Losdon, April 8.—Sir Henry Isaacs, formerly Lord Mayor of London, Mr. Horatio Bottomley, Joseph Isaacs and Mr. Charles Doliman were to-day committed for trial on the charge of having conspired to defraud the Hassard Publishing Union, Limited, of upwards of 30,000. The defendants were substantially charged with lawing bought properties on the Hansard Union's behalf, and then charged the Union's delay of the Treasury counsel, alleging that they cleared £160,000 on one deal, and £30,000 on another. Sir Henry Isaacs was Lord Mayor at the time when he permitted his name to be used in floating these and several other companies, and he was severely censured by the London press at the time for using his official dignity in the promotion of financial schemes.

Melbourne, April 7.—A verdict of will; full murder has been found against Deem ing. The verdict, however, does not seem to affect him in the least, and he is in turn jocular and insolent.

The London Globe says a dressmaker living in the east end of London has recognized a portrait of Deeming as that of the man who courted her under the name of Lawson in the autumn of 1888. She states that they were walking together on the night of Sept. 20, and parted from each other at 11 oclock. Tho following morning the shockingly mutilated bodies of the women, Strider and Eddows, were found in the Whitechapel district. The dressmaker says she met Deeming, and parted from each other at 11 oclock. The foresmaker says she met Deeming, and parted from each other at 11 oclock. The foresmaker says she met Deeming, and parted from each other at 11 oclock. The dressmaker says she met Deeming as uggestion contained in a newspaper that the murders of the night before were committed shortly siter middight. Deeming seemed to forget to whom he was talking, and said to the girl: "Look at the time. The proposal to the ground dead. The proposal o seemed to forget to whom he was talking, and said to the girl: "Look at the time. I could not have committed the murders." The girl was very much struck by this uncalled for remark, and she has often since thought of it. Throughout the afternoon Deeming was very much situated, and eagerly read the newspaper comments on the crimes. A few days later he vanished, and the girl never saw thin again. Though the remark, inadvertently dropped by Deeming, and his subsequent actions, aroused a suspicion in the girl's mind that Deeming was perhaps the murderer, yet she did not until now communicate her suspicions to the police. The Globe says the police have been unable to trace Deeming's exact whereabouts at the time these murders were committed in Whitechapel. It is thought that with the cine furnished them by the girl some startling developments may be looked for, and that the Whitechapel mysteries may at last be so veid.

Buckley, Hawkins, Conacher and Maclure, the last named being a member of the House for the named being a member of the House for the northeast division of Lancashire, and all of whom are directors of the Cambrain Railway, appeared at the bar of the House to-day to answer a summons charging them with censuring one of the railway employes who had testified before a parliamentary commission inquiring into the hours imposed upon railway servants in such a manner as tended to intimidate other railway employes from testifying in such a manner as tended to intimidate other railway employes from testifying freely and fully upon the matter the commission is inquiring into. The commission made a special report of the fact in this case, and the four gentlemen above named were summoned by the House to appear and explain their action. They all concurred in expressing regret for their tanguage in censuring Hood (the employe referred to) and declared that their offense was unintentional. The House was crowdwas unintentional. The House was crowded, as were also the galleries, with persons who were attracted by the debate on this question. The rarity of privilege cases invested the proceedings with a special interest. The last case of the kind occurred in 1879, when Ward was sent to Newgate for 14 days and Gussell for 21 days after asserting that they could bribe a decision from a House-committee on a private bill. To-night so large was the muster that many members had difficulty to find seats. The public galleries were crammed, while in the peer's gallery were Lords Spencer, Limerick, Wharneliffe, Windsor, Thring and 30 others.

Director Maclure being a member of the House of Commons made his apology from the floor of the House. The other directors stood outside the bar which was placed across the gang way.

stood outside the bar which was placed across the gang way.

The debate assumed a partisan color when Sir George Trevelyan, Liberal, succeeding Mr. O'Connor, accused the railway directors of trying to suppress evidence in favor of men by dismissing Hood.

Mr. Milvain (Con.) denounced Sir George for trying to mislead the House.

Mr. Gettenhorn Hardy (Con.) charged Sir George with trying to influence the report of the committee on hours of railway men.

port of the committee on hours of railway men.

Then a number of members simultaneously tried to catch the Speaker's eye and the House was becoming highly excited, when of a sudden it was stilled by the rising of Mr. Gladstone. He suggested that the House would go beyond its functions if it forced the railway directors to compensate a man whom they had dismissed from the service, but it was the absolute duty of the House, he continued, to sus-sate a man whom they had dismissed from the service, but it was the absolute duty of the House, he continued, to sustain perfect freedom of witnesses appearing before committees. It had been the eustom in cases of breaches of privilege to act with mildness and yet with firmness, an apolegy having been made for a wrong done. The House had generally accepted the apolegy, and had also admonished those who intringed a privilege. Mr. B Gladstone recaled the reprimand administered to O'Connell, who refused to make an apolegy. He did not think that the House could act more wisely than to adopt the recommendations of Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, who had moved that the directors be summoned to the bar of the House, and to simply admonish the offenders, declaring that it was not a case in which punishment should be inflicted. Mr. Gladstone spoke for fifteen minutes, and on every point was cheered by the Ministerialists. Ministerialists

Mr. Cremer (Radical) next suggested that Mr. Gremer (Radica) next suggested that the railway directors pay Hood £1,000.

Mr. Fenwick proposed to adjourn the debate with the view of allowing the directors to compensate Hood.

Mr. Balfour, the Government leader, urged the members to take Mr. Gladstone's advice.

[Special to the ADVERTISER.]
TORONTO, April 7.—The Law Committee this morning made an important change in Mr. Balfour's bill to provide for the admission of women to the study of law. The bill made it compulsory upon the Law Society to admit women to equal privileges with men, but the amended bill provides that the Law Society may make rules to permit women to practice as solicitors. The committee was opposed to women practicing as barristers.
