He did not consider that the sum so engaged for came under the rule passed in Public Accounts Committee of 1872. He refused to give the names of the parties to whom the money was paid. He said, he thought that Mackenzie assented to the payment of the money, as he had put the case. Mr. Mackenzie did not either object or conkenzie did not either object or consent, save so far as mentioning the rule passed in committee might be considered as an objection. He said he spoke to Mr. Mackenzie because he did not want any "afterclaps," as he told him, on this question, and because one of his colleagues had been made personally liable for the amount.
