

'do' execution?" "Success!" That's the word. It's success that counts in the great central metropolis of the Republic.

I have been asking myself the question: Which is the more comprehensive term? Which word means the most? Is it knowledge, or blood, or wealth, or success?" And I have rather come to the conclusion that that word "SUCCESS" is, to the average mind, the larger and more expressive phrase. It is the most musical word in the vocabulary of our Anglo-Saxon civilization. We roll it like a sweet morsel beneath the tongue. When you can affirm concerning a man, to-day, that "He is a success," you have said (to the average man) the biggest thing which can be said about him. As Josh Billings once said: "There's no use arguing 'agin' success." "There is nothing which succeeds like success." So be it.

If success is the main thing in life, it might be well for us to stop long enough to find out what this wonderful thing is. How many kinds of success are there? What is the highest interpretation of success? Which is the lowest? Does the possession of money constitute success? Is the man who flings his conscience overboard a success?—What is it to achieve a genuine success? In this discussion I present for your consideration four interpretations of success—

First, there is the dictionary definition of success. Every young man should own a dictionary. There is a wealth of knowledge in the meaning of words. No man can speak clearly who does not think clearly, and no man can think clearly who does not know the weight of a word. A word before
