* WAR SUMMARY *

THE DAY'S EVENTS REVIEWED

HE Canadians began an advance on Lens down both sides of the Souchez River yesterday. They made this movement on a considerable front, of a width, it is reported, of a mile and a half, and they ousted the enemy from his strong positions for a considerable depth. The Hamilton Men Who Walked Out British bulletin from the front describes their progress as substantial. A success won last night at the base of Reservoir Hill enabled them to make this advance. They are now in the suburbs of Lens. A German division garrisoned this city in April. As the British have kept the town under an artillery barrage pretty well ever since, the numbers of the garrison have certainly considerably declined, unless the enemy has thrown in reinforcements. He has already pretty thoroly destroyed the town, as well as flooded the mines in the district by damming the Souchez River,

It is rather a ticklish business for an army to move forward in this region. It has required preliminary work not unlike the work along the Ancre Brook and about Miraumont, carried out during the winter. Canadians had to oust the Germans from many strong concealed positions, rendered doubly formidable by nests of machine guns. They have now uncovered some of the approaches to the town, and as the Germans of their wages being delayed was not are showing signs of weakening their hold on it and consequently of de- sufficient reason for them walking out feat, the order has come for another advance. The loss of Lens will un- of the plant. Assurance was given cover La Bassee and will facilitate the reduction of Lille by creating a pronounced salient west of it and so permitting its reduction. The method of the British advance has been the forcing of salient after salient and then flattening them out by superiority of gunfire ensured by superiority

. . . . The German official communications are making much note of the heavy artillery action which is proceeding among the sand dunes of the Belgian coast towards Ostend. As previously explained, an infantry adwance in this region, if carried far enough, would involve the reduction the important German submarine base at Zeebrugge. In response to severe censure of the Anglo-French newspapers concerning the allowing this almost open port to menace the allied sea communications, the ritish aerial service recently sent out machines to drop great quantities of high explosives on Zeebrugge harbor. As the Germans had taken the it is the worst section of road in the ordinary precaution of making bomb-proof shelters for the submarines, it province, and that owing to the many denger. is generally believed that the operation was largely a waste of explosives. It comes rather within the province of a land force to drive the enemy from the Belgian coast. It is probable, however, that Sir Douglas Haig has other objectives besides this limited one before him. His real objective of course is the dispersal or destruction of the German army.

The enemy has desisted from his attacks on the French positions north of the Aisne and he has confessed defeat again by drenching Rheims with 1200 big shells. The bombardment of Rheims or any other open towns by the Germans has always been a signal of a German failure or reverse. The talk in Parls about another German offensive as imminent probably comes from enemies of the French republic. A considerable section of French opinion remains undemocratic and monarchical and the agents of the monarchists still lose no opportunity of striving to undermine the public confidence in the republic.

As the cohesion and spirit of the Russian army improves, owing to the education of the opinion at home in the need of an offensive, the fighting with artfllery and scouts becomes more lively on the eastern This does not necessarily mean the launching of any big offensive in the immediate future. It will be the Russian military object to conceal from the enemy the time and place of its offensive in order to secure the maximum effects from a surprise. It is also always an object of a commander to keep the enemy in darkness concerning the real strength. morale and general condition of his forces. The Germans have always had and fractured one of her hips. a tendency to overestimate their own strength and prowess and to underestimate the strength and prowess of the enemy.

Sir Edward West No doubt the winning of elections.

Hon. Albert Sevigny, minister of inland revenue, said there was no ground for the contention that parlia-of vindictiveness towards the province of Quebec. The government was no less anxious than the opposition to preserve concord and unity among the people and provinces of Canada. The action of the prime minister in offer-ing to give half the portfolios at his disposal to Liberals had been endorsed ty all of his present colleagues. They were all of them quite willing to give place if the prime minister strengthen his government and bring about a coalition. Personally, leader of the opposition had not seen fit to accept the prime minister's German for Referendum. Mr. German (Welland) said while our sons were fighting for freedom in Flanders, we must be careful not to deprive the people of their freedom in Canada. He had often declared that Canada should give her last man and her last dollar to win the war and he had not changed his position He wanted to see the war won, but he hoped that it might be won without imperiling national unity. Referring to the province-wide campaigr of education on the conscription question being conducted by Arthur Hawkes, Mr. German quoted Mr. Hawkes as saying that the people ought to be consulted . Mr. German. herefore, construed a telegram received by him from a mass meeting in Welland urging him to vote for conscription and help bring about a coalition government to mean con the meeting in question had been a non-partisan government. He said addressed by Mr. Hawkes. At any the present government had procured rate, it was Mr. German's conviction that the measure should be submitted ising that no political measures to the people before further proceeded be put thru the house, and with. He was confident that the had brought down the most

he wanted the question squarely put country. up to them by a referendum. In a general election many side issues might come up and distract the attention of the voters from the allimportant question.

Mr. German admitted that the voluntary system had broken down, and from drinking wood alcoho he blamed the breakdown on the goveral others are seriously ill from the ernment and the "slimy influence of same cause. The liquor was conernment and the "slimy influence of same cause. The liquor was comparty politics." Conscription was sumed in Mrs. Scott's home Sunday necessary, and he wanted to see a conscription bill passed, but one that gation as to where the alcohol was would be effective. There could be no purchased, and it is likely prosecueffective conscription law, he said, unless public opinion was behind its en-

Mr. German said he was astonished to find a man getting up in the house and opposing a referendum on the ground that conscription would be overwhelmingly defeated if it were submitted to the people. How could we pass a law which the people did not want, and in defiance of their wishes? To advocate anything of this kind was Prussianism; it certainly was not Liberalism. For himself, Mr. German had no lost faith in democracy. He was willing to trust the people, and was satisfied that on a referendum they would pronounce themselves overwhelmingly in favor of conscription.

He referred to Sir Edward Kemp's

statement respecting Sir Robert Border having proposed a coalition government. The offer, Mr. German thought, should have been made two or three years ago. It had been so coupled up with the conscription bill that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had no choice but to refuse it. It was, in Mr. German's conjuging in every way better to but to refuse it.. It was, in Mr. German's opinion, in every way better to consult the people first by a referendum rather than to pass the bill and have a general election. It was true that the British parliament after extending its own term had passed a conscription bill, but the situation was far different in England from that in Canada. In England they had a coalition government, and the a coalition government, and the people were frequently consulted at by elections. In Canada we had a

In closing, Mr. German said that the bill was not aimed to gather recruits any consideration to the question of conscription. represented in the house. Replying to Sir Edward Kemp's re-marks on the Militia Act, Mr. Pugsley said that the act as it now stood did not authorize the conscription of soldiers for service overseas. The mil itia act of 1863 might have admitted of that conscription but in 1904 the law had been amended by the Laurier government so as to make it plain that soldiers could only be compelled to serve outside of Canada for the de fence of Canada. This change in the law had been resisted at the time by prominent members in the Conserva-tive opposition, including Sir Edmund Osler, of West Toronto, and W. F. MacLean of South York. Yet L'Evenement and other government papers in the province of Quebec were saying that conscription was due to a law that Laurier put on the statute book.

Seeds of Discord. There was an effort to stir up bad eeling between Ontario and Quebec and it was not, in Dr. Pugsley's opin-ion, confined to Quebec. Ontario papers, he said, were suggesting that the soldiers on their way overseas should stop long enough to French Canadians, and the member for South Perth (Dr. Steele) had told his constituents the other night that the French-Canadians would make war on Ontario rather than make war on Germany,

Dr. Steele: "I should have excepted 8,000 who went to the front." In conclusion, Dr. Pugsley said that scription preceded by a referendum, as conscription could only be enforced by be put thru the house, and yet they people would vote for conscription, and tious measure in the history of the

Moves to Strike Out,

When the bill got to the railway committee it was amended so as to extend the franchise for five years. The discussion today arose upon the bill as amended by the railway committee.

Mr. Stewart moved to strike out the operative clauses of the bill. He said the T. H. and B. would not accept the five-year extension, and argued that parliament must ratify the agre-ment or refuse to ratify it; that it had no authority to change or modify the agreement.

Mr. Wilson (Wentworth) spoke for the Town of Dundas, which is in the riding. He said the town was un-willing for the next thirty years to have the main street occupied be steam locomotives. If the T. H. an B. treated the town well, he had not that the agreement would be extended at the end of the five year The T. H. and B., he said, was threat-ening to discontinue its freight ser-

Neither Mr. Stewart nor Mr. Wilson mentioned the hydro-electric or hydroradial, but as they contended over the bill the members of the house sense the real point in dispute and Mr. Pugsley, Mr. Carvell, Mr. Neshitt and Mr. Knowles went to Mr. Stewant's relief. They urged that the bill be laid over for future consideration. This, Mr. Wilson objected to, and a strong plea for tramediate action by parliament was also made by Nickle, Conservative

Sir Robert Borden said he was familiar with the bill but as the claim was made that the railway common had exceeded its powers in report the amendment he thought it we have the question referred to the de partment of justice for an opinion an moved the committee arise.
