of the working out of divine right. Did the Kaiser pick violets? Rosner had it noted down. Nothing escaped his eagle look. Via the Crown Prince, frogs croaked their way into history. Everything that happened, and a lot that didn't, bore some august significance, proving anew the uncommon and immortal flame that was William the Second and Last.

Rosner tried hard, but his was a hopeless task. A first principle of advertising is that the goods must be on hand to back up the talk .-- Montreal Daily Star.
