Madame advancing stepped on the door with as much spring as though she were making an afternoon call on some Park Lane acquaintance. It opened wide, and Cressingham stood amazed to see a hall more grand and splendid than that of any European palace he had ever visited.

ver I use a man when I intend to kill. Cressingham felt a shuddering coldness at his heart, but he answered with calm indifference: "Your Lordship is a man of great mind who is satisfied with the supreme. Meaner natures and lesser intellects seek to improve on the punishment of death, unable to realize or understand that what is absolute is best."

dropped with weariness or scorn. The perfect oval of the face cheeks was honeycombed with narrow wrinkles, and a million tiny crowfeet backed beneath the eyes. The shock like ears came upwards to a point like the ears of a bat.

VERY LARGE AUDIENCES

Were Stirred by the Addresses of E. Tennyson Smith

Drunkards Worth Saving—Using the Flag for a Brewer's Trade Mark—The Traffic is a Corrupting Influence—Address to Men.

Tennyson Smith is beyond question a man who grows upon his hearers. Perhaps in none of his other addresses last week was he so effective as in that of Saturday evening. He began by frankly declaring that he did not expect his hearers to entirely agree with his views and his methods in all things, and he only asked that if they discovered in the chair any grains of wheat—that his purpose to be misunderstood. He had come to St. John to arouse public sentiment, and he believed he had succeeded.

People were certainly talking and taking notice; and so was the press. He desired to pay a tribute to the press, they went on reporting his meetings fairly, and showed no disposition to criticize the temperance federation because of anything he said. For that and their fairness he liked them. The Telegraph had said a true thing when it observed that the temperance question was a great question, ever present, and Tennyson Smith was only an incident. After he had gone it would be for the people to continue the work and take advantage of the feeling aroused.

Dr. Smith then took up a statement of the once made by the London Times to the effect that drunkards were a worthless lot who could not in any case be made to amount to anything. With telling and realistic power the speaker delineated the struggle and later work of John B. Gough, one-time drunkard, who twice fell after signing the pledge, but who lived to thrill two continents by his eloquence. He cited other striking instances, to enforce the statement that in the ranks of the drunkards going down to death are many noble men, capable of magnificent work for humanity if divorced from the fatal habit of drinking to excess.

Dealing with his experience in the United States, he told of making the whisky traffic, and was thus a corrupting influence. Doubtless it was the same in Canada. He repeated what he had said at former meetings of the men in the United Kingdom, from members of parliament down, who owned shares in breweries, and how as a result of exposure many made haste to sell out. He regretted that he could not make similar exposures in St. John. In Newcastle, Pennsylvania, he had discovered a brewer's company that used the national flag as part of its trade mark. He got a large picture of it, showed it on the public platform and denounced the desecration of the flag, with the result that the people forced the company to call in the trade mark. While telling the story Mr. Smith unfolded the picture of the Stars and Stripes and beer case placed together, and his stirring words about reverence for the national emblem evoked great applause.

subject, yet every one of the miserable, abject, cowering slaves, negro, bleeding from a cruel scourge said: "I'm satisfied, my body, bone belongs to massa but my the Lord, belongs to the Lov."

Mr. Smith here spoke on the moderate drinking. "Many a y has been plunged into hell by ple of a church deacon." He then gave an almost terrific sensation of a drunkard in delirium, which had a powerful effect on the audience.
