"But," said Rich, with a sudden look of interest, "this will necessitate a little change in a certain document which I procured from the city clerk a short time ago-how very fortunate that this discovery was made before the tenth!" "True; it would make matters a trifle awkward, I confess," said Mr. Halstead,

The next morning that gentleman himself visited Bellevue Hospital and had an interview with Margaret Fox, recognizing her at once; and, questioning her further regarding her confession, he was fully satised with the truth of it and that he had indeed found his son.

CHAPTER XL.

Miss Waldemar, Rich and his father returned to Lynnell the third day after their arrival in New York, and they re-ceived a most cordial welcome from every member of the family.

All were glad to have the suspense ended, for they had experienced no small amount of curiosity concerning the important and mysterious business which had called Audrey so suddenly to New Her story, when she related it, created considerable excitement and surprise, while Rich was heartily congratulated upon the happiness which Margaret Fox's revelation had brought to him, and also upon his future brilliant prospects.

"I have felt from the first that there was good blood in his veins. It has always seemed to me that he could not have sprung from any ordinary source."

Mrs. Campbell remarked, when talking these things over miletly with Audrey Campbell remarked, when talking things over quietly with Audrey afterward.

"That has been my own feeling, too," returned Miss Waldemar, "but it seems very wonderful to me that Arthur's boy, of all others, should have been commit-

of all others, should have been committed to my care."

"The whole affair, from beginning to end, is the most romantic story I everheard of in real life, and," with an arch glance at Audrey, "I never saw such a change in anyone as there has been in Mr. Halstead since our first meeting."

Audrey blushed. She knew there had been a change in her also. Something of the beauty and hope of her early life had returned to her, as well as to him, and had shed a very different light upon their future, thus leaving its impress upon their faces.

Arthur Halstead was no longer the sad, self-repressed man he had been for twenty years and more. The shadows of disappointment and grief had all been swept out of his countenance, leaving it genial and beaming as in the days of his searly hopes, while there had come an genial and beaming as in the days of his early hopes; while there had come an energy and buoyancy into his manner that had long been foreign to it.

Audrey's lassitude and paleness all fled before the dawn of this new day, and she seemed to grow young with a beauty at which her friends all marveled. The score or more of years that had elapsed since her separation from her lover had touched her very lightly, despite the sorrow of which she had been ever conscious, and now, at forty-two, with the future still holding so much of hope for her she did not seem a day over thirty her she did not seem a day over thirty. "Mamma, I am not sure but that Miss Waldemar will make a lovelier bride than Annie," Grace Campbell remarked only a day or two before the wedding.

It had been decided that there should be two weddings instead of one.

Audrey told Arthur Halstead that she would become his wife whenever he pleased, and he was unwilling to wait for the fulfillment of his hannings, a day fulfillment of his happiness a day longer than was necessary; so it had been arranged that after Rich and Annie should have plighted the vows which would make them one, Mr. Halstead and Miss Waldemar should also me married, without any show or ostentation.

There was no reason why they should There was no reason why they should delay; it would save the labor and excitement of preparing for another wed-

Rich and Annie were to take a trip to the White Mountains and thence to Saratega, where they intended to spend a couple of weeks; so it would be a couple of their return. Meanwhile a couple of weeks; so it would be a month before their return. Meanwhile Mr. and Mrs. Halstead, senior, would repair directly to New York to await the home-coming of the young couple. The evening of the ninth arrived, and everything was in readiness for the all-important event of the morrow. Miss Starkey was tired but happy, for all things had moved along as smoothly as anyone could have any right to expect, and the old homestead was in pect, and the old homestead was in perfect order—swept and garnished from attic to cellar, no pains or expense having been spared to 'have things done up in shape." in shape."
"Audrey., my own," Arthur Halstead aid, as he parted from the beautiful woman who was to be his wife on the morrow, "I can hardly realize this great happiness, but it almost makes me for-get all those lost years of my life." She lifted her lovely face to him, and it seemed is if it shone with almost holy beauty.

"Do not let us call them lost years, Arthur," she said, "for I do not believe they have been, even though they have held so much of pain for both of us. You have faithfully fulfilled the duties which seemed to be laid upon you in such an unaccountable way, and no one can do that without having both heart and character ennobled and purified. While surely I cannot feel that the years were lost, which have brought so much of comfort to me, in watching and helping to forward the development of such a boy as Rich has been."

"No, indeed; the influence of your work no one can estimate," returned Arthur, almost reverently. beauty.

no one can estimate," returned Arthur, almost reverently.

"And the knowledge," continued Audrey, with a tender smile, "when it came to me, that Rich was your son—that, though we had been so strangely separated, I had been working for you all these years, was my crowning joy—my recompense—as I told you the other day. Oh no they have not been lost years. Oh, no, they have not been lost years, Arthur; they have only been a sort of sowing and growing time, and now we sowing and growing time, and now we are about to reap a beautiful harvest, and shall. I believe, realize and appreciate our happiness far more than we should have done if we had had everything our own way in those old days."
"Perhaps you are right, Audrey," Mr. Halstead said, gravely, yet the pain of the oast had been so great that he could not look back upon it even now without regret.

She glanced up at him wistfully.

"I have gradually grown to feel sure," she said, in a low, reverent tone, "that God's ways are always best. Someone has said that life is something like a carpet, Gazing upon the wrong side of it, it looks very much mixed; there is apparently no pattern or plan or harapparently no pattern, or plan, or har-monious blending of color. But the other side is perfect; and so, when we other side is perfect; and so, when we are permitted to gaze upon our lives from the other side, we shall see and understand just how the pattern has been growing into beauty of design and according to the plan of One who never makes a mistake. Arthur," she continued, gravely, "I am not going to look backward any more; all the past has been for a purpose, which will be revealed to us by and bye, and we have no longer anything to do with it. Our cup has been filled to the brim now—let us keep it full as we go along and not embitter its contents by vain regrets."

Arthur Halstead bent and touched the Arthur Halstead bent and touched the upturned brow with reverent lips, feeling almost as if she stood upon a higher plane than he, but believing that If perfect happiness could be attained in this world, he should experience it with Audrew Waldemar as his wife.

mr. Hamilton and Mrs. Allen, together with a few other friends, had come on from New York the previous day to do honor to the occasion, while Mr. Hamilton had been chosen to perform the ceremonics. Annie Noble made one of the loveliest brides that "e'er the sun shone on." Miss Waldemar and Grace Campbell had planned her dress to suit them-selves, after receiving a hint from Miss Starkey regarding the matter.

Starkey regarding the matter.

"I want things done right up to the mark," she had said, when the question of material and make had been under discussion. "It's not likely that George Washington and I will ever marry of anybody again, and I don't want any half-way work about this wedding. We half-way work about this wedding. We love the child with all our hearts, and she's going to have the best there is, as long as we can give it to her. So you fix her up as pretty as you can, and don't count the cost."

But Annie's wedding-dress was com-paratively simple, after all, for they de-cided that white tulle over white silk would be the most effective for her style of beauty; and the result proved that they were right, for when she stood arrayed in it on her bridal day she was simply perfect from the crown of her golden head to the tip of her white satin

ADVANCE GUARD TO BE SOLD FOR AN ENGLISH CAMPAIGN

New York, Oct. 29.-It is more than probable that Advance Guard, justly egarded by many as the best horse in the country, will pass into the posses-sion of the Messrs. Keene, who are anxious to add him to their stable, which will race on an extensive scale in England next season. Negotiations have so far progressed that Mr. James Carruthers has placed a price on the old horse, albeit he is loth to part with him. The price asked is $25,000, but the Messrs. Keene are not likely to let it stand in the way of securing an animal that will worthily carry the stable's

GAVE UP THE TASK.

New York, Oct. 29.-After another session today the National Board of Arbitration gave up the task for the time being of trying to settle the Western baseball war. The board adjourned to meet in Chicago, Nov. 15. Meantime a truce has been declared between the Western League and the American Association with regard to taking each other's players. Conferences have been going on all week with the American Association, represented by Presidents Brice, of Columbus, and Watkins, of Indianapolis, while M. H. Sexton, of Rock Island president of the Western League, and T. H. VanBrant, of St. Joseph, the financial man of the league, have looked out for the interests of their organizations. Acording to a member of the board the American Association people want the Western League to get out of both Kansas City and Milwaukee, VanBrunt to get a half-interest in the Kansas City team. The capacious dining-room of the City Hotel was last night the scene of one of the most enjoyable banquets ever held in this city. It was the first dinner of the London Rowing Club, and judging by the prevailing enthusihereafter, and will be eagerly antici-Nearly every member of the club was present last night, and all the speeches were of the happiest description. Each address contained some reference to the unprecedented prosperity of the club during the past year. Not since its organization had the club house and grounds been so well-patronized as Auring the past season, and never before had such a keen interest been manifested in all the departments rowing, bowling and tennis. Last night's dinner was a fit termination of a season of success. The toast list was in the hands of President James Mattinson, who, needless to say, fulfilled the duties of the post very gracefully. Secretary McDougall read letters of regreat from the following: Messrs. W. B. Pope, H. G. Hopkirk, T. Blakeney, W. E. Lawson, A. D. Huff and Henry S. Culver. "I hope and feel sure that all will go as well next year as it has during the past year," were the opening words of Mr. J. Harley Brown, in response to the toast in honor of "The Western Ontario Bowling Association." He outlined briefly the history of the organization, from its inauguration in 1896 by Col. Macbeth, up till the present To the colonel and to Mr. Edtime. mund Weld was largely due the credit for having brought the association to its present status. In 1896 there were 25 entries to the annual tourney, while in the past season 44 were received. The speaker asked, for the earnest cooperation of every member in the club's interests. If the same circumsances as marked last year prevailed the coming season it would prove a

The toast to the "London Rowing and Canoe Club" was responded to by Mr. Edmund Weld, who said that the organization was meeting with better encouragement than ever before, a fact, he believed, due largely to the af-filiation of that organization with the bowling club.

"Our Veteran Oarsmen," was responded to by Mr. E. Rechnitzer, a member of the club's crew, which won a victory at Rondeau. Speaking of their race with the Argonauts at recent regatta, he pointed out that the London crew had worked under a disadvantage in that struggle, owing to

Mr. Finchamp felt assured that the year just completed was the most successful since he had been a member, and that the club had experienced great growth in that time. Mr. Stevenson gave a few interesting reminiscences of the game, and said he was sure that this year's success had been the most gratifying.

Mr. Wm. Lind, who has been associated with the game of bowling for 44 years, and Mr. A. G. McWhinney, gave replies to the toast in honor of "Our Old Bowlers." Both were pleased to see the growth and success with which the club was meeting. Mr. John Bowman gave a brilliant

"The Man Behind the Gun" was the appropriate toast in honor of the club's caretaker, Mr. Richard Sparrowhawk. The "Has-Beens" was replied to by Messrs. C. M. R. Graham, J. B. Cox and Dr. English.

"Kindred Sports" received attention from Principal Merchant, of the Normal School, and Principal Radcuite, of the collegiate institute. 'The Ladies" was responded to by
