

in the direction of the actwork security paradigm with all of the subsequent ramifications that flow from it as other areas of politics and society. Those who embrace either the national or state collective images will face a reach unbill bentle.

Lastly, this clash of values implies that there is no simple formula for determining whether and in what ways not interned is a "security threat" because the latter is contingent on the perspectives of several competing paradigms each of which perceives the laternet. Canada, global communications, and world order from different perspectives. Ultimately, such a deterritination reaches well beyond the technical and political featers surrounding the internet to the question of the nature of the Canadian.

DOCS
CA1 EA751 98S23 ENG
Deibert, Ronald J
Security in the internet environment: issues for Canadian foreign policy. A report 17192410