Peters Bros., corn merchants of that city with liabilities estimated at £150,000. Accounts from manufacturing and mining centres continue to be burdened with complaints of business depression. Employers are taking measures everywhere to reduce wages or to extend working hours. The workmen in some district, are preparing to resist, and it is feared great strikes will be the result.

— Turn about is fair play, and it is only just that the jewelry trade should have their little divertissement as well as the leather or any other business. This they are now enjoying in the reported absconding of E. G. Mellor, a Notre Dame street jeweller of prominence, who left the city sometime Wednesday evening or night, without even having the courtesy of informing his clerks, who were rather surprised to find their efforts for entrance the following morning unavailing and for some time were unable to account for it. It leaked out during the day however, that he had engaged a double team, on Wednesday, and had departed, whither no one pretends to know; but at date of writing, said carter had not returned. Mr. Mellor commenced here some eight or ten years ago in a moderate way, and, being a shrewd, enterprising little German, worked into a very good trade and kept one of the tastiest and most select stocks in the city. This necessitated his keeping a very large assortment, and, as during the past two years the demand for such luxuries had been very light, it is believed that he had not been making enough to pay the expenses of his costly establishment and the interest on his heavy purchases, and that he in consequence became disheartened. He had been living somewhat freely of late, which was altogether contrary to his previous record, and apparently primed himself up to his present move. A seizure to-day reveals the fact that the most valuable portions of his stock have been removed, and he must have made quite a respectable haul. His local indebtedness is quite small, the bulk of his purchases having been made in Europe, where he was in the habit of going twice a year, until recently, to replenish his stock.
