

Has Won
The Golden opinion of thousands of Japan tea drinkers.

SALADA
CEYLON TEA
(GREEN) is all pure tea leaves without any adulteration whatsoever. It is as far ahead of Japan tea as Salada black is ahead of all other black teas.

A STERLING HEART.

"It is membranous croup," he said, turning his despairing face to Shirley, and she saw that he was losing heart.

"Are you sure?" she said, in a low, startled tone.

"Yes, and I am afraid there is no hope."

The ominous words smote the tender heart of the girl like the keen edge of a knife, and for a moment she stood dumb and almost paralyzed at the thought that the beautiful boy must die.

Then a sudden idea flashed into her mind, and she lifted an eager look to Neil's white face.

"I have heard that a small silver tube is sometimes inserted in the windpipe and affords relief in such cases," she said.

"Yes, the operation is called 'tracheotomy.' Neil returned, with white trembling lips; but there is no surgeon nearer than Montreal whom I could trust to perform it, and Ray would be gone before we could get him."

A mighty sob choked his utterance, and Shirley's heart sank within her at the sight of his despair.

There was a moment of painful silence, broken only by the labored breathing of the little sufferer before them.

But all at once Shirley turned to her companion, a resolute, almost exalted expression on her white face.

"Then you must do it!" she said, authoritatively.

"Good heavens! I could not!" I should not dare," the young man cried, and reeling as if he had struck him a blow at the thought.

"But you have told me that you are a regularly educated physician and surgeon," Shirley returned.

"Yes."

"You have seen operations of this kind performed?"

"Often. I have even assisted in cases of this nature, but to take the responsibility of doing it alone—indeed, to take the life of my boy in my own hands!

The gesture which accompanied the exclamation told too plainly how dreadful the idea was to him.

"Lord, Wallace," said Shirley, impres-sionably, "it is poor Ray's only chance, and you must do it. There is no time to send for anyone else, so I entreat that you will not delay. I will stay by you—I will do anything that you tell me."

"You—could you?" he cried, almost awed by her calm, resolute manner.

"I will do it—I will do anything to help you save the life of this dear child. Oh, pray, pray, do not lose one precious moment," she pleaded, with intense earnestness.

Neil Wallace bowed his head and covered his face with his hands, wondering within himself if it would be possible for him to command his nerves sufficiently to follow this brave girl's suggestion.

He stood thus for a full minute, but, short as the time was, it seemed like hours to the anxious, waiting girl by his side.

"I will do it, and may God give me the strength," he said at last, and lifting a face so drawn and haggard that Shirley's heart ached for him.

Then he turned away from her and left her staring at his retreating back.

Shirley took her station by the bedside, to do what she could for the relief of the sinking child during his absence.

He had not been gone more than a minute when Lady Wallace glided into the room, looking pale and greatly distressed, some one having told her of Ray's alarming condition, and presently a number of servants came crowding about the door, actuated by mingled sympathy and curiosity.

It seemed to Shirley, as she stood there watching the labored breathing of the little one, that her own throat was slowly contracting until she soon must suffocate herself—that time never lagged so heavily—that his lordship would never return, and years afterward there were times when the memory of that dreadful moment would overcome her and render her weak as a child.

Neil's son came at last—he had been absent only five minutes by the clock.
The case of instruments in his hand, a look of high resolve on his pale, handsome face, his manner calm and self-contained.

He flashed a glance of disapproval upon the servants gathered about the door.
"Get down, all of you," he said authoritatively, yet not unkindly, and they at once obediently and quietly dispersed.

Neil turned to Shirley, and looking into her face, he said, "I am afraid it will be worse for you to remain here; pray go to your room, and I will send you word the moment there is the slightest relief or improvement."

"No, I shall stay here," the frail woman tremulously but resolutely answered. "I know that my nerves are not strong enough to enable me to be of any use, but I will not disturb you in the least. I will make myself as comfortable as I can, and I am sure that you will conclude, as she seated herself at the foot of the bed, and apparently realizing that he contemplated doing, although not a word regarding the operation had been spoken in her presence.

She looked more like a beautiful spirit than like a human being, in the spotless wrapper which she had donned to act as nurse to Madame Marton, and she scarcely seemed to breathe as she took her station at the foot of the bed, the young physician, and held the bottle while he administered the ether.

Then she watched a strange fascination seeming to compel her to do so, while Neil bared the white throat of his child, and with his glittering lancet made an incision above the thyroid gland, carefully dissecting down to the trachea with a firm and resolute hand.

Now came the most trying part of all.
For the bleeding must be stopped before he could proceed, and she was obliged to write the sponge again and again to cleanse it from the life-blood of the little one lying so white and helpless before her.

When the crimson tide was stayed, the young surgeon made another incision—a vertical one in the windpipe—and with rapid, skillful movements, removed a portion of two of its rings. Then he held out his hand to Shirley for the silver cannula, which he deftly inserted in the opening thus made, and the critical operation was over.

The result was almost magical, for the effects of the ether having begun to wear off, the child revived, and the stern, set look of his father was replaced by a breath of more ease.

MAPLE LEAFS VANQUISHED.

When our late lamented Uncle Peter Lohan made his carpet bag and set forth for the sunny slopes of the Pacific, he must have left behind him the horrible thought that he was leaving his hundred fans who witnessed the performance of the Maple Leafs last year. Not that luck had anything to do with Saturday's game, but the Maple Leafs, who Guelp, for it hadn't Manager Sipple staid away from the diamond with the determination to win, and win they did, after landing on the unfortunate shoulder of the Maple Leafs.

The Maple Leafs' first inning was a disappointment, for they failed to get any hits. The second inning was a disappointment, for they failed to get any hits. The third inning was a disappointment, for they failed to get
