It is the cominion lanentation of Spanish historiographers，that， for an obscure and melanclooly space of time innmediately sueceed－ ing the conquest of their country ly the Moslems，its history is a mere wilderness of dubious facts，groundless fables，and rash exag－ cerations，Learned men，in cells and cloisters，have worn out their lives in vainly endeavouring to connect incongruous events， and to account for startling improbabilities，recorded of this period． The worthy Jesuit，Padre Avarca，declares that，for more than forty years，during which he had been－employed in theological controversies，be luad never found any so obscure and inexplicable as those which rise out of this portion of Spanish history，and that the only fruit of an indefatigable，prolix，and even prodigious stu－ dy of the sulject，was a melancholy and mortifying state of indeci－ sion
Daring this a pocryphal period，flourished Pclayo，the deliverer of $S_{\text {pain，whose name，like that of William Wallace，will ever the }}$ linked with the glory of his country，but linked，in like manner， by a bond in which fact and fiction are inestricably interwoven．
The guaiut old chronicle of the Moor Rasis，which，though wild and taisiful in the extreme，is frequently drawn upon for early： f．uts by Spanish historians，professes to give the birth，pareatage， and whole course of fortune of Pelayo，without the least doubt or hesitation．It makes him a son of the Duke of Cantabria，and iliseended，both by father and inother＇s side，from the Gothic kings of Spain．I shall pass over the romantic story of his child－ hoorl，and shall content myself with a scene of his youth，which was passed in a castlc among the l＇grenees，under the eye of his ridowed and nolle－minded mother，who caused him to be instruct－ ed in every thing befiting a civalier of gentle birth．While the sons of the novility were revelling annid the plensures of a licentious court，and sunk in that vicions and effeninate iudulgence which Ied to the perlition of unhapy＂Spuin，the youthful Pelhyo，in his rugged mountain school，was steeled to all kinds of hardy cxer－ cises．A great part of his time was spentingunting the bears，the wid boirs－and the wolves，with whicli the Pyreness abounded； and so purely and chastely was he brought up，by his good lady nother，that，if the ancient chronicle frou which I draw my facts may be relied on，lee had attained his one－and－twenticth year， without having onee lost a sigh on woman！
Nor were his hardy contests confined to the wild leasts of the forest．Oceasionally he lad to contend with adversaries of a more formidable ciaracter．The skirts and defiles of these border monntains were often infested by marauders from the Gallic plains of Gascony．The Galsoons，says an old ehronicler，were a people who used smooth words when expedient，but force when they had power，and were ready to lay their hands on every thing they met． Though poor，they were proud ；for there was not one who did not pride himself on being a hidalgo，or the son of somebody．
At the head of a band of these needy hidalgos of Gascony，was me Arnaud，a broken－down cavalier．He and four of his follow－ ers were well armad and mounted；the rest were a set of scamper－ srounds on foot，furnisted with darts and javelins．They were The terror of the lowder；here to－day and gone to－morrow ；some－ tincsis in one pass，sometimes in another．They would make sud－ den inroads into Spain，scour the roads，plunder the country，and were over the mountains and far away，befife a force could be col－ lected to pursue them．
Now it happened one day，that a wenllhy burgher of Bordeaux， who was a merchant，trading with Biscay，set out on a journey for that province．As he interded to sejourn there for a scason， he took with him his wife，who was a goodly dame，and his daugh－ tur，a gentle damsel，of marriageable age，and exceeding fair to look upon．The was attended by at trusty clerk from his comptoir，and a wan servant；while another servant led a hackney，laden with bigs of money，with which he intended to purchase merchandise．
When the Giscons heard of this wealthy inereliant and his con－ roy pässing throigl the mountains，they thanked their stars，for they cousidered all peacefil men of traficic as lawful spoil，sent by Providence for the benefit of hidalgos like themselves，of valor and gentle blood，who lived by the sword．Placing themselves in am－ luash，in atonely defile，by which the travellers had to pass，they silently arsaited their coming．In a little while they beheld them appronching．The merchant was a fair，portly man，in a buff sur－ cout and velvet eap．His looks bespoke the good cheer of his na－ i：ive eity，and he was mounted on a stately，well－fed steed，while his wife and diaughter paced gently on palfreys by his side．
The travellers had adranced some distance in the defile，when and Landleros rushed forth．and assiled them．The merchent though but little used to the exercise of arms，and unvieldy in his form，yet made it valiant defence，having lis wife and daughter and money－bags at hazard．He was wouided in two places，and overpowered；one of his servants was slain，the other took to fight．

The freebooters then began to ransack for spoil，but were disap－ pointed at not finding the wealth they had expected．Putting their swords to the breust of the trembliag meschant，they demand－ ed where he had conceiled his treasure，and learned from hiun of the haekney that was followilig，laden with money．Overjoyed at this intelligence，they bound their captives to trees，and awaited the arrival of the goiden spoil．
On this same day，Pelaso was out＇with his huntsmen among the mountains，and lad tiken his stand on＂a rock＂，at a narrow pass；to await the sally ying forth of a wild bear．．Close by＂him was a parge，conducting a horse，and at the saddlle－bow hiug his armour，＂ for he always prepared for fight anong these border mountins． While thus posted，the gervant of the merchant came flying from the robbers．On beholding Pelayo，he fell on his knees，and im－ plored his life，for he supposed him to be one of the band．It was some time before he could be reliered from his terror，and made to tell his story：When Pelayo heard of the robbers，he concluded they were the crew of Gascon hidalyos，upon the scamper．Tak－ ing his armour from the page，he put on his helnet，slung his buck－ ler round his neck，took lance in hand，and nounting his steed， compelled the treinbling servint to conduct him to the seene of action．At the same time he ordered the page to seek his hunts－ men，and summon them to his assistance．
When the robbers sav Ielayg edraneing through the furest， with a single attendant on foot，and beheld his armour sparkling in the sun，they thouglit a new prize had fallen into their hands， and Arnaud，and two of his companions，mounting their horses， advanced to meet him．As they approached，Pelayo stationed himself in a narrow pass between two rocks，where he could only be assailed infront，and bracing his buickler，aud lowering his lancé， awaited their coming．
Who and what are ye，＇cried he，and what seek ye in this land ？

We are huntsmen，＇replied Arnand，＇and lol our game runs into our toils！
＇Ala！＇replied lelayo，＇thou wilt find the game more readily roused than taken ：have at the for a villain！？
So saying，he put spurs to his horse，and ran full spoed upon him． The Gascon，not expecting so sudden an attack from a single horse－ man，was taker by surprise．IIe hastily couched his lance，but it merely glancell on the shiedid of Pelayo，who sent his own through the middle of his breast，and threw him out of his saddle to the earth．One of the other robbers made at Pelayo，and wounded him slightly in the side，but reeeived a blow from the sword of the latter，which cleft his scull cap，and sank into his train．His companion，seeing him fall，put spurs to his steed，and galloped ofl＇ through the forest．
Bethulding several other rolbers on foot coming on，Pelayo re－ turned to his station between the rocks，where he was assailed ly them all at once．He received two of their darts on his buckler， a javelin razed his cuirass，and glancing down，wounded his horse． Pelayo then rushed forth，and struck one of the robbers dead ：the others，beholding several huntsmen advancing，took to fight，but were pursued，and several of them taken．
The good merehant of Bordeaux and his family beheld this seene with trembling and amazement，for never lad they looked upon such feats of arms．They considered Don Pelayo as a leader of some rival band of robbers；and when the bonds were loosed by which they．were tied to the trees，they fell at his feet and implored mercy：The females were soonest undeceived，especially the daughter；for the dansel was struck with the noble countenance and gentle deneanour of Pelayo，and said to horself，＇Surely no－ thing evil can dwell in so goodly and gracious a form．＇
Pelayo now sounded his horn，which cchoed from rock to rock， and was answered by shouts and horns from various parts of the mountains．The merchant＇s leart．misgave him at thase signals， and especially when he beheld more than forty men gathering from glen and thicket．Tley were clad in hunter＇s dresses，and armed with boarspears，darts，and hunting swords，and many of them led hounds in long leashes．All this was a new and wild scene to the astonistred merchant；nor were his fears abated，when he saw his servant approaching with the hackney，laden with money lags； －for of a certainty said he to himself，＇this will be too tempting a spoil for these wild hunters of the mountains
Prlayo，lowever，took no more notice of the gold than if $\mathfrak{i t}$ had been so much dross；at which the honest burgher maryelled exceed－ ingly．Ile ordered that the wounds of the merehnte stiould be dressed，and his own exnmined．On taking of his cuiras，his wound was found to be but slight；but his men were so extsper－ uted at seeing his blood，that they would have put the captive rob－ bers to instant death，had he not forbidden then to do them 隹y harm．

The huntsineln now made a great fire at the foot of a tree，and bringing a bour which they ladi killed，cut off portions and roasted them，or broiled them on the conls．Then drawing forth luaves of bread from their wrallets，they devoured their food half raw，with the hungry relish of humtsmen and mountaineers．＂The merchant， his wife and daugltetr，looked at all this，and wondered，for they had never belaeld so savage a repast．
Pelayo then inquired of him if they dia not desire to eat？they were too much in awe of him to decline，thougle they felt at joath－： ing at the thought of partaking of this huiter＇s fare ；buit he order－ ed linen cloth to be spread ${ }^{7}$ under the slinde of＂n great onk，＂on＂the grassy margin of a clear rumning strean ；and to their astonish－ ment，they were served，not with the flesh of the boar，but with dainty cheer，such as the merchant had seureely hoped to find out of the walls of his native city of Bordenux．
The good burgler was of a community renowned for gastrono－ mic prowess：his fears laving sulsided，his appetite was now awakened，and he addressed himself mauffully to the viands that were set before him．His daughter，however，could not ent；her eyes were ever and mon stealing to gaze on Pelayo，whon slie re－ garded with gratitucle for his proteotion，and admiration for his valour ；and now that he had laid＇aside his helmect，and shé beheld his lofty countenance，glowing with manly beauty，Slle thought him something more than＇mortal．The heapt of the gentle don＇ zelha；says the ancient clonicler，was kind and yiêding，ond hind Pelayo thouglt fit to ask her fair hand sho obuld not have liad the cruelty to say to limin nat．Pullayo，hourer，lad no such thouglats sthe love of wo man had nevery cet citered his ligart ；and though he regarded the dansel as the fairest maiden lie diad eve beheld，her béauty liad caused no pertürbation in lis breate．
When the repast was over，Pelayoo offered to condict tie ，met should be molested by ary nf the scatered band of rolbers．＂The bodies of the slain marauders were buried，and the corpse of the servint was laid upon one of the horses captured in the battle． Having formed thecir cavaloade，they pursued their way slowly up ouc of the stecp and winding passes of the Pyreness．
Towards sunset they arrived at the dwelling of a holy hermit． It was hewn out of the living rock ：there was a cross orer the door，and before it was a great spreading oak，with a sivect spring of water at its foot．The body of the faithful servant who had fallen in the defence of lis lord，was buried elose by the wall of this sacred retreat，and the hermit promised to perform masses for the repose of his soul．Then Pelayo obtained from the holy father consent that the merchant＇s wife and danghter should pass the night within his cell；and the hermit made beds of moss for them， and gave them his benediction；but the damsel found little rest．so much were her thoughts oceupied by the youthful champion who had rescued her from death and dishnooir．
l＇elayo，however，was visited by no such wandering of the mind， but wrapping himself in his mantle，slept soundly by the fountriin under the tree．At miduight，when every thing wus buried in deep repose，he was nwakened from his sleepl，and belield the hermit before him，with the beams of the moon shining on his silver hair and beard．
＇This is no time，＇saill the latter，＇to be sleeping；arise and lis－ ten to my words，and hear of the great work fur which thou art chosen！
Then Pelayo arose and seated liinself on a rock，and the herrnit continued his discourse．
＇Behold，＇suid le，＇the ruin of Spain is at hand！It will be de－ livered into the hauds of strangers，and will becone a prey to the spoiler．Its children will be slain，or esurried into captivity ；or such as may escape these cvils，will harbour with the heasts of the furst，or the eagles of the mountain．The thorn and bramble will spring up where now are seen the cornfield，the vinc，and the olive，and hungry wolves will roam in place of peacelul flocks and herds．But thou，my son！tarry not thou to see these things，for thou canst not prevent them．Depart on a pilgrimage to the se－ pulchre of our blessed Lord in Palestine ；purify thysulf by prayer； enrol thyself in the order of chivalry，and prepare for the great work of the redemption of thy country；for to thee it will be given to raise it from the depth of its affliction．＇
Pelayo would have inquired farther into the cvils thais furetold， but the hermit rebuked his curiosity．
