WHICH SHALL IT BE?

What kind of an old lady are you going to be? Needless to say that question is directed to the feminine contingent of my readers. The male contingent may wonder, if they care to, what kind of old men they are going to be. Only I can't picture men being so much interested in that sort of thing. By the nature of things they don't have to be.

A group of old ladies, evidently on their way to some meeting or convention, sat opposite me in a railway station while I was waiting for the train recently, and as I watched and listened to them I found myself remembering that some day (barring accidents) I should be like one of them, and wondering which one.

There were several types in the group. There was the woman who has evidently, for some reason, led a very repressed life, and the results of that repression showed in the thin, tight line of her lips and in every line of her face. Whether the habit of repression was something she had acquired herself, or was something forced upon her I did not know, but I did not like the result.

The Bound-To-Be-Young Old Lady.
There was the bound-to-be-young old lady. She wore a hat faced with coral, a plaid skirt and a bright scarf. Her hair was frizzed and her skirt short. She had none of the charm of youth, naturally, and none of the dignity of old age. I was glad she wasn't my mother.

Beside her sat an imposing looking old lady, large of figure and large of mind. Large old-fashioned diamonds on her hands, rich furs around her neck. One felt instinctively, that she had always been liberally endowed with money by the males of her family, that she had the habit of having what she wanted and of thinking that people who didn't must be rather stupid. I could imagine that she would be autocratic to deal with, generous and mean by fits and starts, entirely unamenable to reason, logic or justice.

She Spells Them; They Bally Her.
A nervous, deprecating little old lady in shabby, old-fashioned clothes sat on the end, effacing herself into as small a corner as possible. She had a sweet face, but was so nervous and fidgety that it made one nervous to look at her. The type of woman, I should say, who has spoiled her children by carrying the natural unselfishness of motherhood to the nth degree, and has been repaid for the spoiling by being bullied and set aside.

A typical grandmother, as we vision one, was a plump motherly looking old lady in a dark blue suit and a pleasantly homely black bonnet. She had a bag with her from which she produced some knitting at which she busied herself while waiting.

A Lovely Old Lady.
An erect little old lady in grey suit, and a grey hat with a pink rose in it, completed the group. She had white hair, prettily arranged, very bright brown eyes and a clear skin. She had as pretty a laugh and voice as a girl's and seemed as interested in everything going on about her as a girl.

Everywhere about us are old ladies of all kinds and types. Watch a group of them some day and ask yourself what kind you are going to be like.

You are making to-day the old lady you are to be. What kind shall it be?
