HELEN MOIR

Love and Honour.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE.

CHAPTER II.

TWO EVIL SPIRITS IN COMMUNION.

Jasper Jaquin lay peering out upon them from under his leafy coverlet, and so much was his attention directed towards their movements that he ceased to keep his eye on the road behind, till the sound of a footstep came to his ear, when, looking hastily round, he saw Victor Dubouque not many yards off, his dark face scowling with passion and hate, and his gaze fixed on the pair across the water. He, too, had recognized them, and the rage within his bosom was manifesting itself untrammelled, and all the more openly and violently that he knew not anyone was near to observe him.

He never noticed Jaquin under the bushes, though he crept within the covert, and throwing himself on the ground, lay glaring at Hermann and Helen like a wild beast watching its prey.

So near was he to Jaquin that the latter, by stretching forth his arm, could lay his hand on his shoulder. He was, however, able to observe him minutely, and saw his firm compressed lips twitching violently, saw his hands clench till it seemed as if the nails would penetrate the flesh, saw his bosom heave and fall with spasmodic rapidity, and heard his teeth come hissing forth with fitful audibility.

Oh, curses on the chance that made my work fall the other night! he muttered, with husky hoarseness. But for the help that came to them, my triumph and revenge had been complete. Yet they live still—live to mock and baffle me. Ere long, if I cannot circumvent them, I shall see her the wife of that German swine, and be powerless to avenge the humiliation. Oh, my dearest wish is to crush them both. If I am not to possess her, I would keep her from him at any cost, any risk, any—

He stopped his muttering with a violent start, for just then a hand was laid on his shoulder, and turning suddenly round, he saw the hideous form of the hunchback crouch beside him, and his ghastly face leering into his own.

You love her—I thought so, said Jaquin, with a nod and a glance at the other side of the loch.

What do you mean by this? exclaimed Dubouque, springing half up, and regarding the hunchback with an angry, threatening gesture. How dare you crawl behind me, and listen and watch as you have been doing?

Because I am your friend, and would help you, was the answer.

How am I to believe that? I don't know you—you don't know me, yet you have played the snavedropper, and the spy, and by this means you have gained a knowledge which to me is dangerous. Have you counted the risk you run?

No, because I run no risk. I am your friend I tell you—I told you so in the steamboat, and would now prove so.

Give me the proof, then, for I cannot part with you, when I know I am in your power, without being assured that the power will not be against me.

I will give you the proof. Did I betray you, or denounce you, at Kilman the other night?

No. I saw you though no other person did—I saw you looking at them over the churchyard wall; I saw you lying by the water side when they took to the boat, and I heard your words there.

You heard my words? Yes; and by what followed I knew you had scuttled the boat.

By heavens, but your knowledge of my affairs may cost you dear, said Dubouque, his countenance livid with fear and wrath. Think you I shall leave you free to go to and fro with a secret that, if known, would ruin me. By all the fiends, this shall not be. You must satisfy me beyond all doubt that I have nothing to fear from you, or—
