

versive of the order and peace of society, demoralizing in its effects, and ins, reeding a generation of politicalcowar's rom"suckers, drunkards and criminal." He says that the state dispensaries have become "a huge political machine," and proceeds:

"Those who have watched the politics of this state for the last ten years are blind indeed who deny its existence. During this period no man could aspire to office with any hope of success and oppose the dispensary system. During this period no legislation which seemed inimical to the officers of the dispensary system could be secured. It is only by breaking down the dispensary system that this political machine can be destroyed, and I hope that the sober and thinking people of the state will rise in their might and destroy both."

It was to break down the dominaton of its state politics by a liquor ring that South Carolina abolished the license system, and now the abolition of the dispensary system is declared to be necessary for the same purpose. The advocates of the dispensary system contend that the dishonesty of officials entrusted with its administration does not furnish just ground for condemnation of the system as a system. Its opponents take the ground that it must be judged according to its workings under the test of actual operation.
