He refused to do so, and they were sent further east and to the town of Krasnoyarsk. A second refusal to take the osth of allegiance resulted in their being sent to Irkutak. By this time winter had set in, and they were traveling in an open tarantas with a delicate baby thirteen months of age. It was with the greatest difficulty that Mrs. Cherniavski could keep her baby warm, and at the last station before reaching Irkutsk site regioned the Besty wingings in which sile had enveloped it and found it dead. With the shock of this discovery she became delirious, and wept, sang pathetic little nursery songs to hed child ricked it in hegarms, and prayed and cursed took by turns. In the courty and of the Irkutsk forwarding prison, in a temperature of thirty degrees below zero, Mr. Cherniavski stood for half an hour wanting for the party to be formally received, with his dead child in his arms.
