In many people the causes of the nerves have suffered from the strain of War and from the shortage of fats. You can restore your nerves in a natural way by eating "Skippers". The pure olive oil in which they are packed is worth its weight in gold to those who suffer from "fat-starved" nerves. "Skippers" are especially valuable for children. They are very easily digested, and contain certain vital elements which assist the growing body, nerves and brain. Your retailer will supply you with a tin of

CHAPTER II. THE OTHER ONE.

He answered with a cry of anguish, for there at their feet lay the lovely girl, her sweet eyes closed, her golden curls trailing on the sands, while a thin stream of blood trickled down her cheek from a little cut on her temple.

Dallas and Miss Janowitz—for it was the beautiful brunette again—bent over the prostrate girl, and they saw that she was quite unconscious, stunned, perhaps, by the blow on her temple, received either from the horse's hoof or a shell on the sands.

"It was an accident—I would give my life if it had not happened!" he cried wildly, and she saw that his face grew pale as Daisie's while he felt for her heart, adding: "She cannot be dead, only stunned a little, I think. Oh, if she could but have turned aside as quickly as you did!"

Annette wrung her little hands, and her dark eyes filled with tears as she cried:

"Poor Daisie! She was just learning to ride, and was not skillful enough to get out of the way. Oh, what shall we do now, Mr. Bain?"

"Why, I will take her home in my buggy, and you had better remount your wheel and go for the doctor as fast as you can."

Annette called a curious urchin loitering near to ride Daisie's wheel back to town, and the sad procession started on its return. Annette soon leaving the buggy far in the rear in her haste to obtain a physician for her friend.

It was several miles back to the cottage, and Dallas Bain would never forget that ride, nor the love and grief that thrilled his heart as beautiful Daisie rested against it like a dead girl, with the dark fringe of her lashes prone upon her pallid cheeks. All his thoughts were prayers that she might soon revive, and a little before he turned into Temple Street he saw her breast heave slightly and her eyelids quiver. The next moment they unclosed, while a moan of pain came from her colorless lips.

He could not help pressing her a little tighter in his arms for very joy, as he murmured tenderly:

"Do not be frightened, little Daisie. I am Dallas Bain, you know, and I am taking you home because you fainted."

"Yes, I remember now. I fell from my wheel—your horse knocked me down!" She shuddered; and then, looking up into his face, Dallas saw her blush as she felt herself in his arms. "—Oh, I can sit up!" she murmured; but the effort made her moan with pain, and he said, with gentle authority:

"Lie still, child, for you are hurt, you know, and must not move."

CHAPTER III. THE SPELL OF LOVE.

Daisie was certainly suffering severely, but it was balm for her pain to see the eyes of Dallas Bain rest on her with such tenderness, and though she was thrillingly conscious that his arms held her more tightly than was necessary, even in her weakness, she did not rebel; the sensation gave her a happiness that she had never known before.

Directly they reached the house and found that Annette had the doctor waiting, they carried her tenderly in, and Dallas waited on the porch with an anxious heart for the verdict.

"The accident was all my fault, and every pang of her suffering wrings my heart!" he groaned to himself.

Soon the warm-hearted little Annette put an end to his suspense by running downstairs to tell him that Daisie had no serious injuries. The cut on her brow was superficial; she had some bruises, and a sprained ankle, that was all. She would have to keep quiet on a sofa for a few days, then she would be all right again.

What a light of joy flashed into those dark eyes of Dallas Bain at the joyful tidings, as he cried:

"Ah, how happy you make me, for if she had been seriously hurt I never could have forgiven myself for the carelessness that made such an accident possible. Will you tell her for me that I will call to-morrow morning to ask her forgiveness?"

Annette promised freely—she was such a romantic little thing—and she was sure that he had fallen in love with her lovely friend. As she was already engaged herself to the dearest fellow in Newfoundland, she did not experience any pangs of jealousy.

So when the doctor was gone and Daisie resting easily, she whispered his message, and added:

"You have made quite a conquest. I am sure, by this accident, for if ever I saw love in a man's eyes for a girl, it shone in Dallas Bain's for you!"

Daisie blushed and demurred, but her heart was full of joy. She forgot all about Royal Sherwood, who had gone to New York last evening to be absent two days. She could think of nothing but the message and its visit she was to receive next morning. If she spent a restless night, it was not so much from her injuries as from happy suspense.

She had longed so eagerly to know him, and when she had given up hope at last this blessing had come to her so suddenly that it made her forget everything else that she ought to remember.

The next morning she pretended to be feeling much better than she really was, so that the doctor would permit her to be taken down to the parlor to lie on the little blue sofa. When he gave his consent, she insisted on wearing her very trimmings, though her aunt said she didn't see that it mattered how she dressed, seeing that Mr. Sherwood was away.

Daisie answered, with a burning blush:

"It is Mr. Sherwood's friend that is coming to call on me; so, of course, I want to look nice."

This satisfied the old lady, and when Dallas Bain came at the earliest permissible hour she simply ushered him into the parlor and left him alone with Daisie, excusing herself on the plea of domestic duties.

They were alone together—the pair of unacknowledged lovers—in the simple, dainty room, with its blue-and-white hangings that harmonised so exquisitely with the girl's radiant fairness. The summer breeze swayed the lace curtains at the window and diffused the odor of white roses growing on a bush outside, disposing of the mind to thoughts of love and purity.

Daisie, in her soft white robe, with her bandaged foot on a cushion, and the loose curls of her shining hair veiling her form in sunshine, reclined on a sofa, looking very unlike an invalid, so bright were her eyes and so rosy her face from the warm blood that coursed through her throbbing heart.

Dallas bent down and took her soft white hand in a gentle pressure, murmuring audaciously:

"I ought to be repenting in dust and ashes the accident that caused you such pain. I know; but—how can I regret the accident that gave me the delight of knowing you, Miss Bell?"

He had quite forgotten that he had decided two weeks ago that it was not worth his while trying to know her, forgotten that Royal Sherwood had told him she was still.

The incidents of yesterday had drawn them nearer together than months of formal acquaintance could have done.

He had held that sweet form in his arms, close to his heart, during a long ride, had feasted his eyes, unreproved, on her beauty, had even dared press reverent lips on her golden hair and one limp white hand.

It seemed to him, in the delirium of love that had come upon him, that all this made her his own, sealed her lips to have and to hold forever.

He drew a chair close to her sofa, and they began to talk to each other incoherently. I am afraid, for how could they preserve the formal dignity of strangers?—and very soon he saw that her mind was as lovely as her face, her words well chosen, her voice low and musical, her smile like sunshine, and her laughter a chime of silver bells.

If he had been keeping back a remnant of his heart, he surrendered now at discretion to this adorable creature.

Within half an hour he was saying gently:

"Do you know that I seem to have known you a long while, although we never spoke to each other till yesterday? Yet it is, after all, only two weeks since I first saw you. Since that day you have never been out of my thoughts."

His beautiful dark eyes seemed to hold her violet ones in a fascinated gaze. She could not remove them, though she felt the rosy blushes bathing cheeks and brow. Their glances mingled caressingly, and, taking her unresisting hand in his, he continued, in low, thrilling accents:

"Forgive me if I seem rash and forward, taking advantage of your gentleness; but, Daisie Bell, I love you with the passion of my life, though it may be madness to avow it, though it may meet your scorn. But the softness of your gaze inspires me with some little hope that you are not indifferent to my love, that I may win you—by long devotion—to be my bride."

How pale her cheek grew—pale as yesterday, when she lay unconscious on his breast after that perilous accident! That a startled look came into her violet eyes!

CHAPTER IV. FALSE.

Dallas Bain was startled by the young girl's emotion, and his own cheek paled with sorrow as he cried hoarsely:

"You are angry with me for my presumption? I was too hasty, but my love must be my excuse. Will you forgive me?"

Daisie put out the little hand he had dropped in his alarm, and as he clasped it again he felt the soft pressure of fingers twining about his own as she whispered, in a choked voice:

"You startled me, but—but—I am not angry. For how could I be, when—when—"

She stopped, tears rushing to her eyes.

What could she mean? he thought. Did she—did she care also, as he had dared to hope?

Trembling with hope, the color rushing to his brow, he bent over the agitated girl, and read hope in the trembling smile of the coral lips.

"Oh, Daisie, will you love me?" he cried impetuously, and she answered, with a broken sob:

"Oh, how could I help it, dear?"

And then he dared to kiss her, and for the space of five minutes heaven seemed to come down to earth in that rare bliss of mutual love.

Absorbed in sweet assurance of tenderness, they did not hear the crunching of carriage wheels that stopped at the gate, nor the rustle of a silken robe as a fine little lady came up the steps. But Aunt Alice saw the sight from an upper window, and hurried down to admit the pretty, airy little visitor.

"Mrs. Bell, I presume?" she twittered. "Well, I am Mrs. Fleming, cousin of Royal Sherwood, you know. I came to call on Miss Daisie, having heard she had been injured in an accident."

And scarcely had Dallas pushed back his chair from its close proximity to the sofa when she was in the room, attired with laces and ribbons and fawn crinkles.
