Nitrates.

South America is the Chief Source of Supply.
 During the great war one often heard the alarming cry about the shortage of nitrates. What if we should be cut off from the nitrate fields of South America? was the question often raised.
 For the time being, we receive practically all of our nitrate supply from the great lake in Chili. Sodium nitrate, also called Chili saltpetre, is found in natural deposits in desert regions along the west coast of South America, especially near the boundary lines between Peru, Chili, and Bolivia. The territory is now chiefly owned by Chili. The deposits extend about 220 miles in length, and the average width about two miles.
 There is practically no rain in this nitrate district. Water and fuel are both very scarce; so much so, in fact, that they are employed as economically as possible in refining the crude ore. The sodium nitrate crystals are only partially pure when they are drained and dried in the sun, and then packed for shipment as crude nitrate.

The formation of the nitrate beds or lakes is attributed to the decomposition of sea plants under such conditions of temperature and humidity that the ammonia produced was converted into nitrate by the action of the nitrifying bacillus, an organism found in the soil. The region, being rainless, the sodium nitrate was not washed away.
 The chief use of this material is in making gunpowder and explosives, matches, fireworks, and in certain metallurgical and analytical operations. It is even employed for curing meat. It can be prepared into excellent chemical fertilizer. Still nearer home to most of us city folk, it can be used in making "laughing" gas, which is what the dentist gives his patient to put him to sleep preparatory to pulling out a troublesome tooth.

Oversees Pets.

The Red Cross worker at the information booth in the Grand Central Terminal thought she was familiar with almost every one of the new splints and surgical appliances, but the like of that worn by the yellow-haired boy she had never seen before. It seemed to be a sort of brown stone jar firmly fastened to his left side. As she showed him the way to the rest room—the boy was tired and had a long wait between trains—she speculated as to whether it might be a new-method Dakin-Carrall treatment for walking patients or a strange system of draining wounds. To her great surprise the boy, as soon as he reached the rest room, set the apparatus upon a table; it was attached to his side by only a closely guarding left arm. The Red Cross worker's curiosity got the better of her and she asked what in the world it was.
 "It's my gold fish," explained the boy, as if it were the most natural thing in the world. He took the cover off the jar and showed her. "A little French kid gave them to me when I was in hospital over there. I used to lie and watch 'em all the time. They were an awful lot of comfort to me. So I've kept 'em ever since I brought 'em back on the transport and I'm going to take 'em home and keep 'em always. They can stay like that shut up for five hours if they have to, but I guess they'll be glad of a little air." He set the cover on the table and settled back comfortably into a big chair to wait for his train.

Strange Recruits.

A non-commissioned officer was reading the names of a number of recruits.
 "Your name!" he snapped to the first.
 "Fox."
 "Next!"
 "Bear," was the reply.
 The sergeant sniffed and glanced at the third.
 "Wolf," said the recruit; and his interrogator gave him a sharp look.
 "And what do you call yourself?" he asked a tall youth.
 "Lion," the recruit responded; whereat the non-com threw down his pen and shouted with good-natured laughter.
 "Go and order some cages to be built!" he roared to a private. "We've been recruiting from a menagerie!"
 Every Saturday evening after 7 o'clock, Choice Ends of Beef, Mutton, Lamb, Pork will be sold at cost. ELLIS & CO., LTD., 203 Water Street.—nov29.
