

THREE GREAT BRITISH SPEECHES

C. F. G. Masterman, M.P., Discusses Problem of Unemployed—Can be Solved Without Revolution—John Dillon Says Irish Party Has Notable Career—Rev. Campbell, Pastor of London City Temple, on Socialism—Says it Will Solve Modern Problem.

MASTERMAN ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Brilliant Young Liberal Discusses Problem—Can be Solved Without a Revolution.

Mr. C. F. G. Masterman, M.P., parliamentary secretary to the British Local Government Board, addressed a gathering of members of the Manchester '36 Club recently on the problem of the unemployed.

Mr. Masterman said it was not the calamities of the opposition nor the random violence of extremists nor the adverse results of various by-elections that troubled him at the present time.

One Phase of the Problem. During the last few years, partly out of parliament and partly in parliament, I have been facing what we call the problem of the unemployed, or one phase of it—the problem of a variable but not excessive number of persons who in a time of superabundance of activity, which exports and imports unparalleled in the history of the country, are still for some reason unemployed.

Today we are face to face with a problem different not only in degree but in kind. We are faced with what is indeed a new and more serious problem, that is, a problem of a variable but not excessive number of persons who in a time of superabundance of activity, which exports and imports unparalleled in the history of the country, are still for some reason unemployed.

Two Lines of Approach. Any ultimate I hesitate to say solution of this great problem—of which we may make must be along two lines—treatment of those particularly unfortunate people who, when trade is prosperous and every factory is employed at full time, are yet left outside the ordinary workings of the economy.

Mr. Masterman pointed out that there was no question of a "social class" when the government came into office the trade boom was on a course and was adopted as a policy—having no particular interest in supporting the government in this matter—entirely believed in this right course. The government intended to give an exhaustive consideration to the whole matter when the result of certain experiments and the inquiries of the royal commission appointed to investigate the condition of unemployment and the condition of the poor law were ascertained.

To Bridge the Gulf. There is the question of the one hand of these experiments, but apparently regular, periodic variations in the demand for commodities, and, therefore in the demand for labor, in

CONNECTION WITH THESE COMMODITIES

The problem before us there is the question of what kind of a bridge we can provide over the gulf which separates us regularly at the conclusion of a certain number of years. It is beyond the power or intelligence of the community as a whole to create the possibilities and resources of the material wealth of the country, to devise some scheme of insurance, or some method of private work which, though in the nature of relief work, is work which will be better for the country as a whole than enforced idleness, by which at least a considerable proportion of men who will be some day wanted back again in their own trades may be preserved in physical efficiency and self-respect over the intervening period.

I shall want to see called in—and I feel sure the government will want to see called in—for the consideration of such a large problem all those men of whatever party who regard this as a problem of serious social concern, and not simply a problem to be dealt with by the ordinary machinery of party politics.

Problem of the Unemployed.

I will ask another question. Given a bridge across the gulf created by periodic declines in trade, what are you going to do with those people who, when the factories are working day and night, are still protesting that they belong to the army of the unemployed? Well, there are two direct methods which offer possibilities of least experiment. We may diminish economic friction in the industry by imposing a minimum to be imposed upon the time that an employer is demanding labor on the one hand and a laborer is demanding employment on the other.

It may not be possible to open up direct access to the labor market which are not opened out at present, in undertakings which are not undertaken by private enterprise, because it is not a matter of private enterprise to undergo them.

Mr. Masterman pointed out that there was no question of a "social class" when the government came into office the trade boom was on a course and was adopted as a policy—having no particular interest in supporting the government in this matter—entirely believed in this right course. The government intended to give an exhaustive consideration to the whole matter when the result of certain experiments and the inquiries of the royal commission appointed to investigate the condition of unemployment and the condition of the poor law were ascertained.

JOHN DILLON, ON IRISH PARTY.

Says He Has Had a Remarkable and Fruitful Career—The Future Bright.

Mr. John Dillon, M. P., addressed a meeting recently under the auspices of the United Irish League at the Hippodrome in London.

Mr. Dillon addressed himself to the subject of the Irish party, its political and historical record, and its future.

Socialism and Marriage Views.

The chairman has stated, Mr. Campbell continued, that Socialism is something which is not a matter of sex in sexual relations, and the break up of family life. I do not deny that there have been professional Socialists who held views which the majority of us would not approve, but we have some amongst them who have called themselves Christians.

The Irish party was surrounded now, as it was in its infancy, by a ring of enemies who were determined to destroy it.
