

F) Transnational NGO networks can offset what some see as the potentially negative effects of NAFTA: a feeling of loss of political control over local events. These networks may have the capacity to balance the power, in effect, of transnational capital.

G) National governments, which sometimes may be reluctant to respond to grass roots movements, are much more likely to do so when transnational networks amplify the specific issue.

4) Professor John Saxe-Fernandez, Dept. Of Economics, National Autonomous University of Mexico, Mexico City.

A) Professor Saxe-Fernandez concentrated on the economic underpinnings of problems associated with security and human rights in Mexico.

B) He noted that while aggregate GDP growth in the country has increased over the last 12 months, this affects only about 10% of the country.

C) He presented figures which suggest that, overall, income
