sense. I tell you sir, to-day that the Allies are all doing their part. All are in perfect sympathy with one another. England and France are closer now than they have ever been before. France has learned much from England. We are a Latin race, given to the impulse of that race, but from England we have learned to become a practical people, and that has been a great help to us in facing this war. That has to us in facing this war. That has helped us to be steady and firm.

"And after the war this friendship, this feeling of brotherhood, between England and France will continue A new bond has been continue. A new bond has been ormed between the two nations. "Does this mean a trade agree nent?" I asked. "Germany always has been saying that Great Britain dominated the seas and Germany has been insisting upon the liberties of the seas, what are the liberties of the seas." What are the inpertes of the war were German ships before the war were free to enter the ports of England, the ports of France, the ports of Russia, the ports of Italy and Spain and all the countries. The Englist people have even built railways down to the wharves of the German eamers to facilitate the unloa of those steamers. The great German steamship lines have sent their cargoes to all parts of the world They have taken freight from England and her colonies and from other countries and they have chargother countries and they have charged what rates pleased them. How, then has England dominated the seas? How has the liberty of the seas been denied to Germany or to any other nation? Germany has brought what goods she pleased to England free from revenues at the ports of entries with a few exceptions and even in those exceptions ions, and even in those exce the charge has been very light. Ger many was treated as all other na-tions were treated.

"Well, now, suppose that in the future it should be this way: A tax on all German goods entering England and France and other countries of the Allies, this tax to continue until the total amount reaches the total amount of the damage Germany has done in this war."

"That sounds like a novel method of demanding an indemnity," I suggested
