THE HOLLOW RUBY.

he had vanished. It was not surprising; the war scare threw everything into a hubbub. Had the American not been rendered so conspicuous by his mission, he might easily have spirited away the princess himself. Late in the afternoon a report that the princess' mot'er had been taken violently ill added to the confusion. When Meryon went to the prince for his farewell interview, he was half minded to proclaim and put himself at the head of a revolution, depose his highness, and assume her safe-deposit company's vaults,

The animals were watered and fed. The camels squatted down in their usual absurd fashion, with their usual absurd fashion, with their legs curled under them and their noses on a parallel with the horizon. The drivers curled up beside them and promptly went to sleep. Meryon did not feel sleepy. He wandered about, thinking over what had happened, and speculating as to might be to come.

It was like a mixture of the lazy wonder and laughed.

even of his Nubians. He produced a writing done in minute characters on very thin tissue, setting forth that the bearer was the trusted friend of the undersigned and going on to describe the situation and demand help. When Meryon had finished reading this his highness drew from the folds of his robe a small gold box richly ornamented, and opened it. There lay a huge ruby, about two inches even of his Nubians. The prince handed it to Meryon.

An hour after sunset Meryon, mounted on a thoroughbred Arab and followed by two camels bearing his luggage, passed out of the gate of the city and set his course towards the west. A good many things had happened since we saw him last.

As they crossed the line the moon rose, in its third quarter, throwing black shadows before them on the sandy plain. Its light also dimly revealed-the apex of the great rock appointed as the trysting place, and where it was still Meryon's intention to camp for the pight.

As they crossed the line the moon rose, in its third quarter, throwing the matter that he didn't escort you?"

The princess, whom the wine was beginning to restore, laughed faintly, as a schoolgirl over some bit of roguery.

"We exchanged dresses and places lord of my heart" said she.

Ebal, on hearing the result of the night.

Ebal, on hearing the result of the interview, had declared that it meant mischief, and begged to be taken along to share his master's for his passport, which was in the soft cushions again. But now the soft cushions again. But now the soft cushions again to share the soft cushions again. But now the soft cushions again the soft cushions again. taken aloug to share his master's fate. Meryon had a half-formed scheme to profit by the confusion in the harem caused by the disgrace of Hatipha, to carry off the princess; but the only way to effect it was to have her join him that night beyond the boundary of the principality, which was not more than twenty miles distant. By the connivance of Senuah and the help of Ebal, this might be accomplished; and the latter eagerly agreed to attempt it. There had not been much time to arrange the details of the plot, but a trysting place was fixed upon—a tall, isolated rock near the caravan read, in the enemy's country. Here Meryon was to wait six hours; if Ebal and the princess did not appear within that time, he was to presume that the plan had miscarried, and the enemy on the details of the plot, but a trysting place was fixed upon—a tall, isolated rock near the caravan read, in the enemy's country. Meryon finally resolved against it, from reluctance to be left with a kindom on his hands so far from New York, and with the home policy still so strong against annexations. He afterwards was sorry he had been so fastidious into which his artistic and susceptible temperament and devil-may care habit had brought him. No doubt his mother-wit and audacity had that day saved his neck, buy only to put it in yet graver jeopardy.
