IMPROVED

OBLIQUE INGUINAL TRUSSES.

TERRERT respectfully informs Medical Gentle-M. It men and the public generally, that he manufactures and has now on hand IMPROVED ORLIQUE INGUINAL TRUSSES, a coording to the construction of T. P. Teale, Esqr., F. L. S., Surgeon to the Leeds General Informery, and which are so highly spoken of in the Medical Gravite, February 1, 1850. For the information of those who cannot refer to the above work, it may be statistically applied to the same of th rhose who cannot refer to the above work, it may be statel, that these Trouser consist of "an elastic stret girdle, a pad of varying form, according to kind of herafa, and aapiral apring acting directly on the pad; elements whichexisting in various trusses heretr-fore known, are hereconbined in the construction of one." The "mode of attachment between the apiral and the pad renders my other fantesting unnecessary. An uniform pressure throughout the whole extent of the pad is thus obtained; and the spirst, acting an a universal joint, allows the girdle to adapt itself
to the varying movements of the body without disturbing
the pad."

For Farmers.

Barn-Yard Manure.

It is known to every experienced farmer, that whoever pursues the plan of constant cropping without manuring, will as certainly exhaust the fertility of his land, as that man will empty his purse who continues to remove the coin therefrom without replacing any. I knew a man living in a community of good farmers, who, by way of saving labour, hauled his manure into his fields, leaving it in heaps, and when it was sufficiently dry, burnt it and spread the ashes. He very soon "farmed out." A certain extensive district in Virginia once produced excellent crops of tobacco and grain, but the farmers (?) thinking men crazy who used manures, they burnt their straw as the most economical method of disposing of it. The land of that same district is now, in common phrase of that country, " so poor that it will not sprout black-eyed peas." Every farmer should have a permanent threshing floor, (better a good " Dutch barn,") with a manure yard in front, and so secured by a wall as to prevent the escape of juice, and without any low place where much water will collect and remain, as that would prevent rotting. When the small grain is threshed, the straw should be thrown into the yard (or stacked in it) where there should be kept as many cattle as the roughness" of the farm will winter. All the corn raised should, when about half the leaves are turned yellow, be cut off at the roots and nicely shocked, each shock containing fifty or sixty hills, and secured by tying a band half way between the ears and tops-this will generally prevent them from falling. When the corn is husked, or shucked .- the husks, or shucks, being left fast to the stalk—the stocks should be tied into bundles, each with a double band of rve straw, (broom corn will do.) and set up in shocks till done husking. Then they should be hauled to the barn and stored in the dry, or stacked in long stacks like wheat. In feeding, the bundles should be pulled from the end of the stack, which is easily done when the stack is once broken.-Fodder kept in this way rarely spoils from wet. An acre of good corn will yield two hundred such bundles, of which one and a half or two per day, will keep a steer in good order during winter. The quantity of excellent manure that may

With regard to the time of putting manure on land, I would say that after harvest is best, as it is then better rotted. If put on before harvest, it should either be left in heaps or turned under immediately. In no case should manure be allowed to lie spread on the top of the ground -The same amount of materials, well rotted and turned under directly after spreading, will proluce 50 per cent. more wheat than when imperfeetly rotted, and left spread on the top of the ground for two months. ARGICOLA.
