

An Amalgamation of Nations

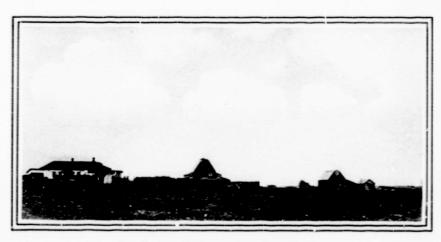

FROM APRIL first, nineteen hundred and ten, to February twenty-eighth, nineteen hundred and eleven, two hundred and seventy-one thousand three hundred and ninety-two persons were admitted into Canada. Of these the decided majority immediately settled on lands. More than a quarter of a million as clean cut men, women and children as ever were admitted to any country save none.

And Mirror is the very hub of an agricultural country, thickly settled by the best United States, the British Isles and the north of Europe can send to any country.

As an investor, as a merchant, as a home-builder, it means much to you to be surrounded by such a community. If you question this, permit us to give you the names of investors, merchants and home-builders who came to Canada a few years ago with practically nothing, and have gained their independence through the financial success of the Canadian farmer.

But is it necessary to remind any intelligent person today that a nation's true greatness lies in her agricultural pursuits? We think not.

So Mirror has not only the backing of a transcontinental railway and the backing of a summer resort; she has also the backing of her farms. The three—railway, lake, farms—form a combination which cannot be beaten.
