THE SCRAP BAG

Mr. Richard Harding Davis, in a recent article on a certain set in Paris, has an anecdote to relate of a young man which would go to prove that the age of chivalry is with us yet. He says: "I met an American art student, who told me with much satisfaction of how he had made himself intensely disagreeable at a dinner party given by one of these expatriated Americans. 'I didn't mind their taking away the character of every married woman they knew,' he said; 'they were their own friends, not mine; but I did object when they began on the young girls, for that is something we haven't learned at home yet. And finally they got to Miss and I, and I don't see that it would have made any difference.' At which it seems my young man banged the table with his fist and said: 'I'll marry her, if she'll have me, and I know twenty more men at home who would be glad of the chance. We've all asked her once, and we're willing to ask her again.'"

"There was an uncomfortable pause, and the young woman who had spoken protested that she had not meant it so seriously. She had only meant that the girl was a trifle passe and travel-worn. But when the women had left the table, one of the men laughed, and said:

"You are quite like the breeze from the pine woods at home. I suppose we do talk rather thoughtlessly over here, but then none of us take what we say of each other as absolute truth."

"It's a great pity," said the convicted burglar to his lawyer, "that you couldn't have made that closing speech of yours at the opening of the trial. I don't see that it would have made any difference."

"It would, though. Then the jury would have been asleep when the evidence came in and I'd have stood some show."—Chicago Tribune.

Perhaps the most difficult side of one's nature to provide for adequately is the social side. It is easy enough to make a hermit of one's self and go nowhere; and it is easy enough to let one's self be sucked into the vortex of endless social recreation until one's sensations become akin to those of a highly-varnished humming-top. I am not quite sure which is the greater evil, but I am inclined to believe that the hermit, especially if he is self-righteous, is more detestable in that he is less altruistic. He may be a more superior person than the gaily-dressed social butterfly, but he is no longer a social butterfly purely for the benefit of self.

Every man and woman who seeks to play an intelligent part in the world ought to manage to come out and attend to her social functions every now and then, even if it is necessary to bid for invitations.—Robert Grant, in the June Scribner.

There is a decided verve and chic about the girl of the period quite different from her sisters of former years, and it is not all due to heaps of finery, to crimps and curls or to artificial aids of any sort. This season's girl is entirely unversed in the arts of the brush or the use of rouge, relying on her own sweetness and clearness of skin to make her attractive, and never touching a curling iron to her locks, depending on the beautiful gloss and satiny smoothness to make her beautiful.

Professor Max Muller, of Zurich University, states forcibly his favorable opinion of the higher education of women. The renowned scholar said lately to an interviewer in Oxford, Eng.: "Formerly, I was a bitter opponent of the higher education of women; but I am now converted, and regard it as one of the greatest achievements of our age. It is an actual pleasure to see the young women at their studies. Young men work as little as possible; young women as much as possible; yes, most of them even to death. Besides, their method of studying is more systematic, and what they accomplish is, therefore, more thorough. I wish the young men would reflect upon this, and learn from the young women how to learn."—Woman's Journal.

A small boy was at a table where his mother was not near to take care of him, and a lady next to him volunteered her services. "Let me cut your steak for you," she said. "If I can cut it the way you like it," she added, with some degree of doubt. "Thank you," the boy responded, accepting her courtesy. "I shall like it the way you cut it, even if you do not cut it the way I like it."

A young woman in one of the departments in Washington has been fortunate enough to have acquired the delicate art of violet raising—perhaps because she regards all blossoms so tenderly—flowers, so runs the superstition, possessing a sort of sense whereby they know their friends and responding to their notice as to sun and showers. At any rate, this young Government clerk very materially, as well as sweetly, thus supplements her salary. She lives at home, and does the housework, and has a little piece of ground that can be devoted to hotbeds, an arrangement in which the poetic violet, under favoring circumstances, will flourish even as the prosaic radish, and whence this thrifty young person in violet time, daily before going to the office, is kept busy gardening her pretty purple crop. She intrusts it to an agent, who sends it to be scattered broadcast throughout the city, and its grower stoutly avers that many a time she recognizes her own particular violets in the bouquets of her sister and brother office-holders, since each blossom is in her eyes endowed with as distinct a personality as are the human flowers of a kindergarten in the eyes of their leader.—Jennens Miller's Magazine.

"On the coinage question," began the grocery statesman, "I stand square on the platform. 'It ain't standin' square is what is the matter with you, 'tilas,' interrupted his wife, having completed her trade of eggs for calico. 'It's standin' round is what is allin' you an' half these other fellers, that order be out plowin' instead of savin' the country with their mouths.'"

Walking on Broadway, the main fact which impresses one is that New York is essentially a city of shoppers—of shoppers, at that, in shirt waists. That the holders of fashion in gay Paris have decreed that none shall be worn, matters little to us. We have accepted and taken them unto ourselves with all their ugliness, but, oh! with all their comfort, too. For they alone solve for us the problem of how to keep cool on a hot day. The name "shirt waist" embraces a large variety of fancy waists, however. There are waists with blouse fronts,

BERUFFLED GRASSCLOTH.

Along with the Marie Antoinette flichs, some with box-plaits running down the front; some of silk, and some of lawn; some of muslin, and some of grasscloth, and so on through an endless variety, but all of them cool and comfortable. For cycling, boating and outing trips the genuine shirt waist appears to be the favorite. Checks of black and white, and red and white are much worn. The check should be about an eighth of an inch square. Pink and white is also very pretty. The other day I saw one worn with a soft pink silk to knotted close to the neck, which was very fetching. As a rule, however, dark ties seem to be preferred. An innovation in ties is one which is very broad and extends in all the width of its two ends, to the waist line.

Grass cloth is cool-looking material for a waist, and, in fact, for an entire gown. It is the old-fashioned linen gown evolved, but how much daintier than of yore! It is gauzy in appearance, and may be made up over a corset.

Such a bodice is the one pictured. It has a slightly full bodice, while the front is trimmed with three box-plaits. These are trimmed with ecru lace. A black velvet band at the neck, and another at the belt give the needed character.

Odds and Ends.

A collet of white chiffon, or of mauve, pink or black is the daintiest for the shoulders. It is too light to give heat, and is merely added to summer toilets because it is becoming and gives stylish breadth. It takes the place of the lace capes of long ago, and suggests a wrap on occasions when a wrap is considered the correct thing, no matter how warm the weather may be. The white collet has two finely crimped pleatings of chiffon hanging from a shallow yoke of white tulle covered with puffs of yellow. A drapery of wide lace of very yellow tint is across the front, while the back has an immense bow and ends of white tulle ribbon. Around the neck is a full ruche of crimped chiffon. A mauve collet is of accordion-pleated chiffon, with the pleating worked effectively. A black chiffon collet, mounted on yellow silk, will be liked for certain. These are more practical and useful apes are black throughout, that they may accompany dresses of any color. For these the yoke is of black jet spangles as large as sequins, mounted closely to cover the entire fabric, which is of chiffon resting smoothly on a foundation of satin. Below are two pleated flounces of chiffon and full ruche about the neck.

Modists make very elegant collets slightly heavier than those just noted, of black satin de sole lined with immaculate white satin, the lining being made still more exquisite by a border of crimped white chiffon. The trimming enriching the outside is of jet spangles put on in large flowerlike clusters representing mammoth pansies or daisies in shape, every spangle sewed on by the hand of painstaking needle-woman. These trimmings are confined to the yoke-like top of the cape, which is circular, and forms voluminous folds around the shoulders. By way of variety these capes are completed by very fine black net instead of chiffon, used in one or two knife-pleated ruffles over the point de sole, and a ruche of the same about the neck.

Very gay Scotch plaid ribbons, in which the French seem to delight, are used as well as in winter, are made to trim these light linen frocks. The Stuart plaid, one of the gayest red tartans, is used by Paquin on ecru batiste gowns with a yoke of linen passementerie lined throughout with red taffeta. It forms a wide belt, with a bow at the back of projecting loops, four in a row, with out ends. The ribbon collar, while drawn back in easy folds in front, is made very large on each side, the last two extending far out beyond the neck to correspond with the loops that stick out back of the belt.

Manicuring, like massage, is one of the luxuries of the age, and although the prices asked by manicures are much less than when it first started in to be a fashionable fad, even now the pennies fly away very rapidly if a professional manicure is employed. There is no reason provided there is no disease of the nails to combat, or no deformity of the fingers, why every woman should not be able herself to keep her hands and nails in proper condition. The various implements, lotions, polishes, powders and acids used by the professionals are now for sale in all the shops, and after having the hands carefully manicured half a dozen times by a skillful manicure, the tricks of the trade are easily learned, and patience and perseverance will enable any woman with a fairly well shaped hand to make it almost beautiful. In these days an ill-kept hand and dirty nails are absolutely inexcusable, and the criticisms passed upon them are extremely harsh.

Daniel is still preaching, because he was not afraid of the Jews' den.
