A SCOOP.

It was after 11 o'clock at night. The rows of dark dwellings which lined each side of the street, made one little house look brilliantly illuminated by contrast. Alvin Barstow walked quickly toward it, considerably surprised as he drew nearer to find that it was his own and not one of the other five in the street. What could be the meaning of this lavish use of gas? For a second time in his married life a suspicion of his wife flashed through his mind. Once, when they were first married, there had been a letter—but, "Fahaw! All this died out years ago," he said to himself. Still, it was queer that she should have received a letter in his presence without telling him of its contents. She had named the writer at his request, but more than I would consent not to tell, and he had been too proud to urge her confidence. He was annoyed that the recollection should return so vividly now. His wife did not expect him before 1 o'clock, as that was the time when he usually got home from the newspaper office where he was employed, but owing to the sudden illness of a member of the staff he had been ordered to start in the morning on a "detail" to a distant town. As he approached the house he saw that the parlor windows were wide open and the curtain swung to and fro in the draught. From the window of the adjoining house the head of an inquisitive neighbor was furtively withdrawn. As he opened the front door with his latch key the husband felt a pang of shame that he should do so so softly.

Through the open door of the parlor he saw his wife bending over the figure of a man lying on the lounge. As he advanced a step nearer he saw that his wife's step visitor and the writer of the letter—a wealthy and prominent man—were the same. At the sight of her husband's face Mrs. Barstow appeared strangely disconcerted, but she did not cease her occupation of bathing the head of the unconscious man. When he began to show signs of returning consciousness she motioned her husband back.

"Don't let him see you," she said, hastily. Her gesture was so imperative that almost involuntarily Barstow moved out of sight. An instant later the man opened his eyes. For a moment he gazed stupidly up at the woman standing over him, then a look of hatred over his countenance.

"You feel better now, do you not?" she asked. "Yes, I am better, I suppose. The fact is, I'm so used to doing as I'd-n please that I can't stand it to be crossed." He raised up on one elbow and glared at her. "Are you a woman or a devil that you defy me so? You must have a price—name it!"

"Hush!" she cried, warningly. Her husband came forward and at sight of him the man fell back on the pillow. "Ah! So you have told him!" "I have told him nothing," she replied, with emphasis. She drew her husband out of the room. "He may have a stroke of apoplexy if he is excited; he came near one as it was."

"I must know what this means," "You insist?" "Certainly." "Then you mistrust me?" she broke out, sharply. They regarded each other silently for a moment. Reproach and appeal were written in her eyes. He dropped his own. "Yes," he said, shortly. "Very well, I will tell you after he has gone."

He grasped her wrist. "You swear it?" She recoiled as if he had struck her. "I said I would tell you." Her voice was cold. "You must ring for a carriage now, and get him home as quickly as possible."

They returned to the parlor, but their visitor maintained a sullen silence until the arrival of the carriage. At the door he turned to the wife. "Remember the power of money!" he said, and without a glance at her husband, he was gone.

When they heard the carriage door shut, husband and wife faced each other. "It will be wrong for me to tell you the meaning of all this, for it is another's secret," she began. "I don't care whose secret it is," he replied, brutally. "I demand to know the truth, and the whole truth."

"I once witnessed a murder. This man, William Sage, was the principal, and one who was very dear to me was the accessory to the crime. Instantly the expression of the man's face changed. The jealousy, which had predominated, vanished, and a new look—keen, shrewd, calculating, the look of a slough-dweller—took its place.

"And who was the one who was so dear to you?" "For a moment she hesitated. "My father," she whispered. "And the victim?" "Was George Stern, a former partner of theirs. It happened in our cabin near Altaville, in Colorado. The three had been playing cards, when a dispute arose and my father charged Stern with cheating. Stern gave him the lie, and my father knocked him down. For some time previous there had been bad blood between them about a mine, and it was only because Stern had expressed a desire for a reconciliation that they consented to the game of cards." She paused. "Well, did it kill him?" "No; that is the worst part of it, for then it would have been partly excusable. Mr. Sage was furiously angry. He threatened to kill us if we rendered the man any assistance. The fall had produced unconsciousness. As soon as he opened his eyes William Sage shot him twice and then flung the heavy gun at his head.

She drew her hands across her eyes with a shudder. "It was an awful sight. I don't think I have ever been quite the same since. His skull was fractured but whether by the fall or by the gun we did not know. Sage said it was the result of the fall, and threatened to prove it if we told what we knew about the affair. They dug a grave in the thick bush, and the body has never been found. It was a long time before I would consent to tell, and during that time they never left me alone. No enquiry was ever made, for the man was supposed to have left the country. No one suffered by his death, and at last I made up my mind to keep the secret for father's sake. After his death I was glad I had. But Mr. Sage never trusted me. He came here to-night in a frenzy and charged me with having told you. He imagined that he saw a reference to the crime in the attack upon him in to-day's Enterprise, and he wanted to buy me off—to buy my silence.

Her eyes flashed. "He seems to feel, somehow, that if he can once get me to accept money he will be more sure of me. His rage, because I refused, brought on the spell you saw. Now I have told you everything. Promise me that you will not breathe a word of this to a human being!" He did not reply at once. "It is a horrible thing," he said at length, "but it is nothing in which you are specially concerned."

"Nothing in which I am specially concerned?" she repeated, in amazement. "When I witnessed it and my own father was possibly the murderer?" "Nonsense! How could he be? If the man's skull had been fractured by the fall, he wouldn't have regained consciousness."

"You haven't promised me yet," she exclaimed, in sudden alarm. "Oh, Alvin, don't put it in the paper! Don't! It would kill me!" He had never seen her so excited. She was usually so calm. "You are nervous and overwrought," he replied, evasively. "You must lie down and get some rest."

She read the truth in his face. "Is nothing sacred?" she asked, bitterly. "Must the monster you work for be fed with my heart's blood?" "You are growing hysterical and giving yourself a great deal of unnecessary alarm. For your own good I must ask you to go to bed at once. I must return to the office immediately; I came home to get some notes I had forgotten, and I've barely time to get through before the paper goes to press."

Once in the streets he fairly ran along them in his haste to get his work done before the paper went to press. It was a tremendous "scoop." Sage was a candidate for re-election to the United States Senate and was the owner of a rival paper. The election would take place in two weeks, and the Enterprise had been making a very bitter fight against him. This black page in his history would be a powerful weapon in their hands; but there was no time to be lost. A slight compunction for what he was about to do Barstow promptly crushed by a ready sophistry of justification. "This coup d'etat just at this time would be of incalculable benefit to him. He would be advanced, perhaps to the dazzling position of special writer. Surely this prosperity would console his wife for the grief she would feel at the publication. Besides, was it not the duty of a newspaper to expose crime?"

He glanced at his watch as he dashed into the building. A full hour remained in which to get his copy ready. In the local room of belated reporters looked upon him in surprise as he hastily entered the night editor's room. "Barstow must have a good one," one remarked, with a look of envy. The fortunate man did not respond. He sent for the artist and gave him a rough outline of the tragedy, with instructions to make what he could out of it. Then he set to work furiously. Within the hour the article was ready for the press. This done he dropped wearily on a lounge and fell asleep. It was 9 o'clock when he awoke. His first thought was for a copy of the paper. Yes, it was all there; a sensation with a vengeance. There was even a drawing of the tragedy, with Senator Sage represented in the act of firing at the prostrate form of his victim, and the figure of a girl and a man in the background. The well-known features of the murderer were unmistakable.

Barstow's next thought was for his wife. The paper must have been delivered two or three hours earlier. He hurried out and went directly home. An aunt of his wife's met him in the hall. "Be prepared for the worst," she said, sternly. "The exposure in the paper has been too much for her. If you wrote it then you brought this misfortune upon yourself."

"What misfortune? What are you talking about? Where is my wife?" he asked in rapid succession. "She has lost her reason. You didn't know it was in her father's family," she added as he staggered back. "They all have terrible tempers, or else they are quiet and deep like her, and these sometimes go mad."

A horrible laugh rang through the house. He rushed the woman to one side and rushed to his wife's room. She sat on the floor rocking her body backward and forward as she gibbered and pointed to the morning Enterprise in her hand.—The Argonaut.
