TEACHERS.

We all love our teachers. That's the reason we pay them so little. A labor of love, and for love is a noble thing and we should not debase those whom we love by offering too much filthy lucre. 11-5-11

We do not want our teachers to be stung by the money-bee. Nor are we entirely unselfish in this. If they were so stung they might communicate the infection to our spotless children, whom we would not make purse-proud for anything in the world except to show that they are better off than those of our neighbors. 11-5-11

Teachers should be glad to make both ends meet. Only thus can they set the divine example. If there is to be any wage-cut due to the industrial depression, it should be given at the bulk of our liberties, whether it be the little red school-house on the hill or the big, ill-situated, unsanitary education emporium in our cities. 11-5-11

Every reader of this paper becomes a possible "finder" of your lost article when you use one of the "lost" ads.

For a moment Bessie smiled at Jack, her heart in her eyes, and her brain yearning for the end of the cruel war. Then her attention to the wireless instrument became attracted again. An important message was coming in—a message from one wing of the Army of the Blue, which was about to be sent by the other wing of the same army.

"Attack city by east bridge at 10 o'clock. Repeat message."

"Know you receive and understand."

"Cartwright jumped to his feet excitedly as the message came in."

"Great heavens!" he cried. "That means the fall of the city! The east bridge is absolutely unprotected, but we did not know that the enemy knew it. Don't send that message, don't do it!"

Jack Cartwright, the prisoner, glanced brightly at his fair captor.

"Well, Bessie," he said, "you caught me fair and square, all right. I'm your prisoner of war; but I'm mighty glad that the cutting of the wires just as you captured me ended my service as a telegraph operator down there in the city where my army—the Army of the Red—lies besieged by your army—the Army of the Blue."

Bessie Warden, wireless operator in the scout alphas of the Army of the Blue, smiled from her key across to him. By her, ready to hand on the operating table, lay a big 45-caliber revolver. Near her side sat her old colored mammy holding a similar weapon in her hand, aimed at Cartwright. It was evident that, although Bessie loved Jack, she was not going to take any chances of his interrupting communication between the two wings of the Army of the Blue, which he could do by destroying the wireless apparatus Bessie operated.
