

The Sound of Wedding Bells Won After Great Perseverance!

CHAPTER VII.

Dulcie colors a maid! She had never thought of that. Of course they ought to have brought a maid; but not having done so, she is too proud to accept the loan of Lady Falconer's.

"No, thanks," she says. "We have no maid. We can do very well if you will send the boxes."

The girl courties, and is respectfulness itself, and fusses about the room for a few minutes, then goes out and Mrs. Fermor is free to utter the exclamation which has been hovering on her lips.

"Oh, Dulcie, what a beautiful room! and this is only the dressing-room; our bedrooms are beyond, I suppose. And did you notice the hall? Oh, my dear, I was never in such a tremendous place, and it was very kind and thoughtful of you to make excuse for me to-night, for I am sure I could not go through it until I have rested and feel a little more composed."

Dulcie laughs, and moves to and fro, examining the apartment.

"Yes, it is all very grand, aunt. It is rather a contrast to what we have been accustomed to, is it not?"

"My dear," exclaims poor Mrs. Fermor, solemnly, "it is quite an ordeal! I—I almost wish we had not come!"

"That is rather inconsistent, since it was you who decided for us," says Dulcie, laughing. "There is nothing to be afraid of, after all. Her ladyship—how strange and new it sounded—won't eat us, I suppose. I wonder what sort of person she is? I have been trying to picture her all the journey. I am afraid she will be rather grim—the old aristocrat, and all that sort of thing; a rather stiff duplicate of Sir Hugh. Poor old lady—she must be old—how she must detest us, me especially."

"My dear Dulcie, you make me more nervous."

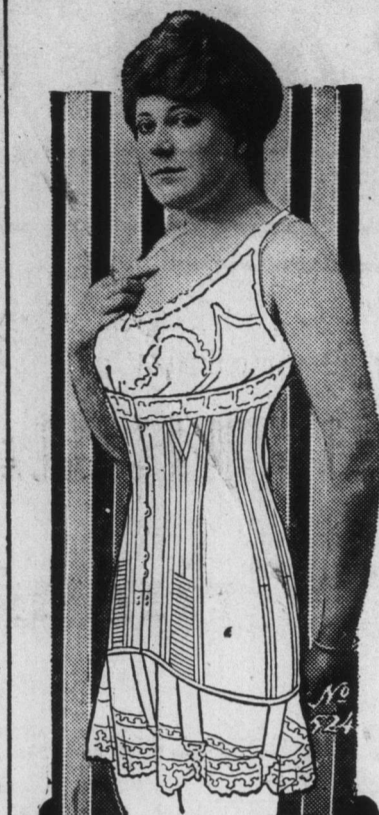

"Do I? Well, I won't say any more. At any rate, I shall have to face the ordeal first. Oh, here are the boxes! How silent the place is!—it is like a cathedral. Aunt, I shall die of ennui here, I know; or else I shall go mad and shriek out, or do something desperate—perhaps pull Lady Falconer's wig off, for instance."

"Good gracious!" groans Mrs. Fermor, with her hand to her head. "Don't talk so, Dulcie; and—pray be quick. Remember Sir Hugh is waiting in the hall all this time. I am sure his kindness is simply touching, touching!"

Dulcie laughs, as she brushes her hair deliberately.

"Do you suppose he will be so stupid as to wait in the hall?" she says. "Not he! He will go into the drawing-room and tell them all about us, and horrify his aristocratic mother with a description of the wild, uncultivated girl they have been saddled with! Then he will come back and look as grave as Solomon at the foot of the stairs!"

"At any rate, be quick," implores Mrs. Fermor, "and, Dulcie, don't let them send me up a lot of things. I only want a cup of tea and to be let alone. I shall be all right to-morrow, but to-night I feel so dreadfully nervous."

Corset Comfort

Model 524 D & A Corset with its elastic bands, special boning and graceful lines is best suited to plump figures. Like all D & A Corsets its price is moderate, and it wears splendidly. Ask your corsetier.

And, Dulcie, dear," coaxingly. "Well?"

"You will be as good and pleasant with them as you can, won't you? You won't make it disagreeable? I am sure they will be nice."

"I am not so sure of that," with a smile, "but I will promise to be good. I won't bark or bite them; no, I promise to be a perfect sucking dove, I will indeed. So you can go to bed and rest in peaceful content. Let us see where 'bed' is" and she insists upon helping the tired and nervous old lady to her well-earned repose, before she proceeds any further with her own toilet.

As to what toilet shall be, she has been rather undecided, but at last she chooses the darkest and quietest of Monsieur Worth's dresses, and carefully avoiding any jewelry, stands and looks at herself for a moment.

Plain as is the dress, absent though the jewelry is, there is something about her which she cannot disguise or divert herself of. The tall, slim figure, with its exquisite natural grace, the lovely, brilliant face, with its closely-coiled braids of dark, shining hair, are still striking, and what the French call "effective," and it is almost with a sigh that she turns away.

"If I could only make myself look dowdy and insignificant," she says, "they would like me better. I feel it. All girls ought to be short. Now for Sir Hugh."

The maid is waiting in the corridor, and explains that she is there to show Miss Dorrimore down. Is miss quite sure that there is nothing she, the maid, can do?

"No," says Dulcie; "if you will be good enough to get a cup of tea for my aunt—"

"I have ordered it, miss," says the maid, quietly. "This way," for Dulcie has turned off in the wrong direction.

She stops a moment when they reach the gallery which overlooks the hall, and bends over, and the first thing she sees is the tall figure of Sir Hugh, standing like a sentinel at the bottom of the stairs. He looks up as she comes down, and smiles.

"You have been very quick," he says. "That is the finest compliment I have ever been presented with," she says. "But you have not been waiting all this time?"

"Yes," he says, with a faint surprise; "I said I should wait."

She looks at him; he is still in his traveling suit, dusty and unwashed, it is quite true; but she does not beg his pardon, instead she says: "Do you publish a guide to the Castle?"

"A—what?" he says, staring at her. "A guide," she says, naively. "Because, if you do I should like to have one, otherwise I shall inevitably lose my way, and be starved to death in some forgotten corner."

He smiles.

"It is not so large as all that. To-morrow, if you will allow me, I will show you over it—or perhaps one of my sisters."

She stops. They are near a door, before which a servant stands ready to open it.

"One moment," she says. "You haven't told me the names of your sisters."

He looks at her rather grimly.

"I didn't think you cared to know," he says. "You didn't ask me."

She keeps back the guilty flush. "I didn't like to be too inquisitive," she says. "Won't you tell me now, please? One never catches people's names when they are introduced, and I shouldn't like to call them Jane and Mary when their names may be Fanny or Ellenor."

"They are neither one nor the other," he says. "The eldest is Maud, the second Edith."

"Thanks," she says. He still pauses.

"Have you any more questions to ask?" he says, with his quiet smile, which always lightened the rather grave beauty of his face.

"Yes, thousands," she retorts; "but we won't wait now."

"Very well," he says; and he makes a sign to the man, who opens the door.

Dulcie sees before her a long, rather low-roofed room, richly furnished in an antique style, and rather dimly lit by wax candles placed in medieval brass sconces attached to Venetian mirrors on the wall, and by a couple of softly toned lamps standing on a table near a fireplace, whose mantel-piece of carved oak runs to the ceiling.

Near the lamps are seated a tall, thin, patrician-looking lady and two young girls. The lady and one girl are employed in needlework, the other has evidently been reading aloud.

There is an air of repose, of quietude, of brooding calm over the scene, which strikes Dulcie in an instant.

Sir Hugh has taken her hand up on his arm, and he leads her forward not briskly, but without any hesitation.

"Mother," he says, "this is Miss Dorrimore."

The lady rises and comes forward, noiselessly, glidingly, like one of the faintly portraits from its frame in the hall, and holds out her hand.

"How do you do, Miss Dorrimore?" she asks; and her voice is thin and clear as crystal, matching her patrician form and bearing. "We are glad to see you. These are my daughters, Maud and Edith."

The two girls—the one tall and stately, like her mother, the other stouter, and with a touch of Sir Hugh's comeliness—come forward and give her their hands; and as they do so Dulcie detects in a moment, in the time of a flash of lightning, the surprise in their faces.
