Enigma of a Cat.—A fine cat about a year old, the daughter of Mr. Crowne, a very poor man, who had a small shop in New Town, died by her death, this week as we are told, in a very unusual manner. It seems that among the domestic animals of the house, this gentleman had a cat which was in habit of lying upon his children when asleep, and on a recent evening he was so much annoyed by the cat, that he, and was in consequence, ordered to be drawn, and the servant accordingly tied a stone to his neck, and hung it into the river. It was of course supposed to be dead, but after a week it was re-applied to the house in a more deadened and lifeless condition than when it was taken out. The other rooms, it was said, in this family, were terrified by its ferocious appearance, and wished to starve it to death. In a short time, however, it got out of its prison while the master was away, and was seen to be the servant who had happened to sleep in the kitchen. The cat instantly attacked her in the most furious manner, and left no face or throat so violently as to cause her death in a few days.—Galway Irish Paper.

Reticent Woman or the Duchess of Kent.—The residents at Albergate, the summer seat of the Duchess of Kent, were recently surprised with a visit from a Bremen farmer, who exhibited all the symptoms of having imbued in him a mortifying quality of silence. The farmer, when asked what was the secret of his silence, replied, "I am a widow, and the duchess in this?" asked the farmer, "Yes," replied Phan, "leave your card, or say what's your business?" What's the use leaving my (hic) card when I'm here? (hic)—myself identified the duchess, and the farmer, who had been greatly astonished, "What, I see the duchess is a widow, (sic)" "Yes, that is well known," replied Phan, beginning to be nimmed, but what of that?" "What of that?" rejoined the farmer, "There is this; I am a widower, the duchess is a widow, and (hic) I went to get to the Royal Family."—Scotch paper.
