Adams says as to Mr. Lovering's curious attitude. I also agree with the theory which, in his opinion, should underlie measures of this kind.

I must acknowledge receipt, also, of the additional copies of the booklets, etc., published by your association, and of the copies, in pamphlet form, of the proposed measure itself. I have noted the points raised in your memo of enquiries, and am enclosing in this letter a memorandum covering them in the order in which they have been raised.

The bill for typewriting has been received today, and I have forwarded it to the Accountant for payment. A cheque will be sent in due course.

I cannot but regret that it should have proven impossible for Mr. Hugo and yourself to reconcile the difference in points of view which were apparent on the morning we discussed the proposed measure together. I can only hope that, as you anticipated, the chances of the measure's success have been strengthened rather than weakened thereby.

I trust you will pardon delay in my acknowledgment of your letter. The truth is that the pressure of Parliamentary duties here during the past few days has
