It soon became known that a meeting had been called, and the passing of the carriage who proclaimed the appointment, caused a momentary-rush to the wildows. About half past 7 being told that the walls were chalked with amouncoments that a meeting had deep counters, and warranted to be unsurpassed by any, be sold at prices to suit the times. All the type furnished by us is "hand cast." de Mars, the writer left the house with a friend and proceeded to that place. At the Champ de Mars a large number of persons were assembled. The bank and stone steps going up to the guard-house were crowded with persons, who proceed with persons, who pressed towards the front, and bore torches; but below, the muster did not appear so great as the ground they occupied seemed to indicate. They were for the most part standing in groups, at some little distance apart, and it was ro-marked that a great number of females accompanied the men who were present. At the moment the writer reached the ground, some persons appeared to be proposing a list of names, for a committee, but the lights were extinguished immediately, and snoth were extinguished immediately, and snoth er voice addressed the Assembly. There was then a cry of "to the Parliament House." The writer immediately proceed-ed thither, and in consequence of the time necessary to enable the procession to form, sont. fore the crowd. The doors were at that time locked, but making use of the privilege

Mr. Murray, of the Montreal effice, had striven inefficiently to get them to work. The whole was blowing a smart breeze, and the whole of the extensive building, in which there was a very large quantity of wood-work, was soon in finnes from end to end, so that it was impossible to approach the irront.
