for herself or should she share it with little brother? There was a certain risk in arousing brother. He was apt to awaken clamant, vociferous. Still, she resolved to try it. For one thing, it seemed so selfish to see Santa Claus alone, and for another the adventure would be a little less timorous taken together.

Slipping her feet into her bedroon slippers and covering her nightgown with a little blanket wrap she tiptoed ever to brother's bed. Fortunately he, too, was sleep ng lightly, and for a like reason. For a wonder she sucseeded in arousing him without any outcry on his part. He was instantly keenly, if quietly, alive to the situation and its fascinating possibilities

"You must be very quiet, John," she whispered, "but I think Santa Claus is down in the library. We'll go down and catch him."

Brother, as became the hardier male disdained further protection of his small but valiant person. Clad only in his pajamas and his slippers, he followed sster out the door and down the stairs. They went hand in hand, greatly excited by the desperate adventure

What proportion of the millions who dwelt in the great city were children of tender years only statisticians can say, but doubtless there were thousands of little hearts beating with anticipation as the hearts of these children beat, and perhaps there may have been others who were softly creeping downstairs to catch Santa Claus un awares at that moment.

One man at least was keenly conscious of one little soul which, with abcolutely nothing to warrant the exectation, nothing reusonable on which to base joyous apticipation, had gone to bed thinking of Santa Claus and hoping that, amid other equally deserving hundreds of thousands of ob-seurs children, this little mite in its rless garret might not be
