From groves of crimson, gold and brown, To fade 'neath the dreary snow, We each must go.
To toil and battle, and bravely stem
Life's ebb and flow. For every heart of love and song,
Must know some shadow of pain or wrong,
And each must be shrouded in death ere long,

And lie 'neath the shifting snow. But a better home and a better life We all may know, In a land where the cruel, cankering thorn Will never grow; Where the palm grove bears an unfading crow Fairer than crimson, or gold, or brown, Where faint and weary we lie not down.
