

at home, old boy?
"God bless them—one and all!" I responded.

"Amen!" he said, shutting his eyes and nestling his face into the hollow of my hand as it lay on the pillow.

"I thought he was asleep; until, presently, he said in a low hesitating voice,

"Must I be carried to the skies on flowery beds of ease, While others—
"There his voice gave out. He never spoke again.

"I got a new tin pan from a sutler, ripped it apart and then beat it flat. With my jack-knife I cut the figure of a cross on it, and under that, 'PAUL CARRINGTON, AGED 16,' and nailed it on the pine coffin.

"Two years afterwards, James, David and I came North for the body. We opened eight or ten graves before we found the tin strip. But for that, there would have been no use of searching.

"The burying-ground at Locust Hill is out of sight of the dwelling-house. It's a pretty place, with a brick wall round it, and inside of that a row of weeping-willows. We drove there, the moonlight night we got back, for Mr. Carrington had a grave ready, and was waiting for us.

"When we had covered the boy with his native soil, and turfed it over, we went to the house, and found the mother sitting on the front porch. In a husky voice Mr. Carrington told what we had done, and that her soldier boy was at home once more.

"She didn't say a word until he sat down by her. Then she put her arms about his neck, laid her face on his shoulder, and sobbed as if her heart would break. All we heard her say was, 'It is well. God's will be done!'

"Such wounds are slow in healing, sir; and so, as I was saying, it isn't well to open them afresh, unless it may be to recall some noble deed, or some views of character that quicken human sympathy, and open the heart to tenderness and love."

MARION HARLAND.
RIGHT.

The greatest of Christian moralists teaches that no man should give exclusive attention to his own interests, but that every man ought to promote the welfare of the many. The precept lies itself directly across one's natural selfishness and the stings of competition. To obey it, one must be possessed by a love which both excels and impels. An anecdote illustrates that he who is swayed by such an affection can obey St. Paul's precept.

An Ohio farmer recently died, leaving eleven children and a tract of land valued at ten thousand dollars. Before his death, he bequeathed to one of his sons forty acres and leased to him all the rest for thirty-two years.

After the funeral, the ten children, discovering that they must wait a long time before they could share in their father's estate, consulted a lawyer. Instead of advising them to begin a legal contest, which might be both expensive and tedious, he suggested that they should confer with the lucky brother.

The advice was heeded. The lawyer, his clients and the brother met to talk matters over. They had not conversed long before the lawyer and his clients were surprised. The brother produced the lease and tore it to shreds.

"I will take the forty acres deeded to me years ago," he said, "and you may divide the rest of the land among yourselves."

When the excitement caused by the unexpectedness as well as the generosity of the act had subsided, the lawyer took the brother aside and asked for an explanation.

"I am a Christian," said this brother, in deed, as well as in blood, "and I could not endure the thought of leaving my brothers and sisters with no share in our father's estate."

Love had expelled the selfishness which would grasp all, and had impelled the destruction of the lease.

The landlord of a village tavern stood at his door fondly gazing at his newly put up sign of the Golden Lamb, which specimen of zoology hung lazily over his door. "Good morning, friend Joshua," quoth a passing rustic, "what be you thinking of?" "I was thinking," said mine host, "as how the lamb is a picture of innocence." "Yes, friend Joshua, but that one of yours is a picture of guilt."

A man says his wife is only half like a telescope. He can draw her out, but he can't shut her up.
