| The younger one is tall and fair, His bright eyes black as jet, And tight he draws his ragged coat To shield him from the wet. | And oh, what jolly fun we'll have, A supper fit for kings; And won't old Bob's eyes glisten bright To see the tempting things." |
| The other boy is taller still, | With hasty feet and whisp'ing tongues, |
| He may be twelve years old; | The hapless orphans ran |
| And, better clad, his well-worn suit | And thought how cleverly they'd robbed |
| Defies the rain and cold. | That unsuspecting man. |
| " Come, John I hope you are inclined | But we must turn to earlier times, |
| To do a job to-night; | When John was two years old; |
| The weather serves us to a 'T;' | And tell how soon his father died, |
| Nay, lad, don't look so white! | And slumber'd 'neath the mould. |
| "You can't expect that 'Jolly Bob' | How when a helpless orphan left, |
| Will keep us both in food, | The woman beat him sore; |
| Unless we take him something home, | And he was forc'd, at her command, |
| As thieves in honour should. | To beg from door to door. |
| "He's taught us all the tricks we know; | Until, by chance, he meets old Bob, |
| You're quite as quick as me; | A trainer of young thieves; |
| And why you fear to make a snap, | And gladly at this man's request, |
| I really cannot see." | His stepmother he leaves. |
| "Come, hère's a court will hide us both, | Five years have pass'd and now, inured |
| Should yonder gent suspect | To cheat, and swear, and lie, |
| We have an eye upon his purse, | He goes with Harry to the streets, |
| And all our schemes detect, | His dreadful skill to try. |
| "There's not a 'Peeler' now in sight, | But o'er the little outcast's path |
| So, Jack, let me go first; | A guardian angel flies; |
| And if I'm caught, then you run home | The form of her he never knew |
| And tell old Bob the worst." | Comes to him from the skies. |
| "Nay, Harry, stop!" exclaimed the lad | Oh! hath she pray'd in vain for him? |
| "Just list to what I say, | Shall sin assert its power? |
| Oh, cannot we give up this trade,— | Ah, no! she feels he will be saved, |
| Pay Bob another way?" | Though storm and tempest lower. |
| The other laugh'd and saunter'd on; | 'Tis night once more, and John goes forth |
| A man that moment pass'd, | Into the streets alone; |
| So quick he walk'd that not a glance | For Harry still is revelling |
| Upon the boys he cast. | In riches not his own. |
| But not so quick that Harry's trick | The stars look down upon the boy, |
| Was then perform'd in vain; | An angel form is nigh, |
| No!swift as thought the purse was caught | He dreams not that his mother sees |
| And carried up the lane. | Her darling from on high. |
| "Now stop!" cried Harry, when he found | A gentleman with hurried step |
| That they were not persued; | Advanced to John, and said:— |
| "Let's see how Fortune's favoured us, | "Pray, do you know some tidy house |
| I hope 'tis something good." | Where I can get a bed ?" |
| "Look, John, a golden sovereign! | "I'm weary now with travelling, |
| Two shillings, and a note! | And want a quiet home; |
| Bravo! this welcome sum will serve | Speak! can you show me what I want? |
| To keep us both aflost. | Or must I further ream?" |
