One Ever Changing Universe

Among publications of long standing the practice of re-publishing items from their issues of the distant past is widely established. These items, if thoughtfully perused are an education in social history. The London "Observer," a weekly more than a century old, often reprints old news paragraphs that are remarkably suggestive of social change and contrast. Recently it published four extracts from its issue of October 2nd, 1825, which threw a searchlight on the past.

The most important of them was an account of the efforts which were being made one hundred years ago to combat the infant movement of Trade Unionism. It was a report of a meeting of Bradford and Halifax woolen manufacturers at which it was resolved to require the signature of all the men in their employment to an undertaking not to contribute to the support of members of a Union. The manufacturers also decided not to employ any workman who had not a written discharge from his late employer, certifying that he was not connected with a Union. Naturally these resolutions were met by counter resolutions from the wool-combers and weavers, who met and proclaimed that it was "no part of their duty to submit to such unprincipled oppression." They declared that they would not suffer themselves and their children "to remain in the abject and degraded condition of irrational animals" or "abandon that noble resolution of their ancestors that Britons never shall be slaves, either to foreign or domestic tyrants."

Clearly the "masters" never expected to see the day when Trade Unionism would become the basis of one of the most powerful political parties in Great Britain and when negotiation would take the place of suppression. Another item which illustrates the changes that have taken place in a hundred years, records that public whipping of a colored thief who had stolen some lead from a building in Fleet Street. He was whipped at the cart's tail in the presence of thousands of spectators for a considerable distance through London streets. Even then the humanitarian movement was making headway. Previous to the victim's being tied to the cart a white man appeared stripped his back, and offered to undergo punishment in place of the black. When refused he poured such a volume of abuse on the City Marshal that he was locked up.

The beginnings of the age of electricity were also apparent in 1825 for there is a note about a meeting held in the Exchange Committee Room, Manchester for the consideration of a proposal to establish telegraphic communication between Liverpool and London, via Manchester. This was a full decade before the invention of what we know as modern telegraphy, and the plan must have been based on earlier systems on which experiments had been in progress for fifty years. There is no record that the meeting reported in action of any kind.

The glimpses we get of the rise of labor organization, humanitarianism and electrical invention, are supplemented by a curious insight into the public attitude toward royalty in 1825. There is an account of a visit, in cognate, of the King of Prussia to Paris, and his appearance at the Italian Opera to hear a forgotten opera by Meyerbeer. The "Observer's" correspondent notes, as an extraordinary circumstance, that his attendants did not pay him "the obsequious and reverential attention generally shown to monarchs." As proof of this, it adds, "it may be mentioned that the playbill slipped twice from the front of the box, and His Majesty stooped down himself to pick it up."

Imagine any newspaper of to-day remarking it as extraordinary that any royal personage should himself recover an article he had dropped on so informal an occasion. But those were days when-such courtesy to the intelligent citizens still believed in the theory of divine rights.

Jewel Search in Whiskey Ship

A $60,000 WORTH SAID TO BE ABOARD.

Customs officers boarded and searched the schooner General Serret, which, after a series of adventures, had its cargo of whisky removed at London and is now lying near Greenwich awaiting sale, following the service of a writ of attachment. It is understood that the search, which proved fruitless, but will be continued to-day, was the result of information that jewels, said to be valued at $60,000, are concealed in the ship—the proceeds of a raid on a diamond merchant's premises in Antwerp, when the vessel was under other ownership than its last one. Before the ship last departed with its whisky cargo officers for a passage were: it is understood, made to the officers by a man who declared he wanted to sail at any price. The officers were declined. The officers, who at that time, were unaware of the theory that the jewels were on board, state that other persons subsequently offered to buy part of the fittings of the schooner, including her five masts.
