What About the New Suits?

Olirror

The question has been answered in a very con-The fashion vincing manner by no less an authority than Mrs. Westermann, known as America's leading fashion artist. .

"Autumn, I welcome you. Now we can have some suits besides the irrepressible sport suit, which has been so irremovably a part of the summer landscape this entire summer. Perhaps I am a little severe, but one really does grow very tired of seeing so much of the same thing. And yet I am warned that there are to be quite a few new suits that show a marked sport influence. Let us pass them, however, and go to the more serious styles.

As a bombshell from the fashion front, the first news comes that "skirts are more or less narrow," and from what I have seen I should say that most of them are more narrow. However, they will not approach that degree of narrowness that will hamper the steps of the wearer.

Long coats are considered the smart thing, some even go to extremes in reaching barely within a few inches of the skirt hem; other jackets come just below the hips, and others are to the knees. In the longer models the coats sometimes fall in graceful points at the sides, and others are quite one-sided in their draping. The Russian influence is paramount, even the favored materials have a texture that would indicate that they were intended for cold weather. Broadcloths and velours are very delightful materials and much in favor this fall. There will always be greens and blues, but just now the smart shops are featuring plum as the leader, with taupe next. And, of course, fur must be spelled in capital letters as the trimming. There are collars and cuffs, and even belts, of fur, to say nothing of bountiful bands of fur. Jackets have an odd way of closing, most of them, that is, in the very smart suits, buttoning to the side; others almost give a surplice effect. Sometimes a fullness is introduced by shirring or pleating.

Serge and broadcloths are favored for the strictly tailored suits. A little touch of newness is found in one model that has vertical buttonholes.

Whatever style suit you select this fall you are sure to select a becoming one.
