"Men, so long as dimples attract them, will choose wives who possess those marks of beauty, and thus, through a simple process of selection, dimples tend to become more numerous from generation to generation. It is easy to imagine that in the not distant future most girls will have dimples. As yet, unfortunately, they are,

"Girls who have pretty dimples never heard of the "most excellent thing commonly cultivate them through a in woman," "I reckon I'll jest set 'em by desire to be pleasing, and this they accomplish by exercising the muscles up-on which the dimples depend. A dimple in the cheek, for example, is a little hollow place where the muscles pass each other. So long as these muscles remain well fed and plump the hollow will be noticeable—whence the importance of keeping them exercised; for if the muscles shrink and become attenuated the dimple will become less observable and may disappear altogether.

"This is why a young woman's dimples tend to vanish as she grows back despairingly at Jerry, and, seeing uated the dimple will become less ob-
