

Mr. King exhibited two seals in lead, dug up at the Thames Embankment in London; whilst bearing the date 1092, a figure of a knight on one side was clad in the plated armour of two centuries later. Mr. King presented one of the seals to the Society. He also exhibited several articles dug up at Chicoutimi, and presented a Moorish coin.

Mr. Chas. T. Hart exhibited two gold Persian coins of old and new issue, both in fine condition; also two undecipherable copper coins, supposed to be Syrian.

Mr. Murphy read a translation of a document referring to the old red cross which stands on the property of the Grey Nuns at the corner of Guy and Dorchester Streets. It appears that about the middle of the last century, immediately before the cession, a man named Belisle lived in a farm-house near the place where the cross now stands, and that Belisle having murdered a man and his wife, his near neighbours, he was executed for the crime in the market-place (the present Custom House Square). The execution was attended with extreme cruelty, the murderer being racked and broken on the scaffold, and his body was carried by the executioner and buried where the red cross now stands, near to the house occupied by his victims.

Mr. Holmes called attention to the question of accommodation for the meetings of the Society and its cabinet, and the inconvenience experienced for want of a proper room, and Mr. King having offered the use of a room in his house, it was resolved, "That the cabinet, books and all other possessions of the Society be removed to the room in Mr. King's house, so kindly offered, and that the thanks of the members be voted to Mr. King."

A conversation ensued on a suggestion of Mr. Horn's that the Society should hold a conversazione during the coming winter, with a view of interesting the public in the
