merce, except for the defence of life and property. We believe that the widest pessible liberty for individual exertion, limited only by the just rights of others, is the political and commercial creed best worth fighting constitutionally to obtain. A Canada has been governed almost to death under the Tory Imperial firegime, and only an entirely new departure can en sure a new and prosperous life.

Let the present contest be fairly fought out on its own merits at the hustings. The result will be the present voice of Canada. If the Liberals win, then let the representatives of the people conscietiously decline any oaths of Imperial allegiance, and invite the Government of America to a congress to consider the whole question of our amalgamation with themselves, and the terms of such marriage contract.

There can be no nonsense about "veiled rebellion based on sordid motives."

The self-interest and desire for National independence at the basis of this proposed alliance (inevitable in the long ruo) has assuredly, in some measure, been precipitated by the political sins of our more recent Administration, and the scapegoat "National Policy" may well, by its "utmost efforts the and latest breath," carry away the national burden into the wilderness. But, whichever side wins in this present political struggle, the issue of this election decides, for the time being, the question: Under which flagf for, practically, there is none other to contest. I am, Sir, yours faithfully,

ARTHUR EWD. MCCALUM.

Can the province afford to allow this non-fruition of their long delayed hopes of a great mining development? With such resources as we believe we possess in our mining regions shall we not kick against the imperions order to "stand," and defer the prosperity which soems ready to descend upon us? Will our legislators be content to obey the behests of a company which speaks so much like a master, and them go home to their constituents to try to explain their action?

We will defer further consideration of these anti-progression resolutions until they appear fully in print.
