that the finer feelings of the men are not blunted by daily contact with death. Three bodies of vic-tims of the enemy artillery lay on a mortuary truck, awaiting removed to the cemetery behind the lines. Each was wrapped up in his blanket which is the universal substitute at the front for winding sheet and coffin. A companion of the dead lade himself a woung fellow barely the front for winding sheet and coffin. A companion of the dead lads, himself a young fellow, barely out of his teens, had risen early and gone out into the wood of the swallows to find some flwers that he might lay on the breasts of his friends as a last tribute of affection. He returned carrying an armful of roses, wet with the dew of morn, and shedding their fragrance widely. It was a touch of poetic sentiment amid the grit and prose of war. Later, in the woods we came upon the place where the roses grew in great abundance. In a small clearing, girt about by German wire entaglements, lay the ruins of an isolated cottage. A shell had so smashed it that scarcely one brick remained unbroken. Around this head of war's desolation bloomed a rose garden that

Around this head of war's desolation bloomed a rose garden that must have been the pride of its owner.
