Muzzling the Press.

Newspaper license, especially on in-

Newspaper license, especially on international topics, is often condemned as one of the disadvantages of free countries. Despotism points to its muzzled press, and its imprisoned editors, and claims to be managing things much more satisfactorily. In Prussia, so press, and its imprisoned editors, and claims to be managing things much more satisfactorily. In Prussia, so strict is the censorship exercised over the press, that it is said that the next most disagreeable thing to being a bishop is being a newspaper editor. The press is hardly less sharply looked after there than the Church, and, in figurative language, the editor who would be brought to immediate and condign pusishment. Not to go beyond the present moment no less than four editors are undergoing various terms of imprisonment for violation of the law, though two of them are permitted to continue their literary labors during confinement. Other Continental Governments pursue the same policy of keeping up a strict watch over the political utterances of the public journals. It is doubtful whether all the advantages that are derived from this system are equal to the disadvantages attending it, as, in countries where the press is held in check by special laws and special control, the anthorities are naturally regarded as responsible for utterances which they allow to pass unnoticed and unchecked; and, in fact, every newspaper is invested with a sort of official.

An imprudent or offensive statement in a newspaper may thus statement in a newspaper may thus in justify diplomatic complaints and a good deal of annoyance. Such a statement, for instance, in a French newspaper would be a proper subject for remonstrance; but no one would think of troubling the British Government on account of anything published in an English maps. Hinton turned his head for a moment, on hearing a crashing of rails, that he became aware of the fair form beside him. There she was, firm as a rock, yet giving easily to every motion of her horse, sailing along without an effort, taking every obstacle in her stride neck and neck with him. Fond of hunting as he was, gallantly as the hounds were running, he could not help dividing his attention.
