THE AWAKENING

9

I in cho was the oder ved iely was i he on igly vhothe ome stay k of 5 to e in.

This was very kind of her, because it was not reasonable that she could really care much—such a girl —for such a man, who had never been able to interest her, he felt. But she looked at him, looked up mistily with her dear eyes of smoke-blue. There was some message in them, behind a glaze of tears.

Drowned in those eyes, he heard himself stammering out things he had not thought that he would ever dare to say. "If you could marry me . . . I don' suppose you could . . . but if . . ."

H₋c answer did not come into the dream. Perhaps she had not answered. But he could see the igly man holding out his hands, and the girl putting her hands into them. He could see her looking up at him again, and in the beautiful eyes there was that message she wanted him to read. There, at that place, was the end of the dream-picture; it never went further, though he tried over and over to carry it on; the girl looking up, a tall slender shape in white, with the afternoon sun burnishing her hair, and giving to it the color of a copper beech tree under which she stood. He knew that he had thought,